PREFACE OF THE AMERICAN EDITOR.

THE volume here presented to the American public is one of a series of Dictionaries prepared under the editorial supervision of Dr. William Smith, aided by a number of learned men, and designed to present in an English dress the valuable historical and archæological researches of the scholars of Germany. For it is a fact not to be denied, that classical learning has found its proper abode in the latter country, and that whatever of value on these subjects has appeared in England for many years past, has been, with a few honorable exceptions—rari nantes in gurgite vasto—derived immediately or remotely from German sources. For instance, an English “Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge” desires a “History of Greek Literature;” none but a German can be found competent to prepare it, and when death removes him in the midst of his noble efforts, a continuator can not be found on English soil, and the ablest history of Greek literature (as far as it goes) remains a fragment. Turn over the pages of the most elaborate and valuable English histories of Greece, and how few names are there quoted as authorities out of the limits of the land of antiquarian research. Thirlwall’s and Grote’s splendid superstructures rest on Teutonic foundations. The text-books used even in the Universities, which claim a Bentley and a Porson among their illustrious dead, and where Gaisford still labors in a green old age, the Nestor of English scholarship, are mere reprints from, or based on, German recensions. The University press sends forth an Aristotle, an Æschylus, a Sophocles, and what English alumnus of Oxford or Cambridge performs the critical revision—we read on the title-page the Teutonic names of Bekker, Dindorf, &c. As in every other department of classical learning English scholarship is indebted to German labors, so, until the appearance of the present series of dictionaries (mostly the result of German erudition), she had nothing to put in comparison with the valuable classical encyclopædias of Germany but the miserable compendiums of Lempriere and Dymock—compilations in which the errors were so glaring and so absurd, that when the American editor of the present work prepared a revised edition of Lempriere, pruning away many of its faults, correcting many of its misstatements, supplying many of its deficiencies, and introducing to his countrymen the latest results of German scholarship, his work was immediately reprinted, and found extensive circulation in England. Though he had to work single-handed, and amid many discouragements and disadvantages, yet his labors seemed to meet with favor abroad, and this approbation was distinctly manifested in the fact that his last revision of Lempriere was republished in its native land in several different forms and in abridgments. What he sought to do unaided, and in the intervals of laborious professional duties, has now been undertaken on a more extended scale by an association of scholars, both English and foreign. The increased attention paid to this department in Germany, the recent discoveries made by travellers in more thorough explorations, the vast amount of literary material collected in separate works, or scattered through the published proceedings of learned societies, at length suggested to these scholars the propriety of exhibiting in one body the latest results of German learning. An able and useful guide was found at hand in the learned and copious "Real-Encyclopädie der Alterthumswissenschaft von Aug. Pauly." Following in the footsteps of Pauly and his fellow-laborers, and using freely the materials and the references of these writers, as well as other works of standard excellence not otherwise accessible to English students, Dr. William Smith, aided by some twenty-eight collaborateurs, English and German, prepared,

1st. A Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities, London, 1842, in one vol. 8vo., of 1121 pages; reprinted in a new edition, London, 1850.

2dly. A Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology, in 3 vols. 8vo., of about 3600 pages; to be followed by, 3dly. A Dictionary of Ancient Geography, now in preparation.

After the completion of the second of these works, Dr. W. Smith and his brother, the Rev. Philip Smith, from that work, from Pauly's Encyclopädie, and other works, drew up a "Classical Dictionary for Schools" (of Greek and Roman Biography, Mythology, and Geography), which should by its size and price be accessible to all students, and present in a brief and convenient form the latest and most reliable results in these departments. The plan and detail of the work are stated at length in the preface of the English editor, subjoined to this, on p. xiii.-xv., to which the reader is referred. When the printing of this work commenced, the publishers of the American edition immediately made an arrangement with the English publishers, and purchased at a considerable cost the sheets in advance, to be revised and edited for circulation in this country; and the two books were to appear nearly simultaneously. The present work is the revised edition of the English one, and will be found, the editor believes, greatly improved, as well as much more complete. It is not, however designed to, and, in the editor's opinion, will not supersede his own "Classical Dictionary" published in 1841, since the articles are purposely brief, and results only are stated, without that fullness of detail which is desirable to the more advanced scholar and the educated man of leisure; but it is intended for the use of those whose means will not allow a more expensive, or their scanty time the use of a more copious work; in other words, it is meant to take the place, by reason of its convenient size and low price, of Lempriere's old dictionary, which, with all its absurd errors and defects, still has a lingering existence in certain parts of our country on account of its cheapness. On this head the English editor speaks strongly; in point of literary or scientific value, Lempriere's dictionary is dead—"requiescat in pace"—and to put it into a boy's hands now as a guide in classical matters would be as wise and as useful as giving him some mystic treatise of the Middle Ages on alchemy to serve as a textbook in chemistry. The present work contains all the names of any value to a schoolboy occurring in Lempriere, and a great many not in that work, while the information is derived from the fountain-head, and not from the diluted stream of French encyclopedias.

As regards the plan pursued in revising the work, the editor has been guided by the wants of the class for whom it is specially designed; he has therefore inserted more fully than in the original the names occurring in the authors most frequently read by younger students, as Cæsar, Sallust, Virgil, Cicero; Ovid, Xenophon, Herodotus, Homer, &c., and has endeavored to give briefly such information as a boy meeting with any of these names in his author would seek in a classical dictionary. For this purpose he has used freely the most recent and most reliable authorities; he has added brief notices from Dr. Smith's Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, and from his own Classical Dictionary, of course, abridging to suit the character of the work; he has also, among other works less frequently consulted, and single books on special topics unnecessary to be enumerated, derived materials from Ersch and Gruber's Allgemeine Encyclopædie (A-F, H-Italien, O-Phokylides), 97 vols. 4to, from Kitto's and Winer's Bible Cyclopædia, from the indexes and notes to the best editions of the classic authors, especially the valuable index to Groskurd's translation of Strabo, and the Onomasticon Ciceronianum and Platonium of Orelli, from Gruber's Mythologisches Lexicon, 3 vols. 8vo, from Manert's, Ukert's, and especially Forbiger's Alte Geographie, from Cramer's Ancient Greece, Italy, and Asia Minor, from numerous recent books of travel in classic and sacred lands, from Grote's and Thirlwall's Greece, and Niebuhr's Rome and Lectures; but particularly would he acknowledge, in the most explicit terms, his obligations to Pauly's Real-Encyclopædie der Alterthumswissenschaft (A-Thymna), and to Kraft and Müller's improved edition of Funke's Real-Schullexicon (of which, unfortunately, only the first volume, A-K, has appeared): from these two works he has derived many of his own articles, and has been enabled to correct many of those in the English work taken from the same sources. In this connection, the editor regrets to find that Dr. W. Smith and some of his coadjutors have studiously avoided, in all their dictionaries hitherto published, making any direct acknowledgment of their indebtedness to the former of these two works. Although the plan and much of the detail of the works in question are taken from Pauly's, there is no indication of the existence of such a book in the preface to the Dictionary of Antiquities, or to the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, and this omission has led a distinguished German scholar, in a notice of the latter work in the Leipziger Repertorium for February, 1846, to complain of this conduct as unscholarlike and reprehensible: he says, "Under this head the editor (Dr. W. Smith) ought not to have omitted stating of how great service to him and several of his coadjutors the 'Encyclopedia of Classical Antiquity,' begun by Aug. Pauly and continued after his (Pauly's) death by Chr. Walz and W. Teuffel, has been, and especially since we can show that the above-named production of German scholars has been actually adopted as the basis of the English Dictionary, although the plan of the latter is considerably altered." . . . "In regard to its (Smith's Dictionary of Biography and Mythology) relation to the Stuttgart (Pauly's) Encyclopædia, we have still further to remark, that the articles which have been borrowed from it, namely, by Dr. Schmitz and the editor, have been revised, and in some respects considerably enlarged." *

* "Hier hätte der Herausgeber nicht verschweigen sollen, von wie grossem Nutzen ihm und mehreren seiner mitarbeiter die von Aug. Pauly begonnene und nach dessen Tode von Ch. Walz und W. Teuffel fortgesetzte 'Real-Encyclopædie der Classischen Alterthumswis-

The present edition is called an enlarged and corrected one, and the editor thinks he may justly claim to have improved as well as enlarged the work: his own additions are inclosed in brackets, and amount to more than 1400 independent articles, while the additions to articles already in the work, but either too briefly or incorrectly stated, or omitting some important matter, are not a few. The editor has bestowed considerable care on the department of bibliography, and under this head many additions will be found. Dr. Smith has been content in most cases to copy the statements in the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, without noticing many valuable books which have appeared since the publication of that work. Many corrections of names, or erroneous statements too short to be marked in the text, will also be found on a comparison of the two editions; we have kept a list of these, and subjoin some of the more important of them here, that the public may see that the revision of the work has been pretty thorough. Many mere verbal alterations and corrections of oversight or carelessness in reading the proofs might also be adduced.

ABÆ is said to be in Phocis, on the boundaries of Eubœa!

ÆSACUS! Thetis is used for Tethys, and the error is very frequently repeated, in most cases copied from the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, in the present instance adopted by Dr. Schmitz from Pauly, s. v.

ALEXANDRIA: oftener ia, rarely ëa, a statement just the reverse of the fact, and for correction, vide the article in the Dictionary.

ANCEUS: the Greek quotation is wrong; the line as given by us from the scholiast is a hexameter verse, as it is also given by Thirlwall in the Philological Museum, vol. i., page 107, quoted by Dr. Schmitz for his authority, though he copies the altered Greek from Pauly.

ANIUS: Dryope is copied erroneously from the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, and the account of the daughters of Anius is taken incorrectly from Kraft and Müller, though right in the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology.

ANTONIA 1 is called husband of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and ANTONIA 2, the husband of Drusus; where the editor, copying from the German of Kraft and Müller, has taken Gemahlin (wife) for Gemahl (husband); and so again under

CRETHEUS, by way probably of compensation, Kraft and Müller's Gemahl (husband) is translated wife, and Cretheus is made "wife of Tyro."

APHRODITOPOLIS, No. 3, 1, from Kraft and Müller, Aphroditopolis Nomos for -lites.

APIS (the city) is said to be 10 stadia west of Parætonium for 100, which erroneous statement, probably a typographical slip in the German work, is copied from Kraft and Müller.

ASSUS: ruins near Berani, a typographical error from Kraft and Müller for Beram or Beiram.

ARCADIA (p. 70), the greatest river of Peloponnesus is said to be the Achelous!!

ARGONAUTÆ (p. 76): "And when Pollux was slain by Amycus," copied from an article senschaft, gewesen ist, und zwar um so weniger, da wir diese Arbeit deutscher Gelehrten geradezu als die Grundlage des englischen Dictionary bezeichnen dürfen, obschon der Plan derselben vielfach anders angelegt ist." * * * "Ueber das Verhältniss zu der Stuttgarter Encyclopädie ist noch zu bemerken, das die Artikel, welche daher entlehnt sind, namentlich von Schmitz und dem Herausgeber, aufs Neue durchgesehen und zum Theil schätzbar erweitert sind."

in the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology by Dr. L. Schmitz, who has compiled the account from Grotefend's in Pauly, and falls into Grotefend's unaccountable blunder of making Amyceus slay Pollux, though Apollodorus, whose narrative both profess to follow, says plainly enough the reverse (Πολυδεύκης δέ, ὑποσχόμενος πυκτεύσειν πρὸς αὐτόν, πλήζας κατὰ τὸν αἰχένα ἀπέκτεινε, i., 9, 20, § 2), and yet Dr. Schmitz, at the end of his article, quotes Schœnemann, de Geogr. Argonaut.; Ukert, Geographie der Griech. und Römer; Müller, Orchomenos, &c., but says not a word about Pauly's work or Grotefend.

Other instances of similarity to Pauly's work are frequent in the articles of this contributor, but this is not the place to point them out.

AULIS: a strange fatality seems to hang over this unfortunate place; the editors, infected with the American spirit of annexation, transfer it, port and all, from the main land to the island of Eubœa!!

BEERYCES, after Craft and Müller, for Bebryces, or, at least, Bebryces; and in the account of their king, the editor, copying hastily from Pauly, has mistaken the German Ihren for Ihrer. Pauly has "Ihren König Amyceus erschlug Pollux," the termination of the accusative indicating sufficiently the object; but Dr. Smith, in following the same order in English, has made quite a difference in the result: "whose king, Amyceus, slew Pollux!"

CÆSAR, No. 5: L. Cæsar is called the uncle, and afterward nephew, of M. Antony in the same article.

CHARES (at the end), the colossus, overthrown B.C. 224, and removed A.D. 672; of course it could not have remained on the ground 923 years, as stated.

CHION: thirteen letters for seventeen.

COCALUS: it is said that he received Dædalus, and afterward killed him, when Minos came in pursuit of him. It was Minos that was killed; the error is taken from Dr. Schmitz, in the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology.

CRATOS: "Uranus and Ge" for "Pallas and Styx;" taken from Dr. Schmitz, in the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology.

CYME, in Æolis: it is said to have been Hesiod's birth-place! though, under HESIOD, it is correctly stated that "we learn from his own poem that he was born in the village of Asera, in Bœotia."

ERINNYES: reference is made to Eumenidæ! for a feminine plural; and so again, under Phaëthon, his sisters are called Heliadæ! the same error occurs under Tisiphonæ (Eumenidæ!) and under Valens (the islands Stæchadæ! for des), in part from the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology.

HALESUS: he is said to have been slain by "Evander" for "Pallas," copied from Dr. Schmitz in the larger dictionary.

HALMYRIS: we have 'Αλμύρις, sc. λίμνη for λίμνη.

HALOSYDNE: Thetys (or Thetis), as usual, for Tothys; from Dr. Schmitz, in the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology.

HELIOS: Phaëtusa, and, under Heliades, Phaëton, for "th."

HERCULES (p. 310): he is said to have taken Pylos and slain Periclymenus, a son of Neleus; elsewhere, all the sons of Neleus, except Nestor.

ITHOME: "last" Messenian war for "first."

LEANDER: "Herois" is made the genitive of "Hero."

LEONTIADES: Spartan" exiles for "Theban."

LEUCIPPUS: his birth-place is inferred to be Elis!! because he was of the "Eleatic" school, instead of "Elea," in Italy! copied from the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology.

MAXIMUS No. 2: Dionysius is styled Halicarnassus!

MYCENÆ: the treasury of Atræus, in Mycenæ, is called the treasury of Athens! and the same error is repeated under Pelasgi (near the end).

MYRONIDES: Megara is used for Megaris.

NEREUS: just as Proteus, in the story of Ulysses, for Menelaus.

NITRIÆ: νοῦδος has the feminine adjective Νηριωτις! agreeing with it.

OASIS: αι'Οασιραι is used for οι'Οασ.

OGYRIS: 2000 stadia — 20 geographical miles for 200.

PADUS: Mount Vesula for -lus!

PANDA: the Siraces for Siraci, as used by Tacitus.

PASITIGRIS: it is said to be now Karoon, which name is given to the Eulæus, s. v.

PAULINUS (p. 531): “Nero’s” for “Otho’s.”

PELOPONNESUS: in the enumeration of its provinces, Argolis is strangely omitted.

PHOCIS: Daphnus is placed on the Eubæan Sea, between the Loeri Ozolæ!! and Opuntii.

PHOCIS: The Crissæan plain is placed in the southeast, on the borders of Loeri Ozolæ! and anti-historical for ante-historical.

PICENUM: along the northern! coast of the Adriatic for western.

PIRITHOUS: Theseus is said to have placed Helen at “Æthra!” under the care of “Phædra!”

POSEIDON (p. 610): Pasiphaë is made “daughter!” of Minos.

SCOPAS, No. 1: he is put to death B.C. 296, though alive in B.C. 204; copied from the larger dictionary.

SILANUS, No. 6: the dates refer to B.C. for A.D.

TAVIUM: now Boghaz-Kieni for Kieui is a typographical error copied from Pauly.

THEOPHRASTUS (p. 763) is said to have presided in the Academy! (for Lyceum), 35 years

TERENTIA, the wife of Cicero, is called Tullia, and this error is copied from the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology.

In some instances references are made to articles which are omitted; these the editor has been careful to supply, while in other cases important names have been passed over altogether: a few of these are given in the English work in the addenda, and many others not there supplied might be quoted, but any one running over the additions marked with brackets can judge of the extent of this improvement in the American edition for himself. The editor ought to add on this point, that, before receiving the page of addenda, he had already inserted in their proper places the only important articles there given. The biographical and mythological notices in the present work, which have been chiefly taken from the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, have been compared with the corresponding ones in that work, and several errors are found to have been made in the process of abridgment, e. g., FERONIA (p. 263) is said to have had her chief sanctuary at Terracina, near Mount Soracte!! Now Terracina is in Latium, southeast of Rome, while Mount Soracte was in Etruria, some distance north of Rome: the larger dictionary says, “Besides the sanctuaries at Terracina and near Mount Soracte, she had others at,” &c.

Other errors from the same cause will be found (in the English work, corrected in this) under Octavius No. 8, Masinissa, Orestes, Tissaphernes, &c.

Another great blemish in the English work is the utter carelessness exhibited in the accentuation of the Greek names. If it be desirable to have the Greek accented at all, it should be done correctly. The editor has carefully revised this portion of the work also, and hopes no gross error will be found uncorrected. In the historical and mythological names the errors are copied from the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology, which exhibits the same carelessness in this respect, and these errors are not of that nature that they might result merely from haste, or a disinclination to turn to the pages of a lexicon or an author to find the place of the accent, but such as the slightest acquaintance with the principles of Greek accentuation would indicate to the eye at once; e. g., dissyllables with long penult and short final syllable having the acute on the penult; the circumflex placed on the antepenult; the acute placed on the penult of feminine adjectives in ίς and άς; or final syllable long by nature, with circumflex on the penult, &c.; as instances almost at random, Βούθασσις, Κλέανθης, Κτήσις, Ἀρητίς, Γενεταίος, Γλάυκος, Καλλιμέδων, Ἴσμήνος, Ἴλος, Μίδα, Κρήναι, Μοιροκλής, Θαλάττα, Πελίαδες, &c. &c. In the English edition the Greek names of the Greek divinities are commonly given, but with considerable inconsistency; e. g., Ge is usually employed, though it does not occur in the work as a separate article at all, Gæa being the form in the alphabetical order, and this is frequently used instead of Ge; Pluto or Aidoneus sometimes instead of Hades, Bacchus interchangeably with Dionysius; while, on the other hand, Æsculapius and Hercules, Ulysses and Pollux, Ajax, and other heroes, are uniformly written after the Latin form of the name; these the editor has allowed to stand, and so, too, he has retained the Greek names of the divinities, but has placed by the side of this form the more usual one inclosed in parentheses, or has placed the parentheses around the former. The change, familiar enough to the Germans and those well acquainted with German literature, seems yet, among us, too great and radical a one to be made at once. Time may effect this, but at present, as a matter of expediency, "sub judice lis est."

To impart additional value to the work, and render it still more complete as a classical guide and book of reference, the editor has appended from the Dictionary of Biography and Mythology the "Chronological Tables of Greek and Roman History" subjoined to that work, and which have been drawn up with great care from the Fasti Hellenici and Romani of Clinton, the Griechische and Römische Zeittafeln of Fischer and Soetbeer, and the Annales Veterum Regnorum et Populorum of Zumpt, and in addition to these, the "Tables of Weights, Measures, and Money," from the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities. With these various improvements and additions, the editor now presents the book to the American public, and ventures to recommend it as a reliable guide to those, for whom it is designed, in the various departments which on its title-page it professes to comprise.

In conclusion, the editor would be guilty of great injustice were he not to acknowledge in the warmest terms the obligations which he is under to his learned and accurate friend Professor Drisler, whose very efficient co-operation has been secured in the revisal and correction of the entire work. Every article has been read over and examined in common, and a frank interchange of opinions has been made wherever any point occurred of sufficient importance to warrant this. And it is on this account that he ventures to recommend the present volume with more confidence to the young student, than if it had been the result merely of his own individual exertions.

P R E F A C E .

THE great progress which classical studies have made in Europe, and more especially in Germany, during the present century, has superseded most of the works usually employed in the elucidation of the Greek and Roman writers. It had long been felt by our best scholars and teachers that something better was required than we yet possessed in the English language for illustrating the Antiquities, Literature, Mythology, and Geography of the ancient writers, and for enabling a diligent student to read them in the most profitable manner. It was with a view of supplying this acknowledged want that the series of classical dictionaries was undertaken; and the very favorable manner in which these works have been received by the scholars and teachers of this country demands from the editor his most grateful acknowledgments. The approbation with which he has been favored has encouraged him to proceed in the design which he had formed from the beginning, of preparing a series of works which might be useful not only to the scholar and the more advanced student, but also to those who were entering on their classical studies. The dictionaries of "Greek and Roman Antiquities" and of "Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology," which are already completed, and the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography," on which the editor is now engaged, are intended to meet the wants of the more advanced scholar; but these works are on too extended a scale, and enter too much into details, to be suitable for the use of junior students. For the latter class of persons a work is required of the same kind as Lempriere's well-known dictionary, containing in a single volume the most important names, biographical, mythological, and geographical, occurring in the Greek and Roman writers usually read in our public schools. It is invidious for an author to speak of the defects of his predecessors; but it may safely be said that Lempriere's work, which originally contained the most serious mistakes, has long since become obsolete, and that since the time it was compiled we have attained to more correct knowledge on a vast number of subjects comprised in that work.

The present dictionary is designed, as already remarked, chiefly to elucidate the Greek and Roman writers usually read in schools; but, at the same time, it has not been considered expedient to omit any proper names connected with classical antiquity, of which it is expected that some knowledge ought to be possessed by every person who aspires to a liberal education. Accordingly, while more space has been given to the prominent Greek and Roman writers, and to the more distinguished characters of Greek and Roman history, other names have not been omitted altogether, but only treated with greater brevity. The chief difficulty which every author has to contend with in a work like the present is the vastness of his subject and the copiousness of his materials. It has therefore been necessary in all cases to study the greatest possible brevity, to avoid all discussions, and to be satisfied with giving simply the results at which the best modern scholars have arrived. The writer is fully aware that in adopting this plan he has frequently stated dogmatically conclusions which may be open to much dispute ; but he has thought it better to run this risk, rather than to encumber and bewilder the junior student with conflicting opinions. With the view likewise of economizing space, few references have been given to ancient and modern writers. In fact, such references are rarely of service to the persons for whom such a work as the present is intended, and serve more for parade than for any useful purpose ; and it has been the less necessary to give them in this work, as it is supposed that the persons who really require them will be in possession of the larger dictionaries.

The present work may be divided into the three distinct parts, Biography, Mythology, and Geography, on each of which a few words may be necessary.

The biographical portion may again be divided into the three departments of History, Literature, and Art. The historical articles include all the names of any importance which occur in the Greek and Roman writers, from the earliest times down to the extinction of the Western Empire, in the year 476 of our era. Very few names are inserted which are not included in this period, but still there are some persons who lived after the fall of the Western Empire who could not with propriety be omitted in a classical dictionary. Such is the case with Justinian, whose legislation has exerted such an important influence upon the nations of Western Europe ; with Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, at whose court lived Cassiodorus and Boëthius ; and with a few others. The lives of the later Western emperors and their contemporaries are given with greater brevity than the lives of such persons as lived in the more important epochs of Greek and Roman history, since the students for whom the present work is intended will rarely require information respecting the later period of the empire. The Romans, as a general rule, have been given under the cognomens, and not under the gentile names ; but in cases where a person is more usually mentioned under the name of his gens than under that of his cognomen, he will be found under the former. Thus, for example, the two celebrated conspirators against Cæsar, Brutus and Cassius, are given under these names respectively, though uniformity would require either that Cassius should be inserted under his cognomen of Longinus, or Brutus under his gentile name of Junius. But in this as in all other cases, it has been considered more advisable to consult utility than to adhere to any prescribed rule, which would be attended with practical inconveniences.

To the literary articles considerable space has been devoted. Not only are all Greek and Roman writers inserted whose works are extant, but also all such as exercised any important influence upon Greek and Roman literature, although their writings have not come down to us. It has been thought quite unnecessary, however, to give the vast number of writers mentioned only by Athenæus, Stobæus, the Lexicographers, and the Scholiasts ; for, though such names ought to be found in a complete history of Greek and Roman literature, they would be clearly out of place in a work like the present. In the case of all writers whose works are extant, a brief account of their works, as well as of their lives, is given ; and at the end of each article one or two of the best modern editions are specified. As the present work is designed for the elucidation of the classical writers, the Christian writers are omitted, with the exception of the more distinguished fathers, who form a constituent part of the history of Greek and Roman literature. The Byzantine historians are, for the same reason, inserted; though in their case, as well as in the case of the Christian Fathers, it has been impossible to give a complete account either of their lives or of their writings.

The lives of all the more important artists have been inserted, and an account has also been given of their extant works. The history of ancient art has received so little attention from the scholars of this country, that it has been deemed advisable to devote as much space to this important subject as the limits of the work would allow. Accordingly, some artists are noticed on account of their celebrity in the history of art, although their names are not even mentioned in the ancient writers. This remark applies to Agasias, the sculptor of the Borghese gladiator, which is still preserved in the Louvre at Paris; to Agesander, one of the sculptors of the group of Laocoön; to Glycon, the sculptor of the Farnese Hercules, and to others. On the contrary, many of the names of the artists in Pliny's long list are omitted, because they possess no importance in the history of art.

In writing the mythological articles, care has been taken to avoid, as far as possible, all indelicate allusions, as the work will probably be much in the hands of young persons. It is of so much importance to discriminate between the Greek and Roman mythology, that an account of the Greek divinities is given under their Greek names, and of the Roman divinities under their Latin names, a practice which is universally adopted by the Continental writers, which has received the sanction of some of our own scholars, and which is, moreover, of such great utility in guarding against endless confusions and mistakes as to require no apology for its introduction into this work.

For the geographical articles the editor is alone responsible. The biographical and mythological articles are founded upon those in the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology," but the geographical articles are written entirely anew for the present work. In addition to the original sources, the editor has availed himself of the best modern treatises on the subject, and of the valuable works of travels in Greece, Italy, and the East, which have appeared within the last few years, both in England and in Germany. It would have been impossible to give references to these treatises without interfering with the general plan of the present work, but this omission will be supplied in the forthcoming "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography." It is hoped that in the geographical portion of the work very few omissions will be discovered of names occurring in the chief classical writers; but the great number of names found only in Strabo, Pliny, Ptolemy, and the Itineraries, have been purposely omitted, except in cases where such names have become of historical celebrity, or have given rise to important towns in modern times. At the commencement of every geographical article the Ethnic name and the modern name have been given, whenever they could be ascertained. In conclusion, the editor has to express his obligations to his brother, the Rev. Philip Smith, who has rendered him valuable assistance by writing the geographical articles relating to Asia and Africa.

CLASSICAL DICTIONARY,

BIOGRAPHICAL, MYTHOLOGICAL, AND GEOGRAPHICAL.

AARASSUS.

[AARASSUS (Ἀρασσός), a city of Pisidia; more correctly, perhaps, Arassus, as given in some MSS.; the old Latin version of Strabo having also Arasum.]

[ABA (Ἄβα), daughter of Zenophanes, made herself queen of Olbe in Cilicia; her authority was confirmed by Antony and Cleopatra: she was subsequently deposed and driven out.]

[ABA (Ἄβα), more usually Ἄβα, q. v.]

ABACENUM (Ἀβακείνον or τὰ Ἀβακείνα: Ἄβα-καινίνοσ: ruins near Tripì), an ancient town of the Siculi in Sicily, west of Messina, and south of Tyndaris.

ABÆ (Ἄβαι: Ἀβαίος: ruins near Exarcho), an ancient town of Phocis, on the boundaries of Bœotia, said to have been founded by the Argive Abas, but see ABANTES. It possessed an ancient temple and oracle of Apollo, who hence derived the surname of Abæus. The temple was destroyed by the Persians in the invasion of Xerxes, and a second time by the Bœotians in the sacred war: it was rebuilt by Hadrian.

[ABALUS, an island in the North or German Ocean, where amber was said to have been washed up by the waves, and used by the inhabitants for fuel. The more usual name was Basilis.]

[ABANNÆ or ABANNI, a people of Mauretania, brought into subjection to the Roman power by Theodosius, father of the Emperor Theodosius.]

[ABANTES (Ἀβαντες), the ancient inhabitants of Eubœa. (Hom., Il., ii., 536). They are said to have been of Thracian origin, to have first settled in Phocis, where they built Abæ, and afterward to have crossed over to Eubœa. The Abantes of Eubœa assisted in colonizing several of the Ionic cities of Asia Minor.

ABANTIÆDES (Ἀβαντιάδης), any descendant of Abas, but especially Perseus, great-grandson of Abas, and Acrisius, son of Abas. A female descendant of Abas, as Danaë and Atalante, was called Abantias.

ABANTIÆS. Vid. ABANTIÆDES.

ABANTIÐAS (Ἀβαντιάδης), son of Paseas, became tyrant of Sicyon, after murdering Clinias, ABAS.

the father of Aratus, B.C. 264, but was soon after assassinated.

[ABANTIS (Ἀβαντίς), an early name of Eubœa, from the Abantes.]

[ABARBÆREA (Ἀβαρβαρήν), name of a Naiad, mother of Æsepus and Pegasus.]

[ABÆRIS (Ἀβαρίς), son of Seuthes, was a Hyperborean priest of Apollo, and came from the country about the Caucasus to Greece, while his own country was visited by a plague. In his travels through Greece he carried with him an arrow as the symbol of Apollo, and gave oracles. His history is entirely mythical, and is related in various ways: he is said to have taken no earthly food, and to have ridden on his arrow, the gift of Apollo, through the air. He cured diseases by incantations, and delivered the world from a plague. Later writers ascribe to him several works; but if such works were really current in ancient times, they were not genuine. The time of his appearance in Greece is stated differently: he may, perhaps, be placed about B.C. 570. [Abæris occurs in Nonnus, Dionys., 11, 132, but the short quantity seems preferable.—2. A Latin hero, who fought on the side of Turnus against Æneas: he was slain by Euryalus.—3. Called Caucasius by Ovid, a friend of Phineas, slain by Perseus.]

[ABARIS (Ἀβαρίς or Ἀβάρης), a city of Egypt, called, also, Avaris. Manetho places it to the east of the Bubastic mouth of the Nile, in the Saitic nome, while Mannert identifies it with what was afterward called Pelusium.]

ABARNIS (Ἀβαρνίς or Ἀβαρνός: Ἀβαρνέϊς), a town and promontory close to Lampsacus on the Asiatic side of the Hellespont. [Abarnis was also the name of the country lying around and adjacent to the city.]

ABAS (Ἄβας). 1. Son of Metanira, was changed by Ceres (Demeter) into a lizard, because he mocked the goddess when she had come on her wanderings into the house of his mother, and drank eagerly to quench her thirst.—2.

Twelfth king of Argos, son of Lynceus and Hypermnestra, grandson of Danaüs, and father of Acrisius and Prætus. When he informed his father of the death of Danaüs, he was rewarded with the shield of his grandfather, which was sacred to Juno (Hera). This shield performed various marvels, and the mere sight of it could reduce a revolted people to submission. He is described as a successful conqueror and as the founder of the town of Abæ in Phocis, and of the Pelagic Argos in Thessaly.—[3. A centaur, son of Ixion and Nephele, a celebrated hunter, one of those who escaped the fury of the Lapthæ in the fight that arose at the nuptials of Pirithoüs and Deidamia.—4. A follower of Perseus, who slew Pelates in the contest with Phineus.—5. A warrior in the Trojan army, son of Eurydamas, slain by Diomedæ.—Others of this name occur in Virgil and Ovid, who probably derived their accounts of them from the Cyclic poets.]

[ABASITUS ('Αβασίτις), a district of Phrygia Major, on the borders of Lydia.]

[ABATOS ('Αβατος; now Biggeh), a small rocky island near Philæ in the Nile, to which priests alone were allowed access, whence the name.]

[ABDAGESES, a Parthian nobleman who revolted from his king Artabanus, and aided Tirdates.]

ABDËRA (τὰ Ἀβδέρρα, Abdera, æ, and Abdera, crum: 'Αβδηρίτης, Abderites and Abdërīta). 1. (Now Polystilo), a town of Thrace, near the mouth of the Nestus, which flowed through the town. According to mythology, it was founded by Hercules in honor of his favorite ABDEBUS; but according to history, it was colonized by Timesius of Clazomenæ about B.C. 656. Timesius was expelled by the Thracians, and the town was colonized a second time by the inhabitants of Teos in Ionia, who settled there after their own town had been taken by the Persians, B.C. 544. Abdera was a flourishing town when Xerxes invaded Greece, and continued a place of importance under the Romans, who made it a free city. It was the birthplace of Democritus, Protagoras, Anaxarehus, and other distinguished men; but its inhabitants, notwithstanding, were accounted stupid, and an "Abderite" was a term of reproach.—2. (Now Adra), a town of Hispania Bætica on the coast, founded by the Phœnicians.

ABDËRUS ('Αβδέρως), a favorite of Hercules, was torn to pieces by the mares of Diomedes, which Hercules had given him to [guard while he himself] pursued the Bistones. Hercules is said to have built the town of Abdera in honor of him.

ABDÖLÖNÏMUS or ABDΛΛÖNÏMUS, also called Ballonymus, a gardener, but of royal descent, was made king of Sidon by Alexander the Great.

ABELLA or AVELLA ('Αβέλλα: Abellanus; now Avella Vecchia), a town of Campania, not far from Nola, founded by a colony from Chalcis in Eubœa. It was celebrated for its apples, whence Virgil (Æn., vii, 740) calls it malifera, and for its great hazel-nuts, nucæ Avellana.

ABELLÏNUM (Abellinas: now Avellino), a town of the Hirpini in Samnium, near the sources of the Sabatus.—[2. (Now Marsico Vetere), a town of Lucania, near the sources of the Aciris, called, for distinction's sake, Abellinum Marsicum.]

ABGÄRUS, ACBÄRUS, or AUGÄRUS ('Αβγαρος, 'Ακβαρος, Αύγαρος), a name common to many rulers of Edessa, the capital of the district of Osrohène in Mesopotamia. Of these rulers, one is supposed by Eusebius to have been the author of a letter written to Christ, which he found in a church at Edessa and translated from the Syriac. The letter is believed to be spurious.

ABIA (ἡ Ἀβία: near Zarnata), a town of Messenia on the Messenian Gulf. It is said to have been the same town as the Ire of the Iliad (ix., 292), and to have acquired the name of Abia in honor of Abia, the nurse of Hyllus, a son of Hercules. At a later time Abia belonged to the Achaean League.

ABÏI ('Αβιοι), a tribe mentioned by Homer (Il., xiii, 6), and apparently a Thraecian people. This matter is discussed by Strabo (p. 296).

ABÏLA (τὰ Ἀβίλα: 'Αβιλῆνός, probably Nebi Abel), a town of Cœle-Syria, afterward called Claudiopolis, and the capital of the tetrarchy of Abilène (Luke iii, 1). The position seems doubtful. A town of the same name is mentioned by Josephus as being sixty stadia east of the Jordan.—[2. A mountain of Mauretania: Vid. ABYLA.]

ABÏSÄRES ('Αβισάρης), also called Embisarus, an Indian king beyond the River Hydaspes, sent embassies to Alexander the Great, who not only allowed him to retain his kingdom, but increased it, and on his death appointed his son his successor.

[ABÏLËRUS ('Αβλῆρος), a Trojan, slain by Antiochus.]

ABNÖBA MONS, the range of hills covered by the Black Forest in Germany, not a single mountain.

[ABOBÏCA (now Bayonne), a city of Gallæcia in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the mouth of the Minius.]

[ABOCÏS (now Abou Simbel), a city of Æthiopia, on the western bank of the Nile, with very remarkable ruins.]

ABÖNÏTÏCHOS ('Αβώνων τεῖχος), a town of Paphlagonia, on the Black Sea, with a harbor, afterward called Ionopolis ('Ἰωνόπολις), whence its modern name Ineboli, the birth-place of the pretended prophet ALEXANDER, of whom Lucian has left us an account.

ABÖRÏGINES, the original inhabitants of a country, equivalent to the Greek αὐτόχθονες. But the Aborigines in Italy are not in the Latin writers the original inhabitants of all Italy, but the name of the ancient people who drove the Siculi out of Latium, and there became the progenitors of the Latini.

ABORRHAS ('Αβόρραç; now Khabur), a branch of the Euphrates, which joins that river on the east side near Arreesium. It is called the Araxes by Xenophon (Anab., i, 4, § 19), and was crossed by the army of Cyrus the Younger in the march from Sardis to the neighborhood of Babylon, B.C. 401. A branch of this river which rises near Nisibis, and is now called Jakh jakhah, is probably the ancient Mygdonius. The Khabur rises near Orfah, and is joined near the Lake of Khatuniyah by the Jakhjakhah, after which the united stream flows into the Euphrates. The course of the Khabur is very incorrectly represented in the maps.

ABRADĀTAS (Ἀβραδάτας), a king of Susa, and an ally of the Assyrians against Cyrus, according to Xenophon's Cyropædia. His wife, Panthēa, was taken on the conquest of the Assyrian camp. In consequence of the honorable treatment which she received from Cyrus, Abradatas joined the latter with his forces. He fell in the first battle in which he fought for him, while fighting against the Egyptians in the army of Croesus at Thymbrana, on the Pactolus. Inconsolable at her loss, Panthea put an end to her own life. Cyrus had a high mound raised in honor of them.

[ABRETTENE (Ἀβρεττηνή), a region of Mysia, on the borders of Bithynia, said to have been so called from the nymph Abretia.]

ABRINCATŪI, a people of Gallia Lugdunensis, in the neighborhood of the modern Avranches.

ABRŌCŌMAS (Ἀβροκόμας), one of the satraps of Artaxerxes Mnemon, was sent with an army to oppose Cyrus on his march into Upper Asia, B.C. 401. He retreated on the approach of Cyrus, but did not join the king in time for the battle of Cunaxa.

[ABROCŌMES (Ἀβροκόμης, Ion.), son of Darius and Phratagune, accompanied the army of Xerxes to Greece, and was slain at Thermopylæ.]

[ABRON (Ἄβρων), son of the Attic orator Lycurgus.—2. Son of Callias, of the deme of Bate in Attica, who wrote on the festivals of the Greeks.]

ABRŌŪCHUS (Ἀβρώνυχος), an Athenian, who served in the Persian war, B.C. 480, and was subsequently sent as ambassador to Sparta, with Themistocles and Aristides, respecting the fortifications of Athens.

ABRŌTŌNUM, mother of THEMISTOCLES.

ABRŌTŌNUM (Ἀβρότονον: now Sabari or Old Tripoli), a city on the coast of Africa, between the Syrtes, founded by the Phœnicians; a colony under the Romans. It was also called Sabrāta and Neapolis, and it formed, with Cæa and Lepitis Magna, the African Tripolis.

[ABRONIUS SILO, a Latin poet of the Augustan age, pupil of Porcius Latro. According to Vossius, there were two of this name, father and son.]

[ABROZELMES (Ἀβροζέλμης), a Thracian, interpreter of the Thracian king Seuthes, mentioned in the Anabasis of Xenophon.]

ABSYRTĪDES or AFSYRTĪDES, sc. insulæ (Ἀψυρτίδες: now Cherso, Osero, Ferosina, and Chao), the name of four islands off the coast of Illyricum, [the principal one of which was ABSŌBUS, with a town of the same name.] According to one tradition, Absyrtus was slain in these islands by his sister Medæa and by Jason.

ABSYRTUS or AFSYRTUS (Ἀψυρτος), son of Æetes, king of Colchis, and brother of Medæa. When Medea fled with Jason, she took her brother Absyrtus with her; and when she was nearly overtaken by her father, she murdered Absyrtus, cut his body in pieces and strewed them on the road, that her father might thus be detained by gathering the limbs of his child. Tōmi, the place where this horror was committed, was believed to have derived its name from τέμνω, "to cut." According to another tradition, Absyrtus did not accompany Medea, but was sent out by his father in pursuit of her. He overtook her in Coreyra, where she had been kindly received by king Alcinoüs, who refused to surrender her to Absyrtus. When he overtook her a second time in certain islands off the Illyrian coast, he was slain by Jason. The son of Æetes, who was murdered by Medea, is called by some writers Ægialeus.

ABŪLĪTES (Ἀβουλίτης), the satrap of Susiana, surrendered Susa to Alexander. The satrapy was restored to him by Alexander, but he and his son Oxyathres were afterward executed by Alexander for the crimes they had committed.

ABURNUS VALENS. Vid. VALENS.

ABUS (now Humber), a river in Britain.

[ABUS (Ἄβος: now Aghri-Dagh), a mountain chain of Armenia Major, and believed by the natives at the present day to be the Ararat of Scripture.]

ABYDĒNUS (Ἀβυθνήος), a Greek historian, who wrote a history of Assyria. His date is uncertain: he made use of the works of Megasthenes and Berossus, and he wrote in the Ionic dialect. His work was particularly valuable for chronology. The fragments of his history have been published by Scaliger, De Emendatione Temporum; and Richter, Berosi Chaldeorum Historie, &c., Lips., 1825.

ABŪDOS (Ἄβυδος: Ἀβυθνήος). 1. A town of the Troad on the Hellespont, and a Milesian colony. It was nearly opposite to Sestos, but a little lower down the stream. The bridge of boats which Xerxes constructed over the Hellespont, B.C. 480, commenced a little higher up than Abydos, and touched the European shore between Sestos and Madytus. The site of Abydos is a little north of Sultania or the old castle of Asia, which is opposite to the old castle of Europe.—2. (Ruins near Arabat el Matfoon and El Birbeh), a city of Upper Egypt, near the west bank of the Nile; once second only to Thebes, but in Strabo's time (A.D. 14) a small village. It had a temple of Osiris and a Memnonium, both still standing, and an oracle. Here was found the inscription known as the Table of Abydos, which contains a list of the Egyptian kings.

ABŪLA or ABĪLA MONS or COLUMNA (Ἀβύλη or Ἀβίλη στήλη or ὄρος: now Jebel Zatout, i. e., Apes' Hill, above Ceuta), a mountain in Mauretania Tingitana, forming the eastern extremity of the south or African coast of the Fretum Gaditanum. This and Mount Calpe (Gibraltar), opposite to it on the Spanish coast, were called the Columns of Hercules, from the fact that they were originally one mountain, which was torn asunder by Hercules.

ACACALLIS (Ἀκακαλλίς), daughter of Minos, by whom Apollo begot a son, Miletus, as well as other children. Acacallis was in Crete a common name for a narcissus.

ACACĒSIUM (Ἀκακήσιον: Ἀκακήσιος), a town of Arcadia, at the foot of a hill of the same name.

ACACĒSIUS (Ἀκακήσιος), a surname of Mercury (Hermes), for which Homer uses the form Acacetes. Some writers derive it from the Arcadian town of Acacesium, in which he was believed to have been brought up; others from a priv, and κακός, and suppose it to mean "the god who does not hurt." The same surname is given to Prometheus, whence it may be inferred that its meaning is that of benefactor or deliverer from evil.

ACACŌTES. Vid. ACACESIUS.

[ACÆCUS (Ἀκάκος), son of Lycæon, a king in Arcadia, who brought up Mercury (Hermes), and founded Acæcium: vid. ACÆCESIUM.]

ACADĒMĪA (Ἀκαδήμεια or Ἀκακδήμια): also Acadēmia in the older Latin writers, a piece of land on the Cephissus, six stadia from Athens, originally belonging to the hero ACADĒMUS, and subsequently a gymnasium, which was adorned by Cimon with plane and olive plantations, statues, and other works of art. Here taught Plato, who possessed a piece of land in the neighborhood, and after him his followers, who were hence called the Academici, or Academic philosophers. When Sulla besieged Athens in B.C. 87, he cut down the plane trees in order to construct his military machines; but the place was restored soon afterward. Cicero gave the name of Acadēmia to his villa near Puteoli, where he wrote his "Questiones Academicæ."

ACADĒMĪCI. Vid. ACADĒMIA.

ACADĒMUS (Ἀκάδημος), an Attic hero, who betrayed to Castor and Pollux, when they invaded Attica to liberate their sister Helen, that she was kept concealed at Aphidnæ. For this the Tyndarids always showed him gratitude, and whenever the Lacedæmonians invaded Attica, they spared the land belonging to Acadēmus. Vid. ACADĒMIA.

ACALANDRUS (now Salandrella), a river in Lucania, flowing into the Gulf of Tarentum.

[ACALANTHIS (Ἀκαλανθίς), daughter of Pierus, changed by the muses into a thistle-finch. Vid. PIERUS.]

ACĀMAS (Ἀκάμας). 1. Son of Theseus and Phædra, accompanied Diomedes to Troy to demand the surrender of Helen. During his stay at Troy he won the affection of Laodice, daughter of Priam, and begot by her a son, Munitus. He was one of the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse at the taking of Troy. The Attic tribe Acamantis derived its name from him.—2. Son of Antenor and Theano, one of the bravest Trojans, slain by Meriones.—3. Son of Eussorus, one of the leaders of the Thracians in the Trojan war, slain by the Telamonian Ajax.—[4. Son of Asius, fought on the side of the Trojans, slain by Meriones.]

[ACĀMAS (Ἀκάμας): now Cape Salizano or St. Pifano), a promontory at the northwest end of Cyprus.]

[ACAMPUSIS (Ἀκαμπυίς): now Tschorak or Bituni), a river of Asia forming the boundary between Pontus and Colchis, and so named from its impetuous course, a priv. and κάμπω. It was called by the natives themselves Boas.]

ACANTHUS (Ἀκανθος: Ἀκάνθιος). 1. (Ruins near Erso), a town on the Isthmus, which connects the peninsula of Athos with Chalcidice, on the canal cut by Xerxes (vid. ΑΤΤΟΣ). It was founded by the inhabitants of Andros, and continued to be a place of considerable importance from the time of Xerxes to that of the Romans.—2. (Now Dashur), a town on the west bank of the Nile, 120 stadia south of Memphis, with a temple of Osiris.

[ACANTHUS (Ἀκανθος), a Lacedæmonian, victor at Olympia in the διαιλος, was said to have been the first who ran naked at these games.]

ni, son of Alcæon and Callirrhœ, and brother of Amphoterus. Their father was murdered by Phegeus when they were very young, and Callirrhœ prayed to Jupiter (Zeus) to make her sons grow quickly, that they might be able to avenge the death of their father. The prayer was granted, and Acarnan with his brother slew Phegeus, his wife, and his two sons. The inhabitants of Peophs, where the sons had been slain, pursued the murderers as far as Tegea, where, however, they were received and rescued. They afterward went to Epirus, where Acarnan founded the state called after him Acarnania.

ACARNĀNĪA (Ἀκαρνανία: Ἀκαρνάν, -ἄνος), the most westerly province of Greece, was bounded on the north by the Ambracian Gulf, on the west and southwest by the Ionian Sea, on the northeast by Amphilochia, which is sometimes included in Acarnania, and on the east by Ætolia, from which at a later time it was separated by the Achelœus. The name of Acarnania does not occur in Homer. In the most ancient times the land was inhabited by the Taphii, Teleboæ, and Leleges, and subsequently by the Curetes, who emigrated from Ætolia and settled there. At a later time a colony from Argos, said to have been led by ACARNAN, the son of Alcæon, settled in the country. In the seventh century B.C. the Corinthians founded several towns on the coast. The Acarnanians first emerge from obscurity at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 431. They were then a rude people, living by piracy and robbery, and they always remained behind the rest of the Greeks in civilization and refinement. They were good slingers, and are praised for their fidelity and courage. The different towns formed a league with a strategus at their head in time of war: the members of the league met at Stratos, and subsequently at Thyrium or Leucas. Under the Romans Acarnania formed part of the province of Macedonia.

[ACASTE (Ἀκάστη), a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys.]

ACASTUS (Ἀκάστος), son of Pelias, king of Iolcus, and of Anaxibia or Philomache. He was one of the Argonauts, and also took part in the Calydonian hunt. His sisters were induced by Medæa to cut up their father and boil him, in order to make him young again. Acastus, in consequence, drove Jason and Medæa from Iolcus, and instituted funeral games in honor of his father. During these games Astydania, the wife of Acastus, also called Hippolyte, first saw Peleus, whom Acastus had purified from the murder of Eurytion. When Peleus, faithful to his benefactor, refused to listen to her addresses, she accused him to her husband of improper conduct. Shortly afterward, when Acastus and Peleus were hunting on Mount Pelion, and the latter had fallen asleep, Acastus took his sword from him, and left him alone. He was, in consequence, nearly destroyed by the Centaurs; but he was saved by Chiron or Mercury (Hermes), returned to Acastus, and killed him, together with his wife.—[2. A king of Dulichium, mentioned in the Odyssey.]

ACBARUS. Vid. ABGARUS.

ACCA LAURENTĪA or LAURENTĪA, a mythical

woman in early Roman story. According to one account, she was the wife of the shepherd Faustulus, and the nurse of Romulus and Remus after they had been taken from the she-wolf. Another account connects her with the legend of Hercules, by whose advice she succeeded in making Carutius or Tarrutius, an Etruscan, love and marry her. After his death she inherited his large property, which she left to the Roman people. Ancus Marcius, in gratitude for this, allowed her to be buried in the Velabrum, and instituted an annual festival, the Larentalia, at which sacrifices were offered to the Lares. According to other accounts, again, she was not the wife of Faustulus, but a prostitute, who, from her mode of life, was called lupa by the shepherds, and who left the property she gained in that way to the Roman people. Thus much seems certain, whatever we may think of the stories, that she was of Etruscan origin, and connected with the worship of the Lares, from which her name Larentia seems to be derived.

L. ACCIUS or ATRIUS, an early Roman tragic poet and the son of a freedman, was born B.C. 170, and lived to a great age. Cicero, when a young man, frequently conversed with him. His tragedies were chiefly imitated from the Greek, but he also wrote some on Roman subjects (Prætextata); one of which, entitled Brutus, was probably in honor of his patron, D. Brutus. We possess only fragments of his tragedies, but they are spoken of in terms of admiration by the ancient writers. Accius also wrote Annales in verse, containing the history of Rome, like those of Ennius; and a prose work, Libri Didascalion, which seems to have been a history of poetry. The fragments of his tragedies are given by Bothe, Poet. Scenici Latin., vol. v., Lips., 1834; and those of the Didascalion by Madvig, De L. Attii, Didascalii Comment., Hafniae, 1831.

Acco, a chief of the Senones in Gaul, who induced his countrymen to revolt against Cæsar, B.C. 53, by whom he was put to death.

ACE. Vid. PTOLEMAIS.

[ACERATUS (Ἀκίρατος), a priest and prophet at Delphi, who with sixty men alone did not abandon the place on the approach of Xerxes and his army.—2. A poet of the Greek anthology.]

ACERBAS, a Tyrian priest of Hercules, who married Elissa, the sister of King Pygmalion. He had concealed his treasures in the earth, knowing the avarice of Pygmalion, but he was murdered by Pygmalion, who hoped to obtain his treasures through his sister. The prudence of Elissa saved the treasures, and she emigrated from Phœnicia. In this account, taken from Justin, Acerbas is the same person as Sichæus, and Elissa the same as Dido in Virgil (Æn., i., 343, seq.). The names in Justin are undoubtedly more correct than in Virgil: for Virgil here, as in other cases, has changed a foreign name into one more convenient to him.

ACERRÆ (Acerranus). 1. (Now Acerra), a town in Campania on the Clanius, received the Roman franchise in B.C. 332. It was destroyed by Hannibal, but was rebuilt. 2. (Now Gerra), a town of the Insubres in Gallia Transpadana.

ACERSÏDÏMES (Ἀκερσεΐδης), a surname of Apollo, expressive of his beautiful hair, which was never cut or shorn.

[ACES (Ἄκης), a river in the interior of Asia, from which the country of the Hyrcanians, Parthians, Chorasmians, &c. was watered by means of canals. On the conquest of this region by the Persian king, the stoppage of this irrigation converted many fertile lands into barren wastes. This river has been supposed to be the same with the Oechus or Oxus, and Wilson (Ariana, p. 129), following Gatterer, inclines to the latter.]

[ACESAMÏNUS (Ἀκεσαμεινός), a king of Thrace, father of Peribœa, and said to have founded the city Acesamœna in Macedonia.]

[ACESANDER (Ἀκείανδρος), a Greek historian, who wrote an account of Cyrene.]

ACÏSAS (Ἀκείσας), a native of Salamis in Cyprus, famed for his skill in weaving cloth with variegated patterns (polymitarius). He and his son Helicon were the first who made a peplus for Minerva (Athena) Polias. They must have lived before the time of Euripides and Plato, who mention this peplus.

[ACESIMBRÏTUS (Ἀκεσίμβροτος), an admiral of the Rhodians, and a delegate to the conference between T. Flamininus and Philippos.]

ACÏSINES (Ἀκείσινης; Ἀκείσινος). 1. (Now Chenab), a river in India, into which the Hydaspes flows, and which itself flows into the Indus.—2. (Now Alcantara), a river in Sicily, near Tauromenium, called also Onobalas.

[ACÏSIUS (Ἀκείσιος), an appellation of Apollo, "the healer," from ἰκέομαι.]

[ACÏSTA. Vid. SEGESTA.]

ACÏSTES (Ἀκείστης), son of a Trojan woman of the name of Egesta or Segesta, who was sent by her father to Sicily, that she might not be devoured by the monsters which infested the territory of Troy. When Egesta arrived in Sicily, the river-god Crimissus begot by her a son, Acestes, who was afterward regarded as the hero who had founded the town of Segesta. Æneas, on his arrival in Sicily, was hospitably received by Acestes.

[ACÏSTODÏRUS (Ἀκεστόδορος), a Greek historian from whom Plutarch quotes some incidents relating to the battle of Salamis, in his Life of Themistocles.]

ACÏSTOR (Ἀκείστωρ). 1. Surnamed Sacas, on account of his foreign origin, was a tragic poet at Athens, and a contemporary of Aristophanes.—2. A sculptor of Onosus, who flourished about B.C. 452.]

[ACÏSTORIDES (Ἀκεστορίδης), a Corinthian chosen general by the Syracusans, but banished from Syracuse by Agathocles.]

ACÏLEA (Ἀχαιία, from ἄχος, "grief"), "the distressed one," a surname of Ceres (Demeter) at Athens, so called on account of her sorrow for the loss of her daughter.

ACHÆI (Ἀχαιοί), one of the chief Hellenic races, were, according to tradition, descended from Achæus, who was the son of Xuthus and Creusa, and grandson of Hellen. The Achæi originally dwelt in Thessaly, and from thence migrated to Peloponnesus, the whole of which became subject to them, with the exception of Arcadia, and the country afterward called Achaia. As they were the ruling nation in Peloponnesus in the heroic times, Homer frequently gives the name of Achæi to the collect-ivo Greeks. On the conquest of the greater part of Peloponnesus by the Heraclidae and the Dorians eighty years after the Trojan war, many of the Achæi under Tisameus, the son of Ōrestes, left their country and took possession of the northern coast of Peloponnesus, then called Æginlæa, and inhabited by the Ionians, whom they expelled from the country, which was henceforth called Achaia. The expelled Ionians migrated to Attica and Asia Minor. The Achæi settled in twelve cities: Pellene, Ægina, Ægæ, Bura, Helice, Ægium, Rhypæ, Patra, Pharæ, Olenus, Dyme, and Tritæa. These cities are said to have been governed by Tisamenus and his descendants till Ogyges, upon whose death a democratical form of government was established in each state; but the twelve states formed a league for mutual defence and protection. In the Persian war the Achæi took no part; and they had little influence in the affairs of Greece till the time of the successors of Alexander. In B.C. 281 the Achæi, who were then subject to the Macedonians, resolved to renew their ancient league for the purpose of shaking off the Macedonian yoke. This was the origin of the celebrated Achæan League. It at first consisted of only four towns, Dyme, Patra, Tritæa, and Pharæ, but was subsequently joined by the other towns of Achaia, with the exception of Olenus and Helice. It did not, however, obtain much importance till B.C. 251, when Aratus united to it his native town, Sicyon. The example of Sicyon was followed by Corinth and many other towns in Greece, and the league soon became the chief political power in Greece. At length the Achæi declared war against the Romans, who destroyed the league, and thus put an end to the independence of Greece. Corinth, then the chief town of the league, was taken by the Roman general Mummius, in B.C. 146, and the whole of southern Greece made a Roman province under the name of ACHAIA. The different states composing the Achæan League had equal rights. The assemblies of the league were held twice a year, in the spring and autumn, in a grove of Jupiter (Zeus) Homagyrus near Ægium. At these assemblies all the business of the league was conducted, and at the spring meeting the public functionaries were chosen. These were: 1. A strategus (στρατηγός) or general, and a hipparchus (ἵππαρχος) or commander of the cavalry; 2. A secretary (γραμματεὺς); and, 3. Ten demiurgi (δημιουργοί, also called ἀρχοντες), who appear to have had the right of convening the assembly. For further particulars, vid. Dict. of Ant., art. Achaicum Fœdus.

ACHÆMĒNES (Ἀχαιμένης). 1. The ancestor of the Persian kings, who founded the family of the Achæmenide (Ἀχαιμενίδαι), which was the noblest family of the Pasargadae, the noblest of the Persian tribes. The Roman poets use the adjective Achæmenius in the sense of Persian. [Some writers identify him with the Djemschid of the Oriental historians.]—2. Son of Darius I., governor of Egypt, commanded the Egyptian fleet in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece, B.C. 480. He was defeated and killed in battle by Inarus the Libyan, B.C. 460.

ACHÆMĒNĪDES or ACHĒMĒNĪDES, son of Adamastus of Ithaca, and a companion of Ulysses, who left him behind in Sicily, when he fled from the Cyclopes. Here he was found by Æneas, who took him with him.

ACHÆUS (Ἀχαιῦς). 1. Son of Xuthus, the mythical ancestor of the Achæi.—2. Governor under Antiochus III, of all Asia west of Mount Taurus. He revolted against Antiochus, but was defeated by the latter, taken prisoner at Sardis, and put to death B.C. 214.—3. Of Erctria in Eubœa, a tragic poet, born B.C. 484. In 447, he contended with Sophocles and Euripides, and though he subsequently brought out many dramas, according to some as many as thirty-four or forty, he nevertheless only gained the prize once. In the satyrical drama he possessed considerable merit. The fragments of his pieces have been published by Ulrichs, Bonn, 1834; [and by Wagner in his Fragmenta Tragicorum Græcorum (in Didot's Biblioth. Græc.), p. 36-52. The satyr pieces have been published separately in Friebel's Græcorum Satyrophorum Fragmenta, Berlin, 1837.—4. A Greek tragic poet of Syracuse, who flourished at a later period than the foregoing, belonging to the Alexandrine period: he was said to have written ten or fourteen tragedies.]

ACHAÏĀ (Ἀχαιῶς: Ἀχαιῶν). 1. The northern coast of the Peloponnesus, originally called Ægi-alæa (Ἀιγιάλεια) or Ægialus (Ἀιγιάλος), i. e. the coast land, was bounded on the north by the Corinthian Gulf and the Ionian Sea, on the south by Elis and Arcadia, on the west by the Ionian sea, and on the east by Sicyonia. It was a narrow slip of country sloping down from the mountains to the sea. The coast is generally low, and has few good ports. Respecting its inhabitants, vid. Achæi.—2. A district in Thessaly, which appears to have been the original seat of the Achæi. It retained the name of Achaia in the time of Herodotus.—3. The Roman province included Peloponnesus and northern Greece south of Thessaly. It was formed on the dissolution of the Achæan League in B. C. 146, and hence derived its name.

[ACHAÏA, (Ἀχαια), a city and harbor on the northeastern coast of the Euxine, mentioned by Arrian in his Periplus.]

[ACHARACA (Ἀχάρακα), a village near Nysa in Lydia, having a celebrated Plutonium, and an oracular cave of Charon, where intimations were given to the sick respecting the cure of their maladies.]

[ACHARDEUS (Ἀχαρδέος: now Egorlik), a river of Asiatic Sarmatia, flowing from the Caucasus into the Palus Mæotis.]

ACHARNÆ (Ἀχαρναί: Ἀχαρνεὺς, pl., Ἀχαρνηῖς), the principal demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Ceneis, sixty stadia north of Athens, possessed a rough and warlike population, who were able to furnish three thousand hoplitæ at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. Their land was fertile, and they carried on considerable traffic in charcoal. One of the plays of Aristophanes bears the name of the inhabitants of this demus.

ACHARRÆ, a town in Thessalotis in Thessaly, on the River Parnissus.

[ACHĀTES, a friend and companion of Æneas, so remarkable for the fidelity of his attachment, that "fidus Achates" became subsequently a proverb.]

ACHATES (now Dirillo), a river in southern Sicily, between Camarina and Gela, in which the first agate is said to have been found.

ACHĒLŌIDES, a surname of the Sirens, the daughters of Achelous and a Muse; also a surname of water nymphs.

ACHĒLŌS ('Αχελῷος: 'Αχελῷος in Hom.: now Aspro Potamo), more anciently called Thoas, Axenus, and Thestius, the largest river in Greece. It rises in Mount Pindus, and flows southward, forming the boundary between Acarnania and Ætolia, and falls into the Ionian Sea opposite the islands called Echinades, [which were supposed to have been formed in part by the depositions of this very rapid river.] It is about one hundred and thirty miles in length. The god of this river is described as the offspring of Oceanus and Tethys, and as the eldest of their three thousand sons. He fought with Hercules for Deianira, but was conquered in the contest. He then took the form of a bull, but was again overcome by Hercules, who deprived him of one of his horns, which, however, he recovered by giving up the horn of Amalthea. According to Ovid (Met., ix, 87), the Naiads changed the horn which Hercules took from Achelous into the horn of plenty. Achelous was, from the earliest times, considered to be a great divinity throughout Greece, and was invoked in prayers, sacrifices, &c. On several coins of Acarnania, the god is represented as a bull with the head of an old man. Achelous was also the name of a river in Arcadia, and of another in Phthiotis in Thessaly.

ACHEMĒNĪDES. Vid. ACHĒMENIDES.

ACHĒRON ('Αχέρων), the name of several rivers, all of which were, at least at one time, believed to be connected with the lower world.—1. [Now Gurla, or River of Suli.] A river in Thesprotia in Epirus, which flows through the Lake Acherusia into the Ionian Sea.—2. A river in Elis, which flows into the Alphæus.—3. [Probably Lese or Arcontii.] A river in southern Italy, in the country of the Bruttii, on which Alexander of Epirus perished.—4. The river of the lower world, round which the shades hover, and into which the Pyriphlegethon and Cocytus flow. In late writers the name of Acheron is used, in a general sense, to designate the whole of the lower world. The Etruscans were acquainted with the worship of Acheron (Acheruns) from very early times, as we must infer from their Acheruntici libri, which treated of the deification of souls, and of the sacrifices (Acheruntia sacra) by which this was to be effected.

ACHĒRONTĪA. 1. (Now Acerenza), a town in Apulia, on a summit of Mount Vultur, whence Horace (Carm., iii, 4, 14) speaks of celsa nidum Acherontia.—2. A town on the River Acheron, in the country of the Bruttii. Vid. ACHĒRON, No. 3.

ACHĒROUSĪA ('Αχερουσία λίμνη or 'Αχερουσίας), the name of several lakes and swamps, which, like the various rivers of the name of Acheron, were at the same time believed to be connected with the lower world, until at last the Acherusia came to be considered to be in the lower world itself. The lake to which this belief seems to have been first attached was the Acherusia in Thesprotia, through which the Acheron flowed. Other lakes or swamps of the same name were near Hermione in Argolis, between Cumæ and Cape Misenum in Campania, and lastly in Egypt, near Memphis. Acherusia was also the name of a peninsula, near Heraclæa in Bithynia, with a deep chasm, into which Hercules is said to have descended to bring up the dog Cerberus.

ACHĒTUM, a small town in Sicily, the site of which is uncertain.

ACHILLA or ACHOLLA ('Αχόλλα: 'Αχολλαῖος Achillitanus: now El Aliah, ruins), a town on the sea-coast of Africa, in the Carthaginian territory (Byzacena), a little above the northern point of the Syrtis Minor.

ACHILLAS ('Αχιλλᾶς), one of the guardians of the Egyptian king Ptolemy Dionysius, and commander of the troops when Pompey fled to Egypt, B.C. 48. It was he and L. Septimius who killed Pompey. He subsequently joined the eunuch Pothinus in resisting Cæsar, and obtained possession of the greatest part of Alexandria. He was shortly afterwards put to death by Arsinoë, the youngest sister of Ptolemy, B.C. 47.

[ACHILLĒIS, a poem of Statius, turning on the story of Achilles. Vid. STATIUS.]

ACHILLES ('Αχιλλεύς), the great hero of the Iliad.—Homeric story. Achilles was the son of Peleus, king of the Myrmidones in Phthiotis, in Thessaly, and of the Nereid Thetis. From his father's name, he is often called Pelides, Peleides, or Pelion, and from his grandfather's, Æacides. He was educated by Phœnix, who taught him eloquence and the arts of war, and accompanied him to the Trojan war. In the healing art he was instructed by Chiron, the centaur. His mother, Thetis, foretold him that his fate was either to gain glory and die early, or to live a long but inglorious life. The hero chose the former, and took part in the Trojan war, from which he knew that he was not to return. In fifty ships, he led his hosts of Myrmidones, Hellenes, and Achæans, against Troy. Here of the swift-footed Achilles was the great bulwark of the Greeks, and the worthy favorite of Minerva (Athena) and Juno (Hera). Previous to the dispute with Agamemnon, he ravaged the country around Troy, and destroyed twelve towns on the coast and eleven in the interior of the country. When Agamemnon was obliged to give up Chryseis to her father, he threatened to take away Briseis from Achilles, who surrendered her on the persuasion of Minerva (Athena), but at the same time refused to take any further part in the war, and shut himself up in his tent. Jupiter (Zeus), on the entreaty of Thetis, promised that victory should be on the side of the Trojans, until the Achæans should have honored her son. The affairs of the Greeks declined in consequence, and they were at last pressed so hard, that an embassy was sent to Achilles, offering him rich presents and the restoration of Briseis; but in vain. Finally, however, he was persuaded by Patroclus, his dearest friend, to allow him to make use of his men, his horses, and his armor. Patroclus was slain, and when this news reached Achilles, he was seized with unspeakable grief. Thetis consoled him, and promised new arms, to be made by Vulcan (Hephestus), and Iris appeared to rouse him from his lamentations, and exhorted him to rescue the body of Patroclus. Achilles now rose, and his thundering voice alone put the Trojans to flight. When his new armor was brought to him, he hurried to the field of battle, disdainingly to take any drink or food until the death of his friend should be avenged. He wounded and slew numbers of Trojans, and at length met Hector, whom he chased thrice around the walls of the city. He then slew him, tied his body to his chariot, and dragged him to the ships of the Greeks. After this, he burned the body of Patroclus, together with twelve young captive Trojans, who were sacrificed to appease the spirit of his friend; and subsequently gave up the body of Hector to Priam, who came in person to beg for it. Achilles himself fell in the battle at the Scean gate, before Troy was taken. His death itself does not occur in the Iliad, but it is alluded to in a few passages (xxii., 358; xxi., 278). It is expressly mentioned in the Odyssey (xxiv., 36), where it is said that his fall—his conqueror is not mentioned—was lamented by gods and men, that his remains, together with those of Patroclus, were buried in a golden urn, which Bacchus (Dionysus) had given as a present to Thetis, and were deposited in a place on the coast of the Hellespont, where a mound was raised over them. Achilles is the principal hero of the Iliad: he is the handsomest and bravest of all the Greeks; he is affectionate toward his mother and his friends; formidable in battles, which are his delight; open-hearted and without fear, and, at the same time, susceptible of the gentle and quiet joys of home. His greatest passion is ambition, and when his sense of honor is hurt, he is unrelenting in his revenge and anger, but withal submits obediently to the will of the gods.—Later traditions. These chiefly consist in accounts which fill up the history of his youth and death. His mother, wishing to make her son immortal, is said to have concealed him by night in the fire, in order to destroy the mortal parts he had inherited from his father, and by day to have anointed him with ambrosia. But Peleus one night discovered his child in the fire, and cried out in terror. Thetis left her son and fled, and Peleus intrusted him to Chiron, who educated and instructed him in the arts of riding, hunting, and playing the phorminx, and also changed his original name, Ligyrion, i. e., the "whining," into Achilles. Chiron fed his pupil with the hearts of lions and the marrow of bears. According to other accounts, Thetis endeavored to make Achilles immortal by dipping him in the River Styx, and succeeded with the exception of the ankles, by which she held him. When he was nine years old, Calchas declared that Troy could not be taken without his aid, and Thetis, knowing that this war would be fatal to him, disguised him as a maiden, and introduced him among the daughters of Lycomedes of Scyros, where he was called by the name of Pyrrha on account of his golden locks. But his real character did not remain concealed long, for one of his companions, Deidamia, became mother of a son, Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus, by him. Ulysses at last discovered his place of concealment, and Achilles immediately promised his assistance. During the war against Troy, Achilles slew Penthesila, an Amazon. He also fought with Memnon and Troilus. The accounts of his death differ very much, though all agree in stating that he did not fall by human hands, or, at least, not without the interference of the god Apollo. According to some traditions, he was killed by Apollo himself; according to others, Apollo assumed the appearance of Paris in killing him, while others say that Apollo merely directed the weapon of Paris against Achilles, and thus caused his death, as had been suggested by the dying Hector. Others, again, relate that Achilles loved Polyxena, a daughter of Priam, and, tempted by the promise that he should receive her as his wife, if he would join the Trojans, he went without arms into the temple of Apollo at Thymbra, and was assassinated there by Paris. His body was rescued by Ulysses and Ajax the Telamonian; his armor was promised by Thetis to the bravest among the Greeks, which gave rise to a contest between the two heroes who had rescued his body. Vid. AJAX. After his death, Achilles became one of the judges in the lower world, and dwelled in the islands of the blessed, where he was united with Medea or Iphigenia—[2. A son of the Earth (γηγενής), to whom Juno (Hera) fled for refuge from the pursuit of Jupiter (Zeus), and who persuaded her to return and marry that deity. Jupiter (Zeus), grateful for this service, promised him that all who bore this name for the time to come should be illustrious personages.—3. The preceptor of Chiron, after whom Chiron named the son of Peleus.—4. The inventor of the ostracism in Athens, according to one account.—5. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Lamia, so beautiful that Pan awarded to him the prize of beauty over every competitor. Venus was so offended at this, that she inspired Pan with a fruitless passion for the nymph Echo, and also wrought a hideous change in his person.]

ACHILLES TATIUS, or, as others call him, Achilles Statius, an Alexandrine rhetorician, lived in the latter half of the fifth or the beginning of the sixth century of our era. He is the author of a Greek romance in eight books, containing the adventures of two lovers, Clitophon and Leuceippe, which has come down to us. The best edition is by Fr. Jacobs, Lips., 1821. Suidas ascribes to this Achilles a work on the sphere (περὶ σφαίρας), a fragment of which, professing to be an introduction to the Phænomena of Aratus, is still extant. But this work was written at an earlier period. It is printed in Petavius, Uranologia, Paris, 1630, and Amsterdam, 1703.

ACHILLEUM (Ἀχίλλειον), a fortified place near the promontory Sigæum in the Troad, [founded by the Mytileneans, and in the neighborhood of which Achilles was supposed to have been buried.] There was a place of the same name on the Cimmerian Bosphorus, Straits of Kaffa, on the Asiatic side.

ACHILLEUS assumed the title of emperor under Diocletian, and reigned over Egypt for some time. He was taken by Diocletian after a siege of eight months in Alexandria, and put to death A. D. 296.

ACHILLEUS DROMOS (Ἀχίλλειος δρόμος; now Tendera or Tendra), a narrow tongue of land in the Euxine Sea, not far from the mouth of the Borysthenes, where Achilles is said to have made a race-course. Before it lay the celebrated Island of Achilles (Insula Achillis) or Leuce (Λευκή), where there was a temple of Achilles.

ACHILLEUS PORTUS (Ἀχιλλεύου λιμὴν), a harbor in Laconia, near the promontory Tænarum.

ACHILLES, a patronymic of Pyrrhus, son of Achilles.

ACHILLIS ÎNSÛLA. Vid. ACHILLEUS DROMOS.

ACHIRËE (Ἀχιρῶν), daughter of Nilus and wife of Belus, by whom she became the mother of Ægyptus and Danaus.

ACHIVI, the name of the Achæi in the Latin writers, and frequently used, like Achæi, to signify the whole Greek nation. Vid. ACHÆI.

ACHOLLA. Vid. ACHILLA.

ACHOLËE. Vid. HARPYLE.

ACHRĀDĪNA or ACRĀDĪNA. Vid. SYRACUSÆ.

ACHĪORĪUS (Ἀκχιώριος), one of the leaders of the Gauls, who invaded Thrace and Macedonia in B. C. 280. In the following year he accompanied Brennus in his invasion of Greece. Some writers suppose that Brennus and Acichorius are the same person, the former being only a title, and the latter the real name.

ACĪDĀLIA (mater), a surname of Venus, from the well Acidalius, near Orchomenos, where she used to bathe with the Graces.

[ACIDAS (Ἀκίδας), a small river of Triphylian Elis, which ran into the Anigrus.]

ACĪDĪNUS, L. MANLIUS. 1. One of the Roman generals in the second Punic war, prætor urbanus, B. C. 210, served against Hasdrubal in 207, and was sent into Spain in 206, where he remained till 199.—2. Surnamed FULVIANUS, because he originally belonged to the Fulvia gens, prætor B. C. 188 in Nearer Spain, and consul in 179 with his own brother Q. Fulvius Flaccus, which is the only instance of two brothers holding the consulship at the same time.

[ACIDON (Ἀκίδων), same as the ACIDAS, q. v.]

ACILĪA GENS, plebeian. Its members are mentioned under the family names of AVIOLA, BALBUS, and GLABRIO.

[ACILISENE (Ἀκίλισσηνή), a district of Armenia Major, between Antitaurus and the Euphrates.]

[ACIMINCUM or ACUMINCUM (now Peterwardien), a town in Lower Pannonia, on the Danube.]

[ACINCUM or AQUINCUM (now Buda or Old Ofen), a strongly fortified town of Pannonia, on the Danube.]

[ACINIPO (ruins near Ronda), a town of Hispania Bætica, of which some remarkable remains still exist.]

[ACĪRIS (Ἀκίρις; now Agri), a river of Lucania, flowing into the Sinus Tarrentinus.]

ACIS (Ἀκίς) son of Faunus and Symethis, was beloved by the nymph Galatea; Polyphemus the Cyclops, jealous of him, crushed him under a huge rock. His blood, gushing forth from under the rock, was changed by the nymph into the River Acis or Aciinus (now Fiume di Jaci), at the foot of Mount Ætna. This story, which is related only by Ovid (Met., xiii, 750, seq.), is perhaps no more than a happy fiction suggested by the manner in which the little river springs forth from under a rock.

[ACIS (Ἀκίς), a river of Sicily. Vid. the foregoing.]

[ACMON (Ἄκμων). 1. A companion of Diomedes, who was changed into a bird for disrespect to Venus. 2. Son of Elytius of Lynceus, a companion of Æneas.]

ACMŌNĪA (Ἄκμωνία; Ἄκμωνίτης; Acmonensis), a city of the Greater Phrygia.

ACMŌNĪDES, one of the three Cyclopes in Ovid, is the same as Pyracmon in Virgil, and as Arges in most other accounts of the Cyclopes.

ACŌTES (Ἀκοίτης), son of a poor fisherman of Mæonia, who served as a pilot in a ship. After landing at the Island of Naxos, the sailors brought with them on board a beautiful boy asleep, whom they wished to take with them; but Acetes, who recognized in the boy the god Bacchus, dissuaded them from it, but in vain. When the ship had reached the open sea, the boy awoke, and desired to be carried back to Naxos. The sailors promised to do so, but did not keep their word. Hereupon the god disclosed himself to them in his majesty; vires began to twine round the vessel, tigers appeared, and the sailors seized with madness, jumped into the sea and perished. Acetes alone was saved and conveyed back to Naxos, where he was initiated into the Bacchic mysteries. This is the account of Ovid (Met., iii, 582, &c.). Other writers call the crew of the ship Tyrrhenian pirates, and derive the name of the Tyrrhenian Sea from them.

ACONTĪUS (Ἀκόντιος), a beautiful youth of the Island of Ceos. On one occasion he came to Delos to celebrate the annual festival of Diana, and fell in love with Cydippe, the daughter of a noble Athenian. In order to gain her, he had recourse to a stratagem. While she was sitting in the temple of Diana, he threw before her an apple, upon which he had written the words, "I swear by the sanctuary of Diana to marry Acontius." The nurse took up the apple and handed it to Cydippe, who read aloud what was written upon it, and then threw the apple away. But the goddess had heard her vow, and the repeated illness of the maiden, when she was about to marry another man, at length compelled her father to give her in marriage to Acontius. This story is related by Ovid (Heroid., 20, 21), who borrowed it from a lost poem of Callimachus, entitled "Cydippe."

ACŌRIS (Ἀκορίς), king of Egypt, assisted Evagoras, king of Cyprus, against Artaxerxes, king of Persia, about B. C. 385. He died about 374, before the Persians entered Egypt, which was in the following year.

[ACRA (Ἄκρα), a name of many places situated on heights and promontories. 1. A village on the Cimmerian Bosphorus.—2. A town in Eubœa.—3. A town in Arcadia.—4. ACRA LEUCE (λευκή), a town in Hispania Tarraconensis, founded by Hamilcar Barca.]

ACRÆ (Ἄκρα). 1. (Ruins near Palazzolo), a town in Sicily, west of Syracuse, and ten stadia from the River Anapus, was founded by the Syracusans seventy years after the foundation of their own city.—2. A town in Ætolia.

ACRÆA (Ἄκραία) and ACRÆUS are surnames given to various goddesses and gods whose temples were situated upon hills, such as Jupiter (Zeus), Juno (Hera), Venus (Aphrodite), Minerva (Pallas), Diana (Artemis), and others.

ACRÆPHEUS. Vid. ACRÆPHIA.

ACRÆPHIA, ACRÆPHIÆ, or ACRÆPHION (Ἀκραφία, Ἀκραφίαί, Ἀκραφίον: Ἀκραφίος, Ἀκραφιάδος: now Kardhitzta), a town in Bœtia, on the Lake Copais, said to have been founded by Aëræpheus, the son of Apollo.

[ACRÆUS. Vid. ACRÆA.]

ACRAGAS (Ἀκράγας: now Girgenti or Fiume di S. Biagio), a small river of Sicily, on which was the celebrated city of Aërægas or Agrigentum.]

ACRÆGAS. Vid. AGRIGENTUM.

ACRÆTIOS (Ἀκράτιος ἀκρον, i. e., Ἄκρος Ἄθος: now Cape Monte Santo), the northeastern promontory in the peninsula Acte in Macedonia.]

ACRÆTUS, a freedman of Nero, sent into Asia and Achaia (A.D. 64) to plunder the temples and take away the statues of the gods.

ACRÆI (Ἀκραι or Ἀκραίαι), a town in Laonia, not far from the mouth of the Eurotas.

ACRILLÆ, a town in Sicily between Agrigentum and Aëræ.

ACRISIŌNĒ (Ἀκρисиώνη), a patronymic of Danaë, daughter of Aërisius. Perseus, grandson of Aërisius, was called, in the same way, Aërisiŏnādes.

ACRISIŪS (Ἀκρисиός), son of Abas, king of Argos, and of Oealia, grandson of Lynceus, and great grandson of Danaus. His twin-brother was Prætus, with whom he is said to have quarrelled even in the womb of his mother. Aërisius expelled Prætus from his inheritance; but, supported by his father-in-law Iobates, the Lycian, Prætus returned, and Aërisius was compelled to share his kingdom with his brother by giving up to him Tiryns, while he retained Argos for himself. An oracle had declared that Danaë, the daughter of Aërisius, would give birth to a son who would kill his grandfather. For this reason he kept Danaë shut up in a subterranean apartment, or in a brazen tower, but here she became mother of Perseus, notwithstanding the precautions of her father, according to some accounts by her uncle Prætus, and according to others by Jupiter (Zeus), who visited her in the form of a shower of gold. Aërisius ordered mother and child to be exposed on the wide sea in a chest; but the chest floated toward the Island of Seriphus, where both were rescued by Dictys. As to the manner in which the oracle was subsequently fulfilled, vid. PERSEUS.

ACRITAS (Ἀκρείτας: now Cape Gallo), the most southerly promontory in Messenia.

ACRŌCÆRAUNIA (τὰ Ἀκροκεραῖνια, sc. ὄρη: now Cape Linguetta), a promontory in Epirus, jutting out into the Ionian sea, was the most westerly part of the CÆRAUNIA MONTES. The coast of the Aërocæraunia was dangerous to ships, whence Horace (Carm. 1., 3, 20) speaks of infames scopulos Aërocæraunia.

ACRŌCŌRINTHUS. Vid. CORINTHUS.

ACRŌLISSUS. Vid. LISSUS.

ACRON. 1. King of the Cæninenses, whom Romulus slew in battle, and whose arms he dedicated to Jupiter Feretrius as Spolia Opima.—2. An eminent physician of Agrigentum in Sicily, is said to have been in Athens during the great plague (B.C. 430) in the Peloponnesian war, and to have ordered large fires to be kindled in the streets for the purpose of purifying the air, which proved of great service to several of the sick. This fact, however, is not mentioned by Thucydides. The medical sect of the Empirici, in order to boast of a greater antiquity than the Dogmatici (founded about B. C. 400), claimed Aëron as their founder, though they did not really exist before the third century B.C.—[3. An Etrurian of Corythus, an ally of Æneas, slain by Mezentius.]

ACRON, HELENIUS, a Roman grammarian, probably of the fifth century A.D., wrote notes on Horace, part of which are extant, and also, according to some critics, the scholia which we have on Persius.

[ACRONIUS LACUS. Vid. BRIGANTINUS LACUS.]

ACRŌPŌLIS. Vid. ATHENSÆ.

ACRŌPŌLITA GEORGIŪS (Γεώργιος Ἀκροπολίτης), a Byzantine writer, was born at Constantinople in A.D. 1220, and died in 1282. He wrote several works which have come down to us. The most important of them is a history of the Byzantine empire, from the taking of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204, down to the year 1261, when Michael Palæologus delivered the city from the foreign yoke. Edited by Leo Allatius, Paris, 1651; reprinted at Venice, 1729.

ACRŌBÆA (ἡ Ἀκρόβεια), a mountainous tract of country in the north of Elis.

ACRŌTATUS (Ἀκρότατος). 1. Son of Cleomenes II., king of Sparta, sailed to Sicily in B.C. 314 to assist the Agrigentines against Agathocles of Syracuse. On his arrival at Agrigentum, he acted with such tyranny that the inhabitants compelled him to leave the city. He returned to Sparta, and died before his father, leaving a son, Aërus.—2. Grandson of the preceding, and the son of Aërus I., king of Sparta; bravely defended Sparta against Pyrrhus, in B.C. 272; succeeded his father as king in 265, but was killed in the same year in battle against Aristodemus, the tyrant of Megalopolis.

ACRŌTHŌM or ACRŌTHŌI (Ἀκρόθωον, Ἀκρόθωοι: Ἀκροθώιτης: now Lavra), afterward called Uranopolis, a town near the extremity of the peninsula of Athos.

ACTÆA (Ἀκταία), daughter of Nereus and Doris.

ACTÆON (Ἀκταίων). 1. A celebrated hunter, son of Aristæus and Autonöë, a daughter of Cadmus, was trained in the art of hunting by the centaur Chiron. One day as he was hunting, he saw Diana (Artemis) with her nymphs bathing in the vale of Gargaphia, whereupon the goddess changed him into a stag, in which form he was torn to pieces by his fifty dogs on Mount Cithæron. Others relate that he provoked the anger of the goddess by boasting that he excelled her in hunting. 2. Son of Melissa, and grandson of Aëron, who had fled from Argos to Corinth for fear of the tyrant Phidon. Archias, a Corinthian, enamored with the beauty of Actæon, endeavored to carry him off; but in the struggle which ensued between Melissa and Archias, Actæon was killed. Vid. ARCHIAS.

ACTÆUS (Ἀκταίος), son of Erisichthon, and the earliest king of Attica. He had three daughters, Agraalos, Herse, and Pandrosus, and was succeeded by Cecrops, who married Agraalos.

ACTE, the concubine of Nero, was originally a slave from Asia Minor. Nero at one time thought of marrying her; whence he pretended that she was descended from King Attalus. She survived Nero.

ACTE ('Ακτῆ), properly a piece of land running into the sea, and attached to another larger piece of land, but not necessarily by a narrow neck. 1. An ancient name of Attica, used especially by the poets.—2. The eastern coast of Peloponnesus, near Trœzen and Epidaurus.—3. The peninsula between the Strymonic and Singitic gulfs, on which Mount Athos is.

ACTIACUS. Vid. ACTIUM.

ACTIS, one of the Heliadæ, who, according to Diodorus, migrated from Rhodes to Egypt, founded Heliopolis, which he named after his father, and taught the Egyptians astrology. The same writer states that the Greeks, having lost by a deluge nearly all the memorials of previous events, became ignorant of their claim to the invention of this science, and allowed the Egyptians to arrogate it to themselves. Wesseling considers this a mere fable, based on the national vanity of the Greeks.]

ACTISÆNES ('Ακτισῆνης), a king of Æthiopia, who conquered Egypt and governed it with justice, in the reign of Amasis. This Amasis is either a more ancient king than the contemporary of Cyrus, [or else we must read Amosis for Anasisis.]

ACTIUM ('Ακτιον: 'Ακτιακός, 'Ακτιος: now La Punta, not Azio), a promontory, and likewise a place in Acarnania, at the entrance of the Ambracian Gulf, off which Augustus gained the celebrated victory over Antony and Cleopatra, on September 2, B.C. 31. At Actium there was originally no town, but only a temple of Apollo, who was hence called Actiacus and Actius. This temple was beautified by Augustus, who established, or rather revived a festival to Apollo, called Actia (vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v.), and erected NICOPOLIS on the opposite coast, in commemoration of his victory. A few buildings sprung up around the temple at Actium, but the place was only a kind of suburb of Nicopolis.

ACTIUS. Vid. ACTIUS.

ΑΚΤΩΡ ('Ακτωρ). 1. Son of Deion and Diomede, father of Menœtius, and grandfather of Patroclus.—2. Son of Phorbos and Hymirne, and husband of Molione.—3. A companion of Æneas, of whose conquered lance Turnus made a boast. This story seems to have given rise to the proverb Actoris spoliū (Juv., ii, 100) for any poor spoil.

ΑΚΤΩΡΙΔΕΣ or ΑΚΤΩΡΙΩΝ ('Ακτωριδης or 'Ακτωριων), patronymics of descendants of an Actor, such as Patroclus, Erithus, Eurytus, and Cteatus.

ACTUARIUS, JOANNES, a Greek physician of Constantinople, probably lived in the reign of Andronicus II. Palæologus, A.D. 1281-1328. He was the author of several medical works, which are extant, [and most of which have been published by Ideler in his "Physici et Medici Græci Minores," Berlin, 1841, seq.]

ACULŒO, C., an eminent Roman lawyer, who married the sister of Helvia, the mother of Cicero: his son was C. Visellius Varro; whence it would appear that Aculeo was only a surname given to the father from his acuteness, and that his full name was C. Visellius Varro Aculeo.

[ACUMENUS ('Ακουμενός), a celebrated physician of Athens, who lived in the fifth century, before Christ, a friend and companion of Socrates.]

ACUSILŒUS ('Ακουσίλαος), of Argos, one of the earlier Greek logographers, flourished about B. C. 525. Three books of his Genealogies are quoted, which were, for the most part, only a translation of Hesiod into prose. He wrote in the Ionic dialect. His fragments are published by Sturz, Lips., 1824, and in Didot's Fragment. Hist. Græc., p. 100, seq.—[2. An Athenian, who taught rhetoric at Rome in the time of Galba, and having amassed there great wealth, left it at his death to his countrymen.]

[AD. This preposition was often prefixed by the Romans to some natural object on the line of their marches, to indicate their stopping-place, especially when encamping in any quarter where they did not find any habitation or settlement by which the spot might be designated. Sometimes the preposition was prefixed to the ordinal number, designating the distance in miles. Thus, Ad Aquas indicated a spot near which there was water, or an encampment near water; Ad Quartum, "at the fourth mile-stone:" supply lapidem, &c.]

ADA ('Αδα), daughter of Hecatomnus, king of Caria, and sister of Mausolus, Artemisia, Hidrieus, and Pixodarus. She was married to her brother Hidrieus, on whose death (B.C. 344) she succeeded to the throne of Caria, but was expelled by her brother Pixodarus in 340. When Alexander entered Caria in 334, Ada, who was in possession of the fortress of Alinda, surrendered this place to him. After taking Halicarnassus, Alexander committed the government of Caria to her.

ADAMANTĒA. Vid. AMALTHEA.

ADAMANTIUS ('Αδαμάντιος), a Greek physician, flourished about A.D. 415, the author of a Greek treatise on Physiognomy, which is borrowed in a great measure from Polemo's work on the same subject. Edited by Franzius, in Scriptores Physiognomiae Veteres, 1780, 8vo.

[ADAMAS ('Αδάμας), a Trojan hero, slain by Meriones.]

[ADAMAS ('Αδάμας), a river of India, where diamonds were found. It is now the Soank, but near its mouth is called Bramni.

[ΑΔΑΝΑ (τὰ Ἀδανα: Ἀδανεύεις: now Adana), a city in the interior of Cilicia, on the west side of the River Sarus, in a fruitful district of country.]

ADDŪA (now Adda), a river of Gallia Cisalpina, which rises in the Rætian Alps, and flows through the Lacus Larius (now Lago di Como) into the Po, about eight miles above Cremona.

ADHERBAL ('Αράρβαρ), son of Micipsa, and grandson of Masinissa, had the kingdom of Numidia left to him by his father in conjunction with his brother Hiempsal and Jugurtha, B.C. 118. After the murder of his brother by Jugurtha, Adherbal fled to Rome, and was restored to his share of the kingdom by the Romans in 117. But he was again stripped of his dominions by Jugurtha, and besieged in Cirta, where he was treacherously killed by Jugurtha in 112. [According to Geseuius, the more Oriental form of the name is Atherbal, signifying "the worshipper of Baal;" from this the softer form Adherbal arose.]

ADIABENE (Ἀδιὰβηνή), a district of Assyria, east of the Tigris, and between the River Lycus, called Zabatus in the Anabasis of Xenophon, and the Caprus, both of which are branches of the Tigris.

ADIMANTUS (Ἀδείμαντος). 1. The commander of the Corinthian fleet when Xerxes invaded Greece (B.C. 480), vehemently opposed the advice of Themistocles to give battle to the Persians.—2. An Athenian, one of the commanders at the battle of Ægospotami, B.C. 405, where he was taken prisoner. He was accused of treachery in this battle, and is ridiculed by Aristophanes in the "Frogs"—3. The brother of Plato, frequently mentioned by the latter.

ADIS (Ἄδης: now Rhades?), a considerable town on the coast of Africa, in the territory of Carthage (Zeugitana), a short distance east of Tunis. Under the Romans it appears to have been supplanted by a new city, named Maxula.

ADMÈTE (Ἀδμήτη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys.—2. Daughter of Eurystheus and Antimache or Admete. Hercules was obliged by her father to fetch for her the girdle of Mars (Ares), which was worn by Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons.

ADMÈTUS (Ἀδμήτος). 1. Son of Pheres and Perilymene or Clymene, was king of Phæra in Thessaly. He took part in the Calydonian hunt and in the expedition of the Argonauts. He sued for the hand of Alcestis, the daughter of Pelias, who promised her to him on condition that he should come to her in a chariot drawn by lions and boars. This task Admetus performed by the assistance of Apollo, who served him, according to some accounts, out of attachment to him, or, according to others, because he was obliged to serve a mortal for one year for having slain the Cyclopes. On the day of his marriage with Alcestis, Admetus neglected to offer a sacrifice to Diana (Artemis), but Apollo reconciled the goddess to him, and at the same time induced the Moiræ to grant to Admetus deliverance from death, if at the hour of his death his father, mother, or wife would die for him. Alcestis died in his stead, but was brought back by Hercules from the lower world.—2. King of the Molossians, to whom THEMISTOCLES fled for protection, when pursued as a party to the treason of Pausanias.

ADŌNIS (Ἄδωνις), a beautiful youth, beloved by Venus (Aphrodite). He was, according to Apollodorus, a son of Cinyras and Medarme, or, according to the cyclic poet Panyasis, a son of Theias, king of Assyria, and Smyrna (Myrrha). The ancient story ran thus: Smyrna had neglected the worship of Venus (Aphrodite), and was punished by the goddess with an unnatural love for her father. With the assistance of her nurse she contrived to share her father's bed. When he discovered the crime he wished to kill her; but she fled, and on being nearly overtaken, prayed to the gods to make her invisible. They were moved to pity and changed her into a tree called σμόρνα. After the lapse of nine months the tree burst, and Adonis was born. Venus (Aphrodite) was so much charmed with the beauty of the infant, that she concealed it in a chest which she intrusted to Proserpina (Persephone); but the latter refused to give it up. Zeus decided the dispute by declaring that during four months of every year Adonis should be left to himself, during four months he should belong to Proserpina (Persephone), and during the remaining four to Venus (Aphrodite). Adonis, however, preferring to live with Venus (Aphrodite), also spent with her the four months over which he had control. Adonis afterward died of a wound which he received from a boar during the chase. The grief of the goddess at the loss of her favorite was so great, that the gods of the lower world allowed him to spend six months of every year with Venus (Aphrodite) upon the earth. The worship of Adonis, which in later times was spread over nearly all the countries round the Mediterranean, was, as the story itself sufficiently indicates, of Asiatic, or more especially of Phœnician origin. Thence it was transferred to Assyria, Egypt, Greece, and even to Italy, though, of course, with various modifications. In the Homeric poems no trace of it occurs, and the later Greek poets changed the original symbolic account of Adonis into a poetical story. In the Asiatic religions Venus (Aphrodite) was the passive or vegetative principle of nature. [Adonis represented the sun as the fructifying principle, while the boar, said to have killed him, was the emblem of winter, during which the productive powers of nature being suspended, Venus (Aphrodite) was said to lament the loss of Adonis until he was again restored to life.] Hence he spends six months in the lower and six in the upper world. His death and his return to life were celebrated in annual festivals (Adonia) at Byblos, Alexandria in Egypt, Athens, and other places.

ADŌNIS (Ἄδωνις: now Nahr Ibrahim), a small river of Phœnicia, which rises in the range of Libanus. [At the anniversary of the death of Adonis, which was in the rainy season, its waters were tinged red with the ochrous particles from the mountains of Libanus, and were hence fabled to flow with his blood.]

ADRAMYTTIUM (Ἀδραμύττειον or Ἀδραμύττιον: now Adramyti), a town of Mysia, near the head of the Gulf of Adramyttium, and opposite to the Island of Lesbos.

ADRĀNA (now Eder), a river in Germany, which flows into the Fulda, near Cassel.

ADRĀNUM or HADRĀNUM (Ἀδρανόν, Ἀδρανών, Ἀδρανίτης: now Aderno), a town in Sicily, on the river Adranus, at the foot of Mount Ætna, was built by Dionysius, and was the seat of the worship of the god Adranus.

ADRĀNUS (Ἀδρανός). Vid. ADRANUM.

ADRĀSTĪA (Ἀδράστεια). 1. A Cretan nymph, daughter of Melisseus, to whom Rhea intrusted the infant Jupiter (Zeus), to be reared in the Dietæan grotto.—2. A surname of Nemesis, derived by some writers from Adrastus, who is said to have built the first sanctuary of Nemesis on the River Asopus, and by others from a, priv., and δράσκειν, ἰ. ε., the goddess whom none can escape.

[ADRĀSTĪA (Ἀδράστεια), a district of Mysia, along the Propontis, through which the Granicus flowed, containing a city of the same name, said to have been founded by a King Adrastus, in which were a temple and oracle of Apollo and Diana.]

ADRASTUS (Ἀδραστός). 1. Son of Talauus, king of Argos, and Lysimache, or Lysianassa, or Eurynome. Adrastus was expelled from Argos by Amphiaraus, and fled to Polybus, king of Sicyon, whom he succeeded on the throne of Sicyon, and instituted the Nemean games. Afterward he became reconciled to Amphiaraus, and returned to his kingdom of Argos. He married his two daughters, Deipyle and Argia, the former to Tydeus of Calydon, and the latter to Polynices of Thebes, both fugitives from their native countries. He now prepared to restore Polynices to Thebes, who had been expelled by his brother Eteocles, although Amphiaraus foretold that all who should engage in the war should perish, with the exception of Adrastus. Thus arose the celebrated war of the "Seven against Thebes," in which Adrastus was joined by six other heroes, viz., Polynices, Tydeus, Amphiaraus, Capaneus, Hippomedon, and Parthenopæus. Instead of Tydeus and Polynices other legends mention Eteocles and Mecisteus. This war ended as unfortunately as Amphiaraus had predicted, and Adrastus alone was saved by the swiftness of his horse Arion, the gift of Hercules. Creon of Thebes refusing to allow the bodies of the six heroes to be buried, Adrastus went to Athens and implored the assistance of the Athenians. Theseus was persuaded to undertake an expedition against Thebes; he took the city, and delivered up the bodies of the fallen heroes to their friends for burial. Ten years after this, Adrastus persuaded the seven sons of the heroes who had fallen in the war to make a new attack upon Thebes, and the oracle now promised success. This war is known as the war of the "Epigoni" (Ἐπίγονοι), or descendants. Thebes was taken and razed to the ground. The only Argive hero that fell in this war was Egialeus, the son of Adrastus: the latter died of grief at Megara, on his way back to Argos, and was buried in the former city. He was worshiped in several parts of Greece, as at Megara, at Sicyon, where his memory was celebrated in tragic choruses, and in Attica. The legends about Adrastus, and the two wars against Thebes, furnished ample materials for the epic as well as tragic poets of Greece.—2. Son of the Phrygian king Gordius, having unintentionally killed his brother, fled to Cræsus, who received him kindly. While hunting, he accidentally killed Atys, the son of Cræsus, and in despair put an end to his own life.—[3. Son of Merope, an ally of the Trojans, probable founder of the city Adrastia, q. v.]

ADRIA or HADRIA. 1. (Now Adria), also called Atria, a town in Gallia Cisalpina, between the mouths of the Po and the Athesis (now Adige), from which the Adriatic Sea takes its name. It was originally a powerful town of the Etruscans.—2. (Now Atri), a town of Picenum in Italy, probably an Etruscan town originally, afterward a Roman colony, at which place the family of the Emperor Hadrian lived.

ADRIA (Ἀδρία, Ion. Ἀδρίας; Ἀδριανός) or MARE ADRIATICUM, also MARE SUPERUM, so called from the town Adria [No. 1], was, in its widest signification, the sea between Italy on the west, and Illyricum, Epirus, and Greece on the east. By the Greeks the name Adrias was only applied to the northern part of this sea, the southern part being called the Ionian Sea.

[ADRIANOPOLIS. Vid. HADRIANOPOLIS.]

ADRIANUS. Vid. HADRIANUS.

ADRIANUS (Ἀδριανός), a Greek rhetorician, born at Tyre in Phœnicia, was the pupil of Herodes Atticus, and obtained the chair of philosophy at Athens during the lifetime of his master. He was invited by M. Antoninus to Rome, where he died about A.D. 192. Three of his declamations are extant, edited by Walz in Rhetores Græci, vol. i, p. 526-33, Stuttg. 1832.

[ADRIATICUM MARE. Vid. ADRIA.]

ADRUMETUM. Vid. HADRUMETUM.

ADUATICA, a castle of the Eburones in Gaul probably the same as the later Aduaca Tongrorum (now Tongern).

ADUATICI or ADUATICI, a powerful people of Gallia Belgica in the time of Cæsar, were the descendants of the Cimbric and Teutonic, and lived between the Scheldis (now Schelde) and Mosa (now Maas).

ADULA MENS. Vid. ALPES.

ADULE or ADULIS (Ἀδούλη, Ἀδουλίς, and also other forms: Ἀδουλίτης, Adulitanus: ruins at Zula), a maritime city of Æthiopia, on a bay of the Red Sea, called Adulitaus Sinus (Ἀδουλιτικός κόλπος, Annesley Bay). It was believed to have been founded by slaves who fled from Egypt, and afterward to have fallen into the power of the Auxumites, for whose trade it became the great Emporium. Cosmas Indicopleustes (A.D. 535) found here the Monumentum Adulitanum, a Greek inscription recounting the conquests of Ptolemy II. Evergetes in Asia and Thrace.

ADYRMĀCHIDÆ (Ἀδυρμαχίδαι), a Lybian people, who appear to have once possessed the whole coast of Africa from the Canopic mouth of the Nile to the Catabathmus Major, but were afterward pressed further inland. In their manners and customs they resembled the Egyptians, to whom they were the nearest neighbors.

ÆA (Αἶα), sometimes with the addition of the word Colchis, may be considered either a part of Colchis or another name for the country. (Herod., i, 2.) [According to the scholium on Apoll. Rhod., the royal city of Æetes, on the Phasis, in Colchis.]

ÆACES (Αἰάκης), son of Syloson, and grandson of Æacus, was tyrant of Samos, but was deprived of his tyranny by Aristagoras, when the Ionians revolted from the Persians, B.C. 500. He then fled to the Persians, who restored him to the tyranny of Samos, B.C. 494.

ÆICEUM (Αἰάκειον). Vid. ÆGINA.

ÆACIDES (Αἰακίδης), a patronymic of the descendants of Æacus, as Peleus, Telamon, and Phocus, sons of Æacus; Achilles, son of Peleus, and grandson of Æacus; Pyrrhus, son of Achilles, and great-grandson of Æacus; and Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who claimed to be a descendant of Achilles.

ÆACIDES, son of Arymbas, king of Epirus, succeeded to the throne on the death of his cousin Alexander, who was slain in Italy, B.C. 326. Æacides married Phthia, by whom he had the celebrated PYRRHUS. He took an active part in favor of Olympias against Cassander; but his subjects disliked the war, rose against their king, and drove him from the kingdom. He was recalled to his kingdom by his subjects in B.C. 313: Cassander sent an army against him under Philip, who conquered him the same year in two battles, in the last of which he was killed.

ÆACUS (Αἶακος), son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Ægina, a daughter of the river-god Asopus. He was born in the Island of Enone or Enopia, whither Ægina had been carried by Jupiter (Zeus), and from whom this island was afterward called Ægina. Some traditions related that at the birth of Æacus, Ægina was not yet inhabited, and that Jupiter (Zeus) changed the ants (μύρμηκες) of the island into men (Μυρμιδόνες), over whom Æacus ruled. Ovid (Met., vii., 520) relates the story a little differently. Æacus was renowned in all Greece for his justice and piety, and was frequently called upon to settle disputes not only among men, but even among the gods themselves. He was such a favorite with the gods, that, when Greece was visited by a drought, rain was at length sent upon the earth in consequence of his prayers. Respecting the temple which Æacus erected to Jupiter (Zeus) Panhellenius, and the Æacæum, where he was worshiped by the Æginetans, see ÆGINA. After his death, Æacus became one of the three judges in Hades. The Æginetans regarded him as the tutelary deity of their island.

ÆÆA (Αἶαία). 1. A surname of Circe, the sister of Æetes. Her son, Telegonus, likewise bore the surname Ææus.—2. A surname of Calypso, who was believed to have inhabited a small island of the name of Ææa in the straits between Italy and Sicily.

[ÆANIS (Αἰανίς), a celebrated fountain near Opus, in Locris.]

[ÆANTËUM (Αἰάντειον), a tomb and temple of the Telamonian Ajax, on the Rhœtean promontory in Troas.]

ÆANTIDES (Αἰαντίδης), tyrant of Lampsacus, to whom Hippis gave his daughter Archædia in marriage.—2. A tragic poet of Alexandria, one of the tragic Pleiades. He lived in the time of the second Ptolemy.]

[ÆAS (Αἶας), more commonly Aous, q. v.]

ÆBURA (now Cuerva), a town of the Carpetani, in Hispania Tarraconensis.

ÆBURIA GENS, patrician, was distinguished in the early ages of the Roman republic, when many of its members were consuls, viz., in B.C. 499, 463, and 442.

ÆCA or ÆCÆ (Æcæus), a town of Apulia, on the road from Aquilonia in Samnium to Venusia.

ÆCULANUM or ÆCLANUM a town of the Hirpini in Samnium, a few miles south of Beneventum.

ÆDEPSUS (Αἰδέψος; Αἰδέψιος; now Dipso), a town on the western coast of Eubœa, north of Chalcis, with warm baths (still famous), sacred to Hercules, which the dictator Sulla used.

ÆDON (Ἄδων), daughter of Pandareus of Ephesus, wife of Zethus, king of Thebes, and mother of Itylus. Envious of Niobe, the wife of her brother Amphion, who had six sons and six daughters, she resolved to kill the eldest of Niobe's sons, but by mistake slew her own son Itylus. Jupiter (Zeus) relieved her grief by changing her into a nightingale, whose melancholy notes are represented by the poets as Ædon's lamentations about her child. Ædon's story is related differently in a later tradition.

ÆDÛR or HEDÛI, one of the most powerful people in Gaul, lived between the Liger (now Loire) and the Arar (now Saone). They were the first Gallic people who made an alliance with the Romans, by whom they were called "brothers and relations." On Cæsar's arrival in Gaul, B.C. 58, they were subject to Ariovistus, but were restored by Cæsar to their former power. In B.C. 52 they joined in the insurrection of Vercingetorix against the Romans, but were at the close of it treated leniently by Cæsar. Their principal town was BIBRACTE. Their chief magistrate, elected annually by the priests, was called Vergobretus.

ÆËTES or ÆËTA (Αἰήτης), son of Helios (the Sun) and Perscis, and brother of Circe, Pasiphaë, and Perses. His wife was Idyia, a daughter of Oceanus, by whom he had two daughters, Medea and Chalcioppe, and one son, Absyrtus. He was king of Colchis at the time when Phrixus came thither on the ram with the golden fleece. For the remainder of his history, see ABSYRTUS, ARGONAUTÆ, JASON, MEDEA, and PHRIXUS.—[2. This name was also borne by later kings of Colchis, as mentioned by Xenophon in the Anabasis, and Strabo, who says it was a common appellation of the kings of Colchis.]

ÆËTIS, ÆËTIAS, and ÆËTINE, patronymics of Medea, daughter of Æetes.

ÆGA (Αἶγη), daughter of Olenus, who, with her sister Helice, nursed the infant Jupiter (Zeus) in Crete, and was changed by the god into the constellation Capella.

ÆGÆA (Αἶγαι; Αἶγαῖος). 1. A town in Achaia on the Crathis, with a celebrated temple of Neptune (Poseidon), was originally one of the twelve Achaean towns, but its inhabitants subsequently removed to Ægina.—2. A town in Emathia, in Macedonia, the burial-place of the Macedonian kings, was probably a different place from EDESSA.—3. A town in Eubœa with a celebrated temple of Neptune (Poseidon), who was hence called Ægæus.—4. Also ÆGÆÆ (Αἶγαῖαι; Αἰγέαιρος), one of the twelve cities of Æolis in Asia Minor, north of Smyrna, on the River Hyllus: it suffered greatly from an earthquake in the time of Tiberius.—5. (Now Ayas), a sea-port town of Cilicia Campestris, at the mouth of the Pyramus.

[ÆGÆA (Αἶγαῖα), an appellation of Venus (Aphrodite), from her being worshiped in the isles of the Ægean.]

ÆGÆON (Αἶγαῖων), son of Uranus by Gæa. Ægæon and his brothers Gyges and Cotus are known under the name of the Uranids, and are described as huge monsters with a hundred arms (ἐκατόχρεια) and fifty heads. Most writers mention the third Uranid under the name of Briareus instead of Ægæon, which is explained by Homer (Il. i., 403), who says that men called him Ægæon, but the gods Briareus. According to the most ancient tradition, Ægæon and his brothers conquered the Titans when they made war upon the gods, and secured the victory to Jupiter (Zeus), who thrust the Titans into Tartarus, and placed Ægæon and his brothers to guard them. Other legends represent Ægæon as one of the giants who attacked Olympus; and many writers represent him as a marine god living in the Ægean Sea. Ægæon and his brothers must be regarded as personifications of the extraordinary powers of nature, such as earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and the like.

ÆGÆUM MARE (τὸ Αἰγαῖον πέλαγος, ὁ Αἰγαῖος πόντος), the part of the Mediterranean now called the Archipelago. It was bounded on the north by Thrace and Macedonia, on the west by Greece, and on the east by Asia Minor. It contains in its southern part two groups of islands, the Cyclades, which were separated from the coasts of Attica and Peloponnesus by the Myrtoan Sea, and the Sporades, lying off the coasts of Caria and Ionia. The part of the Ægean which washed the Sporades was called the Iærian Sea, from the Island Iæria, one of the Sporades. The origin of the name of Ægæan is uncertain; some derive it from Ægæus, the king of Athens who threw himself into it; others from Ægæa, a queen of the Amazons, who perished there: others from Ægæ in Eubœa; and others from αἶγίς, a squall, on account of its storms.

ÆGÆUS (Αἰγαῖος). Vid. ÆGÆ, No. 3.

ÆΓἸΛἸΟΣ (Αἰγάλεος, τὸ Αἰγάλεον ὄρος; now Skarmanga), a mountain in Attica, opposite Salamis, from which Xerxes saw the defeat of his fleet, B.C. 480.—[2. (τὸ Αἰγάλεον, now Mali), a mountain of Messenia, extending to Coryphasium.]

ÆGĀTES, the goat islands, were three islands off the west coast of Sicily, between Drepanum and Lilybæum, near which the Romans gained a naval victory over the Carthaginians, and thus brought the first Punic war to an end, B.C. 241. The islands were Ægūsa (Αἰγούσσα) or Caprāria (now Favignana), Phorbantia (now Levanzo), and Hiera (now Maretimo).

EGĒRIA or EGĒRIA, one of the Camenæ in Roman mythology, from whom Numa received his instructions respecting the forms of worship which he introduced. The grove in which the king had his interviews with the goddess, and in which a well gushed forth from a dark recess, was dedicated by him to the Camenæ. The Roman legends point out two distinct places sacred to Ægeria, one near Aricia, and the other near Rome, at the Porta Capena, in the valley now called Caparella. Ægeria was regarded as a prophetic divinity, and also as the giver of life, whence she was invoked by pregnant women. [Niebuhr places the grove of Egeria below S. Balbina, near the baths of Caracalla. Wagner, in a dissertation on this subject, is in favor of the valley of Caffarella, some few miles from the present gate of S. Sebastian.]

ÆGEUS (Αἰγεύς). 1. Son of Pandion and king of Athens. He had no children by his first two wives, but he afterward begot THESEUS by Æthra at Trœzen. When Theseus had grown up to manhood, he went to Athens and defeated the fifty sons of his uncle Pallas, who had made war upon Ægeus, and had deposed him. Ægeus was now restored. When Theseus went to Crete to deliver Athens from the tribute it had to pay to Minos, he promised his father that on his return he would hoist white sails as a signal of his safety. On approaching the coast of Attica he forgot his promise, and his father, perceiving the black sail, thought that his son had perished, and threw himself into the sea, which, according to some traditions, received from this event the name of the Ægean. Ægeus was one of the eponymous heroes of Attica; and one of the Attic tribes (Ægēis) derived its name from him.—2. The eponymous hero of the phyle called the Ægida at Sparta, son of Cœlycus, and grandson of Theras, the founder of the colony in Thera. All the Ægeids were believed to be Cadmeans, who formed a settlement at Sparta previous to the Dorian conquest.

ÆGĪE (Αἰγιάι, Αἰγιάιαι), a small town in Laconia, not far from Gythium, the Augiæ of Homer (Il., ii., 583).

ÆGĪLE or ÆGĪLĒA (Αἰγιάλη, Αἰγιάλεια), daughter of Adrastus and Amphithea, or of Ægialeus, the son of Adrastus, whence she is called Adrastine. She was married to Diomedes, who, on his return from Troy, found her living in adultery with Cometes. The hero attributed this misfortune to the anger of Vexus (Aphrodite), whom he had wounded in the war against Troy: when Ægiale threatened his life, he fled into Italy.

ÆGĪLĒA, ÆGĪLOS. Vid. ACHAIA: SICYON.

ÆGĪLEUS (Αἰγαλιεύς). 1. Son of Adrastus, the only one among the Epigoni that fell in the war against Thebes. Vid. ADRASTUS.—2. Son of Inachus and the Oceanid Melia, from whom the part of Peloponnesus afterward called Achaia [was fabled to have] derived its name Ægialea: he is said to have been the first king of Sicyon.—3. Son of Æetes, and brother of Medea, commonly called Abŷrtus.

ÆGĪDES (Αἰγίδης), a patronymic from Ægeus, especially his son Theseus.

ÆGĪLA (τὰ Αἰγίλα), a town of Laconia, with a temple of Ceres (Demeter).

ÆGĪLIA (Αἰγίλια: Αἰγίλιεύς). 1. A demus of Attica belonging to the tribe Antiochis, celebrated for its figs.—2. (Now Cerigotto), an island between Crete and Cythera.—3 [Ægilia (Αἰγίλεια, Hdt.)] An island west of Eubœa and opposite Attica.

ÆGĪMIUS (Αἰγίμιος), the mythical ancestor of the Dorians, whose king he was when they were yet inhabiting the northern parts of Thessaly. Involved in a war with the Lapithæ, he called Hercules to his assistance, and promised him the third part of his territory if he delivered him from his enemies. The Lapithæ were conquered. Hercules did not take the territory for himself, but left it to the king, who was to preserve it for the sons of Hercules. Ægimius had two sons, Dymas and Pamphylus, who migrated to Peloponnesus, and were regarded as the ancestors of two branches of the Dorian race (Dymanes and Pamphylians), while the third branch derived its name from Hyllus (Hyllæans), the son of Hercules, who had been adopted by Ægimius. There existed in antiquity an epic poem called Ægimius, which described the war of Ægimius and Hercules against the Laiothea.

ÆGIMURUS (Αἰγίμουρος, Ægimōri Aræ, Plin., and probably the Aræ of Ving., Æn., i, 108; now Zowimour or Zembra), a lofty island, surrounded by cliffs, off the African coast, at the mouth of the Gulf of Carthage.

ÆGINA (Αἴγινα: Αἰγινήτης: now Eghina), a rocky island in the middle of the Saronic Gulf, about two hundred stadia in circumference. It was originally called Œnone or Œnopia, and is said to have obtained the name of Ægina from Ægina, the daughter of the river-god Asopus, who was carried to the island by Jupiter (Zeus), and there bore him a son, Æacus. As the island had then no inhabitants, Jupiter (Zeus) changed the ants into men (Myrmidones), over whom Æacus ruled. Vid. ÆACUS. It was first colonized by Achæans, and afterward by Dorians from Epidaurus, whence the Doric dialect and customs prevailed in the island. It was at first closely connected with Epidaurus, and was subject to the Argive Phidon, who is said to have established a silver mint in the island. It early became a place of great commercial importance, and its silver coinage was the standard in most of the Dorian states. In the sixth century B.C. Ægina became independent, and for a century before the Persian war was a prosperous and powerful state. The Æginetans fought with thirty ships against the fleet of Xerxes at the battle of Salamis, B.C. 480, and are allowed to have distinguished themselves above all the other Greeks by their bravery. After this time its power declined. In B.C. 429 the Athenians took possession of the island and expelled its inhabitants, and though a portion of them were restored by Lysander in B.C. 404, the island never recovered its former prosperity. In the northwest of the island there was a city of the same name, which contained the Æacæum or temple of Æacus, and on a hill in the northeast of the island was the celebrated temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Panhellenius, said to have been built by Æacus, the ruins of which are still extant. The sculptures which occupied the tympana of the pediment of this temple were discovered in 1811, and are now preserved at Munich. In the half century preceding the Persian war, and for a few years afterward, Ægina was the chief seat of Greek art: the most eminent artists of the Æginetan school were CALLON, ANAXAGORAS, GLAUCIAS, SIMON, and ONATAS.

ÆGINËTA PAULUS. Vid. PAULUS ÆGINËTA.

ÆGINËUM (Αἰγίνιον: Αἰγινεύς: now Stagus), a town of the Tymphæi in Thessaly, on the confines of Athamania.

ÆGÏŒCIUS (Αἰγιοχός), a surname of Jupiter (Zeus), because he bore the ægis.

ÆGÏPAN (Αἰγίπαν), that is, Goat-Pan, was, according to some, a being distinct from Pan, while others regard him as identical with Pan. His story appears to be of late origin. Vid. PAN.

ÆGÏPLANCUS MONS (τὸ Αἰγίπλαγκτον ὄρος), a mountain in Megaris.

ÆGÏRA (Αἰγείρα: Αἰγυράτης), formerly Hyperesia (Ἵπερησία), a town in Achæa on a steep hill, with a sea-port about twelve stadia from the town. Vid. ÆGÆ, No. 1.

[ÆGÏAUS (Αἰγίερος), a village in the island of Lesbos, supposed by some scholars to be the town of Æolis alluded to by Herodotus under the name Ægirusa, but Herodotus says explicitly that the towns there mentioned were on the main land.]

ÆGÏRUSSA (Αἰγυρόεσσα, Αἰγυρούσσα), one of the cities of Æolis in Asia Minor.

ÆGISTHUS (Αἰγισθος), son of Thyestes, who unwittingly begot him by his own daughter Pelopia. Immediately after his birth he was exposed, but was saved by shepherds, and suckled by a goat (αἴξ), whence his name. His uncle Atreus brought him up as his son. When Pelopia lay with her father, she took from him his sword, which she afterward gave to Ægisthus. This sword was the means of revealing the crime of Thyestes, and Pelopia thereupon put an end to her own life. Ægisthus murdered Atreus, because he had ordered him to slay his father Thyestes, and he placed Thyestes upon the throne, of which he had been deprived by Atreus. Homer appears to know nothing of these tragic events; and we learn from him only that Ægisthus succeeded his father Thyestes in a part of his dominions. According to Homer, Ægisthus took no part in the Trojan war, and during the absence of Agamemnon, the son of Atreus, Ægisthus seduced his wife Clytemnestra. Ægisthus murdered Agamemnon on his return home, and reigned seven years over Mycenæ. In the eighth, Orestes, the son of Agamemnon, avenged the death of his father by putting the adulterer to death. Vid. AGAMEMNON, CLYTEMNESTRA, ORESTES.

ÆGÏTHALLUS (Αἰγίθαλλος: now C. di S. Teodoro), a promontory in Sicily, between Lilybæum and Drepanum, near which was the town Ægithallum.

ÆGÏTIUM (Αἰγίτιον: near Varnakova, Leake) a town in Ætolia, on the borders of Locris.

ÆGIUM (Αἴγιον: Αἰγιεύς: now Vositiza), a town of Achæa, and the capital after the destruction of Helice. The meetings of the Achæan League were held at Ægium in a grove of Jupiter (Zeus), called Homarium.

ÆGLE (Αἴγλη), that is, "Brightness" or "Splendor," is the name of several mythological females, such as, 1. The daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Næra, the most beautiful of the Naiads.—2. A sister of Phaëthon.—3. One of the Hesperides.—4. A nymph beloved by Theseus, for whom he forsook Ariadne.—5. One of the daughters of Æsculapius.

ÆGLËTES (Αἰγλήτης), that is, the radiant god a surname of Apollo, ÆGÏCËRUS (Αἰγόκερος), a surname of Pan descriptive of his figure with the horns of a goat, but more commonly the name of one of the signs of the Zodiac, Capricornus.

ÆGOS-PÏRÁMOS (Αἰγὸς ποταμός) [more usually in good authors, Αἰγὸς ποταμοί; in Latin writers Ægos Flumen: Αἰγὸς ποταμῆτης], the "goat's river," a small river, with a town of the same name on it, [now probably Galata], in the Thracian Chersonesus, flows into the Hellespont. Here the Athenians were defeated by Lysander B.C. 405.

ÆGOSTHËNA (Αἰγὸσθῆνα: Αἰγὸσθενεύς: Αἰγὸσθενίτης), a town in Megaris, on the borders of Bœotia, with a sanctuary of Melampus

ÆGUS and ROSCILLUS, two chiefs of the Allobroges, who had served Cæsar with fidelity in the Gallic war, deserted to Pompey in Greece (B.C. 48).

ÆGUSA. Vid. ÆGATES.

ÆGYPSUS or ÆGYSUS, a town of Mœsia on the Danube.

[ÆGYPTIUS (Αἰγύπτιος), an Ithacan hero, of noble descent and much experience, who opened the first assembly of the people called after the departure of Ulysses for Troy.]

ÆGYPTUS (Αἰγύπτος), a son of Belus and Anchioce or Achiroe, and twin-brother of Danaus. Belus assigned Libya to Danaus, and Arabia to Ægyptus, but the latter subdued the country of the Melampodes, which he called Egypt, after his own name. Ægyptus by his several wives had fifty sons, and his brother Danaus fifty daughters. Danaus had reason to fear the sons of his brother, and fled with his daughters to Argos in Peloponnesus. Thither he was followed by the sons of Ægyptus, who demanded his daughters for their wives, and promised faithful alliance. Danaus complied with their request, and distributed his daughters among them, but to each of them he gave a dagger, with which they were to kill their husbands in the bridal night. All the sons of Ægyptus were thus murdered, with the exception of Lynceus, who was saved by Hypermnestra. The Danaids buried the heads of their murdered husbands in Lerna, and their bodies outside the town, and were afterwards purified of their crime by Minerva (Athena) and Mercury (Hermes) at the command of Jupiter (Zeus).

ÆGYPTUS (ἡ Αἰγύπτος: Αἰγύπτιος, Ægyptius: now Egypt), a country in the northeastern corner of Africa, bounded on the north by the Mediterranean, on the east by Palestine, Arabia Petraea, and the Red Sea, on the south by Ethiopia, the division between the two countries being at the First or Little Cataract of the Nile, close to Syene (now Assouan: lat. 24° 8'), and on the west by the Great Libyan Desert. This is the extent usually assigned to the country; but it would be more strictly correct to define it as that part of the basin of the Nile which lies below the First Cataract.

1. Physical Description of Egypt.—The River Nile, flowing from south to north through a narrow valley, encounters, in lat. 24° 8', a natural barrier, composed of two islands (Philæ and Elephantine), and between them a bed of sunken rocks, by which it is made to fall in a series of cataracts, or rather rapids. (τὰ Κατάδουπα, ὁ μικρὸς Καταβάκτης, Cataractes Minor, compare CATARACTES), which have always been regarded as the southern limit assigned by nature to Egypt. The river flows due north between two ranges of hills, so near each other as to leave scarcely any cultivable land, as far as Silsilis (now Jebel Selselch), about forty miles below Syene, where the valley is enlarged by the western range of hills retiring from the river. Thus the Nile flows for about five hundred miles, through a valley whose average breadth is about seven miles, between hills which in one place (west of Thebes) attain the height of ten or twelve hundred feet above the sea, to a point some few miles below Memphis, where the western range of hills runs to the northwest, and the eastern range strikes off to the east, and the river divides into branches (seven in ancient time, but now only two), which flow through a low alluvial land, called, from its shape, the Delta, into the Mediterranean. To this valley and Delta must be added the country round the great natural lake Mœris (now Birket-el-Keroun), called Nomos Arsinoïtes (now Faioum), lying northwest of Heracleopolis, and connected with the Valley of the Nile by a break in the western range of hills. The whole district thus described is periodically laid under water by the overflowing of the Nile from April to October. The river, in subsiding, leaves behind a rich deposit of fine mud, which forms the soil of Egypt. All beyond the reach of the inundation is rock or sand. Hence Egypt was called the "Gift of the Nile." The extent of the cultivable land of Egypt is in the Delta about 4500 square miles, in the valley about 2255, in Faioum about 340, and in all about 7095 square miles. The outlying portions of ancient Egypt consisted of three cultivable valleys (called Oases), in the midst of the Western or Libyan Desert, a valley in the western range of hills on the west of the Delta, called Nomos Nitriotes from the Natron Lakes which it contains, some settlements on the coast of the Red Sea, and in the mountain passes between it and the Nile, and a strip of coast on the Mediterranean, extending east as far as Rhinocolura (now El-Arish), and west as far (according to some of the ancients) as the Catabathmus Magnus (long. about 25° 10' E.). The only river of Egypt is the Nile. Vid. NILUS. A great artificial canal (the Bahr-Yussouf, i. e., Joseph's Canal) runs parallel to the river, at the distance of about six miles from Diospolis Parva, in the Thebais, to a point on the west mouth of the river about half way between Memphis and the sea. Many smaller canals were cut to regulate the irrigation of the country. A canal from the eastern mouth of the Nile to the head of the Red Sea was commenced under the native kings, and finished by Darius, son of Hystaspes. There were several lakes in the country, respecting which vid. MÆRIS, MAREOTIS, BUTOS, TANIS, SIRBONIS, and LACUS AMARI.

2. Ancient History.—At the earliest period to which civil history reaches back, Egypt was inhabited by a highly civilized agricultural people, under a settled monarchical government divided into castes, the highest of which was composed of the priests, who were the ministers of a religion based on a pantheistic worship of nature, and having for its sacred symbols not only images, but also living animals and even plants. The priests were also in possession of all the literature and science of the country, and all the employments based upon such knowledge. The other castes were, second, the soldiers; third, the husbandmen; fourth, the artificers and tradesmen; and last, held in great contempt, the shepherds or herdsmen, poulterers, fishermen, and servants. The Egyptians possessed a written language, which appears to have had affinities with both the great families of Language, the Semitic and the Indo-European; and the priestly caste had, moreover the exclusive knowledge of a sacred system of writing, the characters of which are known by the name of Hieroglyphics, in contradistinction to which the common characters are called Enchorial (i. e., of the country). They were acquainted with all the processes of manufacture which are essential to a highly civilized community: they had made great advances in the fine arts, especially architecture and sculpture (for in painting their progress was impeded by a want of knowledge of perspective); they were deterred from commercial enterprise by the policy of the priests, but they obtained foreign productions to a great extent, chiefly through the Phœnicians, and at a later period they engaged in maritime expeditions; in science they do not seem to have advanced so far as some have thought, but their religion led them to cultivate astronomy and its application to chronology, and the nature of their country made a knowledge of geometry (in its literal sense) indispensable, and their application of its principles to architecture is attested by their extant edifices. There can be little doubt that the origin of this remarkable people and of their early civilization is to be traced to the same Asiatic source as the early civilization of Assyria and India. The ancient history of Egypt may be divided into four great periods: (1.) From the earliest times to its conquest by Cambyses; during which it was ruled by a succession of native princes, into the difficulties of whose history this is not the place to inquire. The last of them, Psammenitus, was conquered and dethroned by Cambyses in B.C. 525, when Egypt became a province of the Persian empire. During this period Egypt was but little known to the Greeks. The Homeric poems show some slight acquaintance with the country and its river (which is also called Αἴγυρος, Od., xiv., 25), and refer to the wealth and splendor of "Thebes with the Hundred Gates." In the latter part of the period learned men among the Greeks began to travel to Egypt for the sake of studying its institutions; among others, it was visited by Pythagoras, Thales, and Solon. (2.) From the Persian conquest in B.C. 525, to the transference of their dominion to the Macedonians in B.C. 332. This period was one of almost constant struggles between the Egyptians and their conquerors, until B.C. 340, when Neetanebo II., the last native ruler of Egypt, was defeated by Darius Oeus. It was during this period that the Greeks acquired a considerable knowledge of Egypt. In the wars between Egypt and Persia, the two leading states of Greece, Athens and Sparta, at different times assisted the Egyptians, according to the state of their relations to each other and to Persia; and, during the intervals of those wars, Egypt was visited by Greek historians and philosophers, such as Hellanius, Herodotus, Anaxagoras, Plato, and others, who brought back to Greece the knowledge of the country which they acquired from the priests and through personal observation. (3.) The dynasty of Macedonian kings, from the accession of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, in B.C. 323, down to B.C. 30, when Egypt became a province of the Roman empire. When Alexander invaded Egypt in B.C. 332, the country submitted to him without a struggle; and while he left it behind him to return to the conquest of Persia, he conferred upon it the greatest benefit that was in his power, by giving orders for the building of Alexandria. In the partition of the empire of Alexander after his death in B.C. 323, Egypt fell to the share of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, who assumed the title of King in B.C. 306, and founded the dynasty of the Ptolemies, under whom the country greatly flourished, and became the chief seat of Greek learning. But soon came the period of decline. Wars with the adjacent kingdom of Syria, and the vices, weaknesses, and dissensions of the royal family, wore out the state, till in B.C. 81 the Romans were called upon to interfere in the disputes for the crown, and in B.C. 55 the dynasty of the Ptolemies came to be entirely dependent on Roman protection, and at last, after the battle of Actium and the death of Cleopatra, who was the last of the Ptolemies, Egypt was made a Roman province, B.C. 30. (4.) Egypt under the Romans, down to its conquest by the Arabs in A.D. 638. As a Roman province, Egypt was one of the most flourishing portions of the empire. The fertility of its soil, and its position between Europe and Arabia and India, together with the possession of such a port as Alexandria, gave it the full benefit of the two great sources of wealth, agriculture and commerce. Learning continued to flourish at Alexandria, and the patriarchs of the Christian Church in that city became so powerful as to contend for supremacy with those of Antioch, Constantinople, and Rome, while a succession of teachers, such as Origen and Clement of Alexandria, conferred real lustre on the ecclesiastical annals of the country. When the Arabs made their great inroad upon the Eastern empire, the geographical position of Egypt naturally caused it to fall an immediate victim to that attack, which its wealth and the peaceful character of its inhabitants invited. It was conquered by Amrou, the lieutenant of the Calif Omar, in A.D. 638.

3. Political Geography.—From the earliest times the country was divided into (1.) The Delta, or Lower Egypt (τὸ Δέλτα, ἡ κάτω χώρα now El-Bahari, El-Kébit); (2.) The Heptaomis, or Middle Egypt (Ἑπτανομίς, ἡ μεσὰρὸ χώρα, now Mesr Mostani); (3.) The Thebais, or Upper Egypt, (Θηβαίς, ἡ ἄνω χώρα, now Said): and it was further subdivided into thirty-six nomes or governments. [Under the Ptolemies the number of nomes became enlarged, partly by reason of the new and improved state of things in that quarter of Egypt where Alexandria was situated, partly by the addition of the Greater or Lesser Oasis to Egypt, and partly, also, by the alterations which an active commerce had produced along the borders of the Sinus Arabicus. A change also took place about this same period in the three main divisions of the country. Lower Egypt, now no longer confined itself to the limits of the Delta, but had its extent enlarged by the addition of some of the neighboring nomes. In like manner, Upper Egypt, or the Thebais, received a portion of what had formerly been included within the limits of Middle Egypt, so that eventually but seven nomes remained to this last-mentioned section of the country, which, therefore, received the name of Heptanomis. The number of nomes became still further increased, at a subsequent period, by various subdivisions of the older ones. At still later period we hear little more of the zones. A new division of the country took place under the Eastern empire. An imperial prefect exercised sway not only over Egypt, but also over Libya as far as Cyrene, while a Comes Militaris had charge of the fores. From this time the whole of Middle Egypt, previously named Heptanomia, bore the name of Arcadia, in honor of Arcadius, eldest son of Theodosius. A new province had also arisen, a considerable time before this, called Augustannica, from its lying chiefly along the Nile. It comprised the eastern half of the Delta, together with a portion of Arabia, as far as the Arabian Gulf, and also the cities on the Mediterranean as far as the frontiers of Syria. Its capital was Pelusium. Respecting the Oases, vid. OASIS.

ÆGYS (Αἴγυς, Αἰγύπτις, Αἰγυεύς; near Ghiorgitza), a town of Laconia on the borders of Arcadia.

ÆLANA (Αἰλάνα: Αἰλανίτις; now Akaba), a town on the northern arm of the Red Sea, near the Bahr-el-Akaba, which was called by the Greeks Ælanites, from the name of the town. It is the Elath of the Hebrews, and one of the seaports of which Solomon possessed himself, to carry on trade with Ophir and the remote East.

ÆLIA GENS, plebeian, the members of which are given under their surnames, GALLUS, LAMIA, PÆTUS, SEJANUS, STILO, TUBERO.

ÆLIA, a name given to Jerusalem after its restoration by the Roman emperor Ælius Hadrianus.

[ÆLIA, a name of females of the Ælia gens. 1. Wife of Sulla.—2. Petina, of the family of the Tuberos, and wife of the Emperor Claudius. She was repudiated by him in order to make way for Messalina.]

ÆLIANUS, CLAUDIUS, was born at Præneste in Italy, and lived at Rome about the middle of the third century of the Christian era. Though an Italian, he spoke and wrote Greek as well as a native Athenian. He never married, and lived to the age of sixty. Two of his works have come down to us: one a collection of miscellaneous history (Ποικιλὴ Ἱστορία), in fourteen books, commonly called Varia Historia; and the other a work on the peculiarities of animals (Περὶ Ζῴων Ἰδιότητος), in seventeen books, commonly called De Animalium Natura. The former work contains short narrations and anecdotes, historical, biographical, antiquarian, &c., selected from various authors, generally without their names being given, and on a great variety of subjects. The latter work is of the same kind, serappy and gossiping. It is partly collected from older writers, and partly the result of his own observations both in Italy and abroad. There are also attributed to him twenty letters on husbandry (Ἀγροικικαὶ Ἐπιστολαί), written in a rhetorical style and of no value.—Editions: Of the Varia Historia, by Perizonius, Leyden, 1701; by Gronovius, Leyden, 1731; and by Kühn, Leipsic, 1780. Of the De Animalium Natura, by Gronovius, London, 1744; by J. Schneider, Leipsic, 1784; and by Fr. Jacobs, Jena, 1832. Of the Letters, by Aldus Manutius, in the Collectio Epistolarum Græcarum, Venice, 1499, 4to.

assumed the imperial purple in Gaul, but was killed by his own soldiers.]

ÆLIANUS MÆCICIUS, an ancient physieian, who must have lived in the second century after Christ, as he is mentioned by Galeu as the oldest of his tutors.

ÆLIANUS TACTICUS, a Greek writer, who lived in Rome and wrote a work on the Military Tactics of the Greeks (Περὶ Στρατηγικῶν Τάξεων Ἑλληνικῶν), dedicated to the Emperor Hadrian. He also gives a brief account of the constitution of a Roman army at that time.—Editions. By Franeiseus Robortellus, Venice, 1552; and by Elzevir, Leyden, 1613.

ÆLLO, one of the Harpies. Vid. HARPYLE.
ÆLLOPUS (Ἀελλόπους), a surname of Iris, the messenger of the gods, by which she is described as swift-footed as a storm-wind.

ÆMILIA. 1. The third daughter of L. Æmilius Paulus, who fell in the battle of Cannæ, was the wife of Scipio Africanus I. and the mother of the celebrated Cornelia, the mother of the Græchi.—2. Æmilia Lepida. Vid. LEPIDA.—3. A Vestal virgin, put to death B.C. 114 for having violated her vows upon several occasions.

ÆMILIA GENS, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, said to have been descended from Mamercus, who received the name of Æmilius on account of the persuasiveness of his language (δι' αἰμυλιαν λόγον). This Mamercus is represented by some as the son of Pythagoras, and by others as the son of Numa. The most distinguished members of the gens are given under their surnames, BARBULA, LEPIDUS, MAMERCUS or MAMERCINUS, PAFUS, PAULUS, REGILLUS, SCAURUS.

ÆMILIA VIA, made by M. Æmilius Lepidus, eos. B.C. 187, continued the Via Flaminia from Ariminum, and traversed the heart of Cisalpine Gaul through Bononia, Mutina, Parma, Piacentia (where it crossed the Po) to Mediolanum. It was subsequently continued as far as Aquileia.

ÆMILIANUS. 1. The son of L. Æmilius Paulus Macedonicus, was adopted by P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and was thus called P. Cornelius Scipio Æmilianus Africanus. Vid. SCIPIO.—2. The governor of Pannonia and Mesia in the reign of Gallus, was proclaimed emperor by his soldiers in A.D. 253, but was slain by them after reigning a few months.—3. One of the thirty tyrants (A.D. 259–268), assumed the purple in Egypt, but was taken prisoner and strangled by order of Gallienus.

ÆMILIUS PROBUS. Vid. NEPOS, CORNELIUS.

[ÆMÖDE INSULÆ. Vid. HEMODE.]

ÆMÖNA or EMÖNA (now Laibach), a fortified town in Pannonia, and an important Roman colony, said to have been built by the Argonauts.

ÆNARÏA, also called PITHÆCUSA and INARÏME (now Ischia), a volcanic island off the coast of Campania, at the entrance of the Bay of Naples, under which the Roman poets represented Typhœus as lying.

ÆNËA (Αἰνεα: Αἰνεεύς, Αἰνεύτις), a town in Chalcidice, on the Thermaic Gulf.—[2. ÆNËA VETUS, a city near the Achelous, in Aearnania, in Strabo's time destroyed: further south was Ænëa Nova, now in ruins, near Palæo Catouna.]

ÆNËADES (Αἰνεάδης), a patronymic from

Æneas, given to his son Ascanius or Iulus, and to those who were believed to be descended from him, such as Augustus, and the Romans in general.

ÆNEAS (Alveias). 1. Homeric Story. Æneas was the son of Anchises and Venus (Aphrodite), and born on Mount Ida. On his father's side he was a great-grandson of Tros, and thus nearly related to the royal house of Troy, as Priam himself was a grandson of Tros. He was educated from his infancy at Dardanus, in the house of Alcahous, the husband of his sister. At first he took no part in the Trojan war; and it was not till Achilles attacked him on Mount Ida, and drove away his flocks, that he led his Dardanians against the Greeks. Henceforth he and Hector are the great bulwarks of the Trojans against the Greeks, and Æneas appears beloved by gods and men. On more than one occasion he is saved in battle by the gods: Venus (Aphrodite) carried him off when he was wounded by Diomedes, and Neptune (Poseidon), when he was on the point of perishing by the hands of Achilles. Homer makes no allusion to the emigration of Æneas after the capture of Troy, but, on the contrary, he evidently conceives Æneas and his descendants as reigning at Troy after the extinction of the house of Priam.—Later Stories. The later stories present the greatest variations respecting the conduct of Æneas at the capture of Troy and in the events immediately following. Most accounts, however, agree that after the city had fallen, he withdrew to Mount Ida with his friends and the images of the gods, especially that of Pallas (the Palladium); and that from thence he crossed over to Europe, and finally settled in Latium in Italy, where he became the ancestral hero of the Romans. A description of the wanderings of Æneas before he reached Latium, and of the various towns and temples he was believed to have founded during his wanderings, is given by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (i. 60, &c.), whose account is, on the whole, the same as the one followed by Virgil in his Æneid, although the latter makes various embellishments and additions, some of which, such as his landing at Carthage and meeting with Dido, are irreconcilable with mythical chronology.

From Pallene, where Æneas stayed the winter after the taking of Troy, he sailed with his companions to Delos, Cythera, Boia in Laconia, Zacynthus, Leucas, Actium, Ambracia, and to Dodona, where he met the Trojan Helenus. From Epirus he sailed across the Ionian Sea to Italy, where he landed at the Iapygian promontory. Thence he crossed over to Sicily, where he met the Trojans, Elymus and Ægestus (Acestes), and built the towns of Elyme and Ægesta. From Sicily he sailed back to Italy, landed in the port of Palinurus, came to the Island of Leucasia, and at last to the coast of Latium. Various signs pointed out this place as the end of his wanderings, and he and his Trojans accordingly settled in Latium. The place where they had landed was called Troy. Latinus, king of the Aborigines, prepared for war, but afterward concluded an alliance with the strangers, gave up to them part of his dominions, and with their assistance conquered the Rutulians. Æneas founded the town of Lavinium, called after Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, whom he married. A new war then followed between Latinus and Turnus, in which both chiefs fell, whereupon Æneas became sole ruler of the Aborigines and Trojans, and both nations were united into one. Soon after this Æneas fell in a battle with the Rutulians, who were assisted by Mezentius, king of the Etruscans. As his body was not found after the battle, it was believed that it had been carried up to heaven, or that he had perished in the River Numicius. The Latins erected a monument to him, with the inscription To the father and native god. Virgil represents Æneas landing in Italy seven years after the fall of Troy, and comprises all the events in Italy from the landing to the death of Turnus, within the space of twenty days. The story of the descent of the Romans from the Trojans through Æneas was believed at an early period, but probably rests on no historical foundation.—2. ÆNEAS SILVIUS, son of Silvius, and grandson of Ascanius, is the third in the list of the mythical kings of Alba in Latium: the Silvii regarded him as the founder of their house.

ÆNEAS GAZÆUS, so called from Gaza, his birth-place, flourished A.D. 487. He was at first a Platonist and a Sophist, but afterward became a Christian, when he composed a dialogue, on the Immortality of the Soul, called Theophrastus.—Editions: By Barthius, Lips., 1655; By Boissonade, Par., 1836.

ÆNEAS TACITUS, a Greek writer, may be the same as the Æneas of Stymphalus, the general of the Arcadians, B.C. 362 (Xen., Hell., vii., 3 § 1); and he probably lived about that period. He wrote a work on the art of war, of which a portion only is preserved, commonly called Commentarius Poliorœticus, showing how a siege should be resisted. An epitome of the whole book was made by Cineas. (Cic., ad Fam., ix., 25.)—Editions: By Ernesti, Lips., 1763; by Orelli, Lips., 1818.

ÆNESIDEMUS (Ἀνισίδημος), a celebrated skeptic, born at Cnosus in Crete, probably lived a little later than Cicero. He differed on many points from the ordinary skeptics. The grand peculiarity of his system was the attempt to unite skepticism with the earlier philosophy, to raise a positive foundation for it by accounting from the nature of things for the never-ceasing changes both in the material and spiritual world. None of the works of Ænesidemus have come down to us. To them Sextus Empiricus was indebted for a considerable part of his work.—[2. (Dor. Ἀνισίδαμος), father of Theron, tyrant of Agrigentum. *Vid. ÆNIĀNES (Ἀνιάνας, Ion. Ἐνιάνας), an ancient Greek race, originally near Ossa, afterward in southern Thessaly, between Eta and Othrys, on the banks of the Spercheus.

[ÆNI PONS (now Innsbruck), a town of Rætia, on the Ænus.]

ÆNUS (Ἄνως, Ἀνιάτης): now Eno, an ancient town in Thrace, near the mouth of the Hebrus, mentioned in the Iliad. It was colonized by the Æolians of Asia Minor. Virgil (Æn., iii., 18) supposes Ænos to have been built by Æneas, but he confounds it with ÆNEA in Chalcidice. Under the Romans Enos was a free town, and a place of importance.

ÆNUS (now Inn), a river in Rætia, the boundary between Rætia and Noricum.

ÆÖLES or ÆÖLII (Aiolæis), one of the chief branches of the Hellenic race, supposed to be descended from Æolus, the son of Hellen. Vid. ÆOLUS, No. 1. They originally dwelt in Thessaly, from whence they spread over various parts of Greece, and also settled in Æolis in Asia Minor, and in the Island of Lesbos.

ÆÖLÆ INSULÆ (ai Aiolov νήσοι: now Lipari Islands), a group of islands northeast of Sicily, where Æolus, the god of the winds, reigned. Homer (Od., x., 1) mentions only one Æolian island, and Virgil (Æn., i., 52) accordingly speaks of only one Æolia (sc. insula), where Æolus reigned, supposed to be Strongyle or Lipara. These islands were also called Hephæstīdes or Vulcaniæ, because Hephæstus or Vulcan was supposed to have had his workshop in one of them, called Hiera. (Virg., Æn., viii., 415, seq.) They were also named Lipārenses, from Lipāra, the largest of them. The names of these islands were Lipāra (now Lipari), Hiēra (now Volcano), Strougyle (now Stromboli), Phænicūsa (now Felicudi), Eriēusa (now Alicudi), Euonymus (now Panaria), Didyme (now Salina), Hiesia (now Lisca Bianca), Basilidia (now Basilizzo), Osteodes (now Ustica).

ÆÖLIDES (Aiolίδης), a patronymic given to the sons of Æolus, as Athamas, Cretheus, Sisyphus, Salmoncus, &c., and to his grandsons, as Cephalus, Ulysses, and Phrixus. [The name Æolides, applied by Virgil (Æn., 6, 164) to Misenus, is supposed by some to have arisen from the legendary connection between the Æolian and Campanian Cumæ; others suppose that, as Misenus played upon a wind-instrument, the poet, by a figurative genealogy, makes him the son of the wind-god Æolus. It is much more probable, however, that Virgil calls him Æolides as indicating merely his descent from a mortal father named Æolus, the same, probably, with the one slain in battle with the Latins (Æn., 12, 542, seq.)] Æolis is the patronymic of the female descendants of Æolus, given to his daughters Canace and Aleyone.

ÆÖLIS (Aiolίς), or ÆÖLIA, a district of Mysia in Asia Minor, was peopled by Æolian Greeks, whose cities extended from the Troad along the shores of the Ægean to the River Hermus. In early times their twelve most important cities were independent, and formed a league, the members of which celebrated an annual festival (the Panaeolium) at Cyme. The twelve cities comprising this league were Cyme, Larissæ, Neontehos, Temnus, Cilla, Notium, Ægirūsa, Pitane, Ægææ, Myrina, Grynæa, and Smyrna; but SMYRNA subsequently became a member of the Ionian confederacy. (Herod., i., 149, seq.) These cities were subdued by Cræsus, and were incorporated in the Persian empire on the conquest of Cræsus by Cyrus.

ÆÖLUS (Aiolος). Son of Hellen and the nymph Orseis, and brother of Dorus and Xuthus. He was the ruler of Thessaly, and the founder of the Æolic branch of the Greek nation. His children are said to have been very numerous; but the most ancient story mentions only four sons, viz., Sisyphus, Athamas, Cretheus, and Salmoncus. The great extent of country which this race occupied probably gave rise to the varying accounts about the number of his children.—2. Son of Hippotes, or, according to others, of Neptune (Poseidon) and Arne, a descendant of the previous Æolus. His story probably refers to the emigration of a branch of the Æolians to the west. His mother was carried to Metapontum in Italy, where she gave birth to Æolus and his brother Bæotus. The two brothers afterward fled from Metapontum, and Æolus went to some islands in the Tyrrhenian Sea, which received from him the name of the Æolian Islands. Here he reigned as a just and pious king, taught the natives the use of sails for ships, and foretold them the nature of the winds that were to rise. In these accounts Æolus, the father of the Æolian race, is placed in relationship with Æolus, the ruler and god of the winds. In Homer, however, Æolus, the son of Hippotes, is neither the god nor the father of the winds, but merely the happy ruler of the Æolian Island, to whom Jupiter (Zeus) had given dominion over the winds, which he might soothe or excite according to his pleasure. (Od., x., 1, seq.) This statement of Homer, and the etymology of the name of Æolus from æλλώ, led to Æolus being regarded in later times as the god and king of the winds, which he kept inclosed in a mountain. It is, therefore, to him that Juno applies when she wishes to destroy the fleet of the Trojans. (Virg., Æn., i., 78.) The Æolian Island of Homer was in later times believed to be Lipara or Strongyle, and was accordingly regarded as the place in which the god of the winds dwelt. Vid. ÆOLÆ INSULÆ.

ÆΡΕΑ (Αίπεια: Αιπειτης). 1. A town in Messenia on the sea-coast, afterward THURIA, [as Strabo says, but, according to Pausanias, the later CORONE].—2. A town in Cyprus, afterward SOLI.

ÆΡΥ (Αίρυ), a town in Elis, situated on a height, as its name indicates.

ÆΡΥΤΟΣ (Αίρυτος). A mythical king of Arcadia, from whom a part of the country was called Ærytis.—2. Youngest son of the Heraclid Cresphontes, king of Messenia, and of Merope, daughter of the Arcadian king Cypselus. When his father and brothers were murdered during an insurrection, Ærytus alone, who was with his grandfather Cypselus, escaped the danger. The throne of Cresphontes was, in the mean time, occupied by the Heraclid Polyphontes, who also forced Merope to become his wife. When Ærytus had grown to manhood, he returned to his kingdom, and put Polyphontes to death. From him the kings of Messenia were called Ærytids instead of the more general name Heraclids.—3. Son of Hippothous, king of Arcadia, and great-grandson of the Ærytus mentioned first.—[4. Son of Nelens, grandson of Codrus, founder of Priene.]

ÆQUI, ÆQUICŒLI, ÆQUICŒLÆ, ÆQUICŒLANI, an ancient warlike people of Italy, dwelling in the upper valley of the Anio, in the mountains forming the eastern boundary of Latium, and between the Latini, Sabini, Hernici, and Marsi. In conjunction with the Volsci, who were of the same race, they carried on constant hostilities with Rome, but were finally subdued in B.C. 302. One of their chief seats was Mount Algidus, from which they were accustomed to make their marauding expeditions.

[ÆÆRIAS, an ancient king of Cyprus, who is said to have founded the temple of Venus (Aphrodite) at Paphos.]

ÆÆROPE (ÆÆρόπη), daughter of Catreus, king of Crete, and grand-daughter of Minos. Her father, who had received an oracle that he should lose his life by one of his children, gave her and her sister Clymene to Nauplius, who was to sell them in a foreign land. Aærope married Plisthenes, the son of Atreus, and became by him the mother of Agamemnon and Menelaus. After the death of Plisthenes, Aærope married Atreus; and her two sons, who were educated by Atreus, were generally believed to be his sons. Aærope was faithless to Atreus, being seduced by Thyestes.

[ÆÆROPIUS (ÆÆροπος), brother of Perdicæus, who was the first Macedonian king of the race of Temenus, B.C. 670.—2. Aæropus I, king of Macedonia, great-grandson of Perdicæus, father of Aleætas.—3. Aæropus II, king of Macedonia, guardian of Orestes, the son of Archelaus, whom he murdered, after reigning jointly with him for four years; after this he ruled for two years alone, and was then succeeded by his son Pausanias.]

[ÆÆRÖPUS MONS (now Trëbusin), a mountain range of Illyriëum, at the base of which flows the Aöus.]

ÆÆSÆCUS (ÆÆσακος), son of Priam and Alexirrhöë. He lived far from his father's court, in the solitude of mountain forests. Hesperia, however, the daughter of Cebren, kindled love in his heart, and on one occasion, while he was pursuing her, she was stung by a viper and died. ÆÆsæcus in his grief threw himself into the sea, and was changed by Tethys into an aquatic bird. This is the story related by Ovid (Met., xi, 761, seq.), but it is told differently by Apollodorus.

ÆÆSAR, the name of the deity among the Etruscans.

ÆÆSAR or ÆÆSÄRUS (now Esaro), a river near Croton, in the country of the Brutti, in Southern Italy.

ÆÆSCHINES (ÆÆσχίνης). 1. The Athenian orator, born B.C. 389, was the son of Atrometus and Glaucothæa. According to Demosthenes, his political antagonist, his parents were of disreputable character, and not even citizens of Athens; but ÆÆschines himself says that his father was descended from an honorable family, and lost his property during the Peloponnesian war. In his youth, ÆÆschines appears to have assisted his father in his school; he next acted as secretary to Aristophon, and afterward to Eubulus; he subsequently tried his fortune as an actor, but was unsuccessful; and at length, after serving with distinction in the army, came forward as a public speaker, and soon acquired great reputation. In 347 he was sent, along with Demosthenes, as one of the ten ambassadors to negotiate a peace with Philip: from this time he appears as the friend of the Macedonian party and as the opponent of Demosthenes. Shortly afterward ÆÆschines formed one of the second embassy sent to Philip to receive the oath of Philip to the treaty which had been concluded with the Athenians; but, as the delay of the ambassadors in obtaining the ratification had been favorable to the interests of Philip, ÆÆschines, on his return to Athens, was accused by Timarchus. He evaded the danger by bringing forward a counter-accusation against Timarchus (345), and by showing that the moral conduct of his accuser was such that he had no right to speak before the people. The speech in which ÆÆschines attacked Timarchus is still extant: Timarchus was condemned, and ÆÆschines gained a brilliant triumph. In 343, Demosthenes renewed the charge against ÆÆschines of treachery during his second embassy to Philip. This charge of Demosthenes (περί παραπροβείας) was not spoken, but published as a memorial, and ÆÆschines answered it in a similar memorial on the embassy (περί παραπροβείας), which was likewise published. Shortly after the battle of Charonëa, in 338, which gave Philip the supremacy in Greece, Ctesiphon proposed that Demosthenes should be rewarded for his services with a golden crown in the theatre at the great Dionysia. ÆÆschines availed himself of the illegal form in which this reward was proposed to be given to bring a charge against Ctesiphon on that ground, but he did not prosecute the charge till eight years later 330. The speech which he delivered on the occasion is extant, and was answered by Demosthenes in his celebrated oration on the crown (περί στεφάνου). ÆÆschines was defeated, and withdrew from Athens. He went to Asia Minor, and at length established a school of eloquence at Rhodes. On one occasion he read to his audience in Rhodes his speech against Ctesiphon, [and, after receiving much applause, he was desired to read the speech of his antagonist. When he had done this, his auditors expressed great admiration; "but," exclaimed ÆÆschines, "how much greater would have been your admiration if you had heard (Demosthenes) himself!"] From Rhodes he went to Samos, where he died in 314. Besides the three orations extant, we also possess twelve letters which are ascribed to ÆÆschines, but which are the work of late sophists.—Editions. In the editions of the Attic orators (vid. DEMOSTHENES), and by Bremi, Zurich, 1823.—2. An Athenian philosopher and rhetorician, and a disciple of Socrates. After the death of his master, he went to Syracuse; but returned to Athens after the expulsion of Dionysius, and supported himself, receiving money for his instructions. He wrote several dialogues, but the three which have come down to us under his name are not genuine.—Editions: By Fischer, Lips., 1786; by Böckh, Heidelberg, 1810; and in many editions of Plato.—3. Of Neapolis, a Peripatetic philosopher, who was at the head of the Academy at Athens, together with Charmadæus and Clitomachus, about B.C. 109.—4. Of Miletus, a contemporary of Cicero, and a distinguished orator in the Asiatic style of eloquence.—[5. A distinguished individual among the Eretrians, who disclosed to the Athenians

the treacherous designs of some of his countrymen, when the former had come to their aid against the Persians.—6. An Acarnanian, commander of a company of light-armed troops in the retreat of the ten thousand under Xenophon.]

ÆSCHRION (Αἰσχύριον). 1. Of Syracuse, whose wife Pippa was one of the mistresses of Verres, and who was himself one of the scandalous instruments of Verres.—2. An iambic poet, a native of Samos. There was an epic poet of the same name, who was a native of Mytilene and a pupil of Aristotle, and who accompanied Alexander on some of his expeditions. He may perhaps be the same person as the Samian.—3. A native of Pergamus, and a physician in the second century after Christ, was one of Galen's tutors.

ÆSCHYLUS (Αἰσχύλος). 1. The celebrated tragic poet, was born at Eleusis in Attica, B.C. 525, so that he was thirty-five years of age at the time of the battle of Marathon, and contemporary with Simonides and Pindar. His father Euphorion was probably connected with the worship of Ceres (Demeter), and Æschylus himself was, according to some authorities, initiated in the mysteries of this goddess. At the age of twenty-five (B.C. 499), he made his first appearance as a competitor for the prize of tragedy, without being successful. He, with his brothers Cynægius and Aminius, fought at the battle of Marathon (490), and also at those of Salamis (480) and Plataea (479). In 484 he gained the prize of tragedy; and in 472 he gained the prize with the trilogy, of which the Persæ, the earliest of his extant dramas, was one piece. In 468 he was defeated in a tragic contest by his younger rival, Sophocles; and he is said in consequence to have quitted Athens in disgust, and to have gone to the court of Hiero, king of Syracuse, where he found Simonides, the lyric poet. In 467 his friend and patron King Hiero died; and in 458 it appears that Æschylus was again at Athens, from the fact that the trilogy of the Oresteia was produced in that year. In the same or the following year he again visited Sicily, and he died at Gela in 456, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. It is said that an eagle, mistaking the poet's bald head for a stone, let a tortoise fall upon it to break the shell, and so fulfilled an oracle, according to which Æschylus was fated to die by a blow from heaven. The alterations made by Æschylus in the composition and dramatic representation of Tragedy were so great, that he was considered by the Athenians as the father of it, just as Homer was of Epic poetry and Herodotus of History. Even the improvements and alterations introduced by his successors were the natural results and suggestions of those of Æschylus. The first and principal alteration which he made was the introduction of a second actor (δευτεραγωνιστής), and the consequent formation of the dialogue properly so called, and the limitation of the choral parts. The innovation was of course adopted by his contemporaries, just as Æschylus himself followed the example of Sophocles, in subsequently introducing a third actor. But the improvements of Æschylus were not limited to the composition of tragedy: he added the resources of art in its exhibition. Thus he is said to have availed himself of the skill of Agatharchus, who painted for him the first scenes which had ever been drawn according to the principles of linear perspective. He also furnished his actors with more suitable and magnificent dresses, with significant and various masks, and with the thick-soled cothurnus, to raise their stature to the height of heroes. He moreover bestowed so much attention on the choral dances, that he is said to have invented various figures himself, and to have instructed the choristers in them without the aid of the regular ballet-masters. With him, also arose the usage of representing at the same time a trilogy of plays connected in subject, so that each formed one act, as it were, of a great whole, which might be compared with some of Shakspeare's historical plays. Even before the time of Æschylus, it had been customary to contend for the prize of tragedy with three plays exhibited at the same time, but it was reserved for him to show how each of three tragedies might be complete in itself, and independent of the rest, and nevertheless form a part of an harmonious and connected whole. The only example still extant of such a trilogy is the Oresteia, as it was called. A satyrical play commonly followed each tragic trilogy. Æschylus is said to have written seventy tragedies. Of these only seven are extant, namely, the Persians, the Seven against Thebes, the Suppliants, the Prometheus, the Agamemnon, the Choephoræ, and Electra; the last three forming, as already remarked, the trilogy of the Oresteia. The Persians was acted in 472, and the Seven against Thebes a year afterward. The Oresteia was represented in 458; the Suppliants and the Prometheus were brought out some time between the Seven against Thebes and the Oresteia. It has been supposed from some allusions in the Suppliants, that this play was acted in 461, when Athens was allied with Argos.—Editions: By Schütz, third edition, Hal. Sax., 1808-21; by Wellauer, Lips., 1823; by W. Dindorf, Lips., 1827, and Oxon., 1832; and by Scholefield, Camb., 1830. [The best edition, so far as it goes, is that by Blomfield, which unfortunately was never completed, containing only five of the seven remaining tragedies.—2. of Cnidus, a contemporary of Cicero, and one of the most celebrated rhetoricians of Asia Minor.—3. Of Rhodes, was appointed by Alexander the Great one of the inspectors of the governors of that country after his conquest, in B.C. 332.]

ÆSCULAPIUS (Ἀσκληπιός), the god of the medical art. In the Homeric poems Æsculapius is not a divinity, but simply the "blameless physician" (ἰητὴρ ἀμίμω), whose sons, Machaon and Podalirius, were the physicians in the Greek army, and ruled over Tricca, Ithome, and Cœchælia. Homer says nothing of the descent of Æsculapius. The common story relates that he was a son of Apollo and Coronis, and that when Coronis was with child by Apollo, she became enamored with Ischys, an Arcadian. Apollo, informed of this by a raven, which he had set to watch her, or, according to others, by his own prophetic powers, sent his sister Artemis to kill Coronis. Artemis accordingly destroyed Coronis in her own house at Laccæia in Thessaly, on the shore of Lake Bœbia. According to Ovid (Met., ii, 605), it was Apollo himself who killed Coronis and Ischys. When the body of Coronis was to be burned, either Apollo or Mercury (Hermes) saved the child Æsculapius from the flames, and carried it to Chiron, who instructed the boy in the art of healing and in hunting. There are various other narratives respecting his birth, according to some of which he was a native of Epidaurus, and this was a common opinion in later times. After he had grown up, reports spread over all countries, that he not only cured all the sick, but called the dead to life again. But while he was restoring Glaucus to life, Jupiter (Zeus) killed him with a flash of lightning, as he feared lest men might contrive to escape death altogether, or because Pluto had complained of Æsculapius diminishing the number of the dead. But on the request of Apollo, Jupiter (Zeus) placed Æsculapius among the stars. Æsculapius is also said to have taken part in the expedition of the Argonauts and in the Calydonian hunt. He was married to Epione, and besides the two sons spoken of by Homer, we also find mention of the following children of his: Iapiseus, Alexenor, Aratus, Hygieia, Ægle, Iaso, and Panacea, most of whom are only personifications of the powers ascribed to their father. Æsculapius was worshipped all over Greece. His temples were usually built in healthy places, on hills outside the town, and near wells which were believed to have healing powers. These temples were not only places of worship, but were frequented by great numbers of sick persons, and may therefore be compared to modern hospitals. The principal seat of his worship in Greece was Epidaurus, where he had a temple surrounded with an extensive grove. Serpents were everywhere connected with his worship, probably because they were a symbol of prudence and renovation, and were believed to have the power of discovering herbs of wondrous powers. For these reasons, a peculiar kind of tame serpents, in which Epidaurus abounded, was not only kept in his temple, but the god himself frequently appeared in the form of a serpent. At Rome the worship of Æsculapius was introduced from Epidaurus at the command of the Delphic oracle or of the Sybilline books, in B.C. 293, for the purpose of averting a pestilence. The supposed descendants of Æsculapius were called by the patronymic name Æsclepiadæ (Ἄσκληπιάδαι), and their principal seats were Cos and Cnidus. They were an order or caste of priests, and for a long period the practice of medicine was intimately connected with religion. The knowledge of medicine was regarded as a sacred secret, which was transmitted from father to son in the families of the Æsclepiadæ. Respecting the festivals of Æsculapius, vid. Dict. of Antiq.

[ÆSERUS (Ἄστροπος), son of Bucolon and the nymph Abarbarea, slain by Euryalus before Troy.]

ÆSERUS (Ἄστροπος) [now Boklu according to Leake, but usually considered the modern Sataldere], a river which rises in the mountains of Ida, and flows by a northerly course into the Propontis, which it enters west of Cyzicus and east of the Granicus.

ÆSERNIA (Æserninus; now Isernia), a town in Samnium, made a Roman colony in the first Punic war.

ÆSIS (now Esino or Fiumesino), a river which formed the boundary between Picenum and Umbria, was anciently the southern boundary of the Senones, and the northeastern boundary of Italy proper.

ÆSIS or ÆSIUM (Æsinas; now Jesi), a town and a Roman colony in Umbria, on the River Æsis, celebrated for its cheese, Æsinas caseus.

ÆSON (Ἄϊων), son of Cretheus, the founder of Ioleus, and of Tyro, the daughter of Salmonus, and father of Jason and Promachus. He was excluded from the throne by his half-brother Pelias, who endeavored to keep the kingdom to himself by sending Jason away with the Argonauts. Pelias subsequently attempted to get rid of Æson by force, but the latter put an end to his own life. According to Ovid (Met., vii, 162, seq.), Æson survived the return of the Argonauts, and was made young again by Medea.

[ÆSOÏDĒS (Ἄισοιδῆς), a patronymic given to the sons of Æson, especially Jason.]

ÆSOPUS (Ἄισωπος). 1. A writer of fables, lived about B.C. 570, and was a contemporary of Solon. He was originally a slave, and received his freedom from his master Iadmon the Samian. Upon this he visited Cræsus, who sent him to Delphi, to distribute among the citizens four minæ apiece; but in consequence of some dispute on the subject, he refused to give any money at all, upon which the enraged Delphians threw him from a precipice. Plagues were sent upon them from the gods for the offence, and they proclaimed their willingness to give a compensation for his death to any one who could claim it. At length Iadmon, the grandson of Æsop's old master, received the compensation, since no nearer connection could be found. A life of Æsop prefixed to a book of fables purporting to be his, and collected by Maximus Planudes, a monk of the fourteenth century, represents Æsop as a perfect monster of ugliness and deformity; a notion for which there is no authority whatever in the classical authors. Whether Æsop left any written works at all, is a question which affords considerable room for doubt; though it is certain that fables, bearing Æsop's name, were popular at Athens in its most intellectual age. We find them frequently noticed by Aristophanes. They were in prose, and were turned into poetry by several writers. Socrates turned some of them into verse during his imprisonment, and Demetrius Phalereus (B.C. 320) imitated his example. The only Greek versifier of Æsop, of whose writings any whole fables are preserved, is Babrius. Vid. BABRIUS. Of the Latin writers of Æsopian fables, Phædrus is the most celebrated. Vid. PHÆDRUS. The Fables now extant in prose, bearing the name of Æsop, are unquestionably spurious, as is proved by Bentley in his dissertation on the fables of Æsop appended to his celebrated letters on Phalaris.—Editions: By Ernesti, Lips., 1781; by De Furia, Lips., 1810 reprinted by Coray at Paris, 1810; and by Schaefer, Lips., 1820.—2. A Greek historian, who wrote a life of Alexander the Great. The original is lost, but there is a Latin translation of it by Julius VALERIUS.

ÆSOPUS, CLAUDIUS, or CLODIUS, was the greatest tragic actor at Rome, and a contemporary of Roscius, the greatest comic actor; and both of them lived on intimate terms with Cicero. Æsopus appeared for the last time on the stage, at an advanced age, at the dedication of the theatre of Pompey (B.C. 55), when his voice failed him, and he could not go through with the speech. Æsopus realized an immense fortune by his profession, which was squandered by his son, a foolish spendthrift. It is said, for instance, that this son dissolved in vinegar and drank a pearl worth about £8000, which he took from the ear-ring of Cæcilia Metella.

ÆSTI, ÆSTYI, or ÆSTUR, a people dwelling on the sea-coast, in the northeast of Germany, probably in the modern Kurland, who collected amber, which they called glessum. Their customs, says Tacitus, resembled the Suevic, and their language the British. They were probably a Sarmatian or Slavonic race, and not a Germanic.

ÆSŪLA (Æsŭlānus), a town of the Æqui, on a mountain between Præneste and Tibur. (Æsulæ declivē arvum, Hor., Carm., iii., 29.)

[ÆSYĒTES (Αἰσυήτης), a Trojan hero, whose son Alcathous married a daughter of Anchises. His tomb is alluded to by Homer, according to whom it served as a post of observation, and is said by Strabo to have been five stadia distant from Troy, on the road leading to Alexandria Troas. A conical mound is still pointed out in that vicinity as the tomb of Æsyetes, and bears the appellation Udjek-Tēpe.]

[ÆSYMŒTES (Αἰσυμνήτης), an appellation of Bacchus (Dionysus), which means "Lord," "King," and under which he was honored especially at Arœ in Achaia.]

[ÆTHĒA (Αἰθαία), a city of Laconia.]

ÆTHĀLIA (Αἰθαλία, Αἰθάλη), called Ilva (now Elba) by the Romans, a small island in the Tuscan Sea, opposite the town of Populonia, celebrated for its iron mines. It had on the north-east a good harbor, "Argous Portus" (now Porto Ferraio), in which the Argonaut Jason is said to have landed.

ÆTHALĪDES (Αἰθαλιίδης), son of Mercury (Hermes) and Eupolemia, the herald of the Argonauts. He had received from his father the faculty of remembering every thing, even in Hades, and was allowed to reside alternately in the upper and in the lower world. His soul, after many migrations, at length took possession of the body of Pythagoras, in which it still recollected its former migrations.

ÆTHER (Αἰθήρ), a personified idea of the mythical cosmogonies, in which Æther was considered as one of the elementary substances out of which the Universe was formed. Æther was regarded by the poets as the pure upper air, the residence of the gods, and Jupiter (Zeus) as the Lord of the Æther, or Æther itself, personified.

ÆTHICES (Αἰθικες), a Thessalian or Epirot people, near Mount Pindus.

ÆTHĪCUS, HISTER or ISTER, a Roman writer of the fourth century after Christ, a native of Istria, the author of a geographical work called Æthici Cosmographia, which appears to have been chiefly drawn up from the measurement of the whole Roman world ordered by Julius Cæsar, B.C. 44, and from other official documents Edited by Gronovius, in his edition of Pomponius Mela, Leyden, 1722.

ÆTHILLA (Αἰθίλλα or Αἰθύλλα), daughter of Laomedon and sister of Priam, became after the fall of Troy the captive of Proteusilaus, [according to a late legend, for the Homeric account makes Proteusilaus to have been the first Greek slain before Troy. Viđ. PROTESILAUS.]

[ÆTHĪON, a seer and friend of Phineus, slain at the nuptials of Perseus and Andromeda.— 2. Son of a Heliconian nymph, fell in the expedition of the Seven against Thebes.]

ÆTHĪOPES (Αἰθίοπες, said to be from αἶθω and ὄψ, but perhaps really a foreign name corrupted), was a name applied, (1.) most generally to all black or dark races of men; (2.) to the inhabitants of all the regions south of those with which the early Greeks were well acquainted, extending even as far north as Cyprus and Phœnicia; (3.) to all the inhabitants of Inner Africa, south of Mauretania, the Great Desert, and Egypt, from the Atlantic to the Red Sea and Indian Ocean, and to some of the dark races of Asia; and (4.) most specifically to the inhabitants of the land south of Egypt, which was called ÆTHIOPIA.

ÆTHĪOPĪA (Αἰθιοπία, Αἰθ. ὑπερ Αἰγύπτου: Αἰθιοπία, Αἰθιοπέυς, Hom., fem. Αἰθιοπίς: Æthiops; now Nubia, Kordofan, Sennaar, Abyssinia), a country of Africa, south of Egypt, the boundary of the countries being at Syene (now Assuan) and the Smaller Cataract of the Nile, and extending on the east to the Red Sea, and to the south and southwest indefinitely, as far apparently as the knowledge of the ancients extended. In its most exact political sense the word Æthiopia seems to have denoted the kingdom of MEROË; but in its wider sense it included also the kingdom of the ΑΧΟΜΙΤÆ, besides several other peoples, such as the Troglodytes and the Ichthyophagi on the Red Sea, the Blemmyes and Megabari and Nubæ in the interior. The country was watered by the Nile and its tributaries, the Astapus (Bahr-el-Azrek or Blue Nile) and the Astaboras (Atbara or Tacazze). The people of Æthiopia seem to have been of the Caucasian race, and to have spoken a language allied to the Arabic. Monuments are found in the country closely resembling those of Egypt, but of an inferior style. The religion of the Æthiopians appears to have been similar to that of the Egyptians, but free from the grosser superstitions of the latter, such as the worship of animals. Some traditions made Meroë the parent of Egyptian civilization, while others ascribed the civilization of Æthiopia to Egyptian colonization. So great was the power of the Æthiopians, that more than once in its history Egypt was governed by Æthiopian kings; and even the most powerful kings of Egypt, though they made successful incursions into Æthiopia, do not appear to have had any extensive or permanent hold upon the country. Under the Ptolemies Græco-Egyptian colonies established themselves in Æthiopia, and Greek manners and philosophy had a considerable influence on the upper classes; but the country was never subdued. The Romans failed to extend their empire over Æthiopia, though they made expeditions into the country, in one of which C. Pe tronius, prefect of Egypt under Augustus, advanced as far as Napata, and defeated the warrior queen Candace (B.C. 22). Christianity very early extended to Æthiopia, probably in consequence of the conversion of the treasurer of Queen Candace (Acts, viii, 27). The history of the downfall of the great Æthiopian kingdom of Meroë is very obscure.

ÆTHLIUS (Æθλιος), first king of Elis, father of Endymion, was son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Protopenia, daughter of Deucalion; according to others, a son of Æolus.

[ÆTHON (Αἴθων from αἴθω), father of Tantalus.—2. Appellation assumed by Ulysses to escape detection on his return to Ithaca.—3. Name of a horse of the Sun; also of one of Pluto's; and of Aurora (Eos), of Hector, and of several other heroes.]

ÆTHRA (Αἴθρα): 1. Daughter of Pitheus of Træzen, was mother of Theseus by Ægeus. She afterward lived in Attica, from whence she was carried off to Lacedæmon by Castor and Pollux, and became a slave of Helen, with whom she was taken to Troy. At the capture of Troy she was restored to liberty by her grandson Acamas or Demophon.—2. Daughter of Oceanus, by whom Atlas begot the twelve Hyades and a son, Hyas.

[ÆTHYSA (Αἴθουσα), daughter of Neptune and Alcyone, and mother by Apollo of Eleuther.]

[ÆTHYIA (Αἴθυια), an appellation of Minerva (Athena), as the inventress of ship-building or navigation.]

ÆTIION (Æετιών). 1. A sculptor of Amphipolis, flourished about the middle of the third century B.C.—2. A celebrated painter, whose best picture represented the marriage of Alexander and Roxana. It is commonly supposed that he lived in the time of Alexander the Great; but the words of Lucian (Herod., 4) show that he must have lived about the time of Hadrian and the Antonines.

ÆTIIUS. 1. [Son of Anthas, king of Træzen, whose descendants founded Halicarnassus and Myndus.]—2. A celebrated Roman general, defended the Western empire against the barbarians during the reign of Valentinian III. In A.D. 451 he gained a great victory over Attila, near Chalons, in Gaul; but he was treacherously murdered by Valentinian in 454.—3. A Greek medical writer, born at Amida in Mesopotamia, lived at the end of the fifth or the beginning of the sixth century after Christ. His work Βιβλία Ἰατρικὰ Ἑκκαίδεκα, "Sixteen Books on Medicine," is one of the most valuable medical remains of antiquity, as being a judicious compilation from many authors whose works are lost. The whole of it has never appeared in the original Greek, but a corrupt translation of it into Latin was published by Cornarius, Basil, 1542, often reprinted, and in H. Stephens's Medicæ Artis Principes, Paris, 1567.

ÆTNA (Αἴτνη). 1. (Now Monte Gibello), a volcanic mountain in the northeast of Sicily, between Tauromenium and Catana. It is said to have derived its name from Ætna, a Sicilian nymph, a daughter of Uranus and Gæa, or of Briareus. Jupiter (Zeus) buried under it Typhon or Enceladus; and in its interior Vulcan (Hephestus) and the Cyclopes forged the thunderbolts for Jupiter (Zeus). There were seven ral eruptions of Mount Ætna in antiquity. One occurred in B.C. 475, to which Æschylus and Pindar probably allude, and another in B.C. 425, which Thucydides says (iii, 116) was the third on record since the Greeks had settled in Sicily. The form of the mountain seems to have been much the same in antiquity as it is at present. Its base covers an area of nearly ninety miles in circumference, and its highest point is 10,874 feet above the level of the sea. The circumference of the crater is variously estimated from two and a half to four miles, and the depth from six hundred to eight hundred feet.—2. (Ætnenses: now S. Maria di Licodia or S. Nicoloas di Arenis), a town at the foot of Mount Ætna, on the road to Catana, formerly called Inessa or Innesa. It was founded in B.C. 461, by the inhabitants of Catana, who had been expelled from their own town by the Siculi. They gave the name of Ætna to Inessa, because their own town Catana had been called Ætna by Hiero I.

ÆTNEUS (Αἰτναῖος), an epithet of several gods and mythical beings connected with Mount Ætna: of Jupiter (Zeus), of whom there was a statue on Mount Ætna, and to whom a festival was celebrated there, called Ætnea; of Vulcan (Hephestus); and of the Cyclopes.

ÆTOLIA (Αἰτωλία: Αἰτωλός), a division of Greece, was bounded on the west by Acarnania, from which it was separated by the River Achelous, on the north by Epirus and Thessaly, on the east by the Ozolian Locrians, and on the south by the entrance to the Corinthian Gulf. It was divided into two parts, Old Ætolia, from the Achelous to the Evenus and Calydon, and New Ætolia, or the Acquired (ἐπίκτητος), from the Evenus and Calydon to the Ozolian Locrians. On the coast the country is level and fruitful, but in the interior mountainous and unproductive. The mountains contained many wild beasts, and were celebrated in mythology for the hunt of the Calydonian boar. The country was originally inhabited by Curetes and Leleges, but was at an early period colonized by Greeks from Elis, led by the mythical Ætolus. The Ætoliens took part in the Trojan war, under their king, Thoas. They continued for a long time a rude and uncivilized people, living to a great extent by robbery; and even in the time of Thucydides (B.C. 410) many of their tribes spoke a language which was not Greek, and were in the habit of eating raw flesh. Like the other Greeks, they abolished, at an early time, the monarchical form of government, and lived under a democracy. They appear to have been early united by a kind of league, but this league first acquired political importance about the middle of the third century B.C., and became a formidable rival to the Macedonian monarchs and the Achaean League. The Ætolian League at one time included not only Ætolia Proper, but Acarnania, part of Thessaly, Locris, and the Island of Cephalonia; and it also had close alliances with Elis and several towns in the Peloponnesus, and likewise with Cius on the Propontis. Its annual meetings, called Panætolica, were held in the autumn at Thermus, and at them were chosen a general (στρατηγός), who was at the head of the league, an hipparchus or master of the horse, a secretary, and a select committee called apoleti (ἀποκλητοί). For further particulars respecting the constitution of the league, vid. Dict. of Ant., art. ÆTOLIUM FŒDUS. The Ætoliæ took the side of Antiochus III. against the Romans, and on the defeat of that monarch B.C. 189, they became virtually the subjects of Rome. On the conquest of the Achæans, B.C. 146, Ætolia was included in the Roman province of Achaia. After the battle of Actium, B.C. 31, a considerable part of the population of Ætolia was transplanted to the city of Nicopolis, which Augustus built in commemoration of his victory.

ÆTOLUS (Ἄτωλός), son of Endymion and Neis, or Iphianassa, married Pronoë, by whom he had two sons, Pleuron and Calydon. He was king of Elis, but was obliged to leave Peloponnesus, because he had slain Apis, the son of Jason or Salmones. He went to the country near the Achelous, which was called Ætolia after him.

ÆXŒNE (Ἄξωνή and Ἄξωνής: Ἄξωνεύς: now Asani?), an Attic demus of the tribe Cæcropis or Pandionis. Its inhabitants had the reputation of being mockers and slanderers.

AFER, DOMITIUS, of Nemausus (Nismes) in Gaul, was the teacher of Quintilian, and one of the most distinguished orators in the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, but he sacrificed his character by conducting accusations for the government. He was consul suffectus in A.D. 39, and died in 60. Quintilian mentions several works of his on oratory, which are all lost.

[AFRANIA GAIA or CAIA, the wife of the senator Licinius Buceio, a very litigious woman, who always pleaded her own causes before the prætor. Hence her name became proverbial for a litigious woman. She died 48 B.C.]

AFRANIUS. 1. L., A Roman comic poet, flourished about B.C. 100. His comedies described Roman scenes and manners (Comædiæ togatæ), and the subjects were mostly taken from the life of the lower classes (Comædiæ tabernariæ). They were frequently polluted with disgraceful amours; but he depicted Roman life with such accuracy that he is classed with Menander (Hor., Æp., ii., 1, 57). His comedies continued to be acted under the empire. The names and fragments of between twenty and thirty are still preserved: [these fragments have been published by Bothe, in the 5th vol. of his Poetæ Scenici Lat., and by Neukirch, De Fabula togata Romana.] 2. L., a person of obscure origin, and a faithful adherent of Pompey. He served under Pompey against Scertorius and Mithradates, and was, through Pompey's influence, made consul, B.C. 60. When Pompey obtained the provinces of the two Spains in his second consulship (B.C. 55), he sent Afranius and Petreius to govern them, while he himself remained in Rome. In B.C. 49, Afranius and Petreius were defeated by Cæsar in Spain. Afranius thereupon passed over to Pompey in Greece; was present at the battle of Pharsalia, B.C. 48; and subsequently at the battle of Thapsus in Africa, B.C. 46. He then attempted to fly into Mauretania, but was taken prisoner by P. Sittius, and killed.

AFRICA (Ἀφρική: Africænus), was used by the ancients in two senses, (1.) for the whole continent of Africa, and (2.) for the portion of Northern Africa which constituted the territory of Carthage, and which the Romans erected into a province, under the name of Africa Propria.—1. In the more general sense the name was not used by the Greek writers; and its use by the Romans arose from the extension to the whole continent of the name of a part of it. The proper Greek name for the continent is Libya (Λιβύη). Considerably before the historical period of Greece begins, the Phœnicians extended their commerce over the Mediterranean, and founded several colonies on the northern coast of Africa, of which Carthage was the chief. Vid. CARTHAGO. The Greeks knew very little of the country until the foundation of the Dorian colony of CYRENE (B.C. 620), and the intercourse of Greek travellers with Egypt in the sixth and fifth centuries; and even then their knowledge of all but the part near Cyrene was derived from the Egyptians and Phœnicians, who sent out some remarkable expeditions to explore the country. A Phœnician fleet, sent by the Egyptian king Pharaoh Necho (about B.C. 600), was said to have sailed from the Red Sea, round Africa, and so into the Mediterranean: the authenticity of this story is still a matter of dispute. We still possess an authentic account of another expedition, which the Carthaginians dispatched under Hanno (about B.C. 510), and which reached a point on the western coast nearly, if not quite, as far as latitude ten degrees north. On the opposite side of the continent, the coast appears to have been very little known beyond the southern boundary of Egypt, till the time of the Ptolemies. In the interior, the Great Desert (Sahara) interposed a formidable obstacle to discovery; but even before the time of Herodotus, the people on the northern coast told of individuals who had crossed the Desert and had reached a great river flowing toward the east, with crocodiles in it, and black men living on its banks, which, if the story be true, was probably the Niger in its upper course, near Timbuctoo. That the Carthaginians had considerable intercourse with the regions south of the Sahara, has been inferred from the abundance of elephants they kept. Later expeditions and inquiries extended the knowledge which the ancients possessed of the eastern coast to about ten degrees south latitude, and gave them, as it seems, some further acquaintance with the interior, about Lake Tchad, but the southern part of the continent was so totally unknown, that Ptolemy, who finally fixed the limits of ancient geographical science, recurred to the old notion, which seems to have prevailed before the time of Herodotus, that the southern parts of Africa met the southeastern part of Asia, and that the Indian Ocean was a vast lake. The greatest geographers who lived before Ptolemy, namely, Eratosthenes and Strabo, had accepted the tradition that Africa was circumnavigable. The shape of the continent they conceived to be that of a right-angled triangle, having for its hypotenuse a line drawn from the Pillars of Hercules to the south of the Red Sea: and, as to its extent, they did not suppose it to reach nearly so far as the equator. Ptolemy supposed the western coast to stretch north and south from the Pillars of Hercules, and he gave the continent an indefinite extent toward the south. There were also great differences of opinion as to the boundaries of the continent. Some divided the whole world into only two parts, Europe and Asia, and they were not agreed to which of these two Lybia (i. e., Africa) belonged; and those who recognized three divisions differed again in placing the boundary between Libya and Asia either on the west of Egypt, or along the Nile, or at the Isthmus of Suez and the Red Sea: the last opinion gradually prevailed. As to the subdivision of the country itself, Herodotus distributes it into Ægyptus, Æthiopia (i. e., all the regions south of Egypt and the Sahara), and Libya, properly so called; and he subdivides Libya into three parts, according to their physical distinctions, namely, (1) the Inhabited Country along the Mediterranean, in which dwelt the Nomad Libyans (οἱ παραθαλάσσιοι τῶν νομάδων Λιβίων: the Barbary States); (2) the Country of Wild Beasts (ἡ θηριώδης), south of the former, that is, the region between the Little and Great Atlas, which still abounds in wild beasts, but takes its name from its prevailing vegetation (Beled-el-Jerid, i. e., the Country of Palms), and, (3) the Sandy Desert (ἡ ψίμμος; the Sahara), that is, the table-land bounded by the Atlas on the north and the margin of the Nile valley on the east, which is a vast tract of sand broken only by a few habitable islands, called Oases. As to the people, Herodotus distinguishes four races, two native, namely, the Libyans and Ethiopians, and two foreign, namely, the Phœnicians and the Greeks. The Libyans, however, were a Caucasian race: the Æthiopians of Herodotus correspond to our Negro races. The Phœnician colonies were planted chiefly along, and to the west of, the great recess in the middle of the north coast, which formed the two SYRTES, by far the most important of them being Carthage; and the Greek colonies were fixed on the coast along and beyond the east side of the Syrtes; the chief of them was CYRENE, and the region was called Cyrenaica. Between this and Ægypt were Libyan tribes, and the whole region between the Carthaginian dominions and Ægypt, including Cyrenaica, was called by the same name as the whole continent, Lybia. The chief native tribes of this region were the ADYRMACHIDÆ, MARMARIDÆ, PSYLLI, and NASAMONES. The last extended into the Carthaginian territory. To the west of the Carthaginian possessions, the country was called by the general names of NUMIDIA and MAURETANIA, and was possessed partly by Carthaginian colonies on the coast, and partly by Libyan tribes under various names, the chief of which were the NUMIDÆ, MASSYLI, MASSYSLI, and MAURI, and to the south of them the GÆTULI. The whole of this northern region fell successively under the power of Rome, and was finally divided into provinces as follows: (1.) Ægypt; (2.) Libya, including, (a) Libyæ Nomos or Libya Exterior; (b) Marmarica; (c) Cyrenaica; (3.) Africa Propria, the former empire of Carthage (see below, No. 2); (4.) Numidia; (5.) Mauretania, divided into, (a) Sitifensis; (b) Cæsariensis; (c) Tingitana; these, with (6.) Æthiopia, make up the whole of Africa, according to the divisions recognized by the latest of the ancient geographers. The northern district was better known to the Romans than it is to us, and was extremely populous and flourishing; and, if we may judge by the list of tribes in Ptolemy, the interior of the country, especially between the Little and Great Altars, must have supported many more inhabitants than it does at present. Further information respecting the several portions of the country will be found in the separate articles.—2. AFRICA PROPRIA OR PROVINCIA, or simply Africa, was the name under which the Romans, after the Third Punic War (B.C. 146), erected into a province the whole of the former territory of Carthage. It extended from the River Tusca, on the west, which divided it from Numidia, to the bottom of the Syrtis Minor, on the south-east. It was divided into two districts (regions), namely, (1.) Zeugis or Zeugitana, the district round Carthage, (2.) Byzacium or Byzacena, south of Zeugitana, as far as the bottom of the Syrtis Minor. It corresponds to the modern regency of Tunis. The province was full of flourishing towns, and was extremely fertile, especially Byzacena: it furnished Rome with its chief supplies of corn. The above limits are assigned to the province by Pliny: Ptolemy makes it extend from the River Ampsaga, on the west, to the borders of Cyrenaica, at the bottom of the Great Syrtis, on the east, so as to include Numidia and Tripolitana.

AFRICĀNUS, a surname given to the Scipios on account of their victories in Africa. Vid. SCIPIO.

AFRICĀNUS. 1. SEX. CÆCILIUS, a Roman juriconsult, lived under Antoninus Pius (A.D. 138-161), and wrote Libri LX. Questionum, from which many extracts are made in the Digest.—2. JULIUS, a celebrated orator in the reign of Nero, is much praised by Quintilian, who speaks of him and Domitius Afer as the best orators of their time.—3. SEX. JULIUS, a learned Christian writer at the beginning of the third century, passed the greater part of his life at Emmaus in Palestine, and afterward lived at Alexandria. His principal work was a Chronicon in five books, from the creation of the world, which he placed in 5499 B.C., to A.D. 221. This work is lost, but part of it is extracted by Eusebius in his Chronicon, and many fragments of it are preserved by Georgius Syncellus, Cedrenus, and in the Paschale Chronicon. There was another work written by Africanus, entitled Cesti (Κεστόι), that is, embroidered girdles, so called from the celebrated Cestus of Venus (Aphrodite). It treated of a vast variety of subjects—medicine, agriculture, natural history, the military art, &c. The work itself is lost, but some extracts from it are published by Thevenot in the Mathematici Veteres, Paris, 1698, and also in the Geoponica.

AFREÏCUS (ἄψ by the Greeks), the southwest wind, so called because it blew from Africa, frequently brought storms with it (creberque procellis Africus, Virg., Æn., i, 85).

[AGACLES (Ἀγακλῆς) a Myrmidon hero, father of Epigeus.]

[AGALLIS (Ἀγαλλίς), of Coreyra, a female grammarian, who wrote upon Homer: but from two passages in Suidas some have supposed that the true name is Anagallis.]

ΑΓΑΜΕΔΕ (Ἀγαμέδην), daughter of Augias and wife of Mulius, who, according to Homer (Il., xi., 739), was acquainted with the healing powers of all the plants that grow upon the earth.

ΑΓΑΜΕΔΕΣ (Ἀγαμέδης), commonly called son of Erginus, king of Orebomenus, and brother of Trophonius, though his family connections are related differently by different writers. Agamedes and Trophonius distinguished themselves as architects: they built a temple of Apollo at Delphi, and a treasury of Hyrieus, king of Hyria in Bœotia. The story about this treasury resembles the one which Herodotus (ii., 121) relates of the treasury of the Egyptian king Rhampsinitus. In the construction of the treasury of Hyrieus, Agamedes and Trophonius contrived to place one stone in such a manner that it could be taken away outside, and thus formed an entrance to the treasury, without any body perceiving it. Agamedes and Trophonius now constantly robbed the treasury; and the king, seeing that locks and seals were uninjured, while his treasures were constantly decreasing, set traps to catch the thief. Agamedes was thus ensnared, and Trophonius cut off his head to avert the discovery. After this Trophonius was immediately swallowed up by the earth. On this spot there was afterward, in the grove of Lebadæa, the cave of Agamedes, with a column by the side of it. Here was also the oracle of Trophonius, and those who consulted it first offered a ram to Agamedes and invoked him. A tradition mentioned by Cicero (Tusc. Quæst., i., 47) states that Agamedes and Trophonius, after building the temple of Apollo at Delphi, prayed to the god to grant them in reward for their labor what was best for men. The god promised to do so on a certain day, and when the day came the two brothers died.

ΑΓΑΜΕΜΝΩΝ (Ἀγαμέμνων), son of Plisthenes and Aërope or Eriphyle, and grandson of Atreus, king of Mycenæ; but Homer and others call him a son of Atreus and grandson of Pelops. Agamemnon and his brother Menelaus were brought up together with Ægisthus, the son of Thyestes, in the house of Atreus. After the murder of Atreus by Ægisthus and Thyestes, who succeeded Atreus in the kingdom of Mycenæ (vid. ÆGISHTHUS), Agamemnon and Menelaus went to Sparta, where Agamemnon married Clytemnestra, the daughter of Tyndareus, by whom he became the father of Iphigenia (Iphigenia), Chrysothemis, Laodice (Electra), and Orestes. The manner in which Agamemnon obtained the kingdom of Mycenæ is differently related. From Homer, it appears as if he had peaceably succeeded Thyestes, while, according to others, he expelled Thyestes, and usurped his throne. He now became the most powerful prince in Greece. A catalogue of his dominions is given in the Iliad (ii., 569, &c.) When Homer attributes to Agamemnon the sovereignty over all Argos, the name Argos signifies Peloponnesus, or the greater part of it, for the city of Argos was governed by Diomedes. When Helen, and the Greek chiefs resolved to recover her by force of arms, Agamemnon was chosen their commander-in-chief. After two years of preparation, the Greek army and fleet assembled in the port of Aulis in Bœotia. At this place Agamemnon killed a stag which was sacred to Diana (Artemis), who in return visited the Greek army with a pestilence, and produced a calm which prevented the Greeks from leaving the port. In order to appease her wrath, Agamemnon consented to sacrifice his daughter Iphigenia; but at the moment she was to be sacrificed, she was carried off by Diana (Artemis) herself to Tauris, and another victim was substituted in her place. The calm now ceased, and the army sailed to the coast of Troy. Agamemnon alone had one hundred ships, independent of sixty which he had lent to the Arcadians. In the tenth year of the siege of Troy we find Agamemnon involved in a quarrel with Achilles respecting the possession of Briseis, whom Achilles was obliged to give up to Agamemnon. Achilles withdrew from the field of battle, and the Greeks were visited by successive disasters. The danger of the Greeks at last induced Patroclus, the friend of Achilles, to take part in the battle, and his fall led to the reconciliation of Achilles and Agamemnon. Vid. ACHILLES. Agamemnon, although the chief commander of the Greeks, is not the hero of the Iliad, and in chivalrous spirit, bravery, and character altogether inferior to Achilles. But he nevertheless rises above all the Greeks by his dignity, power, and majesty: his eyes and head are likened to those of Jupiter (Zeus), his girdle to that of Mars (Ares), and his breast to that of Neptune (Poseidon). The emblem of his power is a sceptre, the work of Vulcan (Hephestus), which Jupiter (Zeus) had once given to Mercury (Hermes), and Mercury (Hermes) to Pelops, from whom it descended to Agamemnon. At the capture of Troy he received Cassandra, the daughter of Priam, as his prize. On his return home he was murdered by Ægisthus, who had seduced Clytemnestra during the absence of her husband. The tragic poets make Clytemnestra alone murder Agamemnon: her motive is in Æschylus her jealousy of Cassandra, in Sophocles and Euripides her wrath at the death of Iphigenia.

ΑΓΑΜΕΜΝΩΝΙΔΗΣ (Ἀγαμέμνονιδης), the son of Agamemnon, i. e., Orestes.

[ΑΓΑΝΙΤΗ (Ἀγανίτη) or ΑΓΛΑΟΝΙΤΗ (Ἀγλαονίτη), daughter of the Thessalian Hegeter: she was acquainted with the eclipses of the moon, and gave out that she could draw down the moon itself from the sky.]

ΑΓΑΝΙΠΠΗ (Ἀγανίππη), a nymph of the well of the same name at the foot of Mount Helicon, in Bœotia, which was considered sacred to the Muses (who were hence called Aganippides), and which was believed to have the power of inspiring those who drank of it. [The nymph is called a daughter of the river-god Permessus.] The fountain of Hippocrene has the epithet Aganippis (Ov. Fast., v., 7), from its being sacred to the Muses, like that of Aganippe.

ΑΓΑΡΕΝΩΡ (Ἀγαρήνωρ), a son of Anceus, king of the Arcadians, received sixty ships from Agamemnon, in which he led his Arcadians to Troy. On his return from Troy he was cast by a storm on the coast of Cyprus, where, according to some accounts, he founded the town of Paphos, and in it the famous temple of Venus (Aphrodite).

[AGAPTŌLĒMUS ('Αγαπτολεμος), a son of Ægyptus, slain by the Danaid Piræne.]

[AGAR, a city of Byzacium in Africa Propria. Shaw regards it as the modern Boohadjar, where ruins of a destroyed city are found.]

[AGARA (now Agra), a city of India intra Gangem, on the southern bank of the Iomanes (now Dschumna).]

[AGARICUS SINUS (now Gulf of Artingeri), a gulf of India intra Gangem.]

AGARISTA ('Αγαρίστη). 1. Daughter of Clitænes, tyrant of Sicyon, wife of Megacles, and mother of Clithestenes, who divided the Athenians into ten tribes, and of Hippocrates.—2. Daughter of the above-mentioned Hippocrates, and grand-daughter of No. 1, wife of Xanthippus, and mother of Pericles.

AGASIAS ('Αγασίας), a son of Dositheus, a sculptor of Ephesus, probably a contemporary of Alexander the Great (B.C. 330), sculptured the statue known by the name of the Borghese gladiator, which is still preserved in the gallery of the Louvre. This statue, as well as the Apollo Belvidere, was discovered among the ruins of a palace of the Roman emperors on the site of the ancient Antium (now Capo d'Anzo). From the attitude of the figure, it is clear that the statue represents not a gladiator, but a warrior contending with a mounted combatant. Perhaps it was intended to represent Achilles fighting with Penthesilæa.—[2. Another Ephesian sculptor, son of Menophilus, who exercised his art in Delos, while it was under the Roman sway.—3. Of Stymphalus in Areadia, an officer in the army of the ten thousand, often mentioned by Xenophon in his Anabasis.]

AGASICLES, AGESICLES, or HEGESICLES ('Αγασικλής, 'Αγησικλής, 'Ηγησικλής), king of Sparta, succeeded his father Arehidamas I, about B.C. 600 or 590.

[AGASTHĒNES ('Αγασθένης), son of Augias, and king in Elis: his son Polyxeus is mentioned among the suitors of Helen.]

[AGASTRŌPHUS ('Αγαστρόφος), son of Pæon, was slain by Diomedes before Troy.]

[AGASUS PORTUS (now Porto Greco), a harbor of Apulia on the Adriatic.]

AGATHARCHIDES ('Αγαθαρχίδης) or AGATHARCHUS ('Αγαθαρχος), a Greek grammarian, born at Cnidos, lived at Alexandria, probably about B.C. 130. He wrote a considerable number of geographical and historical works; but we have only an epitome of a portion of his work on the Erythrean Sea, which was made by Photius; it is printed in Hudson's Geogr. Script. Gr. Minores: [of his works on Europe and Asia some fragments are preserved in Athenæus and other writers, which have been published by Müller in Didot's Fragmenta Historicorum Græcorum, vol. iii, p. 190-197.]

AGATHARCHUS ('Αγαθαρχος), an Athenian artist, said to have invented scene-painting, and to have painted a scene for a tragedy which Æschylus exhibited. It was probably not till toward the end of Æschylus's career that scene-painting was introduced, and not till the time of Sophocles that it was generally made use of; which may account for Aristotle's assertion (Poet., iv, 16) that scene-painting was introduced by Sophocles.—2. A Greek painter, a native of Samos, and son of Eudemus. He was a contemporary of Aleibiades and Zeuxis, and must not be confounded with the contemporary of Æschylus.—[3. A Syracusan, who was plued by the Syracusans over a fleet of twelve ships in B.C. 413, to visit their allies and harass the Athenians. He was one of the commanders, in the same year, in the decisive battle fought in the harbor of Syracuse.]

[AGATHIA ('Αγάθη: 'Αγαθαίος: now Agde), a city of Gallia Narbonensis on the Arauris.]

AGATHĒMĒRUS ('Αγαθήμερος), the author of "A Sketch of Geography in Epitome" (τῆς γεωγραφίας ὑποσημῶσις ἐν ἐπιτομῇ), probably lived about the beginning of the third century after Christ. The work consists chiefly of extracts from Ptolemy and other early writers. It is printed in Hudson's Geogr. Script. Gr. Minores, [and by Hoffiman with Arrian's Periplus, &c., Lips., 1842.]

AGATHĪAS ('Αγαθίας), a Byzantine writer, born about A.D. 536 at Myrina in Æolis, practiced as an advocate at Constantinople, whence he obtained the name Scholasticus (which word signified an advocate in his time), and died about A.D. 582. He wrote many poems, of which several have come down to us; but his principal work was his History in five books, which is also extant, and is of considerable value. It contains the history from A.D. 553 to 558, a period remarkable for important events, such as the conquest of Italy by Narses and the exploits of Belisarius over the Huns and other barbarians. The best edition is by Niebuhr, Bonn, 1828.

[AGATHĪNUS ('Αγαθίνος), an eminent Greek physician, born at Sparta, and flourished in the first century after Christ: he was a pupil of Athenæus of Attalia in Cilicia, the founder of the Pneumatic sect: he did not follow strictly the tenets of his master, but united with them those of others, and thus became himself founder of a new medical sect called Hectici or Episyntheticci.—2. Of Elis, son of Thrasylbulus, according to Bæekh, an Iamid, whose father was a seer among the Mantineans in the time of Aratus: he was a celebrated athlete, and gained the prize at the Olympic games.—3. A Corinthian naval commander, who had charge of a fleet in the Corinthian Gulf.]

AGATHŌULĒA ('Αγαθούκλεια), mistress of Ptolemy IV. Philopator, king of Egypt, and sister of his minister Agathocles. She and her brother were put to death on the death of Ptolemy (B. C. 205).

AGATHŌCLES ('Αγαθοκλής). 1. A Sicilian raised himself from the station of a potter to that of tyrant of Syracuse and king of Sicily. Born at Therma, a town of Sicily subject to Carthage, he is said to have been exposed when an infant, by his father, Careinus of Rhegium, in consequence of a succession of troublesome dreams, portending that he would be a source of much evil to Sicily. His mother, however, secretly preserved his life, and at seven years old he was restored to his father, who had long repented of his conduct to the child. By him he was taken to Syracuse, and brought up as a potter. His strength and personal beauty recommended him to Damas, a noble Syracusan, who drew him from obscurity, and on whose death he married his rich widow, and so became one of the wealthiest citizens in Syracuse. His ambitious schemes then developed themselves, and he was driven into exile. After several changes of fortune, he collected an army which overawed both the Syracusans and Carthaginians, and was restored under an oath that he would not interfere with the democracy, which oath he kept by murdering four thousand and banishing six thousand citizens. He was immediately declared sovereign of Syracuse, under the title of Autocrat, B.C. 317. In the course of a few years the whole of Sicily which was under the dominion of Carthage, submitted to him. In B.C. 310 he was defeated at Himera by the Carthaginians, under Hamilcar, who straightway laid siege to Syracuse; whereupon he formed the bold design of averting the ruin which threatened him, by carrying the war into Africa. His successes were most brilliant and rapid. He constantly defeated the troops of Carthage, but was at length summoned from Africa by the affairs of Sicily, where many cities had revolted from him, B.C. 307. These he reduced, after making a treaty with the Carthaginians. He had previously assumed the title of King of Sicily. He afterward plundered the Lipari Isles, and also carried his arms into Italy, in order to attack the Bruttii. But his last days were embittered by family misfortunes. His grandson Archagathus murdered his son Agathoeles, for the sake of succeeding to the crown, and the old king feared that the rest of his family would share his fate. He accordingly sent his wife Texena and her two children to Egypt, her native country; and his own death followed almost immediately, B.C. 289, after a reign of twenty-eight years, and in the seventy-second year of his age. Other authors relate an incredible story of his being poisoned by Mæno, an associate of Archagathus. The poison, we are told, was concealed in the quill with which he cleaned his teeth, and reduced him to so frightful a condition, that he was placed on the funeral pile and burned while yet living, being unable to give any signs that he was not dead.—2. Of Pella, father of Lysimachus.—3. Son of Lysimachus, was defeated and taken prisoner by Dromichætes, king of the Getae, about B.C. 292, but was sent back to his father with presents. In 287 he defeated Demetrius Polioretetes. At the instigation of his step-mother, Arsinoë, Lysimachus cast him into prison, where he was murdered (284) by Ptolemæus Ceraunus.—4. Brother of AGATHOCLEA.—5. A Greek historian, of uncertain date, wrote the history of Cyzicus, which was extensively read in antiquity, and is referred to by Cicero (De Div. i, 24).

AGATHODÆMON (Ἀγαθοδαίμων or Ἀγαθὸς θεός).
1. The "Good Deity," in honor of whom the Greeks drank a cup of unmixed wine at the end of every repast.—[2. A name applied by the Greeks to the Egyptian Kneph, and also to a species of snake as his symbol.—3. A name given by the Greek residents to the Canopic arm of the Nile.]—4. Of Alexandria, the designer of some maps to accompany Ptolemy's Geography. Copies of these maps are found appended to several MSS. of Ptolemy.

ΑΘΛΗΘΩΝ (Ἀθήλων), an Athenian tragic poet, born about B.C. 447, of a rich and respectable family, was a friend of Euripides and Plato.

He gained his first victory in 416: in honor of which Plato represents the Symposium to have been given, which he has made the occasion of his dialogue so called. In 407 he visited the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, where his friend Euripides was also a guest at the same time. He died about 400, at the age of forty-seven. The poetic merits of Agathon were considerable, but his compositions were more remarkable for elegance and flowery ornaments than force, vigor, or sublimity. In the Thesmophoriazusa of Aristophanes he is ridiculed for his effeminaey, being brought on the stage in female dress. [The fragments of Agathon have been published by Wagner in Dido's Fragmenta Tragicorum Græc., p. 52-61.—2. A son of Priam.—3. Son of Tyrimmas, commander of the Odrysian cavalry under Alexander the Great.]

AGATHYRNA, AGATHYRNUM (Ἀγάθυρνα, -ον: Ἀγαθύρνατος: now Agatha), a town on the northern coast of Sicily, between Tyndaris and Calacta.

[AGATHYRUS (Ἀγάθυρος), son of Æolus, and founder of the city Agathyrna, q. v.]

AGATHYRSI (Ἀγάθυρσοι), a people in European Sarmatia, on the River Maris (now Marosch) in Transylvania. From their practice of painting or tattooing their skin, they are called by Virgil (Æn., iv., 146) picti Agathyrsi.

AGAVE (Ἀγανή), daughter of Cadmus, wife of Echion, and mother of Pentheus. When Pentheus attempted to prevent the women from celebrating the Dionysiac festivals on Mount Cithæron, he was torn to pieces there by his own mother Agave, who in her phrensy believed him to be a wild beast. Vid. PENTHEUS.—One of the Nereids, one of the Danaids, and one of the Amazons were also called Agavæ.

AGBATANA. Vid. ECBATANA.

AGDISTIS (Ἀγίστις), an androgynous deity, the offspring of Jupiter (Zeus) and Earth, connected with the Phrygian worship of Attes or Atys.

AGĒLADAS (Ἀγελάδας), an eminent statuary of Argos, the instructor of the three great masters, Phidias, Myron, and Polyeletus. Many modern writers suppose that there were two artists of this name: one an Argive, the instructor of Phidias, born about B.C. 540, the other a native of Sicyon, who flourished about B.C. 432.

AGELĀUS (Ἀγέλαος). 1. Son of Hercules and Omphale, and founder of the house of Cræsus.—2. Son of Damastor and one of the suitors of Penelope, slain by Ulysses.—3. A slave of Priam, who exposed the infant Paris on Mount Ida, in consequence of a dream of his mother.—[4. Son of the Hænelid Temenus.—5. A Trojan, son of Phradmon, slain by Diomedes.]

AGENDĪCUM or AGEDĪCUM (now Sens), the chief town of the Senones in Gallia Lugdunensis.

AGENOR (Ἀγήνωρ). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Libya, king of Phœnicia, twin-brother of Belus, and father of Cadmus, Phœnix, Cilix, Thasus, Phineus, and, according to some, of Europa also. Virgil (Æn., i, 338) calls Carthage the city of Agenor, since Dido was descended from Agenor.—2. Son of Isus, and father of Argus Panoptes, king of Argos.—3. Son and successor of Triopas, in the kingdom of Argos.

—4. Son of Pleuron and Xanthippe, and grandson of Ætolus.—5. Son of Phegeus, king of Peophs, in Arcadia. He and his brother Pronous slew Alemaon, when he wanted to give the celebrated necklace and peplos of Harmonia to his second wife Callirrhoe. Vid. PHEGEUS. The two brothers were afterward killed by Amphoterus and Acarnan, the sons of Alemaon and Callirrhoe.—6. Son of the Trojan Antenor and Theano, one of the bravest among the Trojans, engaged in single combat with Achilles, but was rescued by Apollo.

AGĒNŌRIDĒS (Ἀγηνωρίδης), a patronymic denoting a descendant of an Ageuor, such as Cadmus, Phineus, and Perseus.

AGESANDER, a sculptor of Rhodes, who, in conjunction with Polydorus and Athenodorus, sculptured the group of Laocoon, one of the most perfect specimens of art. This celebrated group was discovered in the year 1506, near the baths of Titus on the Esquiline Hill: it is now preserved in the museum of the Vatican. The artists probably lived in the reign of Titus, and sculptured the group expressly for that emperor.

AGĒSĪLAUS (Ἀγισίλαος), kings of Sparta. 1. Son of Doryssus, reigned forty-four years, and died about B.C. 886. He was contemporary with the legislation of Lycurgus.—2. Son of Archidamus II, succeeded his half-brother Agis II, B.C. 398, excluding, on the ground of spurious birth, and by the interest of Lysander, his nephew LEOTYCHIDES. From 396 to 394 he carried on the war in Asia Minor with great success, and was preparing to advance into the heart of the Persian empire, when he was summoned home to defend his country against Thebes, Corinth, and Argos, which had been induced by Artaxerxes to take up arms against Sparta. Though full of disappointment, he promptly obeyed; and in the course of the same year (394), he met and defeated at Coronæ, in Bœotia, the allied forces. During the next four years he regained for his country much of its former supremacy, till at length the fatal battle of Leuctra, 371, overthrew forever the power of Sparta, and gave the supremacy for a time to Thebes. For the next few years Sparta had almost to struggle for its existence amid dangers without and within, and it was chiefly owing to the skill, courage, and presence of mind of Agesilaus that she weathered the storm. In 361 he crossed with a body of Lacedæmonian mercenaries into Egypt. Here, after displaying much of his ancient skill, he died, while preparing for his voyage home, in the winter of 361–360, after a life of above eighty years and a reign of thirty-eight. His body was embalmed in wax, and splendidly buried at Sparta. In person Agesilaus was small, mean-looking, and lame, on which last ground objection had been made to his accession, an oracle, curiously fulfilled, having warned Sparta of evils awaiting her under a “lame sovereignty.” In his reign, indeed, her fall took place, but not through him, for he was one of the best citizens and generals that Sparta ever had.

minor, in B.C. 394, and reigned fourteen years. As soon as his minority ceased, he took an active part in the wars in which Sparta was then engaged with the other states of Greece. In 390 he invaded Argolis with success; in 385 he took the city of Mantinæ; in 381 he went to the assistance of Acanthus and Apollonia against the Olynthians, and died in 380 during this war in the peninsula of Pallene.—2. Son of Cleombrotus, reigned one year B.C. 371.—3. Succeeded Cleomenes in B.C. 220, but was soon deposed by his colleague Lycurgus: he afterward took refuge with the Romans.

AGĒTOR (Ἀγῆτωρ), “the leader,” a surname of Jupiter (Zeus) at Lacedæmon, of Apollo, and of Mercury (Hermes), who conducts the souls of men to the lower world.

AGĒVUS URIBICUS, a writer on the science of the Agrimensores, may perhaps have lived at the latter part of the fourth century of our era. His works are printed in Goesius, Rei Agrariæ Auctores.

AGGRAMMES OR XANDRAMES (Ξανδράμης), the ruler of the Gangaridæ and Prasiî in India, when Alexander invaded India, B.C. 327.

AGĪAS (Ἀγίας), a Greek epic poet, erroneously called Augias, a native of Træzen, flourished about B.C. 740, and was the author of a poem called Nosti (Νόστοι), i. e., the history of the return of the Acheean heroes from Troy.

AGĪNUM (now Agen), the chief town of the Nitiobriges in Gallia Aquitania.

AGIS (ἄγίς), kings of Sparta. 1. Son of Eurysthenes, the founder of the family of the Agidæ.—2. Son of Archidamus II, reigned B.C. 427–398. He took an active part in the Peloponnesian war, and invaded Attica several times. While Alcibiades was at Sparta he was the guest of Agis, and is said to have seduced his wife Timæa; in consequence of which Leotyichides, the son of Agis, was excluded from the throne as illegitimate.—3. Son of Archidamus III, reigned B.C. 338–330, attempted to overthrow the Macedonian power in Europe, while Alexander the Great was in Asia, but was defeated and killed in battle by Antipater in 330.—4. Son of Eudamidas II, reigned B.C. 244–240. He attempted to re-establish the institutions of Lycurgus, and to effect a thorough reform in the Spartan state; but he was resisted by his colleague Leonidas II and the wealthy, was thrown into prison, and was there put to death by command of the ephors, along with his mother Agesistrata, and his grandmother Archidamia.

AGIS, a Greek poet of Argos, a notorious flatterer of Alexander the Great.

[AGIZYMBIA, the name applied by Ptolemy to the part of Africa lying under the equator, the southernmost portion of that country with which the Greeks were acquainted.]

AGLĪA (Ἀγλαία), “the bright one.” 1. One of the CHARITES or Graces.—2. Wife of Charopus and mother of Nireus, who came from the Island of Syme against Troy.

[AGLAONICE. Vid. AGANICE.]

AGLAOPHÈME. Vid. SIRENS.

AGLAOPHON (Ἀγλαοφών). 1. Painter of Thasos, father and instructor of Polygnotus and Aristophon, lived about B.C. 500.—2. Painter, lived about B.C. 420, probably grandson of No. 1.

[AGLAUROS. Vid. AGRAULOS.]

AGLĀUS (Ἀγλαός), a poor citizen of Psophis in Arcadia, whom the Delphic oracle declared happier than Gyges, king of Lydia, on account of his contented disposition. Pausanias places him in the time of Cræsus.

[AGNIUS (Ἄγνιος), father of the Argonaut Typhs, the pilot of the Argo.]

AGNŌDICE (Ἀγνοδίκη), an Atheuian maiden, was the first of her sex to learn midwifery, which a law at Atheus forbade any woman to learn. Dressed as a man, she obtained instruction from a physician named Hierophilus, and afterward practiced her art with success. Summoned before the Aieopagus by the envy of the other practitioners, she was obliged to disclose her sex, and was not only acquitted, but obtained the repeal of the obnoxious law. This tale, though often repeated, does not deserve much credit, as it rests on the authority of Hyginus alone.

AGNŌNĪDES (Ἀγνωνίδης), an Athenian demagogue, induced the Athenians to sentence Phocion to death (B.C. 318), but was shortly afterward put to death himself by the Athenians.

AGORACRĪTUS (Ἀγοράκριτος), a statutory of Páros, flourished B.C. 440-428, and was the favorite pupil of Phidias. His greatest work was a statue of Venus (Aphrodite), which he changed into a statue of Nemesis, and sold it to the people of Rhamnus, because he was indignant that the Atheuians had given the preference to a statue by Alcámenes, who was another distinguished pupil of Phidias.

AGORÆA and AGORÆUS (Ἀγοραία and Ἀγοραῖος), epithets of several divinities who were considered as the protectors of the assemblies of the people in the agora, such as Jupiter (Zeus), Minerva (Athena), Diana (Artemis), and Mercury (Hermes).

[AGRA (Ἄγρα) or Agræ (Ἄγρα), an Attic demus south of Athens on the Ilissus: it contained a temple of Diana (Artemis) Agrotera, and a temple of Ceres (Demeter).]

AGRÆI (Ἀγραῖοι), a people of Ætolia, on the Achelous.

AGRAULE (Ἀγραυλή and Ἀγρούλη: Ἀγρυλεύς), an Attic demus of the tribe Erechtheis, named after AGRAULOS, No. 2.

AGRAULOS (Ἀγραυλος, also Ἀγλαυρος). 1. Daughter of Actæus, first king of Atheus, and wife of Cærops.—2. Daughter of Cærops and Agraulos, is an important personage in the legends of Attica, and there were three different stories about her. 1. According to some writers, Minerva (Athena) gave Erichthonius in a chest to Agraulos and her sister Herse, with the command not to open it; but, unable to control their curiosity, they opened it, and thereupon were seized with madness at the sight of Erichthonius, and threw themselves down from the Acropolis. 2. According to Ovid (Mét., ii., 710), Agraulos and her sister survived opening the chest, but Agraulos was subsequently punished by being changed into a stone by Mercury (Hermes), because she attempted to prevent the god from entering the house of Herse, when he had fallen in love with the latter. 3. The third legend relates that Athens was once involved in a long-protracted war, and that Agraulos threw herself down from the Acropolis because an oracle had declared that the Athenians would conquer if some one would sacrifice himself for his country. The Athenians, in gratitude, built her a temple on the Acropolis, in which it became customary for the young Athenians, on receiving their first suit of armor, to take an oath that they would always defend their country to the last. One of the Attic demi (Agraulæ) derived its name from this heroine, and a festival and mysteries (Agraulia) were celebrated at Athens in honor of her.

AGREUS (Ἄγρεύς), a hunter, a surname of Pan and Aristæus.

AGRI DECUMĀTES, tithe lands, the name given by the Romans to a part of Germany, east of the Rhine and north of the Danube, which they took possession of when the Germans retired eastward, and which they gave to Gauls and subsequently to their own veterans on the payment of a tenth of the produce (decūma). Toward the end of the first or beginning of the second century after Christ, these lands were incorporated in the Roman empire.

[AGRIĀNES (Ἀγριάνης, now Ergene), a river of Thrace, joining the Hebrus.]

[AGRIĀNES (Ἀγριάνης), a Thracian race dwelling around Mount Hæmus, in the vicinity of the River Agrianes, a rude and warlike people, and excellent archers.]

AGRICŌLA, CN. JŪLĪUS, born June 13th, A.D. 37, at Forum Julii (Fréjus in Provence), was the son of Julius Græcinus, who was executed by Caligula, and of Julia Procella. He received a careful education; he first served in Britain, A.D. 60, under Suetonius Paulinus; was quæstor in Asia in 63; was governor of Aquitania from 74 to 76; and was consul in 77, when he betrothed his daughter to the historian Tacitus, and in the following year gave her to him in marriage. In 78 he received the government of Britain, which he held for seven years, during which time he subdued the whole of the country with the exception of the highlands of Caledonia, and by his wise administration introduced among the inhabitants the language and civilization of Rome. He was recalled in 85 through the jealousy of Domitian, and on his return lived in retirement till his death in 93, which, according to some, was occasioned by poison, administered by order of Domitian. His character is drawn in the brightest colors by his son-in-law Tacitus, whose Life of Agricola has come down to us.

AGRĪGENTUM (Ἀκρίγας: Ἀκραγαντινος, Agrigentinus: now Girgenti), a town on the southern coast of Sicily, about two and a half miles from the sea, between the rivers Acragas (now Fiume di S. Biagio) and Hypsus (now Fiume Drago). It was celebrated for its wealth and populousness, and, till its destruction by the Carthaginians (B.C. 405), was one of the most splendid cities of the ancient world. It was the birth-place of Empedocles. It was founded by a Doric colony from Gela about B.C. 579, was under the government of the cruel tyrant Phalaris (about 560), and subsequently under that of Theron (488-472), whose praises are celebrated by Pindar. After its destruction by the Carthaginians, it was rebuilt by Timoleon, but it never regained its former greatness. After undergoing many vicissitudes, it at length came into the power of the Romans (210), in whose hands it remained. There are still gigantic remains of the ancient city, especially of the Olympiæum, or temple of the Olympian Jupiter (Zeus).

AGRINIUM (Ἀγρινιον), a town in Ætolia, perhaps near the sources of the Thermisus.

AGRIPIA, first a prenomen, and afterward a cognomen among the Romans, signifies a child presented at its birth with its feet foremost.

AGRIPIA, HERODES. I. Called "Agrippa the Great," son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. He was educated at Rome with the future Emperor Claudius, and Drusus, the son of Tiberius. Having given offence to Tiberius, he was thrown into prison; but Caligula, on his accession (A.D. 37), set him at liberty, and gave him the tetrarchies of Abilene, Batanæa, Trachonitis, and Auranitis. On the death of Caligula (41), Agrippa, who was at the time in Rome, assisted Claudius in gaining possession of the empire. As a reward for his services, Judæa and Samaria were annexed to his dominions. His government was mild and gentle, and he was exceedingly popular among the Jews. It was probably to increase his popularity with the Jews that he caused the Apostle James to be beheaded, and Peter to be cast into prison (41). The manner of his death, which took place at Cæsarea in the same year, is related in Acts, xii. By his wife Cypros he had a son, Agrippa, and three daughters, Berenice, Mariamne, and Drusilla.—2. Son of Agrippa I., was educated at the court of Claudius, and at the time of his father's death was seventeen years old. Claudius kept him at Rome, and sent Cuspius Fadus as procurator of the kingdom, which thus again became a Roman province. On the death of Herodes, king of Chalehis (48), his little principality was given to Agrippa, who subsequently received an accession of territory. Before the outbreak of the war with the Romans, Agrippa attempted in vain to dissuade the Jews from rebelling. He sided with the Romans in the war; and after the capture of Jerusalem, he went with his sister Berenice to Rome, and died in the seventy-third year of his age, A.D. 100. It was before this Agrippa that the Apostle Paul made his defence, A.D. 60 (Acts, xxv., xxvi.).

AGRIPIA, M. VIRGANIUS, born in B.C. 63, of an obscure family, studied with young Octavius (afterward the Emperor Augustus) at Apollonia in Illyria; and upon the murder of Cæsar in 44, was one of the friends of Octavius, who advised him to proceed immediately to Rome. In the civil wars which followed, and which terminated in giving Augustus the sovereignty of the Roman world, Agrippa took an active part; and his military abilities, combined with his promptitude and energy, contributed greatly to that result. In 41, Agrippa, who was then prætor, commanded part of the forces of Augustus in the Perusinian war. In 38 he obtained great successes in Gaul and Germany; in 37 he was consul; and in 36 he defeated Sex. Pompey by sea. In 23 he was ædile, and in this office expended immense sums of money upon great public works. He restored old aqueducts, constructed a new one, to which he gave the name of the Julian, in honor of Augustus, and also erected several public buildings. In 31 he commanded the fleet of Augustus, at the battle of Actium; was consul a second time in 28, and a third time in 27, when he built the Pantheon. In 21 he married Julia, daughter of Augustus. He had been married twice before, first to Pomponia, daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, and next to Marcella, niece of Augustus. He continued to be employed in various military commands in Gaul, Spain, Syria, and Pannonia, till his death in B.C. 12. By his first wife Pomponia, Agrippa had Vipsania, married to Tiberius, the successor of Augustus; and by his third wife, Julia, he had two daughters, Julia, married to L. Æmilinus Paulus, and Agrippina, married to Germanicus, and three sons, Caius Cæsar, Lucius Cæsar (vid CÆSAR), and Agrippa Postumus, who was banished by Augustus to the Island of Planasia, and was put to death by Tiberius at his accession, A.D. 14.

AGRIPIA. 1. Daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and of Julia, the daughter of Augustus, married Germanicus, by whom she had nine children, among whom was the Emperor Caligula, and Agrippina, the mother of Nero. She was distinguished for her virtues and heroism, and shared all the dangers of her husband's campaigns. On his death in A.D. 17, she returned to Italy; but the favor with which she was received by the people, increased the hatred and jealousy which Tiberius and his mother Livia had long entertained toward her. For some years Tiberius disguised his hatred, but at length, under the pretext that she was forming ambitious plans, he banished her to the Island of Pandataria (A.D. 30), where she died three years afterward, (A.D. 33), probably by voluntary starvation.—2. Daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina [No. 1.], and mother of the Emperor Nero, was born at Oppidum Ubiorum, afterward called in honor of her Colonia Agrippina, now Cologne. She was beautiful and intelligent, but licentious, cruel, and ambitious. She was first married to Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus (A.D. 28), by whom she had a son, afterward the Emperor Nero; next to Crispus Passienus, and thirdly to the Emperor Claudius (49), although she was his niece. In 50, she prevailed upon Claudius to adopt her son, to the prejudice of his own son Britannicus; and in order to secure the succession for her son, she poisoned the emperor in 54. Upon the accession of her son Nero, who was then only seventeen years of age, she governed the Roman empire for a few years in his name. The young emperor soon became tired of the ascendancy of his mother, and after making several attempts to shake off her authority, he caused her to be assassinated in 59.

AGRIPINENSES. Vid COLONIA AGRIPPIA.

AGRIUS (Ἄγριος), son of Porthaon and Euryte, and brother of Ceneus, king of Calydon in Ætolia: his six sons deprived Ceneus of his kingdom, and gave it to their father; but Agrius and his sons were afterward slain by Diomedes, the grandson of Ceneus.

AGRÆCIUS or AGRÆTIUS, a Roman grammarian, probably lived in the fifth century after Christ, and wrote an extant work, De Orthographia et Proprietate et Differentia Sernonis, which is printed in Putschius, Grammatica Latina Auctores Antiqui, p. 2266-2275.

[AGROLAS (Ἀγρόλας), of Sicily, an architect, who, with Hyperbius, surrounded the citadel of Athens with walls, except that part which was afterward built by Cimón.]

AGRON (Ἄγρων). 1. Son of Ninus, the first of the Lydian dynasty of the Heraclidae.—2. Son of Pleuratus, king of Illyria, died B.C. 231, and was succeeded by his wife Teuta, though he left a son, Pinus or Pinneus, by his first wife, Tritcuta, whom he had divorced.

ΑΓΡΩΤΕΡΑ (Ἀγροτέρα), the huntress, a surname of Diana (Artemis). Vid. AGRA. There was a festival celebrated to her honor at Athens under this name. Vid. Dict. of Antiq.

AGRYLE. Vid. AGRAULE.

[AGSIUS T., a faithful friend of Cicero, who adhered to him in his banishment, and was the sharer of all his labors and sufferings during that period.]

AGYIEUS (Ἀγυιεύς), a surname of Apollo, as the protector of the streets and public places.

AGYLLA (Ἀγύλλα), the ancient Greek name of the Etruscan town of CERE.

AGYRIUM (Ἀγύριον; Ἀγυρινάϊος, Agyrinensis; now S. Filipo d'Argiro), a town in Sicily on the Cyamosorus, northwest of Centuripæ and northeast of Enna, the birth-place of the historian Diodorus.

AGYRRHIUS (Ἀγύρριος), an Athenian, after being in prison many years for embezzlement of public money, obtained, about B.C. 395, the restoration of the Theoricæ, and also tripled the pay for attending the assembly; hence he became so popular, that he was appointed general in 389.

AHALA, SERVILIUS, the name of several distinguished Romans, who held various high offices in the state from B.C. 478 to 342. Of these the best known is C. Servilius Ahala, magister equitum in 439 to the dictator L. Cinna, when he slew Sp. Mælius in the forum, because he refused to appear before the dictator. Ahala was afterward brought to trial, and only escaped condemnation by a voluntary exile. Vid. SAVILLI.

AHARSA [now Bargiano?], a town in Etruria, northeast of Volsinii.

AHENOBARBUS, DOMITIUS, the name of a distinguished Roman family. They are said to have obtained the surname of Ahenobarbus, i. e., "Brazen-Beard" or "Red-Beard," because the Dioscuri announced to one of their ancestors the victory of the Romans over the Latins at Lake Regillus (B.C. 496), and, to confirm the truth of what they said, stroked his black hair and beard, which immediately became red.—1. Cn., plebeian ædile B.C. 196, prætor 194, and consul 192, when he fought against the Boii.—2. Cn., son of No. 1, consul suffectus in 162.—3. Cn., son of No. 2, consul 122, conquered the Allobroges in Gaul, in 121, at the confluence of the Sulga and Rhodanus. He was censor in 115 with Cæcilius Metellus. The Via Domitia in Gaul was made by him.—4. Cn., son of No. 3, tribune of the plebs 104, brought forward the law (Lex Domitia), by which the election of the priests was transferred from the collegia to the people. The people afterward elected him Pontifex Maximus out of gratitude. He was consul in 96, and censor in 92, with Licinius Crassus the orator. In his censorship he and his colleague shut up the schools of the Latin rhet-oricians; but otherwise their censorship was marked by their violent disputes.—5. L., brother of No. 4, prætor in Sicily, probably in 96, and consul in 94, belonged to the party of Sulla, and was murdered at Rome in 82, by order of the younger Marius.—6. Cn., son of No. 4, married Cornelia, daughter of L. Ciuua, consul in 87, and joined the Marian party. He was proscribed by Sulla in 82, and fled to Africa, where he was defeated and killed by Cn. Pompey in 81.—7. L., son of No. 4, married Porcia, the sister of M. Cato, and was a staunch and a courageous supporter of the aristocratic party. He was ædile in 61, prætor in 58, and consul in 54. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49 he threw himself into Corfinium, but was compelled by his own troops to surrender to Cæsar. He next went to Massilia, and, after the surrender of that town, repaired to Pompey in Greece; he fell in the battle of Pharsalia (48), where he commanded the left wing, and, according to Cicero's assertion in the second Philippic, by the hand of Antony.—8. Cn., son of No. 7, was taken with his father at Corfinium (49), was present at the battle of Pharsalia (48), and returned to Italy in 46, when he was pardoned by Cæsar. After Cæsar's death in 44, he commanded the republican fleet in the Ionian Sea. He afterward became reconciled to Antony, whom he accompanied in his campaign against the Parthians in 36. He was consul in 32, and deserted to Augustus shortly before the battle of Actium.—9. L., son of No. 8, married Antonia, the daughter of Antony by Octavia; was ædile in 22, and consul in 16; and after his consulship, commanded the Roman army in Germany and crossed the Elbe. He died A. D. 25.—10. Cn., son of No. 9, consul A. D. 32, married Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus, and was father of the Emperor Nero. Vid. AGRIPPINA.

AJAX (Ἄϊαξ). 1. Son of Telamon, king of Salamis, by Peribœa or Eribœa, and grandson of Æacus. Homer calls him Ajax the Telamonian, Ajax the Great, or simply Ajax, whereas the other Ajax, son of Oileus, is always distinguished from the former by some epithet. He sailed against Troy in twelve ships, and is represented in the Iliad as second only to Achilles in bravery, and as the hero most worthy, in the absence of Achilles, to contend with Hector. In the contest for the armor of Achilles, he was conquered by Ulysses, and this, says Homer, was the cause of his death. (Od. xi, 541, seq.) Homer gives no further particulars respecting his death; but later poets relate that his defeat by Ulysses threw him into an awful state of madness; that he rushed from his tent and slaughtered the sheep of the Greek army, fancying they were his enemies; and that at length he put an end to his own life. From his blood there sprang up a purple flower bearing the letters ai on its leaves, which were at once the initials of his name and expressive of a sight. Homer does not mention his mistress TECMESSA. Ajax was worshipped at Salamis, and was honored with a festival (Ἀλάγνεια). He was also worshipped at Athens, and one of the Attic tribes (Æantis) was called after him.—2. Son of Oileus, king of the Locrians, also called the lesser Ajax, sailed against Troy in forty ships.

He is described as small of stature, and wears a linen cuirass (λινοῦ ὀφρῆς), but is brave and intrepid, skilled in throwing the spear, and, next to Achilles, the most swift-footed among the Greeks. On his return from Troy his vessel was wrecked on the Whirling Rocks (Γυράι πέτραι); he himself got safe upon a rock through the assistance of Neptune (Poseidon); but as he boasted that he would escape in defiance of the immortals, Neptune (Poseidon) split the rock with his trident, and Ajax was swallowed up by the sea. This is the account of Homer, but his death is related somewhat differently by Virgil and other writers, who also tell us that the anger of Minerva (Athena) was excited against him, because on the night of the capture of Troy, he violated Cassandra in the temple of the goddess, where she had taken refuge. The Opuntian Locrians worshipped Ajax as their national hero.

AIDES ('Αΐδης). Vid. HADES.

AIDŌNEUS ('Αΐδωνεύς). 1. A lengthened form of Aides. Vid. HADES.—2. A mythical king of the Molossians in Epirus, husband of Proserpina (Persephone), and father of Core. When Theseus and Pirithous attempted to carry off Core, Aidoneus had Pirithous killed by Cerberus, and kept Theseus in captivity till he was released by Hercules.

AIUS LOCŪTIUS or LOQUENS, a Roman divinity. A short time before the Gauls took Rome (B.C. 390), a voice was heard at Rome in the Via Nova, during the silence of night, announcing that the Gauls were approaching. No attention was at the time paid to the warning, but the Romans afterwards erected on the spot where the voice had been heard, an altar with a sacred inclosure around it, to Aius Locutius, or the "Announcing Speaker."

ALABANDA (ἡ 'Αλάβανδα or τὰ 'Αλάβανδα: Alabandēis or 'Αλλιβανδός: now Arabissar), an inland town of Caria, near the Marsyas, to the south of the Mæander, was situated between two hills: it was a prosperous place, but one of the most corrupt and luxurious towns in Asia Minor. Under the Romans it was the seat of a conventus iuridicus.

[ALABASTRON ('Αλαβαστρῶν πόλις), a city in Upper or Middle Egypt, in the Arabian mountain chain, and famed for its artists, who, from the alabaster dug in Mons Alabastrinus, carved all kinds of vases and ornaments.]

ALABON ('Αλαβών), a river and town in Sicily, north of Syracuse.

ΑΛΑΓΘŌΝΙΑ ('Αλαγονία), a town of the Eleuthero-Laeconiens on the frontiers of Messenia.

ΑΛΑΛΚΟΜΕΝΕΑ ('Αλαλκομεναί: 'Αλαλκομεναῖος, Alalκομενεῖς). 1. (Now Sulinari), an ancient town of Bœotia, east of Coronæa, with a temple of Minerva (Athena), who is said to have been born in the town, and who was hence called Alalcomenēis ('Αλαλκομενηῖς, ἴδος). The name of the town was derived either from Alalcomœnia, a daughter of Ogyges, or from the Bœotian hero Alalcomœnes.—2. A town in Ithaca, or in the Island Asteria, between Ithaca and Cephalonia.

ΑΛΑΛΙΑ. Vid. ALERIA.

ALANI ('Αλανοί, 'Αλαννοί, i. e., mountainceers, from the Sarmatian word ala), a great Asiatic people, included under the general name of Seythians, but probably a branch of the Mas sagetæ. They were a nation of warlike horse men. They are first found about the eastern part of the Caucasus, in the country called Albania, which appears to be only another form of the same name. In the reign of Vespasian they made incursions into Media and Armenia; and at a later time they pressed into Europe, as far as the banks of the Lower Danube, where toward the end of the fifth century, they were routed by the Huns, who then compelled them to become their allies. In A.D. 406, some of the Alani took part with the Vandals in their irruption into Gaul and Spain, where they gradually disappear from history.

ALARICUS, in German Al-ric, i. e., "All-rich," elected king of the Visigoths in A.D. 398, had previously commanded the Gothic auxiliaries of Theodosius. He twice invaded Italy, first in A.D. 402–403, when he was defeated by Stilicho at the battle of Pollentia, and a second time in 408–410; in his second invasion he took and plundered Rome, 24th of August, 410. He died shortly afterward, at Consentia in Bruttium, while preparing to invade Sicily.

ALASTOR ('Αλάστωρ). 1. A surname of Jupiter (Zeus) as the avenger of evil, and also, in general, any deity who avenges wicked deeds.—[2. Son of Neleus and Chloris, was slain, together with his brothers, except Nestor, by Hercules, when that hero took Pylos.]—3. A Lycian, and companion of Sarpedon, slain by Ulysses.—[4. A Greek who rescued Teucer, the brother of Ajax, when wounded, and also Hypsenor when struck down by Deiphobus.]

ALBA SILVIUS, one of the mythical kings of Alba, son of Latinus, reigned thirty-nine years.

ALBA. 1. (Now Abla), a town of the Bastitani in Spain.—2. (Now Alvanna), a town of the Barduli in Spain.—3. AUGUSTA (now Aulps, near Durance), a town of the Elicœi in Gallia Narbonensis.—4. FUCENTIA or FUCENTIS (Albenses: now Alba or Albi), a town of the Marsi, and subsequently a Roman colony, was situated on a lofty rock near the Lake Fucinus. It was a strong fortress, and was used by the Romans as a state prison.—5. LONGA (Albani), the most ancient town in Latium, is said to have been built by Ascanius, and to have founded Rome. It was called Longa, from its stretching in a long line down the Alban Mount towards the Alban Lake, perhaps near the modern convent of Palazzolo. It was destroyed by Tullus Hostilius, and was never rebuilt: its inhabitants were removed to Rome. At a later time the surrounding country, which was highly cultivated and covered with vineyards, was studded with the splendid villas of the Roman aristocracy and emperors (Pompey's, Domitian's, &c.), each of which was called Albanum, and out of which a new town at length grew, also called Albanum (now Albano), on the Appian Road, ruins of which are extant.—6. POMPEIA (Albenses Pompeiani: now Alba), a town in Liguria, founded by Scipio Africanus I., and colonized by Pompeius Magnus, the birth-place of the Emperor Pertinax.

ALBĀNIA ('Αλβανία: 'Αλβανοί, Albani: now Schirvan and part of Daghestan, in the south-eastern part of Georgia), a country of Asia on the western side of the Caspian, extending from the Rivers Cyrus and Araxes on the south to Mount Ceraunius (the eastern part of the Caucasus) on the north, and bounded on the west by Iberia. It was a fertile plain, abounding in pasture and vineyards; but the inhabitants were fierce and warlike. They were a Scythian tribe, probably a branch of the Massagetae, and identical with the ALANI. The Romans first became acquainted with them at the time of the Mithradatic war, when they encountered Pompey with a large army.

ALBĀNUM. Vid. ALBA, No. 5.

ALBĀNUS LACUS (now Lago di Albano), a small lake about five miles in circumference, west of the Mons Albanus, between Bovillæ and Alba Longa, is the crater of an extinct volcano, and is many hundred feet deep. The emissarium which the Romans bored through the solid rock during the siege of Veii, in order to carry off the superfluous water of the lake, is extant at the present day.

ALBĀNUS MONS (now Monte Cavo or Albano), was, in its narrower signification, the mountain in Latium on whose declivity the town of Alba Longa was situated. It was the sacred mountain of the Latins, on which the religious festivals of the Latin League were celebrated (Feria Latina), and on its highest summit was the temple of Jupiter Latiaris, to which the Roman generals ascended in triumph, when this honor was denied them in Rome. The Mons Albanus in its wider signification included the Mons ALGIDUS and the mountains about Tusculum.

ALBI MONTES, a lofty range of mountains in the west of Crete, three hundred stadia in length, covered with snow the greater part of the year.

ALBICI ('Αλβιοκοί, 'Αλβειτε), a warlike Gallic people, inhabiting the mountains north of Massilia.

ALBINGAUNUM. Vid. ALBIUM INGAUNUM.

ALBINOVĀNUS, C. PEDO, a friend of Ovid, who addresses to him one of his epistles from Pontus (iv., 10). Three Latin elegies are attributed to Albinovanus, printed by Wernsdorf, in his Poète Latini Minores, vol. iii., iv., and by Meinecke, Quedlinburg, 1819.—[2. ALB. CELSUS, a Latin poet, friend of Horace.]

ALBINOVANUS, P. TULLIUS, belonged to the Marian party, was proscribed in B.C. 87, but was pardoned by Sulla in 81, in consequence of his putting to death many of the officers of Norbanus, whom he had invited to a banquet at Ariminum.

ALBINUS or ALBUS, POSTUMIUS, the name of a patrician family at Rome, many of the members of which held the highest offices of the state from the commencement of the republic to its downfall.—1. A., surnamed Regillensis, dictator B.C. 498, when he conquered the Latins in the great battle near Lake Regillus, and consul 496, in which year some of the annals placed the battle.—2. SP., consul 466, and a member of the first decemvirate 451.—3. SP., consul 344, and again 321. In the latter year he marched against the Samnites, but was defeated near Caudium, and obliged to surrender with his whole army, who were sent under the yoke. The Senate, on the advice of Albinus, refused to ratify the peace which he had made with the Samnites, and resolved that all persons who had sworn to the peace should be given up to the Samnites, but they refused to accept them.—4. L., consul 234, and again 229. In 216 he was prætor, and was killed in battle by the Boii.—5. SP., consul in 186, when the senatus consultum was passed, which is extant, for suppressing the worship of Bacchus in Rome. He died in 179.—6. A., consul 180, when he fought against the Ligurians, and censor 174. He was subsequently engaged in many public missions. Livy calls him Luscus, from which it would seem that he was blind of one eye.—7. L., prætor 180, in Further Spain, where he remained two years, and conquered the Vaccæi and Lusitani. He was consul in 173, and afterward served under Æmilius Paulus in Macedonia in 168.—8. A., consul 151, accompanied L. Mummius into Greece in 146. He was well acquainted with Greek literature, and wrote in that language a poem and a Roman history, which is censured by Polybius.—9. SP., consul 110, carried on war against Jugurtha in Numidia, but effected nothing. When Albinus departed from Africa, he left his brother Aulus in command, who was defeated by Jugurtha. Spurius was condemned by the Mamilia Lex, as guilty of treasonable practices with Jugurtha.—10. A., consul B.C. 99, with M. Antonius, is said by Cicero to have been a good speaker.

ALBINUS ('Αλβινος), a Platonic philosopher, lived at Smyrna in the second century after Christ, and wrote an Introduction to the Dialogues of Plato, which contains hardly any thing of importance.—Editions. In the first edition of Fabricius's Bibl. Græc., vol. ii., and prefixed to Etwall's edition of three dialogues of Plato, Oxon, 1771; and to Fischer's four dialogues of Plato, Lips., 1783.

ALBINUS, CLODIUS, whose full name was Decimus Clodius Cæionius Septimius Albinus, was born at Adrumetum in Africa. The Emperor Commodus made him governor of Gaul and afterward of Britain, where he was at the death of Commodus in A.D. 192. In order to secure the neutrality of Albinus, Septimius Severus made him Cæsar; but after Severus had defeated his rivals, he turned his arms against Albinus. A great battle was fought between them at Lugdunum (Lyons), in Gaul, the 19th of February, 197, in which Albinus was defeated and killed.

ALBIO or ALĒBION ('Αλβίων, 'Αλεβίων), son of Neptune (Poseidon) and brother of Dercynus or Bergion, with whom he attacked Hercules, when he passed through their country (Liguria) with the oxen of Geryon. They were slain by Hercules.

ALBIO, another name of BRITANNIA, the white land, from its white cliffs opposite the coast of Gaul: [more correctly, perhaps, the high land, from the Celtic root Alb or Alp, high, in reference to its lofty coasts, as it lies facing Gaul.]

ALBIS (now Elbe), one of the great rivers in Germany, the most easterly which the Romans became acquainted with, rises, according to Tacitus, in the country of the Hermundurii. The Romans reached the Elbe for the first time in B.C. 9, under Drusus, and crossed it for the first time in B.C. 3, under Domitius Aheubarbus. The last Roman general who saw the Elbe was Tiberius, in A.D. 5.

ALBIUM INGAUNUM or ALBINGAUNUM (now Al- benço), a town of the Ingauni on the coast of Liguria, and a municipium.

ALBIUM INTEMELIUM or ALBITEMELIUM (now Vintimiglia), a town of the Intemelii on the coast of Liguria, and a municipium.

[ALBUCELLA or ARBOCALA (Ἀρβουκάλη, Polyb.: now Villa Fusila), a city of Hispania Tarraconensis, southwest of Pallantia: according to Polybius, it was the largest city of the Vaecei, and was taken by Hannibal after a brave and long resistance.]

ALBŪCIUS or ALBŪTIUS, T., studied at Athens, and belonged to the Epicurean sect; he was well acquainted with Greek literature, but was satirized by Lueilius on account of his affecting on every occasion the Greek language and philosophy. He was prætor in Sardinia in B.C. 105; and in 103 was accused of repetundæ by C. Julius Cæsar, and condemned. He retired to Athens, and pursued the study of philosophy. [2. C. Albucius Silus. Vid. SILUS.]

ALBŪLA, an ancient name of the River TIBER.

ALBŪLÆ AQUÆ. Vid. ALBUNEA.

ALBŪNĀ or ALBŪNA, a prophetic nymph or Sibyl, to whom a grove was consecrated in the neighborhood of Tibur (now Tivoli), with a fountain and a temple. This fountain was the largest of the Albulæ aquæ, still called Æque Albule, sulphureous springs at Tibur, which flow into the Anio. Near it was the oracle of Faunus Fatidicus. The temple is still extant at Tivoli.

ALBURNUS MONS, [now Monte di Postiglione], a mountain in Lucania, covered with wood, behind Pæstum.—[2. PORTUS, a harbor near Pæstum, at the mouth of the Silârus (now Sele)].

[ALBUS PORTUS ("the White Haven," now Algesiras), a town on the coast of Bætica in Spain.]

[ALBUS VICUS (ἡ Λευκὴ Κώμη; now Iambo?), a harbor in Arabia, from which Gallus set out on his expedition into the interior.]

[ALBUTIUS. Vid. ALBUCIUS.]

ALCÆUS (Ἀλκαῖος), son of Perseus and Andromeda, and father of Amphitryon and Anaxo.—[2. Son of Hercules and a female slave of Jaradanus, from whom the Heraclid dynasty in Lydia, e. g., Candaules (Myrsilus), &c., were descended. Diodorus gives to this son of Hercules the name of Cleolaus.—3. Son of Androgeus, grandson of Minos.]

ALCÆUS. 1. Of Mytilene in Lesbos, the earliest of the Æolian lyric poets, began to flourish about B.C. 611. In the war between the Athenians and Mytilenæans for the possession of Sigæum (B.C. 606), he incurred the disgrace of leaving his arms on the field of battle; these arms were hung up as a trophy by the Athenians in the temple of Pallas at Sigæum. Alcæus took an active part in the struggles between the nobles and people of Mytilene: he belonged by birth to the nobles, and was driven into exile with his brother Antimenidas, when the popular party got the upper hand. He attempted, by force of arms, to regain his country; but all his attempts were frustrated by PITTACUS, who had been chosen by the people Æsymetes, or dictator, for the purpose of resisting him and the other exiles. Alcæus and his brother afterward travelled into various countries: the time of his death is uncertain. Some fragments of his poems which remain, and the excellent imitations of Horæe, enable us to understand something of their character. Those which have received the highest praise are his warlike odes, in which he tried to rouse the spirits of the nobles, the Alcæi minaces Camenæ of Horæe (Carm., iv. 9, 7). In others he described the hardships of exile, and his perils by sea (dura navis, dura fugæ, mala dura belli, Hor., Carm., ii. 13, 27). Alcæus is said to have invented the well-known Alæic metre.—Editions: By Matthiæ, Alcæi Mytilenæi reliquiæ, Lips., 1827; and by Bergk, in Poetæ Lyrici Græci, Lips., 1843.—2. A comic poet at Athens, flourished about B.C. 388, and exhibited plays of that mixed comedy, which formed the transition between the old and the middle. [Some fragments remain, which have been published by Meineke, Fragmenta Comicorum Græcorum, vol. i., p. 457-461, edit. minor.]—3. Of Messene, the author of twenty-two epigrams in the Greek Anthology, written between B.C. 219 and 196.

ALCĀMĒNES (Ἀλκαμένης). 1. Son of Teleclus, king of Sparta, from B.C. 779 to 742.—2. A statuary of Athens, flourished from B.C. 444 to 400, and was the most famous of the pupils of Phidias. His greatest work was a statue of Venus (Aphrodite).

ALCANDER (Ἀλκανδρος), a young Spartan, who threw out one of the eyes of Lyeurgus, when his fellow-citizens were disconcerted with the laws he proposed. Lyeurgus pardoned the outrage, and thus converted Alcander into one of his warmest friends.—[2. A Lycian, slain by Ulysses before Troy.—3. A companion of Æneas, slain by Turnus in Italy.]

[ALCANDRA (Ἀλκάνδρα), wife of Polybus, a wealthy Egyptian of Egyptian Thebes, by whom Helen was kindly received and entertained on her arrival in Egypt.]

[ALCĀNOR, a Trojan, whose sons Pandarus and Bitias accompanied Æneas to Italy.—2. A warrior in the army of the Rutulians, wounded by Æneas.]

ALCĀTHŌE or ALCĪTHŌE (Ἀλκαθὴ or Ἀλκιθὴ), daughter of Minyas, refused, with her sisters Leucippe and Arsippe, to join in the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus) when it was introduced into Bœotia, and were accordingly changed by the god into bats, and their work into vines. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. AGRIONA.

ALCĀTHŌUS (Ἀλκάθοος). 1. Son of Pelops and Hippodamia, brother of Atreus and Thyestes, obtained as his wife Euæehme, the daughter of Megareus, by slaying the Cithæronian lion, and succeeded his father-in-law as king of Megara. He restored the walls of Megara, in which work he was assisted by Apollo. The stone upon which the god used to place his lyre while he was at work, was believed, even in late times, to give forth a sound, when struck, similar to that of a lyre (Or., Met., viii., 15).—2. Son of Æsyetes and husband of Hippodamia, the daughter of Anehises and sister of Æneas, was one of the bravest of the Trojan leaders in the war of Troy, and was slain by Idomeneus.—[3. Son of Porthaon and Euryte, killed by Tydeus.—4. A companion of Æneas, slain by Cædæus.]

ALCESTIS or ALCESTE (Ἀλκῆστις or Ἀλκῆστη), daughter of Pelias and Anaxibia, wife of Admetus, died in place of her husband. Vid. AD-METUS.

ALCĒTAS (Ἀλκῆτας), two kings of Epirus. 1. Son of Tharypus, was expelled from his kingdom, and was restored by the elder Dionysius of Syracuse. He was the ally of the Athenians in B.C. 373.—2. Son of Arynbas, and grandson of Aleetas I., reigned B.C. 313–303, and was put to death by his subjects.

ALCĒTAS. 1. King of Macedonia, reigned twenty-nine years, and was father of Amyntas I.—2. Brother of Perdicas and son of Orontes, was one of Alexander's generals. On the death of Alexander, he espoused his brother's party; and upon the murder of the latter in Egypt in 321, he joined Eumenes. He killed himself at Termessus in Pisidia in 320, to avoid falling into the hands of Antigonus.

ALCĒIDĒS (Ἀλκιδῆδης).—[1. Of Athens, father of Clinias, and grandfather of the celebrated Alcibiades, deduced his descent from Eurysaces, the son of Telamonian Ajax. He joined Clisthenes in an attempt to procure the banishment of the Pisistratidæ; but was banished with him B.C. 512.]—2. Son of Clinias and Dinomache, was born at Athens about B.C. 450, and on the death of his father in 447, was brought up by his relation Pericles. He possessed a beautiful person, transcendent abilities, and great wealth, which received a large accession through his marriage with Hipparche, the daughter of Hipponicus. His youth was disgraced by his amours and debaucheries, and Socrates, who saw his vast capabilities, attempted to win him to the paths of virtue, but in vain. Their intimacy was strengthened by mutual services. At the battle of Potidæa (B.C. 432) his life was saved by Socrates, and at that of Delium (424) he saved the life of Socrates. He did not take much part in public affairs till after the death of Cleon (422), but he then became one of the leading politicians, and the head of the war party in opposition to Nicias. Enraged at the affront put upon him by the Lacedæmonians, who had not chosen to employ his intervention in the negotiations which ended in the peace of 421, and had preferred Nicias to him, he induced the Athenians to form an alliance with Argos, Mantinæ, and Elis, and to attack the allies of Sparta. In 415 he was foremost amongst the advocates of the Sicilian expedition, which he believed would be a step toward the conquest of Italy, Carthage, and Peloponnesus. While the preparations for the expedition were going on, there occurred the mysterious mutilation of the Hermes-busts, which the popular fears connected in some unaccountable manner with an attempt to overthrow the Athenian constitution. Alcibiades was charged with being the ringleader in this attempt. He had been already appointed along with Nicias and Lamachus as commander of the expedition to Sicily, and he now demanded an investigation before he set sail. This, however, his enemies would not grant, as they hoped to increase the popular odium against him in his absence. He was, therefore, obliged to depart for Sicily; but he had not been there long, before he was recalled to stand his trial. On his return homeward, he managed to escape at Thurii, and thence proceeded to Sparta, where he acted as the avowed enemy of his country. At Athens sentence of death was passed upon him, and his property was confiscated. At Sparta he rendered himself popular by the facility with which he adopted the Spartan manners; but the machinations of his enemy, Agis II., induced him to abandon the Spartans and take refuge with Tissaphernes (412), whose favor he soon gained. Through his influence Tissaphernes deserted the Spartans and professed his willingness to assist the Athenians, who accordingly recalled Alcibiades from banishment in 411. He did not immediately return to Athens, but remained abroad for the next four years, during which the Athenians under his command gained the victories of Cynossema, Abydos, and Cyzius, and got possession of Chalcidon and Byzantium. In 407 he returned to Athens, where he was received with great enthusiasm, and was appointed commander-in-chief of all the land and sea forces. But the defeat at Notium, occasioned during his absence by the imprudence of his lieutenant, Antiochus, furnished his enemies with a handle against him, and he was superseded in his command (B.C. 406). He now went into voluntary exile to his fortified domain at Bisantia in the Thracian Chersonesus, where he made war on the neighboring Thracians. Before the fatal battle of Ægos-Potami (405), he gave an ineffectual warning to the Athenian generals. After the fall of Athens (404), he was condemned to banishment, and took refuge with Pharnabazus; he was about to proceed to the court of Artaxerxes, when one night his house was surrounded by a band of armed men, and set on fire. He rushed out sword in hand, but fell, pierced with arrows (404). The assassins were probably either employed by the Spartans, or by the brothers of a lady whom Alcibiades had seduced. He left a son by his wife Hipparche, named Alcibiades, who never distinguished himself. It was for him that Isocrates wrote the speech Περὶ τοῦ Ζεύου.

ALCIDĀMAS (Ἀλκιδῆμας), a Greek rhetorician of Elæa in Æolis, in Asia Minor, was a pupil of Gorgias, and resided at Athens between B.C. 432 and 411. His works were characterized by pompous diction, and the extravagant use of poetical epithets and phrases. There are two declamations extant which bear his name, entitled Ulysses, and On the Sophists, but they were probably not written by him.—Editions: In Reiske's Oratores Græci, vol. viii., and in Bekker's Oratores Attici, vol. vii.

ALCIDĀS (Ἀλκιδῆς Dor = Ἀλκιδῆς), a Spartan commander of the fleet in the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 428–427. In the former year he was sent to Mytilene, and in the latter to Coreyra.

ALCIDĒS (Ἀλκιδῆς), a name of Amphitryon, the son of Alæus, and more especially of Hercules, the grandson of Alæus.

ALCIMĒDE (Ἀλκιμῆδη), daughter of Phylæus and Clymene, wife of Æson, and mother of Jason.

[ALCIMEDON (Ἀλκιμῆδων), an Æreidian hero, father of Phillo. From him the Æreidian plain Alcimedon derived its name.—2. Son of Laërtes, one of the commanders of the Myrmidons under Achilles.—3. One of the Tyrrhenian sailors, who wished to carry off from Naxos the god

Bacchus, who had taken the form of an infant, and for this was metamorphosed into a dolphin.] [ALCIMEDON, an embosser or chaser, spoken of by Virgil (Eclog., iii., 37, 44), who mentions some goblets of his workmanship.]

ALCIMUS (ΑΥΙΤΟΣ) ALETHIUS, the writer of seven short poems, a rhetorician in Aquitania, in Gaul, is spoken of in terms of praise by Sidonius Apollinarius and Ausonius.—Editions: In Meier's Anthologia Latina, p. 254-260, and in Wernsdorff's Poëta Latini Minores, vol. vi.

ALCINOÛS (Ἀλκίνοος). 1. Son of Nausithous, and grandson of Neptune (Poseidon), is celebrated in the story of the Argonauts, and still more in the Odyssey. Homer represents him as the happy ruler of the Phœnicians in the Island of Scheria, who has by Arete five sons and one daughter, Nausicaa. The way in which he received Ulysses, and the stories which the latter related to the king about his wanderings, occupy a considerable portion of the Odyssey (books vi. to xiii.).—2. A Platonic philosopher, who probably lived under the Cæsars, wrote a work entitled Epitome of the Doctrines of Plato.—Editions: By Fell, Oxon, 1667, and by J. F. Fischer, Lips., 1782, 8vo.

ALCIPHRON (Ἀλκίφρων), the most distinguished of the Greek epistolary writers, was perhaps a contemporary of Luceian about A.D. 170. The letters (one hundred and thirteen in number, in three books) are written by fictitious personages, and the language is distinguished by its purity and elegance. The new Attic comedy was the principal source from which the author derived his information respecting the characters and manners which he describes, and for this reason they contain much valuable information about the private life of the Athenians of that time.—Editions: By Bergler, Lips., 1715, and by Wagner, Lips., 1798.

[ALCIPPE (Ἀλκίππη), a daughter of Mars and Agraulus. Vid. HALIETHOTHUS.]

ALCITHOË. Vid. ALCATHOË.

ALCMÆON (Ἀλκμαίων). 1. Son of Amphiaræus and Eriphyle, and brother of Amphiloehus. His mother was induced by the necklace of Harmonia, which she received from Polyneices, to persuade her husband Amphiaræus to take part in the expedition against Thebes; and as he knew he should perish there, he enjoined his sons to kill their mother as soon as they should be grown up. Alcmæon took part in the expedition of the Epigoni against Thebes, and on his return home after the capture of the city, he slew his mother, according to the injunction of his father. For this deed he became mad, and was haunted by the Erinnyes. He went to Phegeus in Psophis, and being purified by the latter, he married his daughter Arsinœ or Alphasibœa, to whom he gave the necklace and peplos of Harmonia. But as the land of this country ceased to bear, on account of its harboring a matricide, he left Psophis and repaired to the country at the mouth of the River Achelous. The god Achelous gave him his daughter Callirrhœ in marriage; and as the latter wished to possess the necklace and peplos of Harmonia, Alcmæon went to Psophis and obtained them from Phegeus, under the pretext of dedicating them at Delphi; but when Phegeus heard that the treasures were fetched for Callirrhœ, he caused his sons to murder Alcmæon. Alcmæon was worshipped as a hero at Thebes, and at Psophis his tomb was shown, surrounded with cypresses.—[2. Son of Sillus, and great grandson of Nestor, founder of the celebrated family of the ΑΛΚΜΑΕΟΝΙΔÆ (q. v.) in Athens.]—3. Son of Megæclæ, was greatly enriched by Crœsus.—4. Of Crotona in Italy, said to have been a pupil of Pythagoras, though this is very doubtful. He is said to have been the first person who dissected animals, and he made some important discoveries in anatomy and natural philosophy. He wrote several medical and philosophical works, which are lost.

ALCMÆONIDÆ (Ἀλκμαιωνίδαι), a noble family at Athens, members of which fill a space in Grecian history from B.C. 750 to 400. They were a branch of the family of the Nelidæ, who were driven out of Pylus in Messenia by the Dorians, and settled at Athens. In consequence of the way in which Megæclæ, one of the family, treated the insurgents under Cylon (B.C. 612), they brought upon themselves the guilt of sacrilege, and were in consequence banished from Athens, about 595. About 560 they returned from exile, but were again expelled by Pisistratus. In 548 they contracted with the Amphityonic council to rebuild the temple of Delphi and obtained great popularity throughout Greece by executing the work in a style of magnificence which much exceeded their engagement. On the expulsion of Hippias in 510, they were again restored to Athens. They now joined the popular party, and Clisthenes, who was at that time the head of the family, gave a new constitution to Athens. Vid. CLISTHENES.

ALCMAN (Ἀλκμάν, [Doric form of the name, which was properly] Ἀλκμαιών), the chief lyric poet of Sparta, by birth a Lydian of Sardis, was brought to Laconia as a slave, when very young, and was emancipated by his master, who discovered his genius. He probably flourished about B.C. 631, and most of his poems were composed after the conclusion of the second Messenian war. He is said to have died, like Sulla, of the morbus pedicularis. Alcmæon's poems were comprised in six books: many of them were erotic, and he is said by some ancient writers to have been the inventor of erotic poetry. His metres were very various. The Cretic hexameter was named Alcmænic from his being its inventor. His dialect was the Spartan Doric, with an intermixture of the Æolic. The Alexandrian grammarians placed Alcmæon at the head of their canon of the nine lyric poets. The fragments of his poems are edited by Welcker, Giesesen, 1815; and by Bergk, in Poëta Lyrici Græci, 1843.

ALCMÈNE (Ἀλκμήνη), daughter of Electryon, king of Mycenæ, by Anaxo or Lysidice. The brothers of Alcmene were slain by the sons of Pterelaus; and their father set out to avenge their death, leaving to Amphitryon his kingdom and his daughter Alcmene, whom Amphitryon was to marry. But Amphitryon having unintentionally killed Electryon before the marriage, Sthenelus expelled both Amphitryon and Alcmene, who went to Thebes. But here, instead of marrying Amphitryon, Alcmene declared that she would only marry the man who should avenge the death of her brothers. Amphitryon undertook the task, and invited Creon of Thebes to assist him. During his absence, Jupiter (Zeus), in the disguise of Amphitryon, visited Alemene, and, having related in what way he had avenged the death of her brothers, [finally persuaded her to a union]. Amphitryon himself returned the next day; Alemene became the mother of Hercules by Jupiter (Zeus), and of Iphicles by Amphitryon. Vid. HERCULES. After the death of Amphitryon, Alemene married Rhadamanthys, at Ocalia in Bœotia. When Hercules was raised to the rank of a god, Alemene, fearing Eurystheus, fled with the sons of Hercules to Athens.

[ALCON ('Αλκων), son of Hippocoon, a Calydonian hunter, slain by Hercules.—2. Son of the Athenian King Erechtheus, so skillful an archer, that he shot a serpent which had entwined itself around his son, without wounding his child. In Virgil (Ecl., 5, 11) an Alcon is mentioned, whom Servius calls a Cretan, and a companion of Hercules, and relates of him nearly the story just given.—3. A statuary, who made a statue of Hercules at Thebes, of iron, to symbolize thereby the hero's powers of endurance.]

ALCŶONE or HALCŶONE ('Αλκόννη). 1. A Pleiad, daughter of Atlas and Pleione, and beloved by Neptune (Poseidon).—2. Daughter of Æolus and Enarete or Ægiale, and wife of Ceyx. They lived so happily that they were presumptuous enough to call each other Jupiter (Zeus) and Juno (Hera), for which Jupiter (Zeus) metamorphosed them into birds, alcyon and ceyx. Others relate that Ceyx perished in a shipwreck, that Alcyone for grief threw herself into the sea, and that the gods, out of compassion, changed the two into birds. It was fabled that during the seven days before, and as many after, the shortest day of the year, while the bird alcyon was breeding, there always prevailed calms at sea.—[2. Daughter of Idas and Marpessa, wife of Meleager, called by her parents Alcyone, from the plaintive cries uttered by her mother Marpessa when carried off by Apollo.]

ALCŶONEUS ('Αλκονοεύς), a giant, killed by Hercules at the Isthmus of Corinth.

[ALCYONIA PALUS ('Αλκυονία λίμνη), a lake in Argolis, of small size, but unfathomable depth, by which Bacchus descended to the lower world, when he sought to bring back Semele. It is regarded by Leake as a part of Lerna.]

ALCŶONIUM MARE (ἡ 'Αλκυονίδε θάλασσα), the eastern part of the Corinthian Gulf.

ALĒA ('Αλέα), a surname of Minerva (Athena), under which she was worshipped at Alea, Mantinea, and Tegea. Her temple at the latter place was one of the most celebrated in Greece. It is said to have been built by Aleus, son of Aphidas, king of Tegea, from whom the goddess is supposed to have derived this surname.

ALĒA ('Αλέα : 'Αλεύς), a town in Arcadia, east of the Stymphalian Lake, with a celebrated temple of Minerva (Athena), the ruins of which are near Piali.

ALECTO. Vid. FURIE.

[ALECTOR ('Αλέκτωρ), son of Pelops, and father of Iphiloche, who married Megapenthes, son of Menelaus.—2. Son of Anaxagoras, father of Iphis, King of Argos.]

[ALECTRYON ('Αλεκτρών), a youth stationed by Mars, during his interview with Venus, at the door to guard against surprise. Having fallen asleep, he was changed by Mars into a cock (ἀλεκτρών) for his neglect of duty.—2. The father of the Argonaut Leitus, called by Apollodorus Alector.]

ALĒIUS CAMPUS or ALĒI CAMPI (τὸ 'Αλῆιον πεδῖον), an extensive and fruitful plain of Cilicia, not far from Mallus, between the Rivers Pyramus and Sarus (in Homer's Lycia, Il., 6, 201). It derives its name from the circumstance that Bellerophon in his old age fell into melancholy and madness, and wandered about here (from ἄλη, wandering). Another legend makes Bellerophon to have been thrown from Pegasus when attempting to mount to heaven, and to have wandered about here lame and blind.]

ALEMANNI, or ALAMANNI, or ALAMANI (from the German alle Männer, all men), a confederacy of German tribes, chiefly of Suevic extraction, between the Danube, the Rhine, and the Main, though we subsequently find them extending their territories as far as the Alps and the Jura. The different tribes of the confederacy were governed by their own kings, but in time of war they obeyed a common leader. They were brave and warlike, and proved formidable enemies to the Romans. They first came into contact with the Romans in the reign of Caracalla, who assumed the surname of Alemannicus on account of a pretended victory over them (A.D. 214). They were attacked by Alexander Severus (234), and by Maximin (237). They invaded Italy in 270, but were driven back by Aurelian, and were again defeated by Probus in 282. After this time they continually invaded the Roman dominions in Germany, and, though defeated by Constantius I., Julian (357), Valentinian, and Gratian, they gradually became more and more powerful, and in the fifth century were in possession of Alsace and of German Switzerland.

ALĒŪIA ('Αλεῦρία : 'Αλαλία in Herod.), one of the chief cities of Corsica, on the east of the island, on the southern bank of the River Rhotanus (now Tavignano), near its mouth. It was founded by the Phœcians B.C. 564, was plundered by L. Scipio in the first Punic war, and was made a Roman colony by Sulla.

ALĒSA. Vid. HALESA.

ALĒSĪA ('Αλεσία), an ancient town of the Manubii in Gallia Lugdunensis, said to have been founded by Hercules, and situated on a high hill (now Auxois, [at the foot of which is a village called Alise]), which was washed by the two rivers Lutosia (now Oze) and Osera (now Ozerain). It was taken and destroyed by Cæsar, in B.C. 52, after a memorable siege, but was afterward rebuilt.

ALĒSĪĒ ('Αλεσίαι), a town in Laconia, west of Sparta, on the road to Phœræ.

ALĒSĪUM ('Αλεσίον), a town in Elis, not far from Olympia, afterward called Alesiacum.

ALĒSĪUS MONS (τὸ 'Αλῆσιον ὄρος), a mountain in Arcadia with a temple of Neptune (Poseidon) Hippia and a grove of Ceres (Demeter).

ALĒTES ('Αλήτης), son of Hippotes, and a descendant of Hercules, is said to have taken possession of Corinth, and to have expelled the Sisyphids, thirty years after the first invasion of Peloponnesus by the Heracleids. His family, called the Aletidae, maintained themselves at Corinth down to the time of Bacchis.—[2. A companion of Æneas, who was held in veneration on account of his age and wisdom.]

ALETIUM (Aletinus), a town of Calabria.

ALETRIUM or ALATRIUM (Aletinas, ātis: now Alatri), an ancient town of the Hernici, subsequently a municipium and a Roman colony, west of Sora and east of Anagnina.

ALEUADÆ. Vid. ALEUAS.

ALEUAS, (Ἀλεύας) a descendant of Hercules, was the ruler of Larissa in Thessaly, and the reputed founder of the celebrated family of the Aleuadae. Before the time of Pisistratus (B.C. 560), the family of the Aleuadae appears to have become divided into two branches, the Aleuadae and the Scopadae. The Scopadae inhabited Crannon and perhaps Pharsalus also, while the main branch, the Aleuadae, remained at Larissa. The influence of the families, however, was not confined to these towns, but extended more or less over the greater part of Thessaly. They formed, in reality, a powerful aristocratic party in opposition to the great body of the Thessalians. In the invasion of Greece by Xerxes (480), the Aleuadae espoused the cause of the Persians, and the family continued to be the predominant one in Thessaly for a long time afterward. But after the end of the Peloponnesian war (404), another Thessalian family, the dynasts of Phæra, gradually rose to power and influence, and gave a great shock to the power of the Aleuadae. The most formidable of these princes was Jason of Phæra, who succeeded, after various struggles, in raising himself to the dignity of Tagus, or supreme ruler of Thessaly. Vid. JASON.

ALEUS. Vid. ALEA.

ALEX or HALEX (now Alice), a small river in Southern Italy, was the boundary between the territory of Rhegium and of the Locri Epizephyrii.

ALEXAMENUS (Ἀλεξαμένηος), an Ætolian leader, sent by his countrymen with one thousand men to Sparta, who slew Nabis the Spartan tyrant.

ALEXANDER (Ἀλέξανδρος), the usual name of Paris in the Iliad.

ALEXANDER SEVERUS. Vid. SEVERUS.

ALEXANDER. 1. Minor Historical Persons.

1. Son of ÆROFUS, a native of the Macedonian district called Lyncestis, whence he is usually called Alexander Lyncestis. He was an accomplice in the murder of Phillip, B.C. 336, but was pardoned by Alexander the Great. He accompanied Alexander to Asia; but in 334 he was detected in carrying on a treasonable correspondence with Darius, was kept in confinement, and put to death in 330. 2. Son of ANTONIUS the triumvir, and Cleopatra, born, with his twin-sister Cleopatra, B.C. 40. After the battle of Actium they were taken to Rome by Augustus, and were generously educated by Octavia, the wife of Antonius, with her own children.—3. Eldest son of ARISTOBULUS II., king of Judæa, rose in arms in B.C. 57, against Hyrcanus, who was supported by the Romans. Alexander was defeated by the Romans in 56 and 55, and was put to death by Pompey at Antioch in 49.—4. Third son of CASSANDER, king of Macedonia, by Thessalonica, sister of Alexander the Great. In his quarrel with his elder brother Antipater for the government (vid. ANTIPATER), he called in the aid of Pyrrhus of Epirus and Demetrius Poliorettes, by the latter of whom he was murdered B.C. 294.—5. JANNÆUS, the son of Joannes Hyrcanus, and brother of Aristobulus I., king of the Jews B.C. 104–77. At the commencement of his reign he was engaged in war with Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Cyprus; and subsequently he had to carry on for six years a dangerous struggle with his own subjects, to whom he had rendered himself obnoxious by his cruelties and by opposing the Pharisees. He signalized his victory by the most frightful butchery of his subjects.—6. Surnamed ISUS, the chief commander of the Ætolians, took an active part in opposing Philip of Macedonia (B.C. 198, 197), and in the various negotiations with the Romans.—7. Tyrant of PHERÆ, was a relation of Jason, and succeeded either Polydorus or Polyphron, as Tagus of Thessaly, about B.C. 369. In consequence of his tyrannical government, the Thessalians applied for aid first to Alexander II., king of Macedonia, and next to Thebes. The Thebans sent Pelopidas into Thessaly to succeed the malecontents; but having ventured incautiously within the power of the tyrant, he was seized by Alexander, and thrown into prison B.C. 368. The Thebans sent a large army into Thessaly to rescue Pelopidas, but they were defeated in the first campaign, and did not obtain their object till the next year, 367. In 364 Pelopidas again entered Thessaly with a small force, but was slain in battle by Alexander. The Thebans now sent a large army against the tyrant, and compelled him to become a dependent ally of Thebes. We afterwards hear of Alexander making piratical descents on many of the Athenian dependencies, and even on Attica itself. He was murdered in 367, by his wife Thebe, with the assistance of her three brothers.—8. Son of POLYSPERCHON, the Macedonian, was chiefly employed by his father in the command of the armies which he sent against Cassander. Thus he was sent against Athens in B.C. 318, and was engaged in military operations during the next year in various parts of Greece. But in 315 he became reconciled to Cassander, and we find him in 314 commanding on behalf of the latter. He was murdered at Sicyn in 314.—9. PTOLEMÆUS. Vid. PTOLEMÆUS.—10. TRIBERIUS, born at Alexandria, of Jewish parents, and nephew of the writer Philo. He deserted the faith of his ancestors, and was rewarded for his apostacy by various public appointments. In the reign of Claudius he succeeded Fadus as procurator of Judæa (A.D. 46), and was appointed by Nero procurator of Egypt. He was the first Roman governor who declared in favor of Vespasian; and he accompanied Titus in the war against Judæa, and was present at the taking of Jerusalem.

II. Kings of Epirus.

1. Son of Neoptolemus, and brother of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great. Philip made him king of Epirus in place of his cousin Æacides, and gave him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage (B.C. 336). In 332, Alexander, at the request of the Tarentines, crossed over into Italy, to aid them against the Lucanians and Brutii. After meeting with considerable success, he was defeated and slain in battle in 326, near Pandosia, on the banks of the Acheron in Southern Italy.—2. Son of Phyrus and Lanassa, daughter of the Sicilian tyrant Agathocles, succeeded his father in B.C. 272, and drove Antigonus Gonatus out of Macedonia. He was shortly afterward deprived of both Macedonia and Epirus by Demetrius, the son of Antigonus; but he recovered Epirus by the aid of the Acarnanians.

III. Kings of Macedonia.

1. Son of Amyntas I, distinguished himself in the lifetime of his father by killing the Persian ambassadors who had come to demand the submission of Amyntas, because they attempted to offer indignities to the ladies of the court, about B.C. 507. He succeeded his father shortly afterward, was obliged to submit to the Persians, and accompanied Xerxes in his invasion of Greece (B.C. 480). He gained the confidence of Mardonius, who sent him to Athens to propose peace to the Athenians, which was rejected. He was secretly inclined to the cause of the Greeks, and informed them the night before the battle of Plataeae of the intention of Mardonius to fight on the following day. He died about B.C. 455, and was succeeded by Perdiccas II.—2. Son of Amyntas II, whom he succeeded, reigned B.C. 369–367. A usurper of the name of Ptolomey Alorites having risen against him, Pelopidas, who was called in to mediate between them, left Alexander in possession of the kingdom, but took with him to Thebes several hostages; among whom was Philip, the youngest brother of Alexander, afterward King of Macedonia. Alexander was shortly afterward murdered by Ptolomey Alorites.—3. Surnamed the GREAT, son of Philip II and Olympias, was born at Pella, B.C. 356. His early education was committed to Leonidas and Lysimachus; and he was also placed under the care of Aristotle, who acquired an influence over his mind and character which was manifest to the latest period of his life. At the age of sixteen, Alexander was intrusted with the government of Macedonia by his father, while he was obliged to leave his kingdom to march against Byzantium. He first distinguished himself, however, at the battle of Chæronæa (338), where the victory was mainly owing to his impetuosity and courage. On the murder of Philip (336), Alexander ascended the throne, at the age of twenty, and found himself surrounded by enemies on every side. He first put down rebellion in his own kingdom, and then rapidly marched into Greece. His unexpected activity overawed all opposition; Thebes, which had been most active against him, submitted when he appeared at its gates; and the assembled Greeks at the Isthmus of Corinth, with the sole exception of the Laedemonians, elected him to the command against Persia, which had previously been bestowed upon his father. He now directed his arms against the barbarians of the north, marched (early in 335) across Mount Hæmus, defeated the Triballi, and advanced as far as the Danube, which he crossed; and, on his return, subdued the Illyrians and Taulantii. A report of his death having reached Greece, the Thebans once more took up arms. But a terrible punishment awaited them. He advanced into Bœotia by rapid marches, took Thebes by assault, destroyed all the buildings, with the exception of the house of Pindar, killed most of the inhabitants, and sold the rest as slaves. Alexander now prepared for his great expedition against Persia. In the spring of 334, he crossed the Hellespont with about thirty-five thousand men. Of these thirty thousand were foot and five thousand horse, and of the former only twelve thousand were Macedonians. Alexander's first engagement with the Persians was on the River Granicus in Mysia (May 334), where they were entirely defeated by him. This battle was followed by the capture or submission of the chief towns on the west coast of Asia Minor. Halicarnassus was not taken till late in the autumn, after a vigorous defence by Memnon, the ablest general of Darius, and whose death in the following year (333) relieved Alexander from a formidable opponent. He now marched along the coast of Lycia and Pamphylia, and then north into Phrygia and Gordium, where he cut or untied the celebrated Gordian knot, which, it was said, was to be loosened only by the conqueror of Asia. In 333, he marched from Gordium through the centre of Asia Minor into Cilicia, where he nearly lost his life at Tarsus by a fever, brought on by his great exertions or through throwing himself, when heated, into the cold waters of the Cydnus. Darius, meantime, had collected an army of five hundred thousand or six hundred thousand men, with thirty thousand Greek mercenaries, whom Alexander defeated in the narrow plain of Issus. Darius escaped across the Euphrates by the ford of Thapsacus; but his mother, wife, and children fell into the hands of Alexander, who treated them with the utmost delicacy and respect. Alexander now directed his arms against the cities of Phœnicia, most of which submitted; but Tyre was not taken till the middle of 332, after an obstinate defence of seven months. Next followed the siege of Gaza, which again delayed Alexander two months. Afterward, according to Josephus, he marched to Jerusalem, intending to punish the people for refusing to assist him, but he was diverted from his purpose by the appearance of the high-priest, and pardoned the people. This story is not mentioned by Arrian, and rests on questionable evidence. Alexander next marched into Egypt, which willingly submitted to him, for the Egyptians had ever hated the Persians. At the beginning of 331, Alexander founded at the mouth of the western branch of the Nile the city of ALEXANDREA, and about the same time visited the temple of Jupiter Ammon, in the desert of Libya, and was saluted by the priests as the son of Jupiter Ammon. In the spring of the same year (331), Alexander set out to meet Darius, who had collected another army. He marched through Phœnicia and Syria to the Euphrates, which he crossed at the ford of Thapsacus; thence he proceeded through Mesopotamia, crossed the Tigris, and at length met with the immense hosts of Darius, said to have amounted to more than a million of men, in the plains of Gauga mela. The battle was fought in the month of October, 331, and ended in the complete defeat of the Persians. Alexander pursued the fugitives to Arbela (now Erbil), which place has given its name to the battle, though distant about fifty miles from the spot where it was fought. Darius, who had left the field of battle early in the day, fled to Ecbatana (now Hanadan), in Media. Alexander was now the conqueror of Asia, and began to adopt Persian habits and customs, by which he conciliated the affections of his new subjects. From Arbela he marched to Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, all of which surrendered to him. He is said to have set fire to the palace of Persepolis, and, according to some accounts, in the revelry of a banquet, at the instigation of Thais, an Athenian courtesan. At the beginning of 330 Alexander marched from Persepolis into Media, in pursuit of Darius, whom he followed through Rhagæ and the passes of the Elburz Mountains, called by the ancients the Caspian Gates, into the deserts of Parthia, where the unfortunate king was murdered by Bessus, satrap of Bactria, and his associates. Alexander sent his body to Persepolis, to be buried in the tombs of the Persian kings. Bessus escaped to Bactria, and assumed the title of King of Persia. Alexander was engaged during the remainder of the year in subduing the northern provinces of Asia between the Caspian and the Indus, namely, Hyrcania, Parthia, Aria, the Drangæ, and Sarangæ. It was during this campaign that PHILOTAS, his father PARMENION, and other Macedonians were executed on a charge of treason. In 329 Alexander crossed the mountains of the Paropamisus (now the Hindoo Koosh), and marched into Bactria against Bessus, whom he pursued across the Oxus into Sogdiana. In this country Bessus was betrayed to him, and was put to death. From the Oxus he advanced as far as the Jaxartes (now the Sir), which he crossed, and defeated several Scythian tribes north of that river. After founding a city, Alexandria, on the Jaxartes, he retraced his steps, and returned to Zariaspa or Bactra, where he spent the winter of 329. It was here that he killed his friend Clitus in a drunken revel. In 328, Alexander again crossed the Oxus to complete the subjugation of Sogdiana, but was not able to effect it in the year, and accordingly went into winter-quarters at Nautaca, a place in the middle of the province. At the beginning of 327, he took a mountain fortress, in which Oxyartes, a Bactrian prince, had deposited his wife and daughters. The beauty of Roxana, one of the latter, captivated the conqueror, and he accordingly made her his wife. This marriage with one of his Eastern subjects was in accordance with the whole of his policy. Having completed the conquest of Sogdiana, he marched south into Bactria, and made preparations for the invasion of India. While in Bactria another conspiracy was discovered for the murder of the king. The plot was formed by Hermolaus with a number of the royal pages, and Callisthenes, a pupil of Aristotle, was involved in it. All the conspirators were put to death. Alexander did not leave Bactria till late in the spring of 327, and crossed the Indus, probably near the modern Attock. He met with no resistance till he reached the Hydaspes, where he was opposed by Porus, an Indian king, whom he defeated after a gallant resistance, and took prisoner. Alexander restored to him his kingdom, and treated him with distinguished honor. He founded two towns, one on each bank of the Hydaspes: one called Bucephala, in honor of his horse Bucephalus, who died here, after carrying him through so many victories; and the other Nicea, to commemorate his victory. From thence he marched across the Acesines (now the Chinab) and the Hydræotes (now the Ravee), and penetrated as far as the Hyphasis (now Garra). This was the furthest point which he reached, for the Macedonians, worn out by long service, and tired of the war, refused to advance further; and Alexander, notwithstanding his entreaties and prayers, was obliged to lead them back. He returned to the Hydaspes, where he had previously given orders for the building of a fleet, and then sailed down the river with about eight thousand men, while the remainder marched along the banks in two divisions. This was late in the autumn of 327. The people on each side of the river submitted without resistance, except the Malli, in the conquest of one of whose places Alexander was severely wounded. At the confluence of the Acesines and the Indus, Alexander founded a city, and left Philip as satrap, with a considerable body of Greeks. Here he built some fresh ships, and continued his voyage down the Indus, founded a city at Pattala, the apex of the delta of the Indus, and sailed into the Indian Ocean, which he reached about the middle of 326. Nearchus was sent with the fleet to sail along the coast to the Persian Gulf (vid. NEARCHUS); and Alexander marched with the rest of his forces through Gedrosia, in which country his army suffered greatly from want of water and provisions. He reached Susa at the beginning of 325. Here he allowed himself and his troops some rest from their labors; and anxious to form his European and Asiatic subjects into one people, he assigned to about eighty of his generals Asiatic wives, and gave with them rich dowries. He himself took a second wife, Barsine, the eldest daughter of Darius, and, according to some accounts, a third, Parysatis, the daughter of Ochus. About ten thousand Macedonians followed the example of their king and generals, and married Asiatic women. Alexander also enrolled large numbers of Asiatics among his troops, and taught them the Macedonian tactics. He, moreover, directed his attention to the increase of commerce, and for this purpose had the Euphrates and Tigris made navigable, by removing the artificial obstructions which had been made in the river for the purpose of irrigation. The Macedonians, who were discontented with several of the new arrangements of the king, rose in mutiny against him, which he quelled with some difficulty. Toward the close of the same year (325), he went to Ecbatana, where he lost his great favorite, HEPHESTION. From Ecbatana he marched to Babylon, subduing in his way the Cossæi, a mountain tribe; and before he reached Babylon he was met by ambassadors from almost every part of the known world. Alexander entered Babylon in the spring of 324, about a year before his death, notwithstanding the warnings of the Chaldeans, who predicted evil to him if he entered the city at that time. He intended to make Babylon the capital of his empire, as the best point of communication between his eastern and western dominions. His schemes were numerous and gigantic. His first object was the conquest of Arabia, which was to be followed, it was said, by the subjugation of Italy, Carthage, and the West. But his views were not confined merely to conquest. He ordered a fleet to be built on the Caspian, in order to explore that sea. He also intended to improve the distribution of waters in the Babylonian plain, and for that purpose sailed down the Euphrates to inspect the canal called Pallacopas. On his return to Babylon he was attacked by a fever, probably brought on by his recent exertions in the marshy districts around Babylon, and aggravated by the quantity of wine he had drunk at a banquet given to his principal officers. He died after an illness of eleven days, in the month of May or June, B.C. 323, at the age of thirty-two, after a reign of twelve years and eight months. He appointed no one as his successor, but just before his death he gave his ring to Perdiceas. Roxana was with child at the time of his death, and afterward bore a son who is known by the name of Alexander Ægus. The history of Alexander forms an important epoch in the history of mankind. Unlike other Asiatic conquerors, his progress was marked by something more than devastation and ruin; at every step of his course the Greek language and civilization took root and flourished; and after his death Greek kingdoms were formed in all parts of Asia, which continued to exist for centuries. By his conquests the knowledge of mankind was increased; the sciences of geography, natural history, and others, received vast additions; and it was through him that a road was opened to India, and that Europeans became acquainted with the products of the remote East.—4. ÆGUS, son of Alexander the Great and Roxana, was born shortly after the death of his father, in B.C. 323, and was acknowledged as the partner of Philip Arrhidaeus in the empire, under the guardianship of Perdiceas, Antipater, and Polysperchon in succession. Alexander and his mother Roxana were imprisoned by Cassander, when he obtained possession of Macedonia in 316, and remained in prison till 311, when they were put to death by Cassander.

IV. Kings of Syria.

1. Surnamed BALAS, a person of low origin, pretended to be the son of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, and reigned in Syria B.C. 150-146. He defeated and slew in battle Demetrius I. Soter, out was afterward defeated and dethroned by Demetrius II. Nicator.—2. Surnamed ZEBINA or ZABINAS, son of a merchant, was set up by Ptolemy Physcon as a pretender to the throne of Syria, shortly after the return of Demetrius II. Nicator from his captivity among the Parthians, B.C. 128. He defeated Demetrius in 125, but was afterward defeated by Antiochus Grypus, by whom he was put to death, 122.

V. Literary.

1. Of Æoæ, a peripatetic philosopher at Rome in the first century after Christ, was tutor to the Emperor Nero.—2. The ÆTOLIAN, of Pleurod in Ætolia, a Greek poet, lived in the reign of Ptolemæus Philadelphus (B.C. 285-247), at Alexandria, where he was reckoned one of the seven tragic poets who constituted the tragic pleiad. He also wrote other poems, besides tragedies. His fragments are collected by Capellmann, Alexandri Ætoli Fragmenta, Bonn, 1829.—3. Of APHRODISIAS, in Caria, the most celebrated of the commentators on Aristotle, lived about A.D. 200. About half his voluminous works were edited and translated into Latin at the revival of literature; there are a few more extant in the original Greek, which have never been printed, and an Arabic version is preserved of several others. His most important treatise is entitled De Fato, an inquiry into the opinions of Aristotle on the subject of Fate and Free-will; edited by Orelli, Zurich, 1824.—4. CORNELIUS, surnamed POLYHISTOR, a Greek writer, was made prisoner during the war of Sulla in Greece (B.C. 87-84), and sold as a slave to Cornelius Lentulus, who took him to Rome, made him the teacher of his children, and subsequently restored him to freedom. The surname of Polyhistor was given to him on account of his prodigious learning. He is said to have written a vast number of works, all of which have perished, [with the exception of a few fragments]: the most important of them was one in forty-two books, containing historical and geographical accounts of nearly all countries of the ancient world. [A list of his works is given by Müller, who has collected and published the fragments of his writings in the third volume of Fragmenta Historicorum Græcorum, p. 206-244.]—5. Surnamed LYCHNUS, of Ephesus, a Greek rhetorician and poet, lived about B.C. 30. A few fragments of his geographical and astronomical poems are extant.—6. Of MYNDES, in Caria, a Greek writer on zoology of uncertain date.—7. NUMENIUS, a Greek rhetorician, who lived in the second century of the Christian era. Two works are ascribed to him, one De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis, from which Aquila Romanus took his materials for his work on the same subject; and the other On Show-speeches, which was written by a later grammarian of the name of Alexander. Edited in Walz's Rhetores Græci, vol. viii.—8. The PAPHLAGONIAN, a celebrated impostor, who flourished about the beginning of the second century after Christ, of whom Lucian has given an amusing account, chiefly of the various contrivances by which he established and maintained the credit of an oracle. The influence he attained over the populace seems incredible; indeed, the narrative of Lucian would appear to be a mere romance, were it not confirmed by some medals of Antoninus and M. Aurélius.—9. Surnamed PELOPLATON, a Greek rhetorician of Seleucia in Cilicia, was appointed Greek secretary to M. Antoninus, about A.D. 174. At Athens, he conquered the celebrated rhetorician Herodes Atticus, in a rhetorical contest. All persons, however, did not admit his abilities; for a Corinthian of the name of Sceptus said that he had found in Alexander "the clay (ἱλῆος), but not Plato," alluding to his surname of "Peloplaton."—10. PHILALÈTHES, an ancient Greek physician, lived probably toward the end of the first century B.C., and succeeded Zeuxis as head of a celebrated Herophilean school of medicine, established in Phrygia between Laodicea and Carura.—11. Of TRALLES in Lydia, an eminent physician, lived in the sixth century after Christ, and is the author of two extant Greek works: 1. Libri Duodecim de Re Medica; 2. De Lumbricis.

ALEXANDRĒA, [sometimes -drin, though, as Madvig says (Cic., De Fin., v., 19, 54), the Latin writers always preferred the ē, and this was always the form on coins and inscriptions; cf. Fea, ad Hor., Od., iv., 14, 35] (Ἀλεξάνδρεια: Ἀλεξανδρείς, Alexandrinus), the name of several cities founded by, or in memory of Alexander the Great.—1. (Alexandrea, Arab. Iskanderia), the capital of Egypt under the Ptolemies, ordered by Alexander to be founded in B.C. 332. It was built on the narrow neck of land between the Lake Mareotis and the Mediterranean, opposite to the Island of Pharos, which was joined to the city by an artificial dike, called Heptastadium, which formed, with the island, the two harbors of the city, that on the northeast of the dike being named the Great Harbor (now the New Port), that on the southwest Eunosios (εὔνοσιος, the Old Port). These harbors communicated with each other by two channels cut through the Heptastadium, one at each end of it; and there was a canal from the Eunosios to the Lake Mareotis. The city was built on a regular plan, and was intersected by two principal streets, above one hundred feet wide, the one extending thirty stadia from east to west, the other across this, from the sea toward the lake, to the length of ten stadia. At the eastern extremity of the city was the royal quarter, called Bruchium, and at the other end of the chief street, outside of the city, the Necropolis or cemetery. A great light-house was built on the Island of Pharos in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 283). Under the care of the Ptolemies, as the capital of a great kingdom and of the most fertile country on the earth, and commanding by its position all the commerce of Europe with the East, Alexandria soon became the most wealthy and splendid city of the known world. Greeks, Jews, and other foreigners flocked to it, and its population probably amounted to three quarters of a million. But a still greater distinction was conferred upon it through the foundation, by the first two Ptolemies, of the Museum, an establishment in which men devoted to literature were maintained at the public cost, and of the Library, which contained ninety thousand distinct works, and four hundred thousand volumes, and the increase of which made it necessary to establish another library in the Serapeum (Temple of Serapis), which reached to forty-two thousand eight hundred volumes, but which was destroyed by the Bishop Theophilus, at the time of the general overthrow of the heathen temples under Theodosius (A.D. 389). The Great Library suffered severely by fire, when Julius Cæsar was besieged in Alexandria, and was finally destroyed by Amroa, the lieutenant of the Calif Omar, in A.D. 651. These institutions made Alexandria the chief centre of literary activity. When Egypt became a Roman province (vid. ÆGYPTUS), Alexandria was made the residence of the Præfectus Ægypti. It retained its commercial and literary importance, and became also a chief seat of Christianity and theological learning. Its site is now covered by a mass of ruins, among which are the remains of the cisterns by which the whole city was supplied with water, house by house; the two obelisks (vulg. Cleopatra's Needles), which adorned the gateway of the royal palace, and, outside the walls, to the south, the column of Diocletian (vulg. Pompey's Pillar). The modern city stands on the dike uniting the Island of Pharos to the main land.—2. A. TROAS, also TROAS simply, (Ἄ. ἡ Τρωάς: now Eskestamboul, i. e., the Old City), on the sea-coast, southwest of Troy, was enlarged by Antigonos, hence called Antigonía, but afterward it resumed its first name. It flourished greatly, both under the Greeks and the Romans; it was made a colonia; and both Julius Cæsar and Constantine thought of establishing the seat of empire in it.—3. A. AD ISSUM (Ἄ. κατὰ Ἴσσιόν: now Iskenderoon, Scanderoun, Alexandrette), a sea-port at the entrance of Syria, a little south of Issus.—4. In Susianna, afterward Antiochia, afterward Charax Spasini (Χάραξ Πασίνου or Σπασ.), at the mouth of the Tigris, built by Alexander; destroyed by a flood; restored by Antiochus Epiphanes: birth-place of Dionysius Periegetes and Isidorus Characenus.—5. A. ARIÆ (Ἄ. ἡ ἐν Ἀρίοις: now Ierrat), founded by Alexander on the River Arius, in the Persian province of Aria, a very flourishing city, on the great caravan road to India.—6. A. ARACHOSIÆ or ALEXANDROPOLIS (now Kandahar?), on the River Arachotus, was probably not founded till after the time of Alexander.—7. A. BACTRIANA (Ἄ. κατὰ Βάκτρα: probably Khooloom, ruins), east of Bactra (Balkh).—8. A. AD CAUCASUM, or apud Paropamisidas (Ἄ. ἐν Παροπαμισδαίαις), at the foot of Mount Paropamisus (now Hindoo Koosh), probably near Cabool.—9. A. ULTIMA or ALEXANDRESCHATA (Ἄ. ἡ ἐσχάτη: now Kokand?), in Sogdiana, on the Jaxartes, a little east of Cyropolis or Cyreschata, marked the furthest point reached by Alexander in his Seythian expedition. These are not all the cities of the name.

ALEXICACUS (Ἀλεξικάκος), the averter of evil, a surname of several deities, but particularly of Jupiter (Zeus), Apollo, and Hercules.

ALEXINUS (Ἀλεξίνος), of Elis, a philosopher of the Dialectic or Megarian school, and a disciple of Eubulides, lived about the beginning of the third century B.C.

ALEXIS (Ἀλέξις). 1. A comic poet, born at Thurii in Italy, and an Athenian citizen. He was the uncle and instructor of Menander, was born about B.C. 394, and lived to the age of one hundred and six. Some of his plays, of which he is said to have written two hundred and forty-five, belonged to the Middle, and others to the New Comedy. [The fragments of his plays have been published by Meineke, Fragmenta Comicorum Græcorum, vol. ii., p. 688-768, edit. minor.]—2. A sculptor and statuary, one of the pupils of Polyctetus.

ALFĒNUS VARUS. Vid. VARUS.

ALGĪDUM or ALGĪDUS (ruins near Cava?), a small but strongly fortified town of the Æqui on one of the hills of Mount Algīdus, of which all trace has now disappeared.

ALGIDUS MONS, a range of mountains in Latium, extending south from Præneste to Mount Albanus, cold, but covered with wood, and containing good pasturage (gelido Algido; Hor., Carm., l. 21, 6: nigræ feraci frondis in Algido; id., iv., 4, 58). It was an ancient seat of the worship of Diana. From it the Æqui usually made their incursions into the Roman territory.

ALIËNUS CÆCINA. Vid. CÆCINA.

ALIMENTUS, L. CINCIUS, a celebrated Roman annalist, antiquary, and jurist, was prætor in Sicily, B.C. 209, and wrote several works, of which the best known was his Annales, which contained an account of the second Punic war [His fragments have been published in the Scriptores Historici Romani of Popma, 1620, and more recently by Krause, in his Vite et Fragmenta veterum Hist. Lat., Berlin, 1833.]

ALINDA (τὰ Ἀλινδὰ: Ἀλινδώνεις), a fortress and small town, southeast of Stratonicæ, where Ada, queen of Caria, fixed her residence, when she was driven out of Halicarnassus (B.C. 340).

ALIPHËRA (Ἀλῖφειρα, Ἀλῖφρα: Ἀλῖφειραῖος, Ἀλῖφρεῖς: ruins near Nerovitz), a fortified town in Arcadia, situated on a mountain on the borders of Elis, south of the Alphæus, said to have been founded by the hero Alipherus, son of Lycaon.

ALIPHËRUS. Vid. ALIPHËRA.

[ALISUM (Ἀλεῖσιον), a town of Elis, the same, probably, with that called ALËSËUM by Strabo, and placed by him between Elis and Olympia.]

ALISO (now Elsen), a strong fortress built by Drusus B.C. 11, at the confluence of the Luppia (now Lippe) and the Eliso (now Alme).

ALJSONTIA (now Alsit), a river flowing into the Mosella (now Mosel).

ALLECTUS, the chief officer of Carausius in Britain, whom he murdered in A.D. 293. He then assumed the imperial title himself, but was defeated and slain in 296 by the general of Constantius.

ALLÏA, or, more correctly, ALÏA, a small river, which rises about eleven miles from Rome, in the neighborhood of Crustumærium, and flows into the Tiber about six miles from Rome. It is memorable by the defeat of the Romans by the Gauls on its banks, July 16th, B.C. 390; which day, dies Alliensis, was hence marked as an unlucky day in the Roman calendar.

ALLIËNUS, A. 1. A friend of Cicero, was the legate of Q. Cicero in Asia, B.C. 60, prætor in 49, and governor of Sicily on behalf of Cæsar in 48 and 47.—2. A legate of Dolabella, by whom he was sent into Egypt in 43.

ALLIFÆ or ALIFÆ (Allifanus: now Allife), a town of Samnium, on the Volturnus, in a fertile country. It was celebrated for the manufacture of its large drinking-cups (Allifana se. pocula, Hor., Sat., ii., 8, 39).

ALLOBRÔGES (nom. sing., Allôbrox: Ἀλλόβρογες, Ἀλλόβρογες, Ἀλλόβριγες: perhaps from the Celtic aill, "rock" or "mountain," and brog, "dwelling," consequently "dwellers in the mountains"), a powerful people of Gaul dwelling between the Rhodanus (now Rhone) and the Isara (now Isère), as far as the Lake Lemanus (now Lake of Geneva), consequently in the modern Dauphiné and Savoy. Their chief town was VIENNA (now Vienne) on the Rhone. They are first mentioned in Hannibal's invasion, B.C.

218. They were conquered, in B.C. 121, by Q. Fabius Maximus Allobrogicus, and made subjects of Rome, but they bore the yoke unwillingly, and were always disposed to rebellion. In the time of Ammianus the eastern part of their country was called Sapaudia, i. e., Savoy.

ALMO (now Almon), a small river, rises near Bovilla, and flows into the Tiber south of Rome, in which the statue and sacred things of Cybele were washed annually.

ALMÔPES (Ἀλμῶπες), a people in Macedonia, inhabiting the district Almopia between Eordæa and Pelagonia.

ALÔEUS (Ἀλωεύς), son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Canace, married Iphimédia, the daughter of Triops. His wife was beloved by Neptune (Poseidon), by whom she had two sons, Otus and Ephialtes, who are usually called the Alôidæ, from their reputed father Aloeus. They were renowned for their extraordinary strength and daring spirit. When they were nine years old, the body of each measured nine cubits in breadth and twenty-seven in height. At this early age, they threatened the Olympian gods with war, and attempted to pile Ossa upon Olympus, and Pelion upon Ossa. They would have accomplished their object, says Homer, had they been allowed to grow up to the age of manhood; but Apollo destroyed them before their beards began to appear (Od., xi., 305, seq.). They also put the god Mars (Ares) in chains, and kept him imprisoned for thirteen months. Other stories are related of them by later writers.

ALÔIDÆ. Vid. ALOEUS.

[ALÔNE (Ἀλωναί: now Benidorme or Torre di Salinas), a town of Hispania Tarraconensis, a colony of the Massilians.—2. A town of Britain, somewhat south of Keswick; by some supposed to correspond to Ambleside.]

ALONTA (Ἀλόντα: now Terek), a river of Albania, in Sarmatia Asiatica, flowing into the Caspian.

ALÔPE (Ἀλόπη), daughter of Cereyon, became by Neptune (Poseidon) the mother of Hippotus. She was put to death by her father, but her body was changed by Neptune (Poseidon) into a well, which bore the same name.

ALÔPE (Ἀλόπη: Ἀλοπεύς, Ἀλοπίτης). 1. A town in the Opuntian Loeris, opposite Eubæa.—2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly (Il., ii., 682).

ALÔPEË (Ἀλωπεκί and Ἀλωπεκαί: Ἀλωπεκεύς), a demus of Attica, of the tribe Antiochis, eleven stadia east of Athens, on the Hill Auehesmus. [Here the parents of Socrates dwelt, who therefore belonged to this demus, as did also Aristides.]

ALÔPEËCIA (Ἀλωπεκία) or ALOPEË (Plin.), an island in the Palus Mæotis, near the mouth of the Tanais.]

ALOPËCONËSUS (Ἀλωπεκόννησος: Ἀλωπεκοννήσιοι: now Alexi), a town in the Thracian Chersonesus, founded by the Æolians.

ALPËNUS (Ἀλπηνός, Ἀλπηνός), a town of the Epicnemidii Loeri at the entrance of the pass of Thermopylæ.

ALPËS (αἱ Ἀλπεις, ἡ Ἄλπις, τὰ Ἀλπεινὰ ὄρη, τὰ Ἀλπειὰ ὄρη; probably from the Celtic Alb or Alp, "a height"), the mountains forming the boundary of Northern Italy, are a part of the great mountain chain which extends from the Gulf of Genoa across Europe to the Black Sea, of which the Apennines and the mountains of the Grecian peninsula may be regarded as offshoots. Of the Alps proper, the Greeks had very little knowledge, and included them under the general name of the Rhipæan Mountains. The Romans first obtained some knowledge of them by Hannibal's passage across them: this knowledge was gradually extended by their various wars with the inhabitants of the mountains, who were not finally subdued till the reign of Augustus. In the time of the emperors the different parts of the Alps were distinguished by the following names, most of which are still retained. We enumerate them in order from west to east. 1. ALPES MARITIMÆ, the Martime or Ligurian Alps, from Genua (now Genoa), where the Apennines begin, run west as far as the River Varus (now Var) and Mount Cema (now La Caillole), and then north to Mount Vesulus (now Monte Viso), one of the highest points of the Alps.—2. ALPES COTTIÆ or COTTIANÆ, the Cottian Alps (so called from a King Cottius in the time of Augustus), from Monte Viso to Mont Cenis, contained Mount Matrona, afterward called Mount Janus or Janua (now Mont Genève), across which Cottius constructed a road, which became the chief means of communication between Italy and Gaul: this road leads from the Valley of the Durance in France to Segusio (now Susa) and the Valley of the Dora in Piedmont. The pass over Mont Cenis, now one of the most frequented of the Alpine passes, appears to have been unknown in antiquity.—3. ALPES GRALÆ, also Saltus Graius (the name is probably Celtic, and has nothing to do with Greece), the Graian Alps, from Mont Cenis to the Little St. Bernard inclusive, contained the Jugum Cremonis (now Le Cramont) and the Centroniæ Alps, apparently the Little St. Bernard and the surrounding mountains. The Little St. Bernard, which is sometimes called Alpis Graia, is probably the pass by which Hannibal crossed the Alps; the road over it, which was improved by Augustus, led to Augusta (now Aosta) in the territory of the Salassi.—4. ALPES PENNINÆ, the Pennine Alps, from the Great St. Bernard to the Simplon inclusive, the highest portion of the chain, including Mont Blanc, Monte Rosa, and Mont Cervin. The Great St. Bernard was called Mount Penninus, and on its summit the inhabitants worshipped a deity, whom the Romans called Jupiter Penninus. The name is probably derived from the Celtic pen, "a height."—5. ALPES LEPONTIUM or LEPONTIÆ, the Lepontian or Helvetian Alps, from the Simplon to the St. Gothard.—6. ALPES RÆTICÆ, the Rætian Alps, from the St. Gothard to the Ortler by the pass of the Stelvio. Mount Adula is usually supposed to be the St. Gothard, but it must be another name for the whole range, if Strabo is right in stating that both the Rhine and the Adda rise in Mount Adula. The Romans were acquainted with two passes across the Rætian Alps, connecting Curia (now Coire) and Milan, one across the Splügen and the other across Mont Septimer, and both meeting at Clavenna (now Chiavenna).—7. ALPES TRIDENTINÆ, the mountains of Southern Tyrol, in which the Athësis (now Adige) rises, with the pass of the Brenner.—8. ALPES NORICÆ, the Noric Alps, northeast of the Tridentine Alps, comprising the mountains in the neighborhood of Salzburg.—9. ALPES CARNICÆ, the Carnic Alps, east of the Tridentine, and south of the Noric, to Mount Terglu.—10. ALPES JULIÆ, the Julian Alps, from Mount Terglu to the commencement of the Illyrian or Dalmatian Mountains, which are known by the name of the Alpes Dalmatiæ, further north by the name of the Alpes Pannoniæ. The Alpes Juliæ were so called because Julius Cæsar or Augustus constructed roads across them: they are also called Alpes Venetæ.

[ALPHÆA ('Αλφαια). Vid. ALPHEUS, near the end.]

[ALPHËNOR ('Αλφῆνωρ), a son of Amphion and Niobe, slain by Apollo.]

ALPHËNUS VARUS. Vid. VARUS.

ALPHESIBEÆ ('Αλφειβία). 1. Mother of Adonis. Vid. ADONIS.—2. Daughter of Phegeus, married Alcmaeon. Vid. ALCMÆON.

ALPHËUS MYTHËNËUS ('Αλφειὸς Μυθηνναῖος), the author of about twelve epigrams in the Greek Anthology, was probably a contemporary of the Emperor Augustus.

ALPHËUS ('Αλφειὸς; Doric, 'Αλφείος; now Alfeo, Rofeo, Ryfo, Rufeo), the chief river of Peloponnesus, rises at Phylæe in Arcadia, shortly afterward sinks under ground, appears again near Asea, and then mingles its waters with those of the Eurôtas. After flowing twenty stadia, the two rivers disappear under ground: the Alpheus again rises at Pegæ in Arcadia, and, increased by many affluents, flows northwest through Arcadia and Elis, not far from Olympia, and falls into the Ionian Sea. The subterranean descent of the river, which is confirmed by modern travellers, gave rise to the story about the river-god Alpheus and the nymph Arethusa. The latter, pursued by Alpheus, was changed by Diana (Artemis) into the fountain of Arethusa, in the Island of Ortygia at Syracuse, but the god continued to pursue her under the sea, and attempted to mingle his stream with the fountain in Ortygia. Hence it was said that a eup thrown into the Alpheus would appear again in the fountain of Arethusa in Ortygia. Other accounts related that Diana (Artemis) herself was beloved by Alpheus: the goddess was worshipped, under the name of Alpheæa, both in Elis and Ortygia.

ALPHËUS AVITUS. Vid. AVITUS.

ALPINUS, a name which Horace gives, in ridicule, to a bombastic poet. He probably means Bibaculus.

[ALSA (now Ausa), a river of Italy, in the territory of the Veneti, just west of Aquileia. Here the younger Constantine lost his life in a battle against his brother Constantius.]

ALSÏUM (Alsiensis; now Palo), one of the most ancient Etruscan towns on the coast near Cære, and a Roman colony after the first Punic war. In its neighborhood Pompey had a country seat (Villa Alsiensis).

[ALTES ('Αλτης), a king of the Leleges, at Pedasus, father of Laothœ.]

ALTHÆA ('Αλθαία), daughter of the Ætolian King Thestius and Eurythemis, married Ceneus, king of Calydon, by whom she became the mother of several children, and among others of MELEAGER, upon whose death she killed herself.

ALTHÆA (now Orgaz?), the chief town of the Olendes in the country of the Cretani, in Hispania TARRACONENSIS.

ALTHĒMĒNES (Ἀλθήμενης or Ἀλθαίμενης), son of Catreus, king of Crete. In consequence of an oracle, that Catreus would lose his life by one of his children, Althemeus quitted Crete and went to Rhodes. There he unwittingly killed his father, who had come in search of his son.

ALTINUM (Altinus: now Alliño), a wealthy municipium in the land of the Veneti in the north of Italy, at the mouth of the River Silis and on the road from Patavium to Aquileia, was a wealthy manufacturing town, and the chief emporium of all the goods which were sent from Southern Italy to the countries of the north. Goods could be brought from Ravenna to Altinum through the Lagoons and the numerous canals of the Po, safe from storms and pirates. There were many beautiful villas around the town. (Mart., iv., 25.)

ALTIIS (Ἄλιτις), the sacred grove of Jupiter (Zeus) at OLYMPIA.

ALUNTIUM or HALUNTIUM (Ἀλούντιον), a town on the north coast of Sicily, not far from Calacta, on a steep hill, celebrated for its wine.

ALUS or HALUS (Ἄλος, Ἄλος: Ἀλειός: ruins near Kefalosi), a town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, at the extremity of Mount Othrys, built by the hero Athamas.

ALYATTES (Ἀλυάττης), king of Lydia, B.C. 617-560, succeeded his father Sadyattes, and was himself succeeded by his son Croesus. He carried on war with Miletus from 617 to 612, and with Cyaxares, king of Media, from 590 to 585; an eclipse of the sun, which happened in 585, during a battle between Alyattes and Cyaxares, led to a peace between them. Alyattes drove the Cimmerians out of Asia and took Smyrna. The tomb of Alyattes, north of Sardis, near the Lake Gygeæ, which consisted of a large mound of earth, raised upon a foundation of great stones, still exists. Mr. Hamilton says that it took him about ten minutes to ride round its base, which would give it a circumference of nearly a mile.

ALYBA (Ἀλύβα), a town on the south coast of the Euxine. (Hom., II., ii., 857.)

ALYPIUS (Ἀλύπιος), of Alexandria, probably lived in the fourth century of the Christian era, and is the author of a Greek musical treatise, called "Introduction to Music" (εἰσαγωγή μουσικῆ), printed by Meibomius in Antiquæ Musicae Auctores Septem, Amstel., 1652.

ALYZIA or ALYZÆA (Ἀλυζία, Ἀλύζεια: Ἀλυζαίος: ruins in the Valley of Kandili), a town in Acarnania, near the sea, opposite Leucas, with a harbor and a temple both sacred to Hercules. The temple contained one of the works of Ly-sippus, representing the labors of Hercules, which the Romans carried off.

AMADŌCUS (Ἀμάδοκος) or MĒDŌCUS (Μήδοκος). 1. King of the Odryse in Thrace, when Xenophon visited the country in B.C. 400. He and Seuthes, who were the most powerful Thracian kings, were frequently at variance, but were reconciled to one another by Thrasylbulus, the Athenian commander, in 390, and induced by him to become the allies of Athens.—2. A ruler in Thrace, who, in conjunction with Berisades and Cersobleptes, succeeded Cotys in 358.

AMAGETOBRIA. Vid. MAGETOBRIA.

[AMALCHIUS OCEANUS, a part of the Northern Ocean, extending, according to Heecataeus, along the coast of Scythia.]

[AMALLOBRIGA (now probably Medino del Rio Seco), a city of the Vaccæi, in Hispania TARRACONENSIS.]

AMALTHĒA (Ἀμάλθεια). 1. The nurse of the infant Jupiter (Zeus) in Crete. According to some traditions, Amalthea is the goat which suckled Jupiter (Zeus), and which was rewarded by being placed among the stars. Vid. ÆGA. According to others, Amalthea was a nymph, daughter of Oceanus, Helios, Hæmonius, or of the Cretan king, Melisseus, who fed Jupiter (Zeus) with the milk of a goat. When this goat broke off one of her horns, Amalthea filled it with fresh herbs and gave it to Jupiter (Zeus), who placed it among the stars. According to other accounts, Jupiter (Zeus) himself broke off one of the horns of the goat Amalthea, and gave it to the daughters of Melisseus, and endowed it with the wonderful power of becoming filled with whatever the possessor might wish. This is the story about the origin of the celebrated horn of Amalthea, commonly called the Horn of Plenty or Cornucopia, which was used in later times as the symbol of plenty in general.—2. One of the Sibyls, identified with the Cumæan Sibyl, who sold to King Tarquinius the celebrated Sibylline books.

AMALTHĒUM or AMALTHĒA, a villa of Atticus on the River Thyamis in Epirus, was perhaps originally a shrine of the nymph Amalthea, which Atticus adorned with statues and bas-reliefs, and converted into a beautiful summer retreat. Cicero, in imitation, constructed a similar retreat on his estate at Arpinum.

AMANTIA (Ἀμαντία: Amantinus, Amantiânus, or Amantes, pl.: now Nivitzta), a Greek town and district in Illyricum: the town, said to have been founded by the Abantes of Eubœa, lay at some distance from the coast, east of Oricum.

AMĀNUS (ὁ Ἀμανός, τὸ Ἀμανόν: Ἀμανίτης, Amaniensis: now Almadân), a branch of Mount Taurus, which runs from the head of the Gulf of Issus northeast to the principal chain dividing Syria from Cilicia and Cappadocia. There were two passes in it; the one, called the Syrian Gates (αἱ Συριαὶ πύλαι, Syria Portæ: now Bylan), near the sea; the other, called the Amanian Gates (Ἀμανίδες or Ἀμανικαὶ πύλαι: Amanicæ Pyke, Portæ Amani Montis: now Donir Kapu, i. e., the Iron Gate), further to the north. The former pass was on the road from Cilicia to Antioch, the latter on that to the district Commagene; but, on account of its great difficulty, the latter pass was rarely used, until the Romans made a road through it. The inhabitants of Amanus were wild banditti.

AMARDI or MARDI (Ἀμαρδοί, Μάρδοι), a powerful, warlike, and predatory tribe, who dwelt on the south shore of the Caspian Sea.

AMARDUS or MARDUS (Ἀμαρδος, Μάρδος: now Kizil Oziën or Sefid Rud), a river flowing through the country of the Mardi into the Caspian Sea.

[AMĀRI LACUS (αι πικρα λιμνη: now Scheib), in Lower Egypt, derived their name from their bitter, brackish taste, which was subsequently changed and rendered sweet by the Canal of Ptolemy, letting into them the water of the Nile.]

AMARYNCEUS (Ἀμαρυγκεύς), a chief of the Eleans, is said by some writers to have fought against Troy: but Homer only mentions his son Dioces (Amarucides) as taking part in the Trojan war.

AMARYNTHUS (Ἀμαρύνθος: Ἀμαρύνθιος), a town in Eubœa, seven stadia from Eretria, to which it belonged, with a celebrated temple of Diana (Artemis), who was hence called Amarynthia or Amarysia, and in whose honor there was a festival of the name both in Eubœa and Attica. Vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. AMARYNTHIA.

AMĀSĒNUS (now Amaseno), a river in Latium, rises in the Volscian Mountains, flows by Privernum, and after being joined by the Ufens (now Ufente), which flows from Setia, falls into the sea between Circæii and Terracina, though the greater part of its waters are lost in the Pontine marshes.

AMĀSĪA or -ĒA (Ἀμάσεια: Ἀμασεύς: now Amasiak), the capital of the kings of Pontus, was a strongly fortified city on both banks of the River Iris. It was the birth-place of Mithradates the Great and of the geographer Strabo.

AMĀSĪS (Ἀμασις). 1. King of Egypt, B.C. 570-526, succeeded Apries, whom he dethroned. During his long reign Egypt was in a very prosperous condition, and the Greeks were brought into much closer intercourse with the Egyptians than had existed previously. Amasis married Ladice, a Cyrenaic lady, contracted an alliance with Cyrene and Ptolemy of Samos, and also sent presents to several of the Greek cities.—2. A Persian, sent in the reign of Cambyses (B.C. 525) against Cyrene, took Barca, but did not succeed in taking Cyrene.

AMASTRIS (Ἀμαστρίς, Ion. Ἀμαστρίς). 1. Wife of Xerxes, and mother of Artaxerxes I, was of a cruel and vindictive character.—2. Also called Amastrine, niece of Darius, the last king of Persia. She married, 1. Craterus; 2. Dionysius, tyrant of Heraclea in Bithynia, B.C. 322; and, 3. Lysimachus, B.C. 302. Having been abandoned by Lysimachus upon his marriage with Arsinoë, she retired to Heraclea, where she reigned, and was drowned by her two sons about 288.

AMASTRIS (Ἀμαστρίς: Ἀμαστριανός: now Amasera), a large and beautiful city, with two harbors, on the coast of Paphlagonia, built by Amastris after her separation from Lysimachus (about B.C. 300), on the site of the old town of Sesamus, which name the citadel retained. The new city was built and peopled by the inhabitants of Cytorus and Cronna.

AMĀTA, wife of king Latinus and mother of Lavinia, opposed Lavinia being given in marriage to Æneas, because she had already promised her to Turnus. When she heard that Turnus had fallen in battle, she hung herself.

[AMĀTHĪA (Ἀμάθεια), one of the Nereids (Hom.).]

AMĀTHŪS, -UNTIS, (Ἀμαθούς, -ούντος: Ἀμαθούσιος: now Limasol), an ancient town on the south coast of Cyprus, with a celebrated temple of Venus (Aphrodite), who was hence called Amathūsia. There were copper mines in the neighborhood of the town (secundam Anathunta metalli, Ov., Mct., x., 220).—[2. (Now Anatah), a fortified town of Peræa or Palestine, beyond the Jordan.]

AMĀTĪS, surnamed Pseudomarius, pretended to be either the son or grandson of the great Marius, and was put to death by Antony in B.C. 44. Some call him Herophilus.

AMĀZŌNES (Ἀμαζόνες), a mythical race of warlike females, are said to have come from the Caucasus, and to have settled in the country about the River Thermodon, where they founded the city Themiseyra, west of the modern Trebizond. Their country was inhabited only by the Amazons, who were governed by a queen; but, in order to propagate their race, they met once a year the Gargareans in Mount Caucasus. The children of the female sex were brought up by the Amazons, and each had her right breast cut off; the male children were sent to the Gargareans or put to death. The foundation of several towns in Asia Minor and in the islands of the Ægean is ascribed to them, c. g., of Ephesus, Smyrna, Cyme, Myrina, and Paphos. The Greeks believed in their existence as a real historical race down to a late period; and hence it is said that Thalestris, the queen of the Amazons, hastened to Alexander, in order to become a mother by the conqueror of Asia. This belief of the Greeks may have arisen from the peculiar way in which the women of some of the Caucasian districts lived, and performed the duties which in other countries devolve upon men, as well as from their bravery and courage, which are noticed as remarkable even by modern travellers. Vague and obscure reports about them probably reached the inhabitants of Western Asia and the Greeks, and these reports were subsequently worked out and embellished by popular tradition and poetry. The following are the chief mythical adventures with which the Amazons are connected: they are said to have invaded Lycia in the reign of Iobates, but were destroyed by Bellerophon, who happened to be staying at the king's court. Vid. BELLEROPHONES, LAOMEDON. They also invaded Phrygia, and fought with the Phrygians and Trojans when Priam was a young man. The ninth among the labors imposed upon Hercules by Eurystheus was to take from Hippolyte, the queen of the Amazons, her girdle, the ensign of her kingly power, which she had received as a present from Mars (Ares). Vid. HERCULES. In the reign of Theseus they invaded Attica. Vid. THESEUS. Toward the end of the Trojan war, the Amazons, under their Queen Penthesilea, came to the assistance of Priam; but she was killed by Achilles. The Amazons and their battles are frequently represented in the remains of ancient Greek art.

AMĀZŌNĪCI or -IUS MONS, a mountain range parallel and near to the coast of Pontus, containing the sources of the Thermodon and other streams which water the supposed country of the Amazons.

AMBARRI, a people of Gaul, on the Arar (now Saone) east of the Ædui, and of the same stock as the latter.

AMBĀNTI, a Belgic people, between the Bello-vaci and Atrebrates, conquered by Cæsar in B. C. 57. Their chief town was Samarobriva, afterward called Ambiani; now Amiens.

AMBIATINUS VICUS, a place in the country of the Treviri near Coblenz, where the Emperor Caligula was born.

AMBIĀRI, an Armoric people in Gaul, near the modern Ambières in Normandy.

[AMBIGĀTUS, a king of the Celts in Gaul in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus.]

AMBIĀTI, a Gallic people, perhaps in Britany.

AMBĪORIX, a chief of the Eburones in Gaul, cut to pieces, in conjunction with Cativolcus, the Roman troops under Sabinus and Cotta, who were stationed for the winter in the territories of the Eburones, B.C. 54. He failed in taking the camp of Q. Cicero, and was defeated on the arrival of Cæsar, who was unable to obtain possession of the person of Ambiorix, notwithstanding his active pursuit of the latter.

AMBIVARETI, the clients or vassals of the Ædni, probably dwelt north of the latter.

AMBIVARITI, a Gallic people west of the Maas, in the neighborhood of Namur.

AMBIVĪ TURFIO. Vid. TURFIO.

AMBLADA (τὴ Ἀμβλάδα: Ἀμβλαδέως), a town in Pisidia, on the borders of Caria; famous for its wine.

AMBRACĪA (Ἀμπρακία, afterward Ἀμβρακία: Ἀμβρακίωτης, Ἀμβρακίεύς, Ambraciensis: now Arta), a town on the left bank of the Arachthus, eighty stadia from the coast, north of the Ambracian Gulf, was originally included in Acarnania, but afterward in Epirus. It was colonized by the Coriuthians about B.C. 660, and at an early period acquired wealth and importance. It became subject to the kings of Epirus about the time of Alexander the Great. Pyrrhus made it the capital of his kingdom, and adorned it with public buildings and statues. At a later time it joined the Ætolian League, was taken by the Romans in B.C. 189, and stripped of its works of art. Its inhabitants were transplanted to the new city of Nicopolis, founded by Augustus after the battle of Actium, B.C. 31. South of Ambracia, on the east of the Arachthus, and close to the sea, was the fort Ambracus.

AMBRACĪUS SINUS (Ἀμπρακινὸς or Ἀμβρακικὸς κόλπος: now Gulf of Arta), a gulf of the Ionian Sea between Epirus and Acarnania, said by Polybius to be three hundred stadia long and one hundred wide, and with an entrance only five stadia in width. Its real length is twenty-five miles and its width ten; the narrowest part of the entrance is only seven hundred yards, but its general width is about half a mile.

AMBRŌNES (Ἀμβρωνες), a Celtic people, who joined the Cimbri and Teutoni in their invasion of the Roman dominions, and were defeated by Marius near Aquæ Sextiæ (now Aix) in B.C. 102.

AMBROSIUS, usually called ST. AMBROSE, one of the most celebrated Christian fathers, was born in A.D. 340, probably at Augusta Trevirorum (now Trèves.) After a careful education at Rome, he practiced with great success as an advocate at Milan; and about A.D. 370 was appointed prefect of the provinces of Liguria and Æmilia, whose seat of government was Milan. On the death of Auxentius, bishop of Milan, in 374, the appointment of his successor led to an open conflict between the Arians and Catholics. Ambrose exerted his influence to restore peace, and addressed the people in a conciliatory speech, at the conclusion of which a child in the further part of the crowd cried out "Ambrosius episcopus." The words were received as an oracle from heaven, and Ambrose was elected bishop by the acclamation of the whole multitude, the bishops of both parties uniting in his election. It was in vain that he adopted the strangest devices to alter the determination of the people; nothing could make them change their mind; and at length he yielded to the express command of the emperor (Valentinian I.), and was consecrated on the eighth day after his baptism, for at the time of his election he was only a catechumen. Ambrose was a man of eloquence, firmness, and ability, and distinguished himself by maintaining and enlarging the authority of the church. He was a zealous opponent of the Arians, and thus came into open conflict with Justina, the mother of Valentinian II., who demanded the use of one of the churches of Milan for the Arians. Ambrose refused to give it; he was supported by the people; and the contest was at length decided by the miracles which are reported to have attended the discovery of the reliques of two martyrs, Gervasius and Protasius. Although these miracles were denied by the Arians, the impression made by them upon the people in general was so strong, that Justina thought it prudent to give way. The state of the parties was quite altered by the death of Justina in 387, when Valentinian became a Catholic, and still more completely by the victory of Theodosius over Maximus (388). This event put the whole power of the empire into the hands of a prince who was a firm Catholic, and over whom Ambrose acquired such influence, that, after the massacre at Thessalonica in 390, he refused Theodosius admission to the Church of Milan for a period of eight months, and only restored him after he had performed a public penance. The best edition of the works of Ambrose is that of the Benedictines, Paris, 1686 and 1690.

AMBRYSUS or AMPHRYSUS (Ἀμβρυσος: Ἀμβρυσεύς: near Dhristomo), a town in Phocis, strongly fortified, south of Mount Parnassus: in the neighborhood were numerous vineyards.

AMBUSTUS, FABĪUS. 1. M., pontifex maximus in the year that Rome was taken by the Gauls, B.C. 390. His three sons, Kæso, Numerius, and Quintus, were sent as ambassadors to the Gauls, when the latter were besieging Clusium, and took part in a sally of the besieged against the Gauls (B.C. 391). The Gauls demanded that the Fabii should be surrendered to them for violating the law of nations; and upon the Senate refusing to give up the guilty parties, they marched against Rome. The three sons were in the same year elected consular tribunes.—2. M., consular tribune in B.C. 381 and 369, and censor in 363, had two daughters, of whom the elder was married to Ser Sulpicius, and the younger to C. Licinius Stolo, the author of the Licinian Rogations. According to the story recorded by Livy, the younger Fabia induced her father to assist her husband in obtaining the consulship for the plebeian cr der, into which she had married.—3. M., thrice consul, in B.C. 360, when he conquered the Hernici; a second time in 356, when he conquered the Falisci and Tarquinians; and a third time in 354, when he conquered the Tiburtes. He was dictator in 351. He was the father of the celebrated Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus. Vid. MAXIMUS.

AMĒNĀNUS (Ἀμενανός, Dor. Ἀμηνάας: [now Judicello]), a river in Sicily near Catania, only flowed occasionally (nunc fluit, interdum suppressis fontibus aret, Ov., Mel., xv., 280.)

AMĒRĪA (Amērīnus: now Amelia), an ancient town in Umbria, and a municipium, the birth-place of Sex. Roscius defended by Cicero, was situate in a district rich in viues (Virg., Georg., i., 265).

AMĒRĪŌLA, a town in the land of the Sabines, destroyed by the Romans at a very early period.

AMĒSTRĀTUS (Ἀμίστρατος: Amestratinus: now Mistretta), a town in the north of Sicily, not far from the coast, the same as the Myllistratum of Polybius, and the Anastra of Silius Italicus, taken by the Romans from the Carthaginians in the first Punic war.

AMĒSTRIS. Vid. AMASTRIS.

AMĪDA (ἡ Ἀμιδα: now Diarbekr), a town in Sophene (Armenia Major), on the Upper Tigris.

AMILCAR. Vid. HAMILCAR.

AMĪNIAS (Ἀμεινίας), brother of Æschylus, distinguished himself at the battle of Salamis (B.C. 480): he and Eumeus were judged to have been the bravest on this occasion among all the Athenians.

AMĪPSĪAS (Ἀμειψίας), a comic poet of Athens, contemporary with Aristophanes, whom he twice conquered in the dramatic contests, gaining the second prize with his Connus when Aristophanes was third with the Clouds (B.C. 423), and the first with his Comastæ when Aristophanes gained the second with the Birds (B.C. 414). [Some fragments of his plays remain, which are collected in Meineke's Fragmenta Comicorum Græcorum, vol. i., p. 402—407, edit. minor.]

AMĪSĪA or AMĪSĪUS (Ἀμισίος, Strab.: now Ems), a river in northern Germany well known to the Romans, on which Drusus had a naval engagement with the Bructeri, B.C. 12.

AMĪSĪA (Ἀμισία and Ἀμισία: now Emden ?), a fortress on the left bank of the river of the same name.

AMĪSŌDĀRUS (Ἀμισώδαρος), a king of Lycia, said to have brought up the monster Chimæra: his sons Atymnius and Maris were slain at Troy by the sons of Nestor.

AMĪSUS (Ἀμισός: Ἀμισηνός, Amisenus: now Samsun), a large city on the coast of Pontus, on a bay of the Euxine Sea, called after it (Amisencus Sinus). Mithradates enlarged it, and made it one of his residences.

AMĪTERNUM (Amiterminus: now Amatrice or Torre d'Amiterno), one of the most ancient towns of the Sabines, on the Aternus, the birth-place of the historian Sallust.

AMMIANUS (Ἀμμιανός), a Greek epigrammatist, but probably a Roman by birth, the author of nearly thirty epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived under Trajan and Hadrian.

AMMIANUS MARCELLINUS, by birth a Greek, and a native of Syrian Antioch, was admitted at an early age among the imperial body guards. He served many years under Ursicinus, one of the generals of Constantius, both in the West and East, and he subsequently attended the Emperor Julian in his campaign against the Persians (A.D. 363). Eventually he established himself at Rome, where he composed his history, and was alive at least as late as 390. His history, written in Latin, extended from the accession of Nerva, A.D. 96, the point at which the histories of Tacitus terminated, to the death of Valens, A.D. 378, comprising a period of two hundred and eighty-two years. It was divided into thirty-one books of which the first thirteen are lost. The remaining eighteen embrace the acts of Constantius from A.D. 353, the seventeenth year of his reign, together with the whole career of Gallus, Julianus, Jovianus, Valentinianus, and Valens. The portion preserved was the more important part of the work, as he was a contemporary of the events described in these books. The style of Ammianus is harsh and inflated, but his accuracy, fidelity, and impartiality deserve praise.—Editions: By Gronovius, Lugd. Bat., 1693; by Ernesti, Lips., 1773; by Wagner and Erfurd, Lips., 1808, 3 vols. 8vo.

[AMMOCHOSTUS (Ἀμμόχωστος: now C. Grego), a sandy promontory near Salamis in Cyprus, which gives name by corruption to the modern Famagusta.]

AMMŌN (Ἀμμών), originally an Æthiopian or Libyan, afterward an Egyptian divinity. The real Egyptian name was Amun or Ammu; the Greeks called him Zeus Ammon, the Romans Jupiter Ammon, and the Hebrews Amon. The most ancient seat of his worship was Meroe, where he had an oracle: thence it was introduced into Egypt, where the worship took the firmest root at Thebes in Upper Egypt, which was therefore frequently called by the Greeks Diospolis, or the city of Zeus. Another famous seat of the god, with a celebrated oracle, was in the oasis of Ammouium (now Siuah) in the Libyan desert; the worship was also established in Cyrenaica. The god was represented either in the form of a ram, or as a human being with the head of a ram; but there are some representations in which he appears altogether as a human being, with only the horns of a ram. It seems clear that the original idea of Ammon was that of a protector and leader of the flocks. The Æthiopians were a nomad people, flocks of sheep constituted their principal wealth, and it is perfectly in accordance with the notions of the Æthiopians as well as Egyptians to worship the animal which is the leader and protector of the flock. This view is supported by the various stories related about Ammon.

AMMONIUM. Vid. OASIS.

AMMŌNIUS (Ἀμμώνιος). 1. GRAMMATICUS, of Alexandria, left this city on the overthrow of the heathen temples in A.D. 389, and settled at Constantinople. He wrote, in Greek, a valuable work On the Differences of Words of like Signification (περὶ ὁμοίων καὶ διαφόρων λέξεων). Editions: By Valekenae, Lugd. Bat., 1739; by Schäfer, Lips. 1822.—2. SON OF HERMEAS, studied at Athens under Proclus (who died A.D. 484), and was the master of Simplicius, Damascius, and others. He wrote numerous commentaries in Greek on the works of the earlier philosophers. His extant works are Commentaries on the Isagoge of Porphyry, or the Five Predicables, first published at Venice in 1500; and On the Categories of Aristotle and De Interpretatione, published by Brandis in his edition of the Scholia ou Aristotle.—3. Of LAMPRÆ, in Attica, a Peripatetic philosopher, lived in the first century of the Christian era, and was the instructor of Plutarch.—4. Surnamed SACCAS, or sack-carrier, because his employment was carrying the corn, landed at Alexandria, as a public porter, was born of Christian parents. Some writers assert, and others deny, that he apostatized from the faith. At any rate, he combined the study of philosophy with Christianity, and is regarded by those who maintain his apostasy as the founder of the later Platonic School. Among his disciples were Longinus, Herennius, Plotinus, and Origen. He died A.D. 243, at the age of more than eighty years.—[5. Of ALEXANDREA, a pupil of Aristarchus, a celebrated grammarian, who composed commentaries on Homer, Pindar, and others, none of which are extant.—6. Styled LITHOTOMUS, an eminent surgeon of Alexandria, celebrated for his skill in cutting for the stone.]

AMNISUS ('Αμνισός), a town in the north of Crete and the harbor of Cnosus, situated on a river of the same name, the nymphs of which, called Amnisiades, were in the service of Diana (Artemis).

AMOR, the god of love, had no place in the religion of the Romans, who only translate the Greek name Eros into Amor. Vid. EROS.

AMORGOS ('Αμοργος: now Amorgo), an island in the Grecian Archipelago, one of the Sporades, the birth-place of Simonides, and, under the Roman emperors, a place of banishment.

AMÖRÏUM ('Αμόριον), a city of Phrygia Major or Galatia, on the River Sangarius; the reputed birth-place of Æsop.

AMPE ('Αμπη, Herod., or AMPELÖNE (Plin.), a town at the mouth of the Tigris, where Darius I. planted the Milesians whom he removed from their own city after the Ionian revolt (B.C. 494).

AMPELIUS, L., the author of a small work, entitled Liber Memorialis, probably lived in the second or third century of the Christian era. His work is a sort of common-place book, containing a meagre summary of the most striking natural objects and of the most remarkable events, divided into fifty chapters. It is generally printed with Florus, and has been published separately by Beek, Lips., 1826.

AMPËLUS ('Αμπελος), a promontory at the extremity of the peninsula Sithonia in Chalcidice, in Macedonia, near Torone.—2. [A promontory of Crete, on the eastern coast south of Sammonium, with a city of same name, now probably Cape Sacro.—3. A mountain ending in a promontory in the Island of Samos, opposite Icaria, now Cape Dominico.]

AMPËLÛSIA ('Αμπελουσία: now C. Espartel), the promontory at the west end of the south or African coast of the Fretum Gaditanum (now Straits of Gibraltar). The natives of the country called it Cotes (αι Κώτες).

AMPHAXITIS ('Αμφαξιτις), a district of Mygdonia in Macedonia, at the mouths of the Axios and Echedorus.

AMPHËA ('Αμφεία: 'Αμφεύς), a small town of Messenia on the borders of Laconia and Messenia, conquered by the Spartans in the first Messenian war.

[AMPHILÄUS ('Αμφιάλος), a Phæacian, who gained the prize in the games, in which Ulysses took part (Od., viii., 114).]

[AMPHILÄNAX ('Αμφιλένας), king of Lycia, who received Prætus when driven out of Argolis, gave him his daughter Antea in marriage, and restored him to Argos.]

AMPHĪRÄUS ('Αμφίραος), son of Oicles and Hypermnestra, daughter of Thestius, was descended on his father's side from the famous seer Melampus, and was himself a great prophet and a great hero at Argos. By his wife Eriphyle, the sister of Adrastus, he was the father of Alemæon, Amphiarus, Eurydiee, and Demonassa. He took part in the hunt of the Calydonian boar and in the Argonautic voyage. He also joined Adrastus in the expedition against Thebes, although he foresaw its fatal termination, through the persuasions of his wife Eriphyle, who had been induced to persuade her husband by the necklace of Harmonia which Polynices had given her. On leaving Argos, however, he enjoined on his sons to punish their mother for his death. During the war against Thebes, Amphiarus fought bravely, but could not escape his fate. Pursued by Periclymenus, he fled toward the River Ismenius, and the earth swallowed him up, together with his chariot, before he was overtaken by his eunymy. Jupiter (Zeus) made him immortal, and henceforth he was worshipped as a hero, first at Oropus and afterward in all Greece. His oracle between Potniæ and Thebes, where he was said to have been swallowed up, enjoyed great celebrity. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. ORACULUM. His son, Alemæon, is called Amphiararides.

AMPHICLÆA OR AMPHICLĒA (Αμφικλαία; 'Αμφικλεία: 'Αμφικλείης: now Dhadhi or Ogouitza?), a town in the north of Phœcis, with an adytum of Bacchus (Dionysus), was called for a long time Ophiteia ('Οφιτεία), by command of the Amphictyons.

[AMPHICLUS ('Αμφικλος), a Trojan, slain by Meges.]

AMPHICTÏON ('Αμφικτύων), a son of Deuention and Pyrrha. Others represent him as a king of Attica, who expelled from the kingdom his father-in-law Cranaus, ruled for twelve years, and was then in turn expelled by Erichthonius. Many writers represent him as the founder of the amphictyony of Thermopylæ; in consequence of this belief a sanctuary of Amphictyony was built in the village of Anthela on the Asopus, which was the most ancient place of meeting of this amphictyony.

AMPHĪDÄMAS ('Αμφιδάμας), son, or, according to others, brother, of Lyeurgus, one of the Argonauts.—[2. Son of Busiris, king of Egypt, slain by Hercules along with his father. Vid. BUSIRIS.—3. A hero of Scandia in Cythera, to whom Atolycus sent a helmet set round with boar's tusks, afterward borne by Meriones be fore Troy.—4. A king of Chaleis in Eubœa: he fell in battle against the Erythreans, and his sons celebrated in his honor funereal games, at which Hesiod gained the first prize of poetry, viz., a golden tripod, which he dedicated to the Muses.]

[AMPHIDŌLI ('Αμφίδολοι), a city of Triphylian Elis.]

AMPHILOCHIA ('Αμφιλοχία), the country of the Amphilochi ('Αμφιλοχοί), an Epirot race, at the eastern end of the Ambracian Gulf, usually included in Acarnania. Their chief town was ARGOS AMPHILOCHICUM.

AMPHILŌCHUS ('Αμφιλόχος), son of Amphiarus and Eriphyle, and brother of Alemæon. He took an active part in the expedition of the Epigoni against Thebes, assisted his brother in the murder of their mother (vid. ALCMÆON), and afterward fought against Troy. On his return from Troy, together with Mopsus, who was, like himself, a seer, he founded the town of Mallos in Cilicia. Hence he proceeded to his native place, Argos, but returned to Mallos, where he was killed in single combat by Mopsus. Others relate (Thuc., ii., 68) that, after leaving Argos, Amphiloclus founded Argos Amphilocheum on the Ambracian Gulf. He was worshipped at Mallos in Cilicia, at Oropus, and at Athens.

AMPHILŪTUS ('Αμφιλύτος), a celebrated seer in the time of Pisistratus (B.C. 559), is called both an Acarnanian and an Athenian: he may have been an Acarnanian who received the franchise at Athens.

AMPHIMĀCHUS ('Αμφίμαχος). 1. Son of Cteatus, grandson of Neptune (Poseidon), one of the four leaders of the Epeans against Troy, was slain by Hector.—2. Son of Nomion, with his brother Nastes, led the Carians to the assistance of the Trojans, and was slain by Achilles.

AMPHIMALLA (τὰ 'Αμφίμαλλα), a town on the northern coast of Crete, on a bay called after it (now Gulf of Armiro).

[AMPHIMĀRUS ('Αμφίμαρος), son of Neptune, father of the mistrel Linus by Urania.]

AMPHIMĒDON ('Αμφιμέδων), of Ithaca, a guest-friend of Agamemnon, and a suitor of Penelope, was slain by Telemachus.—[2. A Libyan slain at the nuptials of Perseus.]

[AMPHINŌME ('Αμφινόμη), one of the Nereids.—2. Wife of Æson and mother of Jason, slew herself when Pelias had slain her husband.—3. Daughter of Pelias, married by Jason to Andraemon.]

[AMPHINŌMUS ('Αμφινόμος), son of Nisus of Dulichium, one of the suitors of Penelope, slain by Telemachus.]

AMPHION ('Αμφίων). 1. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Antiope, the daughter of Nycteus of Thebes, and twin-brother of Zethus. (Ov., Met., vi., 110, seq.) Amphion and Zethus were born either at Eleuthera in Bœotia or on Mount Cithæron, whither their mother had fled, and grew up among the shepherds, not knowing their descent. Mercury (Hermes) (according to others, Apollo, or the Muses) gave Amphion a lyre, who henceforth practiced song and music, while his brother spent his time in hunting and tending the flocks. (Hor., Ep., i., 18, 41.) Having become acquainted with their origin, they marched against Thebes, where Lycus reigned, the husband of their mother Antiope, whom he had repudiated, and had then married Dirce in her stead. They took the city, and as Lycus and Dirce had treated their mother with great cruelty, the two brothers killed them both. They put Dirce to death by tying her to a bull, who dragged her about till she perished; and they then threw her body into a well, which was from this time called the Well of Dirce. After they had obtained possession of Thebes, they fortified it by a wall. It is said that when Amphion played his lyre, the stones moved of their own accord and formed the wall (movit Amphion lapides canendo, Hor., Carm., iii., 11). Amphion afterward married Niobe, who bore him many sons and daughters, all of whom were killed by Apollo. His death is differently related: some say, that he killed himself from grief at the loss of his children (Ov., Met., vi., 270), and others tell us that he was killed by Apollo because he made an assault on the Pythian temple of the god. Amphion and his brother were buried at Thebes. The punishment inflicted upon Dirce is represented in the celebrated Farnese bull, the work of Apollonius and Tauriscus, which was discovered in 1546, and placed in the palace Farnese at Rome.—2. Son of Jasus and father of Chloris. In Homer, this Amphion, king of Orchomenos, is distinct from Amphion, the husband of Niobe; but in earlier traditions they seem to have been regarded as the same person.—[3. A leader of the Epeans before Troy.—4. Son of Hyperesius of Pallene, an Argonaut.—5. A king of Corinth, father of Labda.]

AMPHIPŌLIS ('Αμφίπολις: 'Αμφιπολίτης: now Neokhorio, in Turkish Jeni-Keui), a town in Macedonia on the left or eastern bank of the Strymon, just below its egress from the Lake Cereinitis, and about three miles from the sea. The Strymon flowed almost round the town, nearly forming a circle, whence its name Amphipolis. It was originally called 'Ενεα ὁδοί, "the Nine Ways," and belonged to the Edonians, a Thracian people. Aristagoras of Miletus first attempted to colonize it, but was cut off with his followers by the Edonians in B.C. 497. The Athenians made a next attempt with ten thousand colonists, but they were all destroyed by the Edonians in 465. In 437 the Athenians were more successful, and drove the Edonians out of the "Nine Ways," which was henceforth called Amphipolis. It was one of the most important of the Athenian possessions, being advantageously situated for trade on a navigable river in the midst of a fertile country, and near the gold mines of Mount Pangæus. Hence the indignation of the Athenians when it fell into the hands of Brasidas (B.C. 424) and of Philip (358). Under the Romans it was a free city, and the capital of Macedonia prima: the Via Egnatia ran through it. The port of Amphipolis was Eion.

AMPHIS ('Αμφίς), an Athenian comic poet, of the middle comedy, contemporary with the philosopher Plato. We have the titles of twenty-six of his plays, and a few fragments of them. [These fragments have been published by Meineke, Fragmenta Comicorum Græcorum, vol. i., p. 645-656, edit. minor.]

eri Ozolæ on the borders of Phocis, seven miles from Delphi, said to have been named after Amphissa, daughter of Macareus, and beloved by Apollo. In consequence of the Sacred War declared against Amphissa by the Amphictyons, the town was destroyed by Philip, B.C. 338, but it was soon afterward rebuilt, and under the Romans was a free state.

AMPHISTRATUS ('Αμφίστρατος) and his brother Rheceas, the charioteers of the Dioscuri, were said to have taken part in the expedition of Jason to Colchis, and to have occupied a part of that country which was called after them Heni-ochia, as heniochus (ἡνίοχος) signifies a charioteer.

[AMPHITHEA ('Αμφιθέα), wife of Autolyces, grandmother of Ulysses.—2. Wife of Adrastus.]

[AMPHITHEMIS ('Αμφίθεμις), son of Apollo and Acaëllis, and father of Nasamon and Capharus by Tritonis.—2. A Theban general, who received money sent by the Persians into Greece to excite disturbances there, for the purpose of causing the recall of Agesilaus from Asia.]

[AMPHITHOË ('Αμφιθόη), one of the Nereids.]

AMPHITRITE ('Αμφιτριτή), a Nereid or an Oceanid, wife of Neptune (Poseidon) and goddess of the sea, especially of the Mediterranean. In Homer Amphitrite is merely the name of the sea, and she first occurs as a goddess in Hesiod. Later poets again use the word as equivalent to the sea in general. She became by Neptune (Poseidon) the mother of Triton, Rhode or Rhodos, and Benthesisyme.

AMPHITRŌPE ('Αμφιτρόπη 'Αμφίτροπαιεύς), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Antiochis, in the neighborhood of the silver-mines of Laurium.

AMPHITRYŌN or AMPHITRŌO ('Αμφιτρύων), son of Alcæus, king of Tiryns, and Hippoënone. Alcæus had a brother Electryon, who reigned at Mycænæ. Between Electryon and Pterelaus, king of the Taphians, a furious war raged, in which Electryon lost all his sons except Lieymnius, and was robbed of his oxen. Amphitryon recovered the oxen, but on his return to Mycænæ accidentally killed his uncle Electryon. He was now expelled from Mycænæ, together with Alcmene the daughter of Electryon, by Sthenclus the brother of Electryon, and went to Thebes, where he was purified by Creon. In order to win the hand of Alcmene, Amphitryon prepared to avenge the death of Alcmene's brothers on the Taphians, and conquered them, after Comætho, the daughter of Pterelaus, through her love for Amphitryon, cut off the one golden hair on her father's head, which rendered him immortal. During the absence of Amphitryon from Thebes, Jupiter visited ALCMENE, who became by the god the mother of Hercules; the latter is called Amphitryoniades in allusion to his reputed father. Amphitryon fell in a war against Erginus, king of the Miuyans. The comedy of Plautus, called Amphitruo, is a ludicrous representation of the visit of Jupiter (Zeus) to Alcmene in the disguise of her lover Amphitryon.

[AMPHIUS ('Αμφίος), son of Lelagus, an ally of the Trojans, slain by the Telamonian Ajax.—2. Son of Merops, the celebrated seer, against whose wish his two sons Amphius and Adrastus went to the Trojan war: they were both slain by Diomedes.]

AMPHŌTĒRUS ('Αμφότερος). Vid. ACARNAN.—[2. A Trojan slain by Patroclus.]

AMPHŪYSUS ('Αμφύρυσός). 1. A small river in Thessaly which flowed into the Pagasæan Gulf, on the banks of which Apollo fed the herds of Admetus (pastor ab Amphryso, Virg., Georg., iii, 2).—2. Vid. AMBRYSUS.

[AMPIUS BALBUS, T. Vid. BALBUS.]

AMPSAGA (now Wad-el-Kabir, or Suffimar), a river of Northern Africa, which divided Numidia from Mauretania Sitifensis. It flows past the town of Cirta (now Constantina).

AMPSANCTUS or AMSANCTUS LACUS (now Lago d'Ansanti or Mufiti), a small lake in Samnium near Æleulauum, from which mephitic vapors arose. Near it was a chapel sacred to Mephitis, with a cavern from which mephitic vapors also came, and which was therefore regarded as an entrance to the lower world. (Virg., Æn., vii, 563, seq.)

AMPSIVARII. Vid. ANSIBARII.

AMPYCUS ('Αμπυκος). 1. Son of Pelias, husband of Chloris, and father of the famous seer Mopsus, who is hence called Ampycideus. Pausanias calls him Ampyx.—2. Son of Iapetus, a bard and priest of Ceres, killed by Pectalus at the marriage of Perseus.

AMPYX. Vid. AMPYCUS.—[2. A friend of Phineus, changed to stone by Perseus by the head of Medusa.—3. One of the Lapithæ, who slew the Centaur Cælus at the nuptials of Pirithous.]

AMŪLIUS. Vid. ROMULUS.

AMYCLÆ. 1. ('Αμύκλαι: 'Αμυκλαιεύς, 'Αμυκλαιός: now Sklavokhori or Aia Kyriaki?), an ancient town of Laconia on the Eurotas, in a beautiful country, twenty miles southeast of Sparta. It is mentioned in the Iliad (ii, 584), and is said to have been founded by the ancient Laedæmonian King Amyclas, father of Hyacinthus, and to have been the abode of Tyndarus, and of Castor and Pollux, who are hence called Amyclæi Fratres. After the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, the Achæans maintained themselves in Amyclæ for a long time; and it was only shortly before the first Messenian war that the town was taken and destroyed by the Laedæmonians under Teleclus. The tale ran that the inhabitants had been so often alarmed by false reports of the approach of the enemy, that they passed a law that no one should speak of the enemy; and accordingly, when the Laedæmonians at last came, and no one dared to announce their approach, "Amyclæ perished through silence;" hence arose the proverb Amyclæi ipsis taciturnior. After its destruction by the Laedæmonians Amyclæ became a village, and was only memorable by the festival of the Hyacinthia (vid. Dict. of Antig., s. v.) celebrated at the place annually, and by the temple and colossal statue of Apollo, who was hence called Amyclæus.—2. (Amyclanus), an ancient town of Latium, east of Terracina, on the Sinus Amyclanus, was, according to tradition, an Achæan colony from Laconia. In the time of Augustus the town had disappeared; the inhabitants were said to have deserted it on account of its being infested by serpents; whence Virgil (Æn., x, 564) speaks of tacitæ Amyclæ, though some commentators suppose that he transfers to this town the epithet be-singing to the Amyclæ in Laconia (No. 1). Near Amyclæ was the Spelunca (Sperlonga), or natural grotto, a favorite retreat of the Emperor Tiberius.

AMYCLAS. Vid. AMYCLÆ.

AMYCLIDES, a name of Hyacinthus, as the son of Amyclas.

AMŶCUS (Ἀμυκος), son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Bithynis, king of the Bebryces, was celebrated for his skill in boxing, and used to challenge strangers to box with him. When the Argonauts came to his dominions, Pollux accepted the challenge and killed him.

[AMŶDON (Ἀμυδών), an ancient city of Pæonia in Macedonia, on the Axios, spoken of by Homer (Il., ii., 849).]

AMŶMONE (Ἀμυμώνη), one of the daughters of Danaus and Elephantis. When Danaus arrived in Argos, the country was suffering from a drought, and Danaus sent out Amymone to fetch water. She was attacked by a satyr, but was rescued from his violence by Neptune (Poseidon), who appropriated her to himself, and then showed her the wells at Lerna. According to another account, he bade her draw his trident from the rock, from which a three-fold spring gushed forth, which was called after her the Well and River of Amymone. Her son by Neptune (Poseidon) was called Nanplius.

AMYNANDER (Ἀμυνανδρος), king of the Athamans in Epirus, an ally of the Romans in their war with Philip of Macedonia, about B.C. 198, but an ally of Antiochus, B.C. 189.

AMŶNTAS (Ἀμύντας). I. I. King of Macedonia, reigned from about B.C. 540 to 500, and was succeeded by his son Alexander I.—2. II. King of Macedonia, son of Philip, the brother of Perdiccas II., reigned B.C. 393–369, and obtained the crown by the murder of the usurper Pausanias. Soon after his accession he was driven from Macedonia by the Illyrians, but was restored to his kingdom by the Thessalians. On his return he was engaged in war with the Olynthians, in which he was assisted by the Spartans, and by their aid Olynthus was reduced in 379. Amyntas united himself also with Jason of Pheræ, and carefully cultivated the friendship of Athens. Amyntas left by his wife Euridice three sons, Alexander, Perdiccas, and the famous Philip.—3. Grandson of Amyntas II., was excluded by Philip from the succession on the death of his father, Perdiccas III., in B.C. 360. He was put to death in the first year of the reign of Alexander the Great, 336, for a plot against the king's life.—4. A Macedonian officer in Alexander's army, son of Andromenes. He and his brothers were accused of being privy to the conspiracy of Philotas in 330, but were acquitted. Some little time after he was killed at the siege of a village.—5. A Macedonian traitor, son of Antiochus, took refuge at the court of Darius, and became one of the commanders of the Greek mercenaries. He was present at the battle of Issus (B.C. 333), and afterward fled to Egypt, where he was put to death by Mazæus, the Persian governor.—6. A king of Galatia, supported Antony, and fought on his side against Augustus at the battle of Actium (B.C. 31). He fell in an expedition against the town of Homonada or Homona.—7. A Greek writer of a work entitled Stathmi.

(Σταθμοί) probably on account of the different halting-places of Alexander the Great in his Asiatic expedition.

AMŶNTOR (Ἀμύντωρ), son of Ormentus of Eleon in Thessaly, where Autolyceus broke into his house, and father of PHŶNIX, whom he ensnared on account of unlawful intercourse with his mistress. According to Apollodorus he was a king of Ormenium, and was slain by Hercules, to whom he refused a passage through his dominions, and the hand of his daughter ASTYDAMIA. According to Ovid (Met., xii., 364), he was king of the Dolopes.

AMŶRTÆUS (Ἀμυρταῖος), an Egyptian, assumed the title of king, and joined Inarus the Libyan in the revolt against the Persians in B.C. 460. They at first defeated the Persians (vid. ACHEMENES), but were subsequently totally defeated, 455. Amyrtaeus escaped, and maintained himself as king in the marshy districts of Lower Egypt till about 414, when the Egyptians expelled the Persians, and Amyrtaeus reigned six years.

AMŶRUS (Ἀμυρος), a river in Thessaly, with a town of the same name upon it, flowing into the Lake Bæbeis: the country around was called the Ἀμυρικὸν πεδῖον.

AMŶTHÆON (Ἀμυθίων), son of Cretheus and Tyro, father of Bias and of the seer Melampus, who is hence called Amythæônus (Virg., Georg., iii., 550). He dwelt at Pylus in Messenia, and is mentioned among those to whom the restoration of the Olympian games was ascribed.

ANÆBON (Ἀνάβων), a district of the Persian province of Aria, south of Aria Proper, containing four towns, which still exist, Pira (now Ferrah), Bis (now Beest or Bost), Gari (now Ghore), Nil (now Neh).

[ANABŪRA (τὰ Ἀνάβουρα), a city of Pisidia.]

ANÆCES (Ἀνακες). Vid. ANAX, No. 2.

ANACHARSIS (Ἀναχάρσις), a Scythian of princely rank, left his native country to travel in pursuit of knowledge, and came to Athens about B.C. 594. He became acquainted with Solon, and by his talents and acute observations, he excited general admiration. The fame of his wisdom was such, that he was even reckoned by some among the seven sages. He was killed by his brother Saulius on his return to his native country. Cicero (Tusc. Disp., v., 32) quotes from one of his letters, of which several, but spurious, are still extant.

ANACREON (Ἀνακρέων), a celebrated lyric poet, born at Teos, an Ionian city in Asia Minor. He removed from his native city, with the great body of its inhabitants, to Abdera, in Thrace, when Teos was taken by the Persians (about B.C. 540), but lived chiefly at Samos, under the patronage of Polycrates, in whose praise he wrote many songs. After the death of Polycrates (522), he went to Athens at the invitation of the tyrant Hipparchus, where he became acquainted with Simonides and other poets. He died at the age of eighty-five, probably about 478, but the place of his death is uncertain. The universal tradition of antiquity represents Anacreon as a consummate voluptuary, and his poems prove the truth of the tradition. He sings of love and wine with hearty good will; and we see in him the luxury of the Ionian inflamed by the fervor of the poet. The tale that Le loved Sappho is very improbable. Of his poems only a few genuine fragments have come down to us: for the "Odes" attributed to him are now admitted to be spurious.—Editions: By Fischer, Lips., 1793; Bergk, Lips., 1834.

ANACTORIUM ('Ανακτόριον: 'Ανακτόριος), a town in Acarnania, built by the Corinthians, upon a promontory of the same name (near La Madonna) at the entrance of the Ambracian Gulf. Its inhabitants were removed by Augustus after the battle of Actium (B.C. 31) to Nicopolis.

ANADYOMĒNE ('Αναδυομένη), the goddess rising out of the sea, a surname given to Venus (Aphrodite), in allusion to the story of her being born from the foam of the sea. This surname had not much celebrity before the time of Apelles, but his famous painting of Aphrodite Anadyomene excited the emulation of other artists, painters as well as sculptors. Vid. APHELLES.

[ANĒA OR ANNĒA ('Ανάα or 'Αναία), a Carian city on the Ionian coast of Asia Minor, opposite the Island of Samos, deriving its name from an Amazon, Anaa: it was the place of refuge in the Peloponnesian war for the Samian exiles.]

ANAGNĪA (Anagninus: now Anagni), an ancient town of Latium, the chief town of the Hernici, and subsequently both a municipium and a Roman colony. It lay in a very beautiful and fertile country on a hill, at the foot of which the Via Lavicana and Via Praenestina united (now Compositum Anagninum). In the neighborhood Cicero had a beautiful estate, Anagninum (sc. praedium).

ANAGYRUS ('Αναγυρός, οὔντος: 'Αναγυράσιος, 'Αναγυροντόθεν: ruins near Vari), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Erechtheis, not, as some say, Æantis, south of Athens, near the Promontory Zoster.

ANAITĪA ('Αναϊτική), a district of Armenia, in which the goddess Anaitis was worshipped; also called Acilisene.

ANAITIS ('Αναϊτις) an Asiatic divinity, whose name is also written Anaa, Anaitis, Tanaïs, or Nanaa. Her worship prevailed in Armenia, Cappadocia, Assyria, Persis, &c., and seems to have been a part of the worship so common among the Asiaties, of the creative powers of nature, both male and female. The Greek writers sometimes identify Anaitis with Diana (Artemis), and sometimes with Venus (Aphrodite).

ANAMARI OR -RES, a Gallic people in the plain of the Po, in whose laud the Romans founded Placentia.

ANĀNES, a Gallic people west of the Trebia, between the Po and the Apennines.

ANAXĪUS ('Ανάγιος), a Greek iambic poet, contemporary with Hipponax, about B.C. 540. [His remains have been collected by Welcker, and published at the end of his edition of Hipponax, q. v.]

ANAPHĪE ('Ανάφη: 'Αναφαίος: now Anaphi, Nanfō), a small island in the south of the Ægean Sea, east of Thera, with a temple of Apollo Ægletes, who was hence called Anaphēus.

ANAPHLYSTUS ('Ανάφλυστος: 'Αναφλύστιος: now Anavlyso), an Attic demus of the tribe Antiochis on the southwest coast of Attica, opposite the Island Eleussa, called after Anaphlytus, son of Neptune (Poseidon).

ANĀPUS ('Αναπος). 1. A river in Acarnania flowing into the Æchelous.—2. (Now Anapo), a river in Sicily, flowing into the sea south of Syracuse through the marshes of Lysimelia.

ANARTES OR -TI, a people of Dacia, north of the Theiss.

ANAS ('Ανας: now Guadiana), one of the chief rivers of Spain, rising in Celtiberia in the mountains near Laminium, formed the boundary between Lusitania and Bætica, and flowed into the ocean by two mouths (now only one).

[ANASSUS (now Stella), a small river in the territory of the Veneti.]

ANATOLIUS. 1. Bishop of Laodicea, A.D. 270, an Alexandrian by birth, was the author of several mathematical and arithmetical works, of which some fragments have been preserved.—2. An eminent jurist, was a native of Berytus, and afterward P. P. (praefectus pratorio) of Illyricum. He died in A.D. 361. A work on agriculture, often cited in the Geoponica, and a treatise concerning Sympathies and Antipathies, are assigned by many to this Anatolius. The latter work, however, was probably written by Anatolius the philosopher, who was the master of Iamblichus, and to whom Porphyry addressed Homeric Questions.—3. Professor of law at Berytus, is mentioned by Justinian among those who were employed in compiling the Digest. He wrote notes on the Digest, and a very concise commentary on Justinian's Code. Both of these works are cited in the Basilica. He perished A.D. 557, in an earthquake at Byzantium, whether he had removed from Berytus.

ANAURUS ('Αναυρός), a river of Thessaly flowing into the Pagasæan Gulf. [It was in this stream that Jason lost his sandal, and thus fulfilled the words of the oracle. Vid. JASON.]

ANĀVA ('Αναβα), an ancient, but early decayed city of Great Phrygia, on the salt lake of the same name, between Celænæ and Colossæ (now Hagee Ghioul).

ANAX ('Αναξ). 1. A giant, son of Uranus and Gæa, and father of Asterius.—2. An epithet of the gods in general, characterizing them as the rulers of the world; but the plural forms, 'Ανακες, or 'Ανακτες, or 'Ανακες παίδες, were used to designate the Dioscuri.

ANAXĀGŌRAS ('Αναξαγόρας), a celebrated Greek philosopher of the Ionian school, was born at Clazomenæ in Ionia, B.C. 500. He gave up his property to his relations, as he intended to devote his life to higher ends, and went to Athens at the age of twenty; here he remained thirty years, and became the intimate friend and teacher of the most eminent men of the time, such as Euripides and Pericles. His doctrines gave offence to the religious feelings of the Athenians; and the enmities of Pericles availed themselves of this circumstance to accuse him of impiety, B.C. 450. It was only through the eloquence of Pericles that he was not put to death; but he was sentenced to pay a fine of five talents, and to quit Athens. He retired to Lampsacus, where he died in 428, at the age of seventy-two. Anaxagoras was dissatisfied with the systems of his predecessors, the Ionic philosophers, and struck into a new path. The Ionic philosophers had endeavored to explain nature and its various phenomena by regarding matter in its different forms and modifications as the cause of all things. ANAXAGORAS, on the other hand, conceived the necessity of seeking a higher cause, independent of matter, and this cause he considered to be nous (νοῦς), that is, mind, thought, or intelligence. [Editions of the fragments by Schaubach, Lips., 1827, and by Schorn, Bonn, 1829.—2. Son of ARGÆUS, grandson of Megapenthes, monarch of Argos. He shared the sovereign power with Bias and Melampus, who had cured the Argive women of madness.—3. An Athenian orator, pupil of Isocrates.]

ANAXANDER (Ἀνάξανδρος), king of Sparta, son of Euryerates, fought in the second Messenian war, about B.C. 668.

ANAXANDRIDES (Ἀναξανδρίδης). 1. Son of Theopompus, king of Sparta.—2. King of Sparta, son of Leon, reigned from about B.C. 560 to 520. Having a barren wife whom he would not divorce, the ephors made him take with her a second. By her he had Cleomenes; and after this by his first wife, Dorieus, Leonidas, and Cleombrotus.—3. An Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, a native of Camirus in Rhodes, began to exhibit comedies in B.C. 376. Aristotle held him in high esteem. [The fragments of his plays are collected in Meineke's Fragmenta Comicorum Græc., vol. i., p. 574-594, edit. minor.]

ANAXARCHUS (Ἀναξαρχός), a philosopher of Abdera, of the school of Democritus, accompanied Alexander into Asia (B.C. 384), and gained his favor by flattery and wit. After the death of Alexander (323), Anaxarchus was thrown by shipwreck into the power of Nicocreon, king of Cyprus, to whom he had given mortal offence, and who had him pounded to death in a stone mortar.

ANAXARÈTE (Ἀναξαρέτη), a maiden of Cyprus, remained unmoved by the love of Iphis, who at last, in despair, hung himself at her door. She looked with indifference at the funeral of the youth, but Venus changed her into a stone statue.

ANAXIBIA (Ἀναξίβια), daughter of Plisthenes, sister of Agamemnon, wife of Strophilus, and mother of Pylades.—[2. Daughter of Bias, wife of Pelias of Iolcos, and mother of Acastus, Pisdice, Hippothoë, and Alestis.]

ANAXIBIUS (Ἀναξίβιος), the Spartan admiral stationed at Byzantium on the return of the Cyprian Greeks from Asia, B.C. 400. In 389 he succeeded Dercyllidas in the command in the Ægean, but fell in battle against Iphierates, near Antandrus, in 388.

ANAXIDAMUS (Ἀναξίδαμος), king of Sparta, son of Zeuxidamus, lived to the conclusion of the second Messenian war, B.C. 668.

ANAXILÆUS (Ἀναξίλαος), or ANAXILAS (Ἀναξίλαος). 1. Tyrant of Rhegium, of Messenian origin, took possession of Zancle in Sicily about B.C. 494, peopled it with fresh inhabitants, and changed its name into Messene. He died in 476.—2. Of Byzantium, surrendered Byzantium to the Athenians in B.C. 408.—3. An Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, contemporary with Plato and Demosthenes. We have a few fragments, and the titles of nineteen of his comedies. [His fragments are collected by Meineke in his Fragmenta Comicorum Græc., vol. ii., p. 667-675, edit. minor.]—4. A physician and Pythagorean philosopher, born at Larissa, was banished by Augustus from Italy, B.C. 28, on the charge of magic.

ANAXIMANDER (Ἀναξίμανδρος), of Miletus, was born B.C. 610 and died 547, in his sixty-fourth year. He was one of the earliest philosophers of the Ionian school, and the immediate successor of Thales, its first founder. He first used the word ἀρχή to denote the origin of things, or rather the material out of which they were formed; he held that this ἀρχή was the infinite (τὸ ἀπειρον), everlasting, and divine, though not attributing to it a spiritual or intelligent nature; and that it was the substance into which all things were resolved on their dissolution. He was a careful observer of nature, and was distinguished by his astronomical, mathematical, and geographical knowledge: he is said to have introduced the use of the gnomon into Greece.

ANAXIMÈNES (Ἀναξίμηνος). 1. Of Miletus, the third in the series of Ionian philosophers, flourished about B.C. 544; but as he was the teacher of Anaxagoras B.C. 480, he must have lived to a great age. He considered air to be the first cause of all things, the primary form, as it were, of matter, into which the other elements of the universe were resolvable.—2. Of Lampsaenus, accompanied Alexander the Great to Asia (B.C. 334), and wrote a history of Philip of Macedonia; a history of Alexander the Great; and a history of Greece, in twelve books, from the earliest mythical age down to the death of Epaminondas. He also enjoyed great reputation as a rhetorician, and is the author of a scientific treatise on rhetoric, the Ῥητορικὴ πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον, usually printed among the works of Aristotle. He was an enemy of Theophrastus, and published under the name of the latter a work calumniating Sparta, Athens, and Thebes, which produced great exasperation against Theophrastus. [The Ars Rhetorica, edited by L. Spengel, Turin, 1844; the fragments of the history of Alexander, by Geier, in his "Scriptores Historiarum Alexandri M. ætate suppreses," Lips., 1844.]

ANAXIPPUS (Ἀναξίππος). 1. A general of Alexander the Great.—2. A comic poet of the new comedy, who flourished about B.C. 303. The titles of four of his plays have come down to us: his fragments are collected by Meineke, Fragmenta Comicorum Græc., vol. ii., p. 1112-1116, edit. minor, who adds a fragment from Athenæus, attributed to Anthippus in the ordinary text, but supposed to be an error for Anaxippus.]

ANAZARBUS or -A (Ἀναζαρβός or -ά: Ἀναζαρβός, Anazarbēnus; ruins at Anasarba or Naversa), a considerable city of Cilicia Campestris, on the left bank of the River Pyramus, at the foot of a mountain of the same name. Augustus conferred upon it the name of Cæsarea (ad Anazarbum); and, on the division of Cilicia into the two provinces of Prima and Secunda, it was made the capital of the latter. It was almost destroyed by earthquakes in the reigns of Justinian and Justin. [It was the birth-place of Dioscorides and Oppian.]

ANÆUS (Ἀγκαῖος). 1. Son of the Arcadian Lyeurgus and Cleophile or Eurynome, and fa-

(ler of Agapenor. He was one of the Argonauts, and took part in the Calydonian hunt, in which he was killed by the boar.—2. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Astypalæa or Alta, king of the Leleges in Samos, husband of Samia, and father of Perilaus, Enodos, Samos, Alitherses, and Parthenope. He seems to have been confounded by some mythographers with Anceus, the son of Lycurgus. The son of Neptune (Poseidon) is also represented as one of the Argonauts, and is said to have become the helmsman of the ship Argo after the death of Tiphys. A well-known proverb is said to have originated with this Anceus. He had been told by a seer that he would not live to taste the wine of his vineyard; and when he was afterward on the point of drinking a cup of wine, the growth of his own vineyard, he laughed at the seer, who, however, answered, πολλὰ μετὰ πύλει κύλικος καὶ χεῖλος ἄρου, "There is many a slip between the cup and the lip." At the same instant Anceus was informed that a wild boar was near. He put down his cup, went out against the animal, and was killed by it.

ANCALITES, a people of Britain, probably a part of the ATREBATES.

ANCHARIUS, Q., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 59, took an active part in opposing the agrarian law of Cæsar. He was prætor in 56, and succeeded L. PISO in the province of Macedonia.

[ANCHEMALUS, son of Rhætus, king of the Marrubii in Italy, was expelled by his father for criminal conduct toward his step-mother, fled to TURBUS, and was slain by Pallas, son of Evander, in the war with Æneas.]

ANCHESMUS (Ἀγχεσμός), a hill not far from Athens, with a temple of Jupiter (Zeus), who was hence called Anchesmius.

ANCHIÆLE and -LUS (Ἀγχιῶλη). 1. (Now Akiadi), a town in Thrace on the Black Sea, on the borders of Mæsia.—2. Also ANCHIALOS, an ancient city of Cilicia, west of the Cydnus near the coast, said to have been built by Sardana-palus.

[ANCHIÆLUS (Ἀγχίαλος). 1. King of the Taphians, father of Menetes, united in guest-friendship with Ulysses.—2. A Greek, slain by Hector before Troy.—3. A Phæacian. All these are mentioned in Homer.]

ANCHISES (Ἀγχίσης), son of Capys and Themis, the daughter of Ius, king of Dardanus on Mount Ida. In beauty he equalled the immortal gods, and was beloved by Venus (Aphrodite), by whom he became the father of Æneas, who is hence called Anchisiades. The goddess warned him never to betray the real mother of the child; but as on one occasion he boasted of his intercourse with the goddess, he was struck by a flash of lightning, which, according to some traditions, killed, but according to others, only blinded or lamed him. Virgil, in his Æneid, makes Anchises survive the capture of Troy, and Æneas carries his father on his shoulders from the burning city. He further relates that Anchises died soon after the first arrival of Æneas in Sicily, and was buried on Mount Eryx. This tradition seems to have been believed in Sicily, for Anchises had a sanctuary at Egesta, and the funeral games celebrated in Sicily in his honor continued down to a late period.

ANCHISIÆ (Ἀγχισία), a mountain in Arcadia, northwest of Mantinea; where Anchises is said to have been buried, according to one tradition.

[ANCHÛRUS (Ἀγχουρος), son of Midas, king of Phrygia. A large chasm having opened near Celæne, Anchurus threw himself into it, as an oracle had said that it would not close until he had thrown what he regarded as most precious into it. On this the chasm closed immediately.]

ANCON (Λευκοσύρων Ἀγκών), a harbor and town at the mouth of the River Iris (now Yeshil ernaik) in Pontus.

ANCONA or ANCON (Ἀγκών : Anconitanus : now Ancona), a town in Picenum on the Adriatic Sea, lying in a bend of the coast between two promontories, and hence called Ancon or an "elbow." It was built by the Syracusans, who settled there about B.C. 392, discontented with the rule of the elder Dionysius; and under the Romans, who made it a colony, it became one of the most important sea-ports of the Adriatic. It possessed an excellent harbor, completed by Trajan, and it carried on an active trade with the opposite coast of Illyricum. The town was celebrated for its temple of Venus and its purple dye: the surrounding country produced good wine and wheat.

ANCONARIUS MONS, a mountain in Manretania Cæsariensis, south of Cæsarea, abounding in citron trees, the wood of which was used by the Romans for furniture.

ANCONÆ. Vid. NICÆA.

ANCOUS MARCIUS, fourth king of Rome, reigned twenty-four years, B.C. 640–616, and is said to have been the son of Numa's daughter. He conquered the Latins, took many Latin towns, transported the inhabitants to Rome, and gave them the Aventine to dwell on: these conquered Latins formed the original Plebs. He also founded a colony at Ostia, at the mouth of the Tiber; built a fortress on the Janiculum as a protection against Etruria, and united it with the city by a bridge across the Tiber; dug the ditch of the Quirites, which was a defence for the open ground between the Cælian and the Palatine; and built a prison. He was succeeded by Tarquinius Priscus.

ANCYRA (Ἀγκυρα : Ἀγκυρανός, Ancyranus). 1. (Now Anqora), a city of Galatia in Asia Minor, in 39° 56' north latitude. In the time of Augustus, when Galatia became a Roman province, Ancyra was the capital: it was originally the chief city of a Gallic tribe named the Teetosages, who came from the south of France. Under the Roman empire it had the name of Sebaste, which in Greek is equivalent to Augusta in Latin. When Augustus recorded the chief events of his life on bronze tablets at Rome, the citizens of Ancyra had a copy made, which was cut on marble blocks and placed at Ancyra in a temple dedicated to Augustus and Rome. This inscription is called the Monumentum Ancyranum. The Latin inscription was first copied by Tournefort in 1701, and it has been copied several times since. One of the latest copies has been made by Mr. Hamilton, who also copied as much of the Greek inscription as is legible. [Near this place Bajazet was defeated and made prisoner by Timur, or, as he is commonly called, Tamerlane].—2. A town in Phrygia Epictetus, on the borders of Mysia.

ANDANIA ('Ανδανία: 'Ανδανεύς, 'Ανδάνιος: [now Andorossa, and the ruins near Crano]), a town in Messenia, between Megalopolis and Messene, the capital of the kings of the race of the Leleges, abandoned by its inhabitants in the second Messenian war, and from that time only a village.

ANDĒCĀVI, ANDĒGĀVI, or ANDES, a Gallic people north of the Loire, with a town of the same name, also called Juliomagus, now Angers.

ANDEMATUNNUM. Vid. LINGONES.

ANDĒRA (τὴ 'Ανδείρα: 'Ανδείρηός), a city of Mysia, celebrated for its temple of Cybele, surnamed 'Ανδείρηή.

ANDĒRITUM (now Anterieux), a town of the Gabali in Aquitania.

ANDES. 1. Vid. ANDECAVI.—2. Now Pietola, a village near Mantua, the birth-place of Virgil.

ANDŌCĪDES ('Ανθοκίδης), one of the ten Attic orators, son of Leogoras, was born at Athens in B.C. 467. He belonged to a noble family, and was a supporter of the oligarchical party at Athens. In 436 he was one of the commanders of the fleet sent by the Athenians to the assistance of the Coreyreans against the Corinthians. In 415 he became involved in the charge brought against Alcibiades for having profaned the mysteries and mutilated the Hermæ, and was thrown into prison; but he recovered his liberty by promising to reveal the names of the real perpetrators of the crime. He is said to have denounced his own father among others, but to have rescued him again in the hour of danger. But as Andocides was unable to clear himself entirely, he was deprived of his rights as a citizen, and left Athens. He returned to Athens on the establishment of the government of the Four Hundred in 411, but was soon obliged to fly again. In the following year he ventured once more to return to Athens, and it was at this time that he delivered the speech, still extant, On his Return, in which he petitioned for permission to reside at Athens, but in vain. He was thus driven into exile a third time, and went to reside at Elis. In 403 he again returned to Athens upon the overthrow of the tyranny of the Thirty by Thrasybulus, and the proclamation of the general amnesty. He was now allowed to remain quietly at Athens for the next three years, but in 400 his enemies accused him of having profaned the mysteries: he defended himself in the oration still extant, On the Mysteries, and was acquitted. In 394 he was sent as ambassador to Sparta to conclude a peace, and on his return in 393 he was accused of illegal conduct during his embassy (παραπρεβείας); he defended himself in the extant speech On the Peace with Lacedæmon, but was found guilty, and sent into exile for the fourth time. He seems to have died soon afterwards in exile. Besides the three orations already mentioned, there is a fourth against Alcibiades, said to have been delivered in 415, but which is in all probability spurious—Editions: In the collections of the Greek orators; also, separately by Baïter and Sauppe, Zürich, 1838.

ANDRĒMON ('Ανδραίμων). 1. Husband of Gorge, daughter of Eneus, king of Calydon, in Ætolia, whom he succeeded, and father of Thoas, who is hence called Andramonides.—2. Son of Oxylus, and husband of Dryope, who was mother of Amphiaraus by Apollo.

[ANDRIACA ('Ανδριακή: now Andraki), port of Myra in Lycia.]

ANDRISCUS ('Ανδρίσκος), a man of low origin, who pretended to be a natural son of Perseus, king of Macedonia, was seized by Demetrius, king of Syria, and sent to Rome. He escaped from Rome, assumed the name of Philip, and obtained possession of Macedonia, B.C. 149. He defeated the prætor Juventius, but was conquered by Cæcilius Metellus, and taken to Rome to adorn the triumph of the latter, 148.

ANDRŌCLES ('Ανδροκλής), an Athenian demagogue and orator. He was an enemy of Alcibiades; and it was chiefly owing to his exertions that Alcibiades was banished. After this event, Androcles was for a time at the head of the democratical party; but in B.C. 411 he was put to death by the oligarchical government of the Four Hundred.

[ANDROCLĪDES ('Ανδροκλείδης), a Theban officer, one of those who received money from the Persians to induce the Thebans to make war on Sparta, so as to bring about the recall of Agesilaus from Asia.]

ANDROCLUS (('Ανδροκλος). 1. Son of Codrus, leader of a colony of Ionians to Asia Minor, and founder of Ephesus.—2. The slave of a Roman consular, was sentenced to be exposed to the wild beasts in the circus; but a lion which was let loose upon him, instead of springing upon his victim, exhibited signs of recognition, and began licking him. Upon inquiry, it appeared that Androelus had been compelled by the severity of his master, while in Africa, to run away from him. Having one day taken refuge in a cave from the heat of the sun, a lion entered, apparently in great pain, and, seeing him, went up to him and held out his paw. Androelus found that a large thorn had pierced it, which he drew out, and the lion was soon able to use his paw again. They lived together for some time in the cave, the lion catering for his benefactor. But at last, tired of this savage life, Androelus left the cave, was apprehended by some soldiers, brought to Rome, and condemned to the wild beasts. He was pardoned, and presented with the lion, which he used to lead about the city.

[ANDROCRĀTES ('Ανδροκράτης), an ancient hero of the Platæans, who had a temple consecrated to him at Platææ.]

ANDRŌGĒŌS ('Ανδρόγεος), son of Minos and Pasiphaë, or Crete, conquered all his opponents in the games of the Panathenæa at Athens. This extraordinary good luck, however, became the cause of his destruction, though the mode of his death is related differently. According to some accounts, Ægeus sent the man he dreaded to fight against the Marathonian bull, who killed him; according to others, he was assassinated by his defeated rivals on his road to Thebes, whither he was going to take part in a solemn contest. A third account related that he was assassinated by Ægeus himself. Minos made war on the Athenians in consequence of the death of his son, and imposed upon them the shameful tribute, from which they were delivered by THESEUS. He was worshipped in Attica as a hero, and games were celebrated in his honor every year in the Cerameius. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. ANDROGEONIA.

ANDRŌMĀCHE (Ἀνδρομάχη), daughter of Eëtion, king of the Cilician Thebe, and one of the noblest and most amiable female characters in the Iliad. Her father and her seven brothers were slain by Aëhilles at the taking of Thebe, and her mother, who had purchased her freedom by a large ransom, was killed by Diana (Artemis). She was married to Hector, by whom she had a son, Scamandrius (Astyanax), and for whom she entertained the tenderest love. On the taking of Troy her son was hurled from the wall of the city, and she herself fell to the share of Neoptolemus (Pyrrhus), the son of Aëhilles, who took her to Epirus, and to whom she bore three sons, Molossus, Pielus, and Pergamus. She afterward married Helenus, a brother of Hector, who ruled over Chaonia, a part of Epirus, and to whom she bore Cestrius. After the death of Helenus, she followed her son Pergamus to Asia, where a heroum was erected to her.

ANDRŌMĀCHUS (Ἀνδρόμαχος). 1. Ruler of Tauromenium in Sicily about B.C. 344, and father of the historian Timæus.—2. Of Crete, physician to the Emperor Nero, A.D. 54–68; was the first person on whom the title of Architater was conferred, and was celebrated as the inventor of a famous compound medicine and antidote called Theriaca Andromachi, which retains its place in some foreign Pharmacopœias to the present day. Andromachus has left the directions for making this mixture in a Greek elegiac poem, consisting of one hundred and seventy-four lines, edited by Tidicæus, Tiguri, 1607, and Leinker, Norimb., 1754.—[3. Son of the former, commonly called the Younger, held the same office, that of physician to Nero, after his father's death. He is generally supposed to have been the author of a work on pharmacy in three books, of which only a few fragments remain.]

ANDRŌMĒDA (Ἀνδρομέδη), daughter of the Æthiopian king Cepheus and Cassiopæa. Her mother boasted that the beauty of her daughter surpassed that of the Nereids, who prevailed on Neptune (Poseidon) to visit the country by an inundation and a sea-monster. The oracle of Ammon promised deliverance if Andromeda was given up to the monster; and Cepheus, obliged to yield to the wishes of his people, chained Andromeda to a rock. Here she was found and saved by Perseus, who slew the monster and obtained her as his wife. Andromeda had previously been promised to Phineus, and this gave rise to the famous fight of Phineus and Perseus at the wedding, in which the former and all his associates were slain. (Ov. Met., v., 1, seq.) After her death, she was placed among the stars.

His fragments are given by Müller, l. c., p. 349–9.—Two other historians of this name are mentioned, one of Alexandria, author of a Chronica, a fragment of which is given by Müller, p. 352; the other of Ephesus, author of a work entitled Tripus: fragments of it are given in Müller, p. 347–8.—3. An Athenian, son of Andron, and father of the orator Andron.]

ANDRŌNICUS (Ἀνδρόνικος). 1. CYRRESTES, so called from his native place, Cyrrha, probably lived about B.C. 100, and built the octagonal tower at Athens, vulgarly called "the Tower of the Winds." Vid. Dict. of Ant., p. 616, 2d ed., where a drawing of the building is given.—2. LIVIUS ANDRŌNICUS, the earliest Roman poet, was a Greek, probably a native of Tarentum, and the slave of M. Livius Salinator, by whom he was manumitted, and from whom he received the Roman name Livius. He obtained at Rome a perfect knowledge of the Latin language. He wrote both tragedies and comedies in Latin, and we still possess the titles and fragments of at least fourteen of his dramas, all of which were borrowed from the Greek: his first drama was acted in B.C. 240. He also wrote an Odyssey in the Saturnian verse and Hymns. (Vid. Düntzer, Livii Andronici Fragmenta Collecta, &c., Berl., 1835).—3. OF RHODES, a Peripatetic philosopher at Rome, about B.C. 58. He published a new edition of the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus, which formerly belonged to the library of Apellieon, and which were brought to Rome by Sulla with the rest of Apellieon's library in B.C. 84. Tyrannio commenced this task, but apparently did not do much toward it. The arrangement which Andronieus made of Aristotle's writings seems to be the one which forms the basis of our present editions. He wrote many commentaries upon the works of Aristotle; but none of these is extant, for the paraphrase of the Nicomachean Ethics, which is ascribed to Andronieus of Rhodes, was written by some one else, and may have been the work of Andronieus Callistus of Thessalouica, who was professor in Italy in the latter half of the fifteenth century.

ANDRŌPŌLIS (Ἀνδρών πόλις; now Chabur), a city of Lower Egypt, on the western bank of the Canopic branch of the Nile, was the capital of the Nomos Andropolites, and, under the Romans, the station of a legion.

ANDROS (Ἄνδρος; Andros: now Andro), the most northerly and one of the largest islands of the Cyclades, southeast of Eubœa, twenty-one miles long and eight broad, early attained importance, and colonized Aeanthus and Stagira about B.C. 654. It was taken by the Persians in their invasion of Greece, was afterward subject to the Athenians, at a later time to the Macedonians, and at length to Attalus III., king of Pergamus, on whose death (B.C. 133) it passed, with the rest of his dominions, to the Romans. It was celebrated for its wine, whence the whole island was regarded as sacred to Bacchus (Dionysus). Its chief town, also called Andros, contained a celebrated temple of Bacchus (Dionysus), and a harbor of the name of Gaureleon, and a Fort Gaurion.

[ANDROSTHENES (Ἀνδροσθένης), of Thasus, one of Alexander's admirals, sailed with Nearchus, and was also sent by Alexander to explore the coast of the Persian Gulf. He wrote an account of his voyage, and also a Ἰνδικῆς Παράπλους.]

ANDROTION (Ἀνδρότιον). 1. An Athenian orator, and a contemporary of Demosthenes, against whom the latter delivered an oration, which is still extant.—2. The author of an Atthis, or a work on the history of Attica. [Fragments published by Siebelis with Philochorus, Lips., 1811, and by Müller in his Fragm. Hist. Græc., vol. i., p. 371–377.]

ANEMŌRĒA, afterward ANEMŌLĒA (Ἀνεμώρεια, Ἀνεμώλεια; Ἀνεμωρείς), a town on a hill on the borders of Phocis and Delphi.

ANEMŪRIUM (Ἀνεμῦριον: now Anamur, with ruins), a town and promontory at the southern point of Cilicia, opposite to Cyprus.

[ANGELION (Ἄγγελιον), an artist always mentioned in connection with Teetæus: they were pupils of Dipænus and Seyllis, and flourished about 548 B.C.]

ANGERŌNA or ANGERŌNĪA, a Roman goddess, respecting whom we have different statements, some representing her as the goddess of silence, others as the goddess of anguish and fear; that is, the goddess who not only produces this state of mind, but also relieves men from it. Her statue stood in the temple of Volupia, with her mouth bound and sealed up. Her festival, Angeronalia, was celebrated yearly on the twelfth of December.

ANGĪTES (Ἄγγιτης: now Anghista), a river in Macedonia, flowing into the Strymon.

ANGĪTĀ or ANGUĪTĀ, a goddess worshipped by the Marsians and Marubians, who lived about the shores of the Lake Fucinus.

ANGLI or ANGLII, a German people of the race of the Suevi, on the left bank of the Elbe, afterward passed over with the Saxons into Britain, which was called after them England. Vid. SAXONES. A portion of them appear to have settled in Angeln in Schleswig.

ANGRIVARĪ, a German people dwelling on both sides of the Visurgis (now Weser), separated from the Cherusci by an agger or mound of earth. The name is usually derived from Angern, that is, meadows. They were generally on friendly terms with the Romans, but rebelled in A.D. 16, and were subdued. Toward the end of the first century they extended their territories southward, and, in conjunction with the Chamavi, took possession of part of the territory of the Bructeri, south and east of the Lippe, the Angaria or Engern of the Middle Ages.

ANICĒTUS [Ἀνίκητος]. 1. Son of Hercules, by Hebe, after his admission to the abode of the gods.—2. A freedman of Nero, and formerly his tutor, was employed by the emperor in the execution of many of his crimes: he was afterward banished to Sardinia, where he died.

ANICĪUS GALLUS. Vid. GALLUS.

[ANICĪUS, C., a senator and friend of Cicero, whose villa was near the latter's; mentioned in the letters of Cicero.]

ANĪERTUS (Ἀνίγρος: now Mavro-Potamo), a small river in the Triphylian Elis, the Minyæus (Μινυῖος) of Homer (Il., xi., 721), rises in Mount Lapithas, and flows into the Ionian Sea near Samicum: its waters have a disagreeable smell, and its fish are not eatable. Near Samicum was a cave sacred to the Nymp^h; Anigrades (Ἀνιγρίδες or Ἀνιγριάδες), where persons with cutaneous diseases were cured by the waters of the river.

ANĪO, anciently ANĪEN (hence, gen., Anicenis: now Teverone or L'Aniene), a river, the most celebrated of the tributaries of the Tiber, rises in the mountains of the Hernici, near Treba (now Trevi), flows first northwest and then southwest through narrow mountain-valleys, receives the brook Digentia (now Licezza), above Tibur, forms at Tibur beautiful waterfalls (hence præceps Anio, Hor., Carm., l., 7, 13), and flows, forming the boundary between Latium and the land of the Sabines, into the Tiber, three miles above Rome, where the town of Antemna stood. The water of the Anio was conveyed to Rome by two aqueducts, the Anio vetus and Anio novus. Vid. Dict. of Ant., p. 110, 111, 2d ed.

[ANITORGIS or ANISTORGIS, a city of Hispania Bætica, near which a battle was fought between Hasdrubal and the Scipios.]

ANĪUS (Ἄνιος), son of Apollo by Creïsa, or Rheo, and priest of Apollo at Delos. By Dorippe he had three daughters, Eno, Spermo, and Elais, to whom Bacchus (Dionysus) gave the power of producing at will any quantity of wine, corn, and oil, whence they were called Enotriæ. When the Greeks, on their expedition to Troy, landed in Delos, Anius endeavored to persuade them to stay with him for nine years, as it was decreed by fate that they should not take Troy until the tenth year; and he promised, with the help of his three daughters, to supply them with all they wanted during that period. After the fall of Troy, Æneas was kindly received by Anius.

ANNA, daughter of Belus and sister of Dido. After the death of the latter, she fled from Carthage to Italy, where she was kindly received by Æneas. Here she excited the jealousy of Lavinia, and being warned in a dream by Dido, she fled and threw herself into the River Numicius. Henceforth she was worshipped as the nymph of that river, under the name of ANNA PERENNA. There are various other stories respecting the origin of her worship. Ovid relates that she was considered by some as Luna, by others as Themis, by others as Io, daughter of Inachus, by others as the Anna of Bovilla, who supplied the plebs with food, when they seceded to the Mons Sacer. (Ov., Fast., iii., 523.) Her festival was celebrated on the 15th of March. She was, in reality, an old Italian divinity, who was regarded as the giver of life, health, and plenty, as the goddess whose powers were most manifest at the return of spring, when her festival was celebrated. The identification of this goddess with Anna, the sister of Dido, is undoubtedly of late origin.

ANNA CŌMNĒNA, daughter of Alexis I. Comnenus (reigned A.D. 1081–1118), wrote the life of her father Alexis in fifteen books, which is one of the most interesting and valuable histories of the Byzantine literature. Editions: By Possinus, Paris, 1651; by Schopen, Bonn, 1839, 8vo.

ANNĀLIS, a cognomen of the Villia Gens, first acquired by L. Villius, tribune of the plebs, in B.C. 179, because he introduced a law fixing the year (annus) at which it was lawful for a person to be a candidate for each of the public offices.

ANNEIUS, M., legate of M. Cicerio during his government of Cilicia, B.C. 51.

[ANNA, wife of L. Cinna, and, after his death, of M. Piso Calpurnianus.]

ANNIANUS, T., a Roman poet, lived in the time of Trajan and Hadrian, and wrote Fescennine verses.

ANNICÆRIS ('Ἀννίκερις), a Cyrenaic philosopher, of whom the ancients have left us contradictory accounts. Many modern writers have supposed that there were two philosophers of this name, the one contemporary with Plato, whom he is said to have ransomed for twenty minæ from Dionysius of Syracuse, and the other with Alexander the Great.

ANNIUS CIMBER. Vid. CIMBER.

ANNIUS MILO. Vid. MILO.

ANSER, a poet of the Augustan age, a friend of the triumvir Marcus Antonius, and one of the detractors of Virgil. Hence Virgil plays upon his name (Ecl., ix., 36). Ovid (Trist., ii., 435) calls him procaz.

ANSIBARII or AMPSIVARII, a German people, originally dwelt south of the Bruncteri, between the sources of the Ems and the Weser: driven out of their country by the Chauæi in the reign of Nero (A.D. 59), they asked the Romans for permission to settle in the Roman territory between the Rhine and the Yssel, but when their request was refused they wandered into the interior of the country to the Cherusci, and were at length extirpated, according to Tacitus. We find their name, however, among the Franks in the time of Julian.

ΑΝΤΕΟΠΟΛΙΣ ('Ἀνταίοπολις: near Gau-el-Kebir), an ancient city of Upper Egypt (the Thebais), on the east side of the Nile, but at some distance from the river, was the capital of the Nomos Antæopolites, and one of the chief seats of the worship of Osiris.

ΑΝΤΑΥΣ ('Ἀνταῖος). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Ge, a mighty giant and wrestler in Libya, whose strength was invincible so long as he remained in contact with his mother earth. The strangers who came to his country were compelled to wrestle with him; the conquered were slain, and out of their skulls he built a house to Neptune (Poseidon). Hercules discovered the source of his strength, lifted him from the earth, and crushed him in the air. The tomb of Antæus (Antæi collis), which formed a moderate hill in the shape of a man stretched out at full length, was shown near the town of Tingis in Mauretania down to a late period.—2. [A companion of Turnus, slain by Æneas.]

ΑΝΤΑΓΩΡΑΣ ('Ἀνταγόρας), of Rhodes, flourished about B.C. 270, a friend of Antigonus Gonatas and a contemporary of Aratus. He wrote an epic poem entitled Thebais, and also epigrams, of which specimens are still extant [in the Greek Anthology.]

ΑΝΤΑΛΚΙΔΑΣ ('Ἀνταλκίδας), a Spartan, son of Leon, is chiefly known by the celebrated treaty concluded with Persia in B.C. 387, usually called the peace of Antalcidas, since it was the fruit of his diplomaey. According to this treaty, all the Greek cities in Asia Minor, together with Clazomenæ and Cyprus, were to belong to the Persian king: the Athenians were allowed to retain only Lemnos, Imbros, and Seyros; and all the other Greek cities were to be independent.

ΑΝΤΑΝΔΡΟΣ ('Ἀντανδρος). 1. Brother of Agathœcles, king of Syracuse, wrote the life of his brother. [A fragment, preserved by Diodorus, is given by Müller, Frag. Hist. Græc., vol. ii., p. 383.—2. General of the Messenians, and commander of cavalry in the first Messenian war against the Lacedæmonians.]

ΑΝΤΑΝΔΡΟΣ ('Ἀντανδρος: now Antandro), a city of Great Mysia, on the Adramyttian Gulf, at the foot of Mount Ida; an Æolian colony. Virgil represents Æneas as touching here after leaving Troy (Æn., iii., 106).

ΑΝΤΑΡΑΔΟΣ ('Ἀνταράδος: now Tortosa), a town on the northern border of Phœnicia, opposite the island of Aradus.

ΑΝΤΕΑ or ΑΝΤΙΑ ('Ἀντεία), daughter of the Lycian king Iobates, wife of Præctus of Argos. She is also called Sthenobœa. Respecting her love for Bellerophon, see BELLEROPHONTES.

[ANTEIUS, P., appointed governor of Syria 55 A.D. On account of the favor in which he stood with Agrippina, he was an object of hatred to Nero: being accused of a conspiracy, he took poison, but, finding this too slow, he opened his veins.]

ΑΝΤΕΜΝΕ ('Ἀντεμνας, -atis), an ancient Sabine town at the junction of the Anio and the Tiber, destroyed by the Romans in the earliest times.

ΑΝΤΕΝΩΡ ('Ἀντήνωρ). 1. A Trojan, son of Æsyetes and Cleomestra, and husband of Theano. According to Homer, he was one of the wisest among the elders at Troy: he received Menelaus and Ulysses into his house when they came to Troy as ambassadors, and advised his fellow-citizens to restore Helen to Menelaus. Thus he is represented as a traitor to his country, and when sent to Agamemnon, just before the taking of Troy, to negotiate peace, he concerted a plan of delivering the city, and even the palladium, into the hands of the Greeks. On the capture of Troy, Antenor was spared by the Greeks. His history after this event is related differently. Some writers relate that he founded a new kingdom at Troy; according to others, he embarked with Menelaus and Helen, was carried to Libya, and settled at Cyrene; while a third account states that he went with the Heneti to Thræe, and thence to the western coast of the Adriatic, where the foundation of Patavium and several other towms is ascribed to him. The sons and descendants of Antenor were called Antenoridae.—2. Son of Euphranor, an Athenian sculptor, made the first bronze statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, which the Athenians set up in the Ceramieus, B.C. 509. These statues were carried off to Susa by Xerxes, and their place was supplied by others made either by Callias or by Praxiteles. After the conquest of Persia, Alexander the Great sent the statues back to Athens, where they were again set up in the Ceramieus.

ΑΝΤΕΡΟΣ. Vid. EROS.

ΑΝΤΕΒΟΡΤΑ, also called PORRIMA or PRORSA, together with Postvorta, are described either as the two sisters or companions of the Roman goddess Carmenta; but originally they were only two attributes of the one goddess Car-meata, the former describing her knowledge of the future, and the latter that of the past, analogous to the two-headed Janus.

[ANTHĒA (Ἀνθεῖα), a city of Messenia, mentioned by Homer (Il., 9, 151); the later Thuria, or, according to others, identical with Asine.]

ANTHĒDŌN (Ἀνθηδών: Ἀνθηδώνιος: now Lukisi?). 1. A town of Bœotia with a harbor, on the coast of the Eubœan Sea, at the foot of Mount Messapius, said to have derived its name from a nymph Anthedon, or from Anthedon, son of Glaucus, who was here changed into a god. (Ov., Met., vii., 232; xiii., 905.) The inhabitants lived chiefly by fishing.—[2. A sea-port of Argolis on the Saronic Gulf, near the borders of Corinthia, called by Ptolemy Ἀθηναίων λιμὴν.—3. A harbor in the southern part of Palestine, afterward called Ἀγριππιδίς.]

[ANTHĒLA (Ἀνθήλη), a village of Thessaly, between the entrance of the Asopus into the Malian Gulf and Thermopylæ, containing a temple of Ceres: it was one of the places of meeting of the Amphictyonic council.]

ANTHĒMŪS, emperor of the West, A.D. 467-472, was killed on the capture of Rome by Ricimer, who made Olybrius emperor.

ANTHĒMŪS (Ἀνθεμοῖς-οὐντις: Ἀνθεμοῖσιος), a Macedonian town in Chalcidice.

ANTHĒMŪSĪA or ANTĒMŪS (Ἀνθεμονσία), a city of Mesopotamia, southwest of Edessa, and a little east of the Euphrates. The surrounding district was called by the same name, but was generally included under the name of OSROENE.

ANTHĒNE (Ἀνθήνη), a place in Cynuria, in the Peloponnesus.

[ANTHERMUS, a statuary of Chios, father of Bupalus and Athenis: as the name is differently given in different MSS, Sillig has proposed Archennus instead of Anthermus.]

[ANTHEUS (Ἀνθεύς), a Trojan, a companion of Æneas.]

ANTHYLLA (Ἀνθυλλα), a considerable city of Lower Egypt, near the mouth of the Canopic branch of the Nile, below Naucratis, the revenues of which, under the Persians, were assigned to the wife of the satrap of Egypt, to provide her with shoes.

ANTĪAS, Q. VALERĪUS, a Roman historian, flourished about B.C. 80, and wrote the history of Rome from the earliest times down to those of Sulla. He is frequently referred to by Livy, who speaks of him as the most lying of all the annalists, and seldom mentions his name without terms of reproach: there can be little doubt that Livy's judgment is correct. [The fragments of his work are collected by Krause in his Vitæ et Fragm. veterum Hist. Rom., Berlin, 1833, p. 271-88.]

ANTICLEA (Ἀντίκλεια), daughter of Autolycus, wife of Læertes, and mother of Ulysses, died of grief at the long absence of her son. It is said that, before marrying Læertes, she lived on intimate terms with Sisyphus; whence Euripides calls Ulysses a son of Sisyphus.

ANTICLĪDES (Ἀντικλείδης), of Athens, lived after the time of Alexander the Great, and was the author of several works, the most important of which was entitled Nosti (Νόσται), containing an account of the return of the Greeks from their mythical expeditions.

[ANTICRAGUS (Ἀντίκραγος: now Soumbouriu), a lofty and steep mountain range in Lycia, running in a northeast direction along the coast of the Sinus Glaucus.]

[ANTICRĀTES (Ἀντικράτης), a Spartan, who claimed the merit of having dealt the blow that proved fatal to Epaminondas at Mantinea.]

ANTICŪRA, more anciently ANTICIRRIA, (Ἀντίκυρρα or Ἀντίκυρα: Ἀντικυρεῖς, Ἀντικυραῖος) 1. (Now Aspra Spitiā), a town in Phœcis, with a harbor on a peninsula on the western side of the Sinus Anticyranus, a bay of the Crissæan Gulf, called in ancient times Cyparissus, and celebrated for its hellebore. It continued to be a place of importance under the Romans.—2. A town in Thessaly, on the Spercheus, not far from its mouth. Both towns were celebrated for their hellebore, the chief remedy in antiquity for madness; hence the proverb, Ἀντικίρρας σε δεῖ, when a person acted senselessly, and Naviget Anticyram. (Hor., Sat., ii., 3, 166.)

ANTIGĒNES (Ἀντιγένης), a general of Alexander the Great, on whose death he obtained the satrapy of Susiana, and espoused the side of Eumenes. On the defeat of the latter in B.C. 316, Antigēnes fell into the hands of his enemy Antigonus, and was burned alive by him.

ANTIGĒNĪDAS (Ἀντιγενίδας), a Theban, a celebrated flute-player, and a poet, lived in the time of Alexander the Great.

ANTIGŌNE (Ἀντιγόνη). 1. Daughter of Œdipus by his mother Jocaste, and sister of Ismene, and of Eteocles and Polyneices. In the tragic story of Œdipus, Antigone appears as a noble maiden, with a truly heroic attachment to her father and brothers. When Œdipus had blinded himself, and was obliged to quit Thebes, he was accompanied by Antigone, who remained with him till he died in Colonus, and then returned to Thebes. After her two brothers had killed each other in battle, and Creon, the king of Thebes, would not allow Polyneices to be buried, Antigone alone defied the tyrant, and buried the body of her brother. Creon thereupon ordered her to be shut up in a subterranean cave, where she killed herself. Hæmon, the son of Creon, who was in love with her, killed himself by her side.—[2. Daughter of the Trojan king Laomedon, changed by Juno (Hera) into a stork, because she presumed to vie with her in the beauty of her hair.—3. (Historical.) Daughter of Cassander, second wife of Ptolemy Lagus, and mother of Berenice.]

ANTIGŌNEA OF -IA and -IA (Ἀντιγόμεια, Ἀντιγονία). 1. (Now Tepeleñ), a town in Epirus (Illyricum), at the junction of a tributary with the Aous, and near a narrow pass of the Acroceraunian Mountains.—2. A Macedonian town in Chalcidice.—3. Vid. MANTINEA.—4. A town on the Orontes in Syria, founded by Antigonus as the capital of his empire (B.C. 306), but most of its inhabitants were transferred by Seleucus to ANTIOCHĪA, which was built in its neighborhood.—5. A town in Bithynia, afterward Nicæa.—6. A town in the Troas. Vid. ALEXANDBEA, No. 2.

motis, and father of Demetrius Poliorettes by Stratonice. He was one of the generals of Alexander the Great, and in the division of the empire after the death of the latter (B.C. 323), he received the provinces of the Greater Phrygia, Lycia, and Pamphylia. On the death of the regent Antipater in 319, he aspired to the sovereignty of Asia. In 316 he defeated and put Eumenes to death, after a struggle of nearly three years. From 315 to 311 he carried on war, with varying success, against Seleucus, Ptolemy, Cassander, and Lysimachus. By the peace made in 311, Antigonus was allowed to have the government of all Asia; but peace did not last more than a year. After the defeat of Ptolemy's fleet in 306, Antigonus assumed the title of king, and his example was followed by Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Seleucus. In the same year, Antigonus invaded Egypt, but was compelled to retreat. His son Demetrius carried on the war with success against Cassander in Greece; but he was compelled to return to Asia to the assistance of his father, against whom Cassander, Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus had formed a fresh confederacy. Antigonus and Demetrius were defeated by Lysimachus at the decisive battle of Ipsus in Phrygia, in 301. Antigonus fell in the battle in the eighty-first year of his age.—2. GONATAS, son of Demetrius Poliorettes, and grandson of the preceding. He assumed the title of King of Macedonia, after his father's death in Asia in B.C. 283, but he did not obtain possession of the throne till 277. He was driven out of his kingdom by Pyrrhus of Epirus in 273, but recovered it in the following year: he was again expelled by Alexander, the son of Pyrrhus, and again recovered his dominions. He attempted to prevent the formation of the Achaean League, and died in 239. He was succeeded by Demetrius II. His surname Gonatas is usually derived from Gonnos or Gonni in Thessaly; but some think that Gonatas is a Macedonian word, signifying an iron plate protecting the knee.—3. DOSON (so called because he was always about to give, but never did,) son of Demetrius of Cyrene, and grandson of Demetrius Poliorettes. On the death of Demetrius II, in B.C. 229, he was left guardian of his son Philip, but he married the widow of Demetrius, and became King of Macedonia himself. He supported Aratus and the Achaean League against Cleomenes, king of Sparta, whom he defeated at Sellasia in 221, and took Sparta. On his return to Macedonia, he defeated the Illyrians, and died a few days afterward, 220.—4. King of JUDAEA, son of Aristobulus II, was placed on the throne by the Parthians in B.C. 40, but was taken prisoner by Sosius, the lieutenant of Antony, and was put to death by the latter in 37.—5. Of CARYSUS, lived at Alexandria about B.C. 250, and wrote a work, still extant, entitled Historia Mirabiles, which is only of value from its preserving extracts from other and better works.—Editions: By J. Beckmann, Lips., 1791, and by Westermann in his Paradoxographi, Bruns., 1839.

ANTILIBANUS (Ἀντιλίβανος: now Jebel-es-Sheikh or Anti-Lebanon), a mountain on the confines of Palestine, Phœnicia, and Syria, parallel to Libanus (now Lebanon), which it exceeds in height. Its highest summit is Mount Hermon (also Jebel-es-Sheikh).

ANTILŌCHUS (Ἀντίλοχος), son of Nestor and Anaxibia or Eurydice, accompanied his father to Troy, and distinguished himself by his bravery. He was slain before Troy by Memnon the Æthiopian, and was buried by the side of his friends Achilles and Patroclus.

ΑΝΤΙΜΑΧΟΣ (Ἀντίμαχος). 1. A Trojan, persuaded his countrymen not to surrender Helen to the Greeks. He had three sons, two of whom were put to death by Menelaus.—2. Of Claros or Colophon, a Greek epic and elegiac poet, was probably a native of Claros, but was called a Colophonian, because Claros belonged to Colophon. (Clarius poeta, Ov., Trist., i., 6, 1.) He flourished toward the end of the Peloponnesian war: his chief work was an epic poem of great length called Thebais Ἰθβαίς. Antimachus was one of the forerunners of the poets of the Alexandrine school, who wrote more for the learned than for the public at large. The Alexandrine grammarians assigned to him the second place among the epic poets, and the Emperor Hadrian preferred his works even to those of Homer. He also wrote a celebrated elegiac poem called Lyde, which was the name of his wife or mistress, as well as other works. There was likewise a tradition that he made a recension of the text of the Homeric poems. [His fragments have been collected and published by Schellenberg, Halle, 1786; some additional fragments in Stoll's Animadversiones in Antimachi Fragm., Götting, 1840; the epic fragments in Düntzer's Fragm. der Episch. Poes. der Griech. bis auf Alexander, p. 99.]

[ANTIMERUS (Ἀντιμερος), a sophist of Mende in Thraee, a pupil of Protagoras, mentioned by Plato (Protag., 315, A.)]

ΑΝΤΙΝΟΨΟΛΙΣ (Ἀντινοῦς πολις or Ἀντινόβεια: ruins at Enseneh), a splendid city, built by Hadrian, in memory of his favorite ANTINOS, on the eastern bank of the Nile, upon the site of the ancient Besa, in Middle Egypt (Heptanomis). It was the capital of the Nomos Antinoïtes, and had an oracle of the goddess Besa.

ΑΝΤΙΝΟΣ (Ἀντινοῦς). 1. Son of Eupithes of Ithaca, and one of the suitors of Penelope, was slain by Ulysses.—2. A youth of extraordinary beauty, born at Claudiopolis in Bithynia, was the favorite of the Emperor Hadrian, and his companion in all his journeys. He was drowned in the Nile, A.D. 122, whether accidentally or on purpose, is uncertain. The grief of the emperor knew no bounds. He enrolled Antinous among the gods, caused a temple to be erected to him at Mantinea, and founded the city of ANTINOOPOLIS in honor of him. A large number of works of art of all kinds were executed in his honor, and many of them are still extant.

ΑΝΤΙΟΧΙΑ and -ΕΑ (Ἀντιόχεια: Ἀντιοχέως and -όχειός, fem. Ἀντιοχίς and -όχισσα, Antiochéus), the name of several cities of Asia, sixteen of which are said to have been built by Seleucus I. Nicator, and named in honor of his father Antiochus. 1. A. EPIDAPHNES, or AD DAPHNEM, of AD ORONTEM ('A. ἐπὶ Δάφνη: so called from a neighboring grove: 'A. ἐπὶ Ορόντη: ruins at Antakia), the capital of the Greek kingdom of Syria, and long the chief city of Asia, and perhaps of the world, stood on the left bank of the Orontes, about twenty miles (geog.) from the sea, in a beautiful valley, about ten miles long and five or six broad, inclosed by the ranges of Amanus on the northwest, and Casius on the southeast. It was built by Seleucus Nicator, about B.C. 300, and peopled chiefly from the neighboring city of ANTIGONIA. It flourished so rapidly as soon to need enlargement; and other additions were again made to it by Seleucus II. Callinicus (about B.C. 240), and Antiochus IV. Epiphanes (about B.C. 170). Hence it obtained the name of Tetrapolis (τετραπόλις, i. e. four cities). Besides being the capital of the greatest kingdom of the world, it had a considerable commerce, the Orontes being navigable up to the city, and the high road between Asia and Europe passing through it. Under the Romans it was the residence of the proconsuls of Syria; it was favored and visited by emperors; and was made a colonia with the Jus Italicum by Antoninus Pius. It was one of the earliest strongholds of the Christian faith; the first place where the Christian name was used (Acts, xi, 26); the centre of missionary efforts in the Apostolic age; and the see of one of the four chief bishops, who were called Patriarchs. Though far inferior to Alexandria as a seat of learning, yet it derived some distinction in this respect from the teaching of Libanius and other Sophists; and its eminence in art is attested by the beautiful gems and medals still found among its ruins. It was destroyed by the Persian King Chosroës (A.D. 540), but rebuilt by Justinian, who gave it the new name Θεούπολις (Θεούπολις). The ancient walls which still surround the insignificant modern town are probably those built by Justinian. The name of Antiochia was also given to the surrounding district, i. e., the northwestern part of Syria, which bordered upon Cilicia.—2. A. AD MÆANDRUM ('Α. πρὸς Μαϊάνδρω: ruins near Yenishehr), a city of Caria, on the Mæander, built by Antiochus I. Soter, on the site of the old city of Pythopolis.—3. A. PIDISLÆ or AD PIDISIAM ('Α. Πισιδίας or πρὸς Πισιδίᾳ), a considerable city on the borders of Phrygia Parorcios and Pisidia; built by colonists from Magnesia; declared a free city by the Romans after their victory over Antiochus the Great (B.C. 189); made a colony under Augustus, and called Cæsarea. It was celebrated for the worship and the great temple of Men Arcæus (Μην' Ἀρκάσιος, the Phrygian Moon-god), which the Romans suppressed.—4. A. MARGIANA ('Α. Μαργιανή; now Meru Shah-Jehan?), a city in the Persian province of Margiana, on the River Margus, founded by Alexander, and at first called Alexandria; destroyed by the barbarians, rebuilt by Antiochus I. Soter, and called Antiochia. It was beautifully situated, and was surrounded by a wall seventy stadia (about eight miles) in circuit. Among the less important cities of the name were: (5.) A. AD TAURUM in Commagene; (6.) A. AD CRAGUM; and (7.) A. AD PYRAMUM, in Cilicia. The following Antiochs are better known by other names: A. AD SARUM (vid. ADANA); A. CHARACENES (vid. CHARAX); A. CALLIRHOË (vid. EDESSA); A. AD HIPPIUM (vid. GADARA); A. MIGDONLÆ (vid. NISIBIS); in Cilicia (vid. TARSUS); in Caria or Lydia (vid. TRALLES).

ΑΝΤΙΟΧΟΣ (Ἀντίοχος). 1. Kings of Syria.

1. SOTER (reigned B.C. 280-261), was the son of Seleucus I., the founder of the Syrian kingdom of the Selucidæ. He married his step-mother Stratonice, with whom he fell violently in love, and whom his father surrendered to him. He fell in battle against the Gauls in 261.—2. THEOS (B.C. 261-246), son and successor of No. 1. The Milesians gave him his surname of Theos, because he delivered them from their tyrant, Timarchus. He carried on war with Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt, which was brought to a close by his putting away his wife Laodice, and marrying Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy. After the death of Ptolemy, he recalled Laodice; but, in revenge for the insult she had received, she caused Antiochus and Berenice to be murdered. During the reign of Antiochus, Arsaces founded the Parthian empire (256), and Theodotus established an independent kingdom in Bactria. He was succeeded by his son Seleucus Callinicus. His younger son Antiochus Hierax also assumed the crown, and carried on war some years with his brother. Vid. SELEUCUS II.—3. THE GREAT (B.C. 223-187), second son of Seleucus Callinicus, succeeded to the throne on the death of his brother Seleucus Ceraunus, when he was only in his fifteenth year. After defeating (220) Molon, satrap of Media, and his brother Alexander, satrap of Persis, who had attempted to make themselves independent, he carried on war against Ptolemy Philopator, king of Egypt, in order to obtain Cœle-Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine, but was obliged to cede these provinces to Ptolemy, in consequence of his defeat at the battle of Raphia near Gaza, in 217. He next marched against Achæus, who had revolted in Asia Minor, and whom he put to death, when he fell into his hands in 214. Vid. ACHÆUS Shortly after this he was engaged for seven years (212-205) in an attempt to regain the eastern provinces of Asia, which had revolted during the reign of Antiochus III.; but though he met with great success, he found it hopeless to effect the subjugation of the Parthian and Bactrian kingdoms, and accordingly concluded a peace with them. In 205 he renewed his war against Egypt with more success, and in 198 conquered Palestine and Cœle-Syria, which he afterward gave as a dowry with his daughter Cleopatra upon her marriage with Ptolemy Epiphanes. In 196 he crossed over into Europe, and took possession of the Thracian Chersonese. This brought him into contact with the Romans, who commanded him to restore the Chersonese to the Macedonian king; but he refused to comply with their demand, in which resolution he was strengthened by Hannibal, who arrived at his court in 195. Hannibal urged him to invade Italy without loss of time; but Antiochus did not follow his advice, and it was not till 192 that he crossed over into Greece. In 191 he was defeated by the Romans at Thermopylæ, and compelled to return to Asia; his fleet was also vanquished in two engagements. In 190 he was again defeated by the Romans under L. Scipio at Mount Sipylus, near Magnesia, and compelled to sue for peace, which was granted in 188, on condition of his ceding all his dominions east of Mount Taurus paying fifteen thousand Euboic talents within twelve years, giving up his elephants and ships of war, and surrendering the Roman enemies; but he allowed Hannibal to escape. In order to raise the money to pay the Romans, he attacked a wealthy temple in Elymais, but was killed by the people of the place (187). He was succeeded by his son Seleucus Philopator.—4. EPIPHANES (B.C. 175–164), son of Antiochus III, was given in hostage to the Romans in 188, and was released from captivity in 175 through his brother Seleucus Philopator, whom he succeeded in the same year. He carried on war against Egypt from 171–168 with great success in order to obtain Cœle-Syria and Palestine, which had been given as a dowry with his sister, and he was preparing to lay siege to Alexandria in 168, when the Romans compelled him to retire. He endeavored to root out the Jewish religion and to introduce the worship of the Greek divinities; but this attempt led to a rising of the Jewish people, under Mattathias and his heroic sons the Maccabees, which Antiochus was unable to put down. He attempted to plunder a temple in Elymais in 164, but he was repulsed, and died shortly afterward in a state of raving madness, which the Jews and Greeks equally attributed to his sacrilegious crimes. His subjects gave him the name of Epiphanes (“the madman”) in parody of Epiphaneus.—5. EUPATOR (B.C. 164–162), son and successor of Epiphanes, was nine years old at his father’s death, and reigned under the guardianship of Lysias. He was dethroned and put to death by Demetrius Soter, the son of Seleucus Philopator, who had hitherto lived at Rome as a hostage.—6. THEOS, son of Alexander Balas. He was brought forward as a claimant to the crown in 144, against Demetrius Nicator by Tryphon, but he was murdered by the latter, who ascended the throne himself in 142.—7. SIDETES (B.C. 137–128), so called from Side in Pamphylia, where he was brought up, younger son of Demetrius Soter, succeeded Tryphon. He married Cleopatra, wife of his elder brother Demetrius Nicator, who was a prisoner with the Parthians. He carried on war against the Parthians, at first with success, but was afterward defeated and slain in battle in 128.—8. GRYPUS, or Hook-nosed (B.C. 125–96), second son of Demetrius Nicator and Cleopatra. He was placed upon the throne in 125 by his mother Cleopatra, who put to death his elder brother Seleucus, because she wished to have the power in her own hands. He poisoned his mother in 120, and subsequently carried on war for some time with his half-brother A. IX. Cyzicenus. At length, in 112, the two brothers agreed to share the kingdom between them, A. Cyzicenus having Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia, and A. Grypus the remainder of the provinces. Grypus was assassinated in 96.—9. CYZICENUS, from Cyzicus, where he was brought up, son of A. VII. Sidetes and Cleopatra, reigned over Cœle-Syria and Phœnicia from 112 to 96, but fell in battle in 95 against Seleucus Epiphaneus, son of A. VIII. Grypus.—10. EUSEBES, son of A. IX. Cyzicenus, defeated Seleucus Epiphaneus, who had slain his father in battle, and maintained the throne against the brothers of Seleucus. He succeeded his father Antiochus

IX. in 95.—11. EPIPHANES, son of A. VIII. Grypus and brother of Seleucus Epiphaneus, carried on war against A. X. Eusebes, but was defeated by the latter, and drowned in the River Orontes.—12. DIONYSUS, brother of No. 11, held the crown for a short time, but fell in battle against Aretas, king of the Arabians. The Syrians, worn out with the civil broils of the Seleucidæ, offered the kingdom to Tigraues, king of Armenia, who united Syria to his own dominions in 83, and held it till his defeat by the Romans in 69.—13. ASIATICUS, son of A. X. Eusebes, became King of Syria on the defeat of Tigraues by Lucullus in 69; but he was deprived of it in 65 by Pompey, who reduced Syria to a Roman province. In this year the Seleucidæ ceased to reign.

II. Kings of Commagene.

1. Made an alliance with the Romans about B.C. 64. He assisted Pompey with troops in 49, and was attacked by Antony in 38. He was succeeded by Mithradates I., about 31.—2. Succeeded Mithradates I., and was put to death at Rome by Augustus in 29.—3. Succeeded Mithradates II., and died in A.D. 17. Upon his death, Commagene became a Roman province, and remained so till A.D. 38.—4. Surnamed EPIPHANES, apparently a son of Antiochus III, received his paternal dominion from Caligula in A.D. 38. He was subsequently deposed by Caligula, but regained his kingdom on the accession of Claudius in 41. He was a faithful ally of the Romans, and assisted them in their wars against the Parthians under Nero, and against the Jews under Vespasian. At length, in 72, he was accused of conspiring with the Parthians against the Romans, was deprived of his kingdom, and retired to Rome, where he passed the remainder of his life.

III. Literary.

1. Of ÆGÆ in Cilicia, a Sophist, or, as he himself pretended to be, a Cyzic philosopher. He flourished about A.D. 200, during the reign of Severus and Caracalla. During the war of Caracalla against the Parthians, he deserted to the Parthians together with Tiridates. He was one of the most distinguished rhetoricians of his time, and also acquired some reputation as a writer.—2. Of ASCALON, the founder of the fifth Academy, was a friend of Lucullus and the teacher of Cicero during his studies at Athens (B.C. 79); but he had a school at Alexandria also, as well as in Syria, where he seems to have ended his life. His principal teacher was Philo, who succeeded Plato, Arcesilas, and Carneades, as the founder of the fourth Academy. He is, however, better known as the adversary than the disciple of Philo; and Cicero mentions a treatise called Sosus, written by him against his master, in which he refutes the skepticism of the Academies.—3. Of SYRACUSE, a Greek historian, lived about B.C. 423, and wrote histories of Sicily and Italy. [The fragments of his writings are collected in Müller’s Fragmenta Hist. Græc., vol. i., p. 181–184.—4. Of ALEXANDREA, author of a history of the comic poets of Greece.]

ΑΝΤΙΟΠΕ (Ἀντιόπη). 1. Daughter of Nycteus and Polyxo, or of the river-god Asopus in Bœtin, became by Jupiter (Zeus) the mother of Amphion and Zethus. Vid. ΑΝΤΙΦΩΝ. Bacchus (Dionysus) threw her into a state of madness on account of the vengeance which her sons had taken on Dirce. In this condition she wandered through Greece, until Phocus, the grandson of Sisyphus, cured and married her.—2. An Amazon, sister of Hippolyte, wife of Theseus, and mother of Hippolytus.

ΑΝΤΙΠΑΤΕΡ (Ἀντίπατρος). 1. The Macedonian, an officer greatly trusted by Philip and Alexander the Great, was left by the latter regent in Macedonia, when he crossed over into Asia in B.C. 334. In consequence of dissensions between Olympias and Antipater, the latter was summoned to Asia in 324, and Craterus appointed to the regency of Macedonia, but the death of Alexander in the following year prevented these arrangements from taking effect. Antipater now obtained Macedonia again, and in conjunction with Craterus, who was associated with him in the government, carried on war against the Greeks, who endeavored to establish their independence. This war, usually called the Lamian war, from Lamia, where Antipater was besieged in 323, was terminated by Antipater's victory over the confederates at Crannon in 322. This was followed by the submission of Athens and the death of DEMOSTHENES. In 321 Antipater passed over into Asia in order to oppose Perdiccas; but the murder of PERDICCAS in Egypt put an end to this war, and left Antipater supreme regent. Antipater died in 319, after appointing Polysperchon regent, and his own son CASSANDER to a subordinate position.—2. Grandson of the preceding, and second son of Cassander and Thessalonica. After the death of his elder brother Philip IV. (B.C. 295), great dissensions ensued between Antipater and his younger brother Alexander for the kingdom of Macedonia. Antipater, believing that Alexander was favored by his mother, put her to death. The younger brother upon this applied for aid at once to Pyrrhus of Epirus and Demetrius Poliorcetes. The remaining history is related differently; but so much is certain, that both Antipater and Alexander were subsequently put to death, either by Demetrius or at his instigation, and that Demetrius became King of Macedonia.—3. Father of Herod the Great, son of a noble Idumæan of the same name, espoused the cause of Hyrcanus against his brother Aristobulus. He ingratiated himself with the Romans, and in B.C. 47 was appointed by Cæsar procurator of Judæa, which appointment he held till his death in 43, when he was carried off by poison, which Malchus, whose life he had twice saved, bribed the cup-bearer of Hyrcanus to administer to him.—4. Eldest son of Herod the Great by his first wife, Doris, brought about the death of his two half-brothers, Alexander and Aristobulus, in B. C. 6, but was himself condemned as guilty of a conspiracy against his father's life, and was executed five days before Herod's death.—5. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher, the successor of Diogenes and the teacher of Panætius, about B.C. 144.—6. Of Tyre, a Stoic philosopher, died shortly before B.C. 45, and wrote a work on Duties (De Officiis).—7. Of Sidon, the author of several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, flourished about B.C. 108—

100, and lived to a great age.—8. Of Thessalonica, the author of several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived in the latter part of the reign of Augustus.

ΑΝΤΙΠΑΤΕΡ, L. CÆLIVS, a Roman jurist and historian, and a contemporary of C. Gracchus (B.C. 123) and L. Crassus, the orator, wrote Annales, which were epitomized by Brutus, and which contained a valuable account of the second Punic war. [The fragments of this work have been published by Krause in his Vite et Fragmenta veterum Hist. Roman. Berlin, 1833, p. 182—201.]

ΑΝΤΙΠΑΤΡΙΑ (Ἀντιπάτρια; now Berat?), a town in Illyrium on the borders of Macedonia, on the left bank of the Apsus.

[ΑΝΤΙΠΑΤΡΙΣ (Ἀντιπατρίς), a city of Judæa between Jerusalem and Cæsarea, in a beautiful and fruitful plain: it was built on the site of an older town called Capharsaba, enlarged by Herod the Great, and named Antipatris in honor of his father Antipater.]

ΑΝΤΙΦΑΝΕΣ (Ἀντιφάνης). 1. A comic poet of the middle Attic comedy, born about B.C. 404, and died 330. He wrote 365, or at the least 260 plays, which were distinguished by elegance of language. [The fragments of his plays are collected by Meineke in his Fragmenta Comici Græc., vol. i., p. 491—574, edit. minor.]—2. Of Berga in Thrace, a Greek writer on marvelous and incredible things.—3. An epigrammatic poet, several of whose epigrams are still extant in the Greek Anthology, lived about the reign of Augustus.—[4. Of Argos, a sculptor, disciple of Polyclëtus, and teacher of Cleon.—5. A physician of Delos, who lived about the beginning of the second century A.D.]

ΑΝΤΙΦΙΛΙΑΣ (Ἀντιφίλης). 1. King of the mythical Læstrygones in Sicily, who are represented as giants and cannibals. They destroyed eleven of the ships of Ulysses, who escaped with only one vessel.—[2. Son of the diviner Melampus, and father of Cæles, mentioned in the Odyssey.—3. A companion of Æneas, son of Sarpedon, slain by Turnus.]

ΑΝΤΙΦΕΛΛΟΣ (Ἀντιφέλλος; now Antiphilo), a town on the coast of Lycia, between Patara and Aperlae, originally the port of PHELLUS.

ΑΝΤΙΦΗΜΟΣ (Ἀντιφήμος), the Rhodian, founder of Gela in Sicily, B.C. 690.

ΑΝΤΙΦΙΛΟΣ (Ἀντιφίλος). 1. Of Byzantium, an epigrammatic poet, author of several excellent epigrams in the Greek Anthology, was a contemporary of the Emperor Nero.—2. Of Egypt, a distinguished painter, the rival of Apelles, painted for Philip and Alexander the Great.—[3. An Athenian general in the Lamian war, appointed in the place of Leostheus.]

ΑΝΤΙΦΩΝ (Ἀντιφών). 1. The most ancient of the ten orators in the Alexandrine canon, was a son of Sophilus the Sophist, and born at Rhamnus in Attica, in B.C. 430. He belonged to the oligarchical party at Athens, and took an active part in the establishment of the government of the Four Hundred (B.C. 411), after the overthrow of which he was brought to trial, condemned, and put to death. The oratorical powers of Antiphon are highly praised by the ancients. He introduced great improvements in public speaking, and was the first who laid down theoretical laws for practical eloquence;

he opened a school in which he taught rhetoric, and the historian Thucydides is said to have been one of his pupils. The orations which he composed were written for others; and the only time that he spoke in public himself was when he was accused and condemned to death. This speech, which was considered in antiquity a master-piece of eloquence, is now lost. (Thuc., viii., 68; Cic., Brut., 12.) We still possess fifteen orations of Antiphon, three of which were written by him for others, and the remaining twelve as specimens for his school, or exercises on fictitious cases. They are printed in the collections of the Attic orators, and separately, edited by Baiter and Sauppe, Zürich, 1838, and Mätzner, Berlin, 1838.—2. A tragic poet, whom many writers confound with the Attic orator, lived at Syraeusa, at the court of the elder Dionysius, by whom he was put to death.—3. Of Athens, a Sophist and an epic poet, wrote a work on the interpretation of dreams, which is referred to by Cicero and others. He is the same person as the Antiphon who was an opponent of Socrates. (Xen., Mem., i., 6.)—4. The youngest brother of Plato, mentioned in the Parmenides.—5. An Athenian, who was arrested for favoring the cause of Macedonia, at the instigation of Demosthenes, and put to death.

[ΑΝΤΙΦΩΝΟΣ ('Αντίφωνος), one of the sons of Priam, accompanied his father when he went to solicit the body of Hector from Achilles.]

[ΑΝΤΙΦΡΑΞ ('Αντίφρα and 'Αντίφραι), a city of Africa, in the Libyan nome, at some distance from the sea: it was here that the common Libyan wine was made, which formed the drink of the lower orders at Alexandria.]

ΑΝΤΙΦΗΣ ('Αντίφος). 1. Son of Priam and Heeuba, slain by Agamemnon.—2. Son of Thesalus, and one of the Greek heroes at Troy.—3. Son of Pylæmenes and the nymph Gygæa, ally of the Trojans, joint leader with his brother Mestibes of the Mæonians from Mount Tmolus.—4. Son of Ægyptius of Ithaca, a companion of Ulysses in his wanderings; devoured by Polyphemus.—5. Another Ithæacan, a friend of Telemachus.]

ΑΝΤΙΨΟΛΙΣ ('Αντίπολις: now Antibes, pronounced by the inhabitants Antiboul), a town in Gallia Narbonensis on the coast, in the territory of the Deciates, a few miles west of Nicæa, was founded by Massilia: the muria, or salt pickle made of fish, prepared at this town, was very celebrated.

ΑΝΤΙΡΗΨΙΟΝ ('Αντίρριον: now Castello di Romelia), a promontory on the borders of Ætolia and Locris, opposite Rhium (now Castello di Morea) in Achaia, with which it formed the narrow entrance of the Corinthian Gulf: the straits are sometimes called the Little Dardanelles.

ΑΝΤΙΣΣΑ ('Αντίσσα: 'Αντισσαίος: now Kalas Limnionas), a town in Lesbos with a harbor, on the western coast between Methymna and the promontory Sigrum, was originally on a small island opposite Lesbos, which was afterward united with Lesbos. [It was the birthplace of the poet Terpander.] It was destroyed by the Romans, B.C. 168, and its inhabitants removed to Methymna, because they had assisted Antiochus.

ΑΝΤΙΣΤΗΕΝΕΣ ('Αντισθένης). 1. An Athenian, founder of the sect of the Cynic philosophers. His mother was a Thracian. In his youth he fought at Tanagra (B.C. 426), and was a disciple first of Gorgias, and then of Socrates, whom he never quitted, and at whose death he was present. He died at Athens, at the age of seventy. He taught in the Cynosarges, a gymnasium for the use of Athenians born of foreign mothers; whence probably his followers were called Cynics (κυνικοί), though others derive their name from the dog-like neglect of all forms and usages of society. His writings were very numerous, and chiefly dialogues; his style was pure and elegant; and he possessed considerable powers of wit and sarcasm. Two declamations of his are preserved, named Ajax and Ulysses, which are purely rhetorical. He was an enemy to all speculation, and thus was opposed to Plato, whom he attacked furiously in one of his dialogues. His philosophical system was confined almost entirely to ethics, and he taught that virtue is the sole thing necessary. He showed his contempt of all the luxuries and outward comforts of life by his mean clothing and hard fare. From his school the Stoics subsequently sprung. In one of his works entitled Physicus, he contended for the unity of the Deity. (Cic., De Nat. Deor., i., 13.) [The fragments of his writings have been collected and published by Winckelmann, Antisthenis Fragmenta, Turici, 1842.—2. Of Rhodes, a Greek historian, who flourished about 200 B.C. He wrote a history of his own times, which has perished.]

ΑΝΤΙΣΤΗΣ, P., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 88, a distinguished orator, supported the party of Sulla, and was put to death by order of young Marius in 82. His daughter Antistia was married to Pompeius Magnus.

ΑΝΤΙΤΑΥΡΟΣ ('Αντίταυρος: now Ali-Dagh), a chain of mountains, which strikes off northeast from the main chain of the Taurus on the southern border of Cappadocia, in the centre of which district it turns to the east and runs parallel to the Taurus as far as the Euphrates. Its average height exceeds that of the Taurus; and one of its summits, Mount Argæus, near Mazæa, is the loftiest mountain of Asia Minor.

ΑΝΤΙΟΝ (Antias: now Torre or Porto d'Anzo), a very ancient town of Latium, on a rocky promontory running out some distance into the Tyrrhenian Sea. It was founded by Tyrrhenians and Pelasgians, and in earlier and even later times was noted for its piracy. Although united by Tarquinius Superbus to the Latin League, it generally sided with the Volscians against Rome. It was taken by the Romans in B.C. 468, and a colony was sent thither, but it revolted, was taken a second time by the Romans in B.C. 338, was deprived of all its ships, the beaks of which (Rostra) served to ornament the platform of the speakers in the Roman forum, was forbidden to have any ships in future, and received another Roman colony. But it gradually recovered its former importance, was allowed in course of time again to be used as a seaport, and in the latter times of the republic and under the empire, became a favorite residence of many of the Roman nobles and emperors.

The Emperor Nero was born here, and in the remains of his palace the celebrated Apollo Belvedere was found. Antium possessed a celebrated temple of Fortune (O Diva, gratum que regis Antium, Hor., Carm., i., 35), of Æsculapius, and at the port of Ceno, a little to the east of Antium, a temple of Neptune, on which account the place is now called Nettuno.

ANTIUS RESTIO. Vid. RESTIO.

ANTŌNIA. 1. Major, elder daughter of M. Antouius and Octavia, wife of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and mother of Cn. Domitius, the father of the Emperor Nero. Tacitus calls this Antonia the younger daughter.—2. Minor, younger sister of the preceding, wife of Drusus, the brother of the Emperor Tiberius, and mother of Germanicus, the father of the Emperor Caligula, of Livia or Livilla, and of the Emperor Claudius. She died A.D. 35, soon after the accession of her grandson Caligula. She was celebrated for her beauty, virtue, and chastity.—3. Daughter of the Emperor Claudius, married first to Pompeius Magnus, and afterward to Faustus Sulla. Nero wished to marry her after the death of his wife Poppæa, A.D. 66; and on her refusal he caused her to be put to death on a charge of treason.

ANTŌNIA TURRIS, a castle on a rock at the northwest corner of the temple at Jerusalem, which commanded both the temple and the city. It was at first called Baris: Herod the Great changed its name in honor of Marcus Antonius. It contained the residence of the Procurator Judææ.

ANTŌNINI ITINERARIUM, the title of an extant work, which is a very valuable itinerary of the whole Roman empire, in which both the principal and the cross-roads are described by a list of all the places and stations upon them, the distances from place to place being given in Roman miles. It is usually attributed to the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antonius, but it appears to have been commenced by order of Julius Cæsar, and to have been completed in the reign of Augustus, though it is probable that it received important additions and revision under one or both of the Antonines.—Editions: By Wesseling, Amst., 1735; by Parthey and Pinder, Berlin, 1848.

ANTŌNINŌPŌLIS (Ἀντωνινόπολις—λίτης, -anus), a city of Mesopotamia, between Edessa and Dara, afterward Maximianapolis, and afterward Constantia.

ANTŌNINUS, M. AURELIUS. Vid. AURELIUS, M.

ANTŌNINUS PIUS, Roman emperor, A.D. 138–161. His name in the early part of his life, at full length, was Titus Aurelius Fulvus Boionius Arrius Antoninus. His paternal ancestors came from Nemausus (now Nîmes) in Gaul; but Antoninus himself was born near Lanuvium, September 19th, A.D. 86. From an early age he gave promise of his future worth. In 120 he was consul, and subsequently proconsul of the province of Asia: on his return to Rome, he lived on terms of the greatest intimacy with Hadrian, who adopted him on February 25th, 138. Henceforward he bore the name of T. Ælius Hadrianus Antoninus Cæsar, and on the death of Hadrian, July 2d, 138, he ascended the throne. The Senate conferred upon him the title of Pius, or the dutifully affectionate, because he persuaded them to grant to his father Hadrian the apotheosis and the other honors usually paid to deceased emperors, which they had at first refused to bestow upon Hadrian. The reign of Antoninus is almost a blank in history—a blank caused by the suspension for a time of war, violence, and crime. He was one of the best princes that ever mounted a throne, and all his thoughts and energies were dedicated to the happiness of his people. No attempt was made to achieve new conquests, and various insurrections among the Germans, Dacians, Jews, Moors, Egyptians, and Britons, were easily quelled by his legates. In all the relations of private life the character of Antoninus was without reproach. He was faithful to his wife Faustina, notwithstanding her profligate life, and after her death loaded her memory with honors. He died at Lorium, March 7th, 161, in his seventy-fifth year. He was succeeded by Marcus Aurelius, whom he had adopted, when he himself was adopted by Hadrian, and to whom he gave his daughter FAUSTINA in marriage.

ANTŌNINUS LIBERALIS, a Greek grammarian, probably lived in the reign of the Antonines, about A.D. 147, and wrote a work on Metamorphoses (Μεταμορφώσεων συναγωγή) in forty-one chapters, which is extant.—Editions: By Verheyk, Lugd. Bat., 1774; by Koeh, Lips., 1832; by Westermaun, in his Mythographi, Brunsv., 1843.

ANTŌNINUS. 1. M., the orator, born B.C. 143; quæstor in 113; prætor in 104, when he fought against the pirates in Cilicia; consul in 99; and censor in 97. He belonged to Sulla's party, and was put to death by Marius and Cinna when they entered Rome in 87: his head was cut off and placed on the Rostra. Cicero mentions him and L. Crassus as the most distinguished orators of their age; and he is introduced as one of the speakers in Cicero's De Oratore.—2. M., surnamed Creticus, elder son of the orator, and father of the triumvir, was prætor in 75, and received the command of the fleet and all the coasts of the Mediterranean, in order to clear the sea of pirates; but he did not succeed in his object, and used his power to plunder the provinces. He died shortly afterward in Crete, and was called Creticus in derision.—3. C., younger son of the orator, and uuele of the triumvir, was expelled the Senate in 70, and was the colleague of Cicero in the prætorship (65) and consulship (63). He was one of Catiline's conspirators, but deserted the latter by Cicero's promising him the province of Macedonia. He had to lead an army against Catiline, but, unwilling to fight against his former friend, he gave the command on the day of battle to his legate, M. Petreius. At the conclusion of the war, Antony went into his province, which he plundered shamefully; and on his return to Rome in 59, was accused both of taking part in Catiline's conspiracy and of extortion in his province. He was defended by Cicero, but was condemned, and retired to the island of Cephallenia. He was subsequently recalled, probably by Cæsar, and was in Rome at the beginning of 44.—4. M., the TRIUMVIR, was son of No. 2, and Julia, the sister of L. Julius Cæsar, consul in 64, and was born about 83 B.C. His father died while he was still young, and he was brought up by Cornelius Lentulus, who married his mother Julia, and who was put to death by Cicero in 63 as one of Catiline's conspirators; whence he became a personal enemy of Cicero. Antony indulged in his earliest youth in every kind of dissipation, and his affairs soon became deeply involved. In 58 he went to Syria, where he served with distinction under A. Gabinius. He took part in the campaigns against Aristobulus in Palestine (57, 56), and in the restoration of Ptolemy Auletes to Egypt in 55. In 54 he went to Cæsar in Gaul, and by the influence of the latter was elected quæstor. As quæstor (52) he returned to Gaul, and served under Cæsar for the next two years (52, 51). He returned to Rome in 50, and became one of the most active partisans of Cæsar. He was tribune of the plebs in 49, and in January fled to Cæsar's camp in Cisalpine Gaul, after putting his veto upon the decree of the Senate which deprived Cæsar of his command. He accompanied Cæsar in his victorious march into Italy, and was left by Cæsar in the command of Italy, while the latter carried on the war in Spain. In 48 Antony was present at the battle of Pharsalia, where he commanded the left wing; and in 47 he was again left in the command of Italy during Cæsar's absence in Africa. In 44 he was consul with Cæsar, when he offered him the kingly diadem at the festival of the Lupercalia. After Cæsar's murder on the 15th of March, Antony endeavored to succeed to his power. He therefore used every means to appear as his representative; he pronounced the speech over Cæsar's body, and read his will to the people; and he also obtained the papers and private property of Cæsar. But he found a new and unexpected rival in young Octavianus, the adopted son and great-nephew of the dictator, who came from Apollonia to Rome, assumed the name of Cæsar, and at first joined the Senate in order to crush Antony. Toward the end of the year Antony proceeded to Cisalpine Gaul, which had been previously granted him by the Senate; but Dec. Brutus refused to surrender the province to Antony and threw himself into Mutina, where he was besieged by Antony. The Senate approved of the conduct of Brutus, declared Antony a public enemy, and intrusted the conduct of the war against him to Octavianus. Antony was defeated at the battle of Mutina, in April, 43, and was obliged to cross the Alps. Both the consuls, however, had fallen, and the Senate now began to show their jealousy of Octavianus. Meantime Antony was joined by Lepidus with a powerful army; Octavianus became reconciled to Antony; and it was agreed that the government of the state should be vested in Antony, Octavianus, and Lepidus, under the title of Triumviri Reipublice Constituende, for the next five years. The mutual friends of each were proscribed, and in the numerous executions that followed, Cicero, who had attacked Antony in the most unmeasured manner in his Philippic Orations, fell a victim to Antony. In 42, Antony and Octavianus crushed the republican party by the battle of Philippi, in which Brutus and Cassius fell. Antony then went to Asia, which he had received as his share of the Roman world. In Cilicia he met with Cleopatra, and followed her to Egypt, a captive to her charms. In 41 Fulvia, the wife of Antony, and his brother L. Antonius, made war upon Octavianus in Italy. Antony prepared to support his relatives, but the war was brought to a close at the beginning of 40, before Antony could reach Italy. The opportune death of Fulvia facilitated the reconciliation of Antony and Octavianus, which was cemented by Antony marrying Octavia, the sister of Octavianus. Antony remained in Italy till 39, when the triumvirs concluded a peace with Sext. Pompey, and he afterward went to his provinces in the East. In this year and the following, Ventidius, the lieutenant of Antony, defeated the Parthians. In 37 Antony crossed over to Italy, when the triumvirate was renewed for five years. He then returned to the East, and shortly afterward sent Octavia back to her brother, and surrendered himself entirely to the charms of Cleopatra. In 36 he invaded Parthia, but he lost a great number of his troops, and was obliged to retreat. He was more successful in his invasion of Armenia in 34, for he obtained possession of the person of Artavasdes, the Armenian king, and carried him to Alexandria. Antony now laid aside entirely the character of a Roman citizen, and assumed the pomp and ceremony of an eastern despot. His conduct, and the unbounded influence which Cleopatra had acquired over him, alienated many of his friends and supporters; and Octavianus thought that the time had now come for crushing his rival. The contest was decided by the memorable sea-fight off Actium, September 2d, 31, in which Antony's fleet was completely defeated. Antony, accompanied by Cleopatra, fled to Alexandria, where he put an end to his own life in the following year (30), when Octavianus appeared before the city.—5. C., brother of the triumvir, was prætor in Macedonia, B.C. 44, fell into the hands of Marcus Brutus in 43, and was put to death by Brutus in 42, to revenge the murder of Cicero.—6. L., youngest brother of the triumvir, was consul in 41, when he engaged in war against Octavianus at the instigation of Fulvia, his brother's wife. He was unable to resist Octavianus, and threw himself into the town of Perusia, which he was obliged to surrender in the following year; hence the war is usually called that of Perusia. His life was spared, and he was afterwards appointed by Octavianus to the command of Iberia. Cicero draws a frightful picture of Lucius's character. He calls him a gladiator and a robber, and heaps upon him every term of reproach and contempt. Much of this is of course exaggeration.—7. M., called by the Greek writers Antyllus, which is probably only a corrupt form of Antonillus (young Antonius), elder son of the triumvir by Fulvia, was executed by order of Octavianus, after the death of his father in B.C. 30.—8. IULIUS, younger son of the triumvir by Fulvia, was brought up by his step-mother Octavia at Rome, and received great marks of favor from Augustus. He was consul in B.C. 10, but was put to death in 2, in consequence of his adulterous intercourse with Julia, the daughter of Augustus.

ANTRON (Ἀντρώων and οἱ Ἀντρώωνες: Ἀντρώωνος: now Pano), a town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, at the entrance of the Sinus Malinus.

ANTUNNACUM (now Andernach), a town of the Ubii on the Rhine.

ANŪBIS (Ἄνουβις), an Egyptian divinity, worshipped in the form of a human being with a dog's head. He was originally worshipped simply as the representative of the dog, which animal, like the cat, was sacred in Egypt; but his worship was subsequently mixed up with other religious systems, and Anubis thus assumed a symbolical or astronomical character, at least with the learned. His worship prevailed throughout Egypt, but he was most honored at Cynopolis in Middle Egypt. Later myths relate that Anubis was the son of Osiris and Nephthys, born after the death of his father; and that Isis brought him up, and made him her guard and companion, who thus performed to her the same service that dogs perform to men. In the temples of Egypt Anubis seems to have been represented as the guard of other gods, and the place in the front of a temple was particularly sacred to him. The Greeks identified him with their own Hermes, and thus speak of Hermanubis in the same manner as of Zeus Ammon. His worship was introduced at Rome toward the end of the republic, and, under the empire, spread very widely both in Greece and at Rome.

[ANXUR. Vid. TARRACINA.]

ANXUR, an ally of Turnus in Italy, wounded by Æneas.]

ANXŪRUS, an Italian divinity, who was worshipped in a grove near Auxur (Tarracina), together with Peronia. He was regarded as a youthful Jupiter, and Peronia as Juno. On coins his name appears as Axur or Anxur.

ANYSIS (Ἄνυσις), an ancient king of Egypt, in whose reign Egypt was invaded by the Æthiopians under their king, Sabaco.

ANŪTE (Ἀνύτη), of Tegea, the authoress of several epigrams in the Greek Anthology, flourished about B.C. 300, [a date which some writers, on mere conjecture, have changed to 700 B.C.] The epigrams are for the most part in the style of the ancient Doric choral songs.

ANŪTUS (Ἄνυτος), a wealthy Athenian, son of Anthemion, the most influential and formidable of the accusers of Socrates, B.C. 399 (hence Socrates is called Anyti reus, Hor., Sat. ii., 4, 3). He was a leading man of the democratic party, and took an active part along with Thrasybulus, in the overthrow of the Thirty Tyrants. The Athenians, having repented of their condemnation of Socrates, sent Anytus into banishment.

[ÆCDE (Ἄϊδής), one of the three oldest Muses, whose worship was introduced into Bœotia by the Aloidae.]

AŌN (Ἄων), son of Neptune, and an ancient Bœotian hero, from whom the Aones, an ancient race in Bœotia, were believed to have derived their name. Aônia was the name of the part of Bœotia near Phocis, in which were Mount Helicon and the fountain Aganippe (Aoniæ aque, Ov., Fast. iii., 456). The Muses are also called Aonides, since they frequented Helicon and the fountain of Aganippe. (Ov., Met. v., 333.)

AŌNIDES. Vid. AON.

[AORNOS (Ἄορνός), a city of Bactria, next to

Bactra in importance, having a strong and lofty citadel, but taken by Alexander the Great. Wilson regards the name as of Sanscrit origin (from Avarana), and meaning "an inclosure" or "stockade."—2. A mountain fastness of India on this side of the Indus, between the Copheu and Indus, to which the inhabitants of Bazira fled from before Alexander.]

AORSI (Ἄορσοί) or ADORSI, a powerful people of Asiatic Sarmatia, who appear to have had their original settlements on the northeast of the Caspian, but are chiefly found between the Palus Mæotis (now Sea of Azof) and the Caspian, to the southeast of the River Tanais (now Don), whence they spread far into European Sarmatia. They carried on a considerable traffic in Babylonian merchandise, which they fetched on camels out of Media and Armenia.

AŌUS or ÆAS (Ἄῶος or Αἶας: now Viosa, Viussa or Vovussa), the principal river of the Greek part of Illyricum, rises in Mount Læmon, the northern part of Pindus, and flows into the Ionian Sea near Apollonia.

[ΑΡΑΜΑ (Ἄραμα or Ἀράμη), wife of Seleucus Nicator, and mother of Antiochus Soter.]

ΑΡἈΜΕΛΑ or -ΙΑ (Ἀπάμεια: Ἀπαμειεύς, Ἀραμειεύς, -ένος, -ensis), the name of several Asiatic cities, three of which were founded by Seleucus I. Nicator, and named in honor of his wife Arama. 1.

A. AD ORONTEM (now Famial), the capital of the Syrian province Aramene, and, under the Romans, of Syria Secunda, was built by Seleucus Nicator on the site of the older city of PELLA in a very strong position on the River Orontes or Axius, the citadel being on the left (west) bank of the river, and the city on the right. It was surrounded by rich pastures, in which Seleucus kept a splendid stud of horses and five hundred elephants.—2. In OSROËNE in Mesopotamia (now Balasir), a town built by Seleucus Nicator on the east bank of the Euphrates, opposite to ZEUGMA, with which it was connected by a bridge, commanded by a castle, called Seleucia. In Pliny's time (A.D. 77) it was only a ruin.—3. A. CIBŌTUS or AD MEANDRUM (Ἄ. ἡ Κιβωτός, or πρὸς Μαιάνδρον), a great city of Phrygia, on the Mæander, close above its confluence with the Marsyas. It was built by Antiochus I. Soter, who named it in honor of his mother Arama, and peopled it with the inhabitants of the neighboring Celæne. It became one of the greatest cities of Asia within the Euphrates; and, under the Romans, it was the seat of a Conventus Juridicus. The surrounding country, watered by the Mæander and its tributaries, was called Apamæna Regio.—4. A. MYRLËON, in Bithynia. Vid. MYRLËA.—5. A town built by Antiochus Soter, in the district of Assyria called Sittacene, at the junction of the Tigris with the Royal Canal which connected the Tigris with the Euphrates, and at the northern extremity of the island called Mesene, which was formed by this canal and the two rivers.—6. A. MESENES (now Korna), in Babylonia, at the south point of the same Island of Mesene, and at the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates.—7. A. RHAGIANA (Ἄ. ἡ πρὸς Παγαίς), a Greek city in the district of Choarene in Parthia (formerly in Media), south of the Caspian Gates.

[ΑΡΕΛΛΑ, a very common name of Roman freedmen: the Jews in Rome, mostly freedmen, dwelt on the further side of the Tiber, and were regarded as superstitious; hence Apella came to be used proverbially for a superstitious person. (Credat Judæus Apella, Hor., Sat., i, 5, 100.)

APELLES (Ἀπελλῆς), the most celebrated of Grecian painters, was born, most probably, at Colophon in Ionia, though some ancient writers call him a Coan, and others an Ephesian. He was the contemporary and friend of Alexander the Great (B.C. 336-323), whom he probably accompanied to Asia, and who entertained so high an opinion of him, that he was the only person whom Alexander would permit to take his portrait. After Alexander's death he appears to have travelled through the western parts of Asia. Being driven by a storm to Alexandria, after the assumption of the regal title by Ptolemy (B.C. 306), whose favor he had not gained while he was with Alexander, his rivals laid a plot to ruin him, which he defeated by an ingenious use of his skill in drawing. We are not told when or where he died. Throughout his life Apelles labored to improve himself, especially in drawing, which he never spent a day without practicing. Hence the proverb Nulla dies sine linea. A list of his works is given by Pliny (xxxv., 36). They are for the most part single figures, or groups of a very few figures. Of his portraits the most celebrated was that of Alexander wielding a thunderbolt; but the most admired of all his pictures was the "Venus Anadyomene" (ἡ ἀναδυομένη Ἀφροδίτη), or Venus rising out of the sea. The goddess was wringing her hair, and the falling drops of water formed a transparent silver veil around her form. He commenced another picture of Venus, which he intended should surpass the Venus Anadyomene, but which he left unfinished at his death.

APELLICON (Ἀπελλικῶν), of Teos, a Peripatetic philosopher and great collector of books. His valuable library at Athens, containing the autographs of Aristotle's works, was carried to Rome by Sulla (B.C. 83): Apellicon had died just before.

APENNINUS Mons (ὁ Ἀπέννινος and τὸ Ἀπέννινον ὄρος, probably from the Celtic Pen, "a height"), the Apennines, a chain of mountains which runs throughout Italy from north to south, and forms the backbone of the peninsula. It is a continuation of the Maritime Alps (vid. ALPES), begins near Genua, and ends at the Sicilian Sea, and throughout its whole course sends off numerous branches in all directions. It rises to its greatest height in the country of the Sabines, where one of its points (now Monte Corno) is 9521 feet above the sea; and further south, at the boundaries of Samnium, Apulia, and Lucania, it divides into two main branches, one of which runs east through Apulia and Calabria, and terminates at the Salentine promontory, and the other west, through Bruttium, terminating apparently at Rhegium and the Straits of Messina, but in reality continued throughout Sicily. The greater part of the Apennines is composed of limestone, abounding in numerous caverns and recesses, which, in ancient as well as modern times, were the resort of numerous robbers: the highest points of the mountains are covered with snow, even during most of the summer (nivali vertice se attollens Apenninus Virg., Æn., xii., 703).

APER, M., a Roman orator and a native of Gaul, rose by his eloquence to the rank of quaestor, tribune, and prætor, successively. He is one of the speakers in the Dialogue De Oratoribus, attributed to Tacitus.

APER, ARRĪUS, prætorian prefect, and son-in-law of the Emperor Numerian, whom he was said to have murdered: he was himself put to death by Diocletian on his accession in A.D. 284.

APERANTĪA, a town and district of Ætolia near the Achelous, inhabited by the Aperantii.

[ΑΠΕΡΟΡΪΑ (Ἀπερορῖα: now Dhoko or Bello Poulo), a small island in the Argolic Gulf, near Hydræa.]

APĒSAS (Ἀπέσας: now Fuka?), a mountain on the borders of Phlissia and Argolis, with a temple of Jupiter (Zeus), who was hence called Apesantius, and to whom Perseus here first sacrificed.

ΑΡΗΧΑ (τὸ Ἀράκα: now Αρκα?), a town of Cœle-Syria, between Heliopolis and Byblus celebrated for the worship and oracle of Venus (Aphrodite) Aphacitis (Ἀφακίτις).

ΑΡΗΑΡΕΪΣ (Ἀραρεῖς), son of the Messenian king Perieres and Gorgophone, and founder of the town of Arene in Messenia, which he called after his wife. His two sons, Idas and Lynceus, the Apharetidæ (Aphareïa proles, Ov., Met., viii., 304), are celebrated for their fight with the Dioscuri, which is described by Pindar. (Nem., x., 111.)—[2. Son of Caletor, slain by Æneas before Troy.—3. A centaur, whose arm was crushed by Theseus with the trunk of an oak at the nuptials of Pirithœus.]—4. An Athenian orator and tragic poet, flourished B.C. 369-342. After the death of his father, his mother married the orator Isocrates, who adopted Aphareus as his son. He wrote thirty-five or thirty-seven tragedies, and gained four prizes.

ΑΡΗΕΤΕ (Ἀρέται and Ἀφεταί: Ἀφεταῖος: [now Fetio?]), a sea-port and promontory of Thessaly, at the entrance of the Sinus Maliacus, from which the ship Argo is said to have sailed.

ΑΡΗΪΔΑΣ (Ἀρείδας), son of Arcas, obtained from his father Tegea and the surrounding territory. He had a son, Aleus.—[2. Son of Polyphemus, for whom Ulysses, on his return to Ithaca, passed himself off to Eumæus.—3. A centaur, slain by Theseus at the nuptials of Pirithous.]

ΑΡΗΪΔΝΑ (Ἀρίδνα and Ἀρίδναι: Ἀρίδναῖος), an Attic demus not far from Decælea, originally belonged to the tribe Æantis, afterward to Leontis, and last to Hadrianis. It was in ancient times one of the twelve towns and districts into which Cærops is said to have divided Attica, in it Theseus concealed Helen, but her brothers, Castor and Pollux, took the place and rescued their sister.

[ΑΡΗΪΔΝΟΣ, one of the companions of Æneas, slain by Turnus.]

ΑΡΗΡΩΪΣΙΑΣ (Ἀφροδισιαῖς: Ἀφροδισιεῖς: Aphrodisiensis), the name of several places famous for the worship of Aphrodite (Venus). 1. A. CARLÆ (now Gheira, ruins), on the site of an old town of the Leleges, named Ninöë: under the Romans a free city and asylum, and a flourishing school of art.—2. VENERIS OPIDUM (now

Porto Cavaliere, a town, harbor, and island on the coast of Cilicia, opposite to Cyprus.—3. A town, harbor, and island on the coast of Cyrenæa, in North Africa.—4. Vid. GADES.—[5. (Now Kaisch), an island in the Persian Gulf, on the coast of Carmania, earlier called Cataea.]

[APHRODISIUM (Ἀφροδίσιον), a town on the northern coast of Cyprus.—2. A village of Arcadia, east of Megalopolis.—3. One of the three minor harbors into which the Piræus was subdivided.—4. A PROMONTORIUM, a promontory at the eastern base of the Pyrenees, with a temple of Aphrodite (Venus).]

APHRODITE (Ἀφροδίτη), one of the great divinities of the Greeks, the goddess of love and beauty. In the Iliad she is represented as the daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Dione, and, in later traditions, as a daughter of Saturn (Cronos) and Eponyme, or of Uranus and Hemera; but the poets most frequently relate that she was sprung from the foam (ἀφρός) of the sea, whence they derive her name. She is commonly represented as the wife of Vulcan (Hephestus); but she proved faithless to her husband, and was in love with Mars (Ares), the god of war, to whom she bore Phobos, Deimos, Harmonia, and, according to later traditions, Eros and Anteros also. She also loved the gods Bacchus (Dionysus), Mercury (Hermes), and Neptune (Poseidon), and the mortals ANCHISES, ADONIS, and BURET. She surpassed all the other goddesses in beauty, and hence received the prize of beauty from Paris. She likewise had the power of granting beauty and invincible charms to others, and whoever wore her magic girdle immediately became an object of love and desire. In the vegetable kingdom the myrtle, rose, apple, poppy, &c., were sacred to her. The animals sacred to her, which are often mentioned as drawing her chariot or serving as her messengers, are the sparrow, the dove, the swan, the swallow, and a bird called iynx. The planet Venus and the spring-month of April were likewise sacred to her. The principal places of her worship in Greece were the islands of Cyprus and Cythera. The sacrifices offered to her consisted mostly of incense and garlands of flowers, but in some places animals were sacrificed to her. Respecting her festivals, vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. ADONIA, ANAGOGIA, APHRODISIA, CATAGOGIA. Her worship was of Eastern origin, and probably introduced by the Phœnicians into the islands of Cyprus, Cythera, and others, whence it spread all over Greece. She appears to have been originally identical with Astarte, called by the Hebrews Ashtoreth, and her connection with Adonis clearly points to Syria. Respecting the Roman goddess Venus, vid. VENUS.

APHRODITOPOLIS (Ἀφροδίτης πόλις), the name of several cities in Egypt. 1. In Lower Egypt: (1.) In the Nomos Leontopolites, in the Delta, between Arthribis and Leontopolis; (2.) (Now Chybin-el-Koum), in the Nomos Prosopites, in the Delta, on a navigable branch of the Nile, between Nauaratis and Sais; probably the same as Atarbeehis, which is an Egyptian name of the same meaning as the Greek Aphroditopolis.—2. In Middle Egypt or Heptanomis (now Atfyh), a considerable city on the east bank of the Nile; the chief city of the Nomos Aphroditopolites.—

3. In Upper Egypt, or the Thebais: (1.) Veneris Oppidum (now Tachta), a little way from the west bank of the Nile; the chief city of the Nomos Aphroditopolites; (2.) In the Nomos Hermonthites (now Deir, northwest of Esneh), on the west bank of the Nile.

APHRONIUS (Ἀφρόνιος), of Autioch, a Greek rhetorician, lived about A.D. 315, and wrote the introduction to the study of rhetoric, entitled Progymnasmata (προγυμνάσματα). It was constructed on the basis of the Progymnasmata of Hermogeus, and became so popular that it was used as the common school-book in this branch of education for several centuries. On the revival of letters it recovered its ancient popularity, and during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries was used every where, but more especially in Germany, as the text book for rhetoric. The number of editions and translations which were published during that period is greater than that of any other ancient writer. The best edition is in Walz's Rhetores Græci, vol. 1. Aphthonius also wrote some Æsopic fables, which are extant.

APHÏTIS (Ἀφῆτις; now Athyto), a town in the peninsula Pallene in Mæcedonia, with a celebrated temple and oracle of Jupiter Ammon.

ΑΡΙΑ (Ἀρία, sc. γῆ), the Apian land, an ancient name of Peloponnesus, especially Argolis, said to have been so called from Apis, a mythical king of Argos.

APICATA, wife of Sejanus, was divorced by him, A.D. 23, after she had borne him three children, and put an end to her own life on the execution of Sejanus, 31.

APICIUS, the name of three notorious gluttons:—1. The first lived in the time of Sulla, and is said to have procured the condemnation of Rutilius Rufus, B.C. 92.—2. The second and most renowned, M. Gabius Apicius, flourished under Tiberius. [It is stated by Seneca that, after having spent upon his culinary dainties one hundred millions of sesterces (sestertium millies), upward of three millions of dollars, he became overwhelmed with debts, and was thus forced, for the first time, to look into his accounts. He found that he would have only ten millions of sesterces (sestertium centies), a sum somewhat over three hundred thousand dollars, left after paying his debts;] upon which, despairing of being able to satisfy the cravings of hunger from such a pittance, he forthwith put an end to his life by poison. But he was not forgotten. Sundry cakes (Apicia) and sauces long kept alive his memory; Apion, the grammarian, composed a work upon his luxurious labors, and his name passed into a proverb in all matters connected with the pleasures of the table.—3. A contemporary of Trajan, sent to this emperor, when he was in Parthia, fresh oysters, preserved by a skillful process of his own. The treatise we now possess, bearing the title CÆLII APICII de Oponiis et Condimentis, sive de Re Culinaria Libri decem, is a sort of Cook and Confectioner's Manual, containing a multitude of receipts for cookery. It was probably compiled at a late period by some one who prefixed the name of Apicius, in order to insure the circulation of his book.—Editions: By Almeloveen, Amstelod., 1709; and by Bernhold, Ansbach, 1800.

ΑΡΙΔΑΝΟΣ (Ἀριδανός, Ion. Ἰριδανός), a river in Thessaly, which receives the Enīpeus near Pharsalus, and empties into the Peneus.

APIÖLÆ, a town of Latium, destroyed by Tarquinius Priscus.

ΑΡΙΩΝ (Ἀπίων), a Greek grammarian, and a native of Oasis Magna in Egypt, studied at Alexandria, and taught rhetoric at Rome in the reigns of Tiberius and Claudius. In the reign of Caligula he left Rome, and in A.D. 38 he was sent by the inhabitants of Alexandria at the head of an embassy to Caligula to bring forward complaints against the Jews residing in their city. Apion was the author of many works, all of which are now lost [with the exception of a few fragments]. Of these the most celebrated were upon the Homeric poems. He is said not only to have made the best recension of the text of the poems, but to have written explanations of phrases and words in the form of a dictionary (λέξεις Ὀμηρικαί). He also wrote a work on Egypt in five books, and a work against the Jews, to which Josephus replied in his treatise Against Apion.

ΑΡΙΩΝ, PTOLEMÆUS. Vid. PTOLEMÆUS, ΑΡΙΩΝ.

ΑΠΙΣ (Ἀπις). 1. Son of Phoroneus and Ladoice, king of Argos, from whom Peloponnesus was called ΑΡΙΑ: he ruled tyrannically, and was killed by Thelxion and Telchis.—2. The Bull of Memphis, worshipped with the greatest reverence as a god among the Egyptians. The Egyptians believed that he was the offspring of a young cow, fructified by a ray from heaven. There were certain signs by which he was recognized to be the god. It was requisite that he should be quite black, have a white square mark on the forehead, on his back a figure similar to that of an eagle, have two kinds of hair in his tail, and on his tongue a knot resembling an insect called cantharus. When all these signs were discovered, the animal was consecrated with great pomp, and was conveyed to Memphis, where he had a splendid residence, containing extensive walks and courts for his amusement. His birth-day, which was celebrated every year, was his most solemn festival: it was a day of rejoicing for all Egypt. The god was allowed to live only a certain number of years, probably twenty-five. If he had not died before the expiration of that period, he was killed and buried in a sacred well, the place of which was unknown except to the initiated. But if he died a natural death, he was buried publicly and solemnly; and as his birth filled all Egypt with joy and festivities, so his death threw the whole country into grief and mourning. The worship of Apis was originally nothing but the simple worship of the bull; but in the course of time, the bull, like other animals, was regarded as a symbol, and Apis is hence identified with Osiris or the Sun.

ΑΠΙΣ (Ἀπις: now Kasser Schama?) a city of Egypt on the coast of the Mediterranean, on the border of the country toward Libya, about one hundred stadia west of Parætonium; celebrated for the worship of the god Apis.

[ΑΡΙΣΙΩΝ (Ἀρισίων), son of Phasius, slain by Eurypylus before Troy.—2. Son of Hippasus, a leader of the Pæonians, slain by Lycomedes before Troy.]

ΑΡΟΒΑΤΙΜΙ (Ἀρόβαθμοι), a place in Argolis, on the sea, not far from Thyrea, where Danaus is said to have landed.

[ΑΡΟΒΑΤΗΡΑ (Ἀρόβαθρα. now Boja), a place near Sestos, where Xerxes's bridge of boats ended.]

ΑΡΟΔΟΤΙ and ΑΡΟΔΕΥΕ (Ἀρόδοτοι and Ἀροδοτοί), a people in the southeast of Ætolia, between the Evenus and Hylæthus.

[ΑΡΟΛΛΙΝΑΡΙΣ, ΣΥΛΠΙΧΙΟΣ. Vid. SYLPICIUS.]

ΑΡΟΛΛΙΝΙΣ ΠΡΟΜΟΝΤΟΡΙΟΝ (Ἀπόλλωνος ἄκρον. now Cape Zibeeb or Cape Farina), a promontory of Zeugitana in Northern Africa, forming the western point of the Gulf of Carthage.

[ΑΡΟΛΛΙΝΟΡΟΛΙΣ (Ἀπόλλωνος πόλις). 1. MAGNA ΠΟΛΙΣ ΜΕΓΑΛΗ Ἀπόλλωνος: now Edfou, the capital of the nome named after it, Apollouiatos, in Upper Egypt, on the west bank of the Nile. The people of this city were haters and destroyers of the crocodile.—2. ΠΑΡΥΑ (Ἀπόλλωνος ἡ μικρά: now Kuss), a city of Upper Egypt, on the east bank of the Nile, in the Nomos Coptites, between Coptos and Thebes.]

ΑΡΟΛΛΟ (Ἀπόλλων), one of the great divinities of the Greeks, son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Latona (Leto), and twin-brother of Diaua (Artemis), was born in the Island of Delos, whither Latona (Leto) had fled from the jealous Juno (Hera). Vid. LETO. After nine days' labor, the god was born under a palm or olive tree at the foot of Mount Cynthus, and was fed by Themis with ambrosia and nectar. The powers ascribed to Apollo are apparently of different kinds, but all are connected with one another, and may be said to be only ramifications of one and the same, as will be seen from the following classification. He is: 1. The god who punishes, whence some of the ancients derived his name from ἀπόλλυμι, destroy. (Æsch., Agam., 1081.) As the god who punishes, he is represented with bow and arrows, the gift of Vulcan (Hephestus); whence his epithets, ἐκατος, ἐκάεργος, ἐκατηβόλος, κλυτότοξος and ἀργυρότοξος, arcitenens, &c. All sudden deaths were believed to be the effect of the arrows of Apollo; and with them he sent the plague into the camp of the Greeks.—2. The god who affords help and wards off evil. As he had the power of punishing men, so he was also able to deliver men, if duly propitiated; hence his epithets, ἄεσιος, ἀκέστωρ, ἀλεξίκακος, σωτήρ, ἀποτρόπαιος, ἐπικούριος, ἰατρομαντις, ὀψιφ, salutifer, &c. From his being the god who afforded help, he is the father of Æsculapius, the god of the healing art, and was also identified in later times with Pæon, the god of the healing art in Homer. Vid. ΠÆΩΝ.—3. The god of prophecy. Apollo exercised this power in his numerous oracles, and especially in that of Delphi. Vid. Dict. of Ant. art. ORACULUM. He had also the power of communicating the gift of prophecy both to gods and men, and all the ancient seers and prophets are placed in some relationship to him.

—4. The god of song and music. We find him in the Iliad (l. 603) delighting the immortal gods with his phorminx; and the Homeric bards derived their art of song either from Apollo or the Muses. Later traditions ascribed to Apollo even the invention of the flute and lyre, while it is more commonly related that he received the lyre from Mercury (Hermes). Respecting his musical contests, vid. MARSTAS, MIDAS.—5. The god who protects the flocks and cattle (νόμιος θεός, from νόμος or λουή, a meadow or pasture land). There are in Homer only a few allusions to this feature in the character of Apollo, but in later writers it assumes a very prominent form, and in the story of Apollo tending the flocks of Admetus at Phæra in Thessaly, the idea reaches its height.—6. The god who delights in the foundation of towns and the establishment of civil constitutions. Hence a town or a colony was never founded by the Greeks without consulting an oracle of Apollo, so that in every case he became, as it were, their spiritual leader.—7. The god of the Sun. In Homer, Apollo and Helios, or the Sun, are perfectly distinct, and his identification with the Sun, though almost universal among later writers, was the result of later speculations and of foreign, chiefly Egyptian, influence. Apollo had more influence upon the Greeks than any other god. It may safely be asserted that the Greeks would never have become what they were without the worship of Apollo: in him the brightest side of the Grecian mind is reflected. Respecting his festivals, vid. Dict. of Ant., art. APOLLONIA, THARGELIA, and others. In the religion of the early Romans there is no trace of the worship of Apollo. The Romans became acquainted with this divinity through the Greeks, and adopted all their notions and ideas about him from the latter people. There is no doubt that the Romans knew of his worship among the Greeks at a very early time, and tradition says that they consulted his oracle at Delphi, even before the expulsion of the kings. But the first time that we hear of his worship at Rome is in B.C. 430, when, for the purpose of averting a plague, a temple was raised to him, and soon after dedicated by the consul, C. Julius. A second temple was built to him in 350. During the second Punic war, in 212, the ludi Apollinæres were instituted in his honor. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. LUDI APOLLINÆRES. His worship, however, did not form a very prominent part in the religion of the Romans till the time of Augustus, who, after the battle of Actium, dedicated to him a portion of the spoils, built or embellished his temple at Actium, and founded a new one at Rome on the Palatine, and instituted quinquennial games at Actium. The most beautiful and celebrated among the extant representations of Apollo are the Apollo Belvedere at Rome, which was discovered in 1503 at Rettuno, and the Apollino at Florence. In the Apollo Belvedere, the god is represented with commanding but serene majesty; sublime intellect and physical beauty are combined in the most wonderful manner.

APOLLŌCRĀTES (Ἀπολλοκράτης), elder son of Dionysius the Younger, was left by his father in command of the island and citadel of Syracuse, but was compelled by famine to surrender them to Dion, about B.C. 354.

APOLLŌDŌRUS (Ἀπολλοδόωρος). 1. Of AMPHIPOLIS, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, was intrusted in B.C. 331, together with Menes, with the administration of Babylon and of all the satrapies as far as Cilicia.—2. Tyrant of CASSANDREA (formerly Potidæa), in the peninsula of Pallene, obtained the supreme power in B.C. 379, and exercised it with the utmost cruelty. He was conquered and put to death by Antigonus Gonatas.—3. Of CARYSTUS, a comic poet, probably lived B.C. 300–260, and was one of the most distinguished of the poets of the new Attic comedy. It was from him that Terence took his Hecyra and Phormio.—4. Of GELA in Sicily, a comic poet and a contemporary of Menander, lived B.C. 340–290. He is frequently confounded with Apollodorus of Carystus.—5. A GRAMMARIAN of Athens, son of Asclepiades, and pupil of Aristarchus and Panætius, flourished about B.C. 140. He wrote a great number of works, all of which have perished with the exception of his Bibliotheca. This work consists of three books, and is by far the best among the extant works of the kind. It contains a well-arranged account of the mythology and the heroic age of Greece: it begins with the origin of the gods, and goes down to the time of Theseus, when the work suddenly breaks off.—Editions: By Heyne, Göttingen, 1803, 2d ed.; by Clavier, Paris, 1805, with a French translation; and by Westermann in the Mythographi, Bruuswick, 1843. Of the many other works of Apollodorus, one of the most important was a chronicle in iambic verses, comprising the history of one thousand and forty years, from the destruction of Troy (1184) down to his own time, B.C. 143.—6. Of PERGAMUS, a Greek rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Apollonia in his advanced age, and had as a pupil the young Octavius, afterward the Emperor Augustus.—7. A painter of Athens, flourished about B.C. 408, with whom commenced a new period in the history of the art. He made a great advance in coloring, and invented chiaro-scuro.—8. An architect of Damascus, lived under Trajan and Hadrian, by the latter of whom he was put to death.—9. Of PHALERUM, one of the intimate friends of Socrates, and who was present at his death.—10. Of LEMNOS, a writer on agriculture previous to the time of Aristotle.]

APOLLŌNĪA (Ἀπολλωνία: Ἀπολλωνιάτης). 1. (Now Pollina or Pollona), an important town in Illyria or New Epirus, not far from the mouth of the Aous, and sixty stadia from the sea. It was founded by the Corinthians and Corecyæans, and was equally celebrated as a place of commerce and learning: many distinguished Romans, among others the young Octavius, afterward the Emperor Augustus, pursued their studies here. Persons travelling from Italy to Greece and the East, usually landed either at Apollonia or Dyrrhachium; and the Via Egnatia, the great high road to the East, commenced at Apollonia, or, according to others, at Dyrrhachium. Vid. EGNATIA VĪA.—2. (Now Polina), a town in Macedonia, on the Via Egnatia, between Thessalonica and Amphipolis, and south of the Lake of Bolbe.—3. (Now Sizeboli), a town in Thrace on the Black Sea, with two harbors, a colony of Miletus, afterward called Sozopolis, whence its modern name: it had a celebrated temple of Apollo, from which Lucullus carried away a colossus of this god, and erected it on the Capitol at Rome.—4. A castle or fortified town of the Locri Ozolæ, near Naupactus.—5. A town in Sicily, on the northern coast, of uncertain site.—6. (Now Abullonte), a town in Bithynia, on the Lake Apolloniatis, through which the River Rhyndæus flows.—7. A town on the borders of Mysia and Lydia, between Pergamus and Sardis.—8. A town in Palestina, between Cæsaræa and Joppa.—9. A town in Assyria, in the district of Apolloniatis, through which the Delas or Durus (now Diala) flows.—(10. Now Marza Susa), a town in Cyrenaica, and the harbor of Cyrene, one of the five towns of the Pentapolis in Libya: it was the birth-place of Eratosthenes.

[APOLLONĪDAS (Ἀπολλωνίδας), a Greek poet, under whose name there are thirty-one pieces extant in the Greek Anthology. He flourished under Augustus and Tiberius.]

[APOLLŌNĪDES (Ἀπολλωνίδης, Dor. Ἀπολλωνιδᾶς). 1. Commander of the cavalry in Olynthus, who opposed Philip of Macedon, and prevented the surrender of the town to him. Philip, however, by his agents in Olynthus, procured his banishment.—2. A Bœotian officer in the army of Cyrus the Younger, who was, after the death of Cyrus, deprived of his office, and degraded to a menial condition.—3. Of Chios, who betrayed Chios to the Persian general Memnon during Alexander's eastern expedition: he was afterward taken and put in confinement.—4. A Stoic philosopher, friend of the younger Cato, with whom he conversed on the allowableness of suicide before committing that act at Utica.—5. A Greek physician and surgeon, born at Cos, obtained reputation and honor at the Persian court under Artaxerxes Longimanus. He became engaged in a disreputable attempt, and was put to death by torture.]

APOLLŌNIS (Ἀπολλωνίς), a city in Lydia, between Pergamus and Sardis, named after Apollonis, the mother of King Enmenes. It was one of the twelve cities of Asia which were destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius (A.D. 17).

APOLLŌNIŪS (Ἀπολλώνιος). 1. Of ALABANDA in Caria, a rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Rhodes about B.C. 100. He was a very distinguished teacher of rhetoric, and used to ridicule and despise philosophy. He was surnamed ὁ Μαλακός, and must be distinguished from the following.—2. Of ALABANDA, surnamed MOLO, likewise a rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Rhodes, and also distinguished himself as a pleader in the courts of justice. In B.C. 81, when Sulla was dictator, Apollonius came to Rome as ambassador of the Rhodians, on which occasion Cicero heard him; Cicero also received instruction from Apollonius at Rhodes a few years later.—3. Son of ARCHEBULUS, a grammarian of Alexandria, in the first century of the Christian era, and a pupil of Didymus. He wrote an Homeric Lexicon, which is still extant, and, though much interpolated, is a work of great value.—Editions: By Villoison, Paris, 1773; by H. Tollius, Lugd. Bat., 1788: and by Bekker, Berlin, 1833.—3. Surnamed DYSCOLES, "the ill-tempered," a grammarian at Alexandria, in the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius (A.D. 117-161), taught at Rome as well as Alexandria. He and his son HERODIANUS are called by Priscian the greatest of all grammarians. Apollonius was the first who reduced grammar to any thing like a system. Of his numerous works only four are extant. 1. Περὶ συντάξεως τοῦ λόγου μερῶν, "De Constructione Orationis," or "De Ordinatione sive Constructione Dictionum," in four books; edited by Fr. Sylburg, Frankf., 1590, and by I. Bekker, Berlin, 1817. 2. Περὶ ἀντωνυμίας, "De Pronomine;" edited by I. Bekker, Berlin, 1814. 3. Περὶ συνδέσμων, "De Conjunctionibus;" and, 4. Περὶ ἐπιφρημάτων, "De Adverbiis," printed in Bekker's Anecdot., ii., p. 477, &c. Among the works ascribed to Apollonius by Suidas there is one, περὶ κατεφυσμένης ἱστορίας, on fictitious or forged histories. This has been erroneously supposed to be the same as the extant work Ἱστορίαι θανατοῦσαι, which purports to be written by an Apollonius (published by Westermann, Paradoxographi, Brunswick, 1839); but it is now admitted that the latter work was written by an Apollonius who is otherwise unknown.—5. PERGEUS, from Perga in Pamphylia, one of the greatest mathematicians of antiquity, commonly called the "Great Geometer," was educated at Alexandria under the successors of Euclid, and flourished about B.C. 250-220. His most important work was a treatise on Conic Sections in eight books, of which the first four, with the commentary of Eutocius, are extant in Greek; and all but the eighth in Arabic. We have also introductory lemmata to all the eight by Pappus. Edited by Halley, "Apoll. Perg. Conic. lib. viii.," &c., Oxon., 1710, fol. The eighth book is a conjectural restoration founded on the introductory lemmata of Pappus.—6. RHODIUS, a poet and grammarian, son of Silleus or Illeus and Rhode, was born at Alexandria, or, according to one statement, at Naucratis, and flourished in the reigns of Ptolemy Philopator and Ptolemy Epiphanes (B.C. 222-181). In his youth he was instructed by Callimachus; but they afterward became bitter enemies. Their tastes were entirely different; for Apollonius admired and imitated the simplicity of the ancient epic poets, and disliked and despised the artificial and learned poetry of Callimachus. When Apollonius read at Alexandria his poem on the Argonautic expedition (Argonautica), it did not meet with the approbation of the audience; he attributed its failure to the intrigues of Callimachus, and revenged himself by writing a bitter epigram on Callimachus which is still extant. (Anth. Græc., xi., 275.) Callimachus, in return, attacked Apollonius in his Ibis, which was imitated by Ovid in a poem of the same name. Apollonius now left Alexandria and went to Rhodes, where he taught rhetoric with so much success, that the Romans honored him with their franchise; hence he was called the "Rhodian." He afterward returned to Alexandria, where he read a revised edition of his Argonautica with great applause. He succeeded Eratosthenes as chief librarian at Alexandria, in the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes, about B.C. 194, and appears to have held this office till his death. The Argonautica, which consists of four books, and is still extant, gives a straightforward and simple description of the adventures of the Argonauts: it is a close imitation of the Homeric language and style, but exhibits marks of art and labor, and thus forms, notwithstanding its many resemblances, a contrast with the natural and easy flow of the Homeric poems. Among the Romans the work was much read, and P. Terenus Varro Atacinus acquired great reputation by his translation of it. The Argonautica of Valerius Flaccus is only a free imitation of it.—Editions: By Bruuck, Argentorat., 1780; by G. Schaefer, Lips., 1810-13; by Wellauer, Lips., 1828. Apollonius wrote several other works which are now lost.—7. TYANENSIS or TYANÆUS, i. e., of Τυάνα in Cappadocia, a Pythagorean philosopher, was born about four years before the Christian era. At a period when there was a general belief in magical powers, it would appear that Apollonius obtained great influence by pretending to them; and we may believe that his Life by Philostratus gives a just idea of his character and reputation, however inconsistent in its facts and absurd in its marvels. Apollonius, according to Philostratus, was of noble ancestry, and studied first under Euthydemus of Tarsus; but, being disgusted at the luxury of the inhabitants, he retired to the neighboring town of Ægæ, where he studied the whole circle of the Platonic, Sceptic, Epicurean, and Peripatetic philosophy, and ended by giving his preference to the Pythagorean. He devoted himself to the strictest asceticism, and subsequently travelled throughout the East, visiting Nineveh, Babylon, and India. On his return to Asia Minor, we first hear of his pretensions to miraculous power, founded, as it would seem, on the possession of some divine knowledge derived from the East. From Ionia he crossed over into Greece, and came thence to Rome, where he arrived just after an edict against magicians had been issued by Nero. He accordingly remained only a short time at Rome, and next went to Spain and Africa; at Alexandria he was of assistance to Vespasian, who was preparing to seize the empire. The last journey of Apollonius was to Æthiopia, whence he returned to settle in the Ionian cities. On the accession of Domitian, Apollonius was accused of exciting an insurrection against the tyrant: he voluntarily surrendered himself, and appeared at Rome before the emperor; but, as his destruction seemed impending, he escaped by the exertion of his supernatural powers. The last years of his life were spent at Ephesus, where he is said to have proclaimed the death of the tyrant Domitian at the instant it took place. Many of the wonders which Philostratus relates in connection with Apollonius are a clumsy imitation of the Christian miracles. The proclamation of the birth of Apollonius to his mother by Proteus, and the incarnation of Proteus himself, the chorus of swans which sang for joy on the occasion, the casting out of devils, raising the dead, and healing the sick, the sudden disappearances and reappearances of Apollonius, his adventures in the cave of Trophonius, and the sacred voice which called him at his death, to which may be added his claim as a teacher having authority to reform the world, can not fail to suggest the parallel passages in the Gospel history, [from which they have evidently been borrowed.] We know, too, that Apollonius was one among many rivals set up by the Eclectics to our Saviour, an attempt renewed by the English free-thinkers Blount and Lord Herbert. Still it must be allowed that the resemblances are very general, and, on the whole, it seems probable that the life of Apollonius was not written with a controversial aim, as the resemblances, although real, only indicate that a few things were borrowed, and exhibit no trace of a systematic parallel. Vid. PHILOSTRATUS.—8. Of TYRE, a Stoic philosopher, who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Auletes, wrote a history of the Stoic philosophy from the time of Zeno.—9. APOLLONIUS and TACRISCUS of Tralles, were two brothers, and the sculptors of the group which is commonly known as the Farnese bull, representing the punishment of Dirce by Zethus and Amphion. Vid. DIRCE. It was taken from Rhodes to Rome by Asinius Pollio, and afterward placed in the baths of Caracalla, where it was dug up in the sixteenth century, and deposited in the Farnese palace. It is now at Naples. Apollonius and Tauriscus probably flourished in the first century of the Christian era.

APOLLŌPHĀNES (Ἀπολλοφάνης), a poet of the old Attic comedy, of whose comedies a few fragments are extant, lived about B.C. 400. [The fragments are collected in Meineke's Fragm. Com. Græc., vol. i., p. 482-484, edit. minor.]

APŌNUS or APŌNI FONS (now Abano), warm medicinal springs near Patavium, hence called Aquæ Patavinæ, were much frequented by the sick.

ΑΡΡΙΑ or ΑΡΙΑ (Ἀρρία, Ἀρία), a city of Phrygia Paecatiana.

ΑΡΡΙΑ VIA, the most celebrated of the Roman roads (regina viarum, Stat., Silv., ii., 2, 12.), was commenced by Appius Claudius Cæcus when censor, B.C. 319, and was the great line of communication between Rome and Southern Italy. It issued from the Porta Capena, and, passing through Aricia, Tres Tabernæ, Appii Forum, Tarracina, Fundi, Formiæ, Minturnæ, Sinuessæ, and Casilinum, terminated at Capua, but was eventually extended through Calatia and Caudium to Beneventum, and finally thence through Venusia, Tarentum, and Uria, to Brundisium.

ΑΡΡΙΑΝΟΣ (Ἀρριανός), the Roman historian, was born at Alexandria, and lived at Rome during the reigns of Trajan, Hadrian, and Antoninus Pius. He wrote a Roman history (Ῥωμαϊκὴ or Ῥωμαϊκὴ ἱστορία) in twenty-four books, arranged, not synchronistically, but ethnographically, that is, he did not relate the history of the Roman empire as a whole in chronological order, but he gave a separate account of the affairs of each country, till it was finally incorporated in the Roman empire. The subjects of the different books were: 1. The kingly period. 2. Italy. 3. The Samnites. 4. The Gauls or Celts. 5. Sicily and the other islands. 6. Spain. 7. Hannibal's wars. 8. Libya, Carthage, and Numidia. 9. Macedonia. 10. Greece and the Greek states in Asia Minor. 11. Syria and Parthia. 12. The war with Mithradates, 13-21. The civil wars, in nine books, from those of Marius and Sulla to the battle of Actium. 22. Ἐκαρονταετία, comprised the history of a hundred years, from the battle of Actium to the beginning of Vespasian's reign. 23. The wars with Illyria. 24. Those with Arabia. We possess only eleven of these complete, namely, the sixth, seventh, eighth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, and twenty-third: there are fragments of several of the others. The Parthian history, which has come down to us as part of the eleventh book, is not a work of Appian, but merely a compilation from Plutarch's Lives of Antony and Crassus. Appian's work is a compilation. His style is clear and simple; but he possesses few merits as an historian, and he frequently makes the most absurd blunders. Thus, for instance, he places Saguntum on the north of the Iberus, and states that it takes only half a day to sail from Spain to Britain. The best edition is that of Schweighäuser, Lips., 1785.

APPIAS, a nymph of the Appian well, which was situated near the temple of Venus Genetrix in the forum of Julius Cæsar. It was surrounded by statues of nymphs, called Appiades.

APPII FORUM. Vid. FORUM APPII.

[APPIOLE, an old city of Latium, said to have been taken and burned by Tarquinius Priscus, and to have furnished from its spoils the sums necessary for the construction of the Circus Maximus.]

[APPIUS CLAUDIUS. Vid. CLAUDIUS.]

APPŪLEIUS or APŪLEIUS, of Medaura in Africa, was born about A.D. 130, of respectable parents. He received the first rudiments of education at Carthage, and afterward studied the Platonic philosophy at Athens. He next travelled extensively, visiting Italy, Greece, and Asia, and becoming initiated in most mysteries. At length he returned home, but soon afterward undertook a new journey to Alexandria. On his way thither he was taken ill at the town of Cæa, and was hospitably received into the house of a young man, Sicinius Pontianus, whose mother, a very rich widow of the name of Pudentilla, he married. Her relatives, being indignant that so much wealth should pass out of the family, impeached Appuleius of gaining the affections of Pudentilla by charms and magic spells. The cause was heard at Sabrata before Claudius Maximus, proconsul of Africa, A.D. 173, and the defence spoken by Appuleius is still extant. Of his subsequent career we know little: he occasionally declaimed in public with great applause. The most important of the extant works of Appuleius are, 1. Metamorphoseon seu de Asino Aureo Libri XI. This celebrated romance, together with the Asinus of Lucian, is said to have been founded upon a work bearing the same title by a certain Lucius of Patræ. It seems to have been intended simply as a satire upon the hypocrisy and debauchery of certain orders of priests, the frauds of juggling pretenders to supernatural powers, and the general profligacy of public morals. There are some, however, who discover a more recondite meaning, and especially Bishop Warburton, in his Divine Legation of Moses, who has at great length endeavored to prove that the Golden Ass was written with the view of recommending the Pagan religion in opposition to Christianity, and especially of inculcating the importance of initiation into the purer mysteries. The well-known and beautiful episode of Cupid and Psyche is introduced in the fourth, fifth, and sixth books. This, whatever opinion we may form of the principal narrative, is evidently an allegory, and is generally understood to shadow forth the progress of the soul to perfection. II. Floridorum Libri IV. An Anthology, containing select extracts from various orations and dissertations, collected, probably, by some admirer. III. De Deo Socratis Liber. IV. De Dogmate Platonis Libri tres. The first book contains some account of the speculative doctrines of Plato, the second of his morals, the third of his logic. V. De Mundo Liber. A translation of the work περὶ κόσμου, at one time ascribed to Aristotle. VI. Apologia sive De Magia Liber. The oration described above, delivered before Claudius Maximus. The best edition of the whole works of Appuleius is by Hildebrand, Lips., 1842.

APPŪLEIUS SATURNINUS. Vid. SATURNINUS.

APRIËS (Ἀπρίης, Ἀπρίας), a king of Egypt, the Pharaoh-Hophra of Scripture, succeeded his father Psammis, and reigned B.C. 595-570. After an unsuccessful attack upon Cyrene he was dethroned and put to death by AMASIS.

APRONIUS. 1. Q., one of the worst instruments of Verres in oppressing the Sicilians.— 2. L., served under Drusus (A.D. 14) and Germanicus (15) in Germany. In 20 he was proconsul of Africa, and prætor of Lower Germany, where he lost his life in a war against the Frisii. Apronius had two daughters, one of whom was married to Plautius Silvanus, the other to Lentulus Gætulicus, consul in 26.

[APRŪSA (now Ausa), a river of Umbria in Italy, flowing near Ariminum.]

[APSEUDES (Ἀψευδής), a Nereid, mentioned in the Iliad of Homer.]

APSIŁE (Ἀψιλλαι), a Scythian people in Colchis, north of the River Phasis.

APSIŪNES (Ἀψίνης), of Gadara in Phœnicia, a Greek Sophist and rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Athens about A.D. 235. Two of his works are extant: Περὶ τῶν μερῶν τοῦ πολιτικοῦ λόγου τέχνη, which is much interpolated; and Περὶ τῶν ἐσχηματισμένων προβλημάτων, both of which are printed in Walz, Rhetor. Græci, vol. ix., p. 465, sqq., and p. 534, sqq.

[APSIŪTHI (Ἀψίνθιοι), a people of Thracæ, said by Herodotus to border on the Thracian Chersouesus.]

APSES (now Crevasa), a river in Illyria (Nova Epirus), which flows into the Ionian Sea.

APSYRTUS. Vid. ABSYRTUS.

APTA JULIA (now Apt), chief town of the Vulgientes in Gallia Narbonensis, and a Roman colony.

APTĒRA (Ἀπτέρα: Ἀππεραῖος; now Palæokastron on the Gulf of Suda), a town on the west coast of Crete, eighty stadia from Cydonia.

APŪANI, a Ligurian people on the Maera, were subdued by the Romans after a long resistance and transplanted to Sannium, B.C. 180.

APŪLEIUS. Vid. APŪLEIUS.

APŪLIA (Apulus), included, in its widest signification, the whole of the southeast of Italy from the River Frento to the promontory Iapygium, and was bounded on the north by the Frentani, on the east by the Adriatic, on the south by the Tarentine Gulf, and on the west by Sannium and Lucania, thus including the modern provinces of Bari, Otranto, and Capitanata, in the kingdom of Naples. Apulia, in its narrower sense, was the country east of Sannium on both sides of the Aufidus, the Daunii and Peucetia of the Greeks: the whole of the southeast part was called Calabria by the Romans. The Greeks gave the name of Daunia to the north part of the country from the Frento to the Aufidus, of Peuceia to the country from the Aufidus to Tarentum and Brundisium, and of Iapygia or Messapia to the whole of the remaining south part, though they sometimes included under Iapygia all Apulia in its widest meaning. The northwest of Apulia is a plain, but the south part is traversed by the east branch of the Apennines, and has only a small tract of land on the coast on each side of the mountains. The country was very fertile, especially in the neighborhood of Tarentum, and the mountains afforded excellent pasturage. The population was of a mixed nature: they were, for the most part, of Illyrian origin, and are said to have settled in the country under the guidance of Iapyx, Daunus, and Peuceetius, three sons of an Illyrian king, Lyeaon. Subsequently many towns were founded by Greek colonists. The Apulians joined the Samnites against the Romans, and became subject to the latter on the conquest of the Samnites.

AQUÆ, the name given by the Romans to many medical springs and bathing-places. 1. AURELLE or COLONIA AURELIA AQUENSIS (now Baden-Baden). 2. CALIDÆ of SOLIS (now Bath) in Britain. 3. CUTILÆ, mineral springs in Samnium near the ancient town of Cutilia, which perished in early times, and east of Reäte. There was a celebrated lake in its neighborhood with a floating island, which was regarded as the umbilicus or centre of Italy. Vespasian died at this place. 4. MATTIACÆ or FONTES MATTIACI (now Wiesbaden), in the land of the Mattiaci in Germany. 5. PATAVINÆ (vid. APONI FONS). 6. SEXTILÆ (now Aix), a Roman colony in Gallia Narbonensis, founded by Sextius Calvius, B.C. 122; its mineral waters were long celebrated, but were thought to have lost much of their efficacy in the time of Augustus. Near this place Marius defeated the Teutoni, B.C. 102. 7. STATIELLÆ (now Acqui), a town of the Statielli in Liguria, celebrated for its warm baths.

AQUÆ, in Africa. 1. (Now Meriga, ruins), in the interior of Mauretania Cæsariensis.—2. CALIDÆ (now Gurbos or Hammam l' Enf), on the Gulf of Carthage.—3. REGLÆ (now Hammam Truzza), in the north part of Byzæena.—4. TACAPITANÆ (now Hammam-el-Khabs), at the southern extremity of Byzæena, close to the large city of Tacape (now Khabs).

AQUILA. 1. Of Pontus, translated the Old Testament into Greek in the reign of Hadrian, probably about A.D. 130. Only a few fragments remain, which have been published in the editions of the Hexapla of Origen.—2. JULIUS AQUILA, a Roman jurist quoted in the Digest, probably lived under or before the reign of Septimius Severus, A.D. 193–198.—3. L. PONTIUS AQUILA, a friend of Cicero, and one of Cæsar's murderers, was killed at the battle of Mutina, B.C. 43.—4. AQUILA ROMANUS, a rhetorician who probably lived in the third century after Christ, wrote a small work entitled De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis, which is usually printed with Rutilius Lupus.—Editions: By Ruhnken, Lugd. Bat., 1768, reprinted with additional notes by Frotseher, Lips., 1831.

AQUILARIÆ (now Alhoveareah), a town on the coast of Zeugitana in Africa, on the west side of Hærmæum Promontorium (now Cape Bon), the eastern extremity of the Gulf of Carthage. It was a good landing-place in summer.

AQUILÆA (Aquilænsis: now Aquileia or Aglar), a town in Gallia Transpadana, at the very top of the Adriatic, between the rivers Sontius and Natiso, about sixty stadia from the sea. It was founded by the Romans in B.C. 182 as a bulwark against the northern barbarians, and is said to have derived its name from the favorable omen of an eagle (aquila) appearing to the colonists. As it was the key of Italy on the northeast, it was made one of the strongest fortresses of the Romans. From its position it became also a most flourishing place of commerce: the Via Æmilia was continued to this town, and from it all the roads to Rætia, Noricum, Pannonia, Istria, and Dalmatia branched off. It was taken and completely destroyed by Attila in A.D. 452: its inhabitants escaped to the Lagoons, where Venice was afterwards built.

AQUILLÆ VIA, began at Capua, and ran south through Nola and Nuceria to Salernum; from thence it ran through the very heart of Lucania and the country of the Bruttii, passing Nerulum, Interamnia, Cosentia, Vibo, and Medma, and terminated at Rhegium.

AQUILLŪS or AQUILŪS. 1. M., consul B.C. 129, finished the war against Aristoniceus, son of Eumenes of Pergamus. On his return to Rome he was accused of maladministration in his province, but was acquitted by bribing the judges.—2. M., consul in B.C. 101, conquered the slaves in Sicily, who had revolted under Athenion. In 98 he was accused of maladministration in Sicily, but was acquitted. In 88 he went into Asia as one of the consular legates in the Mithradatic war: he was defeated, and handed over by the inhabitants of Mytilene to Mithradates, who put him to death by pouring molten gold down his throat.

AQUILLŪS GALLUS. Vid. GALLUS.

AQUILŌNĀ (Aquilōnus), a town of Samnium, east of Bovianum, destroyed by the Romans in the Samnite wars.

AQUINUM (Aquinus: now Aquino), a town of the Volscians, east of the River Melpis, in a fertile country; a Roman municipium, and afterwards a colony; the birth-place of Juvenal; celebrated for its purple dye. (Hor., Ep., i, 10, 27.)

AQUITĀNĀ. 1. The country of the Aquitani, extended from the Garumna (now Garonne) to the Pyrenees, and from the ocean to Gallia Narbonensis: it was first conquered by Cæsar's legates, and again upon a revolt of the inhabitants in the time of Augustus.—2. The Roman province of Aquitania, formed in the reign of Augustus, was of much wider extent, and was bounded on the north by the Ligeris (now Loire), on the west by the ocean, on the south by the Pyrenees, and on the east by the Mons Cevenna, which separated it from Gallia Narbonensis. The Aquitani were one of the three races which inhabited Gaul; they were of Iberian or Spanish origin, and differed from the Gauls and Belgians in language, customs, and physical peculiarity.

ARA UBIORUM, a place in the neighborhood of Bonn in Germany, perhaps Godesberg: others suppose it to be another name of Colonia Agrippina (now Cologne).

ARABIA (ἡ Ἀραβία: Ἀραβ, pl. Ἀραβες, Ἀραβοί, Arabs, Arābūs, pl. Arābēs, Arābi: now Arabia), a country at the southwest extremity of Asia, forming a large peninsula, of a sort of hatched-shape, bounded on the west by the ARABICUS SINUS (now Red Sea), on the south and southeast by the ERYTHRÆUM MARE (now Gulf of Bab-el-Mandeb and Indian Ocean), and on the northeast by the Persicus Sinus (now Persian Gulf). On the north or land side its boundaries were somewhat indefinite, but it seems to have included the whole of the desert country between Egypt and Syria on the one side, and the banks of the Euphrates on the other; and it was often considered to extend even further on both sides, so as to include, on the east, the southern part of Mesopotamia along the left bank of the Euphrates, and on the west, the part of Palestine east of the Jordan, and the part of Egypt between the Red Sea and the eastern margin of the Nile valley, which, even as a part of Egypt, was called Arabia Nomos. In the stricter sense of the name, which confines it to the peninsula itself, Arabia may be considered as bounded on the north by a line from the head of the Red Sea (at Suez) to the mouth of the Tigris (now Shat-el-Arab), which just about coincides with the parallel of thirty degrees north latitude. It was divided into three parts: (1.) ARABIA PETRÆA (ἡ πετραία Ἀραβία: northwest part of El-Hejaz), including the triangular piece of land between the two heads of the Red Sea (the peninsula of Mount Sinni) and the country immediately to the north and northeast, and called, from its capital, Petra, while the literal signification of the name, "Rocky Arabia," agrees also with the nature of the country: (2.) ARABIA DESERTA (now El-Jebel), including the great Syrian Desert, and a portion of the interior of the Arabian peninsula: (3.) ARABIA FELIX (now El-Nejed, El-Hejaz, El-Yemen, El-Hadramaut, Oman, and El-Hejer) consisted of the whole country not included in the other two divisions; the ignorance of the ancients respecting the interior of the peninsula leading them to class it with Arabia Felix, although it properly belongs to Arabia Deserta, for it consists, so far as it is known, of a sandy desert of steppes and table land, interspersed with Oases (Wadis), and fringed with mountains, between which and the sea, especially on the western coast, lies a belt of low land (called Tehamah), intersected by numerous mountain torrents, which irrigate the strips of land on their banks, and produce that fertility which caused the ancients to apply the epithet of Felix to the whole peninsula. The width of the Tehamah is, in some places on the western coast, as much as from one to two days' journey, but on the other sides it is very narrow, except at the eastern end of the peninsula (about Muskat in Oman), where for a small space its width is again a day's journey. The inhabitants of Arabia were of the race called Semitic or Aramæan, and closely related to the Israelites. The northwestern district (Arabia Petræa) was inhabited by the various tribes which constantly appear in Jewish history: the Amalekites, Midianites, Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, &c. The Greeks and Romans called the inhabitants by the name of NABATHÆI, whose capital was Petra. The people of Arabia Deserta were called Arabes Scenitæ (Σκηνῖται), from their dwelling in tents, and Arabes Nomades (Νομάδες), from their mode of life, which was that of wandering herdsmen, who supported themselves partly by their cattle, and to a great extent, also, by the plunder of caravans, as their unchanged descendants, the Bedouins or Bedavee, still do. The people of the Tehamah were (and are) of the same race; but their position led them to an early period to cultivate both agriculture and commerce, and to build considerable cities. Their chief tribes were known by the following names, beginning south of the Nabathæi, on the western coast: the Thamydœni and Minæi (in the southern part of Hejaz), in the neighborhood of Macoraba (now Mecca); the Sabæi and Homeritæ, in the southwestern part of the peninsula (now Yemen); on the southeastern coast, the Chatramolitæ and Adramitæ (in El-Hadramaut, a country very little known, even to the present day); on the eastern and northeastern coast, the Omanitæ and Daraehœni (in Oman, and El-Ahsa or El-Hejer). From the earliest known period a considerable traffic was carried on by the people in the north (especially the Nabathæi) by means of caravans, and by those on the southern and eastern coast by sea, in the productions of their own country (chiefly gums, spices, and precious stones), and in those of India and Arabia. Besides this peaceful intercourse with the neighboring countries, they seem to have made military expeditions at an early period, for there can be no doubt that the Hyksos or "Shepherd-kings," who for some time ruled over Lower Egypt, were Arabians. On the other hand, they have successfully resisted all attempts to subjugate them. The alleged conquests of some of the Assyrian kings could only have affected small portions of the country on the north. Of the Persian empire we are expressly told that they were independent. Alexander the Great died too soon even to attempt his contemplated scheme of circumnavigating the peninsula and subduing the inhabitants. The Greek kings of Syria made unsuccessful attacks upon the Nabathæi. Under Augustus, Ælius Gallus, assisted by the Nabathæi, made an expedition into Arabia Felix, but was compelled to retreat into Egypt to save his army from famine and the climate. Under Trajan, Arabia Petræa was conquered by A. Cornelius Palma (A.D. 107), and the country of the Nabathæi became a Roman province. Some partial and temporary footing was gained at a much later period, on the southwestern coast, by the Æthiopians; and both in this direction and from the north Christianity was early introduced into the country, where it spread to a great extent, and continued to exist side by side with the old religion (which was Sabæism, or the worship of heavenly bodies), and with some admixture of Judaism, until the total revolution produced by the rise of Mohammedanism in 622. While maintaining their independence, the Arabs of the Desert have also preserved to this day their ancient form of government, which is strictly patriarchal, under the heads of tribes and families (Emirs and Sheiks). In the more settled districts, the patriarchal authority passed into the hands of kings, and the people were divided into the several castes of scholars, warriors, agriculturists, merchants, and mechanics. The Mohammedan revolution lies beyond our limits.

ARABICUS SINUS (ὁ Ἀραβικὸς κόλπος: now Red Sea), a long narrow gulf between Africa and Arabia, connected on the south with the Indian Ocean by the Angustæ Divæ (now Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb), and on the north divided into two heads by the peninsula of Arabia Petraea (now Peninsula of Sinai), the east of which was called Sinus Ælanites or Ælaniticus (now Gulf of Akaba), and the west Sinus Heroopolites or Heroopoliticus (now Gulf of Suez). The upper part of the sea was known at a very early period, but it was not explored in its whole extent till the maritime expeditions of the Ptolemies. Respecting its other name, see ERYTHRÆUM MARE.

ARABÏS (Ἀραβίς, also Ἀράβιος, Ἀραβίς, Ἀραβίς, and Ἀράβιος: now Poorally or Ajbor), a river of Gedrosia, falling into the Indian Ocean 1000 stadia (100 geographical miles) west of the mouth of the Indus, and dividing the Orītæ on its west from the Arabitæ or Arbīes on its east, who had a city named Arbis on its eastern bank.

ARABITÆ. Vid. ARABIS.

[ARABIUS (Scholasticus), a Grecian poet, probably in the time of Justinian, who has left seven epigrams, which are found in the Anthologia Græca.]

ARACHNEUM (Ἀραχναίων), a mountain forming the boundary between Argolis and Corinthia.

ARACHNE, a Lydian maiden, daughter of Idmon of Colophon, a famous dyer in purple. Arachne excelled in the art of weaving, and, proud of her talent, ventured to challenge Minerva (Athena) to compete with her. Arachne produced a piece of cloth in which the amours of the gods were woven, and as Minerva (Athena) could find no fault with it, she tore the work to pieces. Arachne, in despair, hung herself: the goddess loosened the rope and saved her life, but the rope was changed into a cobweb and Arachne herself into a spider (ἀράχνη), the animal most odious to Minerva (Athena). (Ov., Mét. vi., 1, seq.) This fable seems to suggest the idea that man learned the art of weaving from the spider, and that it was invented in Lydia.

ARACHOSÏA (Ἀραχωσία: Ἀραχωτοί or -ῶται: southeastern part of Afghanistan and northeastern part of Beloochistan), one of the extreme eastern provinces of the Parthian (and afterward of the Parthian) empire, bounded on the east by the Indus, on the north by the Paropamisadæ, on the west by Drangiana, and on the south by Gedrosia. It was a fertile country, watered by the River Arachotus, with a town of the same name, built by Semiramis, and which was the capital of the province until the foundation of ALEXANDREA. The shortest road from Persia to India passed through Arachosia.

ARACHOTÏS. Vid. ARACHOSIA.

ARACHTHUS or ARÉTHO (Ἀραχθός or Ἀρέθων: now Arta), a river of Epirus, rises in Mount Laemon or the Tympean Mountains, and flows into the Ambracian Gulf, south of Ambracia:

it is deep and difficult to cross, and navigable up to Ambracia.

[ARACIA (Ἀρακία), or Alexandria Insula (now Charedsch or Karek), an island in the Persian Gulf, opposite the coast of Persis, containing a mountain sacred to Neptune.]

ARACYNTHUS (Ἀράκυνθος: now Zigos), a mountain on the southwest coast of Ætolia, near Pleuron, sometimes placed in Acarnania. Later writers erroneously make it a mountain between Bœotia and Attica, and hence mention it in connection with Amphion, the Bœotian hero. (Propert., iii., 13, 41; Actæo (i. e. Attico) Aracyntho, Virg., Ecl., ii., 24.)

ARADUS (Ἀράδος: Ἀράδιος, Arādīus: in Old Testament, Arvad: now Ruad), an island off the coast of Phœnicia, at the distance of twenty stadia (two geographical miles), with a city which occupied the whole surface of the island, seven stadia in circumference, which was said to have been founded by exiles from Sidon, and which was a very flourishing place under its own kings, under the Seleucidæ, and under the Romans. It possessed a harbor on the main land, called ANTARADUS.

ARÆ PHILÆNORUM. Vid. PHILÆNORUM ARÆ.

ARÆTHYRÆA (Ἀραθυρέα), daughter of Aras, an autochthon who was believed to have built Arantea, the most ancient town in Phlasiæ. After her death, her brother Aōris called the country of Phlasiæ Aræthyrea, in honor of his sister.

ARÆPHËN (Ἀραφήν: Ἀραφήνιος, Ἀραφήνοθεν: now Rafina), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Ægeis, on the east of Attica, north of the River Erasimus, not far from its mouth.

ARAR or ARÆRIS (now Saône), a river of Gaul, rises in the Vosges, receives the Dubis (now Doubs) from the east, after which it becomes navigable, and flows with a quiet stream into the Rhone at Lugdunum (now Lyon). In the time of Ammianus (A.D. 370) it was also called Sauconna, and in the Middle Ages Sangona, whence its modern name Saône.

[ARARËNE (Ἀραρήνη), a barren district of Arabia Felix, inhabited by nomad tribes, through which Ælius Gallus had to make his way in his unsuccessful attempt to subjugate Arabia.]

ARARŌS (Ἀραρός), an Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy, son of Aristophanes, flourished B.C. 375. [The fragments of his comedies are collected in Meineke's Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i., p. 630-632, edit. minor.]

ARAS. Vid. ARÆTHYRÆA.

ARASPES (Ἀράσπης), a Mede, and a friend of the elder Cyrus, is one of the characters in Xenophon's Cyropædia. He contends with Cyrus that love has no power over him, but shortly afterward refutes himself by falling in love with Panthea, whom Cyrus had committed to his charge. Vid. ABRADATAS.

ARATUS (Ἀρατος). 1. The celebrated general of the Aheæans, son of Clinias, was born at Sicyon, B.C. 271. On the murder of his father by ABANTIDAS, Aratus, who was then a child, was conveyed to Argos, where he was brought up. When he had reached the age of twenty, he gained possession of his native city, B.C. 251, deprived the usurper Nicæoles of his power, and united Sicyon to the Aheæan league, which gained, in consequence, a great accession of power Vid. ACHÆL. In 245 he was elected general of the league, which office he frequently held in subsequent years. Through his influence a great number of the Greek cities joined the league; but he excelled more in negotiation than in war, and in his war with the Ætoliæ and Spartans he was often defeated. In order to resist these enemies, he cultivated the friendship of Antigonus Dosis, king of Macedonia, and of his successor Philip; but as Philip was evidently anxious to make himself master of all Greece, dissensions arose between him and Aratus, and the latter was eventually poisoned in 213, by the king's order. Divine honors were paid to him by his countrymen, and an annual festival (Ἀράτεια, vid. Dict. of Antig.) established. Aratus wrote Commentaries, being a history of his own times down to B.C. 220, at which point POLYBIUS commenced his history.—2. Of Soli, afterward Pompeiopolis, in Cilicia, or (according to one authority) of Tarsus, flourished B.C. 270, and spent all the latter part of his life at the court of Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedonia. He wrote two astronomical poems, entitled Phænomena (Φαινόμενα), consisting of 732 verses, and Diosemeia (Διοσημεία), of 422. The design of the Phænomena is to give an introduction to the knowledge of the constellations, with the rules for their risings and settings. The Diosemeia consists of prognostics of the weather from astronomical phænomena, with an account of its effects upon animals. It appears to be an imitation of Hesiod, and to have been imitated by Virgil in some parts of the Georgics. The style of these two poems is distinguished by elegance and accuracy, but it wants originality and poetic elevation. That they became very popular both in the Grecian and Roman world (cum sole et luna semper Aratus erit, Ov. Am., i., 15, 16), is proved by the number of commentaries and Latin translations. Parts of three poetical Latin translations are preserved. One written by Cicero when very young, one by Cæsar Germanicus, the grandson of Augustus, and one by Festus Avienus.—Éditions. [Most copious and complete, by Buhle, Lips., 1793–1801, 2 vols.; later, with revised text], by Voss, Heidelberg, 1824, with a German poetical version; by Buttmann, Berol., 1826; and by Bekker, Berol., 1828.

[ARAURA (now St. Tibéri), earlier Cessëro, a town of the Volcæ Arecomici, on the Arauris, in Gallia Narbonensis.]

ARAURIS (now Herault), erroneously Rauraris in Strabo, a river in Gallia Narbonensis, rises in Mount Cevenna, and flows into the Mediterranean.

ARAUŠO (now Orange), a town of the Cavari or Cavares, and a Roman colony, in Gallia Narbonensis, on the road from Arelate to Vienna: it still contains remains of an amphitheatre, circus, acqueduct, triumphal arch, &c.

ARAXES (Ἀράξης), the name of several rivers.—1. In Armenia Major (now Eraskh or Aras), rises in Mount Aba or Abus (near Erzeroum), from the opposite side of which the Euphrates flows; and, after a great bend southeast, and then northeast, joins the Cyrus (now Kour), which flows down from the Caucasus, and falls with it into the Caspian by two mouths, in about 39° 20' north latitude. The lower part, past AR-

TAXATA, flows through a plain, which was called τὸ Ἀραξηνὸν πεδίον. The Araxes was proverbial for the force of its current; and hence Virgil (Æn., viii., 728) says pontem indignatus Araxes, with special reference to the failure of both Xerxes and Alexander in throwing a bridge over it. It seems to be the Phasis of Xenophon.—2. In Mesopotamia. Vid. ABORRHAS.—3. In Persis (now Beud-Emir), the river on which Persepolis stood, rises in the mountains east of the head of the Persian Gulf, and flows southeast into a salt lake (now Bakhtegan) not far below Persepolis.—4. It is doubtful whether the Araxes of Herodotus is the same as the OXUS, JAXARTES, or Volga.—5. The PENEUS, in Thessaly, was called ARAXES from the violence of its torrent (from ἀράσσω).

ARAXUS (Ἀραῦος: now Cape Papa), a promontory of Achaia, near the confines of Elis.

ARBÆCES (Ἀρβᾶκης), the founder of the Median empire, according to Ctesias, is said to have taken Nineveh in conjunction with Belesis, the Babylonian, and to have destroyed the old Assyrian empire under the reign of Sardanapalus, B.C. 876. Ctesias assigns twenty-eight years to the reign of Arbaces, B.C. 876–848, and makes his dynasty consist of eight kings. This account differs from that of Herodotus, who makes DEIOCES the first king of Media, and assigns only four kings to his dynasty.

ARBELA (τὰ Ἀρβήλα: now Erbille), a city of Adiabene in Assyria, between the rivers Lycus and Caprus; celebrated as the head-quarters of Darius Codomannus before the last battle in which he was overthrown by Alexander (B.C. 331), which is hence frequently called the battle of Arbela, though it was really fought near GAUGAMELA, about fifty miles west of Arbela. The district about Arbela was called Arbelitis (Ἀρβηλιτικός).

ARBIS. Vid. ARABIS.

[ARBITER. Vid. PETRONIUS.]

ARBUCĀLA or ARBOCĀLA (now Villa Fosila?), the chief town of the Vaccaei in Hispania Tarraconensis, taken by Hannibal after a long resistance.

ARBUCŪLA, a celebrated female actor in paucities in the time of Cicero.

ARCA or -Æ (Ἄρκη or -at: now Tell-Arka), a very ancient city in the north of Phœnicia, not far from the sea-coast, at the foot of Mount Lebauon: a colony under the Romans, named Arca Cæsarea or Cæsarea Libani: the birth-place of the Emperor Alexander Severus.

ARCĀDIA (Ἀρκάδία: Ἄρκας, pl. Ἀρκάδες), a country in the middle of Peloponnesus, was bounded on the east by Argolis, on the north by Achæia, on the west by Elis, and on the south by Messenia and Laconia. Next to Laconia it was the largest country in the Peloponnesus, its greatest length was about fifty miles, its breadth from thirty-five to forty-one miles. It was surrounded on all sides by mountains, which likewise traversed it in every direction and it may be regarded as the Switzerland of Greece. Its principal mountains were Cyllene and Erymanthus in the north, Artemisium in the east, and Parthenius, Mænalus, and Lycæus in the south and southwest. The Alphæus, the greatest river of Peloponnesus, rises in Arcadia, and flows through a considerable part of the country, receiving numerous affluents. The northern and eastern parts of the country were barren and unproductive; the western and southern were more fertile, with numerous valleys where corn was grown. The Arcadians, said to be descended from the eponymous hero Arcas, regarded themselves as the most ancient people in Greece: the Greek writers call them indigenous (αὐτόχθονες) and Pelasgians. In consequence of the physical peculiarity of the country, they were chiefly employed in hunting and the tending of cattle, whence their worship of Pan, who was especially the god of Arcadia, and of Diana (Artemis). They were a people simple in their habits and moderate in their desires: they were passionately fond of music, and cultivated it with great success (soli cantare periti Arcades, Virg., Ecl., x., 32), which circumstance was supposed to soften the natural roughness of their character. The Arcadians experienced fewer changes than any other people in Greece, and retained possession of their country upon the conquest of the rest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians. Like the other Greek communities, they were originally governed by kings, but are said to have abolished monarchy toward the close of the second Messenian war, and to have stoned to death their last king Aristocrates, because he betrayed his allies the Messenians. The different towns then became independent republics, of which the most important were MANTINEA, TEGEA, ORCHOMENUS, PSOPHIS, and PHENEOS. Like the Swiss, the Arcadians frequently served as mercenaries, and in the Peloponnesian war, they were found in the armies of both the Lacedæmonians and Athenians. The Lacedæmonians made many attempts to obtain possession of parts of Arcadia, but these attempts were finally frustrated by the battle of Leuctra (B.C. 371); and in order to resist all future aggressions on the part of Sparta, the Arcadians, upon the advice of Epaminondas, built the city of MEGALOPOLIS, and instituted a general assembly of the whole nation, called the Myrii (Μυριοί, vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.). They subsequently joined the Achæan League, and finally became subject to the Romans.

ARCADIUS, emperor of the East (A.D. 395-408), elder son of Theodosius I., was born in Spain, A.D. 383. On the death of Theodosius he became emperor of the East, while the West was given to his younger brother Honorius. Arcadius possessed neither physical nor intellectual vigor, and was entirely governed by unworthy favorites. At first he was ruled by Rufinus, the præfect of the East; and on the murder of the latter soon after the accession of Arcadius, the government fell into the hands of the eunuch Eutropius. Eutropius was put to death in 399, and his power now devolved upon Gainas, the Goth; but upon his revolt and death in 401, Arcadius became entirely dependent upon his wife Eudoxia, and it was through her influence that Saint Chrysostom was exiled in 404. Arcadius died on the first of May, 408, leaving the empire to his son, Theodosius II., who was a minor.

[ARCADIUS (Ἀρκάδιος), a Greek grammarian of Antioch, of uncertain date, but certainly not earlier than 200 A.D. He wrote a useful work on accents (περὶ τόνων), which is extant.—Editions: By Barker, Leipzig, 1820, and by Dindorf, in his Grammat. Græci, Leipzig, 1823.]

ARCANUM. VID. ARPINUM.

ARCAS (Ἄρκας), king and eponymous hero of the Arcadians, son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Callisto, grandson of Lyeon, and father of Arphidas and Elatus. Arcas was the boy whose flesh his grandfather Lyeon placed before Jupiter (Zeus), to try his divine character. Jupiter (Zeus) upset the table (τράπεζα) which bore the dish, and destroyed the house of Lyeon by lightning, but restored Arcas to life. When Arcas had grown up, he built on the site of his father's house the town of Trapezus. Arcas and his mother were placed by Jupiter (Zeus) among the stars.

ARCĒSILĀUS or ARCĒSĪLAS (Ἀρκεσίλαος, Ἀρκεσίλας), a Greek philosopher, son of Seuthes or Scythes, was born at Pitave in Æolis, and flourished about B.C. 250. He studied at first in his native town under Autolycus, a mathematician and afterward went to Athens, where he became the disciple first of Theophrastus, and next of Polemo and of Crantor. He succeeded Crates about B.C. 241 in the chair of the Academy, and became the founder of the second or middle (μέση) Academy. He is said to have died in his seventy-sixth year from a fit of drunkenness. His philosophy was of a skeptical character, though it did not go so far as that of the followers of Pyrrhon. He did not doubt the existence of truth in itself, only our capacities for obtaining it, and he combated most strongly the dogmatism of the Stoics.

ARCĒSĪLĀUS (Ἀρκεσίλαος). 1. Son of Lyeus and Theobule, leader of the Bœotians in the Trojan war, slain by Hector.—2. The name of four kings of Cyrene. VID. BATTUS and BATTIADÆ.—[3. A Sicilian, who accompanied Agathocles to Africa, but, on the departure of the latter from that country, murdered his son Archagathus.—4. A sculptor in the first century B.C., who was held in high esteem at Rome: he was intimate with L. Lentulus, and was greatly commended by Varro.]

ARCĒSIUS (Ἀρκεΐσιος), son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Euryodia, father of Laertes, and grandfather of Ulysses. Hence both Laertes and Ulysses are called Arcesiades (Ἀρκεΐαιδής).

ARCHĒDRŪLIS (Ἀρχαῖδρον πόλις), the later capital of Colchis, near the River Phasis.

[ARCHAGATHUS. VID. ARCESILAIUS, 3.]

ARCHANDRŪRŪLIS (Ἀρχάνδρον πόλις), a city of Lower Egypt, on the Nile, between Canopus and Cercasorus.

[ARCHEBĀTES (Ἀρχεβάτης), son of Lyeon, destroyed by Jupiter (Zeus) by lightning.]

ARCHEDEMUS (Ἀρχέδημος; Dor. Ἀρχέδαμος). 1. A popular leader at Athens, took the first step against the generals who had gained the battle of Arginusæ, B.C. 406. The comic poets called him "blar-eyed" (γλάμων), and said that he was a foreigner, and had obtained the franchise by fraud.—2. An Ætolian (called Archidamus by Livy), commanded the Ætolian troops which assisted the Romans in their war with Philip (B.C. 199-197). He afterward took an active part against the Romans, and eventually joined Perseus, whom he accompanied in his flight after his defeat in 168.—3. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher, mentioned by Cicero, Seneca, and other ancient writers.

ARCHĒDICUS (Ἀρχέδικος), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, supported Antipater and the Macedonian party.

ARCHĒGĒTES (Ἀρχηγέτης), a surname of Apollo, probably in reference to his being a leader of colonies. It was also a surname of other gods.

ARCHĒLĀIS (Ἀρχελαΐς). 1. In Cappadocia (now Akserai), on the Cappadox, a tributary of the Halys, a city founded by Archelaus, the last king of Cappadocia, and made a Roman colony by the Emperor Claudius.—2. A town of Palestine, near Jericho, founded by Archelaus, the son of Herod the Great.

ARCHĒLĀUS (Ἀρχέλαος). 1. Son of HEROD the Great, was appointed by his father as his successor, and received from Augustus Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa, with the title of ethnarch. In consequence of his tyrannical government, the Jews accused him before Augustus in the tenth year of his reign (A.D. 7): Augustus banished him to Vienna in Gaul, where he died.—2. King of MACEDONIA (B.C. 413–399), an illegitimate son of Perdicaeus II., obtained the throne by the murder of his half-brother. He improved the internal condition of his kingdom, and was a warm patron of art and literature. His palace was adorned with magnificent paintings by Zeuxis; and Euripides, Agathon, and other men of eminence, were among his guests. According to some accounts, Archelaus was accidentally slain in a hunting party by his favorite, Craterus or Crateus; but, according to other accounts, he was murdered by Craterus.—3. A distinguished general of MITHRADATES. In B. C. 87 he was sent into Greece by Mithradates with a large fleet and army; at first he met with considerable success, but was twice defeated by Sulla in 86, near Chæronæa and Orchomenos in Bœotia, with immense loss. Thereupon he was commissioned by Mithradates to sue for peace, which he obtained; but subsequently being suspected of treachery by the king, he deserted to the Romans just before the commencement of the second Mithradatic war, B.C. 81.—4. Son of the preceding, was raised by Pompey, in B.C. 63, to the dignity of priest of the goddess (Enyo or Bellona) at Comana in Pontus or Cappadocia. In 56 or 55 Archelaus became king of Egypt by marrying Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, who, after the expulsion of her father, had obtained the sovereignty of Egypt. Archelaus, however, was king of Egypt only for six months, for Gabinus marched with an army into Egypt in order to restore Ptolemy Auletes, and in the battle which ensued, Archelaus perished.—5. Son of No. 4, and his successor in the office of high-priest of Comana, was deprived of his dignity by Julius Cæsar in 47.—6. Son of No. 5, received from Antony, in B.C. 36, the kingdom of Cappadocia, a favor which he owed to the charms of his mother Glaphyra. After the battle of Actium, Octavianus not only left Archelaus in the possession of his kingdom, but subsequently added to it a part of Cilicia and Lesser Armenia. But, having incurred the enmity of Tiberius by the attention which he had paid to C. Cæsar he was summoned to Rome soon after the accession of Tiberius and accused of treason. His life was spared, but he was obliged to remain at Rome, where he died soon after, A.D. 17. Cappadocia was then made a Roman province.—7. A philosopher, probably born at Athens, though others make him a native of Miletus, flourished about B.C. 450. The philosophical system of Archelaus is remarkable, as forming a point of transition from the older to the newer form of philosophy in Greece. As a pupil of Anaxagoras, he belonged to the Ionian school, but he added to the physical system of his teacher some attempts at moral speculation.—8. A Greek poet, in Egypt, lived under the Ptolemies, and wrote epigrams, some of which are still extant in the Greek Anthology.—9. A sculptor of Priene, son of Apollonius, made the marble bas-relief representing the Apotheosis of Homer, which formerly belonged to the Colonna family at Rome, and is now in the Townley Gallery of the British Museum. He probably lived in the reign of Claudius.

[ARCHĒLŌCHUS (Ἀρχέλοχος), son of the Trojan Antenor; slain by Ajax.]

[ARCHĒMĀCHUS (Ἀρχέμαχος), a Greek historian of Eubœa, who wrote a work on his native country (τὰ Εὐβοϊκά), consisting of at least three books.]

ARCHĒMŌRTUS (Ἀρχέμωρος), or OPHELTES, son of the Nemean king Lyeurgus and Eurydice. When the Seven heroes, on their expedition against Thebes, stopped at Nemea to obtain water, Hypsipyle, the nurse of the child Opheltus, while showing the way to the Seven, left the child alone. In the meantime, the child was killed by a dragon, and buried by the Seven. But as Amphiarus saw in this accident an omen boding destruction to him and his companions, they called the child Archemorus, that is, "Forerunner of Death," and instituted the Nemean games in honor of him.

[ARCHĒPTŌLĒMUS (Ἀρχεπτόλεμος), son of Iphitus, charioteer of Hector, was slain by Teucer.]

[ARCHĒSTRĀTUS (Ἀρχέστρατος), one of the ten generals appointed to supersede Alcibiades in the command of the Athenian fleet, after the battle of Notium, B.C. 407.—2. A member of the βουλὴ at Athens, who, during the siege of the city, after the battle of Ægospotami, B.C. 405, was thrown into prison for advising capitulation on the terms proposed by Sparta.]

ARCHĒSTRĀTUS (Ἀρχέστρατος), of Gela or Syracuse, about B.C. 350, wrote a poem on the Art of Cookery, which was imitated or translated by Ennius in his Carmina Hedyphathica or Hedyphathica (from ἡδονάθαια).

[ARCHĒTUS, a companion of Turnus, slain by Mnestheus.]

ARCHIAS (Ἀρχίας). 1. An Heraclid of Corinth, left his country in consequence of the death of Actæon, and founded Syracuse, B.C. 734, by command of the Delphic oracle.—[2. A Theban, who betrayed the citadel (Cadmea) to the Spartan commander Phœbidas, B.C. 382. He was at the head of the party in the interest of Sparta, but was slain by the Theban exiles under Pelopidas.—3. Of Thurii, originally an actor, was sent, B.C. 322, after the battle of Cranon, to apprehend the orators whom Antipater had demanded of the Athenians, and who had fled from Athens. Vid. HYPERIDES and DEMOSTHENES

NES. He was nicknamed Φυγάδοθής, "exile-hunter;" and ended his life, as he deserved, in poverty and disgrace.]—4. A. LICINIUS ARCHIAS, a Greek poet, born at Antioch in Syria, about B.C. 120, very early obtained celebrity by his verses. In 102 he came to Rome, and was received in the most friendly way by many of the Roman nobles, especially by the Luculli, from whom he afterward obtained the gentile name of Licinius. After a short stay at Rome he accompanied L. Lucullus, the elder, to Sicily, and followed him, in the banishment to which he was sentenced for his management of the slave war in that island, to Heraclea in Lucania, in which town Archias was enrolled as a citizen; and as this town was a state united with Rome by a fœdus, he subsequently obtained the Roman franchise in accordance with the lex Plautia Papiria passed in B.C. 89. At a later time he accompanied L. Lucullus the younger to the Mithradatic war. Soon after his return, a charge was brought against him in 61 of assuming the citizenship illegally, and the trial came on before Q. Cicero, who was prætor this year. He was defended by his friend M. Cicero in the extant speech Pro Archia, in which the orator, after briefly discussing the legal points of the case, rests the defence of his client upon his surpassing merits as a poet, which entitled him to the Roman citizenship. We may presume that Archias was acquitted, though we have no formal statement of the fact. Archias wrote a poem on the Cimbric war in honor of Marius; another on the Mithradatic war in honor of Lucullus; and at the time of his trial was engaged on a poem in honor of Cicero's consulship. No fragments of these works are extant; and it is doubtful whether the epigrams preserved under the name of Archias in the Greek Anthology were really written by him.

[ARCHIDAMIA (Ἀρχιδάμεια), the priestess of Ceres (Demeter) at Sparta, who, through love of Aristomenes, set him at liberty when he had been taken prisoner.—2. A Spartan woman, who distinguished herself by her heroic spirit when Sparta was nearly taken by Pyrrhus in B.C. 272, and opposed the plan which had been entertained of sending the women to Crete.]

ARCHIDĀMUS (Ἀρχίδαμος), the name of five kings of Sparta. 1. Son of Anaxidamus, contemporary with the Tegeatan war, which followed soon after the second Messenian, B.C. 668.—2. Son of Zeuxidamus, succeeded his grandfather Leotycheides, and reigned B.C. 469–427. During his reign, B.C. 464, Sparta was made a heap of ruins by a tremendous earthquake; and for the next ten years he was engaged in war against the revolted Helots and Messenians. Toward the end of his reign the Peloponnesian war broke out: he recommended his countrymen not rashly to embark in the war, and he appears to have taken a more correct view of the real strength of Athens than any other Spartan. After the war had been declared (B.C. 431) he invaded Attica, and held the supreme command of the Peloponnesian forces till his death in 429.—3. Grandson of No. 2, and son of Agesilaus II., reigned B.C. 361–338. During the lifetime of his father he took an active part in resisting the Thebans and the various other enemies of Sparta, and in 367 he defeated the Areadians and Argives in the "Tearless Battle," so called because he had won it without losing a man. In 362 he defended Sparta against Epaminondas. In the third Sacred war (B.C. 356–346) he assisted the Phocians. In 338 he went to Italy to aid the Tarentines against the Lucanians, and there fell in battle.—4. Grandson of No. 3, and son of Eudomidus I., was king in B.C. 296, when he was defeated by Demetrius Poliorcetes.—5. Son of Eudamidus II., and the brother of Agis IV. On the murder of Agis, in B.C. 240, Archidamus fled from Sparta, but afterward obtained the throne by means of Aratus. He was, however, slain almost immediately after his return to Sparta. He was the last king of the Eurypontid race.

ARCHIGĒNES (Ἀρχιγένης), an eminent Greek physician born at Apamea in Syria, practiced at Rome in the time of Trajan, A.D. 98–117. He published a treatise on the pulse, on which Galen wrote a Commentary. He was the most eminent physician of the sect of the Eclectici, and is mentioned by Juvenal as well as by other writers. Only a few fragments of his works remain.

ARCHILŪCHUS (Ἀρχιλόχος), of Paros, was one of the earliest Ionian lyric poets, and the first Greek poet who composed Iambic verses according to fixed rules. He flourished about B.C. 714–676. He was descended from a noble family, who held the priesthood in Paros. His grandfather was Tellis, his father Telesicles, and his mother a slave, named Enipo. In the flower of his age (between B.C. 710 and 700), Archilochus went from Paros to Thasos with a colony, of which one account makes him the leader. The motive for this emigration can only be conjectured. It was most probably the result of a political change, to which cause was added, in the case of Archilochus, a sense of personal wrongs. He had been a suitor to Neobule, one of the daughters of Lyeambes, who first promised and afterward refused to give his daughter to the poet. Enraged at this treatment, Archilochus attacked the whole family in an Iambic poem, accusing Lyeambes of perjury, and his daughters of the most abandoned lives. The verses were recited at the festival of Ceres (Demeter), and produced such an effect, that the daughters of Lyeambes are said to have hung themselves through shame. The bitterness which he expresses in his poems toward his native island seems to have arisen in part also from the low estimation in which he was held, as being the son of a slave. Neither was he more happy at Thasos. He draws the most melancholy picture of his adopted country, which he at length quitted in disgust. While at Thasos, he incurred the disgrace of losing his shield in an engagement with the Thracians of the opposite continent; but instead of being ashamed of the disaster, he recorded it in his verse. At length he returned to Paros, and in a war between the Parians and the people of Naxos, he fell by the hand of a Naxian named Calondas or Corax. Archilochus shared with his contemporaries, Thaletas and Terpander, in the honor of establishing lyric poetry throughout Greece. The invention of the elegy is ascribed to him, as well as to Callinus; but it was on his satiric Iambic poetry that his fame was founded. His Iambics expressed the strongest feelings in the most unmeasured language. The licence of Ionian democracy and the bitterness of a disappointed man were united with the highest degree of poetical power to give them force and point. The emotion accounted most conspicuous in his verses was "rage," "Archilochem proprio rabies armavit iambo." (Hor., Ars. Poët., 79.) The fragments of Archilochemus are collected in Bergk's Poet. Lyrici Græc., and by Liebel, Archilochi Reliquiæ, Lips., 1812, 8vo; [2d edit., somewhat enlarged, Vienna, 1818, 8vo.]

ΑΡΧΙΜΕΔΕΣ (Ἀρχιμήδης), of Syracuse, the most famous of ancient mathematicians, was born B.C. 287. He was a friend, if not a kinsman, of Hiero, though his actual condition in life does not seem to have been elevated. In the early part of his life he travelled into Egypt, where he studied under Conon the Samian, a mathematician and astronomer. After visiting other countries, he returned to Syracuse. Here he constructed for Hiero various engines of war, which, many years afterward, were so far effectual in the defence of Syracuse against Marcellus as to convert the siege into a blockade, and delay the taking of the city for a considerable time. The accounts of the performances of these engines are evidently exaggerated; and the story of the burning of the Roman ships by the reflected rays of the sun, though very current in later times, is probably a fiction. He superintended the building of a ship of extraordinary size for Hiero, of which a description is given in Athenæus (v., p. 206, d.), where he is also said to have moved it to the sea by the help of a screw. He invented a machine called, from its form, Cochlea, and now known as the water-screw of Archimedes, for pumping the water out of the hold of this vessel. His most celebrated performance was the construction of a sphere; a kind of orrery, representing the movements of the heavenly bodies. When Syracuse was taken (B.C. 212), Archimedes was killed by the Roman soldiers, being at the time intent upon a mathematical problem. Upon his tomb was placed the figure of a sphere inscribed in a cylinder. When Cicero was questor in Sicily (75), he found this tomb near one of the gates of the city, almost hid among briars, and forgotten by the Syracusans. The intellect of Archimedes was of the very highest order. He possessed, in a degree never exceeded, unless by Newton, the inventive genius which discovers new provinces of inquiry, and finds new points of view for old and familiar objects; the clearness of conception which is essential to the resolution of complex phenomena into their constituent elements; and the power and habit of intense and persevering thought, without which other intellectual gifts are comparatively fruitless. The following works of Archimedes have come down to us: 1. On Equiponderants and Centres of Gravity. 2. The Quadrature of the Parabola. 3. On the Sphere and Cylinder. 4. On Dimension of the Circle. 5. On Spirals. 6. On Conoids and Spheroids. 7. The Arenarius. 8. On Floating Bodies. 9. Lemmata. The best edition of his works is by Torelli, Oxon., 1792. There is a French translation of his works, with notes, by F. Peyrard, Paris, 1808, and an English translation of the Arenarius by G. Anderson, London, 1784.

ΑΡΧΙΝΟΣ (Ἀρχίνος), one of the leading Athenians, who, with Thrasylbulus and Anytus, overthrew the government of the Thirty, B.C. 403.

ΑΡΧΙΠΠΟΣ (Ἀρχίππος), an Athenian poet of the old comedy, about B.C. 415. [The fragments of Archippus are collected in Meineke's Fragm. Comic. Græcor., vol. i., p. 408-415, edit. minor.]

[ΑΡΧΙΠΠΟΣ, an ancient king of the Marrubii in Italy, one of the allies of Turnus in his war with Æneas.]

ΑΡΧΥΤΑΣ (Ἀρχύτας). 1. Of Amphissa, a Greek epic poet, flourished about B.C. 300.—2. Of Tarentum, a distinguished philosopher, mathematician, general, and statesman, probably lived about B.C. 400, and onward, so that he was contemporary with Plato, whose life he is said to have saved by his influence with the tyrant Dionysius. He was seven times the general of his city, and he commanded in several campaigns, in all of which he was victorious. After a life which secured to him a place among the very greatest men of antiquity, he was drowned while upon a voyage on the Adriatic. (Hor., Carm., i., 28.) As a philosopher, he belonged to the Pythagorean school, and he appears to have been himself the founder of a new sect. Like the Pythagoreans in general, he paid much attention to mathematics. Horace calls him maris et terræ numeroque carentis arenæ Mensorem. To his theoretical science he added the skill of a practical mechanic, and constructed various machines and automata, among which his wooden flying dove in particular was the wonder of antiquity. He also applied mathematics with success to musical science, and even to metaphysical philosophy. His influence as a philosopher was so great, that Plato was undoubtedly indebted to him for some of his views; and Aristotle is thought by some writers to have borrowed the idea of his categories, as well as some of his ethical principles, from Archytas. [The fragments of Archytas are published in part by Gale, Opusc. Mythol., Cantab., 1671, Amst., 1688; and more fully by Oréll, Opusc. Sentent. et Moral., vol. ii., p. 234, seqq.]

ΑΡΚΟΝΝΗΣΟΣ (Ἀρκόννησος; Ἀρκοννήσιος). 1. An island off the coast of Ionia, near Lebedus, also called Aspis and Macris.—2. (Now Orak Ada), an island off the coast of Caria, opposite Halicarnassus, of which it formed the harbor.

ΑΡΚΤΙΝΟΣ (Ἀρκτίνος), of Miletus, the most distinguished among the cyclic poets, probably lived about B.C. 776. Two epic poems were attributed to him. 1. The Æthiopsis, which was a kind of continuation of Homer's Iliad: its chief heroes were Menon, king of the Æthiopians, and Achilles, who slew him. 2. The Destruction of Ilium, which contained a description of the destruction of Troy, and the subsequent events until the departure of the Greeks. [The fragments of Arctinus have been collected by Dübner, Homeri Carm. et Cycli Epici Reliq., Paris, 1837, and by Düntzer, Die Fragm. des ep. Poesie bis auf Alex., Köln, 1840; and Nachtrag, p. 16, Köln, 1841.]

ΑΡΚΤΟΡΥΛΑΧ. Vid. ARCTOS.

ΑΡΚΤΟΣ (Ἀρκτος, "the Bear," two constellations near the North Pole. 1. THE GREAT BEAR Ἄρκτος μεγάλη: Ursa Major), also called the Wagon (ἄμαξα: plaustrum). The ancient Italian name of this constellation was Septem Triones, that is, the Seven Ploughing Oxen, also Septentrio, and with the epithet Major to distinguish it from the Septentrio Minor, or Lesser Bear: hence Virgil (Æn., iii., 356) speaks of geminose Triones. The Great Bear was also called Helice (Ἑλική) from its sweeping round in a curve.—

2. THE LESSER or LITTLE BEAR (Ἄρκτος μικρά: Ursa Minor), likewise called the Wagon, was first added to the Greek catalogues by Thales, by whom it was probably imported from the East. It was also called Phœnice (Φοινίκη), from the circumstance that it was selected by the Phœnicians as the guide by which they shaped their course at sea, the Greek mariners with less judgment employing the Great Bear for the purpose; and Cynosura (Κυνόσουρα), dog's tail, from the resemblance of the constellation to the upturned curl of a dog's tail. The constellation before the Great Bear was called Boötes (Βούτης) Arctophylax (Ἀρκτοφύλαξ), or Arcturus (Ἀρκτούρος, from οὐρος, guard); the two latter names suppose the constellation to represent a man upon the watch, and denote simply the position of the figure in reference to the Great Bear, while Boötes, which is found in Homer, refers to the Wagon, the imaginary figure of Boötes being fancied to occupy the place of the driver of the team. At a later time Arctophylax became the general name of the constellation, and the word Arcturus was confined to the chief star in it. All these constellations are connected in mythology with the Arcadian nymph Callisto, the daughter of Lycæon. Metamorphosed by Jupiter (Zeus) upon the earth into a she-bear, Callisto was pursued by her son Arcas in the chase, and when he was on the point of killing her, Jupiter (Zeus) placed them both among the stars, Callisto becoming the Great Bear, and Arcas the Little Bear, or Boötes. In the poets the epithets of these stars have constant reference to the family and country of Callisto: thus we find them called Lycæonis Arctos; Mænalια Arctos and Mænalια Ursa (from Mount Mænalus in Arcadia); Erymanthis Ursa (from Mount Erymanthus in Arcadia); Parrhasides stellæ (from the Arcadian town Parrhasia). Though most traditions identified Boötes with Arcas, others pronounced him to be Icarus or his daughter Erigone. Hence the Septentriones are called Boves Icarii. Vid. Dict. of Antiq., p. 147, 148, 159, 2d ed.

ARCTURUS. Vid. ARCTOS.

ARDEA (Ardeas, -atis; now Ardea). 1. The chief town of the Rutuli in Latium, a little to the left of the River Numicus, three miles from the sea, was situated on a rock surrounded by marshes, in an unhealthy district. It was one of the most ancient places in Italy, and was said to have been the capital of Turnus. It was conquered and colonized by the Romans, B.C. 442, from which time its importance declined. In its neighborhood was the Latin Aphrodisium or temple of Venus, which was under the superintendence of the Ardeates.—2. (Now Ardekân ?), an important town in Persia, southwest of Persepolis.

phrates was so diverted from its course that it passed three times through this place.—2. A town of Susiana, not far from Susa; perhaps the same as the Aracea of later writers, where Darius Hystaspis settled the captured Eretrians.]

[ARDESCUS (Ἀρδῆσος), a river of European Sarmatia, flowing into the Ister; the god of this stream was, according to Hesiod, a son of Oceanus and Tethys.]

ARDEENNA SILVA (now the Ardenne), a vast forest in the northwest of Gaul, extended from the Rhine and the Treviri to the Nervi and Remi, and north as far as the Scheldt: there are still considerable remains of this forest, though the greater part of it has disappeared.

ARDES (Ἀρδῆς), son of Gyges, king of Lydia, reigned B.C. 678–629: he took Priene, and made war against Miletus.

ARĒA or ARĒTIAS (Ἄρεια or Ἀρρητιῶς νῆσος, i. e., the island of Ares: now Kerasunt Ada), also called Chalceritis, an island off the coast of Pontus, close to Pharnacæ, celebrated in the legend of the Argonauts.

[ARĒOÖNIS (Ἀρηγονίς), wife of Ampycus, and mother of Mopsus.]

[ARĒILYCUS (Ἀρηίλυκος), a Trojan warrior, slain by Patroclus.]

ARĒITHOÜS (Ἀρηθῖοος). 1. King of Arne in Boeotia, and husband of Philomedusa, is called in the Iliad (vii., 8) κορυνήτης, because he fought with a club: he fell by the hand of the Arcadian Lycurgus.—[2. Charioteer of Rhigmus, slain by Achilles.]

ARĒLĀTE, ARĒLAS, or ARĒLĀTUM (Arrelatensis now Arles), a town in Gallia Narbonensis, at the head of the delta of the Rhone on the left bank, and a Roman colony founded by the soldiers of the sixth legion, Colonia Arrelate Sextanorum. It is first mentioned by Cæsar, and under the emperors it became one of the most flourishing towns on this side of the Alps. Constantine the Great built an extensive suburb on the right bank, which he connected with the original city by a bridge. The Roman remains at Arles attest the greatness of the ancient city: there are still to be seen an obelisk of granite, and the ruins of an aqueduct, theatre, amphitheatre, palace of Constantine, and a large Roman cemetery.

[ARELLIUS FUSCUS. Vid. FUSCUS.]

[ARENĒ MONTES (now Arenas Gordas), high sand hills in Hispania Bætica, between the Bætis and Urium.]

[ARĒNE (Ἀρρήνη). 1. Daughter of the Spartan king Ebalus, wife of Aphareus.—2. A city of Elis, on the River Minyæus, said to have been named after the foregoing: it was the residence of Aphareus.]

ARĒOPĀGUS. Vid. ATHENE.

ARES (Ἄρης), (the Latin Mars), the Greek god of war and one of the great Olympian gods, is represented as the son of Zeus (Jupiter) and Hera (Juno). The character of Ares (Mars) in Greek mythology will be best understood by comparing it with that of other divinities who are likewise in some way connected with war. Athena (Minerva) represents thoughtfulness and wisdom in the affairs of war, and protects men and their habitations during its ravages. Ares (Mars), on the other hand, is nothing but the personification of bold force and strength, and not so much the god of war as of its tumult, confusion, and horrors. His sister Eris calls forth war, Zeus (Jupiter) directs its course, but Ares (Mars) loves war for its own sake, and delights in the din and roar of battles, in the slaughter of men, and the destruction of towns. He is not even influenced by party spirit, but sometimes assists the one, and sometimes the other side, just as his inclination may dictate; whence Zeus (Jupiter) calls him ἀλλοπρόσαλλος. (II., v., 889.) This savage and sanguinary character of Ares (Mars) makes him hated by the other gods and by his own parents. It was contrary to the spirit of the Greeks to represent a being like Ares (Mars), with all his overwhelming physical strength, as always victorious; and when he comes in contact with higher powers, he is usually conquered. He was wounded by Diomedes, who was assisted by Athena (Minerva), and in his fall he roared like ten thousand warriors. The gigantic Alóidæ had likewise conquered him, and kept him a prisoner for thirteen months, until he was delivered by Hermes (Mercury). He was also conquered by Hercules, with whom he fought on account of his son Cycnus, and was obliged to return to Olympus. This fierce and gigantic, but, withal, handsome god, loved and was beloved by Aphrodite (Venus). Vid. APHRODITE. When Aphrodite (Venus) loved Adonis, Ares (Mars), in his jealousy, metamorphosed himself into a boar, and killed his rival. Vid. ADONIS. According to a late tradition, Ares (Mars) slew Halirrhothius, the son of Poseidon (Neptune), when he was on the point of violating Alcippe, the daughter of Ares (Mars). Hereupon Poseidon (Neptune) accused Ares (Mars) in the Areopagus, where the Olympian gods were assembled in court. Ares (Mars) was acquitted, and this event was believed to have given rise to the name Areopagus. The warlike character of the tribes of Thrace led to the belief that the god's residence was in that country, and here and in Scythia were the principal seats of his worship. In Scythia he was worshipped under the form of a sword, to which not only horses and other cattle, but men also, were sacrificed. In Greece itself the worship of Ares (Mars) was not very general. All the stories about Ares (Mars), and his worship in the countries north of Greece, seem to indicate that his worship was introduced into the latter country from Thrace. The Romans identified their god Mars with the Greek Ares. Vid. MARS.

ARÉSTOR ('Αρέστωρ), father of Argus, the guardian of Io, who is therefore called Arcestoridae.

ARÉTEUS ('Αρεταίος), the Cappadocian, one of the most celebrated of the ancient Greek physicians, probably lived in the reign of Vespasian. He wrote in Ionic Greek a general treatise on diseases in eight books, which is still extant. The best edition is by C. G. Kühn, Lips., 1828.

[ARÉTĀON ('Αρετάων), a Trojan, slain by Teucer.]

ARÉTAS ('Αρίταρ), the name of several kings of Arabia Petraea. 1. A contemporary of Pompey, invaded Judæa in B.C. 65, in order to place Hyrcanus on the throne, but was driven back by the Romans, who espoused the cause of Aristobulus. His dominions were subsequently invaded by Scaurus, the lieutenant of Pompey.—2. The father-in-law of Herod Antipas, invaded Judæa because Herod had dismissed the daughter of Aretas in consequence of his connection with Herodias. This Aretas seems to have been the same who had possession of Damascus at the time of the conversion of the Apostle Paul, A.D. 31.

ARĒTE ('Αρήτη). 1. Wife of Alcinous, king of the Phæaciens, received Ulysses with hospitality.—2. [ARĒTE, in Greek 'Αρετή], daughter of the elder Dionysius and Aristomache, wife of Thearides, and after his death of her uncle Dion. After Dion had fled from Syracuse, Arcte was compelled by her brother to marry Timocrates, one of his friends; but she was again received by Dion as his wife when he had obtained possession of Syracuse, and expelled the younger Dionysius. After the assassination of Dion in 353, she was drowned by his enemies.—3. Daughter of Aristippus, the founder of the Cyrenaic school of philosophy, was instructed by him in the principles of his system, which she transmitted to her son, the younger Aristippus.

ARĒTHŪSA ('Αρήθουσα), one of the Nereids, and the nymph of the famous fountain of Arethusa, in the island of Ortygia, near Syracuse. For details, see ALPHEUS. Virgil (Ecol., iv., 1; x., 1) reckons her among the Sicilian nymphs, and as the divinity who inspired pastoral poetry. There were several other fountains in Greece which bore the name of Arethusa, of which the most important was one in Ithaca, now Lebado, and another in Eubœa, near Chalcis.

ARĒTHŪSA ('Αρήθουσα; now Er-Restun). 1. A town and fortress on the Orontes, in Syria: in Strabo's time, the seat of a petty Arabian principality.—[2. a city of Macedonia, between Amphipolis and the Lake Bolbe.—3. A bituminous lake in Greater Armenia, through which the Tigris was said to flow without mingling its waters, at no great distance from its source. Strabo gives as the Oriental names of this lake, Arsene and Thospilis.]

ARĒTĪAS. Vid. AREA.

ARĒTIUM. Vid. ARETIUM.

[ARĒTUS ('Αρητός). 1. Son of Priam, slain by Automedon.—2. Son of Nestor.]

ARĒUS ('Αρέυς), two kings of Sparta. 1. Succeeded his grandfather, Cleomenes II, since his father Acrotatus had died before him, and reigned B.C. 309–265. He made several unsuccessful attempts to deliver Greece from the dominion of Antigonus Gonatas, and at length fell in battle against the Macedonians in 265, and was succeeded by his son Acrotatus.—2. Grandson of No. 1, reigned for eight years (the duration of his life) under the guardianship of his uncle Leonidas II, who succeeded him about B.C. 256.

[ARĒUS ('Αρείος), of Alexandria, a Stoic or Pythagorean philosopher, who enjoyed in a high degree the confidence of Augustus, and was said to have been his instructor in philosophy.]

[ARĒVA (now Alanzon, or, according to Florez, Uero), a tributary of the Durus, in Hispania Tarraconensis.]

AREVACÆ or AREVACI, the most powerful tribe of the Celtiberians in Spain, near the sources of the Tagus, derived their name from the River Areva (q. v.).

ARGÆUS ('Αργαῖος). 1. King of Macedonia, son and successor of Perdicas I., the founder of the dynasty.—2. A pretender to the Macedonian crown, dethroned Perdicas II., and reigned two years.

ARGÆUS MONS ('Αργαῖος; now Erdjish-Dagh), a lofty snow-capped mountain nearly in the centre of Cappadocia; an offset of the Anti-Taurus. At its foot stood the celebrated city of Mazaca or Cæsarea.

ARGANTHŌNĪUS ('Αργανθώνιος), king of Tartessus in Spain, in the sixth century B.C., is said to have reigned eighty years, and to have lived one hundred and twenty.

ARGANTHŌNĪUS or ARGANTHUS MONS (τὸ 'Αργανθώνιον ὄρος; now Katirli), a mountain in Bithynia, running out into the Propontis, forming the Promontorium Posidium (Cape Bouz), and separating the bays of Cios and Astacus.

[ARGE ('Αργη), a Hyperborean maiden, who came with Opis to Delos.]

ARGENNUM or ARGĪNUM ('Αργεννον, 'Αργῖνον; now Cape Blanco). 1. A promontory on the Ionian coast, opposite to Chios.—[2. A promontory of the eastern coast of Sicily, now Capo San Alessio.]

[ARGENNUSA, an island with a city of same name between the promontory of Argennum, and the Ionian coast, and the promontorium Posidium in the island of Chios.]

[ARGENTANUM (now San Marco), a city of Bruttium.]

[ARGENTĀRIA or ARGENTUĀRIA, also ARGENTOVARIA (now Arzenheim), the capital city of Gallia Belgica, where Gratian defeated the Alemanni A.D. 378.]

ARGENTĒUS (now Argens), a small river in Gallia Narbonensis, which flows into the Mediterranean near Forum Julii.

ARGENTĀTUM or -TUS (now Strassburg), an important town on the Rhine, in Gallia Belgica, the head-quarters of the eighth legion, and a Roman municipium. In its neighborhood Julian gained a brilliant victory over the Alemanni, A.D. 357. It was subsequently called Stratsburgum and Stratsburgum, whence its modern name.

[ARGLEŌNIS ('Αργιλευνίς), a Spartan female, mother of the celebrated general Brasidas.]

ARGILĒTUM, a district in Rome, which extended from the south of the Quirinal to the Capitoline and the Forum. It was chiefly inhabited by mechanics and booksellers. The origin of the name is uncertain: the most obvious derivation is from argilla, "potter's clay;" but the more common explanation in antiquity was Argiletum, "death of Argus," from a hero Argus who was buried there.

ARGĪLUS ('Αργίλος; 'Αργίλιος), a town in Bithynia, the eastern part of Mygdonia, in Macedonia, between Amphipolis and Brouncus, a colony of Andros.

ARGINCSÆ ('Αργινοῦσαι or 'Αργινοῦσαι), three small islands off the coast of Æolis, opposite Mytilene in Lesbos, celebrated for the naval victory of the Athenians over the Lacedæmonians under Callicratidas, B.C. 406.

[ARGĪPPE ('Αργίπη), a nymph, mother of the Thracian bard Thamyras by Philammon.]

ARGĪPHONTES ('Αργεφόντης), "the slayer of Argus," a surname of HERMES.

ARGIPPÆI ('Αργιππαιοί), a Scythian tribe in Sarmatia Asiatica, who appear, from the description of them by Herodotus (iv, 23), to have been of the Calnuc race.

ARGONAUTÆ ('Αργοναῦται), the Argonauts, "the sailors of the Argo," were the heroes who sailed to Æa (afterward called Colchis) for the purpose of fetching the golden fleece. The story of the Argonauts is variously related by the ancient writers, but the common tale ran as follows: In Iolcus in Thessaly reigned Pelias, who had deprived his half-brother Æson of the sovereignty. In order to get rid of JASON, the son of Æson, PELIAS persuaded Jason to fetch the golden fleece, which was suspended on an oak-tree in the grove of Ares (Mars) in Colchis, and was guarded day and night by a dragon. Jason willingly undertook the enterprise, and commanded Argus, the son of Phrixus, to build a ship with fifty oars, which was called Argo ('Αργώ) after the name of the builder. Jason was accompanied by all the great heroes of the age, and their number is usually said to have been fifty. Among these were Hercules, Castor and Pollux, Zetes and Calais, the sons of Boreas, the singer Orpheus, the seer Mopsus, Philammon, Tydeus, Theseus, Amphiarus, Peleus, Nestor, Admetus, &c. After leaving Iolcus they first landed at Lemnos, where they united themselves with the women of the island, who had just before murdered their fathers and husbands. From Lemnos they sailed to the Doliones at Cyzicus, where King Cyzicus received them hospitably. They left the country during the night, and being thrown back on the coast by a contrary wind, they were taken for Pelasgians, the enemies of the Doliones, and a struggle ensued, in which Cyzicus was slain; but, being recognized by the Argonauts, they buried him, and mourned over his fate. They next landed in Mysia, where they left behind Hercules and Polyphemus, who had gone into the country in search of Hylas, whom a nymph had carried off while he was fetching water for his companions. In the country of the Bebryces, King Amyeus challenged the Argonauts to fight with him; and when he was killed by Pollux, [the Bebryces, to avenge the death of their king, made an attack on Pollux, but the Argonauts, having seized their arms, repulsed them, and slew many in their flight; they then sailed to Salmidesus in Thrace, where the seer Phineus was tormented by the Harpies. When the Argonauts consulted him about their voyage, he promised them his advice on condition of their delivering him from the Harpies. This was done by Zetes and Calais, two sons of Boreas; and Phineus now advised them, before sailing through the Symplegades, to mark the flight of a dove, and to judge from its fate what they themselves would have to do. When they approached the Symplegades, they sent out a dove, which, in its rapid flight between the rocks, lost only the end of its tail. The Argonauts now, with the assistance of Juno (Hera), followed the example of the dove, sailed quickly between the rocks, and succeeded in passing without injury to their ship, with the exception of some ornaments at the stern. Henceforth the Symplegades stood immovable in the sea. On their arrival at the country of the Mariandyni, the Argonauts were kindly received by their king, Lyeus. The seer Idmon and the helmsman Tiphys died here, and the place of the latter was supplied by Anæus. They now sailed along the coast until they arrived at the mouth of the River Phasis. The Colchian king Æetes promised to give up the golden fleece if Jason alone would yoke to a plough two fire-breathing oxen with brazen feet, and sow the teeth of the dragon which had not been used by Cadmus at Thebes, and which he had received from Minerva (Athena). The love of Medea furnished Jason with means to resist fire and steel, on condition of his taking her as his wife; and she taught him how he was to kill the warriors that were to spring up from the teeth of the dragon. While Jason was engaged upon his task, Æetes formed plans for burning the ship Argo and for killing all the Greek heroes. But Medea's magic powers lulled to sleep the dragon who guarded the golden fleece; and after Jason had taken possession of the treasure, he and his Argonauts, together with Medea and her young brother Absyrtus, embarked by night and sailed away. Æetes pursued them; but, before he overtook them, Medea murdered her brother, cut him into pieces, and threw his limbs overboard, that her father might be detained in his pursuit by collecting the limbs of his child. Æetes at last returned home, but sent out a great number of Colchians, threatening them with the punishment intended for Medea if they returned without her. While the Colchians were dispersed in all directions, the Argonauts had already reached the mouth of the River Eridanus. But Jupiter (Zeus), angry at the murder of Absyrtus, raised a storm which cast the ship from its course. When driven on the Absyrtian Islands, the ship began to speak, and declared that the anger of Jupiter (Zeus) would not cease unless they sailed toward Ausonia, and got purified by Circe. They now sailed along the coasts of the Ligyans and Celts, and through the sea of Sardinia, and, continuing their course along the coast of Tyrrhenia, they arrived in the Island of Æaea, where Circe purified them. When they were passing by the Sirens, Orpheus sang to prevent the Argonauts being allured by them. Butes, however, swam to them, but Venus (Aphrodite) carried him to Lilybæum. Thetis and the Nereids conducted them through Seylla and Charybdis and between the whirling rocks (πέτραι πλαγκταί); and, sailing by the Thracian island with its oxen of Helios, they came to the Phæacian island of Coreyra, where they were received by Alcinoüs. In the mean time, some of the Colchians, not being able to discover the Argonauts, had settled at the foot of the Ceraunian Mountains; others occupied the Absyrtian islands near the coast of Illyricum; and a third band overtook the Argonauts in the island of the Phæacians. But as their hopes of recovering Medea were deceived by Arete, the queen of Alcinoüs, they settled in the island, and the Argonauts continued their voyage. During the night they were overtaken by a storm; but Apollo sent brilliant flashes of lightning, which enabled them to discover a neighboring island, which they called Anapha. Here they erected an altar to Apollo, and solemn rites were instituted, which continued to be observed down to very late times. Their attempt to land in Crete was prevented by Talus, who guarded the island, but was killed by the artifices of Medea. From Crete they sailed to Ægina, and from thence between Eubœa and Locris to Ioleus. Respecting the events subsequent to their arrival in Ioleus, vid. ÆSON, MEDEA, JASON, PELIAS. The story of the Argonauts probably arose out of accounts of commercial enterprises which the wealthy Minyans, who lived in the neighborhood of Ioleus, made to the coasts of the Euxine. The expedition of the Argonauts is related by Pindar in the fourth Pythian ode, by Apollonius Rhodius in his Argonautica, and by his Roman imitator, Valerius Flaccus.

ARGOS (τὸ Ἄργος, -εος), is said by Strabo (p. 372) to have signified a plain in the language of the Macedonians and Thessalians, and it may therefore contain the same root as the Latin word ager. In Homer we find mention of the Pelasgic Argos, that is, a town or district of Thessaly, and of the Achæan Argos, by which he means sometimes the whole Peloponnesus sometimes Agamemnon's kingdom of Argos, of which Mycenæ was the capital, and sometimes the town of Argos. As Argos frequently signifies the whole Peloponnesus, the most important part of Greece, so the Ἄργεῖοι often occur in Homer as a name of the whole body of the Greeks, in which sense the Roman poets also use Argivi.—1. ARGOS, a district of Peloponnesus, called Argolis (ἡ Ἀργολικὴ) by Herodotus, but more frequently by other Greek writers either Argos, Argiva (ἡ Ἀργεία), or Argolice (ἡ Ἀργολικὴ). Under the Romans Argolis became the usual name of the country, while the word Argos or Argi was confined to the town. Argolis, under the Romans, signified the country bounded on the north by the Corinthian territory, on the west by Arcadia, on the south by Lacedonia, and included toward the east the whole Æete or peninsula between the Saronic and Argolic gulfs; but, during the time of Grecian independence, Argolis or Argos was only the country lying round the Argolicus Sinus (now Gulf of Nauplia), bounded on the west by the Arcadian Mountains, and separated on the north by a range of mountains from Corinth, Cleonæ, and Phlius. Argolis, as understood by the Romans, was, for the most part, a mountainous and unproductive country: the only extensive plain adapted for agriculture was in the neighborhood of the city of Argos. Its rivers were insignificant, and mostly dry in summer: the most important was the Inachus. The country was divided into the districts of Argia or Argos proper, ΕΠΙΔΑΥΡΙΑ, ΤΡΕΖΕΝΙΑ, and ΗΕΡΜΙΟΝΙΣ. The original inhabitants of the country were, according to mythology, the Cynurii; but the main part of the population consisted of Pelasgi and Achæi, to whom Dorians were added after the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians. See below, No. 2.—2. ARGOS, or ARGĪ, -ORUM, in the Latin writers, now Argo, the capital of Argolis, and, next to Sparta, the most important town of Peloponnesus, situated in a level plain a little to the west of the Inachus. It had an ancient Pelasgic citadel, called Larissa, and another built subsequently on another height (duas arces habent Argi, Liv., xxxiv., 25). It possessed numerous temples, and was particularly celebrated for the worship of Juno (Hera), whose great temple, Heræum, lay between Argos and Mycenæ. The remains of the Cyclopiæan walls of Argos are still to be seen. The city is said to have been built by INACHUS or his son PHORONEUS, or grandson ARGUS. The descendants of Inachus, who may be regarded as the Pelasgic kings, reigned over the country for nine generations, but were at length deprived of the sovereignty by DANAUUS, who is said to have come from Egypt. The descendants of Danaus were in their time obliged to submit to the Achæan race of the Pelopidæ. Under the rule of the Pelopidæ Mycenæ became the capital of the kingdom, and Argos was a dependent state. Thus Mycenæ was the royal residence of Atreus and of his son Agamemnon; but under Orestes Argos again recovered its supremacy. Upon the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians Argos fell to the share of Temenus, whose descendants ruled over the country; but the great bulk of the population continued to be Achæan. All these events belong to Mythology; and Argos first appears in history about B.C. 750, as the chief state of Peloponnesus, under its ruler ΠΗΡΘΟΝ. After the time of Phidon its power declined, and it was not even able to maintain its supremacy over the other towns of Argolis. Its power was greatly weakened by its wars with Sparta. The two states long contended for the district of Cynuria, which lay between Argolis and Laeonia, and which the Spartans at length obtained by the victory of their three hundred champions, about B.C. 550. In B.C. 524, Cleomenes, the Spartan king, defeated the Argives with such loss near Tiryns that Sparta was left without a rival in Peloponnesus. In consequence of its weakness and of its jealousy of Sparta, Argos took no part in the Persian war. In order to strengthen itself, Argos attacked the neighboring towns of Tiryns, Mycenæ, &c., destroyed them, and transplanted their inhabitants to Argos. The introduction of so many new citizens was followed by the abolition of royalty and of Doric institutions, and by the establishment of a democracy, which continued to be the form of government till later times, when the city fell under the power of tyrants. In the Peloponnesian war Argos sided with Athens against Sparta. In B.C. 243 it joined the Achæan League, and on the conquest of the latter by the Romans, 146, it became a part of the Roman province of Achaia. At an early time Argos was distinguished by its cultivation of music and poetry (vid. SACADAS, TEL-ESILLA); but at the time of the intellectual greatness of Athens, literature and science seem to have been entirely neglected at Argos. It produced some great sculptors, of whom AGE-LAS and POLYCLETUS are the most celebrated.

[ARGOS PELASGICUM ('Αργος τὸ Πελασγικόν), an ancient city and district of Thessaly, mentioned by Homer; but in Strabo's time the city no longer existed.]

ARGŌUS PORTUS (now Porto Ferraio), a town and harbor in the Island of Ilva (now Elba).

ARGŪA ('Αργυρα), a town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, called Argissa by Homer (Il., ii., 738).

ARGUS ('Αργος). 1. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Niobe, third king of Argos, from whom Argos derived its name.—2. Surnamed Panoptes, "the all-seeing," because he had a hundred eyes, son of Agenor, Arestor, Inachus, or Argus. Juno (Hera) appointed him guardian of the cow into which Io had been metamorphosed; but Mercury (Hermes), at the command of Jupiter (Zeus), put Argus to death, either by stoning him, or by cutting off his head after sending him to sleep by the sweet notes of his flute. Juno (Hera) transplanted his eyes to the tail of the peacock, her favorite bird.—3. The builder of the Argo, son of Phrixus, Arestor, or Polybus, was sent by Æetes, his grandfather, after the death of Phrixus, to take possession of his inheritance in Greece. On his voyage thither he suffered shipwreck, was found by Jason in the Island of Aretias, and carried back to Colchis.

ARGŪRA ('Αργυρῶ), a town in Achaia near Patræ, with a fountain of the same name.

ARIA ('Αρεία, Ἀρία: Ἀρειος, Ἄρειος: the eastern part of Khorassan, and the western and north-western part of Afghanistan), the most important of the eastern provinces of the ancient Persian Empire, was bounded on the east by the Paropamisadæ, on the north by Margiana and Hyrcania, on the west by Parthia, and on the south by the great desert of Carmania. It was a vast plain, bordered on the north and east by mountains, and on the west and south by sandy deserts; and, though forming a part of the great sandy table-land, now called the Desert of Iran, it contained several very fertile oases, especially in its northern part, along the base of the Saphi (now Kohistan and Hazarah) Mountains, which was watered by the river ARĪUS or -AS (now Herirood), on which stood the later capital Alexandria (now Herat). The river is lost in the sand. The lower course of the great river ETYMANDREUS (now Helmund) also belonged to Aria, and the lake into which it falls was called ARIA LACUS (now Zurrah). From Aria was derived the name under which all the eastern provinces were included. Vid. ARIANA.

ARIA LACUS. Vid. ARIA.

ARIABIGNES (Ἀριαβιγνης), son of Darius Hystaspis, one of the commanders of the fleet of Xerxes, fell in the battle of Salamis, B.C. 480.

ARIADNE (Ἀριάδνη), daughter of Minos and Pasiphaë or Creta, fell in love with Theseus when he was sent by his father to convey the tribute of the Athenians to Minotaurus, and gave him the clew of thread by means of which he found his way out of the Labyrinth, and which she herself had received from Vulcan (Hephestus). Theseus, in return, promised to marry her, and she accordingly left Crete with him; but on their arrival in the Island of Dia (Naxos), she was killed by Diana (Artemis). This is the Homeric account (Od., xi., 322); but the more common tradition related that Theseus left Ariadne in Naxos alive, either because he was forced by Bacchus (Dionysus) to leave her, or because he was ashamed to bring a foreign wife to Athens. Bacchus (Dionysus) found her at Naxos, made her his wife, and placed among the stars the crown which he gave her at their marriage. There are several circumstances in the story of Ariadne which offered the happiest subjects for works of art, and some of the finest ancient works, on gems as well as paintings, are still extant, of which Ariadne is the subject.

ARLÆUS (Ἀρλαῖος) or ARIDEUS (Ἀριδαῖος), the friend of Cyrus, commanded the left wing of the army at the battle of Cunaxa, B.C. 401. After the death of Cyrus he purchased his pardon from Artaxerxes by deserting the Greeks.

ARIAMNES (Ἀριάμνης), the name of two kings of Cappadocia, one the father of Ariarathes I., and the other the son and successor of Ariarathes II.

ARIANA (Ἀριανή: now Iran), derived from ARIA, from the specific sense of which it must be carefully distinguished, was the general name of the eastern provinces of the ancient Persian Empire, and included the portion of Asia bounded on the west by an imaginary line drawn from the Caspian to the mouth of the Persian Gulf, on the south by the Indian Ocean, on the east by the Indus, and on the north by the great chain of mountains called by the general name of the Indian Caucasus, embracing the provinces of Parthia, Aria, the Paropamisadæ, Arachosia, Drangiana, Gedrosia, and Carmania (now Khorassan, Afghanistan, Beloochistan, and Kirman). But the name was often extended to the country as far west as the margin of the Tigris valley, so as to include Media and Persis, and also to the provinces north of the Indian Caucasus, namely, Bactria and Sogdiana (now Bokhara). The knowledge of the ancients respecting the greater part of this region was confined to what was picked up in the expeditions of Alexander and the wars of the Greek kings of Syria, and what was learned from merchant caravans.

[ARIANTAS, a king of the Scythians, who, in order to take a census of his subjects, ordered each to bring him an arrow-head. So great a number was collected, that he caused a bronze vessel to be made from them, and this he preserved as a memorial.]

[ARIAPITHES, a king of the Scythians, who was treacherously murdered by Spargapithes king of the Agathyrsi.]

[ARIARATHĒA (Ἀριαράθεια), a city of Cappadocia, founded by the Cappadocian king Ariarathes IV.: it lay between Sebastia and Comana Aurea.]

ARIARATHES (Ἀριαράθης), the name of several kings of Cappadocia.—1. Son of Ariamnes I., assisted Ochus in the recovery of Egypt, B.C. 350. Ariarathes was defeated by Perdiccas, and crucified 322. Eumenes then obtained possession of Cappadocia.—2. Son of Holophernes, and nephew of Ariarathes I., recovered Cappadocia after the death of Eumenes, B.C. 315. He was succeeded by Ariamnes II.—3. Son of Ariamnes II., and grandson of No. 2, married Stratonice, daughter of Antiochus II., king of Syria.—4. Son of No. 3, reigned B.C. 220–162. He married Antiochia, the daughter of Antiochus III., king of Syria, and assisted Antiochus in his war against the Romans. After the defeat of Antiochus, Ariarathes sued for peace in 188, which he obtained on favorable terms. In 183–179, he assisted Eumenes in his war against Pharnaces.—5. Son of No. 4, previously called Mithradates, reigned B.C. 163–130. He was surnamed Philopator, and was distinguished by the excellence of his character and his cultivation of philosophy and the liberal arts. He assisted the Romans in their war against Aristonicus of Pergamus, and fell in this war, 130.—6. Son of No. 5, reigned B.C. 130–96. He married Laodice, sister of Mithradates VI., king of Pontus, and was put to death by Mithradates by means of Gordius. On his death the kingdom was seized by Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who married Laodice, the widow of the late king. But Nicomedes was soon expelled by Mithradates, who placed upon the throne.—7. Son of No. 6. He was, however, also murdered by Mithradates in a short time, who now took possession of his kingdom. The Cappadocians rebelled against Mithradates, and placed upon the throne.—8. Second son of No. 6; but he was speedily driven out of the kingdom by Mithradates, and shortly afterward died. Both Mithradates and Nicomedes attempted to give a king to the Cappadocians; but the Romans allowed the people to choose whom they pleased, and their choice fell upon Ariobarzanes.—9. Son of Ariobarzanes II., reigned B.C. 42–36. He was deposed and put to death by Antony, who appointed Archelaus as his successor.

ARIASPÆ or AGRIASPÆ (Ἀριάσπαι, Ἀγριάσπαι), a people in the southerly part of the Persian province of Drangiana, on the very borders of Gedrosia, with a capital city, Ariaspæ (Ἀριάσπη). In return for the services which they rendered to the army of Cyrus the Great when he marched through the desert of Carmania, they were honored with the name of Ελευγέται, and were allowed by the Persians to retain their independence, which was confirmed to them by Alexander as the reward of similar services to himself.

[ARIASPES (Ἀριάσπης), called by Justin (10, 1) Ariarates, son of the Persian king Artaxerxes Mnemon.]

of the elder Cyrus, according to Xenophon in his Cyropædia.]

ARICIA (Aricinus: now Ariceia or Riccìa), an ancient town of Latium, at the foot of the Alban Mount, on the Appian Way, sixteen miles from Rome. It was a member of the Latin confederacy, was subdued by the Romans, with the other Latin towns, in B.C. 338, and received the Roman franchise. In its neighborhood was the celebrated grove and temple of Diana Aricina, on the borders of the Lacus Nemorensis (now Nemi). Diana was worshipped here with barbarous customs: her priest, called rex nemorensis, was always a runaway slave, who obtained his office by killing his predecessor in single combat. The priest was obliged to fight with any slave who succeeded in breaking off a branch of a certain tree in the sacred grove.

ARIDÆUS. Vid. ARLEUS, ARRHIDÆUS.

[ARIDŌLIS (Ἀριδῶλις), tyrant of Alabanda in Caria, accompanied Xerxes in his expedition against Greece, and was taken captive by the Greeks off Artemisium, B.C. 480.]

ARIL is the name applied to the inhabitants of the province of ARIA, but it is probably, also, a form of the generic name of the whole Persian race, derived from the root ar, which means noble, and which forms the first syllable of a great number of Persian names. Compare ΑΡΤΕΛ.

ΑΡΙΜΑΣΠΙ (Ἄριμασπί), a people in the north of Scythia, of whom a fabulous account is given by Herodotus (iv., 27). The germ of the fable is perhaps to be recognized in the fact that the Ural Mountains abound in gold.

ARIMAZES (Ἀριμάζης) or ARIOMAZES (Ἀριομάζης), a chief in Sogdiana, whose fortress was taken by Alexander in B.C. 328. In it Alexander found Roxana, the daughter of the Bactrian chief Oxyartes, whom he made his wife.

ARIMI (Ἀριμοί) and ARIMĀ (τὰ Ἄριμα, sc. ἄρη), the names of a mythical people, district, and range of mountains in Asia Minor, which the old Greek poets made the scene of the punishment of the monster Typhœus. Vigil (Æn., ix., 716) has misunderstood the εἰν Ἀριμοίς of Homer (Il., ii., 783), and made Typhœus lie beneath Inarime, an island off the coast of Italy, namely, Pithecusa or Ænaria (now Ischia).

ARIMINUM (Ariminensis: now Rimini), a town in Umbria, on the coast, at the mouth of the little River Ariminus (now Marocchia). It was originally inhabited by Umbrians and Pelasgians, was afterward in the possession of the Senones, and was colonized by the Romans in B.C. 268, from which time it appears as a flourishing place. After leaving Cisalpine Gaul, it was the first town which a person arrived at in the northeast of Italia proper.

ARIOBARZANES (Ἀριοβαρζάνης). I. Kings or Satraps of Pontus.—1. Betrayed by his son Mithradates to the Persian king about B.C. 400.—2. Son of Mithradates I., reigned B.C. 363–337. He revolted from Artaxerxes in 362, and may be regarded as the founder of the kingdom of Pontus.—3. Son of Mithradates III., reigned 266–240, and was succeeded by Mithradates IV. II. Kings of Cappadocia.—1. Surnamed Philoromæus, reigned B.C. 93–63, and was elected king by the Cappadocians, under the direction of the Romans. He was several times expelled from his kingdom by Mithradates, but was finally restored by Pompey in 63, shortly before his death.—2. Surnamed Philopator, succeeded his father in 63. The time of his death is not known, but it must have been before 51, in which year his son was reigning.—3. Surnamed Eusebes and Philoromæus, son of No. 2, whom he succeeded about 51. He assisted Pompey against Cæsar in 48, but was nevertheless pardoned by Cæsar, who even enlarged his territories. He was slain in 42 by Cassius, because he was plotting against him in Asia.

ARION (Ἀρίων). 1. Of Methymna in Lesbos, an ancient Greek bard and celebrated player on the cithara, is called the inventor of the dithyrambic poetry and of the name dithyramb. He lived about B.C. 625, and spent a great part of his life at the court of Periander, tyrant of Corinth. Of his life scarcely any thing is known beyond the beautiful story of his escape from the sailors with whom he sailed [from Tarentum in Italy] to Corinth. On one occasion, thus runs the story, Arion went to Sicily to take part in some musical contest. He won the prize, and, laden with presents, he embarked in a Corinthian ship to return to his friend Periander. The rude sailors coveted his treasures, and meditated his murder. After trying in vain to save his life, he at length obtained permission once more to play on the cithara. In festal attire, he placed himself in the prow of the ship, and invoked the gods in inspired strains, and then threw himself into the sea. But many song-loving dolphins had assembled round the vessel, and one of them now took the bard on its back and carried him to Tænarus, from whence he returned to Corinth in safety, and related his adventure to Periander. Upon the arrival of the Corinthian vessel, Periander inquired of the sailors after Arion, who replied that he had remained behind at Tarentum; but when Arion, at the bidding of Periander, came forward, the sailors owned their guilt, and were punished according to their desert. In the times of Herodotus and Pausanias there existed at Tænarus a brass monument, representing Arion riding on a dolphin. Arion and his cithara (lyre) were placed among the stars. A fragment of a hymn to Neptune (Poseidon), ascribed to Ariou, is contained in Bergk's Poeta Lyrici Græci, p. 566, &c.—2. A fabulous horse, which Neptune (Poseidon) begot by Ceres (Demeter); for, in order to escape from the pursuit of Neptune (Poseidon), the goddess had metamorphosed herself into a mare, and Neptune (Poseidon) deceived her by assuming the figure of a horse. There were many other traditions respecting the origin of this horse, but all make Neptune (Poseidon) its father, though its mother is different in the various legends.

ARIOVISTUS, a German chief, who crossed the Rhine at the request of the Sequani, when they were hard pressed by the Ædui. He subdued the Ædui, but appropriated to himself part of the territory of the Sequani, and threatened to take still more. The Sequani now united with the Ædui in imploring the help of Cæsar, who defeated Ariovistus about fifty miles from the Rhine, B.C. 58. Ariovistus escaped across the river in a small boat.

[ARIPHON (Ἀρίφων). 1. The father of Xanthippus, and grandfather of Pericles.—2. Of Sicily, a Greek poet, author of a beautiful pæan to Health, preserved by Athenæus: it is given in Bergk's Poeta Lyrici Græci, p. 841.]

[ARISBE (Ἀρίσβη). 1. Daughter of Merops, first wife of Priam, to whom she bore Æsacus.—2. Daughter of Teucer, wife of Dardanus, from whom the town Arisbe, in Troas, was said to be named.]

[ARISBE (Ἀρίσβη, now Mussa Köi). 1. A town of Troas, on the Selleis, not far from Abydus, founded by the Lesbians, or, according to Anaximenes of Lampsacus, by the Milesians, the earlier town having been destroyed by Achilles in the Trojan war. It was occupied by the army of Alexander after the passage of the Hellespont: at a later period it was captured by the Gauls, and in Strabo's time it no longer existed. It appears to have been subsequently rebuilt, and to have become a considerable place under the later emperors.—2. A city of Lesbos, made tributary at an early period by the Methymnæans: it was destroyed by an earthquake.]

[ARISBUS (Ἀρισβός), a river of Thrace, flowing into the Hebrus.]

ARISTÆNÉTUS (Ἀρισταίνετος), the reputed author of two books of Love Letters, taken almost entirely from Plato, Lucian, Philostratus, and Plutarch. Of the author nothing is known. The best edition is by Boissonade, Paris, 1822.

ARISTÆNUS (Ἀρίστανος), of Megalopolis, sometimes called Aristanetus, was frequently strategus or general of the Achæan League from B.C. 198 to 185. He was the political opponent of Philopœmen, and a friend of the Romans.

ARISTÆUS (Ἀρισταῖος), a divinity worshipped in various parts of Greece, was once a mortal, who became a god through the benefits he had conferred upon mankind. The different accounts about him seem to have arisen in different places and independently of one another, so that they referred to several distinct beings, who were subsequently identified and united into one. He is described either as a son of Uranus and Ge, or, according to a more general tradition, as the son of Apollo and Cyrene. His mother Cyrene had been carried off by Apollo from Mount Pelion to Libya, where she gave birth to Aristæus. Aristæus subsequently went to Thebes in Bœotia; but after the unfortunate death of his son ΑΣΤΕΩΝ, he left Thebes, and visited almost all the Greek colonies on the coasts of the Mediterranean. Finally he went to Thrace, and after dwelling for some time near Mount Hæmus, where he founded the town of Aristæon, he disappeared. Aristæus is one of the most beneficent divinities in ancient mythology: he was worshipped as the protector of flocks and shepherds, of vine and olive plantations; he taught men to keep bees, and averted from the fields the burning heat of the sun and other causes of destruction.

ARISTAGÓRAS (Ἀρισταγόρας). 1. Of Miletus, brother-in-law of Histæus, was left by the latter, during his stay at the Persian court, in charge of the government of Miletus. Having failed in an attempt upon Naxos (B.C. 501), which he had promised to subdue for the Persians, and fearing the consequences of his failure, he induced the Ionian cities to revolt from Persia.

He applied for assistance to the Spartans and Athenians: the former refused, but the latter sent him twenty ships and some troops. In 499 his army captured and burned Sardis, but was finally chased back to the coast. The Athenians now departed; the Persians conquered most of the Ionian cities; and Aristagoras, in despair, fled to Thrace, where he was slain by the Edonians in 497.—[2. Son of Heracles, tyrant of Cyme in Æolis, one of the Ionian chiefs left by Darius to guard the bridge over the Danube.—3. Tyrant of Cyzicus, also in the service of the Persian king, and left by him as one of the guards of the bridge over the Danube.—4. A Greek author, who composed a work on Egypt, flourished near the time of Plato.—5. A comic poet of the old comedy, of whom a few slight fragments remain, given by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i., p. 427–428, edit. minor.]

ARISTANDER (Ἀρίστανδρος), the most celebrated soothsayer of Alexander the Great, wrote a work on prodigies.

ARISTARCHUS (Ἀρίσταρχος). 1. An Athenian, one of the leaders in the revolution of the "Four Hundred," B.C. 411. He was afterward put to death by the Athenians, not later than 406.—2. A Laedæmonian, succeeded Cleander as harmost of Byzantium in 400, and in various ways ill treated the Greeks of Cyrus's army, who had recently returned from Asia.—3. Of TEGEA, a tragic poet at Athens, contemporary with Euripides, flourished about B.C. 454, and wrote seventy tragedies.—4. Of SAMOS, an eminent mathematician and astronomer at Alexandria, flourished between B.C. 280 and 264. He employed himself in the determination of some of the most important elements of astronomy; but none of his works remain, except a treatise on the magnitudes and distances of the sun and moon (περὶ μεγεθῶν καὶ ἀποστημάτων ἡλίου καὶ σελήνης). Edited by Wallis, Oxon, 1688, and reprinted in vol. iii. of his works. There is a French translation, and an edition of the text, Paris, 1810.—5. Of SAMOTHRACE, the celebrated grammarian, flourished B.C. 156. He was educated in the school of Aristophanes of Byzantium, at Alexandria, where he himself founded a grammatical and critical school. At an advanced age he left Alexandria and went to Cyprus, where he is said to have died at the age of 72, of voluntary starvation, because he was suffering from incurable dropsy. Aristarchus was the greatest critic of antiquity. His labors were chiefly devoted to the Greek poets, but more especially to the Homeric poems, of which he published a recension, which has been the basis of the text from his time to the present day. The great object of his critical labors was to restore the genuine text of the Homeric poems, and to clear it of all later interpolations and corruptions. He marked those verses which he thought spurious with an obelos, and those which he considered as particularly beautiful with an asterisk. He divided the Iliad and Odyssey into twenty-four books each. He did not confine himself to a recension of the text, but also explained and interpreted the poems: he opposed the allegorical interpretation which was then beginning to find favor, and which at a later time became very general. His grammatial principles were attacked by many of his contemporaries: the most eminent of his opposers was CRATES of Mallus.

ARISTEAS (Ἀριστείας). 1. Of Proconnesus, an epic poet of whose life we have only fabulous accounts. His date is quite uncertain: some place him in the time of Cræsus and Cyrus; but other traditions make him earlier than Homer, or a contemporary and teacher of Homer. The ancient writers represent him as a magician, who rose after his death, and whose soul could leave and re-enter its body according to its pleasure. He was connected with the worship of Apollo, which he was said to have introduced at Metapontum. He is said to have travelled through the countries north and east of the Euxine, and to have visited the Issedones, Arimaspeæ, Cimmerii, Hyperborei, and other mythical nations, and after his return to have written an epic poem in three books, called The Arimaspea (τὰ Ἀριμάσπεια). This work is frequently mentioned by the ancients, but it is impossible to say who was the real author of it.—[2. Of Chios, a distinguished officer in the army of the Ten Thousand.—3. An Argive, who invited Pyrrhus to Argos, B.C. 272, as his rival Aristippus was supported by Antigonus Gonatas.]

ARISTEAS OF ARISTÆUS, an officer of Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 285–247), the reputed author of a Greek work, giving an account of the manner in which the translation of the Septuagint was executed, but which is generally admitted by the best critics to be spurious. Printed at Oxford, 1692, 8vo.

ARISTIDES (Ἀριστείδης). 1. An Athenian, son of Lysimachus, surnamed the "Just," was of an ancient and noble family. He was the political disciple of Clisthenes, and partly on that account, partly from personal character, opposed from the first to Themistocles. Aristides fought as the commander of his tribe at the battle of Marathon, B.C. 490; and next year, 489, he was archon. In 483 or 482 he suffered ostracism, probably in consequence of the triumph of the maritime and democratic policy of his rival. He was still in exile in 480 at the battle of Salamis, where he did good service by dislodging the enemy, with a band raised and armed by himself, from the islet of Psytaleia. He was recalled from banishment after the battle, was appointed general in the following year (479), and commanded the Athenians at the battle of Plataeæ. In 477, when the allies had become disgusted with the conduct of Pausanias and the Spartans, he and his colleague Cimon had the glory of obtaining for Athens the command of the maritime confederacy; and to Aristides was by general consent intrusted the task of drawing up its laws and fixing its assessments. This first tribute (φόρος) of 460 talents, paid into a common treasury at Delos, bore his name, and was regarded by the allies in after times as marking their Saturnian age. This is his last recorded act. He died after 471, the year of the ostracism of Themistocles, and very likely in 468. He died so poor that he did not leave enough to pay for his funeral: his daughters were portioned by the state, and his son, Lysimachus, received a grant of land and of money.—2. The author of a work entitled Milesiaca, which was probably a romance, having Miletus for its scene. It was written in prose, and was of a licentious character. It was translated into Latin by L. Cornelius Sisenna, a contemporary of Sulla, and it seems to have become popular with the Romans. Aristides is reckoned as the inventor of the Greek romance, and the title of his work gave rise to the term Milesian, as applied to works of fiction. His age and country are unknown, but the title of his work is thought to favor the conjecture that he was a native of Miletus.—3. OF THEBES, a celebrated Greek painter, flourished about B.C. 360–330. The point in which he most excelled was in depicting the feelings, expressions, and passions which may be observed in common life. His pictures were so much valued, that, long after his death, Attalus, king of Pergamus, offered six hundred thousand sesterces for one of them.—4. ÆLIUS ARISTIDES, surnamed THEOPHORUS, a celebrated Greek rhetorician, was born at Adriani, in Mysia, in A.D. 117. He studied under Herodes Atticus at Athens, and subsequently travelled through Egypt, Greece, and Italy. The fame of his talents and acquirements was so great, that monuments were erected to his honor in several towns which he had honored with his presence. Shortly before his return he was attacked by an illness which lasted for thirteen years, but this did not prevent him from prosecuting his studies. He subsequently settled at Smyrna, and when this city was nearly destroyed by an earthquake in 178, he used his influence with the emperor, M. Aurelius, to induce him to assist in rebuilding the town. The Smyrnæans showed their gratitude to Aristides by offering him various honors and distinctions, most of which he refused: he accepted only the office of priest of Æsculapius (Aesclepius), which he held until his death, about A.D. 180. The works of Aristides which have come down to us are fifty-five orations and declamations, and two treatises on rhetorical subjects of little value. His orations are much superior to those of the rhetoricians of his time. His admirers compared him to Demosthenes, and even Aristides did not think himself much inferior. This vanity and self-sufficiency made him enemies and opponents; but the number of his admirers was far greater, and several learned grammarians wrote commentaries on his orations, some of which are extant. The best edition of Aristides is by W. Dindorf, Lips., 1829.—5. QUINTILIANUS ARISTIDES, the author of a treatise in three books on music, probably lived in the first century after Christ. His work is perhaps the most valuable of all the ancient musical treatises: it is printed in the collection of Meibomius entitled Antiquæ Musicæ Auctores Septem, Amst., 1652.

ARISTION (Ἀριστίων), a philosopher either of the Epicurean or Peripatetic school, made himself tyrant of Athens through the influence of Mithradates. He held out against Sulla in B.C. 87; and when the city was taken by storm, he was put to death by Sulla's orders.

ARISTIPPUS (Ἀριστίππος). 1. Son of Aristides, born at Cyrene, and founder of the Cyrenaic school of philosophy, flourished about B.C. 370. The fame of Socrates brought him to Athens, and he remained with that philosopher almost up to the time of his execution, B.C. 399. Though a disciple of Socrates, he wandered both in principle and practice very far from the teaching and example of his great master. He was luxurious in his mode of living; he indulged in sensual gratifications and the society of the notorious Lais; and he took money for his teaching (being the first of the disciples of Socrates who did so). He passed part of his life at the court of Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse; but he appears at last to have returned to Cyrene, and there to have spent his old age. The anecdotes which are told of him, however, do not give us the notion of a person who was the mere slave of his passions, but rather of one who took a pride in extracting enjoyment from all circumstances of every kind, and in controlling adversity and prosperity alike. They illustrate and confirm the two statements of Horace (Ep. i, 1, 18), that to observe the precepts of Aristippus is mihî res, non me rebus subjungere, and (l. 17, 23) that omnis Aristippum decuit color et status et res. Thus, when reproached for his love of bodily indulgences, he answered that there was no shame in enjoying them, but that it would be disgraceful if he could not at any time give them up. To Xenophon and Plato he was very obnoxious, as we see from the Menorabilia (ii, 1), where he maintains an odious discussion against Socrates in defence of voluptuous enjoyment, and from the Phædo, where his absence at the death of Socrates, though he was only at Ægina, two hundred stadia from Athens, is doubtless mentioned as a reproach. He imparted his doctrine to his daughter Arete, by whom it was communicated to her son, the younger Aristippus.—[2. ARISTIPPUS, an Aleuad, of Larissa in Thessaly, received money and troops from Cyrus, to resist a faction opposed to him, and for the ulterior purposes of Cyrus, to whom he sent the troops under command of Menon.—3. An Argive, who obtained the supreme power in Argos through the aid of Antigonus Gonatas, about B.C. 272.—4. An Argive, tyrant of Argos after the murder of Aristomachus I. Aratus made many attempts to deprive him of his tyranny, but at first without success: he fell at length in a battle against Aratus, and was succeeded in the tyranny by Aristomachus II. Vid. ARISTOMACHUS, Nos. 3 and 4.]

[ARISTIUS FUSCUS. Vid. FUSCUS. No. 2.]

ARISTO, T, a distinguished Roman jurist, lived under the Emperor Trajan, and was a friend of the younger Pliny. His works are occasionally mentioned in the Digest, but there is no direct extract from any of them in that compilation. He wrote notes on the Libri Posteriorum of Labeo, on Cassius, whose pupil he had been, and on Sabinus.

ARISTO. Vid. ARISTON.

ARISTOBULUS (Ἀριστόβουλος), princes of Judæa. 1. Eldest son of Joannes Hyrcanus, assumed the title of King of Judæa on the death of his father in B.C. 107. He put to death his brother Antigonus in order to secure his power, but died in the following year, 106.—2. Younger son of Alexander Jannæus and Alexandra. After the death of his mother in B.C. 70, there was a civil war for some years between Aristobulus and his brother Hyrcanus for the possession of the crown. At length, in B.C. 63, Aristobulus was deprived of the the sovereignty by Pompey, and carried away as a prisoner to Rome. In 57 he escaped from his confinement at Rome with his son Antigonus, and, returning to Judæa, renewed the war; but he was taken prisoner, and sent back to Rome by Gabinius. In 49 he was released by Julius Cæsar, who sent him into Judæa, but he was poisoned on the way by some of Pompey's party.—3. Grandson of No. 2, son of Alexander, and brother of Herod's wife Mariamne. He was made high-priest by Herod when he was only seventeen years old, but was afterward drowned at Jericho, by order of Herod, B.C. 35.—4. Son of Herod the Great by Mariamne, was put to death in B.C. 6, with his brother Alexander, by order of their father, whose suspicions had been excited against them by their brother ANTIPATER.—5. Surnamed "the Younger," son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. He was educated at Rome with his two brothers, Agrippa I and Herod the future king of Chalcis. He died, as he had lived, in a private station.—6. Son of Herod, king of Chalcis, grandson of No. 4, and great-grandson of Herod the Great. In A.D. 55, Nero made him king of Armenia Minor, and in 61 added to his dominions some portion of the Greater Armenia which had been given to Tigranes. He joined the Romans in the war against Antiochus, king of Commagene, in 73.

ARISTOBŪLUS. 1. Of Cassandrea, served under Alexander the Great in Asia, and wrote a history of Alexander, which was one of the chief sources used by Arrian in the composition of his work.—2. An Alexandrine Jew, and a Peripatetic philosopher, lived B.C. 170, under Ptolemy VI. Philometor. He is said to have been the author of commentaries upon the books of Moses, the object of which was to prove that the Greek philosophy was taken from the books of Moses; but it is now admitted that this work was written by a later writer, whose object was to induce the Greeks to pay respect to the Jewish literature.

ARISTŌCLES (Ἀριστοκλῆς). 1. Of Rhodes, a Greek grammarian and rhetorician, a contemporary of Strabo.—2. Of Pergamus, a Sophist and rhetorician, and a pupil of Herodes Atticus, lived under Trajan and Hadrian.—3. Of Messene, a Peripatetic philosopher, probably lived about the beginning of the third century after Christ. He wrote a work on philosophy, some fragments of which are preserved by Eusebius.—4. Sculptors. There were two sculptors of this name: Aristocles the elder, who is called both a Cydonian and a Sicyonian, probably because he was born at Cydonia and practiced his art in Sicyon; and Aristocles the younger, of Sicyon, grandson of the former, son of Cleetas, and brother of Canachus. These artists founded a school of sculpture at Sicyon, which secured an hereditary reputation, and of which we have the heads for several generations, namely, Aristocles, Cleetas, Aristocles and Canachus, Synnoön, Ptoliehus, Sostratus, and Pantias. The elder Aristocles probably lived about B.C. 600–568; the younger about 540–508.—[5. Earlier name of Plato. Vid. PLATO.]

of Areadia, was the leader of the Areadians in the second Messenian war, when they assisted the Messenians against the Spartans. Having been bribed by the Spartans, he betrayed the Messenians, and was, in consequence, stoned to death by the Areadians about B.C. 668, who now abolished the kingly office.—2. An Athenian of wealth and influence, son of Scellias, was one of the Athenian generals at the battle of Arginusæ, B.C. 406, and on his return to Athens was brought to trial and executed.

ARISTODĒMUS (Ἀριστόδημος). 1. A descendant of Hercules, son of Aristomachus, and father of Eurysthenes and Procles. According to some traditions, Aristodemus was killed at Naupactus by a flash of lightning, just as he was setting out on his expedition into Peloponnesus; but a Lacedæmonian tradition related that Aristodemus himself came to Sparta, was the first king of his race, and died a natural death.—2. A Messenian, one of the chief heroes in the first Messenian war. As the Delphic oracle had declared that the preservation of the Messenian state demanded that a maiden of the house of the Æpytids should be sacrificed, Aristodemus offered his own daughter. In order to save her life, her lover declared that she was with child by him; but Aristodemus, enraged at this assertion, murdered his daughter, and opened her body to refute the calumny. Aristodemus was afterward elected king in place of Euphæus, who had fallen in battle against the Spartans. He continued the war against the Spartans, till at length, finding further resistance hopeless, he put an end to his life, on the tomb of his daughter, about B.C. 723.—3. Tyrant of Cumæ in Campania, at whose court Tarquinius Superbus died, B.C. 496.—4. One of the three hundred Spartans at Thermopylæ (B.C. 480), was not present at the battle in which his comrades fell, either in consequence of sickness, or because he had been sent on an errand from the camp. The Spartans punished him with Atimia, or civil degradation. Stung with this treatment, he met his death at Platææ in the following year (479), after performing the wildest feats of valor.—5. A tragic actor of Athens in the time of Demosthenes, took a prominent part in the political affairs of his time, and advocated peace with Macedonia. He was employed by the Athenians in the negotiations with Philip, with whom he was a great favorite.—6. Of Miletus, a friend and flatterer of Antigonus, king of Asia, who sent him into Greece in B.C. 315, in order to promote his interests there.—7. There were many literary persons of this name referred to by the ancient grammarians, whom it is difficult to distinguish from one another. Two were natives of Nysa in Caria, both grammarians, one a teacher of Pompey, and the other of Strabo. There was also an Aristodemus of Elis, and another of Thebes, who are quoted as writers. [The fragments of these writers are collected and published together by Müller, Fragm. Histor. Græc., vol. iii., p. 307–311.]

ARISTOGITON (Ἀριστογίτων). 1. The conspirator against the sons of Pisistratus. Vid. HARMODIUS.—2. An Athenian orator and adversary of Demosthenes, Hyperides, and Dinarchus. He was often accused by Demosthenes and others, and defended himself in a number of orations which are lost. Among the extant speeches of Demosthenes there are two against Aristogiton, and among those of Dinarchus there is one.

ARISTOMĀCHE (Ἀριστομάχη). [1. One of the daughters of Priam, and wife of Critolaus.]—2. Daughter of Hipparinus of Syraeuse, sister of Dion, and wife of the elder Dionysius, who married her and Doris of Loeri on the same day. She afterward perished with her daughter ARETE.

ARISTOMĀCHUS (Ἀριστομάχος). 1. Son of Talau and brother of Adrastus.—2. Son of Cleodemus or Cleodæus, grandson of Hylus, great-grandson of Hercules, and father of Temæus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus. He fell in battle when he invaded Peloponnesus; but his three sons were more successful, and conquered Peloponnesus.—3. Tyrant of Argos, under the patronage of Antigonus Gonatas, was assassinated, and succeeded by Aristippus II.—4. Tyrant of Argos, succeeded Aristippus II.; he resigned his power upon the death of Demetrius in B.C. 229, and induced Argos to join the Achaean League. He afterward deserted the Achæans, and again assumed the tyranny of Argos; but the city having been taken by Antigonus Doson, Aristomachus fell into the hands of the Achæans, and was by them put to death.

ARISTOMĒNES (Ἀριστομένης). 1. The Messenian, the hero of the second war with Sparta, belongs more to legend than to history. He was a native of Andania, and was sprung from the royal line of Æpytus. Tired of the yoke of Sparta, he began the war in B.C. 685, thirty-nine years after the end of the first war. Soon after its commencement, he so distinguished himself by his valor that he was offered the throne, but refused it, and received the office of supreme commander. After the defeat of the Messenians in the third year of the war, through the treachery of Aristocrates, the Arcadian leader, Aristomenes retreated to the mountain fortress of Ira, and there maintained the war eleven years, constantly ravaging the land of Laconia. In one of his incursions, however, the Spartans overpowered him with superior numbers, and carrying him, with fifty of his comrades, to Sparta, cast them into the pit (κεῶδας) where condemned criminals were thrown. The rest perished; not so Aristomenes, the favorite of the gods; for legends told how an eagle bore him up on its wings as he fell, and a fox guided him on the third day from the cavern. But having incurred the anger of the Twin Brothers, his country was destined to ruin. The city of Ira, which he had so long successfully defended, fell into the hands of the Spartans; Aristomenes, after performing prodigies of valor, was obliged to leave his country, which was again compelled to submit to the Spartans, B.C. 668. He afterward settled at Ialysus in Rhodes, where he died. Damagetus, king of Ialysus, had been enjoined by the Delphic oracle "to marry the daughter of the best of the Greeks," and he therefore took to wife the daughter of Aristomenes, who accompanied him to Rhodes. The Rhodians honored Aristomenes as a hero, and from him were descended the illustrious family of the Diagoridæ.—2

An Acarnanian, who governed Egypt with justice and wisdom during the minority of Ptolemy V. Epiphanes, but was put to death by Ptolemy in 192.—3. A comic poet of Athens, flourished during the Peloponnesian war: [of his comedies only a few fragments remain, which are collected in Meineke's Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i., p. 415-7, edit. minor.]

ARISTON (Ἀρίστων). 1. Of Chios, a Stoic philosopher, and a disciple of Zeno, flourished about B.C. 260. Though he professed himself a Stoic, yet he differed from Zeno in several points, and became the founder of a small school. He is said to have died of a coup de soleil.—2. A Peripatetic philosopher of Iulis in the Island of Ceos, succeeded Lycon as head of the Peripatetic school about B.C. 230. He wrote several philosophical works which are lost.—3. Of Alexandria, a Peripatetic philosopher and a contemporary of Strabo, wrote a work on the Nile; [and another, περὶ Ἀθηνῶν ἁποικίας, as Vossius has shown, with whom also Müller agrees, who has given the fragments of these works, in his Fragm. Hist. Græc., vol. iii., p. 324-5.]

ARISTONAΥΤἘ (Ἀριστοναύται), a town in Achaia, the harbor of Pallene.

ARISTONICUS (Ἀριστόνικος). 1. [A tyrant of Methymna, in Lesbos, who oppressed the Lesbians. He was subsequently taken prisoner by the naval commanders of Alexander at Chios, given up to the Methymnæans, and by them cruelly put to death.]—2. A natural son of Eumenes II. of Pergamus. Upon the death of his brother, Attalus III., B.C. 133, who left his kingdom to the Romans, Aristonicus laid claim to the crown. At first he met with considerable success. He defeated in 131 the consul P. Licinius Crassus; but in 130 he was defeated and taken prisoner by M. Perperna, was carried to Rome by M. Aquillius in 129, and was there put to death.—3. An Alexandrine grammarian, a contemporary of Strabo, and the author of several works, most of which related to the Homeric poems.

ARISTONŶMUS (Ἀριστόνυμος), a comic poet and contemporary of Aristophanes and Amipsias, [of whose plays scarcely any thing survives: two or three fragments are given in Meineke's Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i., p. 401-2, edit. minor.]

ARISTOPHĀNES (Ἀριστοφάνης). 1. The celebrated comic poet, was born about B.C. 444, and probably at Athens. His father Philippus had possessions in Ægina, and may originally have come from that island, whence a question arose whether Aristophanes was a genuine Athenian citizen: his enemy Cleon brought against him more than one accusation to deprive him of his civic rights (ξενίας γραφαί), but without success. He had three sons, Philippus, Araros, and Nicostratus, but of his private history we know nothing. He probably died about B.C. 380. The comedies of Aristophanes are of the highest historical interest, containing as they do an admirable series of caricatures on the leading men of the day, and a contemporary commentary on the evils existing at Athens. Indeed, the caricature is the only feature in modern social life which at all resembles them. Aristophanes was a bold and often a wise patriot. He had the strongest affection for Athens and longed to see her restored to the state in which she was flourishing in the previous generation, and almost in his own childhood, before Pericles became the head of the government, and when the age of Miltiades and Aristides had but just passed away. The first great evil of his own time against which he inveighs is the Peloponnesian war, which he regards as the work of Pericles. To this fatal war, among a host of evils, he ascribes the influence of demagogues like Cleon at Athens. Another great object of his indignation was the recently adopted system of education, which had been introduced by the Sophists, acting on the speculative and inquiring turn given to the Athenian mind by the Ionian and Eleatic philosophers, and the extraordinary intellectual development of the age following the Persian war. The new theories introduced by the Sophists threatened to overthrow the foundations of morality, by making persuasion, and not truth, the object of man in his intercourse with his fellows, and to substitute a universal skepticism for the religious creed of the people. The worst effects of such a system were seen in Aleibiades, who combined all the elements which Aristophanes most disliked, heading the war party in politics, and protecting the sophistical school in philosophy and also in literature. Of this latter school—the literary and poetical Sophists—Euripides was the chief, whose works are full of that μετεωροσοφία which contrasts so offensively with the moral dignity of Æschylus and Sophocles, and for which Aristophanes introduces him as soaring in the air to write his tragedies. Another feature of the times was the excessive love for litigation at Athens, the consequent importance of the deacons, and disgraceful abuse of their power, all of which enormities are made by Aristophanes objects of continual attack. But though he saw what were the evils of his time, he had not wisdom to find a remedy for them, except the hopeless and undesirable one of a movement backward; and therefore, though we allow him to have been honest and bold, we must deny him the epithet of great. The following is a list of his extant comedies, with the year in which they were performed: 425. Acharnians. Produced in the name of Callistratus. First prize.—424. Ἰππείς, Knights or Horsemen. The first play produced in the name of Aristophanes himself. First prize; second Cratinus.—423. Clouds. First prize, Cratinus; second, Amipsias.—422. Wasps. Second prize.—Clouds (second edition), failed in obtaining a prize. Some writers place this B.C. 411, and the whole subject is very uncertain.—419. Peace. Second prize; Eupolis, first.—Birds. Second prize; Amipsias, first; Phrynichus, third.—411. Lysistrata.—Thesmophoriazuse. During the Oligarchy.—408. First Plutus.—405. Frogs. First prize; Phrynichus, second; Plato, third. Death of Sophocles.—392. Ecclēsiāzuse.—388. Second edition of the Plutus.—The last two comedies of Aristophanes were the Æolosicon and Cocalus, produced about B.C. 387 (date of the peace of Antalcidas) by Araros, one of his sons. Suidas tells us that Aristophanes was the author, in all, of fifty-four plays. As a poet Aristophanes possessed merits of the highest order. His works contain snatches of lyric poetry which are quite noble, and some of tus choruses, particularly one in the Knights, in which the horses are represented as rowing triremes in an expedition against Corinth, are written with a spirit and humor unrivalled in Greek, and are not very dissimilar to English ballads. He was a complete master of the Attic dialect, and in his hands the perfection of that glorious language is wonderfully shown. No flights are too bold for the range of his fancy: animals of every kind are pressed into his service; frogs chaunt choruses, a dog is tried for stealing a cheese, and an iambic verse is composed of the grunts of a pig.—Editions: The best of the collective plays are by Invernizzi, completed by Beck and Dindorf, 13 vols., Lips., 1794–1826; by Bekker, 5 vols. 8vo, Lond., 1829; [and by Dindorf, 4 vols., in 7 parts, 8vo, Oxford, 1835–38].—2. Of Byzantium, son of Apelles, and one of the most eminent Greek grammarians at Alexandria. He was a pupil of Zenodotus and Eratosthenes, and teacher of the celebrated Aristarchus. He lived about B.C. 264, in the reign of Ptolemy II. and Ptolemy III., and had the supreme management of the library at Alexandria. Aristophanes was the first who introduced the use of accents in the Greek language. He devoted himself chiefly to the criticism and interpretation of the Greek poets, and more especially of Homer, of whose works he made a new and critical edition (διόρθωσις). The philosophers Plato and Aristotle likewise engaged his attention, and of the former, as of several of the poets, he made new and critical editions. All we possess of his numerous works consists of fragments scattered through the Scholia on the poets, some arguments to the plays of the tragic poets and of Aristophanes, and a part of his Ἰδέσεις, which is printed in Boissonade's edition of Herodian's Partitions, London, 1819, p. 283–289. [A collection of all the extant fragments of Aristophanes has been made by Nauck, Halle, 1848, 8vo.]

ΑΡΙΣΤΟΦΩΝ (Ἀριστοφῶν). 1. Of the demus of Azenia in Attica, one of the most distinguished Athenian orators about the close of the Peloponnesian war. The number of laws which he proposed may be inferred from his own statement, as preserved by Æschines, that he was accused seventy-five times of having made illegal proposals, but that he had always come off victorious. In B.C. 354 he accused Iphicrates and Timotheus, and in the same year he came forward in the assembly to defend the law of Leptines against Demosthenes. The latter treats him with great respect, and reckons him among the most eloquent orators.—2. Of the demus of Colyttus, a contemporary of Demosthenes, and an orator of great distinction and influence. It was this Aristophon whom Æschines served as a clerk, and in whose service he was trained for his public career. Vid. ÆSCHINES.—3. A comic poet of the middle comedy; [the fragments of his plays remaining are collected by Meineke, in his Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. ii., p. 675–679, ed. minor].—4. A painter of some distinction, son and pupil of Aglaophon, and brother of Polygnotus.

ΑΡΙΣΤΟΤΕΛΕΣ (Ἀριστοτέλης), the philosopher, was born at Stagira, a town in Chalcidice in Macedonia, B.C. 384. His father, Nicomachus, was physician in ordinary to Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, and the author of several treatises on subjects connected with natural science: his mother, Phæstis (or Phæstias), was descended from a Chalcidian family. The studies and occupation of his father account for the early inclination manifested by Aristotle for the investigation of nature, an inclination which is perceived throughout his whole life. He lost his father before he had attained his seventeenth year, and he was intrusted to the guardianship of one Proxeus of Atarneus in Mysia, who was settled in Stagira. In 367 he went to Athens to pursue his studies, and there became a pupil of Plato upon the return of the latter from Sicily about 365. Plato soon distinguished him above all his other disciples. He named him the "intellect of his school," and his house the house of the "reader." Aristotle lived at Athens for twenty years, till 347. During the whole of this period the good understanding which subsisted between teacher and scholar continued, with some trifling exceptions, undisturbed, for the stories of the disrespect and ingratitude of the latter toward the former are nothing but calumnies invented by his enemies. During the last ten years of his first residence at Athens, Aristotle gave instruction in rhetoric, and distinguished himself by his opposition to Isocrates. It was at this time that he published his first rhetorical writings. Upon the death of Plato (347) Aristotle left Athens; perhaps he was offended by Plato having appointed Speusippus as his successor in the Academy. He first repaired to his friend Hermias at Atarneus, where he married Pythias, the adoptive daughter of the prince. On the death of HERMIAS, who was killed by the Persians (344), Aristotle fled from Atarneus to Mytilene. Two years afterward (342) he accepted an invitation from Philip of Macedonia to undertake the instruction of his son Alexander, then thirteen years of age. Here Aristotle was treated with the most marked respect. His native city, Stagira, which had been destroyed by Philip, was rebuilt at his request, and Philip caused a gymnasium (called Nymphæum) to be built there in a pleasant grove expressly for Aristotle and his pupils. Several of the youths of the Macedonian nobles were educated by Aristotle along with Alexander. Aristotle spent seven years in Macedonia, but Alexander enjoyed his instruction without interruption for only four. Still, with such a pupil, even this short period was sufficient for a teacher like Aristotle to fulfill the highest purposes of education, and to create in his pupil that sense of the noble and great which distinguishes Alexander from all those conquerors who have only swept like a hurricane through the world. On Alexander's accession to the throne in 335, Aristotle returned to Athens. Here he found his friend Xenocrates president of the Academy. He himself had the Lyceum, a gymnasium sacred to Apollo Lyceus, assigned to him by the state. He soon assembled round him a large number of distinguished scholars, to whom he delivered lectures on philosophy in the shady walks (περίπατοι), which surrounded the Lyceum, while walking up and down (περιπατών), and not sitting, which was the general practice of the philosophers. From one or other of these circumstances the name Peripatetic is derived, which was afterward given to his school. He gave two different courses of lectures every day. Those which he delivered in the morning (ἑωθινὸς περίπατος) to a narrower circle of chosen (esoteric) hearers, and which were called acroamatic or acroatic, embraced subjects connected with the more abstruse philosophy (theology), physics, and dialectics. Those which he delivered in the afternoon (δελτινὸς περίπατος), and intended for a more promiscuous circle (which, accordingly, he called exoteric), extended to rhetoric, sophistics, and politics. He appears to have taught not so much in the way of conversation as in regular lectures. His school soon became the most celebrated at Athens, and he continued to preside over it for thirteen years (335-323). During this time he also composed the greater part of his works. In these labors he was assisted by the truly kingly liberality of his former pupil, who not only presented him with 800 talents, but also caused large collections of natural curiosities to be made for him, to which posterity is indebted for one of his most excellent works, the History of Animals. Meanwhile various causes contributed to throw a cloud over the latter years of the philosopher's life. In the first place he felt deeply the death of his wife Pythias, who left behind her a daughter of the same name: he lived subsequently with a friend of his wife's, the slave Herpyllis, who bore him a son, Nicomachus. But a source of still greater grief was an interruption of the friendly relation in which he had hitherto stood to his royal pupil. This was occasioned by the conduct of CALLISTHENES, the nephew and pupil of Aristotle, who had vehemently and injudiciously opposed the changes in the conduct and policy of Alexander. Still Alexander refrained from any expression of hostility towards his former instructor, although their former cordial connection no longer subsisted undisturbed. The story that Aristotle had a share in poisoning the king is a fabrication of a later age; and, moreover, it is certain that Alexander died a natural death. After the death of Alexander (323), Aristotle was looked upon with suspicion at Athens as a friend of Macedonia; but as it was not easy to bring any political accusation against him, he was accused of impiety (ἀσεβείας) by the hierophant Eurymedon. He withdrew from Athens before his trial, and escaped in the beginning of 322 to Chalcis in Eubœa, where he died in the course of the same year, in the sixty-third year of his age, of a chronic disease of the stomach. His body was transported to his native city Stagira, and his memory was honored there, like that of a hero, by yearly festivals. He bequeathed to Theophrastus his well-stored library and the originals of his writings. In person Aristotle was short and of slender make, with small eyes, and a lisp in his pronunciation, using L for R, and with a sort of sarcastic expression in his countenance. He exhibited remarkable attention to external appearance, and bestowed much care on his dress and person. He is described as having been of weak health, which, considering the astonishing extent of his studies, shows all the more the energy of his mind. The numerous works of Aristotle may be divided into the following classes, according to the subjects of which they treat: we only mention the most important in each class. I. DIALECTICS AND LOGIC. The extant logical writings are comprehended as a whole under the title Organon ('Ὀργανον, i. e., instrument of science). They are occupied with the investigation of the method by which man arrives at knowledge. An insight into the nature and formation of conclusions, and of proof by means of conclusions, is the common aim and centre of all the separate six works composing the Organon: these separate works are, 1. Κατηγορίαι, Prædicamenta, in which Aristotle treats of the (ten) comprehensive generic ideas, under which all the attributes of things may be subordinated as species.—2. Περὶ ἑρμηνείας, De Interpretatione, concerning the expression of thought by means of speech.—3. 4. Ἀναλυτικὰ πρότερα and ὑστερα, Analytica, each in two books, on the theory of conclusions, so called from the resolution of the conclusion into its fundamental component parts.—5. Τοπικά, De Locis, in eight books, of the general points of view (τόποι), from which conclusions may be drawn.—6. Περὶ σοφιστικῶν ἐλλέγχων, concerning the fallacies which only apparently prove something. The best edition of the Organon is by Waitz, Lips., 1844. II. THEORETICAL PHILOSOPHY, consisting of Metaphysics, Mathematics, and Physics, on all of which Aristotle wrote works. 1. The Metaphysics, in fourteen books (τῶν μετὰ τὰ φυσικά), originally consisted of distinct treatises, independent of one another, and were put together as one work after Aristotle's death. The title, also, is of late origin, and was given to the work from its being placed after (μετὰ) the Physics (τὰ φυσικά). The best edition is by Brandis, Berl., 1823.—2. In Mathematics we have two treatises by Aristotle: (1.) Περὶ ἀτόμων γραμμῶν, i. e., concerning indivisible lines; (2.) Μηχανικὰ προβλήματα, Mechanical Problems.—3. In Physics we have, (1.) Physics (φυσικὴ ἀκροῖσις, called also, by others, περὶ ἀρχῶν), in eight books. In these Aristotle develops the general principles of natural science (Cosmology). (2.) Concerning the Heaven (περὶ οὐρανοῦ), in four books. (3.) On Production and Destruction (περὶ γενέσεως καὶ φθορᾶς, de Generatione et Corruptione), in two books, develop the general laws of production and destruction. (4.) On Meteorology (μετεωρολογικά, de Meteoris), in four books. (5.) On the Universe (περὶ κόσμου, de Mundo), a letter to Alexander, treats the subject of the last two works in a popular tone and a rhetorical style altogether foreign to Aristotle. The whole is probably a translation of a work with the same title by Appuleius. (6.) The History of Animals (περὶ ζῴων ἱστορίαι), in nine books, treats of all the peculiarities of this division of the natural kingdom, according to genera, classes, and species, especially giving all the characteristics of each animal according to its external and internal vital functions, according to the manner of its copulation, its mode of life, and its character. The best edition is by Schneider, Lips., 1811. The observations in this work are the triumph of ancient sagacity, and have been confirmed by the results of the most recent investigations (Cuvier). (7.) On the parts of Animals (περὶ ζῴων μορίων), in four books, in which Aristotle, after describing the phenomena in each species, develops the causes of these phenomena by means of the idea to be formed of the purpose which is manifested in the formation of the animal. (8.) On the Generation of Animals (περὶ ζώων γενέσεως) in five books, treats of the generation of animals and the organs of generation.—(9.) De Incessu Animalium (περὶ ζώων πορείας). (10.) Three books on the Soul (περὶ ψυχῆς). Aristotle defines the soul to be the “internal formative principle of a body which may be perceived by the senses, and is capable of life.” Best edition by Trendelenburg, Jenæ, 1833. Several anatomical works of Aristotle have been lost. He was the first person who, in any special manner, advocated anatomical investigations, and showed the necessity of them for the study of the natural sciences. He frequently refers to investigations of his own on the subject. III. PRACTICAL PHILOSOPHY OR POLITICS. All that falls within the sphere of practical philosophy is comprehended in three principal works: the Ethics, the Politics, and the Economics. 1. The Nicomachean Ethics (Ἠθικὰ Νικομάχεια), in ten books. Aristotle here begins with the highest and most universal end of life, for the individual as well as for the community in the state. This is happiness (εὐδαιμονία); and its conditions are, on the one hand, perfect virtue exhibiting itself in the actor, and, on the other hand, corresponding bodily advantages and favorable external circumstances. Virtue is the readiness to act constantly and consciously according to the laws of the rational nature of man (ὁρθὸς λόγος). The nature of virtue shows itself in its appearing as the medium between two extremes. In accordance with this, the several virtues are enumerated and characterized. Best editions by Zell, Heidelb., 1820; Coray, Paris, 1822; Cardwell, Oxon., 1828; Michelet, Berol., 1848, 2d edition.—2. The Eudemian Ethics (Ἠθικὰ Εὐδημεία), in several books, of which only books i., ii., iii., and vii. are independent, while the remaining books iv., v., and vi. agree word for word with books v., vi., and vii. of the Nicomachean Ethics. This ethical work is perhaps a recension of Aristotle's lectures, edited by Eudemus.—3. Ἠθικὰ Μεγала, in two books.—4. Politics (Πολιτικά), in eight books. The Ethics conduct us to the Politics. The connection between the two works is so close, that in the Ethics by the word ἵστέον reference is made by Aristotle to the Politics, and in the latter by πρότερον to the Ethics. The Politics show how happiness is to be attained for the human community in the state; for the object of the state is not merely the external preservation of life, “but happy life,” as it is attained by “means of virtue” (ἀρετῇ, perfect development of the whole man). Hence, also, ethics form the first and most general foundation of political life, because the state cannot attain its highest object if morality does not prevail among its citizens. The house, the family, is the element of the state. Accordingly, Aristotle begins with the doctrine of domestic economy, then proceeds to a description of the different forms of government, after which he gives a delineation of the most important Hellenic constitutions, and then investigates which of the constitutions is the best (the ideal of a state). The doctrine concerning education, as the most important condition of this best state, forms the conclusion. Best editions, by Schneider, Fran cof. ad. Viadr., 1809; Coray, Paris, 1821; Göttling, Jenæ, 1824; Stahr, with a German translation, Lips., 1837; Barthélémy St. Hilaire, with a French translation, Paris, 1837.—5. Economics (οἰκονομικά), in two books, of which only the first is genuine. IV. WORKS ON ART, which have for their subject the exercise of the creative faculty, or Art. To these belong the Poetics and Rhetoric. 1. The Poetics (Περὶ ποιητικῆς). Aristotle penetrated more deeply than any of the ancients into the essence of Hellenic art. He is the father of the aesthetics of poetry, as he is the completer of Greek rhetoric as a science. The greatest part of the treatise contains a theory of Tragedy; nothing else is treated of, with the exception of the epos; comedy is merely alluded to. Best editions, by Tyrwhitt, Oxon., 1794; Hermann, Lips., 1802; Gräfenhan, Lips., 1821; Bekker, Berol., 1832; Ritter, Colou., 1839.—2. The Rhetoric (τέχνη ῥητορικῆ), in three books. Rhetoric, as a science, according to Aristotle, stands side by side with Dialectics. The only thing which makes a scientific treatment of rhetoric possible is the argumentation which awakens conviction: he therefore directs his chief attention to the theory of oratorical argumentation. The second main division of the work treats of the production of that favorable disposition in the hearer, in consequence of which the orator appears to him to be worthy of credit. The third part treats of oratorical expression and arrangement. According to a story current in antiquity, Aristotle bequeathed his library and MSS. to Theophrastus, his successor in the Academy. On the death of Theophrastus, the libraries and MSS., both of Aristotle and Theophrastus, are said to have come into the hands of his relation and disciple, Neleus of Scepsis. This Neleus sold both libraries to Ptolemy II, king of Egypt, for the Alexandrine library; but he retained for himself, as an heir-loom, the original MSS. of the works of these two philosophers. The descendants of Neleus, who were subjects of the King of Pergamus, knew of no other way of securing them from the search of the Attali, who wished to rival the Ptolemies in forming a large library, than concealing them in a cellar, where for a couple of centuries they were exposed to the ravages of damp and worms. It was not till the beginning of the century before the birth of Christ that a wealthy book-collector, the Athenian Apellicon of Teos, traced out these valuable relics, bought them from the ignorant heirs, and prepared from them a new edition of Aristotle's works. After the capture of Athens, Sulla conveyed Apellicon's library to Rome, B. C. 84. Vid. APELLICON. From this story an error arose, which has been handed down from the time of Strabo to the present day. It was concluded from this account that neither Aristotle nor Theophrastus had published their writings, with the exception of some exoteric works, which had no important bearing on their system, and that it was not till 200 years later that they were brought to light by the above-mentioned Apellicon, and published to the phil' osophical world. That, however, was by no means the cause. Aristotle, indeed, did not prepare a complete edition, as we call it, of his writings. Nay, it is certain that death overtook him before he could finish some of his works and put the finishing hand to others. Nevertheless, it can not be denied that Aristotle destined all his works for publication, and published several in his life-time. This is indisputably certain with regard to the exoteric writings. Those which had not been published by Aristotle himself, were given to the world by Theophrastus and his disciples in a complete form.

—Editions: The best edition of the complete works of Aristotle is by Bekker, Berlin, 1831–1840, 4to, text in 2 vols., and a Latin translation in one volume. This edition has been reprinted at Oxford in 11 vols. 8vo. There is a stereotyped edition published by Tauchnitz, Leipzig, 1832, 16mo, in 16 vols., and another edition of the text by Weise, in one volume, Leipzig, 1843.—[2. One of the thirty tyrants established in Athens B.C. 404: he would also appear to have been one of the 400, and to have taken an active part in the scheme of fortifying Eetionea, and admitting the Spartans into the Piræus, B.C. 411. In B.C. 405 he was living in banishment, and is mentioned by Xenophon as being with Lysander during the siege of Athens.—3. Of Sisyli, a rhetorician, who wrote against the Panegyricus of Isocrates.—4. Of Athens, an orator and statesman, under whose name some forensic orations were known in the time of Diogenes Laërtius, which were distinguished for their elegance.—5. Of Argos, a Megaric or dialectic philosopher, belonged to the party at Argos which was hostile to Cleomenes of Sparta.]

ARISTOXENUS (Ἀριστοξένος). 1. Of Tarentum, a Peripatetic philosopher and a musician, flourished about B.C. 318. He was a disciple of Aristotle, whom he appears to have rivalled in the variety of his studies. According to Suidas, he produced works to the number of 453 upon music, philosophy, history—in short, every department of literature. We know nothing of his philosophical opinions except that he held the soul to be a harmony of the body (Cic. Tusc., i., 10), a doctrine which had been already discussed by Plato in the Phædo. Of his numerous works, the only one extant is his Elements of Harmony (ἁρμονικὰ στοιχεῖα), in three books, edited by Meibomius, in the Antique Musice Auctores Septem, Amst., 1652.—[2. Of Selinus in Sicily, a Greek poet, who is said to have been the first who wrote in anapestic metres.—3. A celebrated Greek physician, who flourished about the beginning of the Christian era, and was the author of a work Περὶ τῆς Ἡροφίλου Αἰσθήσεως, De Herophili Secta.]

ARISTUS (Ἀριστος). 1. Of Salamis in Cyprus, wrote a history of Alexander the Great.—2. An Academic philosopher, a contemporary and friend of Cicero, and teacher of M. Brutus.

ARUS, river. Vid. ARIA.
[ARĪUS (*Αρειος). 1. A Pythagorean or Stoic philosopher of Alexandria, an instructor of Augustus in philosophy; highly esteemed by Augustus, who declared, after the capture of Alexandria, that he spared the city chiefly for the sake of Arius. Besides philosophy, he also taught rhetoric, and wrote on that art.—2. The celebrated heretic, born shortly after the middle of the third century A.D. In the religious disputes at Alexandria, A.D. 306, Arius at first took the part of Meletius, but afterward became reconciled to the Bishop of Alexandria, the opponent of Meletius, who made Arius deacon. Soon after this he was excommunicated by Peter of Alexandria, but was restored by his successor Achilles, and ordained priest A.D. 313. In 318 the celebrated controversy with Bishop Alexander broke out, a controversy which has had a greater and more lasting influence upon the development of the Christian religion than any other. So fierce did the dispute become, that the Emperor Constantine was forced to convoke a general council at Nicæa (Nica), A.D. 325, at which upward of three hundred bishops were present. The errors of Arius were condemned; and he was compelled to go into exile into Illyrium, where he remained until recalled by the emperor in 330, and allowed to return to Alexandria, through the influence of Eusebius of Nicomedia. His ever-wakeful opponent, however, Athanasius, was not so easily deceived as the emperor, and, notwithstanding the order of Constantine, refused to receive him into the communion of the Church. This led to a renewed application to the emperor; and when Arius finally seemed on the point of triumphing over his sturdy orthodox opponents, he was removed suddenly by the hand of death, A.D. 336.]

ARÛSĪA (ἡ Ἀριουσία χώρα), a district on the north coast of Chios, where the best wine in the island was grown (Ariusium Vinum, Virg., Ecl., v., 71.)

ARMENE (Ἀρμένη or ἄρηνη: now Akliman), a town on the coast of Paphlagonia, where the 10,000 Greeks, during their retreat, rested five days, entertained by the people of Sinope, a little to the west of which Armene stood.

ARMĒNĪA (Ἀρμενία: Ἀρμένιος, Armenius: now Armenia), a country of Asia, lying between Asia Minor and the Caspian, is a lofty table-land, backed by the chain of the Caucasus, watered by the rivers Cyrus and Araxes, containing the sources also of the Tigris and of the Euphrates, the latter of which divides the country into two unequal parts, which were called Major and Minor. 1. ARMENIA MAJOR or PROPRIA (*Α. ἡ μεγάλη or ἡ ἰδίως καλουμένη: now Erzeroum, Kars, Van, and Erivan), was bounded on the north-east and north by the Cyrus (now Kur), which divided it from Albania and Iberia; on the north-west and west by the Moschic Mountains (the prolongation of the chain of the Anti-Taurus), and the Euphrates (now Frat), which divided it from Colehis and Armenia Minor; and on the south and southeast by the mountains called Masius, Niphates, and Gordiaei (the prolongation of the Taurus), and the lower course of the ARAXES, which divided it from Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Media: on the east the country comes to a point at the confluence of the Cyrus and ARAXES. It is intersected by chains of mountains, between which run the two great rivers ARAXES, flowing east into the Caspian, and the Arsanius (now Murad), or south branch of the Euphrates, flowing west into the main stream (now Frat) just above Mount Masius. The eastern extremity of the chain of mountains which separates the basins of these two rivers, and which is an offshoot of the Anti-Taurus, forms the Ararat of Scripture. In the south of the country is the great lake of Van, Arsissa Palus, inclosed by mountain chains which connect Ararat with the southern range of mountains.—2. ARMENIA MINOR (A. μικρά or βραχυτέρα), was bounded on the east by the Euphrates, which divided it from Armenia Major, on the north and northwest by the mountains Scodises, Paryadres, and Anti-Taurus, dividing it from Pontus and Cappadocia, and on the south by the Taurus, dividing it from Commagene in Northern Syria, so that it contained the country east and south of the city of Sivas (the ancient Cabira or Sebaste) as far as the Euphrates and the Taurus. The boundaries between Armenia Minor and Cappadocia varied at different times; and, indeed, the whole country up to the Euphrates is sometimes called Cappadocia, and, on the other hand; the whole of Asia Minor east of the Halys seems at one time to have been included under the name of Armenia. The people of Armenia claimed to be aboriginal; and there can be little doubt that they were one of the most ancient families of that branch of the human race which is called Caucasian. Their language, though possessing some remarkable peculiarities of its own, was nearly allied to the Indo-Germanic family; and their manners and religious ideas were similar to those of the Medes and Persians, but with a greater tendency to the personification of the powers of nature, as in the goddess Anaitis, whose worship was peculiar to Armenia. They had commercial dealings with Assyria and Phœnicia. In the time of Xenophon they had preserved a great degree of primitive simplicity, but four hundred years later Tacitus gives an unfavorable view of their character. The earliest Armenian traditions represent the country as governed by native kings, who had perpetually to maintain their independence against attacks from Assyria. They were said to have been conquered by Semiramis, but again threw off the yoke at the time of the Median and Babylonian revolt. Their relations to the Medes and Persians seem to have varied between successful resistance, unwilling subjection, and friendly alliance. A body of Armenians formed a part of the army which Xerxes led against Greece; and they assisted Darius Codomannus against Alexander, and in this war they lost their king, and became subject to the Macedonian empire (B.C. 328). After another interval of successful revolt (B.C. 317–274), they submitted to the Greek kings of Syria; but when Antiochus the Great was defeated by the Romans (B.C. 190), the country again regained its independence, and it was at this period that it was divided into the two kingdoms of Armenia Major and Minor, under two different dynasties, founded respectively by the nobles who headed the revolt, Artaxias and Zariadras. Ultimately, Armenia Minor was made a Roman province by Trajan; and Armenia Major, after being a perpetual object of contention between the Romans and the Parthians, was subjected to the revived Persian empire by its first king, Artaxerxes (Ardeshir), in A.D. 226.

ARMENIUS MONS (τὸ Ἀρμένιον ὄρος), a branch of the Anti-Taurus chain in Armenia Minor.

ARMINIUS (the Latinized form of Hernann, “the chief-tain”), son of Sigimon, “the conqueror,” and chief of the tribe of the Cherusci, who inhabited the country to the north of the Hartz Mountains, now forming the south of Hanover and Brunswick. He was born in B.C. 18; and in his youth he led the warriors of his tribe as auxiliaries of the Roman legions in Germany, where he learned the language and military discipline of Rome, and was admitted to the freedom of the city, and enrolled among the equites. In A.D. 9, Arminius, who was now twenty-seven years old, and had succeeded his father as chief of his tribe, persuaded his countrymen to rise against the Romans, who were now masters of this part of Germany, and which seemed destined to become, like Gaul, a Roman province. His attempt was crowned with success. Quintilius Varus, who was stationed in the country with three legions, was destroyed with almost all his troops (vid. VARUS); and the Romans had to relinquish all their possessions beyond the Rhine. In 14, Arminius had to defend his country against Germanicus. At first he was successful; the Romans were defeated, and Germanicus withdrew toward the Rhine followed by Arminius. But having been compelled by his uncle, Inguomer, against his own wishes, to attack the Romans in their entrenched camp, his army was routed, and the Romans made good their retreat to the Rhine. It was in the course of this campaign that Thusnelda, the wife of Arminius, fell into the hands of the Romans, and was reserved, with the infant boy to whom she soon after gave birth in her captivity, to adorn the triumph of Germanicus at Rome. In 16, Arminius was again called upon to resist Germanicus, but he was defeated, and his country was probably only saved from subjection by the jealousy of Tiberius, who recalled Germanicus in the following year. At length Arminius aimed at absolute power, and was, in consequence, cut off by his own relations in the thirty-seventh year of his age, A.D. 19.

ARMORICA or AEMORICA, the name of the northwest coast of Gaul from the Ligeris (now Loire) to the Sequana (now Seine), derived from the Celtic ar, air, “upon,” and muir, mōr, “the sea.” The Armorica civitates are enumerated by Cæsar (B. G., vii., 75).

ARNA (Arnas, -ātis: now Civitella d'Arno), a town in Umbria, near Perugia.

ARNÆ (Ἀρναί), a town in Chalcidice in Macedonia, south of Aulon and Bromisæus.

[ARNÆUS (Ἀρναῖος), the proper name of the beggar Irus, mentioned in the Odyssey. Vid. IRUS.]

ARNE (Ἄρνη). 1. A town in Bœotia, mentioned by Homer (Il., ii., 507), supposed by Pausanias to be the same as Chæronœa, but placed by others near Aeraphium, on the east of the Lake Copais.—[2. A town of Magnesia in Thessaly, on the Malia Gulf, said to have derived its name from Arne, a daughter of Æolus.—3. A fountain in the territory of Mantinea in Areadia.]

[ARNE (Ἄρνη). 1. A daughter of Æolus. Vid. the foregoing, No. 2.—2. The betrayer of her native country to King Minos, and, on this account, changed into a jaekdaw.]

ARNISSA (Ἀρνίσσα: now Ostrova?) a town in Eordæa in Macedonia.

ARNOBIUS. 1. The elder, a native of Africa, lived about A.D. 300, in the reign of Diocletian. He was first a teacher of rhetoric at Sicca in Africa, but afterward embraced Christianity; and, to remove all doubts as to the reality of his conversion, he wrote, while yet a catechumen, his celebrated work against the Pagans, in seven books (Libri septem adversus Gentes), which we still possess. The best editions are by Orelli, Lips., 1816, [and by Hildebrand, Halle, 1844].—2. The Younger, lived about A.D. 460, and was probably a bishop or presbyter in Gaul. He wrote a commentary on the Psalms, still extant, which shows that he was a Semi-Pelagian.

ARNŌN ('Αρνών: now Wad-el Mojjib), a considerable river of East Palestine, rising in the Arabian Desert, and flowing west through a rocky valley into the Lacus Asphaltites (now Dead Sea). The surrounding district was called Arnonas; and in it the Romans had a military station, called Castra Arnonensis.

ARNUS (now Arno), the chief river of Etruria, rises in the Apennines, flows by Pisa, and falls into the Tyrrhenian Sea. It gave the name to the Tribus Arniensis, formed B.C. 387.

ΑΡΘΑ ('Αρθά or 'Αρόη), the ancient name of PATRE.

[ARCOANIUS ('Αροάνιος), a river of Arcadia, rises in Mount Cyllene, loses itself in some natural cavities near Pheneus, then reappears at the foot of Penteleion, and joins the Ladon. The same name was given to two other streams, one a tributary likewise of the Ladon, the other a tributary of the Erymanthus.]

ΑΡΩΜΑΤΑ (τὰ 'Αρώματα, 'Αρωμάτων ἄκρον: now Cape Guardafui), the easternmost promontory of Africa, at the southern extremity of the Arabian Gulf: the surrounding district was also called Aromata or Aromatophora Regio, with a town 'Αρωμάτων ἐμπορίον: so named from the abundance of spices which the district produced.

ΑΡΡΙ (Arpānus: now Arpi), an inland town in the Daunian Apulia, founded, according to tradition, by Diomedes, who called it 'Αργος Ἴριον, from which its later names of Argyrrippa or Argyrrippa and Arpi are said to have arisen (Ille (Diomedes) urbem Argyrippam, patriæ cognomine gentis, Virg., Æn., xi, 246). During the time of its independence it was a flourishing commercial town, using Salapia as its harbor. It was friendly to the Romans in the Samnite wars, but revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, B.C. 216: it was taken by the Romans in 213, deprived of its independence, and never recovered its former prosperity.

[ARPIA ('Αρπινα), an ancient place in Elis, near the Alphæus, so called from a daughter of the Asopus: near it flowed the River Arpinætes.]

ARPINUM (Arpīnas, -ātis: now Arpino), a town of Latium, on the small river Fibrenus (now Fibreno), originally belonging to the Volscians and afterward to the Samnites, from whom the Romans wrested it, was a Roman municipium, and received the jus suffragii, or right of voting in the Roman comitia, B.C. 188. It was the birth-place of Marius and Cicero; the latter of whom was born in his father's villa, situated on a small island formed by the River Fibrenus. Cicero's brother Quintus had an estate south of Arpinum, called Arcanum.

[ARRABO (in Ptolemy Ναπαβών, now Raab), a river in Pannonia, a tributary of the Danube. At its mouth lay the city and fortress Arrabo, now Raab.]

ARRĒTIUM or ARĒTIUM (Arretinus: now Arezzo), one of the most important of the twelve cities of Etruria, was situated in the northeast of the country at the foot of the Apennines, and possessed a fertile territory near the sources of the Arnus and the Tiber, producing good wine and corn. It was thrice colonized by the Romans, whence we read of Arretini Veteres, Fidenates, Julienses. It was particularly celebrated for its pottery, which was of red ware. The Cilni, from whom Mæcenas was descended, was a noble family of Arretium. The ruins of a city two or three miles to the southeast of Arezzo, on a height called Poggio di San Cornelio, or Castel Secco, are probably the remains of the ancient Arretium.

ARRHAPACHITIS ('Αρραπαχίτις), a district of Assyria, between the rivers Lyceus and Choatras.

ARRHIDÆUS ('Αρριδαίος), chieftain of the Macedonians of Lynceus, revolted against King Perdiccas in the Peloponnesian war. It was to reduce him that Perdiccas sent for Brasidas (B.C. 424), and against him took place the unsuccessful joint expedition, in which Perdiccas deserted Brasidas, and Brasidas effected his bold and skillful retreat.

ARRHIDÆUS ('Αρριδαίος) or ARIDÆUS ('Αριδαίος). 1. A half-brother of Alexander the Great, son of Philip and a female dancer, Philinna of Larissa, was of imbecile understanding. He was at Babylon at the time of Alexander's death, B.C. 323, and was elected king under the name of Philip. The young Alexander, the infant son of Roxana, was associated with him in the government. In 322 Arrhidæus married Eurydice. On their return to Macedonia, Eurydice attempted to obtain the supreme power in opposition to Polysperchon; but Arrhidæus and Eurydice were made prisoners, and put to death by order of Olympias, 317.—2. One of Alexander's generals, obtained the province of the Hellespontine Phrygia at the division of the provinces in 321 at Triparadusis, but was deprived of it by Antigonus in 319.

ARRIA. 1. Wife of Cæcina Pætus. When her husband was ordered by the Emperor Claudius to put an end to his life, A.D. 42, and hesitated to do so, Arria stabbed herself, handed the dagger to her husband, and said, "Pætus, it does not pain me."—2. Daughter of the preceding, and wife of Thrasea.

ARRIĀNUS ('Αρριανός). 1. Of Nicomedia in Bithynia, born about A.D. 90, was a pupil and friend of Epictetus, and first attracted attention as a philosopher by publishing at Athens the lectures of his master. In 124 he gained the friendship of Hadrian during his stay in Greece, and received from the emperor the Roman citizenship; from this time he assumed the name of Flavius. In 136 he was appointed præfect of Cappadocia, which was invaded the year after by the Alani or Massagetae, whom he defeated under Antoninus Pius, in 146, Arrian was son sul; and about 150 he withdrew from public life, and from this time lived in his native town of Nicomedia, as priest of Ceres (Demeter) and Proserpina (Persephone). He died at an advanced age in the reign of M. Aurelius. Arrian was one of the most active and best writers of his time. He was a close imitator of Xenophon, both in the subjects of his works and in the style in which they were written. He regarded his relation to Epictetus as similar to that of Xenophon to Socrates; and it was his endeavor to carry out that resemblance. With this view he published, 1. The philosophical lectures of his master (Διατριβαὶ Ἐπικτήτου), in eight books, the first half of which is still extant. Edited in Schweighäuser's Epictetæ Philosophiæ Monumenta, vol. iii, and in Corae's Πάρεργα Ἑλλην. Βιβλιοθ., vol. viii.—2. An abstract of the practical philosophy of Epictetus (Ἐγχειρίδιον Ἐπικτήτου), which is still extant. This celebrated work maintained its authority for many centuries, both with Christians and Pagans. The best editions are those of Schweighäuser and Corae, in the collections above referred to. He also published other works relating to Epictetus, which are now lost. His original works are: 3. A treatise on the chase (Κυνηγητικός), which forms a kind of supplement to Xenophon's work on the same subject, and is printed in most editions of Xenophon's works.—4. The History of the Asiatic expedition of Alexander the Great (Ἀνάβασις Ἀλεξάνδρου), in seven books, the most important of Arrian's works. This great work reminds the reader of Xenophon's Anabasis, not only by its title, but also by the ease and clearness of its style. It is also of great value for its historical accuracy, being based upon the most trustworthy histories written by the contemporaries of Alexander, especially those of Ptolemy, the son of Lagos, and of Aristobulus, the son of Aristobulus.—5. On India (Ἰνδική or τὰ Ἰνδικά), which may be regarded as a continuation of the Anabasis, at the end of which it is usually printed. This work is written in the Ionic dialect, probably in imitation of Ctesias of Cnidus, whose work on the same subject Arrian wished to supplant by a more trustworthy and correct account. The best editions of the Anabasis are by Ellendt, Regimoutii, 1832, and by C. W. Krüger, Berlin 1835-49, 2 vols.; of the Indica by Schmieder, Halle, 1798.—6. A description of a voyage round the coasts of the Euxine (περίπλους πόντου Ἐξείνου), which had undoubtedly been made by Arrian himself during his government of Cappadocia. This Periplus has come down to us, together with a Periplus of the Erythraean, and a Periplus of the Euxine and the Palus Mæotis, both of which also bear the name of Arrian, but they belong undoubtedly to a later period. The best editions are in Hudson's Geographi Minores, vol. i, and in Gail's and Hoffmann's collections of the minor Geographers.—7. A work on Tactics (λόγος τακτικός or τέχνη τακτική), of which we possess at present only a fragment: printed in Blancard's collection of the minor works of Arrian. Arrian also wrote numerous other works, all of which are now lost.—2. A Roman juriconsult, probably lived under Trajan, and is perhaps the same person with the orator Arrianus, who corresponded with the younger Pliny. He wrote a treatise De Interdictis, of which the second book is quoted in the Digest.

ARRIBAS, ARRYBAS, ARYMBAS, or THARRYTAS (Ἀρρίβας, Ἀρύβας, Ἀρύμβας, or Θαδύβας), a descendant of Achilles, and one of the early kings of the Molossians in Epirus. He is said to have been educated at Athens, and on his return to his native country, to have framed for the Molossians a code of laws, and established a regular constitution.

ARRIUS, Q. 1. Prætor B.C. 72, defeated Crixus, the leader of the runaway slaves, but was afterward conquered by Spartacus. In 71, Arrius was to have succeeded Verus as pro-prætor in Sicily, but died on his way to Sicily.—2. A son of the preceding, was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship B.C. 59. He was an intimate friend of Cicero.

ARRIUS APER. Vid. APER.

ARRUNTUS, L. 1. Proscribed by the triumvirs in B.C. 43, but escaped to Sextus Pompey in Sicily, and was restored to the state with Pompey. He subsequently commanded the left wing of the fleet of Octavianus at the battle of Actium, 31, and was consul in 22.—2. Son of the preceding, consul A.D. 6. Augustus declared in his last illness that Arruntius was not unworthy of the empire, and would have boldness enough to seize it, if an opportunity presented. This rendered him an object of suspicion to Tiberius. He was charged in A.D. 27 as an accomplice in the crimes of Albuëilla, and put an end to his own life.

ARSA (now Azunga), a town in Hispania Bætica.

ARSACES (Ἀρσάκης), the name of the founder of the Parthian empire, which was also borne by all his successors, who were hence called the Arsacidae.—1. He was of obscure origin, and seems to have come from the neighborhood of the Oebus. He induced the Parthians to revolt from the Syrian empire of the Seleucidae, and he became the first monarch of the Parthians. This event probably took place about B.C. 250, in the reign of Antiochus II.; but the history of the revolt, as well as of the events which immediately followed, is stated very differently by different historians. Arsaces reigned only two years, and was succeeded by his brother Tiridates.—2. TIRIDATES, reigned thirty-seven years, B.C. 248-211, and defeated Seleucus Callinicus, the successor of Antiochus II.—3. ARTABANUS I, son of the preceding, was attacked by Antiochus III. (the Great), who, however, was unable to subdue his country, and at length, recognized him as king about 210.—4. PRIAPATUS, son of the preceding, reigned fifteen years, and left three sons, Phraates, Mithradates, and Artabanus.—5. PHRAATES I, subdued the Mardi, and, though he had many sons, left the kingdom to his brother Mithradates.—6. MITHRADATES I, son of Arsaces IV., greatly enlarged the Parthian empire by his conquests. He defeated Demetrius Nicator, king of Syria, and took him prisoner in 138. Mithradates treated Demetrius with respect, and gave him his daughter Rhodogune in marriage. Mithradates died during the captivity of Demetrius, between 138 and 130.—7. PHRAATES II, son of the preceding, carried on war against Antiochus VII. Sidetes, whom Phraates defeated and slew in battle, B.C. 128. Phraates himself was shortly after killed in battle by the Scythians, who had been invited by Antiochus to assist him against Phraates, but who did not arrive till after the fall of the former.—8. ARTABĀNUS II, youngest brother of Arsaces VI, and youngest son of Arsaces IV, fell in battle against the Thogarii or Tochari, apparently after a short reign.—9. MITHRADĀTES II, son of the preceding, prosecuted many wars with success, and added many nations to the Parthian empire, whence he obtained the surname of Great. It was in his reign that the Romans first had any official communication with Parthia. Mithradates sent an ambassador to Sulla, who had come into Asia B.C. 92, and requested alliance with the Romans.—10. (MNASCIRES?) Nothing is known of the successor of Arsaces IX. Even his name is uncertain.—11. SANATROCES, reigned seven years, and died about B.C. 70.—12. PHRAĀTES III, son of the preceding. He lived at the time of the war between the Romans and Mithradates of Pontus, by both of whom he was courted. He contracted an alliance with the Romans, but he took no part in the war. At a later period misunderstandings arose between Pompey and Phraates, but Pompey thought it more prudent to avoid a war with the Parthians, although Phraates had invaded Armenia, and Tigranes, the Armenian king, implored Pompey's assistance. Phraates was murdered soon afterward by his two sons, Mithradates and Orodes.—MITHRADĀTES III, son of the preceding, succeeded his father during the Armenian war. On his return from Armenia, Mithradates was expelled from the throne on account of his cruelty, and was succeeded by his brother Orodes. Mithradates afterward made war upon his brother, but was taken prisoner and put to death.—14. Orodes I, brother of the preceding, was the Parthian king whose general Surenas defeated Crassus and the Romans, B.C. 53. Vid. CRASSUS. After the death of Crassus, Orodes gave the command of the army to his son Pacorus, who entered Syria in 51 with a small force, but was driven back by Crassius. In 50 Pacorus again crossed the Euphrates with a much larger army, and advanced as far as Antioch, but was defeated near Antigonēa by Cassius. The Parthians now remained quiet for some years. In 40 they crossed the Euphrates again, under the command of Pacorus and Labienus, the son of T. Labienus. They overran Syria and part of Asia Minor, but were defeated in 39 by Ventidius Bassus, one of Antony's legates: Labienus was [taken and put to death by Ventidius after the battle], and the Parthians retired to their own dominions. In 38, Pacorus again invaded Syria, but was completely defeated and fell in the battle. This defeat was a severe blow to the aged king Orodes, who shortly afterward surrendered the crown to his son Phraates during his life-time.—15. PHRAĀTES IV, commenced his reign by murdering his father, his thirty brothers, and his own son, who was grown up, that there might be none of the royal family whom the Parthians could place upon the throne in his stead. In consequence of his cruelty, many of the Parthian nobles fled to Antony (37), who invaded Parthia in 36, but was obliged to retreat after losing a great part of his army. A few years afterward the cruelties of Phraates produced a rebellion against him; he was driven out of the country, and Tiridates proclaimed king in his stead. Phraates, however, was soon restored by the Scythians, and Tiridates fled to Augustus, carrying with him the youngest son of Phraates. Augustus restored his son to Phraates on condition of his surrendering the Roman standards and prisoners taken in the war with Crassus and Antony. They were given up in 20; their restoration caused universal joy at Rome, and was celebrated not only by the poets, but by festivals and commemorative monuments. Phraates also sent to Augustus as hostages his four sons, with their wives and children, who were carried to Rome. In A.D. 2, Phraates was poisoned by his wife Thermusa and her son Phraataces.—16. PHRAATACES, reigned only a short time, as he was expelled by his subjects on account of his crimes. The Parthian nobles then elected as king Orodēs, who was of the family of the Arsacidae.—17. ORŌDES II, also reigned only a short time, as he was killed by the Parthians on account of his cruelty. Upon his death the Parthians applied to the Romans for Vonones, one of the sons of Phraates IV, who was accordingly granted to them.—18. VONŌNES I, son of Phraates IV, was also disliked by his subjects, who therefore invited Artabanus, King of Media, to take possession of the kingdom. Artabanus drove Vonones out of Parthia, who resided first in Armenia, next in Syria, and subsequently in Cilicia. He was put to death in A.D. 19, according to some accounts by order of Tiberius on account of his great wealth.—19. ARTABĀNUS III, obtained the Parthian kingdom soon after the expulsion of Vonones, about A.D. 16. Artabanus placed Arsaces, one of his sons, over Armenia, and assumed a hostile attitude toward the Romans. His subjects, whom he oppressed, dispatched an embassy to Tiberius to beg him to send Parthia Phraates, one of the sons of Phraates IV. Tiberius willingly complied with the request; but Phraates, upon arriving in Syria, was carried off by a disease, A.D. 35. As soon as Tiberius heard of his death, he set up Tiridates, another of the Arsacidae, as a claimant of the Parthian throne: Artabanus was obliged to leave his kingdom, and fly for refuge to the Hyreanians and Carmanians. Hercupon Vitellius, the governor of Syria, crossed the Euphrates, and placed Tiridates on the throne. Artabanus was, however, recalled next year (36) by his fickle subjects. He was once more expelled by his subjects, and once more restored. He died soon after his last restoration, leaving two sons, Bardanes and Gotarzes, whose civil wars are related differently by Josephus and Tacitus.—20. GOTARZES, succeeded his father, Artabanus III, but was defeated by his brother Bardanes and retired into Hyreania.—21. BARDANES, brother of the preceding, was put to death by his subjects in 47, whereupon Gotarzes again obtained the crown. But, as he ruled with cruelty, the Parthians secretly begged the Emperor Claudius to send them from Rome Meherdates, grandson of Phraates IV. Claudius complied with their request, and commanded the governor of Syria to assist Meherdates, but the latter was defeated in battle, and taken prisoner by Gotarzes.—22. VONŌNES II, succeeded Gotarzes about 50. His reign was short.—23. VOLOGĒSES I, son of Vonones II, or Artabanus

III. Soon after his accession he conquered Armenia, which he gave to his brother Tiridates. In 55 he gave up Armenia to the Romans, but in 58 he again placed his brother over Armenia, and declared war against the Romans. This war terminated in favor of the Romans: the Parthians were repeatedly defeated by Domitius Corbulo, and Tiridates was driven out of Armenia. At length, in 62, peace was concluded between Vologeses and the Romans on condition that Nero would surrender Armenia to Tiridates, provided the latter would come to Rome and receive it as a gift from the Roman emperor. Tiridates came to Rome in 63, where he was received with extraordinary splendor, and obtained from Nero the Armenian crown. Vologeses afterward maintained friendly relations with Vespasian, and seems to have lived till the reign of Domitian.—24. PACORUS, succeeded his father, Vologeses I, and was a contemporary of Domitian and Trajan.—25. CHOSROES or OSROES, succeeded his brother Pacorus during the reign of Trajan. His conquest of Armenia occasioned the invasion of Parthia by Trajan, who stripped it of many of its provinces, and made the Parthians for a time subject to Rome. Vid. TRAJANUS. Upon the death of Trajan in A.D. 117, the Parthians expelled Parthaspates, whom Trajan had placed upon the throne, and recalled their former king, Chosroes. Hadrian relinquished the conquests of Trajan, and made the Euphrates, as before, the eastern boundary of the Roman empire. Chosroes died during the reign of Hadrian.—26. VOLOGĒSES II, succeeded his father Chosroes, and reigned from about 122 to 149.—27. VOLOGĒSES III, began to reign in 149. He invaded Syria in 162, but the generals of the Emperor Verus drove him back into his own dominions, invaded Mesopotamia and Assyria, and took Seleucia and Ctesiphon; and Vologeses was obliged to purchase a peace by ceding Mesopotamia to the Romans. From this time to the downfall of the Parthian empire, there is great confusion in the list of kings.—28. VOLOGĒSES IV., probably ascended the throne in the reign of Commodus. His dominions were invaded by Septimus Severus, who took Ctesiphon in 199. On the death of Vologeses IV., at the beginning of the reign of Caracalla, Parthia was torn asunder by contests for the crown between the sons of Vologeses.—29. VOLOGĒSES V., son of Vologeses IV., was attacked by Caracalla in 215, and about the same time was dethroned by his brother Artabanus.—30. ARTABANUS IV., the last king of Parthia. The war commenced by Caracalla against Vologeses, was continued against Artabanus; but Maerinus, the successor of Caracalla, concluded peace with the Parthians. In this war Artabanus had lost the best of his troops, and the Persians seized the opportunity of recovering their long-lost independence. They were led by Artaxerxes (Ardeshir), the son of Sassan, and defeated the Parthians in three great battles, in the last of which Artabanus was taken prisoner and killed, A.D. 226. Thus ended the Parthian empire of the Arsacidae, after it had existed four hundred and seventy-six years. The Parthians were now obliged to submit to Artaxerxes, the founder of the dynasty of the Sassanidae, which continued to reign till A.D. 651.

ARSACĪA (Ἀρσακία: ruins southeast of Teheran), a great city of Media, south of the Caspian Portæ, originally named Rhagæ (Ῥαγαί); rebuilt by Seleucus Nicator, and called Europus (Εὐρωπός); again destroyed in the Parthian wars, and rebuilt by Arsaces, who named it after himself.

ARSACĪDÆ, the name of a dynasty of Parthian kings. Vid. ARSACES. It was also the name of a dynasty of Armenian kings, who reigned in Armenia from B.C. 149 to A.D. 428. This dynasty was founded by ARTAXIAS I, who was related to the Parthian Arsacidae.

[ARSAMENES (Ἀρσαμένης), son of Darius Hystaspis, a commander in the army of Xerxes.]

[ARSAMES (Ἀρσαμένης). 1. Father of Hystaspes, and grandfather of Darius.—2. Son of Darius, and Artystone, daughter of Cyrus, commanded the Arabians and Æthiopians, who lived above Egypt, in the army of Xerxes.—3. An illegitimate son of Artaxerxes Mnemon, murdered by his brother Artaxerxes Oehus.—4. A Persian Satrap of Lydia under Darius Codomannus: by not securing the Cilician passes, he afforded Alexander an opportunity of a ready passage into Upper Asia from Asia Minor.]

ARSAMŌSĪTĪ (Ἀρσαμώσατα, also wrongly abbreviated Ἀρμύσατα: now Shemshat), a town and strong fortress in Armenia Major, between the Euphrates and the sources of the Tigris, near the most frequented pass of the Taurus.

ARSANĪAS, -IUS, or -US (Ἀρσανίας, &c.), the name of two rivers of Great Armenia.—1. (Now Murad), the southern arm of the Euphrates. Vid. ARMENIA.—2. (Now Arslan Ī), a small stream rising near the sources of the Tigris, and flowing west into the Euphrates near Melitene.

ARSĒNĀRIA or -ENN- (Ἀρσηνᾶρια: now Arsaw, ruins), a town in Mauretania Cæsariensis, three miles (Roman) from the sea: a Roman colony.

ARSĒNE. Vid. ARZANENE.

ARSES, NARSES, or OARSES (Ἀρσης, Νάρσης, or Ὀάρσης), youngest son of King Artaxerxes III. Oehus, was raised to the Persian throne by the eunuch Bagoas after he had poisoned Artaxerxes B.C. 339, but he was murdered by Bagoas in the third year of his reign, when he attempted to free himself from the bondage in which he was kept. After the death of Arses, Bagoas made Darius III. king.

ARSĪA (now Arsa), a river in Istria, forming the boundary between Upper Italy and Illyrium, with a town of the same name upon it.

ARSĪA SILVA, a wood in Etruria, celebrated for the battle between the Tarquins and the Romans.

ARSĪNŌE (Ἀρσηνὴ). I. Mythological. 1. The daughter of Phœgeus, and wife of Alemæon. As she disapproved of the murder of Alemæon, the sons of Phœgeus put her into a chest and carried her to Agapenor at Tegea, where they accused her of having killed Alemæon. Vid. ALCMÆON, AGENOR.—2. Nurse of Orestes, saved the latter from the hands of Clytemnestra, and carried him to Strophius, father of Pylades. Some accounts call her Laodamia.—3. Daughter of Leuceippus and Philodice, became by Apollo mother of Eriopis and Æsculapius. II. Historical. 1. Mother of Ptolemy I, was a concubine of Philip, father of Alexander the Great, and married Lagos while she was pregnant with Ptolemy.—2. Daughter of Ptolemy I. and Berenice, married Lysimachus, king of Thrace, in B.C. 300; after the death of Lysimachus in 281, she married her half-brother, Ptolemy Ceraneus, who murdered her children by Lysimachus; and, lastly, in 279, she married her own brother Ptolemy II. Philadelphus. Though Arsinoë bore Ptolemy no children, she was exceedingly beloved by him: he gave her name to several cities, called a district (νομός) of Egypt Arsinoites after her, and honored her memory in various ways.—3. Daughter of Lysimachus, married Ptolemy II. Philadelphus soon after his accession, B.C. 285. In consequence of her plotting against her namesake [No. 2.], when Ptolemy fell in love with her, she was banished to Coptos, in Upper Egypt. She had by Ptolemy three children, Ptolemy III. Evergetes, Lysimachus, and Berenice.—4. Also called Eurydice and Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy III. Evergetes, wife of her brother Ptolemy IV. Philopator, and mother of Ptolemy V. Epiphanes. She was killed by Philammon by order of her husband.—5. Daughter of Ptolemy XI. Auletes, escaped from Cæsar when he was besieging Alexandria in B.C. 47, and was recognized as queen by the Alexandrians. After the capture of Alexandria she was carried to Rome by Cæsar, and led in triumph by him in 46. She was afterward dismissed by Cæsar, and returned to Alexandria; but her sister Cleopatra persuaded Antony to have her put to death in 41.

ARSINŌË (Ἀρσινόη: Ἀρσινόεις or -οῦνης), the name of several cities of the times of the successors of Alexander, each called after one or other of the persons of the same name (see above).—1. In Ætolia, formerly Κωνόπα.—2. On the northern coast of Cyprus, on the site of the older city of Marium (Μάριον), which Ptolemy I. had destroyed.—3. A port on the western coast of Cyprus.—4. (Now Famagosta), on the southeastern coast of Cyprus, between Salamis and Leucolla.—5. In Cilicia, east of Anemurium.—6. (Now Ajeroud or Suez), in the Nomos Herodopolites in Lower Egypt, near or upon the head of the Siuus Herodopolites or western branch of the Red Sea (now Gulf of Suez). It was afterward called Cleopatris.—7. (Now Médinet-el-Faioum, ruins), the chief city of the Nomos Arsinoites in the Heptanomis or Middle Egypt (vid. EGYPTUS, p. 18, b); formerly called Crocodilopolis (Κροκοδείλων πόλις), and the district Nomos Crocodilopolites, from its being the chief seat of the Egyptian worship of the crocodile. This nomos also contained the Lake Meiris and the Labyrinth.—8. In Cyrenica, also called Taucheira.—9. On the coast of the Troglodytæ on the Red Sea, east of Egypt. Its probable position is a little below the parallel of Thebes. Some other cities called Arsinoë are better known by other names, such as Ephesus in Ionia and Patara in Lycia.

[ARSINŌUS (Ἀρσίνους), father of Hecamede; ruler of Tenédois.]

[ARSITES (Ἀρσίτης), satrap of the Hellenopontine Phrygia when Alexander the Great invaded Asia: after the defeat of the Persians at the Granicus he put himself to death.]

ARSISSA OR MANTIĀNA (Ἀρσίσα, ἡ Μαντιανή: now Van), a great lake abounding in fish, in the south of Armenia Major. Vid. ARMENIA.

ARTABĀNUS (Ἀρτάβανος). 1. Son of Hystaspes and brother of Darius, is frequently mentioned in the reign of his nephew Xerxes as a wise and frank counsellor.—2. An Hyrcanian, commander of the body-guard of Xerxes, assassinating this king in B.C. 465, with the view of setting himself upon the throne of Persia, but was shortly afterward killed by Artaxerxes—3. I, II, III, IV., kings of Parthia. Vid. ARSACES III, VIII, XIX., XXX.

[ARTABAZANES (Ἀρταβάζνης), oldest son of Darius Hystaspis, half-brother of Xerxes, and called, also, Ariabignes. Vid. ARIABIGNES]

ARTABĀZUS (Ἀρτάβαζος). 1. A Mede, acts a prominent part in Xenophon's account of Cyrus the Elder.—2. A distinguished Persian, a son of Pharnaces, commanded the Parthians and Choansians in the expedition of Xerxes into Greece, B.C. 480. He served under Mardonius in 479, and after the defeat of the Persians at Platææ, he fled with forty thousand men, and reached Asia in safety.—3. A general of Artaxerxes I., fought against Inarus in Egypt, B.C. 462.—4. A Persian general, fought under Artaxerxes II. against Datames, satrap of Cappadocia, B.C. 362. Under Artaxerxes III., Artabazus, who was then satrap of Western Asia revolted in B.C. 356, but was defeated and obliged to take refuge with Philip of Macedonia. He was afterward pardoned by Artaxerxes, and returned to Persia; and he was one of the most faithful adherents of Darius III. Codomannus, who raised him to high honors. On the death of Darius (330) Artabazus received from Alexander the satrapy of Bactria. One of his daughters, Barsine, became by Alexander the mother of Hercules; a second, Artocama, married Ptolemy, son of Lagos; and a third, Artontis, married Eumenes.

ARTABRĪ, afterward AROTREBÆ, a Celtic people in the northwest of Spain, near the Promontory Nerium or Celticum, also called Artabrum after them (now Cape Finisterre).

ARTACE (Ἀρτάκη: now Artaki), a sea-port town of the peninsula of Cyzicus, in the Propontis: also a mountain in the same peninsula.

ARTACHÆES (Ἀρταχαιῆς), a distinguished Persian in the army of Xerxes, died while Xerxes was at Athos. The mound which the king raised over him is still in existence.

[ARTACIE (Ἀρτακίη), a fountain in the country of the mythic Læstrygones.]

ARTACŪĀNĀ (Ἀρτακῶνα or -κάννα: now Sekhvan?), the ancient capital of ARIA, not far from the site of the later capital, ALEXANDREA.

ARTEI (Ἀρταῖοι), was, according to Herodotus (vi., 61), the old native name of the Persians. It signifies noble, and appears in the form Arta, as the first part of a large number of Persian proper names. Compare ARII.

[ARTAGĒRA or ARTAGĒRÆ (Ἀρταγήραι), a mountain fortress in southern Armenia, on the Euphrates.]

[ARTAGERSES (Ἀρταγέρσης), a commander in the army of Artaxerxes.]

[ARTĀNES (Ἀρτάνης), son of Hystaspes and brother of Darius, fought and fell at the battle of Thermopylæ.]

ARTANES (Ἀρτάνης). 1. A river in Thrace, falling into the Ister.—2. A river in Bithyia.

[ARTAOZES (Ἀρταόζης), a friend and supporter of the younger Cyrus.]

ARTAPHERNES (Ἀρταφέρνης). 1. Son of Hystaspes and brother of Darius. He was satrap of Sardis at the time of the Ionian revolt, B.C. 500. Vid. ARISTAGORAS.—2. Son of the former, commanded, along with Datis, the Persian army of Greece by Xerxes in 480.—[3. A Persian, sent by Artaxerxes I. to Sparta with a letter, arrested on his way by Aristides and taken to Athens, where his letter was translated: the Athenians endeavored to turn this to their advantage, and sent Artaphernes in a galley, with their ambassadors, to Ephesus.]

ARTANUM (now Salburg, near Homburg?), a Roman fortress in Germany on Mount Taunus, built by Drusus and restored by Germanicus.

ARTAVASDES (Ἀρταβάσιδος or Ἀρταβάσις) or ARTABAZES (Ἀρταβάσις). 1. King of the Great Armenia, succeeded his father Tigranes. In the expedition of Crassus against the Parthians, B.C. 54, Artavasdes was an ally of the Romans; but after the defeat of the latter, he concluded a peace with the Parthian king. In 36 he joined Antony in his campaign against the Parthians, and persuaded him to invade Media, because he was at enmity with his namesake Artavasdes, king of Media; but he treacherously deserted Antony in the middle of the campaign. Antony accordingly invaded Armenia in 34, contrived to entice Artavasdes into his camp, where he was immediately seized, carried him to Alexandria and led him in triumph. He remained in captivity till 30, when Cleopatra had him killed after the battle of Actium, and sent his head to his old enemy, Artavasdes of Media, in hopes of obtaining assistance from the latter. This Artavasdes was well acquainted with Greek literature, and wrote tragedies, speeches, and historical works.—2. King of Armenia, probably a grandson of No. 1, was placed upon the throne by Augustus, but was deposed by the Armenians.—3. King of Media Atropatene, and an enemy of Artavasdes I., king of Armenia. Antony invaded his country in 36, at the instigation of the Armenian king, but he was obliged to retire with great loss. Artavasdes afterward concluded a peace with Antony, and gave his daughter Iotape in marriage to Alexander, the son of Antony. Artavasdes was subsequently engaged in wars with the Parthians and Armenians. He died shortly before 20 B.C.

ARTAXĀTA or -Æ (τὰ Ἀρτάξαρα or -ξίαρα: ruins at Ardachat, above Nakshivan), the later capital of Great Armenia, built by ARTAXIAS, under the advice of Hannibal, on a peninsula, surrounded by the River Araxes. After being burned by the Romans under Corbulo (A.D. 58), it was restored by Tridates, and called Neronia (Νερόνεια). It was still standing in the fourth century.

ARTAXERXES or ARTOXERXES (Ἀρταξέρξης or Ἀροξέρξης), the name of four Persian kings, is compounded of Arta, which means "honored," and Xerxes, which is the same as the Zend ksathra, "a king:" consequently Artaxerxes means "the honored king." 1. Surnamed LONGIMANUS, from the circumstance of his right hand being longer than his left, reigned B.C. 465—425. He ascended the throne after his father, Xerxes I., had been murdered by Artabanus, and after he himself had put to death his brother Darius at the instigation of Artabanus. His reign was disturbed by several dangerous insurrections of the satraps. The Egyptians also revolted in 460, under Inarus, who was supported by the Athenians. The first army which Artaxerxes sent under his brother Achæmenes was defeated and Achæmenes slain. The second army which he sent, under Artabazus and Megabyzus, was more successful. Inarus was defeated in 456 or 455, but Amyrtæus, another chief of the insurgents, maintained himself in the marshes of Lower Egypt. At a later period (449) the Athenians under Cimon sent assistance to Amyrtæus; and even after the death of Cimon, the Athenians gained two victories over the Persians, one by land and the other by sea, in the neighborhood of Salamis in Cyprus. After this defeat Artaxerxes is said to have concluded peace with the Greeks on terms very advantageous to the latter. Artaxerxes was succeeded by his son Xerxes II.—2. Surnamed MNEMON, from his good memory, succeeded his father, Darius II., and reigned B.C. 405—359. Cyrus, the younger brother of Artaxerxes, who was satrap of Western Asia, revolted against his brother, and, supported by Greek mercenaries, invaded Upper Asia. In the neighborhood of Cunaxa, near Babylon, a battle was fought between the armies of the two brothers, in which Cyrus fell, B.C. 401. Vid. CYRUS. Tissaphernes was appointed satrap of Western Asia in the place of Cyrus, and was actively engaged in wars with the Greeks. Vid. TIMBRON, DERCYLLIDAS, AGESILAUS. Notwithstanding these perpetual conflicts with the Greeks, the Persian empire maintained itself by the disunion among the Greeks themselves, which was fomented and kept up by Persian money. The peace of Antalcidas, in B.C. 388, gave the Persians even greater power and influence than they had possessed before. Vid. ANTALCIDAS. But the empire was suffering from internal disturbances, and Artaxerxes had to carry on frequent wars with tributary princes and satraps, who endeavored to make themselves independent. Thus he maintained a long struggle against Evagoras of Cyprus, from 385 to 376; he also had to carry on war against the Cardusians, on the shores of the Caspian Sea; and his attempts to recover Egypt were unsuccessful. Toward the end of his reign he put to death his eldest son Darius, who had formed a plot to assassinate him. His last days were still further embittered by the unnatural conduct of his son Ochus, who caused the destruction of two of his brothers, in order to secure the succession for himself. Artaxerxes was succeeded by Ochus, who ascended the throne under the name of Artaxerxes III.—3. Also called OCHUS, reigned B.C. 359—338. In order to secure his throne, he began his reign with a merciless extirpation of the members of his family. He himself was a cowardly and reckless despot; and the great advantages which the Persians arms gained during his reign were owing only to his Greek generals and mercenaries. These advantages consisted in the conquest of the revolted satrap Artabazus (vid. ARTABAZUS, No. 4), and in the reduction of Phœnicia, of several revolted towns in Cyprus, and of Egypt, 350. The reins of government were entirely in the hands of the eunuch Bagoas and of Mentor the Rhodian. At last he was poisoned by Bagoas, and was succeeded by his youngest son, ARSES.—4. The founder of the dynasty of the SASSANIDÆ.

ARTAXIAS (Ἀρταξίας) or ARTAXES (Ἀρτάξης), the name of three kings of Armenia. 1. The founder of the Armeian kingdom, was one of the generals of Antiochus the Great, but revolted from him about B.C. 188, and became an independent sovereign. Hannibal took refuge at the court of Artaxias, and he superintended the building of ARTAXATA, the capital of Armenia. Artaxias was conquered and taken prisoner by Antiochus IV. Epiphanes about 165.—2. Son of Artavasdes, was made king by the Armenians when his father was taken prisoner by Antony in 34. In 20, Augustus, at the request of the Armenians, sent Tiberius into Armenia in order to depose Artaxias and place Tigranes on the throne, but Artaxias was put to death before Tiberius reached the country. Tiberius, however, took the credit to himself of a successful expedition, whence Horace (Epist., i. 12, 26) says, Claudi virtute Neroñis Armenius cecidit.—3. Son of Polemon, king of Pontus, was proclaimed king of Armenia by Germanicus in A.D. 18. He died about 35.

ARTAYCTES (Ἀρταύκτης), Persian governor of Sestus on the Hellespont, when the town was taken by the Greeks in B.C. 478, met with an ignominious death on account of the sacrilegious acts which he had committed against the tomb of the hero Protesilaus.

[ARTAYNTE (Ἀρταύντη), a daughter of Masistes, the brother of Xerxes I., who gave her in marriage to his son Darius, while he himself was secretly in love with her; this, becoming known to Amastris, brought down her vengeance on the mother of Artaynte, whom she suspected of having been the cause of the king's passion.]

[ARTAYNTES (Ἀρταύντης), one of the generals in the army of Xerxes; after the battle of Salamis, he, with several other generals, sailed to Samos to watch the Ionians; but, after the defeat of the Persians at Plataeæ and Mycale, he abandoned his post and returned to Persia.]

ARTĒMĪDŌRUS (Ἀρτεμίδωρος). 1. Surnamed ARISTOPHANUS, from his being a disciple of the celebrated grammarian Aristophanes, was himself a grammarian, and the author of several works now lost.—2. Of CNIDUS, a friend of Julius Cæsar, was a rhetorician, and taught the Greek language at Rome.—3. DALDIANUS, a native of Ephesus, but called Daldianus, from Daldis in Lydia, his mother's birth-place, to distinguish him from the geographer Artemidorus. He lived at Rome in the reigns of Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius (A.D. 138–180), and wrote a work on the interpretation of dreams (Ὀνειροκριτικά), in five books, which is still extant. The object of the work is to prove that the future is revealed to man in dreams, and to clear the science of interpreting them from the abuses with which the fashion of the time had surrounded it. The style is simple, correct, and elegant. The best edition is by Reiff, Lips., 1805.—4. Of EPHEBUS, a Greek geographer, lived about B.C. 100. He made voyages round the coasts of the Mediterranean, in the Red Sea, and apparently even in the Southern Ocean. He also visited Iberia and Gaul. The work, in which he gave the results of his investigations, consisted of eleven books, of which Marcianus afterward made an abridgment. The original work is lost; but we possess fragments of Marcianus' abridgment, which contain the periplus of the Pontus Euxinus, and accounts of Bithynia and Paphlagonia. These fragments are printed in Hudson's Geographi Minores, vol. i.

ARTĒMIS (Ἄρτεμις), the Latin Diana, one of the great divinities of the Greeks. According to the most ancient account, she was the daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Leto (Latona), and the twin-sister of Apollo, born with him in the island of Delos. She was regarded in various points of view by the Greeks, which must be carefully distinguished. 1. Artemis (Diana), as the sister of Apollo, is a kind of female Apollo, that is, she as a female divinity represented the same idea that Apollo did as a male divinity. As sister of Apollo, Artemis (Diana) is, like her brother, armed with a bow, quiver, and arrows, and sends plagues and death among men and animals. Sudden deaths, but more especially those of women, are described as the effect of her arrows. As Apollo was not only a destructive god, but also averted evils, so Artemis (Diana) likewise cured and alleviated the sufferings of mortals. In the Trojan war she sided, like Apollo, with the Trojans. She was more especially the protectress of the young; and from her watching over the young of females, she came to be regarded as the goddess of the flocks and the chase. In this manner she also became the huntress among the immortals. Artemis (Diana), like Apollo, is unmarried; she is a maiden divinity never conquered by love. She slew ORION with her arrows, according to one account, because he made an attempt upon her chastity; and she changed ACTÆON into a stag simply because he had seen her bathing. With her brother Apollo, she slew the children of NIÖBE, who had deemed herself superior to Leto (Latona). When Apollo was regarded as identical with the suu or Helios, nothing was more natural than that his sister should be regarded as Selene or the moon, and accordingly the Greek Artemis is, at least in later times, the goddess of the moon. Hence Artemis (Diana) is represented in love with the fair youth ENDYMION, whom she kissed in his sleep, but this legend properly relates to Selene or the Moon, and is foreign to the character of Artemis (Diana), who, as we have observed, was a goddess unmoved by love.—2. The Arcadian Artemis is a goddess of the nymphs, and was worshipped as such in Arcadia in very early times. She hunted with her nymphs on the Arcadian Mountains, and her chariot was drawn by four stags with golden antlers. There was no connection between the Arcadian Artemis and Apollo—3. The Taurian Artemis. The worship of this goddess was connected, at least in early times, with human sacrifices. According to the Greek legend there was in Taurus a goddess, whom the Greeks for some reason identified with their own Artemis (Diana), and to whom all strangers thrown on the coast of Tauris were sacrificed. Iphigenia and Orestes brought her image from thence, and landed at Brauron in Attica, whence the goddess derived the name of Brauronia. The Brauronian Artemis was worshipped at Athens and Sparta, and in the latter place the boys were scourged at her altar till it was besprinkled with their blood. This cruel ceremony was believed to have been introduced by Lycurgus, instead of the human sacrifices which had until then been offered to her. Iphigenia, who was at first to have been sacrificed to Artemis (Diana), and who then became her priestess, was afterward identified with the goddess, who was worshipped in some parts of Greece, as at Hermione, under the name of Iphigenia. Some traditions stated that Artemis made Iphigenia immortal, in the character of Hecate, the goddess of the moon.—4. The Ephesian Artemis (Diana) was a divinity totally distinct from the Greek goddess of the same name. She seems to have been the personification of the fructifying and all-nourishing powers of nature. She was an ancient Asiatic divinity, whose worship the Greeks found established in Ionia when they settled there, and to whom they gave the name of Artemis. Her original character is sufficiently clear from the fact that her priests were eunuchs, and that her image in the magnificent temple of Ephesus represented her with many breasts (πολυμαστός). The representations of the Greek Artemis in works of art are different, according as she is represented either as a huntress or as the goddess of the moon. As the huntress, she is tall, nimble, and has small hips; her forehead is high, her eyes glancing freely about, and her hair tied up, with a few locks floating down her neck; her breast is covered, and the legs up to the knees are naked, the rest being covered by the chlamys. Her attributes are the bow, quiver, and arrows, or a spear, stags, and dogs. As the goddess of the moon, she wears a long robe which reaches down to her feet, a veil covers her head, and above her forehead rises the crescent of the moon. In her hand she often appears holding a torch. The Romans identified their goddess Diana with the Greek Artemis.

ARTEMISIA (Ἀρτεμισία). 1. Daughter of Lygdamis, and queen of Halicarnassus in Caria, accompanied Xerxes, in his invasion of Greece, with five ships, and in the battle of Salamis (B.C. 480) greatly distinguished herself by her prudence and courage, for which she was afterward highly honored by the Persian king.—2. Daughter of Hecatomnus, and sister, wife, and successor of the Carian prince Mausolus, reigned B.C. 352–350. She is renowned in history for her extraordinary grief at the death of her husband Mausolus. She is said to have mixed his ashes in her daily drink; and to perpetuate his memory, she built at Halicarnassus the celebrated monument, Mausoleum, which was regarded as one of the seven wonders of the world, and the name of which subsequently became the generic term for any splendid sepulchral monument.

ARTEMISIUM (Ἀρτεμισιον), properly a temple of Artemis. 1. A tract of country on the northern coast of Eubœa, opposite Magnesia, so called from the temple of Artemis (Diana) belonging to the town of Hestica: off this coast the Greeks defeated the fleet of Xerxes, B.C. 480.—2. A promontory of Caria, near the Gulf Glaucus, so called from the temple of Artemis it its neighborhood.

ARTĒMITA (Ἀρτεμίτα). 1. (Now Shereban?), a city on the Sillas, in the district of Apolloniatis in Assyria.—2. A city of Great Armenia, south of the Lake Arsissa.

ARTĒMŌN (Ἀρτέμων), a Lacedæmonian, built the military engines for Pericles in his war against Samos in B.C. 441. There were also several writers of this name, whose works are lost.

[ARTĪMAS (Ἀρτίμας), a Persian satrap, mentioned in the Anabasis.]

[ARTISCUS (Ἀρτισκος: now Bujuk-Dere), a river of Thrace, a tributary of the Hebrus.]

[ARTONTES (Ἀρτόντης), son of Mardonius.]
ARTŌRIUS, M., a physician at Rome, was the friend and physician of Augustus, whom he attended in his campaign against Brutus and Cassius, B.C. 42. He was drowned at sea shortly after the battle of Actium, 31.

ARVERNI, a Gallic people in Aquitania, in the country of the Mons Cebenna, in the modern Auvergne. In early times they were the most powerful people in the south of Gaul: they were defeated by Domitius Ahenobarbus and Fabius Maximus in B.C. 121, but still possessed considerable power in the time of Cæsar (58). Their capital was Nemossus, also named Augustonemetum or Arverni on the Elâver (now Allier), with a citadel, called at least in the Middle Ages Clarus Mons, whence the name of the modern town, Clermont.

ARVINA, a cognomen of the Cornelia gens, borne by several of the Corneli, of whom the most important was A. Cornelius Cossus Arvina, consul B.C. 343 and 322, and dictator 320. He commanded the Roman armies against the Samnites, whom he defeated in several battles.

ARUNS, an Etruscan word, was regarded by the Romans as a proper name, but perhaps signified a younger son in general. 1. Younger brother of Lucumo, i. e., L. Tarquinius Priscus.—2. Younger brother of L. Tarquinius Superbus, was murdered by his wife.—3. Younger son of Tarquinius Superbus, fell in combat with Brutus.—4. Son of Porsena, fell in battle before Aricia.—5. Of Clusium, invited the Gauls across the Alps.

ARUNTĪUS. Vid. ARRUNTUS.

ARUSĪANUS, MESSUS or MESSĪUS, a Roman grammarian, lived about A.D. 450, and wrote a Latin phrase book, entitled Quadriga, vel Exempla Elocutionum ex Virgilio, Sallustio, Terentio, et Cicerone per literas digesta. It is called Quadriga from its being composed from four authors. The best edition is by Lindemann, in his Corpus Grammaticorum Latinæ, vol. i, p. 199.

ARXĀTA (Ἀρξάτα: now Nakhshivan), the capital of Great Armenia, before the building of Artaxata, lay lower down upon the Araxes, on the confines of Media.

ARYANDES (Ἀρῳάνδης), a Persian, who was appointed by Cambyses governor of Egypt, but was put to death by Darius, because he coined silver money of the purest metal, in imitation of the gold money of that monarch.

[ARYBAS OF ARYMBAS. Vir. ARRIBAS.]

ARYCANDA ('Αρύκανδα), a small town of Lycia, east of Xanthus, on the River Arycandus, a tributary of the Limyrus.

ARZĀNĒNE ('Αρζαννή), a district of Armenia Major, bounded on the south by the Tigris, on the west by the Nymphius, and containing in it the Lake Arsēne ('Αρσηνή: now Erzen). It formed part of GORDYENE.

[ARZĒN OR -ĒS, OF ATRANUTZIN ('Αρζήν, 'Αρζές, 'Ατρίνουρζιν: now Erzeroum), a strong fortress in Great Armenia, near the sources of the Euphrates and the Araxes, founded in the fifth century.

ΑΣΞΙ ('Ασαιί), a people of Sarmatia Asiatica, near the mouth of the Tanais (now Don).

ASANDER ('Ασανδρος). 1. Son of Philotas, brother of Parmenion, and one of the generals of Alexander the Great. After the death of Alexander in 323, he obtained Caria for his satrapy, and took an active part in the wars which followed. He joined Ptolemy and Cassander in their league against Antigonus, but was defeated by Antigonus in 313.—2. A general of Pharnaces II, king of Bosphorus. He put Pharnaces to death in 47, after the defeat of the latter by Julius Cæsar, in hopes of obtaining the kingdom. But Cæsar conferred the kingdom upon Mithradates of Pergamus, with whom Asander carried on war. Augustus afterward confirmed Asander in the sovereignty. [He died of voluntary starvation in his ninety-third year.]

[ASBŪLUS ('Ασβόλος), a centaur, famed for his skill in prophesying from the flight of birds; fought against the Lapithæ at the nuptials of Pirithous. He was crucified by Hercules.]

ASBYSTÆ ('Ασβύσται), a Libyan people, in the north of Cyrenaica. Their country was called 'Ασβυστίς.

ASCA ('Ασκα), a city of Arabia Felix.

ASCALĀBUS, son of Misme, respecting whom the same story is told which we also find related of ABAS, son of Metanira. Vir. ABAS, No. 1.

ASCALĀPHUS ('Ασκάλαφος). 1. Son of Mars (Ares) and Astyoche, led, with his brother Ialmenus, the Minyans of Orchomenos against Troy, and was slain by Deiphobus.—2. Son of Acheron and Gorgyra or Orphne. When Proserpina (Persephone) was in the lower world, and Pluto gave her permission to return to the upper, providing she had not eaten any thing, Ascalaphus declared that she had eaten part of a pomegranate. Ceres (Demeter) punished him by burying him under a huge stone, and when this stone was subsequently removed by Hercules, Proserpina (Persephone) changed him into an owl ('ασκάλαφος), by sprinkling him with water from the River Phlegethon.

ASCALŌN ('Ασκαλών: 'Ασκαλωνείτης: now Askaldn), one of the chief cities of the Philistines, on the coast of Palestine, between Azotus and Gaza.

ASCĀNĪA (ἡ 'Ασκανία λίμνη). 1. (Now Lake of Isnik), i. e. Bithynia, a great fresh-water lake, at the east end of which stood the city of Nicæa (now Isnik). The surrounding district was also called Ascania.—2. (Now Lake of Burdur), a salt-water lake on the borders of Phrygia and Pisidia, which supplied the neighboring country with salt.

ASCĀNĪUS ('Ασκανίος). [1. An ally of the Trojans from the Phrygian Ascania.—2. Son of Hippotion, also an ally of the Trojans.]—3. Son of Æneas by Creusa. According to some traditions, Ascanius remained in Asia after the fall of Troy, and reigned either at Troy itself or at some other town in the neighborhood. According to other accounts, he accompanied his father to Italy. Other traditions, again, gave the name of Ascanius to the son of Æneas and Lavinia. Livy states that on the death of his father Ascanius was too young to undertake the government, and that, after he had attained the age of manhood, he left Lavinium in the hands of his mother, and migrated to Alba Longa. Here he was succeeded by his son Silvius. Some writers relate that Ascanius was also called Iulus or Iulus. The gens Julia at Rome traced its origin from Iulus or Ascanius.

ASCĪBURGIUM (now Asburg, near Mörs), an ancient place on the left bank of the Rhine, founded, according to fable, by Ulysses.

ASCĪI ('ασκίοι, i. e. shadowless), a term applied to the people living about the equator, between the tropics, who have, at certain times of the year, the sun in their zenith at noon, when, consequently, erect objects can cast no shadow.

ASCLEPIĀDÆ, the reputed descendants of Asclepius (Æsculapius). Vir. ÆSCULAPIUS.

ASCLEPIĀDES ('Ασκληπιάδης). 1. A lyric poet, who is said to have invented the metre called after him (Metrum Asclepiadæum), but of whose life no particulars are recorded.—2. Of Tragilus in Thrace, a contemporary and disciple of Isocrates, about B.C. 360, wrote a work called Τραγωδούμενα in six books, being an explanation of the subjects of the Greek tragedies [The fragments of this work are published in Muller's Fragm. Hist. Græc., vol. iii, p. 301-6.—3. Of Samos, a bucolic poet, who flourished just before the time of Theocritus, as he is mentioned as his teacher: several epigrams in the Anthology are ascribed to him.]—4. Of Myrlæa in Bithynia, in the middle of the first century B.C., wrote several grammatical works; [and a history of Bithynia, in ten books: a few fragments of this last work are collected in Müller's Fragm. Hist. Græc., vol. iii, p. 300-1.]—5. There were a great many physicians of this name, the most celebrated of whom was a native of Bithynia, who came to Rome in the middle of the first century B.C., where he acquired a great reputation by his successful cures. Nothing remains of his writings but a few fragments published by Gumpert, Asclepiadis Bithynæ Fragmenta, Vinar., 1794.

ASCLEPIODŌRUS ('Ασκληπιόδωρος). 1. A general of Alexander the Great, afterward made satrap of Persia by Antigonus, B.C. 317.—2. A celebrated Athenian painter, a contemporary of Apelles.

ASCĒPIŪS. Vir. ÆSCULAPIUS.

ASCŌNIUS PEDIĀNUS, Q., a Roman grammarian, born at Patavium (now Padua), about B.C. 2, lost his sight in his seventy-third year, in the reign of Vespasian, and died in his eighty-fifth year, in the reign of Domitian. His most important work was a Commentary on the speeches of Cicero, and we still possess fragments of his Commentaries on the Divinatio, the first two speeches against Verres, and a portion of the third, the speeches for Cornelius (i., ii.), the speech In toga candida, for Scaurus, against Piso, and for Milo. They are written in very pure language, and refer chiefly to points of history and antiquities, great pains being bestowed on the illustration of those constitutional forms of the senate, the popular assemblies, and the courts of justice, which were fast falling into oblivion under the empire. This character, however, does not apply to the notes on the Verrine orations, which were probably written by a later grammarian. Edited in the fifth volume of Cicero's works by Orelli and Baier. There is a valuable essay on Asconius by Madvig, Hafniae, 1828.

ASCORDUS, a river in Macedonia, which rises in Mount Olympus, and flows between Agassa and Dium into the Thermaic Gulf.

ASCRA (Ἄσκρα : Ἄσκραϊός), a town in Bœotia, on Mount Helicon, where Hesiod resided, who had removed thither with his father from Cyme in Æolis, and who is therefore called Ascraeus.

ASCOLLUM. 1. PICENUM (Asculanus: now Ascoli), the chief town of Picenum and a Roman municipium, was destroyed by the Romans in the Social War (B.C. 89), but was afterward rebuilt.—2. AFÛLUM (Asculinus: now Ascoli di Satriano), a town of Apulia, in Daunia, on the confines of Samnium, near which the Romans were defeated by Pyrrhus, B.C. 279.

ASCURIS (now Ezero), a lake in Mount Olympus in Perrhæbia in Thessaly, near Lapathus.

ASDRÛBAL. Vid. HASDRÛBAL.

ASËA (ἡ Ἀσεία), a town in Arcadia, not far from Megalopolis.

ASELLIO. P. SEMPRONIUS, tribune of the soldiers under P. Scipio Africanus at Numantia, B.C. 133, wrote a Roman history from the Punic wars inclusive to the times of the Gracchi.

ASELLUS, TIB. CLAUDIUS, a Roman eques, was deprived of his horse by Scipio Africanus Minor, when censor, B.C. 142, and in his tribuneship of the plebs in 139 accused Scipio Africanus before the people.

ASIA (Ἀσία), daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, wife of Iapetus, and mother of Atlas, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. According to some traditions, the continent of Asia derived its name from her.

ASIA (Ἀσία : Ἀσιεύς, -ιανός, -ιύτης; -ατικός: now Asia), also in the poets ASIS (Ἄσις), one of the three great divisions which the ancients made of the known world. It is doubtful whether the name is of Greek or Eastern origin; but, in either case, it seems to have been first used by the Greeks for the western part of Asia Minor, especially the plains watered by the river Cayster, where the Ionian colonists first settled; and thence, as their geographical knowledge advanced, they extended it to the whole country east, northeast, and southeast. The first knowledge which the Greeks possessed of the opposite shores of the Ægean Sea dates before the earliest historical records. The legends respecting the Argonautic and the Trojan expeditions, and other mythical stories, on the one hand, and the allusions to commercial and other intercourse with the people of Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt, on the other hand, indicate a certain degree of knowledge of the coast from the mouth of the Phasis, at the eastern extremity of the Black Sea, to the mouth of the Nile. This knowledge was improved and increased by the colonization of the western, northern, and southern coasts of Asia Minor, and by the relations into which these Greek colonies were brought, first with the Lydian, and then with the Persian empires, so that, in the middle of the fifth century B.C., Herodotus was able to give a pretty complete description of the Persian empire, and some imperfect accounts of the parts beyond it; while some knowledge of southern Asia was obtained by way of Egypt; and its northern regions, with their wandering tribes, formed the subject of marvellous stories which the traveller heard from the Greek colonists on the northern shores of the Black Sea. The conquests of Alexander, besides the personal acquaintance which they enabled the Greeks to form with those provinces of the Persian empire hitherto only known to them by report, extended their knowledge over the regions watered by the Indus and its four great tributaries (the Punjab and Scinde); the lower course of the Indus and the shores between its mouth and the head of the Persian Gulf were explored by Nearchus; and some further knowledge was gained of the nomad tribes which roamed (as they still do) over the vast steppes of Central Asia by the attempt of Alexander to penetrate, on the northeast, beyond the Jaxartes (now Sihoun); while, on all points, the Greeks were placed in advanced positions from which to acquire further information, especially at Alexandria, whither voyagers constantly brought accounts of the shores of Arabia and India, as far as the island of Taprobane, and even beyond this, to the Malay peninsula and the coasts of Cochin China. On the east and north the wars and commerce of the Greek kingdom of Syria carried Greek knowledge of Asia no further, except in the direction of India to a small extent, but of course more acquaintance was gained with the countries already subdued, until the conquests of the Parthians shut out the Greeks from the country east of the Tigris valley; a limit which the Romans, in their turn, were never able to pass. They pushed their arms, however, further north than the Greeks had done, into the mountains of Armenia, and they gained information of a great caravan route between India and the shores of the Caspian, through Bactria, and of another commercial track leading over Central Asia to the distant regions of the Seres. This brief sketch will show that all the accurate knowledge of the Greeks and Romans respecting Asia was confined to the countries which slope down southward from the great mountain chain formed by the Caucasus and its prolongation beyond the Caspian to the Himalayas: of the vast elevated steppes between these mountains and the central range of the Altai (from which the northern regions of Siberia again slope down to the Arctic Ocean) they only knew that they were inhabited by nomad tribes, except the country directly north of Ariana, where the Persian empire had extended beyond the mountain chain, and where the Greek kingdom of Bactria had been subsequently established. The notions of the ancients respecting the size and form of Asia were such as might be inferred from what has been stated. Distances computed from the accounts of travellers are always exaggerated; and hence the southern part of the continent was supposed to extend much further to the east than it really does (about 60° of longitude too much, according to Ptolemy), while to the north and northeasterly parts, which were quite unknown, much too small an extent was assigned. However, all the ancient geographers, except Pliny, agreed in considering it the largest of the three divisions of the world, and all believed it to be surrounded by the ocean, with the curious exception of Ptolemy, who recurred to the early notion, which we find in the poets, that the eastern parts of Asia and the south-eastern parts of Africa were united by land which inclosed the Indian Ocean on the east and south. The different opinions about the boundaries of Asia on the side of Africa are mentioned under AFRICA: on the side of Europe the boundary was formed by the River Tanais (now Don), the Palus Mæotis (now Sea of Azof), Pontus Euxinus (now Black Sea), Propontis (now Sea of Marmara), and the Ægean (now Archipelago). The most general division of Asia was into two parts, which were different at different times, and known by different names. To the earliest Greek colonists the River Halys, the easterly boundary of the Lydian kingdom, formed a natural division between Upper and Lower Asia (ἡ ἄνω Ἄ., or τὰ ἄνω Ἀσίης, and ἡ κάτω Ἄ., or τὰ κάτω τῆς Ἀσίης, or Ἄ. ἡ ἐντὸς Ἄλως ποταμοῦ); and afterward the Euphrates was adopted as a more natural boundary. Another division was made by the Taurus into A. intra Taurum, i. e., the part of Asia north and northwest of the Taurus, and A. extra Taurum, all the rest of the continent (Ἄ. ἐντὸς τοῦ Ταύρου, and Ἄ. ἐκτὸς τοῦ Ταύρου). The division ultimately adopted, but apparently not till the fourth century of our era, was that of Asia Major and Asia Minor. 1. ASIA MAJOR (Ἄ. ἡ μεγάλη) was the part of the continent east of the Tanais, the Euxine, an imaginary line drawn from the Euxine at Trapezus (now Trebizond) to the Gulf of Issus, and the Mediterranean: thus it included the countries of Sarmatica Asiatica, with all the Scythian tribes to the east, Colchis, Iberia, Albania, Armenia, Syria, Arabia, Babylonia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persis, Ariana, Hyrcania, Margiana, Bactriana, Sogdiana, India, the land of the Sinæ and Serica; respecting which, see the several articles.—2. ASIA MINOR (Ἀσία ἡ μικρά: now Anatolia), was the peninsula on the extreme west of Asia, bounded by the Euxine, Ægean, and Mediterranean on the north, west, and south; and on the east by the mountains on the west of the upper course of the Euphrates. It was, for the most part, a fertile country, intersected with mountains and rivers, abounding in minerals, possessing excellent harbors, and peopled, from the earliest known period, by a variety of tribes from Asia and from Europe. For particulars respecting the country, the reader is referred to the separate articles upon the parts into which it was divided by the later Greeks, namely, Mysia, Lydia, and Caria on the west; Lycia, Pamphylia, and Cilicia on the south; Bithynia, Paphlagonia, and Pontus on the north; and Phrygia, Pisidia, Galatia, and Cappadocia in the centre: see, also, the articles TROAS, ÆOLIA, IONIA, DORIA, LYCAONIA, ISAURIA, PERGAMUS, HALYS, SANGARIUS, TAURUS, &c.—3. ASIA PROPRIA (Ἄ. ἡ ἰδίως καλούμενη), or simply ASIA, the Roman province, formed out of the kingdom of Pergamum, which was bequeathed to the Romans by ATTALUS III. (B.C. 130), and the Greek cities on the west coast, and the adjacent islands, with Rhodes. It included the districts of Mysia, Lydia, Caria, and Phrygia, and was governed at first by prætors, afterward by proconsuls. Under Constantine the Great a new division was made, and Asia only extended along the coast from the Promontorium Lectura to the mouth of the Mæander.

[ASIATICUS, a surname of the Scipios and Valerii.]

[ASIDĀTES (Ἀσιδάτης), a Persian nobleman, whose castle was unsuccessfully attacked by Xenophon, but who was afterward captured with all his property.]

[ASINA, a surname of the Scipios.]

[ASINÆUS SINUS, another name of the Messeniacus Sinus. Vid. ASINÆ, No. 3.]

ASINÆRUS (Ἀσινæρος: now Fiume di Noto or Freddo?), a river on the east side of Sicily, on which the Athenians were defeated by the Syracusans, B.C. 413: the Syracusans celebrated here an annual festival called Asinaria.

ASINÆ (Ἀσινῆ: Ἀσινάϊος). 1. (Now Passawa), a town in Laconica, on the coast between Tænarium and Gythium.—2. (Now Phurnos), a town in Argolis, west of Hermione, was built by the Dryopes, who were driven out of the town by the Argives after the first Messenian war, and built No. 3.—3. (Now Saratza?), an important town in Messenia, near the Promontory Acritas, on the Messenian Gulf, which was hence also called the Asinæan Gulf.

ASINIÆ GENS, plebeian, came from Teate, the chief town of the Marrucii; and the first person of the name mentioned is Herius Asinius, the leader of the Marrucini in the Marsic war, B.C. 90. The Asinii are given under their surnames, GALLUS and POLLIO.

ASINUS (Ἄσιος). 1. Son of Hyrtæus of Arisbe, and father of Acamas and Phænops, an ally of the Trojans, slain by Idomeneus.—2. Son of Dymas and brother of Hecuba, whose form Apollo assumed when he roused Hector to fight against Patroclus.—[3. Son of Imbrasus, accompanied Æneas to Italy.]—4. Of Samos, one of the earliest Greek poets, lived probably about B.C. 700. He wrote epic and elegiac poems, which have perished with the exception of a few fragments; [and these have been published with the fragments of Callinus and Tyrteus, by Bach; in the Minor Epic Poets, in Didot's Bibl. Græc.; and by Bergk, in his Poet. Lyrici Græc.]

ASMIRÆA, a district and city of Serica, in the north of Asia, near mountains called ASMIRÆI MONTES, which are supposed to be the Altai range, and the city to be Khamil, in the centre of Chinese Tartary.

[ASOPIS (Ἀσωπίς). 1. Daughter of the river-god Asopus.—2. Daughter of Thespius, mother of Mentor.]

ΑΣΩΠΟΣ (Ἀσωπός). 1. (Now Basilikos), a river in Peloponnesus, rises near Phlius, and flows through the Sicyonian territory into the Corinthian Gulf. Asopus, the god of this river, was son of Oceanus and Tethys, husband of Metope, and father of Evadne, Eubœa, and Ægina, each of whom was therefore called Asopis (Ἀσωπίς). When Jupiter (Zeus) carried off Ægina, Asopus attempted to fight with him, but he was smitten by the thunderbolt of Jupiter (Zeus), and from that time the bed of the river contained pieces of charcoal. By Ægina Asopus became the grandfather of Æacus, who is therefore called Asopiades.—2. (Now Asopo), a river in Bœotia, forms the northern boundary of the territory of Platæa, flows through the south of Bœotia, and falls into the Eubœan Sea near Delphinium in Attica. [On the banks of this river was fought the famous battle of Platæa.]—3. A river in Phthiotis in Thessaly, rises in Mount Ceta, and flows into the Maliac Gulf near Thermopylæ.—4. A river in Phrygia, flows past Laodicœa into the Lycus.—5. (Now Esapo), a town in Laconia, on the east side of the Læconian Gulf.

ΑΣΠΑΔΑΝΑ (Ἀσπαδάνα: now Ispahan?), a town of the district Parætacene in Persia.

ΑΣΠΑΛΙΑ (Ἀσπαλίς), daughter of Argæus, concerning whom an interesting legend is preserved in Antoninus Liberalis.]

ΑΣΠΑΡ, a Numidian, sent by Jugurtha to Bocchus in order to learn his designs, when the latter had sent for Sulla. He was, however, deceived by Bocchus.]

ΑΣΠΑΡΑΓΙΟΝ (now Iscarpur), a town in the territory of Dyrrhachium, in Illyria.

ΑΣΠΑΣΙΑ (Ἀσπασία). 1. The elder, of Miletus, daughter of Axiochus, the most celebrated of the Greek Hæteræ (vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.), came to reside at Athens, and there gained and fixed the affections of Pericles, not more by her beauty than by her high mental accomplishments. Having parted with his wife, Pericles attached himself to Aspasia during the rest of his life as closely as was allowed by the law, which forbade marriage with a foreign woman under severe penalties. The enemies of Pericles accused Aspasia of impiety (ἀσέβεια), and it required all the personal influence of Pericles, who defended her, and his most earnest entreaties and tears, to procure her acquittal. The house of Aspasia was the centre of the best literary and philosophical society of Athens, and was frequented even by Socrates. On the death of Pericles (B.C. 429), Aspasia is said to have attached herself to one Lysicles, a dealer in cattle, and to have made him, by her instructions, a first-rate orator. The son of Pericles by Aspasia was legitimated by a special decree of the people, and took his father's name.—2. The Younger, a Phœæan, daughter of Hermotimus, was the favorite concubine of Cyrus the Younger, who called her Aspasia after the mistress of Pericles, her previous name having been Milto [from μύλος, vermilion, being so called on account of the brilliancy of her complexion.] After the death of Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa (B.C. 401), she fell into the hands of Artaxerxes, who likewise became deeply enamored of her. When Darius, son of Artaxerxes, was appointed successor to the throne, he asked his father to surrender Aspasia to him. The request could not be refused as coming from the king elect; Artaxerxes, therefore, gave her up; but he soon after took her away again, and made her a priestess of a temple at Ecbatana, where strict celibacy was requisite.

ΑΣΠΑΣΙΟΣ (Ἀσπασίος). 1. A peripatetic philosopher, lived about A.D. 80, and wrote commentaries on most of the works of Aristotle. A portion of his commentaries on the Nicomachean Ethics is still preserved.—2. Of Byblus, a Greek sophist, lived about A.D. 180, and wrote commentaries on Demosthenes and Æschines, of which a few extracts are preserved; [the extracts relating to him are collected by Müller, in the third volume of Didot's Fragmenta Historicorum Græcorum, p. 576.—3. Of Tyre, a rhetorician and historian, who, according to Suidas, wrote a history of Epirus and of things in it in twenty books; but Müller (Fragmenta Historicorum Græcorum, p. 576), with much probability, suggests Τύρον for Ἡρείρον, and so the account would be of Tyre.—4. Of Ravenna, a distinguished sophist and rhetorician, who lived about 225 A.D., in the reign of Alexander Severus. His works are now lost.]

ΑΣΠΕΝΔΟΣ (Ἀσπένδος: Ἀσπένδιος, Aspendius: now Dashashkehr or Manavgat), a strong and flourishing city of Pamphylia, on the small navigable river Eurymedon, sixty stadia (six geographical miles) from its mouth: said to have been a colony of the Argives.

ΑΣΠΕΡ, ÆMILIUS, a Roman grammarian, who wrote commentaries on Terence and Virgil, must be distinguished from another grammarian, usually called Asper Junior, the author of a small work entitled Ars Grammatica, printed in the Grammat. Lat. Auctores, by Putschius, Hanov. 1605.

ΑΣΦΑΛΤΙΤΗΣ ΛΑΚΟΣ or MARE MORTUUM (Ἀσφαλτίτης ἢ Σοδομίτης λίμνη, or ἡ θαλάσσια ἢ νεκρά), the great salt and bituminous lake in the southeast of Palestine, which receives the water of the Jordan, [is of an irregular oblong figure, about forty miles long and eight miles broad.] It has no visible outlet, and its surface is [a little more than thirteen hundred feet] below the level of the Mediterranean. [It is called the Dead Sea from the desolation prevailing along its shores, as well as from the belief that no living creature can exist in its waters.] Although the tales about birds dropping down dead as they fly over it are now proved to be fabulous, [yet the waters and the surrounding soil are so intensely impregnated with salt and sulphur that no tree or plants grow on its banks: and it is doubted, with great probability, whether any fish live in its waters, for these, when examined by a powerful microscope, have been found to contain no animalcule or animal matter whatever. This sea has been very recently explored for the first time with accuracy by Lieutenant Lynch of the United States navy, who has proved that the bottom of the sea consists of two submerged plains, an elevated and a depressed one, the former averaging thirteen, the latter thirteen hundred feet below the surface. The shallow portion is to the south; the deeper, which is also the larger, to the north. This southern and shallow portion would appear to have been originally the fertile plain of Siddim, in which the guilty cities stood.

ASPII or ASPASII ('Ασπίοι, 'Ασπάσιοι), an Indian tribe, in the district of the Paropamisadae, between the rivers Choes (now Kama) and Indus, in the northeast of Afghanistan and the northwest of the Punjab.

ASPIS ('Ασπίς). 1. CLYPEA (now Klibiah), a city on a promontory of the same name, near the northeastern point of the Carthaginian territory, founded by Agathocles, and taken in the first Punic war by the Romans, who called it Clypea, the translation of 'Ασπίς.—2. (Now Marsa-Zaffran? ruins), in the African Tripolitana, the best harbor on the coast of the Great Syrtis.—3. Vid. ARCONNESUS.

ASPLEDON ('Ασπληδών: 'Ασπληδώνιος), or SPLEDON, a town of the Minyæ, in Bœotia, on the River Melas, near Orchomenus; built by the mythical Aspledon, son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Midæa.

ASSA ('Ασσα: 'Ασσαίος), a town in Chalcidice, in Macedonia, on the Singitic Gulf.

ASSACENI ('Ασσηκηνόι), an Indian tribe, in the district of the Paropamisadae, between the rivers Cophen (now Cabool) and Indus, in the northwest of the Punjab.

ASSARĀCUS ('Ασάρακος), king of Troy, son of Tros, father of Capys, grandfather of Anchises, and great-grandfather of Æneas. Hence the Romans, as descendants of Æneas, are called domus Asaraci (Virg., Æn., l. 284).

ASSÆCUS ('Ασσηός), a town of Ionia, near Miletus, with a temple of Minerva (Athena), surnamed 'Ασσησία.

ASSŌRUS ('Ασσωρός or 'Ασσωρίον: 'Ασσωρίνος: now Asaro), a small town in Sicily, between Enna and Agrigium.

ASSUS ('Ασσος: 'Ασσαιος, 'Ασσεύς: now Asso, ruins near Beiram). 1. A flourishing city in the Troad, on the Adramyttian Gulf, opposite to Lesbos: afterward called Apollonia: the birthplace of Cleanthes the Stoic.—[2. A tributary of the Cephissus, in Phœcis and Bœotia.]

ASSYRIA ('Ασσυρία: 'Ασσυρίος, Assyrius: now Kurdistan). 1. The country properly so called, in the narrowest sense, was a district of Western Asia, extending along the eastern side of the Tigris, which divided it on the west and northwest from Mesopotamia and Babylonia, and bounded on the north and east by Mount Niphates and Mount Zagrus, which separated it from Armenia and Media, and on the southeast by Susiana. It was watered by several streams, flowing into the Tigris from the east; two of which, the Lycus or Zabatus (now Great Zab), and the Caprus, or Zabas, or Anzabas (now Little Zab), divided the country into three parts: that between the Upper Tigris and the Lycus was called Aturia (a mere dialectic variety of Assyria), was probably the most ancient seat of the monarchy, and contained the capital, Nineveh or NINUS; that between the Lycus and the Caprus was called Adiabene; and the part southeast of the Caprus contained the districts of Apolloniatis and Sittacene. Another division into districts, given by Ptolemy, is the following: Arrhapaehitis, Calacine, Adiabene, Arbelitis, Apolloniatis, and Sittacene.—2. In a wider sense the name was applied to the whole country watered by the Euphrates and the Ti-gris, between the mountains of Armenia on the north, those of Kurdistan on the east, and the Arabian Desert on the west, so as to include, besides Assyria proper, Mesopotamia and Babylonia; nay, there is sometimes an apparent confusion between Assyria and Syria, which gives ground for the supposition that the terms were originally identical.—3. By a further extension the word is used to designate the Assyrian Empire in its widest sense. The early history of this great monarchy is too obscure to be given here in any detail; and, indeed, it is only just now that new means of investigating it are being acquired. The germ of this empire was one of the first great states of which we have any record, and was probably a powerful and civilized kingdom as early as Egypt. Its reputed founder was Ninus, the builder of the capital city; and in its widest extent it included the countries just mentioned, with Media, Persia, and portions of the countries to the east and northeast, Armenia, Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine, except the kingdom of Judah; and, beyond these limits, some of the Assyrian kings made incursions into Arabia and Egypt. The fruitless expedition of Sennacherib against the latter country and the miraculous destruction of his army before Jerusalem (B.C. 714), so weakened the empire, that the Medes revolted and formed a separate kingdom, and at last, in B.C. 606, the governor of Babylonia united with Cyaxares, the king of Media, to conquer Assyria, which was divided between them, Assyria Proper falling to the share of Media, and the rest of the empire to Babylon. The Assyrian king and all his family perished, and the city of Ninus was razed to the ground. Compare BABYLON and MEDIA. It must be noticed as a caution, that some writers confound the Assyrian and Babylonian empires under the former name.

ASTA (Astensis). 1. (Now Asti in Piedmont), an inland town of Liguria on the Tanarus, a Roman colony.—2. (Now Mesa de Asta), a town in Hispania Bœtica, near Gades, a Roman colony with the surname Regia.

ASTĀBORAS ('Ασταβόρας: now Atbarah or Tacazza) and ASTĀPUS ('Αστάπος, now Bahr-el-Azrek or Blue River), two rivers of Æthiopia, having their sources in the highlands of Abyssinia, and uniting in about 17° north latitude to form the Nile. The land inclosed by them was the so-called island of MEROË.

ASTĀCUS ('Αστακος). 1. A Theban, father of Ismarus, Leades, Asphodius, and Melanippus.—[2. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and the nymph Olbia, reputed founder of the city ASTACUS, q. v. 2.]

ASTĀCUS ('Αστάκος: 'Αστακηνός). 1. (Now Dragomestre), a city of Acarnania, on the Achelous.—2. A celebrated city of Bithynia, at the southeast corner of the Sinus Sittacenus ('Αστακηνός κόλπος), a bay of the Propontis, was a colony from Megara, but afterward received fresh colonists from Athens, who called the place Olbia ('Ολβία). It was destroyed by Lysimachus, but rebuilt on a neighboring site, at the northeast corner of the gulf, by Nicomedes I, who named his new city NICOMEDIA.

ASTĀPA (now Estepa), a town in Hispania Bœtica.

ASTĀPUS. Vid. ASTABORAS.

ASTARTE. Vid. APHRODITE and SYRIA DEA.

ASTĒLĒPHUS (Ἀστῆλεφος), a river of Colchis, one hundred and twenty stadia (twelve geographical miles) south of Sebastopolis.

[ASTER (Ἀστήρ), a skillful archer, one of the garrison of Methone in Macedonia, who, when Philip was besieging that city, aimed an arrow at him, with this inscription on it, Ἀστήρ Φίλιππῳ θανάσιμον πέμπει βέλος, and deprived him of an eye. Philip sent back an arrow into the town with the inscription on it, Ἀστέρα Φίλιππος, ἣν λάβῃ, κρεμήσεται. When the place was taken, Philip crucified Aster.]

ASTĒŪIA (Ἀστέρια), daughter of the Titan Cœus and Phœbe, sister of Leto (Latona), wife of Perseus, and mother of Hecate. In order to escape the embraces of Jupiter (Zeus), she is said to have taken the form of a quail (ortyx, ortyx), and to have thrown herself down from heaven into the sea, where she was metamorphosed into the island Asteria (the island which had fallen from heaven like a star), or Ortygia, afterward called Delos.

[ASTERIA. Vid. ASTERIS.]

ASTERĪON or ASTĒRĪUS (Ἀστερίων or Ἀστέριος). 1. Son of Teutamus, and king of the Cretans, married Europa after she had been carried to Crete by Jupiter (Zeus), and brought up the three sons, Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthys, whom she had by the father of the gods.—2. Son of Cometes, Pyremus, or Priscus, by Antigone, daughter of Pheres, was one of the Argonauts.—[3. Son of Minos, slain by Theseus.—4. A small river of Argolis, the god of which was father of Astræa.]

ASTERIS or ASTĒŪIA (Ἀστερίς, Ἀστέρια), a small island between Ithaca and Cephallenia.

ASTERĪUM (Ἀστέριον), a town in Magnesia, in Thessaly.

[ASTERIUS (Ἀστέριος). 1. Son of Hyperasius, an Argonaut.—2. Son of Neleus, brother of Nestor. Vid. also ASTERION.]

ASTEROPEUS (Ἀστεροπαῖος), son of Pelegon, leader of the Pæonians, and an ally of the Trojans, was slain by Achilles.

[ASTERŌPE (Ἀστερόπη), daughter of the river-god Cebren, wife of Æsacus.]

[ASTEROPEA (Ἀστερόπεια). 1. Daughter of Pelias.—2. Daughter of Deius in Phocis, sister of Cephalus.]

ASTICI (now Seiga), a town in Hispania Bætica, on the River Singulis, a Roman colony with the surname Augusta Firma.

[ASTRABŪCUS (Ἀστράβουκος) a son of Irbus, brother of Alopeceus, of the family of the Eurysthenide, an ancient Laconian hero, who had a heroism in Sparta, and was worshipped as a god.]

ASTREA (Ἀστραία) daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Themis, or, according to others, of Astræus and Eos. During the Golden Age, this star-bright maiden lived on earth and among men, whom she blessed; but when that age had passed away, Astræa, who tarried longest among men, withdrew, and was placed among the stars, where she was called Παρθένος or Virgo. Her sister Aldôs, or Pudicitia, left the earth along with her (ad superos Astræa recessit, hac (Pudicitia) comite, Juv. vi, 19.)

ASTRÆUS (Ἀστραῖος), a Titan, son of Crius and Erymbia, husband of Eos (Aurora), and father of the winds Zephyrus, Boreas, and Notus, Eosphorus (the morning star), and all the stars of heaven. Ovid (Met. xiv., 545) calls the winds Astræi (adj.) fratres, the "Astræan brothers."

ASTŪRA. 1. (Now La Stura), a river in Latium, rises in the Alban Mountains, and flows between Antium and Circeii into the Tyrrhenian Sea. At its mouth it formed a small island with a town upon it, also called Astura (now Torre d'Astura): here Cicero had an estate.—2. (Now Ezla), a river in Hispania Tarraconensis, flowing into the Durins.

ASTŪRES, a people in the northwest of Spain, bounded on the east by the Cantabri and Væcæi, on the west by the Gallæci, on the north by the Ocean, and on the south by the Vettones, thus inhabiting the modern Asturias and the northern part of Leon and Valladolid. They contained twenty-two tribes and two hundred and forty thousand freemen, and were divided into the Augustani and Transmontani, the former of whom dwelt south of the mountains as far as the Durius, and the latter north of the mountains down to the sea-coast. The country of the Astures was mountainous, rich in minerals, and celebrated for its horses: the people themselves were rude and warlike. Their chief town was Asturica Augusta (now Astorga).

ASTŪGES (Ἀστύγις), son of Cyaxares, last king of Media, reigned B.C. 594-559. Alarmed by a dream, he gave his daughter Mandane in marriage to Cambyses, a Persian of good family. Another dream induced him to send Harpagus to destroy the offspring of this marriage. The child, the future conqueror of the Medes, was given to a herdsman to expose, but he brought it up as his own. Years afterward, circumstances occurred which brought the young Cyrus under the notice of Astyages, who, on inquiry, discovered his parentage. He inflicted a cruel punishment on Harpagus, who waited his time for revenge. When Cyrus had grown up to man's estate, Harpagus induced him to instigate the Persians to revolt, and, having been appointed general of the Median forces, he deserted with the greater part of them to Cyrus. Astyages was taken prisoner, and Cyrus mounted the throne. He treated the captive monarch with mildness, but kept him in confinement till his death. This is the account of Herodotus, and is to be preferred to that of Xenophon, who makes Cyrus the grandson of Astyages, but says that Astyages was succeeded by his son Cyaxares II., on whose death Cyrus succeeded peaceably to the vacant throne.

ASTŪNAX (Ἀστύναξ), son of Hector and Andromache: his proper name was Seamandritus, but he was called Astyanax or "lord of the city" by the Trojans, on account of the services of his father. After the taking of Troy the Greeks hurled him down from the walls, that he might not restore the kingdom of Troy.

ASTŪDĀMAS (Ἀστυδάμας), a tragic poet, son of Morsimus and of a sister of the poet Æschylus, and a pupil of Isocrates, wrote two hundred and forty tragedies, and gained the prize fifteen times. His first tragedy was acted B.C. 399.

ASTŪDĀMĪA (Ἀστυδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Amyntor, and mother of Tlepolemus by Hercules.—2. Wife of ACASTUS.

[ASTYLUS (Ἀστυλος), of Crotona, a distinguished athlete, gained several prizes at the Olympic games.]

ΑΣΤΥΝΟΜΕ (Ἀστυνόμη), daughter of Chryseis, better known under her patronymic CHRYSEIS.

[ΑΣΤΥΝΟΥΣ (Ἀστυνόος). 1. Son of Phaëthon, father of Sandaëus.—2. Son of Protiaon, a Trojan, slain by Neoptolemus.—3. A Trojan, slain by Diomedes.]

ΑΣΤΥΟΧΗ or ΑΣΤΥΟΧΙΑ (Ἀστυόχη or Ἀστυόχεια). 1. Daughter of Actor, by whom Mars (Ares) begot Ascalaphus and Ialmenus.—2. Daughter of Phylas, king of Ephyra in Thesprotia, became by Hercules the mother of Telepolemus.

ΑΣΤΥΟΧΟΣ (Ἀστυόχος), the Lacedæmonian admiral in B.C. 412, commanded on the coast of Asia Minor, where he was bribed by the Persians to remain inactive.

ΑΣΤΥΠΑΛΕΑ (Ἀστυπάλαια: Ἀστυπαλαίεις, Ἀστυπαλαίτης; now Stampalia). 1. One of the Sporades, in the southern part of the Grecian archipelago, with a town of the same name, founded by the Megarians, which was under the Romans a libera civitas. Astypalëia regna, i. e. Astypalæa, Ov. Met., vii, 461. The inhabitants worshipped Achilles.—[2. A point of land in Attica, near Sunium.—3. A point of land in Caria, near Myndus.—4. An ancient city in the island Cos, which the inhabitants abandoned, and built the city Cos instead.]

ΑΣΤΥΡΑ (τὰ Ἀστυρά), a town of Mysia, northwest of Adramyttium, on a marsh connected with the sea, with a grove sacred to Diana (Artemis), surnamed Ἀστυρίνη or -νή.

ΑΣΥΧΟΣ (Ἀσυχός), an ancient king of Egypt, succeeded Mycerinus.

ΑΤΑΪΒΥΛΟΣ, the name in Apulia of the parching southeast wind, the Sirocco, which is at present called Allino in the Apulia.

ΑΤΑΒΥΡΙΣ or ΑΤΑΒΥΡΙΨΜ (Αταβύριον), the highest mountain in Rhodes on the southwest of that island, on which was a celebrated temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Atabyrius, said to have been founded by Althæmenes, the grandson of Minos.

[ΑΤΑΚΙΝΟΣ. Vid. ΑΤΑΧ.]

ΑΤΑΓΙΣ. Vid. ΑΘΗΣΙΣ.

ΑΤΑΛΑΝΤΑ (Ἀταλάντη). 1. The Arcadian Atalanta, was a daughter of Iasus (Iasion or Iasius) and Clymene. Her father, who had wished for a son, was disappointed at her birth, and exposed her on the Parthenian (virgin) hill, where she was suckled by a she-bear, the symbol of Diana (Artemis). After she had grown up she lived in pure maidenhood, slew the centaurs who pursued her, and took part in the Calydonian hunt. Her father subsequently recognized her as his daughter; and when he desired her to marry, she required every suitor who wanted to win her to contend with her first in the foot-race. If he conquered her, he was to be rewarded with her hand; if not, he was to be put to death. This she did because she was the most swift-footed of mortals, and because the Delphic oracle had cautioned her against marriage. She conquered many suitors, but was at length overcome by Milanion with the assistance of Venus (Aphrodite). The goddess had given him three golden apples, and during the race he dropped them one after the other: their beauty charmed Atalanta so much that she could not abstain from gathering them, and Milanion thus gained the goal before her. She accordingly became his wife. They were subsequently both metamorphosed into lions, because they had profaned by their embraces the sacred grove of Jupiter (Zeus).—2. The Bæotian Atalanta. The same stories are related of her as of the Arcadian Atalanta, except that her parentage and the localities are described differently. Thus she is said to have been a daughter of Schœnus, and to have been married to Hippomenes. Her foot-race is transferred to the Bæotian Onchestus, and the sanctuary which the newly-married couple profaned by their love was a temple of Cybele, who metamorphosed them into lions, and yoked them to her chariot.

ΑΤΑΛΑΝΤΗ (Ἀταλάντη: Ἀταλνανταῖος). 1. A small island in the Euripus, on the coast of the Opuntian Loeri, with a small town of the same name.—[2. A small island on the coast of Attica, near the Piræus.—3. A town of Macedonia, on the Axius, in the neighborhood of Gortynia and Idomene.

ΑΤΑΡΑΝΤΕΣ (Ἀτάραντες), a people in the east of Libya, described by Herodotus (iv., 184).

ΑΤΑΡΒΕΧΙΣ. Vid. ΑΦΗΡΟΔΙΤΟΠΟΛΙΣ.

ΑΤΑΡΝΕΥΣ (Ἀταρνεύς: now Dikeli), a city on Mount Cane, on the coast of Mysia, opposite to Lesbos: a colony of the Chians: the residence of the tyrant Hermias, with whom Aristotle resided some time: destroyed before the time of Pliny.

ΑΤΑΥΛΦΟΣ, ΑΘΑΥΛΦΟΣ, ΑΔΑΥΛΦΟΣ (ἰ. ε., Αθαυφ, "sworn helper," the same name as that which appears in later history under the form of Adolf or Adolphus), brother of Alaric's wife. He assisted Alaric in his invasion of Italy, and on the death of that monarch in A.D. 410, he was elected king of the Visigoths. He then made a peace with the Romans, married Placidia, sister of Honorius, retired with his nation into the south of Gaul, and finally withdrew into Spain, where he was murdered at Barcelona.

ΑΤΑΧ (now Aude), originally called Narbo, a river in Gallia Narbonensis, rises in the Pyrenees, and flows by Narbo Martius into the Lacus Rubresus or Rubrensis, which is connected with the sea. From this river the poet P. Terentius Varro obtained the surname Atacinus. Vid. VARRO.

ΑΤΗ (Ἄτη), daughter of Eris or Jupiter (Zeus), was an ancient Greek divinity, who led both gods and men into rash and inconsiderate actions. She once even induced Jupiter (Zeus), at the birth of Hercules, to take an oath by which Juno (Hera) was afterward enabled to give to Eurystheus the power which had been destined for Hercules. When Jupiter (Zeus) discovered his rashness, he hurled Ate from Olympus, and banished her forever from the abodes of the gods. In the tragic writers Ate appears in a different light: she avenges evil deeds and inflicts just punishments upon the offenders and their posterity, so that her character is almost the same as that of Nemesis and Erinny. She appears most prominent in the dramas of Æschylus, and least in those of Euripides, with whom the idea of Dike (justice) is more fully developed.

ΑΤΡΙΨΟΣ, surnamed Prætextatus and Philologus, a celebrated grammarian at Rome, about

B.C. 40, and a friend of Sallust, for whom he drew up an Epitome (Breviarium) of Roman History. After the death of Sallust Ateius lived on intimate terms with Asinius Pollio, whom he assisted in his literary pursuits.

ATEIUS CAPITO. Vid. CAPITO.

ATELLA (Atellanus; now Aversa), a town in Campania, between Capua and Neapolis, originally inhabited by the Oscans, afterward a Roman municipium and a colony. It revolted to Hannibal (B.C. 216) after the battle of Cannæ, and the Romans, in consequence, transplanted its inhabitants to Calatia, and peopled the town by new citizens from Nuceria. Atella owes its celebrity to the Atellana Fabule or Oscan farces, which took their name from this town. (Vid. Dict. of Antiq., p. 347, second edition.)

ATERNUM (now Pescara), a town in Central Italy, on the Adriatic, at the mouth of the River Aternus (now Pescara), was the common harbor of the Vestini, Marrucini, and Peligni.

ATERNUS. Vid. ATERNUM.

ATESTE (Atestinus; now Este), a Roman colony in the country of the Veneti, in Upper Italy.

ATHÆCUS, a town in Lyncestis, in Macedonia.

ATHAMĀNIA (Ἀθαμανία; Ἀθαμίν, -ἄνος), a mountainous country in the south of Epirus, on the west side of Pindus, of which Argithea was the chief town. The Athamānes were a Thesalian people, who had been driven out of Thessaly by the Lapithæ. They were governed by independent princes, the last of whom was AMYXANDER.

ATHAMAS (Ἀθάμας), son of Æolus and Enarete, and king of Orchomenus in Bœotia. At the command of Juno (Hera), Athamas married Nephele, by whom he became the father of PHRIXUS and Helle. But he was secretly in love with the mortal Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he begot Learechus and Melicertes; and Nephele, on discovering that Ino had a greater hold on his affections than herself, disappeared in anger. Having thus incurred the anger both of Juno (Hera) and of Nephele, Athamas was seized with madness, and in this state killed his own son, Learechus: Ino threw herself with Melicertes into the sea, and both were changed into marine deities, Ino becoming Leucothea, and Melicertes Palæmon. Athamas, as the murderer of his son, was obliged to flee from Bœotia, and settled in Thessaly. Hence we have Athamantides, son of Athamas, i. e., Palæmon; and Athamantis, daughter of Athamas, i. e., Helle.

ATHANAGĪA (now Agramunt?), the chief town of the Illygeses in Hispania Tarraconensis.

ATHANARICUS, king of the Visigoths during their stay in Dacia. In A.D. 367-369 he carried on war with the Emperor Valens, with whom he finally concluded a peace. In 374 Athanaric was defeated by the Huns, and, after defending himself for some time in a stronghold in the mountains of Dacia, was compelled to fly in 380, and take refuge in the Roman territory. He died in 381.

ATHANASIUS (Ἀθανάσιος), St., one of the most celebrated of the Christian fathers, was born at Alexandria about A.D. 296, and was elected archbishop of the city on the death of Alexander in 326. The history of his episcopate is full of stirring incidents and strange transitions of fortune. He was the great champion of the orthodox faith, as it has been expounded at the Council at Nice in 325, and was therefore exposed to persecution whenever the Arians got the upper hand in the state. He was thrice driven from his see into exile through their machinations, and thrice recalled. He died in 373. The Athanasian creed was not composed by Athanasius: its real author is unknown. The best edition of his works is by Montfaucon, Paris, 1698, reprinted at Padua, 1777.

ATHĒNA (Ἀθήνη or Ἀθηνᾶ). (Roman Minerva), one of the great divinities of the Greeks. Homer calls her a daughter of Zeus (Jupiter), without any allusion to the manner of her birth; but later traditions related that she was born from the head of Zeus (Jupiter), and some added that she sprang forth with a mighty war-shout and in complete armor. The most ancient tradition, as preserved by Hesiod, stated that Metis, the first wife of Zeus (Jupiter), was the mother of Athena (Minerva), but that Metis, when pregnant with her, was, on the advice of Gæa and Uranus, swallowed up by Zeus (Jupiter), and that Zeus (Jupiter) afterward gave birth himself to Athena (Minerva), who sprang from his head. Another set of traditions regarded her as the daughter of Pallas, the winged giant, whom she afterward killed on account of his attempting to violate her chastity; and a third set carried her to Libya, and called her a daughter of Poseidon (Neptune) and Tritonis. These various traditions about Athena (Minerva) arose, as in most other cases, from local legends and identifications of the Greek Athena with other divinities. But, according to the general belief of the Greeks, she was the daughter of Zeus (Jupiter); and if we take Metis to have been her mother, we have at once the clew to the character which she bears in the religion of Greece; for, as her father was the most powerful and her mother the wisest among the gods, so Athena was a combination of the two, a goddess in whom power and wisdom were harmoniously blended. From this fundamental idea may be derived the various aspects under which she appears in the ancient writers. She seems to have been a divinity of a purely ethical character; her power and wisdom appear in her being the preserver of the state and of every thing which gives to the state strength and prosperity. As the protectress of agriculture, Athena (Minerva) is represented as inventing the plough and rake; she created the olive-tree (vid. below), taught the people to yoke oxen to the plough, took care of the breeding of horses, and instructed men how to tame them by the bridle, her own invention. Allusions to this feature of her character are contained in the epithets βοῦδεία, βοσκήτρια, ἀγρίον, ἵππια, or χαλιβίτις. She is also represented as the patron of various kinds of science, industry, and art, and as inventing numbers, the trumpet, the chariot, and navigation. She was further believed to have invented nearly every kind of work in which women were employed, and she herself was skilled in such work. Hence we have the tale of the Lydian maiden Arachne, who ventured to compete with Athena (Minerva) in the art of weaving. Vid. ARACHNE. Athena (Minerva), is, in fact, the patroness of both the useful and elegant arts. Hence she is called εργάνη, and later writers make her the goddess of all wisdom, knowledge, and art, and represent her as sitting on the right hand of her father Zeus (Jupiter), and supporting him with her counsel. She is therefore characterized by various epithets and surnames, expressing the keenness of her sight or the vigor of her intellect, such as ὀπτιλέτις, ὀφθαλμίτις, ὄζυδερκής, γλαυκῶπις, πολύβουλος, πολύμητις, and μηχανίτις. As the patron divinity of the state, she was at Athens the protectress of the phratries and houses which formed the basis of the state. The festival of the Apaturia had a direct reference to this particular point in the character of the goddess. (Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. APATURIA.) She also maintained the authority of the law, justice, and order in the courts and the assembly of the people. This notion was as ancient as the Homeric poems, in which she is described as assisting Ulysses against the lawless conduct of the suitors. (Od., xiii., 394.) She was believed to have instituted the ancient court of the Areopagus, and in cases where the votes of the judges were equally divided, she gave the casting one in favor of the accused. The epithets which have reference to this part of the goddess's character are ἀιόποικος, the avenger, βουλαία, and ἀγυραία. As Athena (Minerva) promoted the internal prosperity of the state, so she also protected the state from outward enemies, and thus assumes the character of a warlike divinity, though in a very different sense from Ares (Mars), Eris, or Eryxo. According to Homer, she does not even keep arms, but borrows them from Zeus (Jupiter); she preserves men from slaughter when prudence demands it, and repels Ares's (Mars) savage love of war, and conquers him. The epithets which she derives from her warlike character are ἀγελεία, λαφρία, ἀλκιμάχη, λαοσόφος, and others. In times of war, towns, fortresses, and harbors are under her especial care, whence she is designated as εἰρησπιτολις, ἀλαλκομένης, πολιῆς, πολιοῦχος, ἄκραία, ἄκρια, κληροδοῦχος, πυλαίτις, προμαχώρμα, and the like. In the war of Zeus (Jupiter) against the giants, she assisted her father and Hercules with her counsel, and also took an active part in it, for she buried Enceladus under the island of Sicily, and slew Pallas. In the Trojan war she sided with the Greeks, though on their return home she visited them with storms, on account of the manner in which the Locrian Ajax had treated Cassandra in her temple. As a goddess of war and the protectress of heroes, Athena (Minerva) usually appears in armor, with the ægis and a golden staff. The character of Athena (Minerva), as we have traced it, holds a middle place between the male and female, whence she is a virgin divinity, whose heart is inaccessible to the passion of love. Tiresias was deprived of sight for having seen her in the bath; and Hephestus (Vulcan), who made an attempt upon her chastity, was obliged to take to flight. For this reason, the ancient traditions always describe the goddess as dressed; and when Ovid makes her appear naked before Paris, he abandons the genuine story. Athena (Minerva) was worshipped in all parts of Greece. Her worship was introduced from the ancient towns on the Lake Copais at a very early period into Attica, where she became the great national divinity of the city and the country. Here she was regarded as the θεὸς σώτεια, ὕγισια, and παιωνία. The tale ran that in the reign of Cecrops both Poseidon (Neptune) and Athena (Minerva) contended for the possession of Athens. The gods resolved that whichever of them produced a gift most useful to mortals should have possession of the land. Poseidon (Neptune) struck the ground with his trident, and straightway a horse appeared. Athena (Minerva) then planted the olive. The gods thereupon decreed that the olive was more useful to man than the horse, and gave the city to the goddess, from whom it was called Athenæ. At Athens the magnificent festival of the Panathenæa was celebrated in honor of the goddess. At this festival took place the grand procession, which was represented on the frieze of the Parthenon. (Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. PANATHENÆA.) At Lindus, in Rhodes, her worship was likewise very ancient. Respecting its introduction into Italy, and the modifications which her character underwent there, vid. MINERVA. Among the things sacred to her we may mention the owl, serpent, cock, and olive-tree, which she was said to have created in her contest with Poseidon (Neptune) about the possession of Attica. The sacrifices offered to her consisted of bulls, rams, and cows. Athena (Minerva) was frequently represented in works of art, in which we generally find some of the following characteristics: 1. The helmet, which she usually wears on her head, but in a few instances carries in her hand. It is generally ornamented in the most beautiful manner with griffins, heads of rams, horses, and sphinxes. 2. The ægis, which is represented on works of art, not as a shield, but as a goat-skin, covered with scales, set with the appalling Gorgon's head, and surrounded with tassels. (Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. ÆGIS.) 2. The round Argolic shield, in the centre of which the head of Medusa likewise appears. 4. Objects sacred to her, such as an olive-branch, a serpent, an owl, a cock, and a lance. Her garment is usually the Spartan tunic without sleeves, and over it she wears a cloak, the peplus, or, though rarely, the chlamys.

ATHENÆ ('Αθήναι, also 'Αθήνη in Homer: 'Αθηναίος, ἡ 'Αθηναία, Atheniensis: now Athens), the capital of Attica, about thirty stadia from the sea, on the southwest slope of Mount Lycabettus, between the small rivers Cephissus on the west and Ilissus on the east, the latter of which flowed close by the walls of the town. The most ancient part of it, the Acropolis, is said to have been built by the mythical Cecrops, but the city itself is said to have owed its origin to Theseus, who united the twelve independent states or townships of Attica into one state, and made Athens their capital. The city was burned by Xerxes in B.C. 480, but was soon rebuilt under the administration of Themistocles, and was adorned with public buildings by Cimon and especially by Pericles, in whose time (B.C. 460-429) it reached its greatest splendor. Its beauty was chiefly owing to its public buildings, for the private houses were mostly insignificant, and its streets badly laid out. Toward the end of the Peloponnesian war, it contained ten thousand houses (Xen., Mem., iii, 6, § 14), which, at the rate of twelve inhabitants to a house, would give a population of one hundred and twenty thousand, though some writers make the inhabitants as many as one hundred and eighty thousand. Under the Romans Athens continued to be a great and flourishing city, and retained many privileges and immunities when Southern Greece was formed into the Roman province of Achaia. It suffered greatly on its capture by Sulla, B.C. 86, and was deprived of many of its privileges. It was at that time, and also during the early centuries of the Christian era, one of the chief seats of learning, and the Romans were accustomed to send their sons to Athens, as to a University, for the completion of their education. Hadrian, who was very partial to Athens, and frequently resided in the city (A.D. 122, 128), adorned it with many new buildings, and his example was followed by Herodes Atticus, who spent large sums of money upon beautifying the city in the reign of M. Aurelius. Athens consisted of two distinct parts: I. The City (τὸ ἄστυ), properly so called, divided into, 1. The Upper City or Acropolis (ἡ ἀνω πόλις, ἀκρόπολις), and, 2. The Lower City (ἡ κάτω πόλις), surrounded with walls by Themistocles. II. The three harbor-towns of Piræus, Munychia, and Phalærum, also surrounded with walls by Themistocles, and connected with the city by means of the long walls (τὰ μακρὰ τεῖχη), built under the administration of Pericles. The long walls consisted of the wall to Phalærum on the east, thirty-five stadia long (about four miles), and of the wall to Piræus on the west, forty stadia long (about four and a half miles); between these two, at a short distance from the latter and parallel to it, another wall was erected, thus making two walls leading to the Piræus (sometimes called τὰ σκέλη), with a narrow passage between them. There were, therefore, three long walls in all; but the name of Long Walls seems to have been confined to the two leading to the Piræus, while the one leading to Phalærum was distinguished by the name of the Phalerian Wall (τὸ Φαληρικὸν τεῖχος). The entire circuit of the walls was one hundred and seventy-four and a half stadia (nearly twenty-two miles), of which forty-three stadia (nearly five and a half miles) belonged to the city, seventy-five stadia (nine and a half miles) to the long walls, and fifty-six and a half stadia (seven miles) to Piræus, Munychia, and Phalærum.—I. TOPOGRAPHY OF THE ACROPOLIS OR UPPER CITY. The Acropolis, also called Cecropia, from its reputed founder, was a steep rock in the middle of the city, about one hundred and fifty feet high, eleven hundred and fifty feet long, and five hundred broad: its sides were naturally scarped on all sides except the western end. It was originally surrounded by an ancient Cyclopians wall, said to have been built by the Pelasgians; at the time of the Peloponnesian war only the northern part of this wall remained, and this portion was still called the Pelasgic Wall; while the southern part, which had been rebuilt by Cimon, was called the Cimonian Wall. On the western end of the Acropolis, where access is alone practicable, were the magnificent PROPYLÆA, "the Entrances," built by Pericles, before the right wing of which was the small temple of Νίκη Ἀπτερος. The summit of the Acropolis was covered with temples, statues of bronze and marble, and various other works of art. Of the temples, the grandest was the PARTHENON, sacred to the "Virgin" goddess Athena (Minerva); and north of the Parthenon was the magnificent ERECHTHEUM, containing three separate temples, one of Athena Polias (Πολιάς), or the "Protectress of the State," the Erechthæum proper, or sanctuary of Erechtheus, and the Pandrosium, or sanctuary of Pandrosos, the daughter of Cecrops. Between the Parthenon and Erechthæum was the colossal statue of Athena Promachos (Πρόμαχος), or the "Fighter in the Front," whose helmet and spear was the first object on the Acropolis visible from the sea.—2. TOPOGRAPHY OF THE LOWER CITY. The lower city was built in the plain round the Acropolis, but the plain also contained several hills, especially in the southwestern part.—WALLS. The ancient walls embraced a much greater circuit than the modern ones. On the west they included the hill of the Nymphs and the Pnyx, on the south they extended a little beyond the Ilissus, and on the east they crossed the Ilissus, near the Lyceum, which was outside the walls.—GATES. Their number is unknown, and the position of many of them is uncertain; but the following list contains the most important. On the west side were, 1. Dipyllum (Δίπυλον, more anciently Θρασία or Κεραμικαί), the most frequented gate of the city, leading from the inner Ceramicus to the outer Ceramicus, and to the Academy.—2. The Sacred Gate (αἱ Ἱεραὶ Πύλαι), where the sacred road to Eleusis began.—3. The Knight's Gate (αἱ Ἰππῶδες π.), probably between the hill of the Nymphs and the Pnyx.—4. The Piræean Gate (ἡ Πιραϊκὴ π.), between the Pnyx and the Museum, leading to the carriage road (ἀμάξιτος) between the Long Walls to the Piræus.—5. The Melitian Gate (αἱ Μελιτιδες π.), so called because it led to the demus Melite, within the city. On the south side, going from west to east,—6. The Gate of the Dead (αἱ Ἠρία π.), in the neighborhood of the Museum, placed by many authorities on the north side.—7. The Ionian Gate (αἱ Ἴωνία π.), near the Ilissus, where the road to Phalærum began. On the east side, going from south to north,—8. The Gate of Diochares (αἱ Διοχάρους π.), leading to the Lyceum.—9. The Diomæan Gate (ἡ Διομεία π.), leading to Cynosarges and the demus Diomea. On the north side,—10. The Acharnian Gate (αἱ Ἀχαρνικαί π.) leading to the demus Acharnæ.—CHIEF DISTRICTS. The inner Ceramicus (Κεραμικός), or "Potter's Quarter," in the west of the city, extending north as far as the gate Dipyllum, by which it was separated from the outer Ceramicus; the southern part of the inner Ceramicus contained the Agora (ἀγορά), or "market-place," the only one in the city (for there were not two market-places, as some suppose), lying southwest of the Acropolis, and between the Acropolis, the Areopagus, the Pnyx, and the Museum. The demus Melite, south of the inner Ceramicus, and perhaps embracing the hill of the Museum. The demus Scambonidæ, west of the inner Ceramicus, between the Pnyx and the Hill of the Nymphs. The Collytus, south of Melite. Coæ, a district south of Collytus and the Museum, along the Ilissus, in which were the graves of Cimon and Thucydides. Limna, a district east of Melite and Collytus, between the Acropolis and the Ilissus. Diomea, a district in the east of the city, near the gate of the same name and the Cynosarges. Agæa, a district south of Diomea.—HILLS. The Aræopagus (Ἀρείον πᾶγος or Ἄρειος πᾶγος), the "Hill of Ares" (Mars), west of the Acropolis, which gave its name to the celebrated council that held its sittings there (vid. Dict. of Ant. s. v.), was accessible on the south side by a flight of steps cut out of the rock. The Hill of the Nymphs, northwest of the Areopagus. The Pnyx (Πνύξ), a semicircular hill, southwest of the Areopagus, where the assemblies of the people were held in earlier times, for afterward the people usually met in the Theatre of Dionysus (Bacchus). (Vid. Dict. of Ant. p. 440, b, 2d ed.) The Museum, south of the Pnyx and the Areopagus, on which was the monument of Philopappus, and where the Macedonians built a fortress.—STREETS. Of these we have little information. We read of the Piræan Street, which led from the Piræan gate to the Agora; of the Street of the Hermæ, which ran along the Agora between the Stoa Basilæos and Stoa Poecilê; of the Street of the Tripods, on the east of the Acropolis, &c.—PUBLIC BUILDINGS. 1. Temples. Of these the most important was the Olympium (Ὀλυμπίειον), or Temple of the Olympian Zeus (Jupiter), southeast of the Acropolis, near the Ilissus and the fountain Callirrhœ, which was long unfinished, and was first completed by Hadrian. Theseum (Θησεῖον), or Temple of Theseus, on a hill north of the Areopagus, now converted into the Museum of Athens. The Temple of Ares (Mars), south of the Areopagus and west of the Acropolis. Metron (Μητρῶν), or temple of the mother of the gods, east of the Agora, and south of the Acropolis, near the Senate House, and the Odeum of Herodes Atticus. Besides these, there was a vast number of other temples in all parts of the city.—2. The Senate House (βουλευτήριον), at the south end of the Agora.—3. The Tholos (Θόλος), a round building close to the Senate House, which served as the new Prytanæum, in which the Prytanes took their meals and offered their sacrifices. (Vid. Dict. of Ant. s. v.)—4. The Prytanæum (Πρυτανεῖον), at the northeastern foot of the Acropolis, where the Prytanes used more anciently to take their meals, and where the laws of Solon were preserved.—5. Stoæ (στοαί), or Halls, supported by pillars, and used as places of resort in the heat of the day, of which there were several in Athens. (Vid. Dict. of Ant., p. 944, 2d ed.) In the Agora there were three: the Stoa Basilæos (στοὰ βασιλείος), the court of the King-Archon, on the west side of the Agora; the Stoa Poecilê (στοὰ ποικίλη), so called because it was adorned with fresco paintings of the battle of Marathon and other achievements by Polygnotus, Lycon, and others; and the Stoa Eleutherius (στοὰ ἐλευθέριος), or Hall of Zeus Eleutherius, both on the south side of the Agora.—6. Theatres. The Theatre of Dionysus (Bacchus), on the southeastern slope of the Acropolis, was the great theatre of the state (vid. Dict. of Ant. p. 1120, 2d ed.); besides this there were three Odæa (ὠδεία), for contests in vocal and instrumental music (vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v.), an ancient one near the fountain Callirrhœ, a second built by Pericles, close to the theatre of Dionysus (Bacchus), on the southeastern slope of the Acropolis, and a third built by Herodes Atticus, in honor of his wife Regilla, on the southwestern slope of the Acropolis, of which there are still considerable remains.—7. Stadium (τὸ Στάδιον), south of the Ilissus, in the district Agææ.—8. Monuments. The Monument of Andronicus, Cyrrhestes, formerly called the Tower of the Winds, an octagonal building north of the Acropolis, still extant, was an horologium. (Vid. Dict. of Ant., p. 616, 2d ed.) The Choragic Monument of Lycistrates, frequently but erroneously called the Lantern of Demosthenes, still extant, in the Street of the Tripods. The Monument of Harmodius and Aristogiton in the Agora, just before the ascent to the Acropolis.—SUBURBS. The Outer Ceramicus (ὁ ἔξω καλούμενος), northwest of the city, was the finest suburb of Athens; here were buried the Athenians who had fallen in war, and at the further end of it was the ACADEMIA, six stadia from the city. Cynosarges (τὸ Κυνόσαργες), east of the city, before the gate Diomea, a gymnasium sacred to Hercules, where Antisthenes, the founder of the Cynic school, taught. Lycæum (τὸ Λύκειον), southeast of the Cynosarges, a gymnasium sacred to Apollo Lycæus, where Aristotle and the Peripatetics taught.

ATHENÆ (Ἀθῆναι: now Atenah), a sea-port town of Pontus, named from its temple of Athena (Minerva).

ATHENÆUM (Ἀθῆναιον), in general a temple of Athena, or any place consecrated to the goddess. The name was especially given to a school founded by the Emperor Hadrian at Rome about A.D. 133, for the promotion of literary and scientific studies. It was in the neighborhood of the Forum, and at the foot of the Aventine Hill: it had a staff of professors paid by the government, and continued in repute till the fifth century of our era. (Vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v.)—ATHENÆUM was also the name of a town in Arcadia, not far from Megalopolis, and of a place in Athamania in Epirus.

ATHENÆUS (Ἀθῆναιος). 1. A contemporary of Archimedes, the author of an extant work Περὶ Μηχανημάτων (on warlike engines), addressed to Marcellus (probably the conqueror of Syracuse); printed in Thevenot's Mathematici Veteres, Paris, 1693.—2. A learned Greek grammarian, of Naucratis in Egypt, lived about A.D. 230, first at Alexandria and afterward at Rome. His extant work is entitled the Deipnosophistæ (Δειπνοσοφισταί), i. e., the Banquet of the Learned, in fifteen books, of which the first two books, and parts of the third, eleventh, and fifteenth, exist only in an Epitome. The work may be considered one of the earliest collections of what are called Ana, being an immense mass of anecdotes, extracts from the writings of poets historians, dramatists, philosophers, orators, and physicians, of facts in natural history, criticisms and discussions on almost every conceivable subject, especially on gastronomy. Athenæus represents himself as describing to his friend Timocrates a full account of the conversation at a banquet at Rome, at which Galen, the physician, and Ulpian, the jurist, were among the guests.

—Editions: By Casaubon, Geneva, 1597; by Schweighäuser, Argentorati, 1801–1807; and by W. Dindorf, Lips., 1827.—3. A celebrated physician, founder of the medical sect of the Pneumatici, was born at Attalia in Cilicia, and practiced at Rome about A.D. 50.

ATHENAGORAS (Ἀθηνάγορας), an Athenian philosopher, converted to the Christian religion in the second century of our era, is the author of two extant works, An Apology for Christians, addressed to the emperors M. Aurelius and his son Commodus, and a treatise in defence of the tenet of the resurrection.—Editions: By Fell, Oxon., 1682; Rechenberg, Lips., 1684–85; Dechair, Oxon., 1706.

ATHENĀIS (Ἀθηναῖς). Surnamed Philostorgus, wife of Ariobarzanes II, king of Cappadocia, and mother of Ariobarzanes III.—2. Daughter of Leontius, afterward named EUCOIA.

ATHĒNION (Ἀθηνίων). 1. A Cilician, one of the commanders of the slaves in the second servile war in Sicily, maintained his ground for some time successfully, and defeated L. Licinius Lucullus, but was at length conquered and killed in B.C. 101 by the consul M. Aquilius.—[2. A comic poet of Athens, of whose plays only one fragment has been preserved; it is printed in Meineke's Fragmenta Comic. Græc., vol. ii, p. 165–6, edit. minor.—3. A painter, born at Marone in Thrace. He was a pupil of Glaucion of Corinth, and gave promise of high excellence, but died young.]

ATHĒNŌDORUS (Ἀθηνόδωρος). 1. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher surnamed Cordylis, was the keeper of the library at Pergamus, and afterward removed to Rome, where he lived with M. Cato, at whose house he died.—2. Of Tarsus, a Stoic philosopher, surnamed Cananites, from Cana in Cilicia, the birth-place of his father, whose name was Sandon. He was a pupil of Posidonius at Rhodes, and afterward taught at Apollonia in Epirus, where the young Octavius subsequently the Emperor Augustus) was one of his disciples. He accompanied the latter to Rome, and became one of his intimate friends and advisers. In his old age he returned to Tarsus, where he died at the age of eighty-two. He was the author of several works, which are not extant.—3. A sculptor, the son and pupil of Agesander of Rhodes, whom he assisted in executing the group of Laocoon. Vid. AGESANDER.

ATHĒSIS (now Adige or Etsch), rises in the Rætian Alps, receives the ATĀGIS (now Eisach), flows through Upper Italy past Verona, and falls into the Adriatic by many mouths.

ATHMŌNE (Ἀθμονή, also Ἀθμονία and Ἀθμονον: Ἀθμονεύς, fem. Ἀθμονίς), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Cecropis, afterward to the tribe Attalis.

ATHŌS (Ἄθος, also Ἄθων: Ἀθώτης: now Haghion Oros, Monte Santo, i. e., Holy Mountain), the mountainous peninsula, also called Acte, which projects from Chalcidice in Macedonia. At the extremity of the peninsula the mountain rises abruptly from the sea to a height of 6349 feet: there is no anchorage for ships at its base, and the voyage around it was so dreaded by mariners that Xerxes had a canal cut through the isthmus, which connects the peninsula with the main land, to afford a passage to his fleet.

Vid. ACANTHUS. The isthmus is about one and a half miles across; and there are most distinct traces of the canal to be seen in the present day; so that we must not imitate the scepticism of Juvenal (x., 174), and of many modern writers, who refused to believe that the canal was ever cut. The peninsula contained several flourishing cities in antiquity, and is now studded with numerous monasteries, cloisters, and chapels, whence it derives its modern name. In these monasteries some valuable MSS. of ancient authors have been discovered.

ATHRĪBIS (Ἀθριβίς), a city in the Delta of Egypt; capital of the Nomos Athribites.

[ATHRULLA (Ἀθρουλλά: now Jathrib or Medina), a city of Arabia Felix, conquered by Ælius Gallus.]

ATĪA, mother of AUGUSTUS.

ATĪLĪA or ATĪLLĪA GENS, the principal members of which are given under their surnames, CALATINUS, REGULUS, and SERRANUS.

ATĪLICĪNUS, a Roman jurist, who probably lived about A.D. 50, is referred to in the Digest.

ATĪLIUS. 1. L., one of the earliest of the Roman jurists who gave public instruction in law, probably lived about B.C. 100. He wrote commentaries on the laws of the Twelve Tables.—2. M., one of the early Roman poets, wrote both tragedies and comedies, but apparently a greater number of the latter than of the former.

ATĪNA (Atinas, -atis; now Atina), a town of the Volsci in Latium, afterward a Roman colony.

ATĪNTĀNES (Ἀτιντάνες), an Epirot people in Illyria, on the borders of Macedonia: their country, Atintania, was reckoned part of Macedonia.

ATĪUS VARUS. Vid. VARUS.

ATLANTĪCUM MĀRE. Vid. OCEANUS.

ATLANTIS (Ἀτλαντῖς, sc. νῆσος), according to an ancient tradition, a great island west of the Pillars of Hercules in the Ocean, opposite Mount Atlas: it possessed a numerous population, and was adorned with every beauty; its powerful princes invaded Africa and Europe, but were defeated by the Athenians and their allies: its inhabitants afterward became wicked and impious, and the island was in consequence swallowed up in the ocean in a day and a night. This legend is given by Plato in the Timæus and is said to have been related to Solon by the Egyptian priests. The Canary Islands, or the Azores, which perhaps were visited by the Phœnicians, may have given rise to the legend; but some modern writers regard it as indicative of a vague belief in antiquity in the existence of the western hemisphere.

ATLAS (Ἄτλας), son of Iapetus and Clymene, and brother of Prometheus and Epimetheus. He made war with the other Titans upon Jupiter (Zeus), and being conquered, was condemned to bear heaven on his head and hands: according to Homer, Atlas bears the long columns which keep asunder heaven and earth. The myth seems to have arisen from the idea that lofty mountains support the heavens. Later traditions distort the original idea still more, by making Atlas a man who was metamorphosed into a mountain. Thus Ovid (Mel., iv., 626, seq.) relates that Perseus came to Atlas and asked for shelter, which was refused, whereupon Perseus, by means of the head of Medusa, changed him into Mount Atlas, on which rested heaven with all its stars. Others go still further, and represent Atlas as a powerful king, who possessed great knowledge of the courses of the stars, and who was the first who taught men that heaven had the form of a globe. Hence the expression that heaven rested on his shoulders was regarded as a merely figurative mode of speaking. At first, the story of Atlas referred to one mountain only, which was believed to exist on the extreme boundary of the earth; but, as geographical knowledge extended, the name of Atlas was transferred to other places, and thus we read of a Mauretanian, Italian, Arcadian, and even of a Caucasian Atlas. The common opinion, however, was, that the heaven-bearing Atlas was in the northwest of Africa. See below. Atlas was the father of the Pleiades by Pleione or by Hesperis; of the Hyades and Hesperides by Æthra; and of Cœnomaus and Maia by Sterope. Dione and Calypso, Hyas and Hesperus, are likewise called his children. Atlantiades, a descendant of Atlas, especially Mercury, his grandson by Maia (comp. Mercuri facunde nepos Atlantis, Hor., Carm., i., 10), and Hermaphroditus, son of Mercury. Atlantias and Atlantis, a female descendant of Atlas, especially the Pleiads and Hyads.

ATLAS MONS (Ἀτλας: now Atlas), was the general name of the great mountain range which covers the surface of northern Africa, between the Mediterranean and Great Desert (now Sahara), on the north and south, and the Atlantic and the Lesser Syrtis on the west and east; the mountain chains southeast of the Lesser Syrtis, though connected with the Atlas, do not properly belong to it, and were called by other names. The northern and southern ranges of this system were distinguished by the names of ATLAS MINOR and ATLAS MAJOR, and a distinction was made between the three regions into which they divided the country. Vid. AFRICA, p. 28, a.

ATOSSA (Ἀτσοσα), daughter of Cyrus, and wife successively of her brother Cambyses, of Smerdis the Magian, and of Darius Hystaspis, over whom she possessed great influence. She bore Darius four sons, Xerxes, Masistes, Achæmenes, and Hystaspes.

ATREŪ OF HATRA (Ἄτραϊ, τὸ Ἄτρα: Ἀτρήνως, Atreus: now Hadr, southwest of Mosul), a strongly-fortified city on a high mountain in Mesopotamia, inhabited by people of the Arab race.

SEMPRONIUS, ATRATIŪS. 1. A., consul B.C. 497 and 491.—2. L., consul 444 and censor 443.—3. C., consul 423, fought unsuccessfully against the Volscians, and was in consequence condemned to pay a heavy fine.—4. L., accused Marcus Cælius Rufus, whom Cicero defended, 57 B.C.

ATRAK (Ἄτραξ: Ἀτράκιος). 1. A town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, inhabited by the Perphæbi, so called from the mythical Atrak, son of Penëus and Bura, and father of Hippodamia and Cœnis. [It was famed for its green marble, known by the name of Atracium Marmor.—2. A small river of Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, a tributary of the Penëus.]

ATREBATES, a people in Gallia Belgica, in the modern Artois, which is a corruption of their name. In Cæsar's time (B.C. 57) they numbered 15,000 warriors; their capital was NEME-

TOCENNA. Part of them crossed over to Britain, where they dwelt in the upper valley of the Thames, Oxfordshire and Berkshire.

ATREUS (Ἀτρεΐς), son of Pelops and Hippodamia, grandson of Tantalus, and brother of Thyestes and Nicippe. Vid. PELOPS. He was first married to Cleola, by whom he became the father of Plisthenes; then to Aërope, the widow of his son Plisthenes, who was the mother of Agamemnon, Menelaus, and Anaxibia, either by Plisthenes or by Atreus (vid. AGAMEMNON); and lastly to Pelopia, the daughter of his brother Thyestes. The tragic fate of the house of Tantalus afforded ample materials to the tragic poets of Greece, who relate the details in various ways. In consequence of the murder of their half-brother Chrysippus, Atreus and Thyestes were obliged to take to flight; they were hospitably received at Mycenæ; and, after the death of Eurystheus, Atreus became king of Mycenæ. Thyestes seduced Aërope, the wife of Atreus, and was, in consequence, banished by his brother: from his place of exile he sent Plisthenes, the son of Atreus, whom he had brought up as his own child, in order to slay Atreus; but Plisthenes fell by the hands of Atreus, who did not know that he was his own son. In order to take revenge, Atreus, pretending to be reconciled to Thyestes, recalled him to Mycenæ, killed his two sons, and placed their flesh before their father at a banquet, who unwittingly partook of the horrid meal. Thyestes fled with horror, and the gods cursed Atreus and his house. The kingdom of Atreus was now visited by famine, and the oracle advised Atreus to call back Thyestes. Atreus, who went out in search of him, came to King Thesprotus, and as he did not find him there, he married his third wife, Pelopia, the daughter of Thyestes, whom Atreus believed to be a daughter of Thesprotus. Pelopia was at the time with child by her own father. This child, Ægisthus, afterward slew Atreus, because the latter had commanded him to slay his own father Thyestes. Vid. ÆGISTHUS. The treasury of Atreus and his sons at Mycenæ, which is mentioned by Pausanias, is believed by some to exist still; but the ruins which remain are above ground, whereas Pausanias speaks of the building as under ground.

ATRIA. Vid. ADRIA.

ATREIDES (Ἀτρείδης), a descendant of Atreus, especially Agamemnon and Menelaus.

ATROPATĒNE (Ἀτροπατηνή), or Media Atropatia (Ἀτροπατία or -ορ Μηδία), the northwestern part of Media, adjacent to Armenia, named after Atropatēs, a native of the country, who, having been made its governor by Alexander, founded there a kingdom, which long remained independent alike of the Seleucidæ, the Parthians, and the Romans, but was at last subdued by the Parthians.

ATROPĀTES (Ἀτροπάτης), a Persian satrap, fought at the battle of Gaugamela, B.C. 331, and after the death of Darius was made satrap of Media by Alexander. His daughter was married to Perdiccas in 324; and he received from his father-in-law, after Alexander's death, the province of the Greater Media. In the northwest of the country, called after him, Media Atropatène, he established an independent kingdom, which continued to exist down to the time of the Emperor Augustus.

ΑΤΡΟΠΟΣ. Vid. ΜΟΙΡÆ.

ΑΤΤΑ, T. QUINTIUS, a Roman comic poet, died B.C. 78. His surname Atta was given him from a defect in his feet, to which circumstance Horace probably alludes (Ep., ii, 1, 79). His plays were very popular, and were acted even in the time of Augustus. [The fragments of Atta are collected by Bothe, Poet. Scenic. Lat., vol. v., P. ii., p. 97-102; cf. Weichert, Poet. Lat. Reliquiæ, p. 345.]

ΑΤΤΑΓΙΝΟΣ (Ατταγίνος), son of Phrynon, a Theban, betrayed Thebes to Xerxes, B.C. 480. After the battle of Plataeæ (479) the other Greeks required Attaginus to be delivered up to them, but he made his escape.

ΑΤΤΑΛΙΑ (Ἀττάλεια, Ἀτταλειώτης or -ατῆς).—1. A city of Lydia, formerly called Agroira (Ἀγρόειρα).—2. (Now Laara), a city on the coast of Pamphylia, near the mouth of the River Catarrhactes, founded by Attalus II. Philadelphus, and subdued by the Romans under P. Servilius Isauricus.

ΑΤΤΑΛΟΣ (Ἀτταλος). 1. A Macedonian, uncle of Cleopatra, whom Philip married in B.C. 337. At the nuptials of his niece, Attalus offered an insult to Alexander, and, on the accession of the latter, was put to death by his order in Asia Minor, whither Philip had previously sent him to secure the Greek cities to his cause.—2. Son of Andromenes the Stymphæan, and one of Alexander's officers. After the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), he served under Perdicas, whose sister, Atalante, he had married; and after the death of Perdicas (321), he joined Alceas, the brother of Perdicas; but their united forces were defeated in Persida by Antigonus in 320.—3. Kings of Pergamus.—(I.) Son of Attalus, a brother of Philetarus, succeeded his cousin, Eumenes I., and reigned B.C. 241-197. He took part with the Romans against Philip and the Achæans. He was a wise and just prince, and was distinguished by his patronage of literature.—(II.) Surnamed Philadelphus, second son of Attalus I., succeeded his brother Eumenes II., and reigned 159-138. Like his father, he was an ally of the Romans, and he also encouraged the arts and sciences.—(III.) Surnamed Philometor, son of Eumenes II., and Stratouces, succeeded his uncle Attalus II., and reigned 138-133. He is known to us chiefly for the extravagance of his conduct and the murder of his relations and friends. In his will he made the Romans his heirs; but his kingdom was claimed by Aristonicus. Vid. ΑΡΙΣΤΟΝΙΚΟΣ.—4. Roman emperor of the West, was raised to the throne by Alaric, but was deposed by the latter, after a reign of one year (A.D. 409, 410), on account of his acting without Alaric's advice.—5. A Stoic philosopher in the reign of Tiberius, was one of the teachers of the philosopher Seneca, who speaks of him in the highest terms.

ΑΤΤΕΓΟΥΑ, a town in Hispania Bætica, of uncertain site.

ΑΤΤΗΣ or ΑΤΤΙΣ (Ἀτθίς or Ἀττις), daughter of Cranaus, from whom Attica was believed to have derived its name. The two birds into which Philomele and her sister Procne were metamorphosed were likewise called Attis.

ΑΤΤΙΚΑ (ἡ Ἀττικὴ sc. γῆ), a division of Greece, has the form of a triangle, two sides of which are washed by the Ægean Sea, while the third is separated from Bœotia on the north by the mountains Oitheron and Parnes. Megaris, which bounds it on the northwest, was formerly a part of Attica. In ancient times it was called Acte and Actice (Ἀκτῆ and Ἀκτικῆ), or the "coastland" (vid. ΑΚΤΕ), from which the later form Attica is said to have been derived; but, according to traditions, it derived its name from Atthis, the daughter of the mythical king Cranaus; and it is not impossible that Attice may contain the root Att or Atth, which we find in Atthis and Athena. Attica is divided by many ancient writers into three districts. 1. The Highlands (ἡ διαρκία, also ὄρεινῆ Ἀττικῆ), the northeast of the country, containing the range of Parnes and extending south to the Promontory Cynosura; the only level part of this district was the small plain of Marathon opening to the sea. 2. The Plain (ἡ πεδιάς, τὸ πεδῖον), the northwest of the country, included both the plain round Athens and the plain round Eleusis, and extended south to the Promontory Zoster. 3. The Sea-coast District (ἡ παραλία), the southern part of the country, terminating in the Promontory Sunium. Besides these three divisions we also read of a fourth. The Midland District (μεσόγαια), still called Mesogia, an undulating plain in the middle of the country, bounded by Mount Pentelieus on the north, Mount Hymettus on the west, and the sea on the east. The soil of Attica is not very fertile; the greater part of it is not adapted for growing corn; but it produces olives, figs, and grapes, especially the two former, in great perfection. The country is dry; the chief river is the Cephissus, which rises in Parnes and flows through the Athenian plain. The abundance of wild flowers in the country made the honey of Mount Hymettus very celebrated in antiquity. Excellent marble was obtained from the quarries of Pentelieus, northeast of Athens, and a considerable supply of silver from the mines of Laurium, near Sunium. The area of Attica, including the island of Salamis, which belonged to it, contained between seven hundred and eight hundred square miles; and its population in its flourishing period was probably about five hundred thousand, of which nearly four fifths were slaves. Attica is said to have been originally inhabited by Pelasgians. Its most ancient political division was into twelve independent states, attributed to CECROPS, who, according to some legends, came from Egypt. Subsequently Ion, the grandson of Hellen, divided the people into four tribes, Geleontes, Hoplites, Argades and Ægicorees; and Theseus, who united the twelve independent states of Attica into one political body, and made Athens the capital, again divided the nation into three classes, the Eupatridæ, Geomori, and Demiurgi. Clisthenes (B.C. 510) abolished the old tribes and created ten new ones, according to a geographical division: these tribes were subdivided into one hundred and seventy-four demi or townships. (For details, vid. Dict. of Ant., art. TRIBUS).

ΑΤΤΙΚΟΣ ΗΡΟΔΕΣ, TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS, a celebrated Greek rhetorician, born about A.D. 104, at Marathon in Attica. He taught rhetoric both at Athens and at Rome, and his school was frequented by the most distinguished men of the age. The future emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus were among his pupils, and Antoninus Pius raised him to the consulship in 143. He possessed immense wealth, a great part of which he spent in embellishing Athens. He died at the age of seventy-six, in 180. He wrote numerous works, none of which have come down to us, with the exception of an oration, entitled Περὶ πολιτείας, the genuineness of which, however, is very doubtful. It is printed in the collections of the Greek orators, and by Fiorillo, in Herodis Attici quæ supersunt, Lips., 1801.

ATTICUS, T. ΡΟΜΒΟΥΝΙΟΣ, a Roman eques, born at Rome B.C. 109. His proper name, after his adoption by Q. Cæcilius, the brother of his mother, was Q. Cæcilius Pomponianus Atticus. His surname, Atticus, was given him on account of his long residence in Athens and his intimate acquaintance with the Greek language and literature. He was educated along with L. Torquatus, the younger C. Marius, and M. Cicero. Soon after the breaking out of the civil war between Marius and Sulla, he resolved to take no part in the contest, and accordingly removed to Athens. During the remainder of his life he kept aloof from all political affairs, and thus lived on the most intimate terms with the most distinguished men of all parties. He was equally the friend of Cæsar and Pompey, of Brutus and Cassius, of Antony and Augustus: but his most intimate friend was Cicero, whose correspondence with him, beginning in 68 and continued down to Cicero's death, is one of the most valuable remains of antiquity. He purchased an estate at Buthrotum in Epirus, in which place, as well as at Athens and Rome, he spent the greater part of his time, engaged in literary pursuits and commercial undertakings. He died in 32, at the age of 77, of voluntary starvation, when he found that he was attacked by an incurable illness. His wife Pilia, to whom he was married in 56, when he was fifty-three years of age, bore him only one child, a daughter, Pomponia or Cæcilia, whom Cicero sometimes calls Attica and Atticula. She was married in the life-time of her father to M. Vipstanus Agrippa. The sister of Atticus, Pomponia, was married to Q. Cicero, the brother of the orator. The life of Atticus by Cornelius Nepos is to be regarded rather as a panegyric upon an intimate friend, than, strictly speaking, a biography. In philosophy Atticus belonged to the Epicurean sect. He was thoroughly acquainted with the whole circle of Greek and Roman literature. So high an opinion was entertained of his taste and critical acumen, that many of his friends, especially Cicero, were accustomed to send him their works for revision and correction. None of his own writings have come down to us.

ATTILA (Ἀττίλας or Ἀττίλας, German Etzel, Hungarian Eittele), king of the Huns, attained in A.D. 434, with his brother Bleda (in German Blödel), to the sovereignty of all the northern tribes between the frontier of Gaul and the frontier of China, and to the command of an army of at least five hundred thousand barbarians. He gradually concentrated upon himself the awe and fear of the whole ancient world, which ultimately expressed itself by affixing to his name the well-known epithet of "the Scourge of God." His career divides itself into two parts. The first (A.D. 445-450) consists of the ravage of the Eastern empire between the Euxine and the Adriatic and the negotiations with Theodosius II., which followed upon it. They were ended by a treaty, which ceded to Attila a large territory south of the Danube and an annual tribute. The second part of his career was the invasion of the Western empire (450-452). He crossed the Rhine at Strassburg, but was defeated at Chalons by Aëtius, and Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, in 451. He then crossed the Alps, and took Aquileia in 452, after a siege of three months, but he did not attack Rome, in consequence, it is said, of his interview with Pope Leo the Great. He recrossed the Alps toward the end of the year, and died in 453, on the night of his marriage with a beautiful girl, variously named Hilda, Ildico, Myeolth, by the bursting of a blood-vessel. In person Attila was, like the Mongolian race in general, a short, thick-set man, of stately gait, with a large head, dark complexion, flat nose, thin beard, and bald with the exception of a few white hairs, his eyes small, but of great brilliancy and quickness.

ΑΤΥΡΟΣ (now Adour), a river in Aquitania, rises in the Pyrenees, and flows through the territory of the Tarbelli into the ocean.

ΑΤΥΜΝΙΟΣ (Ἀτυμνιος or Ἀτυμνος). 1. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Cassiopaëa, a beautiful boy, beloved by Sarpedon. Others call him son of Phœnix.—[2. Sou of the Lycian king Amisodarus, came as an ally of the Trojans to the war, was slain by Nestor.]

ΑΤΥΣ, ΑΤΤΥΣ, ΑΤΤΕΣ, ΑΤΤΙΣ, OR ΑΤΤΙΝ (Ἄτυς, Ἄττυς, Ἄττης, Ἄττις, or Ἄττιν). 1. Son of Nana, and a beautiful shepherd of the Phrygian town Celænæ. He was beloved by Cybele, but as he proved unfaithful to her, he was thrown by her into a state of madness, in which he unmanned himself. Cybele thereupon changed him into a fir-tree, which henceforth became sacred to her, and she commanded that, in future, her priests should be eunuchs. Such is the account in Ovid (Fast., iv., 221), but his story is related differently by other writers. Atys was worshipped in the temples of Cybele in common with this goddess. His worship appears to have been introduced into Greece at a comparatively late period. It is probable that the mythus of Atys represents the twofold character of nature, the male and female concentrated in one.—2. Son of Maues, king of the Mæouians, from whose son Lydus, his son and successor, the Mæouians were afterward called Lydians.—3. A Latin chief, sou of Alba, and father of Capys, from whom the Atia Gens derived its origin, and from whom Augustus was believed to be descended on his mother's side.—4. Sou of Cræsus, slain by ADRASTUS.

AUFIDENA (Aufidēnas, -atis; now Alfadena), a town in Samnium, on the River Sagrus.

Ital., x, 171) into the Adriatic. Venusia, the birth-place of Horace, was on the Aufidus.

AUGURUS. Vid. ACBARUS.

AUGE or AUGIA (Ἀύγη or Ἀβυγία), daughter of Aleus and Neera, was a priestess of Athena (Minerva), and mother by Hercules of TELEPHUS. She afterward married Teuthras, king of the Mysians.

AUGĒAS or AUGĪAS (Ἀβυγίας or Ἀβυγίας), son of Phorbas or Helios (the Sun), and king of the Epēans in Elis. He had a herd of three thousand oxen, whose stalls had not been cleaned for thirty years. It was one of the labors imposed upon Hercules by Eurystheus to cleanse these stalls in one day. As a reward the hero was to receive the tenth part of the oxen; but when he had accomplished his task by leading the rivers Alpheus and Peneus through the stables, Augēas refused to keep his promise. Hercules thereupon killed him and his sons, with the exception of Phyleus, who was placed on the throne of his father. Another tradition represents Augēas as dying a natural death at an advanced age, and as receiving heroic honors from Oxyllus.

[AUGĒAS (Ἀβυγίας), a Grecian comic poet of the middle comedy at Athens: of his plays only a few titles remain. For the Cyclic poet whose name is sometimes thus given, vid. AGRAS.]

[AUGĪA (Ἀβυγία), name of two cities mentioned in the Iliad; one was in Laconia, the other in Locris.]

AUGILA (τὰ Ἀβυγίλα: now Aujilah), an oasis in the Great Desert of Africa, about three and a half degrees south of Cyrene, and ten days' journey west of the Oasis of Ammon, abounding in date palms, to gather the fruit of which a tribe of the Nasamones, called Augīlās (Ἀβυγίλαι), resorted to the Oasis, which at other times was uninhabited.

AUGURINUS, GENUCIUS. 1. T., consul B.C. 451, and a member of the first decemvirate in the same year.—2. M., brother of the preceding, consul 445.

AUGURINUS, MINUCIUS. 1. M., consul B.C. 497 and 491. He took an active part in the defence of Coriolanus, who was brought to trial in 491, but was unable to obtain his acquittal.—2. L., consul 458, carried on war against the Equians, and was surrounded by the enemy on Mount Algidus, but was delivered by the dictator Cincinnatus.—3. L., was appointed prefect of the corn-market (praefectus annonae) 439, as the people were suffering from grievous famine. The ferment occasioned by the assassination of Sp. Maelius in this year was appeased by Augustinus, who is said to have gone over to the plebs from the patricians, and to have been chosen by the tribunes one of their body. Augustinus lowered the price of corn in three market days, fixing as the maximum an as for a modius. The people, in their gratitude, presented him with an ox having its horns gilt, and erected a statue to his honor outside the Porta Trigemina, for which every body subscribed an ounce of brass.

AUGUSTA, the name of several towns founded or colonized by Augustus. 1. A. ASTURICA. Vid. ASTURES.—2. A. EMERITA (now Merida), in Lusitania, on the Anas (now Guadiana), colonized by Augustus with the veterans (emerit) of the fifth and tenth legions, was a place of considerable importance.—3. A. FIRMA. Vid. ASTIGI.—4. A. PRAETORIA (now Aosta [contracted from Augusta], a town of the Salassi in Upper Italy, at the foot of the Graian and Pennine Alps, colonized by Augustus with soldiers of the praetorian cohorts. The modern town still contains many Roman remains, the most important of which are the town gates and a triumphal arch.—5. A. RAURACORUM (now Augst), the capital of the Rauraci, colonized by Munatius Plancus under Augustus, was on the left of the Rhine near the modern Basle: the ruins of a Roman amphitheatre are still to be seen.—6. A. SUSSONUM (now Soissons), the capital of the Suesones in Gallia Belgica, probably the Noviodunum of Caesar.—7. A. TAURINORUM (now Turin), more anciently called Taurasia, the capital of the Taurini on the Po, was an important town in the time of Hannibal, and was colonized by Augustus.—8. A. TREVIRORUM. Vid. TREVIRI.—9. TRICASTINORUM (now Aouste), the capital of the Tricastini in Gallia Narbonensis.—10. A. VINDĒLICORUM (now Augsburg), capital of Vindelicia or Rætia Secunda on the Lieus (now Lech), colonized by Drusus under Augustus, after the conquest of Rætia, about B.C. 14.

AUGUSTINUS, AURELIUS, usually called ST. AUGUSTINE, the most illustrious of the Latin fathers, was born A.D. 354, at Tagaste, an inland town in Numidia. His mother was a sincere Christian, who exerted herself in training up her son in the practice of piety, but for a long time without effect. He studied rhetoric at Carthage, where he embraced the Manichæan heresy, to which he adhered for nine years. He afterward became a teacher of rhetoric at Carthage, but in 383 he went to Italy, and in Milan was led by the preaching and conversation of Ambrose to abandon his Manichæan errors and embrace Christianity. He was baptized by Ambrose in 387, and then returned to Africa, where he passed the next three years in seclusion, devoting himself to religious exercises. In 391 he was ordained a priest by Valerius, then bishop of Hippo, and in 395 he was consecrated bishop of Hippo. His history, from the time of his elevation to the see of Hippo, is so closely implicated with the Donatistic and Pelagian controversy, that it would be impracticable to pursue its details within our limits. He died at Hippo in 430, when the city was besieged by the Vandals. Of his numerous works the two most interesting are, 1. His Confessions, in thirteen books, written in 397, con-of Augustus, under the command of Marcus Agrippa, gained a decisive victory over that of Pompey, who abandoned Sicily and fled to Asia. Lepidus, who had landed in Sicily to support Augustus, was impatient of the subordinate part which he had hitherto played, and claimed the island for himself; but he was easily subdued by Augustus, stripped of his power, and sent to Rome, where he resided for the remainder of his life, being allowed to retain the dignity of pontifex maximus. In 35 and 34 Augustus was engaged in war with the Illyrians and Dalmatians. Meantime, Antony had repudiated Octavia, and had alienated the minds of the Roman people by his arbitrary and arrogant proceedings in the East. Augustus found that the Romans were quite prepared to desert his rival, and accordingly, in 32, the senate declared war against Cleopatra, for Antony was looked upon only as her infatuated slave. The remainder of the year was occupied by preparations for war on both sides. In the spring of 31, Augustus passed over to Epirus, and in September in the same year his fleet gained a brilliant victory over Antony's near the promontory of Actium in Acarnania. In the following year (30) Augustus sailed to Egypt. Antony and Cleopatra, who had escaped in safety from Actium, put an end to their lives to avoid falling into the hands of the conqueror; and Augustus now became the undisputed master of the Roman world. He returned to Rome in 29, and after restoring order in all parts of the government, he proposed in the senate to lay down his powers, but pretended to be prevailed upon to remain at the head of affairs for ten years longer. This plan was afterward repeated several times, and he apparently allowed himself to be always persuaded to retain his power either for ten or five years more. He declined all honors and distinctions which were calculated to remind the Romans of kingly power; but he accepted in 33 the imperium proconsulare and the tribunitia potestas for life, by which his inviolability was legally established, while by the imperium proconsulare he became the highest authority in all the Roman provinces. On the death of Lepidus in 12 he became pontifex maximus; but, though he had thus united in his own person all the great offices of state, yet he was too prudent to show to the Romans by any display of authority that he was the sole master. He had no ministers, in our sense of the word; but on state matters, which he did not choose to be discussed in public, he consulted his personal friends, C. Cilnius Mæcenas, M. Vipsanius Agrippa, M. Valerius Messalla Corvinus, and Asinius Pollio. The people retained their republican privileges, though they were mere forms: they still met in their assemblies, and elected consuls and other magistrates, but only such persons were elected as had been proposed or recommended by the emperor. The almost uninterrupted festivities, games, distributions of corn, and the like, made the people forget the substance of their republican freedom, and obey contentedly their new ruler. The wars of Augustus were not aggressive, but were chiefly undertaken to protect the frontiers of the Roman dominions. Most of them were carried on by his relations and friends, but he conducted some of them in person. Thus, in 27, he attacked the warlike Cantabri and Astures in Spain, whose subjugation, however, was not completed till 19, by Agrippa. In 21 Augustus travelled through Sicily and Greece, and spent the winter following at Samos. Next year (20) he went to Syria, where he received from Phraates, the Parthian monarch, the standards and prisoners which had been taken from Crassus and Antony. In 16 the Romans suffered a defeat on the Lower Rhine by some German tribes; whereupon Augustus went himself to Gaul, and spent four years there, to regulate the government of that province, and to make the necessary preparations for defending it against the Germans. In 9 he again went to Gaul, where he received German ambassadors, who sued for peace; and from this time forward, he does not appear to have again taken any active part in the wars that were carried on. Those in Germany were the most formidable, and lasted longer than the reign of Augustus. He died at Nola, on the 29th of August, A.D. 14, at the age of seventy-six. Augustus was first married, though only nominally, to Clodia, a daughter of Clodius and Fulvia. His second wife, Scribonia, bore him his only daughter, Julia. His third wife was Livia Drusilla, the wife of Tiberius Nero. Augustus had at first fixed on M. Marcellus as his successor, the son of his sister Octavia, who was married to his daughter Julia. After his death Julia was married to Agrippa, and her two sons, Caius and Lucius Cæsar, were now destined by Augustus as his successors. On the death of these two youths, Augustus was persuaded to adopt Tiberius, the son of Livia, and to make him his colleague and successor. Vid. TIBERIUS.

AULERICI, a powerful Gallic people dwelling between the Sequana (now Seine) and the Liger (now Loire), were divided into three great tribes. 1. A. EBURONICES, near the coast, on the left bank of the Seine, in the modern Normandy: their capital was Mediolanum, afterward called Eburonices (now Evreux).—2. A. CENOMANI, southwest of the preceding, near the Liger; their capital was Subdinnum (now le Mans). At an early period some of the Cenomani crossed the Alps and settled in Upper Italy.—3. A. BRANNOVICES, east of the Cenomani, near the Ædui, whose clients they were. The Diablintes mentioned by Cæsar are said by Ptolemy to have been likewise a branch of the Auleri.

[AULESTES, a Tyrrhenian, an ally of Æneas, slain by Messapus.]

AULIS (Ἀλίς), a harbor in Bœotia, on the Euxine, where the Greek fleet assembled before sailing against Troy: it had a temple of Artemis (Diana).

AULON (Ἀλών: Ἀλωνίτης). 1. A district and town on the borders of Elis and Messenia, with a temple of Æsculapius, who hence had the surname Aulonius.—2. A town in Chalcidice in Macedonia, on the Strymonic Gulf.—3. (Now Melone), a fertile valley near Tarentum, celebrated for its wine (amicus Aulon fertili Baccho; Hor., Carm., ii., 6, 18.)—4. REGIUS (Ἀλών ὁ βασιλικός), a valley of Syria, not far from Damascus.—5. The valley of the Jordan, extending from the Sea of Galilee, and including the Dead Sea the southern part of it is the fertile plain of Jericho.—6. Cilicius, the strait between Cyprus and the coast of Cilicia.]

[AULUS GELLIUS. Vid. GELLIUS.]

AURANĪTIS (Αἰρανίτις: now Hauran), a district south of Damascus and east of Ituræa and Batauræa, on the eastern side of the Jordan, belonging either to Palestine or to Arabia.

AURĒA CHERSONĒSUS (ἡ Χόνσῃ Χερσόνησος), the name given by the late geographers to the Malay Peninsula, [or, as others maintain, to the southern part of Pegu.] They also mention an Aurca Regio beyond the Ganges, which is supposed to be the country round Ava.

AURĒLIA, the wife of C. Julius Cæsar, by whom she became the mother of C. Julius Cæsar, the dictator, and of two daughters. She carefully watched over the education of her children, and always took a lively interest in the success of her son. She died in B.C. 54, while Cæsar was in Gaul.

AURĒLIA GENS, plebeian, of which the most important members are given under their family names, COTTA, ORESTES, and SCAURUS.

AURĒLIA ORESTILLA, a beautiful but profligate woman, whom Catiline married. As Aurelia at first refused to marry him because he had a grown-up son by a former marriage, Catiline is said to have killed his own offspring in order to remove this impediment to their union.

AURĒLIA VIA, the great coast road from Rome to Transalpine Gaul, at first extended no further than Pisæ, but was afterward continued along the coast to Genoa and Forum Julii in Gaul.

AURELIĀN. Vid. GENABUM.

AURĒLIĀNUS, Roman emperor, A.D. 270–275, was born about A.D. 212, at Sirmium, in Pannonia. He entered the army as a common soldier, and by his extraordinary bravery was raised to offices of trust and honor by Valerian and Claudius II. On the death of the latter, he was elected emperor by the legions at Sirmium. His reign presents a succession of brilliant exploits, which restored for a while their ancient lustre to the arms of Rome. He first defeated the Goths and Vandals, who had crossed the Danube, and were ravaging Pannonia. He next gained a great victory over the Alemanii and other German tribes: but they succeeded, notwithstanding, in crossing the Alps. Near Placentia they defeated the Romans, but were eventually overcome by Aurelian in two decisive engagements in Ūmbria. After crushing a formidable conspiracy at Rome, Aurelian next turned his arms against Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, whom he defeated, took prisoner, and carried with him to Rome. Vid. ZENOBLA. On his return he marched to Alexandria and put Firmus to death, who had assumed the title of emperor. He then proceeded to the West, where Gaul, Britain, and Spain were still in the hands of Tetricus, who had been declared emperor a short time before the death of Gallienus. Tetricus surrendered to Aurelian in a battle fought near Chalons. Vid. TETRICUS. The emperor now devoted his attention to domestic improvements and reforms. Many works of public utility were commenced: the most important of all was the erection of a new line of strongly fortified walls, embracing a much more ample circuit than the old ones, which had long since fallen into ruin; but this vast plan was not completed until the reign of Probus. After a short residence in the city, Aurelian visited the provinces on the Danube. He now entirely abandoned Dacia, which had been first conquered by Trajan, and made the southern bank of the Danube, as in the time of Augustus, the boundary of the empire. A large force was now collected in Thrace in preparation for an expedition against the Persians; but while the emperor was on the march between Heraclæa and Byzantium, he was killed by some of his officers. He had been induced to conspire against him by a certain Mnestheus, the freedman of the emperor and his private secretary, who had betrayed his trust, and, fearful of punishment, had, by means of forged documents, organized the conspiracy.

AURĒLIĀNUS, CÆLIUS or CÆLIŪS, a very celebrated Latin physician, was a native of Nu-midia, and probably lived in the fourth century after Christ. Of his writings we possess three books On Acute Diseases. “Celerum Passionum” (or “De Morbis Acutis”), and five books On Chronic Diseases, “Tardarum Passionum” (or “De Morbis Chronicis”). Edited by Ammān, Amstel, 1709.

AURĒLIŪS ANTONĪNUS, M., Roman emperor, A.D. 161–180, commonly called “the philosopher,” was born at Rome on the 20th of April, A.D. 121. He was adopted by Antoninus Pius immediately after the latter had been himself adopted by Hadrian, received the title of Cæsar, and married Faustina, the daughter of Pius (138). On the death of the latter in 161, he succeeded to the throne, but he admitted to an equal share of the sovereign power L. Ceionius Commodus, who had been adopted by Pius at the same time as Marcus himself. The two emperors henceforward bore respectively the names of M. Aurelius Antoninus and L. Aurelius Verus. Soon after their accession Verus was dispatched to the East, and for four years (A.D. 162–165) carried on war with great success against Vologeses III., king of Parthia, over whom his lieutenants, especially Avidius Cassius, gained many victories. At the conclusion of the war both emperors triumphed, and assumed the titles of Armeniæcus, Parthicus Maximus, and Medicus. Meantime Italy was threatened by the numerous tribes dwelling along the northern limits of the empire, from the sources of the Danube to the Illyrian border. Both emperors set out to encounter the foe; and the contest with the northern nations was continued with varying success during the whole life of M. Aurelius, whose headquarters were generally fixed in Pannonia. After the death of Verus in 169, Aurelius prosecuted the war against the Marcomanni with great success, and in consequence of his victories over them, he assumed in 172 the title of Germanicus, which he also conferred upon his son Commodus. In 174 he gained a decisive victory over the Quadi, mainly through a violent storm, which threw the barbarians into confusion. This storm is said to have been owing to the prayers of a legion chiefly composed of Christians. It has given rise to a famous controversy among the historians of Christianity upon what is commonly termed the Miracle of the Thundering Legion. The Marcomanni and the other northern barbarians concluded a peace with Aurelius in 175, who forthwith set out for the East, where Avidius Cassius, urged on by Faustina, the unworthy wife of Aurelius, had risen in rebellion and proclaimed himself emperor. But before Aurelius reached the East, Cassius had been slain by his own officers. On his arrival in the East, Aurelius acted with the greatest clemency; none of the accomplices of Cassius were put to death; and to establish perfect confidence in all, he ordered the papers of Cassius to be destroyed without suffering them to be read. During this expedition, Faustina, who had accompanied her husband, died, according to some, by her own hands. Aurelius returned to Rome toward the end of 176; but in 178 he set out again for Germany, where the Marcomanni and their confederates had again renewed the war. He gained several victories over them, but died, in the middle of the war, on March 17th, 180, in Pannonia, either at Vindobona (now Vienna) or at Sirmium, in the fifty-ninth year of his age and twentieth of his reign. The leading feature in the character of M. Aurelius was his devotion to philosophy and literature. When only twelve years old, he adopted the dress and practiced the austerities of the Stoics, and he continued throughout his life a warm adherent and a bright ornament of the Stoic philosophy. We still possess a work by M. Aurelius, written in the Greek language, and entitled Tὰ εἰς ἑαυτὸν, or Meditations, in twelve books. It is a sort of commonplace book, in which were registered from time to time the thoughts and feelings of the author upon moral and religious topics, without an attempt at order or arrangement. No remains of antiquity present a nobler view of philosophical heathenism. The best edition of the Meditations is by Gataker, Cantab., 1652, and Lond., 1697. The chief, and perhaps the only stain upon the memory of Aurelius is his two persecutions of the Christians; in the former of which, 166, the martyrdom of Polycarp occurred, and in the latter, 177, that of Irenæus. Aurelius was succeeded by his son Commodus.

AURÉOLUS, one of the Thirty Tyrants (A.D. 260-267), who assumed the title of Augustus during the feeble rule of Gallienus. Aureolus was proclaimed emperor by the legions of Illyria in 267, and made himself master of Northern Italy, but he was defeated and slain in battle in 268, by Claudius II, the successor of Gallienus.

AUSONÍUS, DECÍMUS MAGNUS, a Roman poet, born at Burdigala (now Bordeaux), about A.D. 310, taught grammar and rhetoric with such reputation at his native town that he was appointed tutor of Gratian, son of the Emperor Valentinian, and was afterward raised to the highest honors of the state. He was appointed by Gratian praefectus of Latium, of Libya, and of Gaul, and in 379 was elevated to the consulship. After the death of Gratian in 383, he retired from public life, and ended his days in a country retreat near Bordeaux, perhaps about 390. It is most probable that he was a Christian and not a heathen. His extant works are, 1. Epigrammatum Liber, a collection of one hundred and fifty epigrams.—2. Ephemeris, containing an account of the business and proceedings of a day.—3. Parentalia, a series of short poems, dedicated to the memory of deceased friends and relations, and commemorating their virtues.—4. Professores, notices of the Professors of Bordeaux.—5. Epitaphia Heroum, epitaphs on the heroes who fell in the Trojan war and a few others.—6. A metrical catalogue of the first twelve Cæsars.—7. Tetrasticha, on the Cæsars from Julius to Elagabalus.—8. Clare Urbes, the praises of fourteen illustrious cities.—9. Ludus Septem Sapientum, the doctrines of the seven sages expounded by each in his own person.—10. Idyllia, a collection of twenty poems.—11. Elogarium, short poems connected with the Calendar, &c.—12. Epistolæ, twenty-five letters, some in verse and some in prose.—13. Gratiarum Actio pro Consulatu, in prose, addressed to Gratian.—14. Periochæ, short arguments to each book of the Iliad and Odyssey.—15. Tres Praefatiunculae. Of these works the Idylls have attracted most notice, and of them the most pleasing is the Mosella, or a description of the River Moselle. Ausonius possesses skill in versification, but is destitute of all the higher attributes of a poet. The best edition of his complete works is by Tollius, Amstel., 1671.

AUSTER, called Notus (Νότος) by the Greeks, the south wind, or strictly the southwest wind, is personified as the god of the south wind, son of Astræus and Eos (Aurora). It frequently brought with it fogs and rain; but at certain seasons of the year it was a dry, sultry wind (hence called plumbeus Auster, Hor., Sat., ii, 6, 18), injurious both to man and to vegetation, the Sirocco of the modern Italians.

AUTARIÁTÆ (Ἀυταριᾶται), an Illyrian people in the Dalmatian mountains, extinct in Strabo's time.

AUTESIODORUM, -URUM (now Auzerre), a town of the Senones in Gallia Lugdunensis.

AUTÉSĪON (Ἀυτεσίον), son of Tisamenus, father of Theras and Argia, left Thebes at the command of an oracle, and joined the Dorians in Peloponnesus.

AUTŌLŌLES, or -Æ (Ἀυτολόλαι) a Gætulian tribe on the western coast of Africa, south of the Atlas Mountains.

AUTŌLŌKOS (Ἀυτολόκος). 1. Son of Mercury

(Hermes) and Chione, father of Anticlea, and thus maternal grandfather of Ulysses. He lived on Mount Parnassus, and was renowned for his cunning and robberies. Ulysses, when staying with him on one occasion, was wounded by a boar on Parnassus, and it was by the scar of this wound that he was recognized by his aged nurse when he returned from Troy.—2. A Thesaliar, son of Deimachus, one of the Argonauts, and the founder of Sinope.—3. A mathematician of Pitane in Æolis, lived about B.C. 340, and wrote two astronomical treatises, which are the most ancient existing specimens of the Greek mathematics.—1. On the Motion of the Sphere (περὶ κινουμένης σφαιρας).—2. On the risings and settings of the fixed stars (περὶ ἐπιτρολῶν καὶ ὀψέων). Edited by Dasypodius in his Sphærica Doctrina Propositiones, Argent., 1572.

ΑΥΤΟΜΑΛΑ (τὰ Αὐτομαλα), a fortified place on the Great Syrtis in Northern Africa.

ΑΥΤΟΜΕΔΟΝ (Αὐτομέδων). 1. Son of Dioces, the charioteer and companion of Achilles, and, after the death of the latter, the companion of his son Pyrrhus. Hence Automedon is the name of any skillful charioteer. (Cic., pro Rosc. Am., 35; Juv., l. 61).—2. Of Cyzicus, a Greek poet, twelve of whose epigrams are in the Greek Anthology, lived in the reign of Nerva, A.D. 96–98.

ΑΥΤΟΜΟΛΙ (Αὐτόμολοι), as a proper name, was applied to the Egyptian soldiers, who were said to have deserted from Psammetichus into Æthiopia, where they founded the kingdom of Meroë.

ΑΥΤΟΝΟΪΕ (Αὐτονόη). 1. Daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, wife of Aristæus, and mother of Actæon. With her sister Agave, she tore Pentheus to pieces in their Bacchic fury; her tomb was shown in the territory of Megara.—[2. A handmaid of Penelope, mentioned in the Odyssey.]

ΑΥΤΡΙΓΩΝΕΣ, a people in Hispania Tarracensis, between the ocean (Bay of Biscay) and the upper course of the Iberus: their chief town was FLAVIOBRIGA.

ΑΥΧΗΣΙΑ (Αὐχῆσιᾶ), the goddess who grants growth and prosperity to the fields, honored at Trœzen and Epidaurus, was another name for Proserpina (Persephone). Danica, who was honored along with Auxesia at Epidaurus and Trœzen, was only another name for Ceres (Demeter).

ΑΥΧΙΜΟΝ (Auximas, -atis; now Osimo), an important town of Picenum in Italy, and a Roman colony.

ΑΥΧΙΜΕ or ΑΧ- (Αὐχίσμῃ or Ἀχίσμῃ, and other forms: Αὐχισμίται or Ἀχισμίται, &c.: now Axum, ruins southwest of Adowa), the capital of a powerful kingdom in Æthiopia, to the southwest of Meroë, in Habesh or Abyssinia, which either first arose or first became known to the Greeks and Romans in the early part of the second century of our era. It grew upon the decline of the kingdom of Meroë, and extended beyond the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb into Arabia. Being a mountainous region, watered by the numerous upper streams of the Astaboras and Astapus, and intersected by the caravan routes from the interior of Africa to the Red Sea and the Gulf of Bab-el-Mandeb, the country possessed great internal resources and a flourishing commerce.

ΑΥΖΕΑ, or -ΙΑ, or ΑΥΔΙΑ (now Sur-Guzlan or Hamza, ruins), a city in the interior of Mauretania Cæsariensis; a Roman colony under Marcus Aurelius Antoninus.

ΑΥΛΙΤΕΣ (Αὐλίτης: now Zeilak), an emporium in Southern Æthiopia, on a bay of the Erythræan Sea, called Αὐλίτες Σίνος ('Α. κόλπος), probably the Gulf of Bab-el-Mandeb, or its innermost part, south of the Straits. A people, Αὐλιταί, are also mentioned in these parts.

ΑΥΕΡΝΟΣ ΛΑΚΟΣ (ἡ Ἄορνος λίανη: now Lago Averno), a lake close to the promontory which runs out into the sea between Cumæ and Puteoli. This lake fills the crater of an extinct volcano: it is circular, about one and a half miles in circumference, is very deep, and is surrounded by high banks, which in antiquity were covered by a gloomy forest sacred to Hecate. From its waters mephitic vapors arose, which are said to have killed the birds that attempted to fly over it, from which circumstance its Greek name was supposed to be derived (from a, priv., and ὄρνις). The lake was celebrated in mythology on account of its connection with the lower world. On its banks dwelt the Cimmerians in constant darkness, and near it was the cave of the Cumæan Sibyl, through which Æneas descended to the lower world. Agrippa, in the time of Augustus, cut down the forest which surrounded the lake, and connected the latter with the Lucrine Lake; he also caused a tunnel to be made from the lake to Cumæ, of which a considerable part remains, and is known under the title of Grotta di Sibylla. The Lucrine Lake was filled up by an eruption in 1530, so that Avernus is again a separate lake.

ΑΥΙΑΝΟΣ, ΦΛΑΥΙΟΣ, the author of forty-two Æsopic fables in Latin elegiac verse, which are of very little merit both as respects the matter and the style. The date of Avianus is uncertain; he probably lived in the third or fourth century of the Christian era.—Editions: By Canegieter, Amstel, 1731; by Nodell, Amstel., 1787; and by Lachmann, Berol., 1845.

[ΑΥΙΔΙΟΣ ΚΑΣΣΙΟΣ. Vid. ΚΑΣΣΙΟΣ.]

ΑΥΙΕΝΟΣ, ΡΥΦΟΣ ΦΕΣΤΟΣ, a Latin poet toward the end of the fourth century of the Christian era. His poems are chiefly descriptive, and are some of the best specimens of the poetry of that age. His works are, 1. Descriptio Orbis Terræ, also called Metaphrasis Periegeseos Dionysii, in 1304 hexameter lines, derived directly from the περιήγησις of Dionysius, and containing a succinct account of the most remarkable objects in the physical and political geography of the known world.—2. Ora Maritima, a fragment in 703 iambic trimeters, describing the shores of the Mediterranean from Marseilles to Cadiz.—3. Aratea Phænomena and Aratea Prognostica, both in hexameter verse, the first containing 1325, the second 552 lines, being a paraphrase of the two works of Aratus. The poems are edited by Wernsdorf, in his Poetæ Latini Minores, vol. v., pt. ii., which, however, does not include the Aratea: [reprinted, with the addition of the Aratea, by Lemaire, in the fifth volume of his Poetæ Latini Minores, Paris, 1824–26.]

AVIONES, a people in the north of Germany, whose position is uncertain.

AVITUS, ALPHITUS, a Latin poet under Augustus and Tiberius, the fragments of some of whose poems are preserved in the Anthologia Latina.

AVITUS, CLOVENTIUS. Vid. CLOVENTIUS.

AVITUS, M. MÆCILIUS, Emperor of the West, was raised to the throne by the assistance of Theodoric II., king of the Visigoths, in A.D. 455; but, after a year's reign, was deposed by Reimer.

[AXANTOS, another name of Uxantis (now Ouessant), on the northwestern coast of Gallia.]

[AXELLŌDŪNUM (now Brugh ?), a castle of the Brigantes in Britannia.]

AXENUS. Vid. EUXINUS PONTUS.

AXIA (now Castell d'Asso), a fortress in the territory of Tarquinii in Etruria.

AXION (Ἀξιόν), son of Phegeus, brother of Temenus, along with whom he killed Alemæon.

[AXIŌNICUS (Ἀξιόνικος), an Athenian poet of the middle comedy; of whose plays only a few fragments have been preserved in Athenæus: these are published collectively in Meineke's Fragmenta Comic. Græc., vol. ii., p. 769–72, edit. minor.]

ΑΧΙΟΘĒΑ (Ἀχιόθεα), a maiden of Phlius, who came to Athens, and, putting on male attire, was for some time a hearer of Plato, and afterward of Speusippus.

AXIUS, Q., an intimate friend of Cicero and Varro, one of the speakers in the third book of Varro's De Re Rustica.

AXIUS (Ἄξιος; now Wardar or Vardhari), the chief river in Macedonia, rises in Mount Searus, receives many affluents, of which the most important is the Erigon, and flows southeast through Macedonia into the Thermaic Gulf. As a river-god, Axius begot by Peribœa a son, Pelagon, the father of ASTEROPÆUS.

ΑΧΩΝΑ (now Aisne), a river in Gallia Belgica, which falls into the Isara (now Oise).

AXŪME. Vid. AXUME.

[AXUS (Ἀξός), capital of a small kingdom in Crete.]

[ΑΧΥΛUS (Ἀχυλος), a Thracian prince, mentioned in the Iliad, son of Teuthranus, slain by Diomedes.]

AZAN (Ἀζάν), son of Arcas and the nymph Erato, brother of Aphidas and Elatus. The part of Arcadia which he received from his father was called Azania: it was on the borders of Elis.

AZĀNI (Ἀζάνοι; Ἀζανίτης), a town of Phrygia, on the River Rhyndæus, and twenty miles southwest of Cotyænum (now Kütayah). The ruins of columns, capitals, and other architectural fragments are scattered over the ground. There are also the remains of a splendid temple and of a theatre. This ancient site was discovered by Mr. Keppel.

AZANIA or BARBARIA (Ἀζανία, Barbaria: now Ajan), the region on the eastern coast of Africa, south of Aromata Promontorium (now Cape Guardafui), as far as Rhaptum Promontorium (now Cape Formosa ?).

AZĒNIA (Ἀζηνία; Ἀζηνιεύς), a demus in the southwest of Attica, near Sunium, belonging to the tribe Hippothontis.

AZEUS (Ἀζεύς), son of Olymenus of Orchomenos, brother of Erginus, Stratius, Arrhon, and Pyleus, father of Actor and grandfather of As-tyoche.

[AZĪRIS (Ἀζίρις in Hdt., or Ἀζίλις in Call.: now Temmīneh), a city of Marmarica in Africa, opposite to the island of Platea, and founded by the Theræans.]

AZŌRUS or AZŌRIŪM (Ἀζώρος, Ἀζώριον; Ἀζωρίτης, Ἀζωριότης, Ἀζωρεύς), a town in the north of Thessaly, on the western slope of Olympus, formed, with Doliehe and Pythium, the Perrhæbian Tripolis.

AZŌTUS (Ἀζώτος; Ἀζώτιος; now Ashdod or Ashdoud), a city of Palestine, near the sea-coast, nine miles northeast of Asealon.* It was one of the free cities of the Philistines, which were included within the portion of the tribe of Judah.

B.

BABRIŪS (Βάβριος), a Greek poet, probably in the time of Augustus, turned the fables of Æsop into verse, of which only a few fragments were known till within the last few years, when a manuscript containing one hundred and twenty-three fables was discovered on Mount Athos. Edited by Laehmann, Berol., 1845; by Orelli and Baier, Turic., 1845; by Lewis, Lond., 1847.

BĀBŪLŌN (Βαβυλών; Βαβυλώνιος, fem. Babylōnis; Babel in Old Testament; ruins at and around Hillah), one of the oldest and greatest cities of the ancient world, the capital of a great empire, was built on both sides of the River Euphrates, in about 32° 28' north latitude. Its foundation, and the establishment of a kingdom by Nimrod, with the city for a capital, are among the first recorded facts subsequent to the Deluge (Gen., x., 9, 10; xi., 1–10). Secular history ascribes its origin to Belus (i. e., the god Baal), and its enlargement and decoration to Ninus, or his wife Semiramis; or, according to another tradition, the country was subdued by Ninus, and the city was subsequently built by Semiramis, who made it the capital of the Assyrian empire. At all events, it is pretty clear that Babylon was subject to the Assyrian kings of Nineveh from a very early period; and the time at which the governors of Babylon first succeeded in making themselves virtually independent, can not be determined with any certainty until we know more of the history of the early Assyrian dynasties. Compare NABONASSAR. The Babylonian empire begins with the reign of Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, who, with the aid of the Median king Cyaxares, overthrew the Assyrian monarchy, and destroyed Nineveh (B.C. 606), and soon afterward defended his kingdom against the aggressions (at first successful) of Neco king of Egypt, in the battle of Ciresium, B.C. 604. Under his son and successor, Nebuchadnezzar (B.C. 604-562), the Babylonian empire reached its height, and extended from the Euphrates to Egypt, and from the mountains of Armenia to the deserts of Arabia. After his death it again declined, until it was overthrown by the capture of Babylon by the Medes and Persians under Cyrus (B.C. 538), who made the city one of the capitals of the Persian empire, the others being Susa and Ecbatana. Under his successors the city rapidly sank. Darius I. dismantled its fortifications, in consequence of a revolt of its inhabitants; Xerxes carried off the golden statue of Belus, and the temple in which it stood became a ruin. After the death of Alexander, Babylon became a part of the Syrian kingdom of Seleucus Nicator, who contributed to its decline by the foundation of SELEUCIA on the Tigris, which soon eclipsed it. At the commencement of our era, the greater part of the city was in ruins; and at the present day, all its visible remains consist of mounds of earth, ruined masses of brick walls, and a few scattered fragments. Its very site has been turned into a dreary marsh by repeated inundations from the river. The city of Babylon had reached the summit of its magnificence in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar. It formed a square, each side of which was one hundred and twenty stadia (twelve geographical miles) in length. The walls, of hurued brick, were two hundred cubits high and fifty thick; in them were two hundred and fifty towers and sixty bronze gates; and they were surrounded by a deep ditch. The Euphrates, which divided the city into two equal parts, was embanked with walls of brick, the openings of which, at the ends of the transverse streets, were closed by gates of bronze. A bridge, built on piers of hewn stone, united the two quarters of the city; and at each end of it stood a royal palace: these erections were ascribed to Semiramis. Of two other public buildings of the greatest celebrity, the one was the temple of Belus, rising to a great height, and consisting of eight stories, gradually diminishing in width, and ascended by a flight of steps, which wound round the whole building on the outside; in the uppermost story was the golden statue of Belus, with a golden altar and other treasures: this building also was ascribed to Semiramis. The other edifice referred to was the "hanging gardens" of Nebuchadnezzar, laid out upon terraces which were raised above one another on arches. The houses of the city were three or four stories in height, and the streets were straight, intersecting one another at right angles. The buildings were almost universally constructed of bricks, some burned, and some only sun-dried, cemented together with hot bitumen, and in some cases with mortar. The Babylonians were certainly a Semitic race; but the ruling class, to which the kings, and priests, and the men of learning belonged, were the Chaldeans, whose origin and affiliations are somewhat doubtful; the most probable opinion, however, is that they were a tribe of invaders, who descended from the mountains on the borders of Armenia, and conquered the Babylonians. The religion of the Chaldeans was Sabaism, or the worship of the heavenly bodies, not purely so, but symbolized in the forms of idols, besides whom they had other divinities, representing the powers of nature. The priests formed a caste, and cultivated science, especially astronomy; in which they knew the apparent motions of the sun, moon, and five of the planets, the calculation of eclipses of the moon, the division of the zodiac into twelve constellations, and of the year into twelve months, and the measurement of time by the sun-dial. They must also have had other instruments for measuring time, such as the water-clock, for instance; and it is highly probable that the definite methods of determining such quantities, which the Chaldean astronomers invented, were the origin of the systems of weights and measures used by the Greeks and Romans. Their buildings prove their knowledge of mechanics; and their remains, slight as they are, show considerable progress in the fine arts. The Babylonian government was an unlimited monarchy; the king appears to have lived in almost total seclusion from his people, surrounded by his court; and the provinces were administered by governors, like the Persian satraps, responsible only to the monarch, whose commands they obeyed or defied according to his strength or weakness. The position of the city on the lower course of the Euphrates, by which it was connected with the Persian Gulf, and at the meeting of natural routes between Eastern Asia and India on the one side, and Europe, Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and Arabia on the other, made it the seat of a flourishing commerce, and of immense wealth and luxury. The district around the city, bounded by the Tigris on the east, Mesopotamia on the north, the Arabian Desert on the west, and extending to the head of the Persian Gulf on the south, was known in later times by the name of BABYLONIA (now Irak Arabi), sometimes also called Chaldæa. But compare CHALDÆA. This district was a plain, subject to continual inundations from the Tigris and Euphrates, which were regulated by canals, the chief of which was the Naarmalcha, i. e., Royal River or Canal (ποταμὸς βασιλείος, δι' ὧν ἴσθαι βασιλική, flumen regium), which extended from the Tigris at Seleucia due west to the Euphrates, and was navigable. The country was fertile, but deficient in trees.

ΒΑΒΥΛΩΝ (Babylôn: near Fostat or Old Cairo), a fortress in Lower Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, exactly opposite to the pyramids, and at the beginning of the canal which connected the Nile with the Red Sea. Its origin was ascribed by tradition to a body of Babylonian deserters. It first became an important place under the Romans. Augustus made it the station of one of the three Egyptian legions.

ΒΑΒΥΛΩΝΙΑ. Vid. BABYLON.

ΒΑΚΧΙÆ (Βάκχαι), also called Maenades and Thyiades. 1. The female companions of Dionysus or Bacchus in his wanderings through the East, are represented as crowned with vine leaves, clothed with fawn skins, and carrying in their hands the thyrsus (vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v.). —2. Priestesses of Bacchus (Dionysus), who, by wine and other exciting causes, worked themselves up to phreusy at the Dionysiac festivals.

ΒΑΚΧΙΑΔÆ (Βακχιάδαι), an Heraclid clan, derived their names from Baechis, king of Corinth, and retained the supreme rule in that state, first under a monarchical form of government, and next as a close oligarchy, till their deposition by Cypselus, about B.C. 657. They were, for the most part, driven into banishment, and are said to have taken refuge in different parts of Greece and even Italy.

[BACCHÏUM (Βακχέιον), an island in the Ægean Sea, lying before the harbor of the city Phocæa, beautifully adorned with temples and works of art, which were destroyed by the Romans under Æmilius, B.C. 190.]

BACCHÏUS (Βακχέιος). 1. The author of a short musical treatise called εἰσαγωγή τέχνης μουσικῆς, printed by Meibomius, in the Antiquæ Musicæ Auctores Septem, Amst., 1652.—2. Of Tanagra in Bœotia, one of the earliest commentators on the writings of Hippocrates: his writings have perished.—3. Of Miletus, the author of a work on agriculture.

BACCHUS. Vid. DIONYSUS.

BACCHÏLIDES (Βακχυλίδης), one of the great lyric poets of Greece, born at Iulis in Ceos, and nephew as well as fellow-townsmen of Simonides. He flourished about B.C. 470, and lived a long time at the court of Hiero in Syracuse, together with Simonides and Pindar. He wrote in the Doric dialect Hymns, Pæans, Dithyrambs, &c.; but all his poems have perished, with the exception of a few fragments, and two epigrams in the Greek Anthology. The fragments have been published by Nene, Bacchylidis Cei Fragmenta, Berol., 1823, and by Bergk, Poëtæ Lyrici Græci, p. 820.

BACÉNIS SILVA, a forest which separated the Snevi from the Cherusei, probably the western part of the Thuringian Forest.

BACIS (Βάκις), the name of several prophets, of whom the most celebrated was the Bœotian seer, who delivered his oracles in hexameter verse at Heleon in Bœotia. In later times there existed a collection of his oracles, similar to the Sibylline books at Rome.

BACTRA OF ZARIASPA (τὰ Βάκτρα, τὰ Ζαριάσπα and ἡ Ζαριάσπη: now Balkh), the capital of BACTRIA, appears to have been founded by the early Persian kings, but not to have been a considerable city till the time of Alexander, who settled in it his Greek mercenaries and his disabled Macedonian soldiers. It stood at the northern foot of the Mount Paropamisus (the Hindoo Koosh), on the River Bactrus (now Adirshah or Dehas), about twenty-five miles south of its junction with the Oxus. It was the centre of a considerable traffic. The existing ruins, twenty miles in circuit, are all of the Mohammedan period.

BACTRÏA or -IÂNÀ (Βακτριανή: Βάκτροι, -τοι, -των: now Bokhara), a province of the Persian empire, bounded on the south by Mount Paropamisus, which separated it from Ariana, on the east by the northern branch of the same range, which divided it from the Sacæ, on the northeast by the Oxus, which separated it from Sogdiana, and on the west by Margiana. It was inhabited by a rude and warlike people, who were subdued by Cyrus or his next successors. It was included in the conquests of Alexander, and formed a part of the kingdom of the Seleucidæ until B.C. 255, when Theodotus, its governor, revolted from Antiochus II., and founded the Greek kingdom of Bactria, which lasted till B.C. 134 or 125, when it was overthrown by the Parthians, with whom, during its whole duration, its kings were sometimes at war, and sometimes in alliance against Syria. This Greek kingdom extended beyond the limits of the province of Bactria, and included at least a part of Sogdiana. Bactria was watered by the Oxus and its tributaries, and contained much fertile land; and much of the commerce between Western Asia and India passed through it.

[BACTRUS (Βάκτρος), a river of Bactria. Vid. BACTRIA.]

[BACUNTIUS (now Bossuth), a river of Lower Pannonia, which empties into the Savus near Sirmium.]

BADUHENNÆ LUCUS, a wood in Western Friesland.

BEBÏA GENS, plebeian, the most important members of which are given under their surnames, DIVES, SULCA, TAMPIILLUS.

BECÛLA, a town in Hispania Tartaconensis, west of Castulo, in the neighborhood of silver mines.

[BELON. Vid. BELON.]

[BESIPPO (now Porto Barbatò), a harbor on Junonis Promontorium, not far from Gades, in Hispania Bætica.]

BETERREÆ (now Beziers) also called BITERRENSIS URBS, a town in Gallia Narbonensis, on the Obris, not far from Narbo, and a Roman colony: its neighborhood produced good wine.

BËTICA. Vid. HISPANIA.

BËTIS (now Guadalquivir), a river in Southern Spain, formerly called TARTESSUS, and by the inhabitants CERTIS, rises in Hispania Tartaconensis, in the territory of the Oretani, flows southwest through Bætica, to which it gives its name, past the cities of Corbuda and Hispalis, and falls into the Atlantic Ocean by two mouths, north of Gades.

[BËTURIA (Βαιτουρία), the northwestern part of Bætica, between the Anas and Mount Marianus.]

BAGÛCUM (now Bavai), the chief town of the Nervii in Gallia Belgica: there are many Roman remains in the modern town.

BAGAUDÆ, a Gallie people, who revolted under Diocletian, and were with difficulty subdued by Maximian, A.D. 286.

[BAGISTANUS MONS (τὸ Βαγίστανον ὄρος), a mountain range in Media, southeast of Ecbatana, and made by the Greeks sacred to Jupiter: the region around was called Bagistana. This mountain is now more correctly termed the "sacred rock of Behistun." According to the ancients, it had the figure of Semiramis cut upon it, with a Syrian inscription; but Major Rawlinson has shown that the inscription on the rock was executed by order of Darius Hystaspis.]

BAGÔAS (Βαγῶας), a eunuch, highly trusted and favored by Artaxerxes III. (Ochus), whom he poisoned B.C. 338. He was put to death by Darius III. Codomannus, whom he had attempted likewise to poison, 336. The name Bagoas frequently occurs in Persian history, and is sometimes used by Latin writers as synonymous with a eunuch.

BAGRĀDAS (Βαγράδας: now Mejerdah), a river of Northern Africa, falling into the Gulf of Carthage near Utica.

BAIÆ (Baiānus), a town in Campania, on a small bay west of Naples, and opposite Puteoli, was situated in a beautiful country, which abounded in warm mineral springs. The baths of Baiæ were the most celebrated in Italy, and the town itself was the favorite watering-place of the Romans, who flocked thither in crowds for health and pleasure; it was distinguished by licentiousness and immorality. The whole country was studded with the palaces of the Roman nobles and emperors, which covered the coast from Baiæ to Puteoli: many of these palaces were built out into the sea. (Hor., Carm., ii., 18, 20.) The site of ancient Baiæ is now, for the most part, covered by the sea.

[BALANEA, (Βαλανία: now Banias), a city of Syria, on the coast, north of Aradus, by Stephanus Byzantinus assigned to Phœnicia.]

[BALBILLUS, made governor of Egypt by Nero, and wrote an account of that province.]

BALBINUS, D. CÆLIUS, was elected emperor by the senate along with M. Clodius Pupienus Maximus, after the murder of the two Gordians in Africa at the beginning of A.D. 238; but the new emperors were slain by the soldiers at Rome in June in the same year.

BALBUS, M. ACILIUS, the name of two consuls, one in B.C. 150, and the other in 114.

BALBUS, T. AMPIUS, tribune of the plebs B.C. 63, was a supporter of Pompey, whom he joined in the civil war B.C. 49. He was pardoned by Cæsar through the intercession of Cicero, who wrote to him on the occasion (ad Fam., vi., 12).

BALBUS, M. ATIUS, of Aricia, married Julia, the sister of Julius Cæsar, who bore him a daughter, Atia, the mother of Augustus Cæsar.

BALBUS, L. CORNELIUS. 1. Of Gades, served under Q. Metellus and Pompey against Sertorius in Spain, and received from Pompey the Roman citizenship. He accompanied Pompey on his return to Rome, B.C. 71, and was for a long time one of his most intimate friends. At the same time he gained the friendship of Cæsar, who placed great confidence in him. As the friend of Cæsar and Pompey, he had numerous enemies, who accused him in 56 of having illegally assumed the Roman citizenship; he was defended by Cicero, whose speech has come down to us, and was acquitted. In the civil war, 49, Balbus did not take any open part against Pompey; but he attached himself to Cæsar, and, in conjunction with Oppius, had the entire management of Cæsar's affairs at Rome. After the death of Cæsar (44) he was equally successful in gaining the favor of Octavianus, who raised him to the consulship in 40. Balbus wrote a diary (Ephemeris), which has not come down to us, of the most remarkable occurrences in Cæsar's life. He took care that Cæsar's Commentaries on the Gallic war should be continued; and we accordingly find the eighth book dedicated to him.—2. Nephew of the preceding, received the Roman franchise along with his uncle. He served under Cæsar in the civil war; he was quæstor to Asinius Pollio in Further Spain in B.C. 43, and while there added to his native town, Gades, a suburb; many years afterward he was proconsul of Africa, and triumphed over the Garamantes in 19. He built a magnificent theatre at Rome, which was dedicated in 13.

BALBUS, LUCILIUS. 1. L., a jurist, and brother of the following.—2. Q., a Stoic philosopher, and a pupil of Panætius, is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers in his De Natura Deorum.

BALBUS, OCTAVIUS, a contemporary of Cicero, bore a high character as a judex; he was put to death by the triumvirs, B.C. 43.

BALBUS, SP. THORIUS, tribune of the plebs about B.C. 111, proposed an agrarian law. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. LEX THORIA.

BALEĀRES (Βαλεαρίδες, Βαλιαρίδες), also called GYMNĒSĪÆ (Γυμνησία) by the Greeks, two islands in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Spain, distinguished by the epithets Major and Minor, whence their modern names Majorca and Minorca. They were early known to the Carthaginians, who established settlements there for the purposes of trade; they afterward received colonies from Rhodes; and their population was at a later time of a very mixed kind. Their inhabitants, also called Baleares, were celebrated as slingers, and were employed as such in the armies of the Carthaginians and Romans. In consequence of their piracies they provoked the hostility of the Romans, and were finally subdued, B.C. 123, by Q. Metellus, who assumed, accordingly, the surname Baleariensis.

BALISTA, prefect of the prætorians under Valerian, whom he accompanied to the East. After the defeat and capture of that emperor (A. D. 260), he rallied a body of Roman troops and defeated the Persians in Cilicia. His subsequent career is obscure; he is mentioned as one of the thirty tyrants, and was probably put to death, about 264, by Odenathus.

[BALSA and BALSA FELIX (now Tavira), a city of Lusitania.]

BAMBALĪO, M. FULVIUS, father of Fulvia, the wife of M. Antonius, the triumvir, received the nickname of Bambalio, on account of a hesitancy in his speech.

BAMBŪCE. Vid. HIERAPOLIS.

BĀNĀSA (now Mamora? ruins), a city of Mauretania Tingitana, on the River Subur (now Sebou), near the western coast: a colony under Augustus, Valentia Banasa.

BANDŪSĪÆ FONS (now Sambuco), a fountain in Apulia, six miles from Venusia. (Hor., Carm., iii., 13.)

BANTĪA (Bantinus: now Banzi or Vanzi), a town in Apulia, near Venusia, in a woody district (saltus Bantini, Hor., Carm., iii., 4, 15): [near this place Marcellus fell a victim to the well-laid plans of Hannibal.]

[BAPHŪRAS (Βαφύραξ), a river of Pieria, in Macedonia, empties into the Thermaic Gulf.]

BARBĀNA (now Bojana), a river in Illyria, flows through the Palus Labæatis.

BARBĀRI (Βάρβαροι), the name given by the Greeks to all foreigners whose language was not Greek, and who were therefore regarded by the Greeks as an inferior race. The Romans applied the name to all people who spoke neither Greek nor Latin.

BARBĀRIA. Vid. AZANIA.

[BARBARIUM PROMONTORIUM (now Cabo de Espichel), a promontory of Lusitania, just below the mouth of the Tagus.]

BARBĀTĪO, commander of the household troops under Gallus, whom he arrested by command of Constantius, A.D. 354. In 355 he was made general of the infantry, and sent into Gaul to assist Julian against the Alemanii. He was put to death by Constantius in 359.

BARBĀTUS, M. HORĀTĪUS, consul B.C. 449 with Valerius Publicola after the overthrow of the decemvirs. Vid. PUBLICOLA.

BARLĒSŪLA, a city and river (now Guadiaro) in Hispania Bætica, on the coast, north of Calpe.]

BARBOSTHĒNES, a mountain east of Sparta.

BARBŪLA, EMĪLIŪS. 1. Q., consul B.C. 317, when he subdued Apulia, and consul again in 311, when he fought against the Etruscans.—2. L., consul in 281, carried on war against the Tarentines, Samnites, and Sallentines.—3. M., consul in 230, carried on war against the Ligurians.

BARCA, the surname of HAMILCAR, the father of Hannibal, is probably the same as the Hebrew Barak, which signifies lightning. His family was distinguished subsequently as the "Barcine family," and the democratic party, which supported this family, as the "Barcine party."

BARCA OF -E (Βάρκη: Barcītēs, Barcāios, Barcæus). 1. (Now Merjeh, ruins), the second city of Cyrenaica, in northern Africa, one hundred stadia (ten geographical miles) from the sea, appears to have been at first a settlement of a Libyan tribe, the Barcæi, but about B.C. 560 was colonized by the Greek seceders from Cyrene, and became so powerful as to make the western part of Cyrenaica virtually independent of the mother city. In B.C. 510 it was taken by the Persians, who removed most of its inhabitants to Bactria, and under the Ptolemies its ruin was completed by the erection of its port into a new city, which was named PTOLEMAIS, and which took the place of Barca as one of the cities of the Cyrenæic Pentapolis.—2. A town in Bactria, peopled by the removed inhabitants of the Cyrenæia Barca.

BARCĪNO (now Barcelona), a town of the Lale-tani, in Hispania Tarraconensis, afterward a Roman colony: the town was not large, but it possessed an excellent harbor.

BAR DANES. Vid. ARSACES XXI.

BARDYLIS or BARDYLLIS (Βάρδύλις, Βάρδύλλης), an Illyrian chieftain, carried on frequent wars with the Macedonians, but was at length defeated and slain in battle by Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, B.C. 359.

BARĒA SORĀNUS, consul suffectus in A.D. 52 under Claudius, and afterward proconsul of Asia, was a man of justice and integrity. He was accused of treason in the reign of Nero and was condemned to death, together with his daughter Servilia. The chief witness against him was P. Egnatius Celer, a Stoic philosopher, and the teacher of Soranus. (Vid. Juv. iii, 116.)

BARĠSĪR, a people in the northeast of Spain, between the Pyrenees and the Iberus.

[BARGYLIA or BARGYLLE (Βαργύλια, τά; Βαργυλίτης, Βαργυλιητικός), a city of Caria, lying on the gulf, named from it, Bargyliticus Sinus, and named by the Carians Andanus (Ἀνδανός); famed for a statue of Diana.]

BARĪUM (Barinus: now Barı), a town in Apulia, on the Adriatic, a municipium, and celebrated for its fisheries (Barium piscosum, Hor., Sat., i, 5, 97).

BARSAENTES (Βαρσαέντης) or BARZAENTUS (Βαρζάεντος), satrap of the Arachoti and Drangæ, took part in the murder of Darius III., and afterward fled to India, where he was seized by the inhabitants and delivered up to Alexander, who put him to death.

BARSINE (Βαρσίνη). 1. Daughter of Artabazus, and wife of Memnon the Rhodian, subsequently married Alexander the Great, to whom she bore a son, Hærcules. She and her son were put to death by Polysperchon in 309.—2. Also called STATIRA, elder daughter of Darius III., whom Alexander married at Susa, B.C. 324. Shortly after Alexander's death she was murdered by Roxana.

[BARYGAZA (Βαρύγαια, now Baroatsch), a city of India, on the eastern side of the River Nomadus, possessing an active and extensive land and sea trade with Bactria, Arabia, and Africa.]

[BARZAENTES (Βαρζάεντης). Vid. BARSAENTES.]

BASANĪTIS. Vid. BATANÆA.

BASILIA (now Basel or Bâle), a town on the Rhine, in the neighborhood of which Valentinian built a fortress.—[2. An island. Vid. ABALUS.]

BASILINA, the mother of Julian the apostate, being the second wife of Julius Constantius, brother of Constantine the Great.

BASILĪUS (Βασίλειος), commonly called Basil the Great, was born A.D. 329, at Cæsareæ. He studied at Antioch or Constantiuople under Libanius, and subsequently continued his studies for four years (351–355) at Athens, chiefly under the sophists Himerius and Præresius. Among his fellow-students were the Emperor Julian and Gregory Nazianzen, the latter of whom became his most intimate friend. After acquiring the greatest reputation as a student for his knowledge of rhetoric, philosophy, and science, he returned to Cæsarea, where he began to plead causes, but soon abandoned his profession and devoted himself to a religious life. He now led an ascetic life for many years; he was elected Bishop of Cæsarea in 370 in place of Eusebius; he died in 379. The best edition of his works is by Garnier, Paris, 1721–1730, 3 vols. folio.

BASILŪS, L. MINUCĪUS, served under Cæsar in Gaul, and commanded part of Cæsar's fleet in the civil war. He was one of Cæsar's assassins (B.C. 44), and in the following year was murdered by his own slaves.

[BASSĀNIA, a city of Illyria, not far from Lissus.]

BASSĀREUS (Βασσαρεύς), a surname of Bacchus (Dionysus), probably derived from βασσαρίς, a fox skin, worn by the god himself and the Mænads in Thrace.

BASSUS, AUFIDIŪS, an orator and historian under Augustus and Tiberius, wrote an account of the Roman wars in Germany, and a work upon Roman history of a more general character, which was continued in thirty-one books by the elder Pliny.

BASSUS, Q. CÆCILIŪS, a Roman eque, and an adherent of Pompey, fled to Tyre after the battle of Pharsalia, B.C. 48. Shortly afterward he obtained possession of Tyre, and was joined by most of the troops of Sextus Cæsar, the governor of Syria, who had been killed by his own soldiers at the instigation of Bassus. He subsequently settled down in Apamea, where he maintained himself for three years (46-43) against C. Antistius Vetus, and afterward against Statius Murcus and Marcus Crispus. On the arrival of Cassius in Syria in 43, the troops of Bassus went over to Cassius.

BASSUS, CÆSIUS, a Roman lyric poet, and a friend of Persius, who addresses his sixth satire to him, was destroyed, along with his villa, in A.D. 79, by the eruption of Vesuvius which overwhelmed Herculaneum and Pompeii.

BASSUS, SALEIUS, a Roman epic poet of considerable merit, contemporary with Vespasian.

BASTARNÆ or BASTERNÆ, a warlike German people, who migrated to the country near the mouth of the Danube. They are first mentioned in the wars of Philip and Perseus against the Romans, and at a later period they frequently devastated Thrace, and were engaged in wars with the Roman governors of the province of Macedonia. In B.C. 30 they were defeated by Marcus Crassus, and driven across the Danube; and we find them, at a later time, partly settled between the Tyras (now Dniester) and Borys-thenes (now Dnieper), and partly at the mouth of the Danube, under the name of Peucini, from their inhabiting the island of Peuce, at the mouth of this river.

[BASTI (now Baza), a city of the BASTITANI.]

BASTITANI (also BASTETANI, BASTULI), a people in Hispania Bætica, on the coast.

[BATA (Βατά, τά), a city and port of Sarmatia Asiatica, on the Euxine, opposite Sinope.]

BĀTĀNÆA or BASANITIS (Βαβαίαια, Βασανίτις: in the Old Testament, Bashan, Basan), a district of Palestine, east of the Jordan, extending from the river Jabbok on the south to Mount Hermon, in the Antilibanus chain, on the north. The s and τ are mere dialectic varieties.

BATĀVI or BĀTĀVI (Lucan, l. 431), a Celtic people who abandoned their homes in consequence of civil dissensions before the time of Julius Cæsar, and settled in the island formed by the Rhine, the Waal, and the Maas, which island was called after them, Insula Batavorum. They were for a long time allies of the Romans in their wars against the Germans, and were of great service to the former by their excellent cavalry; but at length, exasperated by the oppressions of the Roman officers, they rose in revolt under Claudius Civilis in A.D. 69, and were with great difficulty subdued. On their subjugation they were treated by the Romans with mildness, and were exempt from taxation. Their country, which also extended beyond the island south of the Maas and the Waal, was called at a later time, BATAVIA. Their chief towns were Lugdunum (now Leyden) and Batavodurum (now Wyk-Durstad?), between the Maas and the Waal. The Caninefates or Caninefates were a branch of the Batavi, and dwelt in the west of the island.

BATAVODURUM. Vid. BATAVI.

[BĀTĒA (Βάτεια). 1. A Naiad, mother by Cebalus of Tyndareus, Hippocoon, and Iearion.—2. Daughter of Teneer, wife of Dardanus, mother of Iulus and Erichthonius.]

BATHYCLES (Βαθυκλής), a celebrated artist of Magnesia on the Mæander, constructed for the Lacedæmonians the colossal throne of the Amyclæan Apollo. He probably flourished about the time of Solon, or a little later.

BATHYLLUS. 1. Of Samos, a beautiful youth beloved by Anacreon.—2. Of Alexandria, the freedman and favorite of Mæcenas, brought to perfection, together with Pylades of Cilicia, the imitative dance or ballet called Pantomimus. Bathyllus excelled in comic, and Pylades in tragic personifications.

[BATHYS PORTUS (Βαθύς λιμὴν), the large deep harbor of Anlis, in which the Grecian fleet assembled before sailing to Troy.]

BATYÆ (Βάτται: Βατταίοι). 1. (Now Saruj), a city of Osroëne in Mesopotamia, east of the Euphrates, and southwest of Edessa, at about equal distances; founded by the Macedonians, and taken by Trajan; celebrated for its annual fair of Indian and Syrian merchandise.—2. (Now Dahab), a city of Cyrrhestie, in Syria, between Beroëa and Hierapolis.

BATO (Βάτων). 1. The charioteer of Amphiarans, was swallowed up by the earth along with AMPHARAUUS.—2. The name of two leaders of the Pannonians and Dalmatians in their insurrection of the reign of Augustus, A.D. 6. Tiberius and Germanicus were both sent against them, and obtained some advantages over them, in consequence of which the Pannonians and Dalmatians concluded a peace with the Romans in A.D. 8. But the peace was of short duration. The Dalmatian Bato put his namesake to death, and renewed the war. Tiberius now finally subdued Dalmatia; Bato surrendered to him in A.D. 9, upon promise of pardon; he accompanied Tiberius to Italy, and his life was spared.

BATTIADÆ (Βαττιάδαι), kings of Cyrene during eight generations. 1. BATTUS I., of Thera, led a colony to Africa at the command of the Delphic oracle, and founded Cyrene about B.C. 631. He was the first king of Cyrene; his government was gentle and just, and after his death in 599 he was worshipped as a hero.—2. ARCESILAUS I., son of No. 1, reigned B.C. 599-583.—3. BATTUS II., surnamed "the Happy," son of No. 2, reigned B.C. 583-560? In his reign Cyrene received a great number of colonists from various parts of Greece; and in consequence of the increased strength of his kingdom, Battus was able to subdue the neighboring Libyan tribes, and to defeat Apries, king of Egypt (570), who had espoused the cause of the Libyans.—4. ARCESILAUS II., son of No. 3, surnamed "the Oppressive," reigned about B.C. 560-550. In consequence of dissensions between himself and his brothers, the latter withdrew from Cyrene and founded Barca. He was strangled by his brother or friend Learchus.—5. BATTUS III., or "the Lame," son of No. 4, reigned about B.C. 550-530. In his time, Demonax, a Mantinean, gave a new constitution to the city, whereby the royal power was reduced within very narrow limits.—6. ARCESILAUS III., son of No. 5, reigned about B.C. 530-514, was driven from Cyrene in an attempt to recover the ancient royal privileges, but recovered his kingdom with the aid of Samian auxiliaries. He endeavored to strengthen him self by making submission to Cambyses in 525. He was, however, again obliged to leave Cyrene; he fled to Alazir, king of Barca, whose daughter he had married, and was there slain by the Barcæans and some Cyrenæan exiles.—7. BATTUS IV., probably son of No. 6, of whose life we have no accounts.—8. ARCESILAUS IV., probably son of No. 7, whose victory in the chariot-race at the Pythian games, B.C. 466, is celebrated by Pindar in his fourth and fifth Pythian odes. At his death, about 450, a popular government was established.

[BATTIÁDES, a patronymic of Callimachus, from his father Battus.]

BATTUS (Bάττος), a shepherd whom Mercury (Hermes) turned into a stone because he broke a promise which he made to the god.

BATŪLUM, a town in Campania of uncertain site.

BAUCIS. Vid. PHILEMON.

BAULI (now Bacolo), a collection of villas rather than a town, between Misenum and Baia, in Campania.

[BAUTIS, BAUTES, or BAUTISUS, (now Hoangho), a river of Serica.]

BAVĪUS and MĒVĪUS, two malevolent poets, who attacked the poetry of Virgil and Horace.

BAZĪRA or BEZĪRA (Bάζυρα: Βάζυροι: now Bajour, northwest of Peshawur), a city in the Paropamisus, taken by Alexander on his march into India.

BEBRŪCES (Bέβρυκες). 1. A mythical people in Bithynia, said to be of Thracian origin, whose king, Amyceus, was slain by Pollux (p. 90, b).—2. An ancient Iberian people on the coast of the Mediterranean, north and south of the Pyrenees: they possessed numerous herds of cattle.

BEDRIÁCUM, a small place in Cisalpine Gaul, between Cremona and Verona, celebrated for the defeat both of Otho and of the Vitellian troops, A.D. 69.

BELEBĪNA (Bέλιβινα: Βελιβίνης). 1. (Now St. George d'Arbori), an island in the Ægean Sea, off the south coast of Attica.—2. Vid. BELEMINA.

BELEMĪNA (Βελεμίνα, now Belemia), also called Belmina and Belbina, a town in the northwest of Laconia, on the borders of Arcadia. The surrounding district was called Belminatis and Belbinatis.

BELĒSIS or BELĒSYS (Bέλεισις, Βέλευσις), a Chaldean priest at Babylon, who is said, in conjunction with Arbaces the Mede, to have overthrown the old Assyrian empire. Vid. ARBACES. Belēsis afterward received the satrapy of Babylon from Arbaces.

BELGÆ, one of the three great people into which Cæsar divides the population of Gaul. They were bounded on the north by the Rhine, on the west by the ocean, on the south by the Sequana (now Seine) and Matrona (now Marne), and on the east by the territory of the Treviri. They were of German origin, and had settled in the country, expelling or reducing to subjection the former inhabitants. They were the bravest of the inhabitants of Gaul, were subdued by Cæsar after a courageous resistance, and were the first Gallic people who threw off the Roman dominion. The Belgæ were subdivided into the tribes of the NERVII, BELLOVACI, REMI, SUES-SIONES, MORINI, MENAPII, ADUATICI, and others and the collective forces of the whole nation were more than a million.

BELGICA. Vid. GALLIA.

BELGIUM, the name generally applied to the territory of the BELLOVACI, and of the tribes dependent upon the latter, namely, the Atrebatæ, Ambiani, Vellioeassæ, Auleri, and Caleti. Belgium did not include the whole country inhabited by the Belgæ, for we find the Nervii, Remi, &c., expressly excluded from it. (Caes., B. G., v. 24.)

[BELGIUS or BOLGIUS (Bόλγιος), a leader of the Gauls, who invaded Macedonia and Illyria in B.C. 280. He defeated the Macedonians in a great battle, in which their king, Ptolemy Ceraunus, was slain.]

[BELIDES, patronymic of Palamedes, as descended from Belus.]

BELISÁRIUS, the greatest general of Justinian, was a native of Illyria, and of mean extraction. In A.D. 534 he overthrew the Vandal kingdom in Africa, which had been established by Genseric about one hundred years previously, and took prisoner the Vandal king Gelimer, whom he led in triumph to Constantinople. In 535–540, Belisarius carried on war against the Goths in Italy, and conquered Sicily, but he was recalled by the jealousy of Justinian. In 541–544 he again carried on war against the Goths in Italy, but was again recalled by Justinian, leaving his victories to be completed by his rival, Narses, in the complete overthrow of the Gothic kingdom, and the establishment of the exarchate of Ravenna. The last victory of Belisarius was gained in repelling an inroad of the Bulgarians, 559. In 563, he was accused of a conspiracy against the life of Justinian; according to a popular tradition, he was deprived of his property, his eyes were put out, and he wandered as a beggar through Constantinople; but according to the more authentic account, he was merely imprisoned for a year in his own palace, and then restored to his honors. He died in 565.

BELLĒRŌPHON or BELLĒRŌPHONTES (Βελλεροφών or Βελλεροφόντης), son of the Corinthian king Glaucus and Eurymede, and grandson of Sisyphus, was originally called Hipponus, and received the name Bellerophon from slaying the Corinthian Bellerus. To be purified from the murder he fled to Prætus, whose wife Antæa fell in love with the young hero; but as her offers were rejected by him, she accused him to her husband of having made improper proposals to her. Prætus, unwilling to kill him with his own hands, sent him to his father-in-law, Iobates, king of Lycia, with a letter, in which the latter was requested to put the young man to death. Iobates accordingly sent him to kill the monster Chimæra, thinking that he was sure to perish in the contest. After obtaining possession of the winged horse, PEGASUS, Bellerophon rose with him in the air, and killed the Chimæra with his arrows. Iobates, thus disappointed, sent Bellerophon against the Solyimi, and next against the Amazons. In these contests he was also victorious; and on his return to Lycia, being attacked by the bravest Lycians, whom Iobates had placed in ambush for the purpose, Bellerophon slew them all. Io-bates, now seeing that it was hopeless to kill the hero, gave him his daughter (Philonöë, Anticlea, or Cassandra) in marriage, and made him his successor on the throne. Bellerophon became the father of Isander, Hippolochus, and Laodamia. At last Bellerophon drew upon himself the hatred of the gods, and, consumed by grief, wandered lonely through the Aleian field, avoiding the paths of men. This is all that Homer says respecting Bellerophon's later fate: some traditions related that he attempted to fly to heaven upon Pegasus, but that Jupiter (Zeus) sent a gad-fly to sting the horse, which threw off the rider upon the earth, who became lame or blind in consequence. (Horace, Carm., iv, 11, 26.)

[BELLËRUS, a Corinthian. Vid. BELLEROPHON.]

BELLI, a Celtiberian people in Hispania Tarraconensis.

[BELLËNIUS, L. 1. Uncle of Catiline, proprætor in Africa B.C. 104.—2. Originally a slave of Demetrius, was the occasion of an insurrection in Lutetium during the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey.]

BELLŌNA, the Roman goddess of war, was probably a Sabine divinity. She is frequently mentioned by the Roman poets as the companion of Mars, or even as his sister or his wife, and is described as armed with a bloody scourge. (Virg., Æn., viii, 703.) During the Samnite wars in B.C. 296, Appius Claudius Cæcus vowed a temple to her, which was erected in the Campus Martius. Her priests, called Bellonarii, wounded their own arms or legs when they offered sacrifices to her.

BELLOVACI, the most powerful of the Belgæ, dwelt in the modern Beauvais, between the Seine, Oise, Somme, and Bresle. In Cæsar's time they could bring one hundred thousand men into the field, but they were subdued by Cæsar with the other Belgæ.

BELON or BÆLON (Βελών, Βαιλών, near Bolonia, ruins), a sea-port town in Hispania Bætica, on a river of the same name, (now Barbate), the usual place for crossing over to Tingis in Mauritania.

BELUS (Βήλος); son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Libya or Eurynome, twin brother of Agenor, and father of Egyptus and Danaus. He was believed to be the ancestral hero and national divinity of several Eastern nations, from whom the legends about him were transplanted to Greece, and there became mixed up with Greek myths.

BËLUS (Βήλος; now Nahr Naman), a river of Phœnicia, rising at the foot of Mount Carmel, and falling into the sea close to the south of Ptolemais (now Acre), celebrated for the tradition that its fine sand first led the Phœnicians to the invention of glass.

BENACUS LACUS (now Lago di Garda), a lake in the north of Italy (Gallia Transpadana), out of which the Mincius flows.

BËNËVENTUM (now Benevento), a town in Samnium, on the Appia Via, at the junction of the two valleys through which the Sabatus and Calor flow, formerly called Maleventum on account, it is said, of its bad air. It was one of the most ancient towns in Italy, having been founded, according to tradition, by Diomedes.

In the Samnite wars it was subdued by the Romans, who sent a colony thither in B.C. 268, and changed its name Maleventum into Beneventum. It was colonized a second time by Augustus, and was hence called Colonia Julia Concordia Augusta Felix. The modern town has several Roman remains, among others a triumphal arch of Trajan.

BERECYNŪA (Βερεκυντία), a surname of Cybele, which she derived from Mount Berecynthus where she was worshipped.

[BERECYNŪS MONS (Βερέκυντος), a mountain in Phrygia, sacred to Cybele. Vid. the foregoing.]

BERËNICË (Βερενίκη), a Macedonic form of Pherenice (Φερενίκη), i. e., "Bringing Victory." 1. First the wife of [Philip, son of Amyntas, a Macedonian officer], and afterward of Ptolemy I. Soter, who fell in love with her when she came to Egypt in attendance on his bride Eurydice, Antipater's daughter. She was celebrated for her beauty and virtue, and was the mother of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus.—2. Daughter of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, and wife of Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, who divorced Laodice in order to marry her, B.C. 249. On the death of Ptolemy, B.C. 247, Antiochus recalled Laodice, who, notwithstanding, caused him to be poisoned, and murdered Berenice and her son.—3. Daughter of Magas, king of Cyrene, and wife of Ptolemy III. Evergetes. She was put to death by her son Ptolemy IV. Philopator on his accession to the throne, 221. The famous hair of Berenice, which she dedicated for her husband's safe return from his Syrian expedition in the temple of Arsinoë at Zephyrium, was said to have become a constellation. It was celebrated by Callimachus in a poem, of which we have a translation by Catullus.—4. Otherwise called Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrus, succeeded her father on the throne B.C. 81, and married Ptolemy X. (Alexander II.), but was murdered by her husband nineteen days after her marriage.—5. Daughter of Ptolemy XI. Auletes, and eldest sister of the famous Cleopatra, was placed on the throne by the Alexandrines when they drove out her father, B.C. 58. She afterward married Archelaus, but was put to death, with her husband, when Gabinius restored Auletes, 55.—6. Sister of Herod the Great, married Aristobulus, who was put to death B.C. 6. She afterward went to Rome, where she spent the remainder of her life. She was the mother of Agrippa I.—7. Daughter of Agrippa I, married her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, by whom she had two sons. After the death of Herod, A.D. 48, Berenice, then twenty years old, lived with her brother Agrippa II., not without suspicion of an incestuous commerce with him. She gained the love of Titus, who was only withheld from making her his wife by fear of offending the Romans by such a step.—[8. Wife of Mithradates the Great, put to death by him with his other wives, to prevent their falling alive into the hands of the Romans.]

BERËNICË (Βερενίκη; Βερενικεύς), the name of several cities of the period of the Ptolemies. 1. Formerly Eziongeber (ruins near Akabah), in Arabia, at the head of the Sinus Ælanites, or eastern branch of the Red Sea.—2. In Upper Egypt (for so it was considered, though it lay a little south of the parallel of Syene), on the coast of the Red Sea, on a gulf called Sinus Immundus (ἀκάθαρτος κόλπος, now Foul Bay), where its ruins are still visible. It was named after the mother of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, who built it, and made a road hence to Coptos, so that it became a chief emporium for the commerce of Egypt with Arabia and India. Under the Romans it was the residence of a præfectus.—3. B. PANCHRYSOS (B. Πάγχρυσος or ἡ κατὰ Σάβας), on the Red Sea coast in Æthiopia, considerably south of the above.—4. B. EPIDIRES (B. ἐπὶ Δειρήσ), on the Promontory Dira, on the western side of the entrance to the Red Sea (now Straits of Babel-Mandeb).—5. (Now Ben Ghazi, ruins), in Cyrenaica, formerly HESPERIS (Ἑσπερίς), the fabled site of the Gardens of the Hesperides. It took its later name from the wife of Ptolemy III. Euergetes, and was the westernmost of the five cities of the Libyan Pentapolis. There were other cities of the name.

BERGISTANI, a people in the northeast of Spain, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees, whose capital was Bergium.

[BERGIUM (now Bamberg?). 1. A place in the country of the Hermunduri, in Germania Magna.—2. Vid. BERGISTANI.]

BERGOMUM (Bergomas, -atis: now Bergamo), a town of the Orobi in Gallia Cisalpina, between Comum and Brixia, afterward a municipium.

[BERMIUS MONS (Βέρμιον ὄρος: now Xero Livadhō), a mountain of Macedonia, a continuation of the great range of Olympus.]

BEROË (Βερόη). 1. A Trojan woman, wife of Doryclous, one of the companions of Æneas, whose form Iris assumed when she persuaded the women to set fire to the ships of Æneas in Sicily.—2. The nurse of Semele, whose form Juno (Hera) assumed for the purpose of persuading Semele to request Jupiter to visit her in all his divine majesty.—3. One of the ocean nymphs.]

BERCÆA (Βέρœια, also Βέρβœια, Βερόη: Βεροιεύς, Βεροιαιός). 1. (Now Verria), one of the most ancient towns of Macedonia, on one of the lower ranges of Mount Bermius, and on the Astræus, a tributary of the Haliæmon, southwest of Pella, and about twenty miles from the sea.—2. (Now Beria), a town in the interior of Thrace, was under the later Roman empire, together with Philippopolis, one of the most important military posts.—3. (Now Aleppo or Haleb), a town in Syria near Antioch, enlarged by Seleucus Nicator, who gave it the Macedonian name of Bercæa. It is called Helbon or Chelbon in Ezekiel (xxvii, 18), and Chalep in the Byzantine writers, a name still retained in the modern Haleb, for which Europeans have substituted Aleppo.

BERŒSUS (Βηρωσός, or Βηρωσσός), a priest of Belus at Babylon, lived in the reign of Antiochus II. (B.C. 261–246), and wrote in Greek a history of Babylonia, in nine books (called Βαβυλωνικά, and sometimes Χαλδαϊκά or ιστορία Χαλδαϊκά). It embraced the earliest traditions about the human race, a description of Babylonia and its population, and a chronological list of its kings down to the time of the great Cyrus. Berossus says that he derived the materials for his work from the archives in the temple of Belus. The work itself is lost, but considerable fragments of it are preserved in Josephus, Eusebius, Syncellus, and the Christian fathers. The best editions of the fragments are by Richter, Lips., 1825, and in Didot's Fragmenta Historicorum Græcorum, vol. ii, Paris, 1848.

BERŒTUS (Βηρωτός: Βηρωτίος: now Beirut, ruins), one of the oldest sea-ports of Phenicia, stood on a promontory near the mouth of the River Magoras (now Nahr Beirut), half way between Byblus and Sidon. It was destroyed by the Syrian king Tryphon (B.C. 140), and restored by Agrippa under Augustus, who made it a colony. It afterward became a celebrated seat of learning.

BESA. Vid. ANTINOÏPOLIS.

BESSI, a fierce and powerful Thracian people, who dwelt along the whole of Mount Hæmus as far as the Euxine. After the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans (B.C. 168), the Bessi were attacked by the latter, and subdued after a severe struggle.

BESSUS (Βήσος), satrap of Bactria under Darius III, seized Darius soon after the battle of Arbela, B.C. 331. Pursued by Alexander in the following year, Bessus put Darius to death, and fled to Bactria, where he assumed the title of king. He was betrayed by two of his followers to Alexander, who put him to death.

BESTIA, CALPURNIUS. 1. L., tribune of the plebs B.C. 124, and consul 111, when he carried on war against Jugurtha, but, having received large bribes, he concluded a peace with the Numidian. On his return to Rome, he was, in consequence, accused and condemned.—2. L., one of the Catilinarian conspirators, B.C. 63, was at the time tribune of the plebs designatus, and not actually tribune, as Sallust says. In 59 he was ædile, and in 57 was an unsuccessful candidate for the prætorship, notwithstanding his bribery, for which offence he was brought to trial in the following year, and condemned, although he was defended by Cicero.

BETASII, a people in Gallia Belgica, between the Tungri and Nervii, in the neighborhood of Beetz in Brabant.

[BEVUS (Βεῦος), a river of Macedonia, an affluent of the Erigon.]

BEZIRA. Vid. BAZIRA.

BIANOR. 1. Also called Oenus or Auenus, son of Tiberis and Manto, is said to have built the town of Mantua, and to have called it after his mother.—2. A Bithynian, the author of twenty-one epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived under Augustus and Tiberius.

BIAS (Βίας). 1. Son of Amythaon, and brother of the seer Melampus. He married Pero, daughter of Neleus, whom her father had refused to give to any one unless he brought him the oxen of Iphiclus. These Melampus obtained by his courage and skill, and so won the princess for his brother. Melampus also gained for Bias a third of the kingdom of Argos, in consequence of his curing the daughters of Prætus and the other Argive women of their madness.—2. Of Priene in Ionia, one of the seven sages of Greece, flourished about B.C. 550.

BIBACULUS, M. FURIUS, a Roman poet, born at Cremona B.C. 103, wrote iambics, epigrams, and a poem on Caesar's Gaulish wars. The opening line in the latter poem is parodied by Horace (Furius hibernas cana nive conspuet Alpes, Sat., ii., 5, 41). It is probable that Bibaculus also wrote a poem entitled Æthiopsis, containing an account of the death of Memnon by Achilles, and that the turgidus Alpinus of Horace (Sat., i., 10, 36) is no other than Bibaculus. The attacks of Horace against Bibaculus may probably be owing to the fact that the poems of Bibaculus contained insults against the Cæsars. (Tac., Ann., iv., 34.)

BIBRACTE (now Autun), the chief town of the Ædui in Gallia Lugdunensis, afterword Augustodunum.

BIBRAX (now Bièvre), a town of the Remi in Gallia Belgica, not far from the Aisne.

BIBULUS CALPURNIUS. 1. L., curule ædile B. C. 65, prætor 62, and consul 59, in each of which years he had C. Julius Cæsar as his colleague. He was a staunch adherent of the aristocratical party, but was unable in his consulship to resist the powerful combination of Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus. After an ineffectual attempt to oppose Cæsar's agrarian law, he withdrew from the popular assemblies altogether; whence it was said in joke that it was the consulship of Julius and Cæsar. In 51 Bibulus was proconsul of Syria; and in the civil war he commanded Pompey's fleet in the Adriatic, and died (48) while holding this command off Corycra. He married Porcia, the daughter of Cato Uticensis, by whom he had three sons, two of whom were murdered by the soldiers of Gabinius, in Egypt, 50.—2. L., son of No. 1, was a youth at his father's death, and was brought up by M. Brutus, who married his mother Porcia. He fought with Brutus at the battle of Philippi in 42, but he was afterward pardoned by Antony, and was intrusted by the latter with important commands. He died shortly before the battle of Actium.

[BICURDIUM (now Erfurt ?), a city of the Cherusci in Germany.]

BIDIS (Bidinus, Bidensis), a small town in Sicily, west of Syracuse.

BIGERRA (now Beçerra ?), a town of the Oretani in Hispania Tarraconensis.

BIGERRIÖNES or BIGERRI, a people in Aquitania, near the Pyrenees.

BILBILIS (now Baubola), a town of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a municipium with the surname Augusta, on the River Salo, also called Bilbilis (now Xalon), was the birth-place of the poet Martial, and was celebrated for its manufactures in iron and gold.

BILLEUS (Βιλλαιος: now Filbas), a river of Bithynia, rising in the Hypii Montes, and falling into the Pontus Euxinus twenty stadia (two geographical miles) east of Tium. Some made it the boundary between Bithynia and Paphlagonia.

BINGIUM (now Bingen), a town on the Rhine, in Gallia Belgica.

BION (Βίων). 1. Of Smyrna, a bucolic poet, flourished about B.C. 280, and spent the last years of his life in Sicily, where he was poisoned. He was older than Moschus, who laments his untimely death, and calls himself the pupil of Bion. (Mosch., Id., iii.) The style of Bion is refined, and his versification fluent and elegant, but he is inferior to Theocritus in strength and depth of feeling.—Editions, including Moschus, by Jacobs, Gotha, 1795; Wakefield, London, 1795; and Manso, Leipzig, 1807.—2. Of Borysthènes, near the mouth of the Dnieper, flourished about B.C. 250. He was sold as a slave, when young, and received his liberty from his master, a rhetorician. He studied at Athens, and embraced the later Cyrenaic philosophy, as expounded by THEODORUS, the Atheist. He lived a considerable time at the court of Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedonia. Bion was noted for his sharp sayings, whence Horace speaks of persons delighting Bioneis sermonibus et sale nigro. (Epist., ii., 2, 60.)—3. Of Soli in Cilicia, author of a work on Æthiopia (Αἰθιοπικά), of which a few fragments remain; he wrote also a treatise on agriculture.—4. A mathematician of Abdera, the first who maintained that there were certain regions where the night lasted six months, and the day the other six months of the year.]

[BISALTÆ (Βισάλται). Vid. BISALTIA.]

BISALTIA (Βισαλία: Βισάλτης), a district in Macedonia, on the western bank of the Strymon. The Bisaltæ were Thracians, and at the invasion of Greece by Xerxes (B.C. 480) they were ruled by a Thracian prince, who was independent of Macedonia; but at the time of the Peloponnesian war we find them subject to Macedonia.

[BISALTIS, female patronymic from Bisaltis, i. e., THEOPHANE.]

BISANTHE (Βισάνθη: Βισανθηρός: now Rodosto), subsequently Rhædestum or Rhædestus, a town in Thrace on the Propontis, with a good harbor, was founded by the Samians, and was in later times one of the great bulwarks of the neighboring Byzantium.

BISTÖNES (Βίστορες) a Thracian people between Mount Rhodope and the Ægean Sea, on the Lake BISTONIS, in the neighborhood of Abdera, through whose land Xerxes marched on his invasion of Greece (B.C. 480). From the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus) in Thrace the Bacchic women are called Bistônides. (Hor., Carm., ii., 19, 20.)

BITHYNIA (Βιθυνία: Βιθυνός), a district of Asia Minor, bounded on the west by Mysia, on the north by the Pontus Euxinus, on the east by Paphlagonia, and on the south by Phrygia Epicetetus, was possessed at an early period by Thracian tribes from the neighborhood of the Strymon, called Thyui (Θυυοί) and Bithyui (Βιθυυοί), of whom the former dwelt on the coast, the latter in the interior. The earlier inhabitants were the BEBYCES, CAUCONES, and MYGDONES, and the northeastern part of the district was possessed by the MARIANDYNI. The country was subdued by the Lydians, and afterward became a part of the Persian empire under Cyrus, and was governed by the satraps of Phrygia. During the decline of the Persian empire, the northern part of the country became independent, under native princes called ἐπαρχοί, who resisted Alexander and his successors, and established a kingdom, which is usually considered to begin with Zipætēs (about B.C. 287) or his son Nicomedes I. (B.C. 278), and which lasted till the death of Nicomedes III. (B.C. 74), who bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans. By them it was first attached to the province of Asia, afterward to that of Pontus, and, under Augustus, it was made a proconsular province. Several changes were made in its boundaries under the later emperors. It was a fertile country, intersected with wooded mountains, the highest of which was the Mysian Olympus, on its southern border. Its chief rivers were the SANGARIUS and the BILLEUS.

BITHYNIUM (Bithynion), afterward CLAUDIOPOLIS, an inland city of Bithynia, the birth-place of Hadrian's favorite Antinous.

BITON (Βίτων). 1. A mathematician, the author of an extant work on Military Machines (κατασκευαὶ πολεμικῶν ὄργάνων καὶ καταπελτικῶν), whose history is unknown. The work is printed in Vet. Mathem. Op., Paris, 1693, p. 105, seq.—[2. A friend of Xenophon, who, with Euclides, showed him kindness, and relieved his wants at Ophrynum, on his return from Babylonia.]

BITON and CLEOBIS (Κλέβις), sons of Cydippe, a priestess of Juno (Hera) at Argos. They were celebrated for their affection to their mother, whose chariot they once dragged during a festival to the temple of Juno (Hera), a distance of forty-five stadia. The priestess prayed to the goddess to grant them what was best for mortals; and during the night they both died while asleep in the temple.

BITUITUS, in inscriptions BETULTUS, king of the Arverni in Gaul, joined the Allobroges in their war against the Romans. Both the Arverni and Allobroges were defeated B.C. 121, at the confluence of the Rhone and the Isara, by Q. Fabius Maximus. Bituitus was subsequently taken prisoner and sent to Rome.

BITURIGES, a numerous and powerful Celtic people in Gallia Aquitania, had in early times the supremacy over the other Celts in Gaul. (Liv., v., 34.) They were divided into, 1. BIT. CUBI, separated from the Carnutes and Ædui by the Liger, and bounded on the south by the Lemovices, in the country of the modern Bourges: their capital was AVARICUM. 2. BIT. VISCI or UBISCI on the Garumna: their capital was BURDIGALA.

BLADUS, BLANDUS, or BLAUDUS (Βλά-, Βλάν-, Βλαῦδος; Βλανδῆνός: Blaudesius), a city of Phrygia, near the borders of Mysia and Lydia.

BLESUS, C. SEMPRONIUS, consul with Cn. Servilius Cæpio, B.C. 253, in the first Punic war. The two consuls sailed to the coast of Africa, and on their return were overtaken off Cape Palinurus by a tremendous storm, in which one hundred and fifty ships perished.

BLESUS, JUNIUS, governor of Pannonia at the death of Augustus, A.D. 14, when the formidable insurrection of the legions broke out in that province. He obtained the government of Africa in 21, where he gained a victory over Tacfarinas. On the fall of his uncle Sejanus in 31, he was deprived of the priestly offices which he held, and in 36 put an end to his own life, to avoid falling by the hand of the executioner.

BLANDA. 1. (Now Blañós), a town of the Laetani in Hispania Tarraconensis.—2. (Now St. Blasio), a town in Lucania.

[BLANDUSIA FONS. Vid. BANDUSIA.]

BLASCÓN (now Brescou), a small island in the Gallius Sinus, off the town of Agatha.

BLASIO, M. HELVIUS, prætor B.C. 197, defeated the Celtiberi in Spain, and took Illiturgi.

[BLAUDUS (Βλαῦδος). Vid. BLADUS.]

BLAVIA (now Blaye), a town of the Santones in Gallia Aquitania, on the Garumna.

BLEMYES (Βλέμυες, Βλέμυες), an Æthiopian people on the borders of Upper Egypt, to which their predatory incursions were very troublesome in the times of the Roman emperors.

[BLENDIUM (now Santander?), a port of the Cantabri in Hispania Tarraconensis.]

BLERA (Bleranus: now Bieda), a town in Etruria, on the Via Claudia, between Forum Clodii and Tuscania: there are many remains of the ancient town at Bieda.

BLOSIUS or BLOSSIUS, the name of a noble family in Campania. One of this family, C. Blossius of Cuma, was a philosopher, a disciple of Antipater of Tarsus, and a friend of Tiberius Gracchus. After the death of Gracchus (B.C. 133) he fled to Aristonius, king of Pergamus, and on the conquest of Aristonius by the Romans, Blossius put an end to his own life for fear of falling into the hands of the Romans.

BOADICÆA, queen of the Ieni in Britain, having been shamefully treated by the Romans, who even ravished her two daughters, excited an insurrection of the Britons against their oppressors during the absence of Suetonius Paulinus, the Roman governor, on an expedition to the island of Mona. She took the Roman colonies of Camalodunum, Londinium, and other places, and slew nearly seventy thousand Romans and their allies. She was at length defeated with great loss by Suetonius Paulinus, and put an end to her own life, A.D. 61.

[BOÆ or BAVO (now Bua), an island on the coast of Dalmatia, used by the later Roman emperors as a place of exile for state criminals.]

BOAGIUS (Βοάγιος, now Terremotto), a river in Loeris, also called MANES, flows past Thurium into the Sinus Maliacus.

[BOBIUM (now Bobbio), a castrum of the Ligurians, on the Trebia.]

[BOCCHAR. 1. A brave king of the Mauri in Africa, a contemporary of Masinissa.—2. An officer of King Syphax, who fought against Masinissa.]

BOCCHUS (Βόκχος). 1. King of Mauretania, and father-in-law of Jugurtha, with whom at first he made war against the Romans, but whom he afterward delivered up to Sulla, the quæstor of Marius, B.C. 106.—2. Son of the preceding, reigned along with his brother Bogud over Mauretania. Bocchus and Bogud assisted Cæsar in his war against the Pompeians in Africa, B.C. 46; and in 45 Bogud joined Cæsar in his war in Spain. After the murder of Cæsar, Bocchus sided with Octavianus, and Bogud with Antony. When Bogud was in Spain in 38, Bocchus usurped the sole government of Mauretania, in which he was confirmed by Octavianus. He died about 33, whereupon his kingdom became a Roman province. Bogud had previously betaken himself to Antony, and was killed on the capture of Methone by Agrippa in 31.

[BODERIA (Βοδερία εἰςχνσις, Ptol). Vid. BODOTRIA.]

BODENUS or BODINCUS. Vid. PADUS.

BODIQCASSES, a people in Gallia Lugdunen sis their capital was AUGUSTODURUM (now Bayeux).

BODOTRIA or BODERIA ÆSTUARĪUM (now Firth of Forth), an æstuary on the eastern coast of Scotland.

[BODUOGNATUS, leader of the Nervii in Gallia in the time of Julius Cæsar.]

BŒÆ (Boai: Βοιάης: now Vatka), a town in the south of Laconia, near Cape Malea.

[BEATICUS SINUS, to the east, or, rather, the eastern part, of the Laconicus Sinus, so called from the town of BŒÆ, and now Gulf of Vatka.]

BŒBE (Βοίβη: Βοιβεύς), a town in Pelasgotic in Thessaly, on the western shore of the Lake BŒBĒIS (Βοιβής, now Bio), into which several rivers of Thessaly flow.

BOËDRŌMIUS (Βοηδρόμιος), "the helper in distress," a surname of Apollo at Athens, because he had assisted the Athenians. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. BOEDROMIA.

[BŒO (Βοιά), a Grecian poetess of Delphi, composed a hymn, of which Pausanias has preserved a few lines.]

BŒŌTĪA (Βοιωτία: Βιωτός: part of Livadia), a district of Greece, bounded north by Opuntian Locris, east by the Eubæan Sea, south by Attica, Megaris, and the Corinthian Gulf, and west by Phocis. It is nearly surrounded by mountains, namely, Helicon and Parnassus on the west, Cithæron and Parnes on the south, the Opuntian mountains on the north, and a range of mountains along the whole sea-coast on the east. The country contains several fertile plains, of which the two most important were the valley of the Asopus in the south, the inhabitants of which were called Parasopii, and the valley of the Cephissus in the north (the upper part of which, however, belonged to Phocis), the inhabitants of which were called Epicephissii. In the former valley the chief towns were THEBÆ, TANAGRA, THESPIÆ, and PLATÆÆ; in the latter the chief towns were ORCHOMENUS, CILÆRONEA, CORONEA, LEBADEA, and HALLIARTUS; the latter valley included the Lake COPAIS. The surface of BŒotia is said to be one thousand and eighty square miles. The atmosphere was damp and thick, to which circumstance some of the ancients attributed the dullness of the BŒotian intellect, with which the Athenians frequently made merry; but the deficiency of the BŒotians in this respect was more probably owing, as has been well remarked, to the extraordinary fertility of their country, which probably depressed their intellectual and moral energies. In the earliest times BŒotia was inhabited by various tribes, the Aones (whence the country was called Aonia), Temmices, Hyantes, Thracians, Leleges, &c. Orchomenus was inhabited by the powerful tribe of the Minyans, and Thebes by the Cadmeans, the reputed descendants of CADMUS. The BŒotians were an Æolian people, who originally occupied Arne in Thessaly, from which they were expelled by the Thessalians sixty years after the Trojan war, and migrated into the country called after them BŒotia, partly expelling and partly incorporating with themselves the ancient inhabitants of the land. BŒotia was then divided into fourteen independent states, which formed a league, with Thebes at its head. The chief magistrates of the confederacy were the BŒotarchs, elected annually, two by Thebes and one by each of the other states; but as the number of states was different at different times, that of the BŒotarchs also varied. The government in most states was an aristocracy. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. BŒOTARCHES.

BOËTHIUS, whose full name was ANICIUS MANLIUS SEVERINUS BOËTHIUS, a Roman statesman and author, was born between A.D. 470 and 475. He was famous for his general learning, and especially for his knowledge of Greek philosophy, which, according to a common account (though of doubtful authority), he studied under Proclus at Athens. He was consul in 510, and was treated with great distinction by Theodoric the Great; but having incurred the suspicions of the latter by advocating the cause of the Italians against the oppressions of the Goths, he was put to death by Theodoric about 524. During his imprisonment he wrote his celebrated work De Consolatione Philosophiæ, in five books, which is composed alternately in prose and verse. The diction is pure and elegant, and the sentiments are noble and exalted, showing that the author had a real belief in prayer and Providence, though he makes no reference to Christianity. Boethius was the last Roman of any note who understood the language and studied the literature of Greece. He translated many of the works of the Greek philosophers, especially of Aristotle, and wrote commentaries upon them, several of which have come down to us. He also wrote a commentary, in six books, upon the Topica of Cicero, which is also extant. In the ignorance of Greek writers which prevailed from the sixth to the fourteenth century, Boethius was looked upon as the head and type of all philosophers, as Augustin was of all theology, and Virgil of all literature; but after the introduction of the works of Aristotle into Europe in the thirteenth century, Boethius's fame gradually died away. The best edition of his collective works was printed at Basel, 1570; the last edition of his De Consolatione is by Obbarius, Jenæ, 1843.

BOËTHUS (Βοηθός). 1. A Stoic philosopher of uncertain date, wrote several works, from one of which Cicero quotes.—2. A Peripatetic philosopher, was a native of Sidon in Phœnicia, a disciple of Andronicus of Rhodes, and an instructor of the philosopher Strabo. He there flourished about B.C. 30. He wrote several works, all of which are now lost.—[3. A native of Tarsus, who gained the favor of Antony by celebrating in verse the defeat of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi.]

BOËUM (Βοίων, Βοίων, Βοίων: Βοιάτης), an ancient town of the Dorian Tetrapolis.

BOGUD. Vid. BOCCUUS, No. 2.

BOII, one of the most powerful of the Celtic tribes, said to have dwelt originally in Gaul (Transalpinga), but in what part of the country is uncertain. At an early time they migrated in two great swarms, one of which crossed the Alps and settled in the country between the Po and the Apennines; the other crossed the Rhine and settled in the part of Germany called Boihemum (now Bohemia) after them, and between the Danube and the Tyrol. The Boii in Italy long carried on a fierce struggle with the Romans, but they were at length subdued by the consul P. Scipio in B.C. 191, and were subsequently incorporated in the province of Gallia Cisalpina. The Boii in Germany maintained their power longer, but were at length subdued by the Marcomanni, and expelled from the country. We find 32,000 Boii taking part in the Helvetian migration; and after the defeat of the Helvetians (B.C. 58), Cæsar allowed these Boii to dwell among the Ædui.

[BOIODURUM, (now Innstadt), a town of Vindehicia, at the junction of the Ænus (now Inn) and the Danube.]

BOIORIX. 1. A chieftain of the Boii, fought against the Romans in Cisalpine Gaul, B.C. 194.—[2. King of the Cimbrî, fought against the Romans under Marius, and fell in battle near Verona, B.C. 161.]

BOLA, BOLE, or VOLÆ (Bolānus), an ancient town of the Æqui, belonging to the Latin league, not mentioned in later times.

BOLĀNUS, VETIUS, governor of Britain in A.D. 69, is praised by Statius in the poem (Silv., v., 2) addressed to Crispinus, the son of Bolanus.

BOLBE (Βόλβη: now Beshek), a lake in Macedonia, empties itself by a short river into the Strymonic Gulf near Bromisus and Aulon: the lake is now about twelve miles in length, and six or eight in breadth. There was a town of the same name upon the lake.

BOLBITINE (Βολβιτίνη: Βολβιτνήτης: now Rosetta), a city of Lower Egypt, near the mouth of a branch of the Nile (the westernmost but one), which was called the Bolbitine mouth (τὸ Βολβίτινον στόμα).

[BOLERIUM PROMONTORIUM, the southwest point of Britannia, now Land's End, in Cornwall.]

BOLINE (Βολίνη: Βολινᾶιος), a town in Achaia, the inhabitants of which Augustus transplanted to Patrae.

BOLISSUS (Βολισσός: Βολισσιος, now Volisso), a town on the western coast of Chios.

BOMILCAR (Βομίλκαρ, Βομίλκαρ). 1. Commander, with Hanno, of the Carthaginians against Agathocles, when the latter invaded Africa, B.C. 310. In 368 he attempted to seize the government of Carthage, but failed, and was crucified.—2. Commander of the Carthaginian supplies sent to Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, 216. He afterward attempted to relieve Syraeus when besieged by Marellus, but was unable to accomplish anything.—3. A Numidian, deep in the confidence of Jugurtha. When Jugurtha was at Rome, 109, Bomilcar effected for him the assassination of Massiva. In 107 he plotted against Jugurtha.

BOMIUS MONS, (Βώμιος and οἱ Βωμοί), the western part of Mount Æta in Ætolia, inhabited by the Bomienses (Βωμιεῖς).

BONA DEA, a Roman divinity, is described as the sister, wife, or daughter of Faunus, and was herself called Fauna, Fatua, or Oma. She was worshipped at Rome as a chaste and prophetic divinity; she revealed her oracles only to females, as Faunus did only to males. Her festival was celebrated every year on the first of May, in the house of the consul or prætor, as the sacrifices on that occasion were offered on behalf of the whole Roman people. The solemnities were conducted by the Vestals, and no male person was allowed to be in the house at one of the festivals. P. Clodius profaned the sacred ceremonies by entering the house of Cæsar in the disguise of a woman, B.C. 62.

BONIFACIUS, a Roman general, governor of Africa under Valentinian III. Believing that the Empress Placidia meditated his destruction, he revolted against the emperor, and invited Genserich, king of the Vandals, to settle in Africa. In 430 he was reconciled to Placidia, and attempted to drive the Vandals out of Africa, but without success. He quitted Africa in 431, and in 432 he died of a wound received in combat with his rival Ætius.

BONNA (now Bonn), a town on the left bank of the Rhine, in Lower Germany, and in the territory of the Ubii, was a strong fortress of the Romans and the regular quarters of a Roman legion. Here Drusus constructed a bridge across the Rhine.

BONŌNIA (Bononiensis). 1. (Now Bologna), a town in Gallia Cispadana, originally called Felsina, was in ancient times an Etruscan city, and the capital of northern Etruria. It afterward fell into the hands of the Boii, but it was colonized by the Romans on the conquest of the Boii, B.C. 191, and its name of Felsina was then changed into Bononia. It fell into decay in the civil wars, but it was enlarged and adorned by Augustus, 32.—2. (Now Boulogne), a town in the north of Gaul. Vid. GESORIACUS.—3. (Now Banostor?), a town of Pannonia, on the Danube.

BONŌSUS, a Spaniard by birth, served with distinction under Aurelian, and usurped the imperial title in Gaul in the reign of Probus. He was defeated and slain by Probus, A.D. 280 or 281.

BOŪTES. Vid. ARCTURUS.

BORBETOMĀGUS (now Worms), also called VANGIONES, at a later time WORMATIA, a town of the Vangiones, on the left bank of the Rhine, in Upper Germany.

BŌREAS (Βόρεας or Βορᾶς), the north wind, or, more strictly, the wind from the north-north-east, was, in mythology, a son of Astræus and Eos, and brother of Hesperus, Zephyrus, and Notus. He dwelt in a cave of Mount Hæmus, in Thrace. He carried off Orithyia, daughter of Erechtheus, king of Attica, by whom he begot Zetes, Calais, and Cleopatra, wife of Phineus, who are therefore called Boreades. In the Persian war, Boreas showed his friendly disposition toward the Athenians by destroying the ships of the barbarians. According to an Homeric tradition (Il., xx., 223), Boreas begot twelve horses by the mares of Erichthonius, which is commonly explained as a figurative mode of expressing the extraordinary swiftness of those horses. Boreas was worshipped at Athens, where a festival, Boreasmi, was celebrated in his honor.

BORĒUM (Βόρειον). 1. (Now Malin Head), the northern promontory of Hibernia (now Ireland).—2. (Now Ras Teyonas), a promontory on the western coast of Cyrenaica, forming the eastern headland of the Great Syrtis.—3. The northern extremity of the island of Taprobane (now Ceylon).

BORĒUS MONS (Βόρειον ὄρος), a mountain in Arcadia, on the borders of Laconia, containing the sources of the rivers Alpheus and Eurotas.

BOREUS PORTUS (Βόρειος λιμὴν), a harbor in the island of Tenedos, at the mouth of a river of the same name.

BOURSA (τὰ Βόρσιππα: Βορσιππῆς: now Bursa), a city of Babylonia, on the western bank of the Euphrates, a little south of Babylon, celebrated for its manufactures of linen, and as the chief residence of the Chaldean astrologers. The Greeks held it sacred to Apollo and Diana (Artemis).

BORYSTHÈNES (Βορυσθένης: now Dnieper), afterward DANAPRIS, a river of European Sarmatia, flows into the Euxine, but its sources were unknown to the ancients. Near its mouth, and at its junction with the Hypanis, lay the town BORYSTHENES or BORYSTHENS (now Kudak), also called OLBIA, OLBIOPOLIS, and MILETOPOLIS, a colony of Miletus, and the most important Greek city on the north of the Euxine. (Ethnic, Βορυσθενίτης, Ὀλβιοπολίτης.)

BOSPÖRUS (Βόσπορος), i. e., Oxford, the name of any straits among the Greeks, but especially applied to the two following: 1. THE THRACIAN BOSPORUS, (now Channel of Constantinople), unites the Propontis, or Sea of Marmara, with the Euxine, or Black Sea. According to the legend, it was called Bosporus from Io, who crossed it in the form of a heifer. At the entrance of the Bosphorus were the celebrated SYMPLEGADES. Darius constructed a bridge across the Bosphorus when he invaded Scythia.—2. THE CIMMERIAN BOSPORUS (now Straits of Caffa) unites the Palus Mæotis, or Sea of Azof, with the Euxine or Black Sea. It formed, with the Tanais (now Don), the boundary between Asia and Europe, and it derived its name from the CIMMERII, who were supposed to have dwelt in the neighborhood. On the European side of the Bosphorus, the modern Crimea, the Milesians founded the town of Panticapæum, also called Bosphorus, and the inhabitants of Panticapæum subsequently founded the town of Phanagoria on the Asiatic side of the Straits. These cities, being favorably situated for commerce, soon became places of considerable importance; and a kingdom gradually arose, of which Panticapæum was the capital, and which eventually included the whole of the Crimea. The first kings we read of were the Archæactidæ, who reigned forty-two years, from B.C. 480 to 438. They were succeeded by Spartacus I. and his descendants. Several of these kings were in close alliance with the Athenians, who obtained annually a large supply of corn from the Bosphorus. The last of these kings was Pærisades, who, being hard pressed by the Scythians, voluntarily ceded his dominions to Mithradates the Great. On the death of Mithradates, his son Pharnaces was allowed by Pompey to succeed to the dominion of Bosphorus; and we subsequently find a series of kings, who reigned in the country till a late period, under the protection of the Roman emperors.

BOSTAR (Βώστωρ, Βώσταρος). 1. A Carthaginian general, who, with Hamilcar and Hasdrubal, the son of Hanno, fought against M. Atilius Regulus, in Africa, B.C. 256, but was defeated, taken prisoner, and sent to Rome, where he is said to have perished in consequence of the barbarous treatment which he received from the sons of Regulus.—2. A Carthaginian general, under Hasdrubal, in Spain, set at liberty the Spanish hostages kept at Saguntum, hoping thereby to secure the affections of the Spaniards.

BOSTRA (τὰ Βόστρα, Old Testament Bozrah: Βοσθρῆς and -αῖος: now Busrak, ruins), a city of Arabia, in an Oasis of the Syrian Desert, a little more than ten degrees south of Damascus. It was enlarged and beautified by Trajan, who made it a colony. Under the later emperors it was the seat of an archbishopric.

BOTTIA, BOTTLEA, BOTTLEIS (Βοττία, Βοττία, Βοττιαῖος: Βοττιαῖος), a district in Macedonia, on the right bank of the River Axios, extended in the time of Thucydides to Pieria on the west. It contained the towns of Pella and Ichnæ near the sea. The Bottiæ were a Thracian people, who, being driven out of the country by the Macedonians, settled in that part of the Macedonian Chalcidice, north of Olynthus, which was called Bottice (Βοττικῆ).

BOTTICE. Vid. BOTTIA.

[BOVENNA (now Cabrera), a small island at the northern extremity of Sardinia.]

BOVIANUM (Bovianus: now Bojano), the chief town of the Pentri in Samnium, was taken by the Romans in the Samnite wars, and was colonized by Augustus with veterans.

BOVILLÆ (Bovillensis), an ancient town in Latium, at the foot of the Alban Mountain, on the Appian Way, about ten miles from Rome. Near it Clodius was killed by Milo (B.C. 52); and here was the sacrum of the Julia gens.

BRACĀRA AUGUSTA (now Braga), the chief town of the Callaici Bracarri, in Hispania Tarraconensis: at Braga there are the ruins of an amphitheatre, aqueduct, &c.

BRACHMĀNE or -I (Βραχμᾶνες), is a name used by the ancient geographers, sometimes for a caste of priests in India (the Brahmins), sometimes, apparently, for all the people whose religion was Brahminism, and sometimes for a particular tribe.

BRACHŌDES or CAPUT VADA (Βραχώδης ἄκρα. now Ras Karoudiah), a promontory on the coast of Byzacena, in Northern Africa, forming the northern headland of the Lesser Syrtis.

BRACHYLLES or BRACHYLLAS (Βραχύλλης, Βραχύλλας), a Boeotian, supported the Macedonian interests in the reigns of Antigonus Dison and Philip V. At the battle of Cyusoccephalæ, B.C. 197, he commanded the Boeotian troops in Philip's army, and was murdered in 196 at Thebes by the Roman party in that city.

BRANCHIDÆ (αἱ Βραγχίδαι: now Jeróna, ruins) afterward DIDYMA or -I (τὰ Δίδυμα, οἱ Δίδυμοι), a place on the sea-coast of Ionia, a little south of Miletus, celebrated for its temple and oracle of Apollo, surnamed Didymæus (Διδυμείος). This oracle, which the Ionians held in the highest esteem, was said to have been founded by Branchus, son of Apollo or Smierus of Delphi, and a Milesian woman. The reputed descendants of this Branchus, the Branchidæ (οἱ Βραγχίδαι), were the hereditary ministers of this oracle. They delivered up the treasures of the temple to Darius or Xerxes; and, when Xerxes returned from Greece, the Branchidæ, fearing the revenge of the Greeks, begged him to remove them to a distant part of his empire. They were accordingly settled in Bactria or Sogdiana, where their descendants are said to have been punished by the army of Alexander for the treason of their forefathers. The temple, called Didymæum, which was destroyed by Xerxes, was rebuilt, and its ruins contain some beautiful specimens of the Ionic order of architecture.

BRASĪDAS (Βρασιδᾶς), son of Tellis, the most distinguished Spartan in the first part of the Peloponnesian war. In B.C. 424, at the head of a small force, he effected a dexterous march through the hostile country of Thessaly, and joined Perdiccas of Macedonia, who had promised co-operation against the Athenians. By his military skill, and the confidence which his character inspired, he gained possession of many of the cities in Macedonia subject to Athens; his greatest acquisition was Amphipolis. In 422 he gained a brilliant victory over Cleon, who had been sent, with an Athenian force, to recover Amphipolis, but he was slain in the battle. He was buried within the city, and the inhabitants honored him as a hero by yearly sacrifices and by games. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. BRASIDEIA.

BRATSPANTĪUM (now Bratuspante, near Breiteuil), the chief town of the Bellovaci in Gallia Belgica.

BRΑURŌN (Βραυρών: Βραυρώνιος: now Vraona or Vrana), a demus in Attica, on the eastern coast, on the River Erasinus, with a celebrated temple of Diana (Artemis), who was hence called Brauronia, and in whose honor the festival Brauronia was celebrated in this place. Vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v.

BRĒGETĪO (near Szőny, ruins, east of Comorn), a Roman municipium in Lower Pannonia on the Danube, where Valentinian I. died.

BRĒNNUS. 1. The leader of the Senonian Gauls, who, in B.C. 390, crossed the Apennines, defeated the Romans at the Allia, and took Rome. After besieging the Capitol for six months, he quitted the city upon receiving one thousand pounds of gold as a ransom for the Capitol, and returned home safe with his booty. But it was subsequently related in the popular legends that Camillus and a Roman army appeared at the moment the gold was being weighed, that Brennus was defeated by Camillus, and that he himself and his whole army were slain to a man.—2. The chief leader of the Gauls who invaded Macedonia and Greece, B.C. 280, 279. In 280 Ptolemy Ceraunus was defeated by the Gauls under Brennus, and slain in battle; and Brennus in the following year penetrated into the south of Greece, but he was defeated near Delphi, most of his men were slain, and he himself put an end to his own life.

BRĒUCI, a powerful people of Pannonia, near the confluence of the Savus and the Danube, took an active part in the insurrection of the Pannonians and Dalmatians against the Romans, A.D. 6.

BRĒUCI, a Rætian people, dwelt in the Tyrol near the Breuner. (Hor., Carm., iv., 14, 11.)

BRĒICINNĪE (Βρικιννία), a place in Sicily not far from Leontini.

BRĒIGANTES, the most powerful of the British tribes, inhabited the whole of the north of the island from the Abus (now Humber) to the Roman wall, with the exception of the southeast corner of Yorkshire, which was inhabited by the Parisii. The Brigantes consequently inhabited the greater part of Yorkshire, and the whole of Lancashire, Durham, Westmoreland, and Cumberland. Their capital was EBORACUM. They were conquered by Petilius Cerealis in the reign of Vespasian. There was also a tribe of Brigantes in the south of Ireland, between the rivers Birgus (now Barrow) and Dabrona (now Blackwater), in the counties of Waterford and Tipperary.

BRĒIGANTĪI, a tribe in Vindelicia, on the Lake Brigantinus, noted for their robberies.

BRĒIGANTĪNUS LACUS (now Bodensee or Lake of Constance), also called VENETUS and ACRONIUS, through which the Rhine flows, was inhabited by the Helvetii on the south, by the Rætii on the southeast, and by the Vindelici on the north. Near an island on it, probably Reichenau, Tiberius defeated the Vindelici in a naval engagement.

BRĒIGANTIUM. 1. (Now Briançon), a town of the Segusiani in Gaul, at the foot of the Cottian Alps.—2. (Now Corunna), a sea-port town of the Lucenses, in Gallæcia in Spain, with a lighthouse, which is still used for the same purpose, having been repaired in 1791, and which is now called La Torre de Hercules.—3. (Now Bregenz), a town of the Brigantini Vindelici, on the Lake of Constance.

BRĒILESSUS (Βρηλίσσός), a mountain in Attica, northeast of Athens.

BRĒMO (Βρημός), "the angry or the terrifying," a surname of Hecate and Proserpina (Persphone.)

BRĒNIĀTES, a people in Liguria, south of the Po, near the modern Brignolo.

BRĒISĒIS (Βρισίς), daughter of Brises of Lyrnessus, fell into the hands of Achilles, but was seized by Agamemnon. Hence arose the dire feud between the two heroes. Vid. ACHILLES. Her proper name was Hippodamīa.

BRĒITANNĪA (ἡ Βρετανική or Βρετανική, sc. νῆσος, ἡ Βρεττανία or Βρετανία: Βρεττανοί, Βρεττανοί, Britanni, Brittōnes), the island of England and Scotland, which was also called ALBION (Ἄλβιον, Ἄλβιον, Insula Albionum). HIBERNIA or Ireland is usually spoken of as a separate island, but it is sometimes included under the general name of the INSULÆ BRITANNICÆ Βρετανικὰ νῆσοι), which also comprehended the smaller islands around the coast of Great Britain. The etymology of the word Britannia is uncertain, but it is derived by most writers from the Celtic word brith or brīū, "painted," with reference to the custom of the inhabitants of staining their bodies with a blue color: whatever may be the etymology of the word, it is certain that it was used by the inhabitants themselves, since in the Gaelic the inhabitants are called Brython, and their language Brythoneg. The name Albion is probably derived from the white cliffs of the island [for the more correct derivation, vid. ALBION]; but writers who derived the names of all lands and people from a mythical ancestor, connected the name with one Albion, the son of Neptune. The Britons were Celts, belonging to that branch of the race called Cymry, and were apparently the aboriginal inhabitants of the country. Their manners and customs were in general the same as the Gauls; but, separated more than the Gauls from intercourse with civilized nations, they preserved the Celtic religion in a purer state than in Gaul, and hence Druidism, according to Cæsar, was transplanted from Gaul to Britain. The Britons also retained many of the barbarous Celtic customs, which the more civilized Gauls had laid aside. They painted their bodies with a blue color extracted from woad, in order to appear more terrible in battle, and they had wives in common. At a later time the Belgæ crossed over from Gaul, and settled on the southern and eastern coasts, driving the Britons into the interior of the island. It was not till a late period that the Greeks and Romans obtained any knowledge of Britain. In early times the Phœnicians visited the Seilly Islands and the coast of Cornwall for the purpose of obtaining tin; but whatever knowledge they acquired of the country they jealously kept secret, and it only transpired that there were CASSITERIDES, or Tin Islands, in the northern parts of the ocean. The first certain knowledge which the Greeks obtained of Britain was from the merchants of Massilia, about the time of Alexander the Great, and especially from the voyages of PYTHEAS, who sailed round a great part of Britain. From this time it was generally believed that the island was in the form of a triangle, an error which continued to prevail even at a later period. Another important mistake, which likewise prevailed for a long time, was the position of Britain in relation to Gaul and Spain. As the northwestern coast of Spain was supposed to extend too far to the north, and the western coast of Gaul to run northeast, the lower part of Britain was believed to lie between Spain and Gaul. The Romans first became personally acquainted with the island by Cæsar's invasion. He twice landed in Britain (B.C. 55, 54), and though on the second occasion he conquered the greater part of the southeast of the island, yet he did not take permanent possession of any portion of the country, and after his departure the Britons continued as independent as before. The Romans made no further attempts to conquer the island for nearly one hundred years. In the reign of Claudius (A.D. 43), they again landed in Britain, and permanently subdued the country south of the Thames. They now began to extend their conquests over the other parts of the island; and the great victory (61) of Suetonius Paulinus over the Britons who had revolted under BOADICEA, still further consolidated the Roman dominions. In the reign of Vespasian, Petilius Cerealis and Julius Frontinus made several successful expeditions against the SILURES and the BRIGANTES; and the conquest of South Britain was at length finally completed by Agricola, who in seven campaigns (78-84) subdued the whole of the island as far north as the Frith of Forth and the Clyde, between which he erected a series of forts to protect the Roman dominions from the incursions of the barbarians in the north of Scotland. The Roman part of Britain was now called Britannia Romana, and the northern part, inhabited by the Caledonians, Britannia Barbara or Caledonia. The Romans, however, gave up the northern conquests of Agricola in the reign of Hadrian, and made a rampart of turf from the Æstuarium Ituna (now Solway Frith) to the German Ocean, which formed the northern boundary of their dominions. In the reign of Antoninus Pius the Romans again extended their boundary as far as the conquests of Agricola, and erected a rampart connecting the Forth and the Clyde, the remains of which are now called Grimes Dike, Grime in the Celtic language signifying great or powerful. The Caledonians afterward broke through this wall; and in consequence of their repeated devastations of the Roman dominions, the Emperor Severus went to Britain in 208, in order to conduct the war against them in person. He died in the island at Eboracum (now York) in 211, after erecting a solid stone wall from the Solway to the mouth of the Tyne, a little north of the rampart of Hadrian. After the death of Severus, the Romans relinquished forever all their conquests north of this wall. In 287 Carausius assumed the purple in Britain, and reigned as emperor, independent of Dioeletian and Maximian, till his assassination by Allectus in 293. Allectus reigned three years, and Britain was recovered for the emperors in 296. Upon the resignation of the empire by Dioeletian and Maximian (305), Britain fell to the share of Constantius, who died at Eboracum in 306, and his son Constantine assumed in the island the title of Cæsar. Shortly afterward, the Caledonians, who now appear under the names of Picts and Scots, broke through the wall of Severus, and the Saxons ravaged the coasts of Britain; and the declining power of the Roman empire was unable to afford the province any effectual assistance. In the reign of Valentinian I., Theodosius, the father of the emperor of that name, defeated the Picts and Scots (367); but in the reign of Honorius, Constantine, who had been proclaimed emperor in Britain (407), withdrew all the Roman troops from the island, in order to make himself master of Gaul. The Britons were thus left exposed to the ravages of the Picts and Scots, and at length, in 447, they called in the assistance of the Saxons, who became the masters of Britain. The Roman dominions of Britain formed a single province till the time of Severus, and were governed by a legatus of the emperor. Severus divided the country into two provinces, Britannia Superior and Inferior, of which the latter contained the earliest conquests of the Romans in the south of the island, and the former the later conquests in the north, the territories of the Silures, Brigantes, &c. Upon the new division of the provinces in the reign of Dioeletian, Britain was governed by a vicarius, subject to the præfectus prætorio of Gaul, and was divided into four provinces: (1.) Britannia Prima, the country south of the Thames; (2.) Britannia Secunda, Wales; (3.) Maxima Caesariensis, the country between the Thames and the Humber; (4.) Flavia Cæsariensis, the country between the Humber and the Roman wall. Besides these, there was also a fifth province, Valentia, which existed for a short time, including the conquests of Theodosius beyond the Roman wall.

BRITANNICUS, son of the Emperor Claudius and Messalina, was born A.D. 42. Agrippina, the second wife of Claudius, induced the emperor to adopt her own son, and give him precedence over Britannicus. This son, the Emperor Nero, ascended the throne in 54, and caused Britannicus to be poisoned in the following year.

[BRITOMARIS, a leader of the Galli Senones, who caused the Roman ambassadors to be put to death, and their bodies to be mangled with every possible indignity: this act brought upon him and his people the vengeance of the Romans.]

BRITOMARTIS (Βριτόμαρτις, usually derived from βριτός, sweet or blessing, and μάρτις, a maiden), was a Cretan nymph, daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Carme, and beloved by Minos, who pursued her nine months, till at length she leaped into the sea and was changed by Diana (Artemis) into a goddess. She seems to have been originally a Cretan divinity who presided over the sports of the chase; on the introduction of the worship of Diana (Artemis) into Crete she was naturally placed in some relation with the latter goddess; and at length the two divinities became identified, and Britomartis is called in one legend the daughter of Latona (Leto). At Ægina Britomartis was worshipped under the name of Aphæa.

BRIXELLUM (Brixellanus: now Bregella or Brescella), a town on the right bank of the Po, in Gallia Cisalpina, where the Emperor Otho put himself to death, A.D. 69.

BRIXIA (Brixianus: now Brescia), a town in Gallia Cisalpina, on the road from Comum to Aquileia, through which the River Mella flowed (fluvius quam molli percurrit flumine Mella, Catull., lxxvii., 33). It was probably founded by the Etruscans, was afterward a town of the Libui and then of the Cenomani, and finally became a Roman municipium with the rights of a colony.

BRUCTERI, a people of Germany, dwelt on each side of the Amisia (now Ems), and extended south as far as the Luppia (now Lippe). The Bructeri joined the Batavi in their revolt against the Romans in A.D. 69, and the prophetic virgin, VELEDA, who had so much influence among the German tribes, was a native of their country. A few years afterward the Bructeri were almost annihilated by the Chamavi and Angrivarii. (Tac. Germ., 33.)

BRUNDISIUM or BRUNDISIUM (Βρενδῖσιον, Βρενδῆσιον; Brundisium: now Brindisi), a town in Calabria, on a small bay of the Adriatic, forming an excellent harbor, to which the place owed its importance. The Appia Via terminated at Brundisium, and it was the usual place of embarkation for Greece and the East. It was an ancient town, and probably not of Greek origin, although its foundation is ascribed by some writers to the Cretans, and by others to Diomedes. It was at first governed by kings of its own, but was conquered and colonized by the Romans, B.C. 245. The poet Pæuvius was born at this town, and Virgil died here on his return from Greece, B.C. 19.

[BRUTTIUS SURA. Vid. SURA.]

BRUTTIUM, BRUTTIUS, and BRUTTIORUM AGER (Βρεττία: Bruttium), more usually called BRUTTIUM, after the inhabitants, the southern extremity of Italy, separated from Lucania by a line drawn from the mouth of the Laus to Thurii, and surrounded on the other three sides by the sea. It was the country called in ancient times Enotria and Italia. The country is mountainous, as the Apennines run through it down to the Sicilian Straits; it contained excellent pasturage for cattle, and the valley produced good corn, olives, and fruit. The earliest inhabitants of the country were Enotrians. Subsequently some Lucanians, who had revolted from their countrymen in Lucania, took possession of the country, and were hence called Bruttii or Brettii, which word is said to mean "rebels" in the language of the Lucanians. This people, however, inhabited only the interior of the land; the coast was almost entirely in the possession of the Greek colonies. At the close of the second Punic war, in which the Bruttii had been the allies of Hannibal, they lost their independence, and were treated by the Romans with great severity. They were declared to be public slaves, and were employed as lieters and servants of the magistrates.

BRUTUS, JUNIUS. 1. L., son of M. Junius and of Tarquinia, the sister of Tarquinius Superbus, His elder brother was murdered by Tarquinius, and Lucius escaped his brother's fate only by feigning idiocy, whence he received the surname of Brutus. After Lucretia had stabbed herself, Brutus roused the Romans to expel the Tarquins; and upon the banishment of the latter, he was elected first consul with Tarquinius Collatinus. He loved his country better than his children, and put to death his two sons, who had attempted to restore the Tarquins. He fell in battle the same year, fighting against Aruns, the son of Tarquinius. Brutus was the great hero in the legends about the expulsion of the Tarquins, but we have no means of determining what part of the account is historical.—2. D., surnamed SCÆVA, magister equitum to the dictator Q. Publius Philo, B.C. 339, and consul in 325, when he fought against the Vestini.—3. D., surnamed SCÆVA, consul 292, conquered the Faliscans.—4. M., tribune of the plebs 195, prætor 191, when he dedicated the temple of the Great Idaean Mother, one of the ambassadors sent into Asia 189, and consul 178, when he subdued the Istri. He was again one of the ambassadors sent into Asia in 171.—5. P., tribune of the plebs 195, curule ædile 192, prætor 190, proprætor in Further Spain 189.—6. D., surnamed GALLECUS (CALLÆCUS) or CALLAICUS, consul 138, commanded in Further Spain, and conquered a great part of Lusitania. From his victory over the Gallæi he obtained his surname. He was a patron of the poet L. Accius, and well versed in Greek and Roman literature.—7. D., son of No. 6, consul 77, and husband of Sempromia, who carried on an intrigue with Catiline.—8. D., adopted by A. Postumius Albinus, consul 99, and hence called Brutus Albinus. He served under Cæsar in Gaul and in the civil war. He commanded Cæsar's fleet at the siege of Massilia, 49, and was afterward placed over Further Gaul. On his return to Rome Brutus was promised the prætorship and the government of Cisalpine Gaul for 44. Nevertheless, he joined the conspiracy against Cæsar. After the death of the latter (44) he went into Cisalpine Gaul, which he refused to surrender to Antony, who had obtained this province from the people. Antony made war against him, and kept him besieged in Mutina, till the siege was raised in April, 43, by the consuls Hirtius and Pansa, and Octavianus. But Brutus only obtained a short respite. Antony was preparing to march against him from the north with a large army, and Octavianus, who had deserted the senate, was marching against him from the south. His only resource was flight, but he was betrayed by Camillus, a Gaulish chief, and was put to death by Antony, 43.—9. M., prætor 88, belonged to the party of Marius, and put an end to his own life in 82, that he might not fall into the hands of Pompey, who commanded Sulla's fleet.—10. L., also called DAMASIPPUS, prætor 82, when the younger Marius was blockaded at Præneste, put to death at Rome by order of Marius several of the most eminent senators of the opposite party.—11. M., married Servilia, the half-sister of Cato of Utica. He was tribune of the plebs 83, and in 77 he espoused the cause of Lepidus, and was placed in command of the forces in Cisalpine Gaul, where he was slain by command of Pompey.—12. M., the so-called tyrannicide, son of No. 11 and Servilia. He lost his father when he was only eight years old, and was trained by his uncle Cato in the principles of the aristocratical party. Accordingly, on the breaking out of the civil war, 49, he joined Pompey, although he was the murderer of his father. After the battle of Pharsalia, 48, he was not only pardoned by Cæsar, but received from him the greatest marks of confidence and favor. Cæsar made him governor of Cisalpine Gaul in 46, and prætor in 44, and also promised him the government of Macedonia. But, notwithstanding all the obligations he was under to Cæsar, he was persuaded by Cassius to murder his benefactor under the delusive idea of again establishing the republic. Vid. CÆSAR. After the murder of Cæsar Brutus spent a short time in Italy, and then took possession of the province of Macedonia. He was joined by Cassius, who commanded in Syria, and their united forces were opposed to those of Octavianus and Antony. Two battles were fought in the neighborhood of Philippi (42), in the former of which Brutus was victorious, though Cassius was defeated, but in the latter Brutus also was defeated and put an end to his own life. Brutus's wife was PORCIA, the daughter of Cato. Brutus was an ardent student of literature and philosophy, but he appears to have been deficient in judgment and original power. He wrote several works, all of which have perished. He was a literary friend of Cicero, who dedicated to him his Tusculanæ Disputationes, De Finibus, and Orator, and who has given the name of Brutus to his dialogue on illustrious orators.

BRYAXIS (Βρύαξις), an Athenian statuary in stoue and metal, lived B.C. 372–312, [one of the artists engaged in adorning the tomb of Mausolus with bas reliefs.]

BRYGI or BRYGES (Βρύγοι, Βρύγες), a barbarous people in the north of Macedonia, probably of Illyrian or Thracian origin, who were still in Macedonia at the time of the Persian war. The Phrygians were believed by the ancients to have been a portion of this people, who emigrated to Asia in early times. Vid. PHRYGIA.

[BUBÆRES (Βουβæρης), son of Megabazus, sent as a special messenger to Macedonia, but allowed himself to be bribed to neglect his duty. In conjunction with Artaebæes, Bubæres superintended the construction of the canal which Xerxes made across the isthmus of Athos. Vid. ATHOS.]

BUBASSUS (Βύβασσος), an ancient city of Caria, east of Cnidus, which gave name to the bay (Bubassius Sinus) and the peninsula (ἡ Χερσόνησος ἢ Βυβασσίνη) on which it stood. Ovid speaks of Bubæsides nurus (Met. ix, 643.)

BUBASTIS (Βοῦβαστίς), daughter of Osiris and Isis, an Egyptian divinity, whom the Greeks identified with Diana (Artemis), since she was the goddess of the moon. The cat was sacred to her, and she was represented in the form of a cat, or of a female with the head of a cat.

BUBASTIS or -US (Βοῦβαστίς or -ος; Βοῦβαστίτης: ruins at Tel Basta), the capital of the Nomos Bubastites in Lower Egypt, stood on the eastern bank of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, and was the chief seat of the worship of Bubastis, whose annual festival was kept here. Under the Persians the city was dismantled, and lost much of its importance.

BUBULCUS, C. JUNIUS, consul B.C. 317, a second time in 313, and a third time in 311; in the last of these years he carried on the war against the Samnites with great success. He was censor in 309, and dictator in 302, when he defeated the Æquians; in his dictatorship he dedicated the temple of Safety which he had vowed in his third consulship. The walls of this temple were adorned with paintings by C. Fabius Pictor.

ΒUCEPHALA or -IA (Βουκέφαλα or -ύλια: [now probably Mung, near Jhelum]), a city on the Hydaspes (now Jhelum), in Northern India (the Punjab), built by Alexander after his battle with Porus, in memory of his favorite charger Bucephalus, whom he buried here. It stood at the place where Alexander crossed the river and where General Gilbert crossed it (February 1849) after the battle of Goojerat.

ΒΥΚΕΦΑΛΟΣ (Βουκέφαλος), the celebrated horse of Alexander the Great, which Philip purchased for thirteen talents, and which no one was able to break in except the youthful Alexander. This horse carried Alexander through his Asiatic campaigns, and died in India B.C. 327. Vid. BUCEPHALA.

[BUCOLION (Βουκολίων, ἡ), a small city of Arcadia.]

BUDALIA, a town in Lower Pannonia, near Sirmium, the birth-place of the Emperor Decius.

BUDINI (Βουδῖνοι), a Scythian people, who dwelt north of the Sauromatae, in the steppes of Southern Russia. Herodotus (iv., 108) calls the nation γλαυκόν τε καὶ πυρρόν, which some interpret "with blue eyes and red hair," and others "painted blue and red." [In their territory was a mountain called BUDINUS, near the sources of the Borysthenes.]

ΒΥΘΩΝ (Βούθων), a fortress in Salamis, on a promontory of the same name, opposite Megara.

BULIS (Βούλις) and SPERTHIAS (Σπερθίης), two Spartans, voluntarily went to Xerxes and offered themselves for punishment to atone for the murder of the heralds whom Darius had sent to Sparta; but they were dismissed uninjured by the king.

BULIS (Βούλις: Βούλιος), a town in Phocis, on the Corinthian Gulf, and on the borders of Bœotia.

BULLIS (Bullinus, Bullio, -ōnis, Bulliensis), a town of Illyria, on the coast, south of Apollouia, capital of the Bulliones.

BΥΡΑΛΟΣ and his brother ATHĒNIS, sculptors of Chios, lived about B.C. 500, and are said to have made caricatures of the poet Hipponax, which the poet requited by the bitterest satires.

[ΒΥΡΗΓΙΟΝ (Βουφάγιον), a small town of Arcadia, on the Buphagus, which flows between the territories of Megalopolis and Heræa.]

[ΒΥΡΗΡΑΣ (Βουφράς), a mountain in Messenia, near Pylos.]

[ΒΥΡΟΡΤΗΜΟΣ (Βούρορθος), a mountain in Argolis, between Hermione and Troezen: on it was a temple of Ceres and Proserpina, and one of Bacchus.]

ΒΥΡΑΣΙΟΝ (Βουπράσιον: -σιεύς, -σίων, -σίδης), an ancient town in Elis, mentioned in the Iliad, which had disappeared in the time of Strabo.

BΥΡΑ (Βούρα: Βουραῖος, Βούριος; ruins near Kalavrytra), one of the twelve cities of Achaia, destroyed by an earthquake, together with Helice, but subsequently rebuilt.

BURDIGALA (Βουρδίγαλα: now Bordeaux), the capital of the Bituriges Vivisci in Aquitania, on the left bank of the Garumna (now Garonne), was a place of great commercial importance, and at a later time one of the chief seats of literature and learning. It was the birth-place of the poet Ausonius.

BURGUNDIÖNES or BURGUNDI, a powerful nation of Germany, dwelt originally between the Viadus (now Oder) and the Vistula, and were of the same race as the Vandals or Goths. They pretended, however, to be descendants of the Romans, whom Drusus and Tiberius had left in Germany as garrisons, but this descent was evidently invented by them to obtain more easily from the Romans a settlement west of the Rhine. They were driven out of their original abodes between the Oder and the Vistula by the Gepidæ, and the greater part of them migrated west and settled in the country on the Main, where they carried on frequent wars with their neighbors the Alemanni. In the fifth century they settled west of the Alps in Gaul, where they founded the powerful kingdom of Burgundy. Their chief towns were Geneva and Lyons.

BURI, a people of Germany, dwelt near the sources of the Viadus (now Oder) and Vistula, and joined the Marcomanni in their war against the Romans in the reign of Marcus Aurelius.

BURRUS, AFRANIUS, was appointed by Claudius præfectus prætorio A.D. 52, and, in conjunction with Seneca, conducted the education of Nero. He opposed Nero's tyrannical acts, and was at length poisoned by command of the emperor, 63.

BURSA. Vid. PLANCUS.

BURSAO (Bursaensis, Bursavolensis), a town of the Autrigonæ in Hispania Tarraconensis.

BUSIRIS (Βούσιρις), king of Egypt, son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Lysianassa, is said to have sacrificed all foreigners that visited Egypt. Hercules, on his arrival in Egypt, was likewise seized and led to the altar, but he broke his chains and slew Busiris. This myth seems to point out a time when the Egyptians were accustomed to offer human sacrifices to their deities.

BUSIRIS (Βούσιρις: Βουσιρίτης). 1. (Now Abousir, ruins), the capital of the Nomos Busirites in Lower Egypt, stood just in the middle of the Delta, on the western bank of the Nile, and had a great temple of Isis, the remains of which are still standing.—2. (Now Abousir, near Jizeh), a small town a little northwest of Memphis.

[BUTAS (Βούτας), a Greek poet of uncertain age, who wrote in elegiac verse an account of early Roman history. Some lines on the fabulous origin of the Lupercalia are preserved in Plutarch's Life of Romulus.]

BUTEO, FABIUS. 1. N., consul B.C. 247, in the first Punic war, was employed in the siege of Drepanum.—2. M., consul 245, also in the first Punic war. In 216 he was appointed dictator to fill up the vacancies in the senate occasioned by the battle of Cannæ.—3. Q., prætor 181, with the province of Cisalpine Gaul. In 179 he was one of the triumvirs for founding a Latin colony in the territory of the Pisani.

BUTES (Βούτης). 1. Son of either Teleon, or Pandion, or Amyceus, and Zeuxippe. He was one of the Argonauts, and priest of Minerva (Athena) and of the Erechthean Neptune (Poseidon). The Attic family of the Butadæ or Eteobutadæ derived their origin from him; and in the Erechthæum on the Aeropolis there was an altar dedicated to Butes.—[2. An Argive, who went with Tlepolemus, son of Hercules, to Rhodes: when the latter sailed for Troy, he gave over the island to Butes.—3. Armor-bearer of Anchises, afterward given as a companion to Iulus by his father Æneas. Apollo assumed his form to dissuade Iulus from continuing the fight.—4. A Trojan companion of Æneas, slain by Camilla.]

BUTHRŌTUM (Βουθροτόν: Βουθρότιος: now Bu-trinto), a town of Epirus, on a small peninsula opposite Coreyra, was a flourishing sea-port, and was colonized by the Romans.

BŪTŌ (Βουτώ), an Egyptian divinity, worshipped principally in the town of Buto. She was the nurse of Horus and Bubastis, the children of Osiris and Isis, and she saved them from the persecutions of Typhon by concealing them in the floating island of Chemmis. The Greeks identified her with Leto, and represented her as the goddess of night. The shrew-mouse (μυγαλή) and the hawk were sacred to her.

BŪTŌ (Βουτώ, Βούτη, or Βούτος: Βουτοίτης: now Baltim ? ruins), the chief city of the Nomos Chemmis in Lower Egypt, stood near the Sebennytic branch of the Nile, on the Lake of Buto (Βουτικὴ λίμνη, also Σεβεννυτικὴ), and was celebrated for its oracle of the goddess Buto, in honor of whom a festival was held at the city every year.

BUXENTUM (Buxentinus, Buxentius: now Policastro), originally ΠΥΧΥΣ (Πυσοῦς), a town on the west coast of Lucania and on the River BUXENTIUS, was founded by Micythus, tyrant of Messana, B.C. 471, and was afterward a Roman colony.

BYBLĪNI MONTES (τὰ Βύβλινα ὄρη), the mountains whence the Nile is said to flow in the mythical geography of Æschylus (Prom., 811).

BYBLIS (Βύβλις), daughter of Miletus and Idothea, was in love with her brother Caunus, whom she pursued through various lands, till at length, worn out with sorrow, she was changed into a fountain.

BYBLUS (Βύβλος: Βύβλιος: now Jebeil), a very ancient city on the coast of Phœnicia, between Berytus and Tripolis, a little north of the River Adonis. It was the chief seat of the worship of Adonis. It was governed by a succession of petty princes, the last of whom was deposed by Pompey.

BYLAZŌRA (Βυλάζωρα: now Bilias), a town in Pœonia, in Macedonia, on the River Astyæus.

BYRSA (Βύρσα), the citadel of CARTHAGO.

BYZACĪUM OR BYZACĒNA REGIO (Βυζάκιον, Βυζακίς χώρα: southern part of Tunis), the southern portion of the Roman province of Africa. Vid. AFRICA, p. 28, b.

BYZANTĪNI SCRIPTŌRES, the general name of the historians who have given an account of the Eastern or Byzantine empire from the time of Constantine the Great, A.D. 325, to the destruction of the empire, 1453. They all wrote in Greek, and may be divided into different classes. 1. The historians whose collected works form an uninterrupted history of the Byzantine empire, and whose writings are therefore called Corpus Historiæ Byzantinæ. They are, (1.) ZONARAS, who begins with the creation of the world, and brings his history down to 1188. (2.) NICEPHORUS ACOMINATUS, whose history extends from 1188 to 1206. (3.) NICEPHORUS GREGORAS, whose history extends from 1204 to 1331. (4.) LAONICUS CHALCONDYLES, whose history extends from 1297 to 1462: his work is continued by an anonymous writer to 1565.—2. The chronographers, who give a brief chronological summary of universal history from the creation of the world to their own times. These writers are very numerous: the most important of them are GEORGIUS SYNCCELLUS, THEOPHANES, NICEPHORUS, CEDREXUS, SIMEON METAPHRASTES, MICHAEL GLYCAS, the authors of the Chronicon Paschale, &c.—3. The writers who have treated of separate portions of Byzantine history, such as ZOSIMUS, PROCOPIUS, AGATHIAS, ANNA COMNENA, &c.—4. The writers who have treated of the constitution, antiquities, &c., of the empire, such as LAURENTIUS LYDUS, CONSTANTINUS VI. PORPHYROGENNETUS. A collection of the Byzantine writers was published at Paris by command of Louis XIV., in 36 vols. fol., 1645–1711. A reprint of this edition, with additions, was published at Venice, in 23 vols. fol., 1727–1733. A new edition of the Byzantine writers was commenced by Niebuhr, Bonn, 1828, 8vo, and is still in course of publication.

BYZANTIŪM (Βυζάντιον: Βυζάντιος, Byzantium: now Constantinople), a town on the Thracian Bosphorus, founded by the Megarians, B.C. 658, is said to have derived its name from Byzas, the leader of the colony and the son of Neptune (Poseidon). It was situated on two hills, was forty stadia in circumference, and its acropolis stood on the site of the present seraglio. Its favorable position, commanding as it did the entrance to the Euxine, soon rendered it a place of great commercial importance. It was taken by Pausanias after the battle of Platææ, B.C. 479; and it was alternately in the possession of the Athenians and Lacedæmonians during the Peloponnesian war. The Lacedæmonians were expelled from Byzantium by Thrasybulus in 390, and the city remained independent for some years. Afterward it became subject in succession to the Macedonians and the Romans. In the civil war between Pescennius Niger and Severus, it espoused the cause of the former: it was taken by Severus A.D. 196, after a siege of three years, and a considerable part of it destroyed. A new city was built by its side (330) by Constantine, who made it the capital of the empire, and changed its name into CONSTANTINOPOLIS.

[BYZAS (Βύζας), mythic founder of Byzantium, q. v.]

C.

CĀBĀLIA OR -IS (Καβαλία, Καβαλίς: Καβαλεύς, Καβάλιος), a small district of Asia Minor, between Lycia and Pamphylia, with a town of the same name.

CĀBĀSA OR -US (Κάβασος: Κάβασιτης), the chief city of the Nomos Cabasites, in Lower Egypt.

CABILLŌNUM [OR CABALLĪNUM (Καβαλλῖνον: now Châlons-sur-Saône), a town of the Ædui, on the Arar (now Saône), in Gallia Lugdunensis, was a place of some commercial activity when Cæsar was in Gaul (B.C. 53). At a later time the Romans kept a small fleet here.

CABIRA (τὰ Κάβειρα: now Sivas), a place in Pontus, on the borders of Armenia, near Mount Paryadres: a frequent residence of Mithradates, who was defeated here by Lucullus, B.C. 71. Pompey made it a city, and named it Diospolis. Under Augustus it was called Sebaste.

CABIRI (Κάβειροι), mystic divinities who occur in various parts of the ancient world. The meaning of their name, their character and nature, are quite uncertain. They were chiefly worshipped at Samothrace, Lemnos, and Imbros, and their mysteries at Samothrace were solemnized with great splendor. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. CABELIRA. They were also worshipped at Thebes, Anthedon, Pergamus, and elsewhere. Most of the early writers appear to have regarded them as the children of Vulcan (Hephæstus), and as inferior divinities dwelling in Samothrace, Lemnos, and Imbros. Later writers identify them with Ceres (Demeter), Proserpina (Persephone), and Rhea, and regard their mysteries as solemnized in honor of one of these goddesses. Other writers identify the Cabiri with the Dioscuri (Castor and Pollux), and others, again, with the Roman penates; but the latter notion seems to have arisen with those writers who traced every ancient Roman institution to Troy, and thence to Samothrace.

CABYLE (Καβύλη: Καβύληνός: now Golowitza), a town in the interior of Thrace, conquered by M. Lucullus, probably the Goloë of the Byzantine writers.

CACUS, son of Vulcan, was a huge giant, who inhabited a cave on Mount Aventine, and plundered the surrounding country. When Hercules came to Italy with the oxen which he had taken from Geryon in Spain, Cacus stole part of the cattle while the hero slept; and, as he dragged the animals into his cave by their tails, it was impossible to discover their traces. But when the remaining oxen passed by the cave, those within began to bellow, and were thus discovered, whereupon Cacus was slain by Hercules. In honor of his victory, Hercules dedicated the ara maxima, which continued to exist ages afterward in Rome.

CACYPÆRIS (Κακὺπάρης or Κακόπαρις; now Cassibili), a river in Sicily, south of Syracuse.

CANENA (τὰ Κάνηνα), a strong city of Cappadocia, the residence of the last king, Archelaus.

CANI (Κάνοι: Καδνός: now Kodus), a city of Phrygia Epictetus, on the borders of Lydia.

CADMEÆ. Vid. THEBÆ.

CADMUS (Κάδμος). 1. Son of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, and of Telephassa, and brother of Europa. Another legend makes him a native of Thebes in Egypt. When Europa was carried off by Jupiter (Zeus) to Crete, Agenor sent Cadmus in search of his sister, enjoining him not to return without her. Unable to find her, Cadmus settled in Thrace, but, having consulted the oracle at Delphi, he was commanded by the god to follow a cow of a certain kind, and to build a town on the spot where the cow should sink down with fatigue. Cadmus found the cow in Phœcis, and followed her into Bœotia, where she sank down on the spot on which Cadmus built Cadmea, afterward the citadel of Thebes. Intending to sacrifice the cow to Minerva (Athena), he sent some persons to the neighboring well of Mars (Ares) to fetch water.

This well was guarded by a dragon, a son of Mars (Ares), who killed the men sent by Cadmus. Thereupon Cadmus slew the dragon, and, on the advice of Minerva (Athena), sowed the teeth of the monster, out of which armed men grew up, called Sparti or the Sown, who killed each other, with the exception of five, who were the ancestors of the Thebans. Minerva (Athena) assigned to Cadmus the government of Thebes, and Jupiter (Zeus) gave him Harmonia for his wife. The marriage solemnity was honored by the presence of all the Olympian gods in the Cadmea. Cadmus gave to Harmonia the famous poplul and necklace which he had received from Vulcan (Hephæstus) or from Europa, and he became by her the father of Autonœ, Ino, Semele, Agave, and Polydorus. Subsequently Cadmus and Harmonia quitted Thebes, and went to the Encheleians: this people chose Cadmus as their king, and with his assistance they conquered the Illyrians. After this Cadmus had another son, whom he called Illyrius. In the end, Cadmus and Harmonia were changed into serpents, and were removed by Jupiter (Zeus) to Elysium. Cadmus is said to have introduced into Greece, from Phœnicia or Egypt, an alphabet of sixteen letters, and to have been the first who worked the mines of Mount Pangæon in Thrace. The story of Cadmus seems to suggest the immigration of a Phœnician or Egyptian colony into Greece, by means of which the alphabet, the art of mining, and civilization, came into the country. But many modern writers deny the existence of any such Phœnician or Egyptian colony, and regard Cadmus as a Pelasgian divinity.—2. Of Miletus, a son of Pandion, the earliest Greek historian or logographer, lived about B.C. 540. He wrote a work on the foundation of Miletus and the earliest history of Ionia generally, in four books, but the work extant in antiquity under the latter name was considered a forgery.

CADMUS (Κάδμος). 1. (Now Mount Baba), a mountain in Caria, on the borders of Phrygia, containing the sources of the rivers Cadmus and Lycus.—2. A small river of Phrygia, flowing north into the Lycus.

CADURCI, a people in Gallia Aquitania, in the country now called Querci (a corruption of Cadurei), were celebrated for their manufactories of linen, coverlets, &c. Their capital was DIVONA, afterward CIVITAS CADURCORUM, now Cahors, where are the remains of a Roman amphitheatre and of an aqueduct. A part of the town still bears the name les Cadurcas.

CADŪSIŪ (Καδούσιοι) or GÊLE (Γῆλαι), a powerful Scythian tribe in the mountains southwest of the Caspian, on the borders of Media Atropatene. Under the Medo-Persian empire they were troublesome neighbors, but the Syrian kings appear to have reduced them to tributary auxiliaries.

CADYTIS (Κάδυτις), according to Herodotus, a great city of the Syrians of Palestine, not much smaller than Sardis, was taken by Necho, king of Egypt, after his defeat of the "Syrians" at Magdolis. It is now pretty well established that by Cadytis is meant Jerusalem, and that the battle mentioned by Herodotus is that in which Necho defeated and slew King Josiah at Megiddo, B.C. 608. (Compare Herod., ii, 159; iii, 5, with 2 Kings, xxiii, and 2 Chron., xxxv., xxxvi.).

CÆCILIA. 1. CALA, the Roman name of TAN- AQUIL, wife of Tarquinius Priscus.—[2. METELLA, daughter of Q. Cæcilius Metellus Macedonicus, consul B.C. 143, married C. Servilius Vatia, and was by him mother of P. Servilius Vatia Isauricus, consul B.C. 79; a second daughter married P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, consul B.C. 111.—3. Daughter of L. Cæcilius Metellus Calvus, married to L. Licinius Lucullus, and by him mother of the celebrated Lucullus, the conqueror of Mithradates.—4. Daughter of Q. Cæcilius Metellus Balearicus, consul B.C. 123, was wife of Ap. Claudius Pulcher.]—5. METELLA, daughter, of L. Metellus Dalmaticus, consul B.C. 119, was first married to Æmilius Scaurus, consul in 115, and afterward to the dictator Sulla. She fell ill in 81, during the celebration of Sulla's triumphal feast; and, as her recovery was hopeless, Sulla, for some religious reasons, sent her a bill of divorce, and had her removed from his house, but honored her memory with a splendid funeral.—6. Daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, called Cæcilia, because her father took the name of his uncle, Q. Cæcilius, by whom he was adopted. She was married to M. Vipsanius Agrippa. Vid. ATTICUS.

CÆCILIA GENS, plebeian, claimed descent from CÆCULUS, the founder of Præneste, or Cæces, the companion of Æneas. Most of the Cæciliæ are mentioned under their cognome, BASSÆ, METELLUS, RUFUS: for others, see below.

CÆCILIUS. 1. Q., a wealthy Roman eque, who adopted his nephew Atticus in his will, and left the latter a fortune of ten millions of sesterces.—2. CÆCILIUS CALACTINUS, a Greek rhetorician at Rome in the time of Augustus, was a native of Cale Acte in Sicily (whence his name Calactinus). He wrote a great number of works on rhetoric, grammar, and historical subjects. All these works are now lost; but they were in great repute with the rhetoricians and critics of the imperial period.—3. CÆCILIUS STATIUS, a Roman comic poet, the immediate predecessor of Terence, was by birth an Insubrian Gaul, and a native of Milan. Being a slave, he bore the servile appellation of Statius, which was afterward, probably when he received his freedom, converted into a sort of cognomen, and he became known as Cæcilius Statius. He died B.C. 168. We have the titles of forty of his dramas, but only a few fragments of them are preserved. They appear to have belonged to the class of Palliata, that is, were free translations or adaptations of the works of Greek writers of the new comedy. The Romans placed Cæcilius in the first rank of comic poets, classing him with Plautus and Terence. [The best edition of the fragments is by Spengel, Monachii, 1829, 4to; they are given also in Bothe's Poeta Scenici Latini, vol. v., p. 128, seqq.]

CÆCINA, the name of a family of the Etruscan city of Volaterræ, probably derived from the River Cæcina, which flows by the town. 1. A. CÆCINA, whom Cicero defended in a law-suit, B.C. 69.—2. A. CÆCINA, son of the preceding, published a libellous work against Cæsar, and was, in consequence, sent into exile after the battle of Pharsalia, B.C. 48. He afterward joined the Pompeians in Africa, and upon the defeat of the latter in 46, he surrendered to Cæsar, who spared his life. Cicero wrote several letters to Cæcina, and speaks of him as a man of ability. Cæcina was the author of a work on the Etrusca Disciplina.—3. A. CÆCINA SEVERUS, a distinguished general in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. He was governor of Mœsia in A.D. 6, when he fought against the two Batos in the neighboring provinces of Dalmatia and Pannonia. Vid. BATO. In 15 he fought as the legate of Germanicus against Arminius, and, in consequence of his success, received the insignia of a triumph.—4. CÆCINA TUSCUS, son of Nero's nurse, appointed governor of Egypt by Nero, but banished for making use of the baths which had been erected in anticipation of the emperor's arrival in Egypt. He returned from banishment on the death of Nero, A.D. 68.—5. A. CÆCINA ALIENUS, was quaestor in Bœtica in Spain at Nero's death, and was one of the foremost in joining the party of Galba. He was rewarded by Galba with the command of a legion in Upper Germany; but being detected in embezzling some of the public money, the emperor ordered him to be prosecuted. Cæcina, in revenge, joined Vitellius, and was sent by the latter into Italy with an army of thirty thousand men toward the end of 68. After ravaging the country of the Helvetii, he crossed the Alps by the pass of the Great St. Bernard, and laid siege to Placentia, from which he was repulsed by the troops of Otho, who had succeeded Galba. Subsequently he was joined by Fabius Valens, another general of Vitellius, and their united forces gained a victory over Otho's army at Bedriacum. Vitellius having thus gained the throne, Cæcina was made consul on the first of September, 69, and was shortly afterward sent against Antoninus Primus, the general of Vespasian. But he again proved a traitor, and espoused the cause of Vespasian. Some years afterward (79) he conspired against Vespasian, and was slain by order of Titus.—6. DECUS ALBINUS CÆCINA, a Roman satirist in the time of Arcadius and Honorius.

CÆCINUS (Καικινός or Καικίνος), a river in Bruttium, flowing into the Sinus Scylacius by the town CÆCINUM.

CÆCIBUS AGER, a marshy district in Latium, bordering on the Gulf of Amyclæ, close to Fundi, celebrated for its wine (Cæcubum) in the age of Horæc. In the time of Pliny the reputation of this wine was entirely gone. Vid. Diet. of Ant., p. 1207, a, second edition.

CÆCULUS, an ancient Italian hero, son of Vulcan, is said to have founded Præneste.

[CÆDICUS, M. 1. A Roman centurion, was elected commander by the Romans that had fled to Veii after the destruction of the city by the Gauls, B.C. 390: he is said to have carried to Camillus the decree of the senate appointing him to the command.—2. C., one of the legates of the consul L. Papirius Cursor, commanded the cavalry in the great battle with the Samnites, B.C. 293.]

[CÆDICUS, two mythical personages mentioned in the Æneid of Virgil.]

CÆLES or CÆLIUS VIBENNA, the leader of an Etruscan army, is said to have come to Rome in the reign either of Romulus or of Tarquinius Priscus, and to have settled with his troops on the hill called after him the Cælian.

CÆNE (Kawai; now Senn), a city of Mesopotamia, on the west bank of the Tigris, opposite the mouth of the Lyeus.

CÆNE, CÆNEPŌLIS, or NEAPŌLIS (Kawē pŏlis, Nēh pŏlis; now Keneh), a city of Upper Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, a little below Coptos, and opposite to Tentyra.

CÆNEUS (Kawēús), one of the Lapithæ, son of Elatus or Coronus, was originally a maiden named CÆNIS, who was beloved by Neptune (Poseidon), and was by this god changed into a man, and rendered invulnerable. As a man, he took part in the Argonautic expedition and the Calydonian hunt. In the battle between the Lapithæ and the Centaurs at the marriage of Pirithous, he was buried by the Centaurs under a mass of trees, as they were unable to kill him, but he was changed into a bird. In the lower world Cæneus recovered his female form. (Virg. Æn. vi, 448.)

CÆNI or CÆNICI, a Thracian people between the Black Sea and the Panyass.

CÆNINA (Cæninensis), a town of the Sabines in Latium, whose king, Aeron, is said to have carried on the first war against Rome. After their defeat, most of the inhabitants removed to Rome.

CÆNIS. Vid. CÆNEUS.

CÆNVS (Kawv; now Capo di Cavallo or Coda di Volpe), a promontory of Bruttium opposite Sicily.

CÆPĀRIUS, M., of Tarracina, one of Catiline's conspirators, was to induce the shepherds in Apulia to rise: he escaped from the city, but was overtaken in his flight, and was executed with the other conspirators, B.C. 63.

CÆPIO, SERVILIUS. 1. CN., consul B.C. 253, in the first Punic war, sailed with his colleague, C. Sempronius Blæsus, to the coast of Africa.—2. CN., curule ædile 207, prætor 205, and consul 203, when he fought against Hannibal near Croton, in the south of Italy. He died in the pestilence in 174.—3. CN., son of No. 2. curule ædile 179, prætor 174, with Spain as his province, and consul in 169.—4. Q., son of No. 3, consul 142, was adopted by Q. Fabius Maximus. Vid. MAXIMUS.—5. CN., son of No. 3, consul 141, and censor 125.—6. CN., son of No. 3, consul 140, carried on war against Viriathus in Lusitania, and induced two of the friends of Viriathus to murder the latter.—7. Q., son of No. 6, was consul 106, when he proposed a law for restoring the judicia to the senators, of which they had been deprived by the Sempronian lex of C. Græchus. He was afterward sent into Gallia Narbonensis to oppose the Cimbri, and was in 105 defeated by the Cimbri, along with the consul Cn. Mallius or Manlius, on which occasion eighty thousand soldiers and forty thousand camp-followers are said to have perished. Cæpio survived the battle, but ten years afterward (95) he was brought to trial by the tribune C. Norbanus on account of his misconduct in this war. He was condemned and east into prison, where, according to one account, he died, but it was more generally stated that he escaped from prison and lived in exile at Smyrna.—8. Q., quæstor urbanus 100, opposed the lex frumentaria of Saturninus. In 91 he opposed the measures of Drusus, and accused two of the most distinguished senators, M. Scaurus and L. Philippus. He fell in battle in the Social War, 90.

CÆPIO, FANNIUS, conspired with Murena against Augustus B.C. 22, and was put to death.

CÆRE (Cærites, Cæretes, Cæretani; now Cervetri), called by the Greeks AGYLLA (Αγυλλα: poet. Agyllina urbs, Virg. Æn. vii. 652), a city in Etruria, situated on a small river (Cæritis amnis), west of Veii, and fifty stadia from the coast. It was an ancient Pelægic city, the capital of the cruel Mezentius, and was afterward one of the twelve Etruscan cities, with a territory extending apparently as far as the Tiber. In early times Cære was closely allied with Rome; and when the latter city was taken by the Gauls, B.C. 390, Cære gave refuge to the Vestal virgins. It was from this event that the Romans traced the origin of their word cærinonia. The Romans, out of gratitude, are said to have conferred upon the Cærites the Roman franchise without the suffragium,* though it is not improbable that the Cærites enjoyed this honor previously. In 353, however, Cære joined Tarquinius in making war against Rome, but was obliged to purchase a truce with Rome for one hundred years by the forfeiture of half of its territory. From this time Cære gradually sunk in importance, and was probably destroyed in the wars of Marius and Sulla. It was restored by Drusus, who made it a municipium; and it continued to exist till the thirteenth century, when part of the inhabitants removed to a site about three miles off, on which they bestowed the same name (now Ceri), while the old town was distinguished by the title of Vetus or Cære Vetere, corrupted into Cervetri which is a small village, with one hundred or two hundred inhabitants. Here have been discovered, within the last few years, the tombs of the ancient Cære, many of them in a state of complete preservation. The country round Cære produced wine and a great quantity of corn, and in its neighborhood were warm baths, which were much frequented. Cære used as its sea-port the town of PYRGI.

CÆRELLIA, a Roman lady frequently mentioned in the correspondence of Cicero as distinguished for her acquirements and her love of philosophy.

[CÆRITES. Vid. CÆRE.]

CÆSAR, the name of a patrician family of the Julia gens, which traced its origin to Iulus, the son of Æneas. Vid. JULIA GENS. Various etymologies of the name are given by the ancient writers; but it is probably connected with

* The Cærites appear to have been the first body of Roman citizens who did not enjoy the suffrage. Thus, when a Roman citizen was struck out of his tribe by the censors and made an ærarian, he was said to become one of the Cærites, since he had lost the suffrage: hence we find the expressions in tabulas Cæritum referre and ærarium facere used as synonymous.

Latin word cæs-ar-ies, and the Sanscrit késa, "hair," for it is in accordance with the Roman custom for a surname to be given to an individual from some peculiarity in his personal appearance. The name was assumed by Augustus as the adopted son of the dictator C. Julius Cæsar, and was by Augustus handed down to his adopted son Tiberius. It continued to be used by Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, as members either by adoption or female descent of Cæsar's family; but, though the family became extinct with Nero, succeeding emperors still retained the name as part of their titles, and it was the practice to prefix it to their own name, as, for instance, Imperator Cæsar Domitianus Augustus. When Hadrian adopted Ælius Verus, he allowed the latter to take the title of Cæsar; and from this time, though the title of Augustus continued to be confined to the reigning prince, that of Cæsar was also granted to the second person in the state and the heir presumptive to the throne.

CÆSAR, JULIUS. 1. SEX., prætor B.C. 208. with Sicily, as his province.—2. SEX., curule ædile 165, when the Hecyra of Terence was exhibited at the Megalesian games, and consul 157.—3. L., consul 90, fought against the Socii, and in the course of the same year proposed the Lex Julia de Civitate, which granted the citizenship to the Latins and the Socii who had remained faithful to Rome. Cæsar was censor in 89; he belonged to the aristocratical party, and was put to death by Marius in 87.—4. C., surnamed STRABO VOPISCUS, brother of No. 3, was curule ædile 90, was a candidate for the consulship in 88, and was slain along with his brother by Marius in 87. He was one of the chief orators and poets of his age, and is one of the speakers in Cicero's dialogue De Oratore. Wit was the chief characteristic of his oratory; but he was deficient in power and energy. The names of two of his tragedies are preserved, the Adrastus and Tecmessa.—5. L., son of No. 3, and uncle by his sister Julia of M. Antony the triumvir. He was consul 64, and belonged, like his father, to the aristocratical party. He appears to have deserted this party afterward: we find him in Gaul in 52 as one of the legates of C. Cæsar, and he continued in Italy during the civil war. After Cæsar's death (44) he sided with the senate in opposition to his nephew Antony, and was, in consequence, proscribed by the latter in 43, but obtained his pardon through the influence of his sister Julia.—6. L., son of No. 5, usually distinguished from his father by the addition to his name of filius or adolescens. He joined Pompey on the breaking out of the civil war in 49, and was sent by Pompey to Cæsar with proposals of peace. In the course of the same year he crossed over to Africa, where the command of Clupea was intrusted to him. In 46 he served as proquaestor to Cato in Utica, and after the death of Cato he surrendered to the dictator Cæsar, and was shortly afterward put to death, but probably not by the dictator's orders.—7. C., the father of the dictator, was prætor, but in what year is uncertain, and died suddenly at Pisa in 84.—8. SEX., brother of No. 7, was consul 91.—9. C., the Dictator, son of No. 7 and of Aurelia, was born on the 12th of July, 100, in the consulship of C.

Marius (VI.) and L. Valerius Flaccus, and was consequently six years younger than Pompey and Cicero. He had nearly completed his fifty-sixth year at the time of his murder, on the 15th of March, 44. Cæsar was closely connected with the popular party by the marriage of his aunt Julia with the great Marius; and in 83, though only seventeen years of age, he married Cornelia, the daughter of L. Cinna, the chief leader of the Marius party. Sulla commanded him to put away his wife, but he refused to obey him, and was consequently proscribed. He concealed himself for some time in the country of the Sabines, till his friends obtained his pardon from Sulla, who is said to have observed, when they pleaded his youth, "that that boy would some day or other be the ruin of the aristocracy, for that there were many Mariuses in him." Seeing that he was not safe at Rome, he went to Asia, where he served his first campaign under M. Minucius Thermus, and, at the capture of Mytilene (80), was rewarded with a civic crown for saving the life of a fellow-soldier. On the death of Sulla in 78, he returned to Rome, and in the following year gained great renown as an orator, though he was only twenty-two years of age, by his prosecution of Cn. Dolabella on account of extortion in his province of Macedonia. To perfect himself in oratory, he resolved to study in Rhodes under Apollonius Molo, but on his voyage thither he was captured by pirates, and only obtained his liberty by a ransom of fifty talents. At Miletus he manned some vessels, overpowered the pirates, and conducted them as prisoners to Pergamus, where he crucified them, a punishment with which he had frequently threatened them in sport when he was their prisoner. He then repaired to Rhodes, where he studied under Apollonius, and shortly afterward returned to Rome. He now devoted all his energies to acquire the favor of the people. His liberality was unbounded, and as his private fortune was not large, he soon contracted enormous debts. But he gained his object, and became the favorite of the people, and was raised by them in succession to the high offices of the state. He was quaestor in 68, and ædile in 65, when he spent enormous sums upon the public games and buildings. He was said by many to have been privy to Catiline's conspiracy in 63, but there is no satisfactory evidence of his guilt, and it is improbable that he would have embarked in such a rash scheme. In the debate in the senate on the punishment of the conspirators, he opposed their execution in a very able speech, which made such an impression, that their lives would have been spared but for the speech of Cato in reply. In the course of this year (63), Cæsar was elected Pontifex Maximus, defeating the other candidates, Q. Catulus and Servilius Isauricus, who had both been consuls, and were two of the most illustrious men in the state. In 62 Cæsar was prætor, and took an active part in supporting the tribune Metellus in opposition to his colleague Cato; in consequence of the tumults that ensued, the senate suspended both Cæsar and Metellus from their offices, but were obliged to reinstate him in his dignity after a few days. In the following year (61) Cæsar went as præ-prætor into Further Spain, where he gained great victories over the Lusitanians. On his return to Rome he became a candidate for the consulship, and was elected, notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of the aristocracy, who succeeded, however, in carrying the election of Bibulus as his colleague, who was one of the warmest supporters of the aristocracy. After his election, but before he entered upon the consulship, he formed that coalition with Pompey and M. Crassus, usually known by the name of the first triumvirate. Pompey had become estranged from the aristocracy since the senate had opposed the ratification of his acts in Asia and an assignment of lands which he had promised to his veterans. Crassus, in consequence of his immense wealth, was one of the most powerful men at Rome, but was a personal enemy of Pompey. They were reconciled by means of Cæsar, and the three entered into an agreement to support one another, and to divide the power in the state between them. In 59 Cæsar was consul, and being supported by Pompey and Crassus, he was able to carry all his measures. Bibulus, from whom the senate had expected so much, could offer no effectual opposition, and, after making a vain attempt to resist Cæsar, shut himself up in his own house, and did not appear again in public till the expiration of his consulship. Cæsar's first measure was an agrarian law, by which the rich Campanian plain was divided among the poorer citizens. He next gained the favor of the equites by relieving them from one third of the sum which they had agreed to pay for the farming of the taxes in Asia. He then obtained the confirmation of Pompey's acts. Having thus gratified the people, the equites, and Pompey, he was easily able to obtain for himself the provinces which he wished. By a vote of the people, proposed by the tribune Vatinius, the provinces of Cisalpine Gaul and Illyricum were granted to Cæsar, with three legions, for five years; and the senate added to his government the province of Transalpine Gaul, with another legion, for five years also, as they saw that a bill would be proposed to the people for that purpose if they did not grant the province themselves. Cæsar foresaw that the struggle between the different parties at Rome must eventually be terminated by the sword, and he had therefore resolved to obtain an army, which he might attach to himself by victories and rewards. In the course of the same year Cæsar united himself more closely to Pompey by giving him his daughter Julia in marriage. During the next nine years Cæsar was occupied with the subjugation of Gaul. He conquered the whole of Transalpine Gaul, which had hitherto been independent of the Romans, with the exception of the southeastern part called Provincia; he twice crossed the Rhine, and twice landed in Britain, which had been previously unknown to the Romans. In his first campaign (58) Cæsar conquered the Helvetii, who had emigrated from Switzerland with the intention of settling in Gaul. He next defeated Ariovistus, a German king, who had taken possession of part of the territories of the Ædui and Sequani, and pursued him as far as the Rhine. At the conclusion of the campaign Cæsar went into Cisal-pine Gaul to attend to the civil duties of his province, and to keep up his communication with the various parties at Rome. During the whole of his campaigns in Gaul, he spent the greater part of the winter in Cisalpine Gaul. In his second campaign (57) Cæsar carried on war with the Belgæ, who dwelt in the northeast of Gaul, between the Sequana (now Seine) and the Rhine, and after a severe struggle completely subdued them. Cæsar's third campaign in Gaul (56) did not commence till late in the year. He was detained some months in the north of Italy by the state of affairs at Rome. At Luca (now Lucca) he had interviews with most of the leading men at Rome, among others with Pompey and Crassus, who visited him in April. He made arrangements with them for the continuance of their power: it was agreed between them that Crassus and Pompey should be the consuls for the following year; that Crassus should have the province of Syria, Pompey the two Spains; and that Cæsar's government, which would expire at the end of 54, should be prolonged for five years after that date. After making these arrangements he crossed the Alps, and carried on war with the Veneti and the other states in the northwest of Gaul, who had submitted to Crassus, Cæsar's legate, in the preceding year, but who had now risen in arms against the Romans. They were defeated and obliged to submit to Cæsar, and during the same time Crassus conquered Aquitania. Thus, in three campaigns, Cæsar subdued the whole of Gaul; but the people made several attempts to recover their independence; and it was not till their revolts had been again and again put down by Cæsar, and the flower of the nation had perished in battle, that they learned to submit to the Roman yoke. In his fourth campaign (55) Cæsar crossed the Rhine in order to strike terror into the Germans, but he only remained eighteen days on the further side of the river. Late in the summer he invaded Britain, but more with the view of obtaining some knowledge of the island from personal observation than with the intention of permanent conquest at present. He sailed from the port Itius (probably Witsand, between Calais and Boulogne), and effected a landing somewhere near the South Foreland, after a severe struggle with the natives. The late period of the year compelled him to return to Gaul after remaining only a short time in the island. In this year, according to his arrangement with Pompey and Crassus, who were now consuls, his government of the Gauls and Illyricum was prolonged for five years, namely, from the first of January, 53, to the end of December, 49. Cæsar's fifth campaign (54) was chiefly occupied with his second invasion of Britain. He landed in Britain at the same place as in the former year, defeated the Britons in a series of engagements, and crossed the Tamesis (now Thames). The Britons submitted, and promised to pay an annual tribute; but their subjection was only nominal, for Cæsar left no garrisons or military establishments behind him, and Britain remained nearly one hundred years longer independent of the Romans. During the winter, one of the Roman legions, which had been stationed, under the command of T. Titurius Sabinus and L. Aurunculeius Cotta, in the country of the Eburones, was cut to pieces by Ambiorix and the Eburones. Ambiorix then proceeded to attack the camp of Q. Cicero, the brother of the orator, who was stationed with a legion among the Nervii; but Cicero defended himself with bravery, and was at length relieved by Cæsar in person. In September of this year, Julia, Cæsar's only daughter and Pompey's wife, died in childbirth. In Cæsar's sixth campaign (53) several of the Gallic nations revolted, but Cæsar soon compelled them to return to obedience. The Treviri, who had revolted, had been supported by the Germans, and Cæsar accordingly again crossed the Rhine, but made no permanent conquests on the further side of the river. Cæsar's seventh campaign (52) was the most arduous of all. Almost all the nations of Gaul rose simultaneously in revolt, and the supreme command was given to Vercingetorix, by far the ablest general that Cæsar had yet encountered. After a most severe struggle, in which Cæsar's military genius triumphed over every obstacle, the war was brought to a conclusion by the defeat of the Gauls before Alesia and the surrender of this city. The eighth and ninth campaigns (51, 50) were employed in the final subjugation of Gaul, which had entirely submitted to Cæsar by the middle of 50. Meanwhile, an estrangement had taken place between Cæsar and Pompey. Cæsar's brilliant victories had gained him fresh popularity and influence, and Pompey saw with ill-disguised mortification that he was becoming the second person in the state. He was thus led to join again the aristocratical party, by the assistance of which he could alone hope to retain his position as the chief man in the Roman state. The great object of this party was to deprive Cæsar of his command, and to compel him to come to Rome as a private man to sue for the consulship. They would then have formally accused him, and as Pompey was in the neighborhood of the city at the head of an army, the trial would have been a mockery, and his condemnation would have been certain. Cæsar offered to resign his command if Pompey would do the same; but the senate would not listen to any compromise. Accordingly, on the 1st of January, 49, the senate passed a resolution that Cæsar should disband his army at a certain day, and that if he did not do so, he should be regarded as an enemy of the state. Two of the tribunes, M. Antonius and Q. Cassius, put their veto upon this resolution, but their opposition was set at naught, and they fled for refuge to Cæsar's camp. Under the plea of protecting the tribunes, Cæsar crossed the Rubicon, which separated his province from Italy, and marched toward Rome. Pompey, who had been intrusted by the senate with the conduct of the war, soon discovered how greatly he had overrated his own popularity and influence. His own troops deserted to his rival in crowds; town after town in Italy opened its gates to Cæsar, whose march was like a triumphal progress. The only town which offered Cæsar any resistance was Corfinium, into which L. Domitius Ahenobarbus had thrown himself with a strong force; but even this place was obliged to surrender at the end of a few days. Meantime, Pompey, with the magistrates and senators, had fled from Rome to

Capua, and now, despairing of opposing Cæsar in Italy, he marched from Capua to Brundisium, and on the 17th of March embarked for Greece. Cæsar pursued Pompey to Brundisium, but he was unable to follow him to Greece for want of ships. He therefore marched back from Brundisium, and repaired to Rome, having thus in three months become master of the whole of Italy. After remaining a short time in Rome, he set out for Spain, where Pompey's legates, Afranius, Petreius, and Varro, commanded powerful armies. After defeating Afranius and Petreius, and receiving the submission of Varro, Cæsar returned to Rome, where he had meantime been appointed dictator by the prætor M. Lepidus. He resigned the dictatorship at the end of eleven days, after holding the consular comitia, in which he himself and P. Servilius Vatia Isauricus were elected consuls for the next year. At the beginning of January, 48, Cæsar crossed over to Greece, where Pompey had collected a formidable army. At first the campaign was in Pompey's favor; Cæsar was repulsed before Dyrrhachium with considerable loss, and was obliged to retreat toward Thessaly. In this country, on the plains of Pharsalus or Pharsalia, a decisive battle was fought between the two armies on the 9th of August, 48, in which Pompey was completely defeated. Pompey fled to Egypt, pursued by Cæsar, but he was murdered before Cæsar arrived in the country. Vid. POMPEIUS. His head was brought to Cæsar, who turned away from the sight, shed tears at the untimely death of his rival, and put his murderers to death. When the news of the battle of Pharsalia reached Rome, various honours were conferred upon Cæsar. He was appointed dictator for a whole year and consul for five years, and the tribunician power was conferred upon him for life. He declined the consulship, but entered upon the dictatorship in September in this year (48), and appointed M. Antony his master of the horse. On his arrival in Egypt, Cæsar became involved in a war, which gave the remains of the Pompeian party time to rally. This war, usually called the Alexandrine war, arose from the determination of Cæsar that Cleopatra, whose fascinations had won his heart, should reign in common with her brother Ptolemy; but this decision was opposed by the guardians of the young king, and the war which thus broke out was not brought to a close till the latter end of March, 47. It was soon after this that Cleopatra had a son by Cæsar. Vid. CÆSARION. Cæsar returned to Rome through Syria and Asia Minor, and on his march through Pontus attacked Pharnaces, the son of Mithradates the Great, who had assisted Pompey. He defeated Pharnaces near Zela with such ease, that he informed the senate of his victory by the words Veni, vidi, vici. He reached Rome in September (47), was appointed consul for the following year, and before the end of September set sail for Africa, where Scipio and Cato had collected a large army. The war was terminated by the defeat of the Pompeian army at the battle of Thapsus, on the 6th of April, 46. Cato, unable to defend Utica, put an end to his own life. Cæsar returned to Rome in the latter end of July. He was now the undisputed master of the Roman world, but he used his victory with the greatest moderation. Unlike other conquerors in civil wars, he freely forgave all who had borne arms against him, and declared that he would make no difference between Pompeians and Cæsarians. His clemency was one of the brightest features of his character. At Rome all parties seemed to vie in paying him honor: the dictatorship was bestowed on him for ten years, and the censorship, under the new title of Præfectus Morum, for three years. He celebrated his victories in Gaul, Egypt, Pontus, and Africa by four magnificent triumphs. Cæsar now proceeded to correct the various evils which had crept into the state, and to obtain the enactment of several laws suitable to the altered condition of the commonwealth. The most important of his measures this year (46) was the reformation of the calendar. As the Roman year was now three months in advance of the real time, Cæsar added ninety days to this year, and thus made the whole year consist of four hundred and forty-five days; and he guarded against a repetition of similar errors for the future by adapting the year to the sun's course. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. CALENDARIUM. Meantime the two sons of Pompey, Sextus and Cneius, had collected a new army in Spain. Cæsar set out for Spain toward the end of the year, and brought the war to a close by the battle of Munda, on the 17th of March, 45, in which the enemy were only defeated after a most obstinate resistance. Cn. Pompey was killed shortly afterward, but Sextus made good his escape. Cæsar reached Rome in September, and entered the city in triumph. Fresh honors awaited him. His portrait was to be struck on coins; the month of Quintilis was to receive the name of Julius in his honor; he received the title of imperator for life; and the whole senate took an oath to watch over his safety. To reward his followers, Cæsar increased the number of senators and of the public magistrates, so that there were to be sixteen prætors, forty questors, and six ædiles. He began to revolve vast schemes for the benefit of the Roman world. Among his plans of internal improvement, he proposed to frame a digest of all the Roman laws, to establish public libraries, to drain the Pomptine marshes, to enlarge the harbor of Ostia, and to dig a canal through the isthmus of Corinth. To protect the boundaries of the Roman empire, he meditated expeditions against the Parthians and the barbarous tribes on the Danube, and had already begun to make preparations for his departure to the East. Possessing royal power, he now wished to obtain the title of king, and Antony accordingly offered him the diadem in public on the festival of the Lupercalia (the 15th of February); but, seeing that the proposition was not favorably received by the people, he declined it for the present. But Cæsar's power was not witnessed without envy. The Roman aristocracy, who had been so long accustomed to rule the Roman world and to pillage it at their pleasure, could ill brook a master, and resolved to remove him by assassination. The conspiracy against Cæsar's life had been set afoot by Cassius, a personal enemy of Cæsar's, and there were more than sixty persons privy to it. Many of these persons had been raised by Cæsar to wealth and honor; and some of them, such as M. Brutus, lived with him on terms of the most intimate friendship. It has been the practice of rhetoricians to speak of the murder of Cæsar as a glorious deed, and to represent Brutus and Cassius as patriots; but the mask ought to be stripped off these false patriots; they cared not for the republic, but only for themselves; and their object in murdering Cæsar was to gain power for themselves and their party. Cæsar had many warnings of his approaching fate, but he disregarded them all, and fell by the daggers of his assassins on the Ides or 15th of March, 44. At an appointed signal the conspirators surrounded him; Cæsar dealt the first blow, and the others quickly drew their swords and attacked him; Cæsar at first defended himself, but when he saw that Brutus, his friend and favorite, had also drawn his sword, he exclaimed Tu quoque Brute! pulled his toga over his face, and sunk pierced with wounds at the foot of Pompey's statue. Julius Cæsar was the greatest man of antiquity. He was gifted by nature with the most various talents, and was distinguished by the most extraordinary attainments in the most diversified pursuits. He was at one and the same time a general, a statesman, a lawgiver, a jurist, an orator, a poet, a historian, a philologist, a mathematician, and an architect. He was equally fitted to excel in all, and has given proofs that he would have surpassed almost all other men in any subject to which he devoted the energies of his extraordinary mind. During the whole of his busy life he found time for literary pursuits, and was the author of many works, the majority of which has been lost. The purity of his Latin and the clearness of his style were celebrated by the ancients themselves, and are conspicuous in his Commentarii, which are his only works that have come down to us. They relate the history of the first seven years of the Gallic war in seven books, and the history of the Civil war down to the commencement of the Alexandrine in three books. Neither of these works completed the history of the Gallic and Civil wars. The history of the former was completed in an eighth book, which is usually ascribed to Hirtius, and the history of the Alexandrine, African, and Spanish wars were written in three separate books, which are also ascribed to Hirtius, but their authorship is uncertain. The lost works of Cæsar are, 1. Anticato, in reply to Cicero's Cato, which Cicero wrote in praise of Cato after the death of the latter in 46. 2. De Analogia, or, as Cicero explains it, De Ratione Latine loquendi, dedicated to Cicero, contained investigations on the Latin language, and were written by Cæsar while he was crossing the Alps. 3. Libri Auspiciorum, or Auguralia. 4. De Astris. 5. Apophthegmata, or Dicta collectanea, a collection of good sayings. 6. Pœmata. Two of these, written in his youth, Laudes Herculis and Œdipus, were suppressed by Augustus. Of the numerous editions of Cæsar's Commentaries, the best are by Oudendorp, Lugd. Bat., 1737, Stuttgart, 1822; by Morus, Lips., 1780; by Oberlin, Lips., 1805, 1819; [and by Herzog, Lips., 1831-34, 2 vols.; and of the Gallic War separately by Nipperdey, Lips., 1849.]

C. CÆSAR and L. CÆSAR, the sons of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and Julia, and the grandson of Augustus. L. Cæsar died at Massilia, on his way to Spain, A.D. 2, and C. Cæsar in Lycia, A.D. 4, of a wound which he had received in Armenia.

CÆSARAUGUSTA (now Zaragoza or Saragossa), more anciently SALDUBA, a town of the Edetani, on the Iberus, in Hispania Tarraconensis, was colonized by Augustus B.C. 27, and was the seat of a Conventus Juridicus. It was the birth-place of the poet Prudentius.

CÆSĀRĒA (Καὶσάρεια: Καῖσαρείς: Cæsariensis), a name given to several cities of the Roman empire in honor of one or other of the Cæsars. 1. CÆSAREA AD ARGÆUM, formerly MAZACA, also EUSĒBĪA (Κ. ἡ πρὸς τῷ Ἀργαίῳ, τὰ Μάζακα, Εὐσέβεια: now Kesariéh, ruins), one of the oldest cities of Asia Minor, stood upon Mount Argæus, about the centre of Cappadocia, in the district (præfectura) called Cilicia. It was the capital of Cappadocia, and when that country was made a Roman province by Tiberius (A.D. 18), it received the name of Cæsarea. It was ultimately destroyed by an earthquake.—2. C. PHILIPPI or PANĒAS (Κ. ἡ Φιλίππου, New Testament; Κ. Πανεϊάς: now Banias), a city of Palestine at the southern foot of Mount Hermon, on the Jordan, just below its source (vid. PANTUM), built by Philip the tetrarch, B.C. 3: King Agrippa called it Neronias, but it soon lost this name.—3. C. PALÆSTINÆ, formerly STRATŌNIS TURRIS (Στρατόναος πύργος: now Kaisariyeh, ruins), an important city of Palestine, on the sea-coast, just above the boundary line between Samaria and Galilee. It was surrounded with a wall and decorated with splendid buildings by Herod the Great (B.C. 13), who called it Cæsarea, in honor of Augustus. He also made a splendid harbor for the city. Under the Romans it was the capital of Palestine and the residence of the procurator. Vespasian made it a colony, and Titus conferred additional favors upon it; hence it was called Colonia Flavia.—4. C. MAURETANLÆ, formerly IOL (Ἰὼλ Καῖσάρεια: now Zersell, ruins), a Phœnician city on the north coast of Africa, with a harbor, the residence of King Juba, who named it Cæsarea, in honor of Augustus. When Claudius erected Mauretania into a Roman province, he made Cæsarea a colony, and the capital of the middle division of the province, which was thence called Mauretania Cæsariensis.—5. C. AD ANAZARBUM. Vid. ANAZARBUS. There are several others, which are better known by other names, and several which are not important enough to be mentioned here.

CÆSARĪON, son of C. Julius Cæsar and Cleopatra, originally called Ptolemæus as an Egyptian prince, was born B.C. 47. In 42 the triumvirs allowed him to receive the title of King of Egypt, and in 34 Antony conferred upon him the title of king of kings. After the death of his mother in 30, he was executed by order of Augustus.

CÆSARODŪNUM (now Tours), chief town of the Turōnes or Turōni, subsequently called TURONI, on the Liger (now Loire), in Gallia Lugdunensis.

CÆSAROMĀGUS. 1. (Now Beauvais), chief town of the Bellovaci in Gallia Belgica.—2. (Now Chelmsford), a town of the Trinobantes in Britain.

CÆSĒNA (Cæsenas, -ētis: now Cesena), a town in Gallia Cispadana, on the Via Æmilia, not far from the Rubicon.

CÆSĪA, a surname of Minerva, a translation of the Greek γλαυκῶπις.

CÆSĪA SILVA (now Häserwald), a forest, in Germany between the Lippe and the Yssel.

CÆSŌNĪA, first the mistress and afterward the wife of the Emperor Caligula, was a woman of the greatest licentiousness, and was put to death with Caligula, together with her daughter, A.D. 41.

CÆSŌNIUS, M., a judex at the trial of Oppianicus for the murder of Cluentius, B.C. 74, and ædile with Cicero in 69.

CĀICUS (Καικός: now Aksou or Bakir), a river of Mysia, rising in Mount Temnus, and flowing past Pergamus into the Cumeæan Gulf.

[CĀICUS. 1. Son of Oceanus and Tethys, god of the Mysian river.—2. A companion of Æneas in his voyage from Troy to Italy.]

CAIĒTA (Caietanus: now Gaeta), a town in Latium, on the borders of Campania, forty stadia south of Formiæ, situated on a promontory of the same name, and on a bay of the sea called after it SIXUS CAIETANUS. It possessed an excellent harbor (Cic., pro Leg. Man., 12), and was said to have derived its name from Caieta, the nurse of Æneas, who, according to some traditions, was buried at this place.

CALAGURRIS (Calagurritanus: now Calahorra), a town of the Vascones and a Roman municipium in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the Iberus, memorable for its adherence to Sertorius and for its siege by Pompey and his generals, in the course of which mothers killed and salted their children, B.C. 71. (Juv., xv., 93.) It was the birth-place of Quintilian.

CALĀIS, brother of Zetes. Vid. ZETES.

CĀLĀMĀ. 1. (Now Kalma, ruins), an important town in Numidia, between Cirta and Hippo Regius, on the eastern bank of the Rubricatus (now Seibous).—2. (Now Kalat-al-Wad) a town in the west of Mauretania Cæsariensis, on the eastern bank of the Malva, near its mouth.

CĀLĀMĒNE, in Lydia, a lake with floating islands, sacred to the nymphs.

CĀLĀMĪS (Κάλαμος), a statuary and embosser at Athens, of great celebrity, was a contemporary of Phidias, and flourished B.C. 467-429.

CĀLĀMUS (Κάλαμος: now El-Kulmon), a town on the coast of Phœnicia, a little south of Tripolis.

CALĀNUS (Κάλανος), an Indian gymnosophist, followed Alexander the Great from India, and having been taken ill, burned himself alive in the presence of the Macedonians, three months before the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), to whom he had predicted his approaching end.

CALASIRIÆS (Καλασίριες), one of the two divisions (the other being the Hermotybi) of the warrior-easte of Egypt. Their greatest strength was two hundred and fifty thousand men, and their chief abode in the western part of the Delta. They formed the king's body guard.

CALATĪA (Calatinus: now Cajazzo), a town in Samnium, on the Appia Via, between Capua and Beneventum, was conquered by the Romans B.C. 313, and was colonized by Julius Cæsar with his veterans.

CALATĪNUS, A. ATILĪUS, consul B.C. 258, in the first Punic war, carried on the war with success in Sicily. He was cœnsul a second time, 254, when he took Panormus; and was dictator, 249, when he again carried on the war in Sicily, which was the first instance of a dictator commanding an army out of Italy.

CALAURĒA, -ΙΑ (Καλαύρεια, Καλαυρία: Καλαυρείτης: now Poro), a small island in the Saronic Gulf, off the coast of Argolis, and opposite Trœzen, possessed a celebrated temple of Neptune (Poseidon), which was regarded as an inviolable asylum. Hither Demosthenes fled to escape Antipater, and here he took poison, B.C. 322. This temple was the place of meeting of an ancient Amphictyonia. Vid. Dict of Ant., p. 79, b, second edition.

CALĀVIUS, the name of a distinguished family at Capua, the most celebrated member of which was Pœuvius Calavius, who induced his fellow-citizens to espouse the cause of Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, B.C. 216.

CALBIS (ὁ Κάλβις), also Indus (now Quingui or Tanas), a considerable river of Caria, which rises in Mount Cadmus, above Cibyra, and after receiving (according to Pliny) sixty small rivers and one hundred mountain torrents, falls into the sea west of Caunus and opposite to Rhodes.

CALCHAS (Κάλχας), son of Thestor of Mycenæ or Megara, the wisest soothsayer among the Greeks at Troy, foretold the length of the Trojan war, explained the cause of the pestilence which raged in the Greek army, and advised the Greeks to build the wooden horse. An oracle had declared that Calchas should die if he met with a soothsayer superior to himself; and this came to pass at Claros, near Colophon, for here Calchas met the soothsayer Morsus, who predicted things which Calchas could not. Thereupon Calchas died of grief. After his death he had an oracle in Daunia.

CALDUS, C. CÆLIUS. 1. Rose from obscurity by his oratory, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 107, when he proposed a lex tabellaria, and consul 94. In the civil war between Sulla and the party of Marius, he fought on the side of the latter, 83.—2. Grandson of the preceding, was Cæsar's quæstor in Cilicia, 50.

CALE (now Oporto), a port-town of the Cal-læi in Hispania Tarraconensis, at the mouth of the Durus. From Porto Cale the name of the country Portugal is supposed to have come.

CALEDONĪA. Vid. BRITANNIA.

CALENTUM, a town probably of the Calenses

Emanci in Hispania Bætica, celebrated for its manufacture of bricks so light as to swim upon water.

CALĒNTUS, Q. FFCIUS, tribune of the plebs B.C. 61, when he succeeded in saving P. Clodius from condemnation for his violation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea. In 59 he was prætor, and from this time appears as an active partisan of Cæsar. In 51 he was legate of Cæsar in Gaul, and served under Cæsar in the civil war. In 49 he joined Cæsar at Brundisium and accompanied him to Spain, and in 48 he was sent by Cæsar from Epirus to bring over the remainder of the troops from Italy, but most of his ships were taken by Bibulus. After the battle of Pharsalia (48) Calenus took many cities in Greece. In 47 he was made consul by Cæsar. After Cæsar's death (44) Calenus joined M. Antony, and subsequently had the command of Antony's legions in the north of Italy. At the termination of the Peruvian war (41) Calenus died, and Octavianus was thus enabled to obtain possession of his army.

CALES or -EX (Κάλης or -ης: now Halabli), a river of Bithynia, southwest of Hæraclæa Pontica. (Thuc., iv., 75.)

CALES (-IS, usually Pl. Cales, -ium: Calenus: now Calvi), chief town of the Caleni, an Ausonian people in Campania, on the Via Latina, said to have been founded by Calais, son of Boreas, and therefore called Threïcia by the poets. Cales was taken and colonized by the Romans, B.C. 335. It was celebrated for its excellent wine.

CALĒTES or -I, a people in Belgic Gaul, near the mouth of the Seine: their capital was JULIOMONA.

CALĒTOR (Καλήτωρ), son of Clytius, slain at Troy by the Telamouian Ajax.

CALĪDĪTES. 1. Q., tribune of the plebs B.C. 99, carried a law for the recall of Q. Metellus Numidicus from banishment. He was prætor 79, and had the government of one of the Spains, and on his return was accused by Q. Lollius, and condemned.—2. M., son of the preceding, distinguished as an orator. In 57 he was prætor, and supported the recall of Cicero from banishment. In 51 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship, and on the breaking out of the civil war, 49, he joined Cæsar, who placed him over Gallia Togata, where he died in 48.

CALIGŪLA, Roman emperor, A.D. 37–41, son of Germanicus and Agrippina, was born A.D. 12, and was brought up among the legions in Germany. His real name was Caius Cæsar, and he was always called Caius by his contemporaries: Caligula was a surname given him by the soldiers from his wearing in his boyhood small caligæ, or soldiers' boots. Having escaped the fate of his mother and brother, he gained the favor of Tiberius, who raised him to offices of honor, and held out to him hopes of the succession. On the death of Tiberius (37), which was either caused or accelerated by Caligula, the latter succeeded to the throne. He was saluted by the people with the greatest enthusiasm as the son of Germanicus. His first acts gave promise of a just and beneficent reign. He pardoned all the persons who had appeared as witnesses or accusers against his family; he released all the state-prisoners of Tiberius; he restored to the magistrates full power of jurisdiction, without appeal to his person, and promised the senate to govern according to the laws. Toward foreign princes he behaved with great generosity. He restored Agrippa, the grandson of Herod, to his kingdom of Judæa, and Antiochus IV. to his kingdom of Commagene. But at the end of eight months the conduct of Caligula became suddenly changed. After a serious illness, which probably weakened his mental powers, he appears as a sanguinary and licentious madman. He put to death Tiberius, the grandson of his predecessor, compelled his grandmother Antonia and other members of his family to make away with themselves, often caused persons of both sexes and of all ages to be tortured to death for his amusement while taking his meals, and on one occasion, during the exhibition of the games in the circus, he ordered a great number of the spectators to be seized and to be thrown before the wild beasts. Such was his love of blood that he wished the Roman people had only one head, that he might cut it off with a blow. His licentiousness was as great as his cruelty. His marriages were disgracefully contracted and speedily dissolved; and the only woman who exercised a permanent influence over him was his last wife Cæsonia. In his madness he considered himself a god; he even built a temple to himself as Jupiter Latiaris, and appointed priests to attend to his worship. He sometimes officiated as his own priest, making his horse Incitatus, which he afterward raised to the consulship, his colleague. His monstrous extravagances soon exhausted the coffers of the state. One instance may show the senseless way in which he spent his money. He constructed a bridge of boats between Baizæ and Puteoli, a distance of about three miles, and after covering it with earth, he built houses upon it. When it was finished, he gave a splendid banquet in the middle of the bridge, and concluded the entertainment by throwing numbers of the guests into the sea. To replenish the treasury, he exhausted Italy and Rome by his extortions, and then marched into Gaul in 40, which he plundered in all directions. With his troops he advanced to the ocean, as if intending to cross over into Britain; he drew them up in battle array, and then gave them the signal—to collect shells, which he called the spoils of conquered Ocean. The Roman world at length grew tired of such a mad tyrant. Four months after his return to the city, on the 24th of January, 41, he was murdered by Cassius Chærea, tribune of a prætorian cohort, Cornelius Sabinus, and others. His wife Cæsonia and his daughter were likewise put to death.

CALINGÆ, a numerous people of India iutra Gangem, on the eastern coast, below the mouths of the Ganges.

CALINIPAXA (now Canonge? a little above 27° north latitude), a city on the Ganges, north of its confluence with the Jomanes (now Jumna), said to have been the furthest point in India reached by Seleucus Nicator.

CALLIACI, CALLECI. Vid. GALLECI.

[CALLAS (Κάλας), a river of Eubœa, flowing from Mount Telethrius into the sea near Oreus.]

CALLATIS (Κάλατις, Κάλατις: Καλατιανός: now Kollat, Kollati), a town of Mœsia, on the Black Sea, originally a colony of Miletus, and afterward of Heraclea.

[CALLIADES (Καλλιᾶδης), archon eponymus at Athens at the time of the second Persian invasion, B.C. 480.]

[CALLIANASSA (Καλλιᾶνασσα), one of the daughters of Nereus, mentioned in the Iliad.]

CALLIÆRUS (Καλλιᾶρος), a town in Locris, mentioned by Homer.

CALLIÆS and HIPPONICUS (Καλλιᾶς, Ἰππώνικος), a noble Athenian family, celebrated for their wealth. They enjoyed the hereditary dignity of torch-bearer at the Eleusinian mysteries, and claimed descent from Triptolemus. 1. HIPPONICUS I., acquired a large fortune by fraudulently making use of the information he had received from Solon respecting the introduction of his σεισάχθεια, B.C. 594. (Plut., Sol., 15.)—2. CALLIÆS I., son of Phænippus, an opponent of Pisistratus, and a conqueror at the Olympic and Pythian games.—3. HIPPONICUS II., surnamed Ammon, son of No. 2.—4. CALLIÆS II., son of No. 3, fought at the battle of Marathon, 490. He was afterward ambassador from Athens to Artaxerxes, and, according to some accounts, negotiated a peace with Persia, 449, on terms most humiliating to the latter. On his return to Athens he was accused of having taken bribes, and was condemned to a fine of fifty talents.—5. HIPPONICUS III., son of No. 4, one of the Atheuian generals in their incursion into the territory of Tanagra, 426, also commanded at the battle of Delium, 424, where he was killed. It was his divorced wife, and not his widow, whom Pericles married. His daughter Hipparete was married to Alcibiades, with a dowry of ten talents; another daughter was married to Theodorus, and became the mother of Isocrates the orator.—6. CALLIÆS III., son of No. 5, by the lady who married Pericles, dissipated all his ancestral wealth on sophists, flatterers, and women. The scene of Xenophon's Banquet, and also that of Plato's Protagoras, is laid at his house. He is said to have ultimately reduced himself to absolute beggary. In 400 he was engaged in the attempt to crush Andocides. In 392 he commanded the Athenian heavy-armed troops, when Iphierates defeated the Spartans; and in 371 he was one of the envoys empowered to negotiate peace with Sparta.

CALLIÆS. 1. A wealthy Athenian, who, on condition of marrying Cimon's sister, Elpinice, paid for him the fine of fifty talents which had been imposed on Miltiades. He appears to have been unconnected with the nobler family of Callias and Hipponicus.—2. Tyrant of Chalcis in Eubœa, and the rival of Plutarchus, tyrant of Eretria. He was defeated by the Athenians under Phocion, B.C. 350, and thereupon betook himself to the Macedonian court; but as he could not obtain aid from Philip, he formed an alliance with the Athenians, and by their means obtained the supremacy in the island.—3. A poet of the old comedy, flourished B.C. 412; the names of six of his comedies are preserved [The fragments of his plays are given in Meuschen's Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i., p. 417-421, edit. minor.]—4. Of Syracuse, a Greek historian, was a contemporary of Agathocles, and wrote a history of Sicily in twenty-two books, embracing the reign of Agathocles, B.C. 317-289. [A few fragments remain, which have been collected by Müller in his Fragm. Hist. Græc., vol. ii., p. 382-3.]

[CALLIBIUS (Καλλιβίος). 1. The commander of the Spartan garrison at Atheus in the time of the thirty tyrants, B.C. 404. He allowed the tyrants to make free use of his soldiers in carrying out their arbitrary measures in return for the deference paid him by those tyrants.—2. One of the leaders of the democratic party at Tegea, B.C. 370, failing, in a peaceable attempt, to unite the Arcadian towns into one body, had recourse to arms; though at first defeated by the oligarchical party, he afterward triumphed over them, and put the most obnoxious to death.]

[CALLICRATES (Καλλικράτης). 1. An Achaean, exerted all his influence in favor of the Romans. On the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans, B.C. 168, Callicrates pointed out one thousand Achæans as having favored the cause of Perseus, who were taken to Rome, and among them was the historian Polybius. Callicrates died at Rhodes, 149.—[2. Name given by Nepos to the murderer of Dion, called Callippus by Diodorus and Plutarch. Vid. CALLIPPUS.]—3. One of the architects of the Parthenon on the Acropolis of Athens.—4. A Laedæmonian sculptor, made ants and other animals out of ivory, so small that one could not distinguish the different limbs.—[5. A Greek historian in the time of the Emperor Aurelian, a native of Tyre. He wrote the history of Aurelian, and is called by Vopiscus the most learned Greek writer of his time.]

[CALLICRATIDAS (Καλλικρατίδας), a Spartan, succeeded Lysander as admiral of the Laedæmonian fleet, B.C. 406, took Methymna, and shut up Conon in Mytilæus; but the Athenians sent out a fleet of one hundred and fifty sail, and defeated Callicratidas off the Arginusæ. Callicratidas fell in the battle. Callicratidas was a plain, blunt Spartan of the old school. Witness his answer, when asked what sort of men the Ionians were: "Bad freemen, but excellent slaves."

[CALLIFÆ (Callifanus: now Calvisi), a town in Samnium, perhaps in the territory of Allifæ.

[CALLIMACHUS (Καλλιμαχος). 1. The Athenian polemarch, commanded the right wing at Marathon, where he was slain, after behaving with much gallantry, B.C. 490.' This is the last recorded instance of the polemarch performing the military duties which his name implies.—2. A celebrated Alexandrine grammarian and poet, was a native of Cyrene in Africa, and a descendant of the Battinadæ, whence he is sometimes called Battinades. He lived at Alexandria in the reigns of Ptolemy Philadelphus and Euergetes, and was chief librarian of the famous library of Alexandria from about B.C. 260 until his death about 240. He founded a celebrated grammatical school at Alexandria, and among his pupils were Eratosthenes, Aristophanes of Byzantium, and Apollonius Rhodius. We have no other particulars of the life of Callimachus except his enmity with his former pupil Apollonius Rhodius, which is related elsewhere. Vid.

APOLLONIUS, No. 6. He is said to have written eight hundred works, in prose and in verse, on an infinite variety of subjects, but of these we possess only some of his poems, which are characterized rather by labor and learning than by real poetical genius. Hence Ovid (Am., i., 15, 14) says of Callimachus, Quamvis ingenio non valet, arte valet. The extant works of Callimachus are six Hymns in hexameter verse, five in the Ionic dialect, and one, on the bath of Pallas, in the Doric dialect, and seventy-two Epigrams, which belong to the best specimens of this kind of poetry, and were incorporated in the Greek Anthology at an early time. We have only a few fragments of his elegies, which enjoyed great celebrity, and were imitated by the Roman poets, the most celebrated of whose imitations is the De Coma Berenices of Catullus. Of the lost poems of Callimachus the most important were, Αἴτια, Causes, an epic poem in four books, on the causes of the various mythical stories, &c., and an epic poem entitled Hecale, the name of an aged woman who received Theseus hospitably when he went out to fight against the Marathonian bull.—Editions: By Spanheim, Ultraj., 1697, re-edited by Ernesti, Lugd. Batav., 1761, 2 vols. 8vo; by Blomfield, Lond., 1815; by Volger, Lips., 1817.—3. An architect and statuary, of uncertain country, who is said to have invented the Corinthian column, and who must have lived before B.C. 396. He was so anxious to give his works the last touch of perfection that he lost the grand and sublime, whence Dionysius compares him to the orator Lysias. Callimachus was never satisfied with himself, and therefore received the epithet κακίζότεχνος, which Pliny interprets as calumniator sui, [where Sillig conjectures, after some MSS., that καταρτηξίτεχνος must be read instead of κακίζότεχνος, but the latter seems to be supported by the translation in Pliny.—4. One of the generals of Mithradates, who, by his skill in engineering, defended the town of Amisus, in Pontus, for a considerable time against the Romans in B.C. 71, and when unable to defend it longer, set it on fire; he afterward fell into the hands of Lucullus at the capture of Nisibis, and was put to death by him in revenge for the burning of Amisus.]

[CALLIMÆDON (Καλλιμέδων), one of the orators at Athens in the Macedonian interest, and a friend of Phocion, was condemned to death by the Athenians in his absence, B.C. 317.

[CALLINICUS SELEUCUS. Vid. SELEUCUS.

[CALLINUS (Καλλίνος), of Ephesus, the earliest Greek elegiac poet, probably flourished about B.C. 700. Only one of his elegies is extant, consisting of twenty-one lines, in which he exhorts his countrymen to courage and perseverance against their enemies. Printed in Bergk's Poetæ Lyrici Græci, p. 303.

[CALLIŒPE. Vid. MUSÆ.

[CALLIŒPE (Καλλιόπη), a considerable city in the west of Parthia, founded, or else enlarged, by Seleucus Nicator.

[CALLIOPIUS, a grammarian, probably of the ninth century, who is thought to have revised and corrected the text of the plays of Terence; it has been maintained by some writers that the name is a mere epithet, and does not denote any individual.]

CALLIPHON (Καλλιφών), a Greek philosopher, and probably a disciple of Epicurus, is condemned by Cicero as making the chief good of man to consist in a union of virtue (honestas) and bodily pleasure (ἡδονή, voluptas).

CALLIPOLIS (Καλλιπολις: Καλλιπολίτης). 1. (Now Gallipoli), a Greek town on the Tarentine Gulf in Calabria.—2. A town on the eastern coast of Sicily, not far from Ætna.—3. (Now Gallipoli), a town in the Thracian Chersonese, opposite Lampsacus.—4. A town in Ætolia.

VID. CALLIUM.

[CALLIPPIDÆ (Καλλιπιδάι), a nation sprung from a union of Greeks and Scythians, dwelling on the Hypanis, in the vicinity of Olbia.]

CALLIPPIDES (Καλλιπιδής), of Athens, a celebrated tragic actor, a contemporary of Alcibiades, and Agesilaus.

CALLIPPUS (Κάλλιππος). 1. An Athenian, accompanied Dion to Syracuse, where he murdered the latter, B.C. 353. Callippus now usurped the government of Syracuse, but was expelled the city at the end of thirteen months, and, after wandering about Sicily with his mercenaries, was at length put to death by his own friends.—2. An astronomer of Cyzicus, came to Athens, where he assisted Aristotle in rectifying and completing the discoveries of Eudoxus. Callippus invented the period or cycle of seventy-six years, called after him the Callippic, which commenced B.C. 330.

CALLIRRHŒ (Καλλιρρόή). 1. Daughter of Oceanus, wife of Chrysaor, and mother of Gerionides and Echidna.—2. Daughter of Achelous and wife of Alcæon, induced her husband to procure her the peplus and necklace of Harmonia; by which she caused his death. VID. ALCÆON.—3. Daughter of Scamander, wife of Tros, and mother of Ilus and Ganymedes.

CALLIRRHŒ (Καλλιρρόή). 1. Afterward called ENNEACRŒNUS (Εννεάκροννος), or the "Nine Springs," because its water was distributed by nine pipes, was the most celebrated well in Athens, and still retains its ancient name Callirrhoe. It was situated in the southeastern extremity of the city, between the Olympicum and the Ilissus.—[2. A fountain and bathing-place in Peræa, on the east side of the Dead Sea, with warm springs, which were accounted healthy.]

[CALLISTE (Καλλίστη), one of the Sporades Islands, the later Thera.]

CALLISTHÈNES (Καλλισθένης), of Olynthus, a relation and a pupil of Aristotle, accompanied Alexander the Great to Asia. In his intercourse with Alexander he was arrogant and bold, and took every opportunity of exhibiting his independence. He expressed his indignation at Alexander's adoption of Oriental customs, and especially at the requirement of the ceremony of adoration. He thus rendered himself so obnoxious to the king, that he was accused of being privy to the plot of Hermolaus to assassinate Alexander; and, after being kept in chains for seven months, was either put to death or died of disease. Callisthenes wrote an account of Alexander's expedition; a history of Greece, in ten books, from the peace of Antalecidas to the seizure of the Delphic temple by Philomelus (B.C. 387-357); and other works, all of which have perished.

CALLISTO (Καλλιστώ), an Arcadian nymph, hence called Nonacrina virgo (Ov., Met., ii., 409) from Nonacris, a mountain in Arcadia, was daughter either of Lycaon, or of Nycteus, or of Ceteus, and a companion of Diana (Artemis) in the chase. She was beloved by Jupiter (Zeus), who metamorphosed her into a she-bear that Juno (Hera) might not become acquainted with the amour. But Juno (Hera) learned the truth, and caused Diana (Artemis) to slay Callisto during the chase. Jupiter (Zeus) placed Callisto among the stars under the name of Arctos, or the Bear. ARCAS was her son by Jupiter (Zeus). According to Ovid, Jupiter (Zeus) overcame the virtue of Callisto by assuming the form of Diana (Artemis); Juno (Hera) then metamorphosed Callisto into a bear; and when Arcas, during the chase, was on the point of killing his mother, Jupiter placed both among the stars. VID. ARCTOS. According to K. O. Müller, Callisto is merely another form of Calliste, a surname of Diana (Artemis), and she is therefore the same as this goddess. The she-bear was the symbol of the Arcadian Diana (Artemis).

CALLISTRATIA (Καλλιστρατία), a town in Paphlagonia, on the coast of the Euxine, near the Promontorium Carambis.

CALLISTRATUS (Καλλιστρατος). 1. An Athenian orator, son of Callierates of Aphidna. His oratory was greatly admired by Demosthenes, and his speech on the affair of Oropus, B.C. 366, is said to have excited the emulation of Demosthenes, and to have caused the latter to devote himself to oratory. After taking an active part in public affairs, generally in favor of Sparta, Callistratus was condemned to death by the Athenians in 361, and went into banishment to Methone in Macedonia. He ultimately returned to Athens, and was put to death. During his exile he is said to have founded the city of Datum, afterward Philippi.—[2. Son of Empedus, commander of a body of Athenian cavalry in Sicily during the expedition of Nicias. After cutting his way through the enemy's forces, he was finally slain in an attack on those who were plundering the Athenian camp.—3. One of the body of knights under the command of Lysimachus, who were employed by the government of the ten to keep in check the exiles under Thra-sybulus in the Piræus; but he was taken by the latter and put to death in revenge for the outrages committed by Lysimachus.]—4. A Greek grammarian, and a disciple of Aristophanes of Byzantium, [who lived about the middle of the second century before Christ. He appears to have devoted himself principally to the study of the great poets of Greece, such as Homer, Pindar, the tragedians, Aristophanes, and some others; and the results of his studies were embodied in commentaries upon those poets, which are now lost.]—5. A Roman jurist, frequently cited in the Digest, wrote at least as late as the reign (A.D. 198-211) of Severus and Antoninus (i. e., Septimius Severus and Caracalla).

CALLISTUS, C. JULIUS, a freedman of Caligula, possessed great influence in the reigns of Caligula and Claudius, and is the person to whom the physician Scribonius Largus dedicates his work.

CALLIUM (Κάλλιον: Καλλιεύς), called CALLIPOLIS by Livy (xxxvi., 30), a town in Ætolia, in the valley of the Spercheus, southwest of Hydrata CALLIXENUS (Καλλιξένος), the leader in the prosecution of the Athenian generals who had conquered at the Arginusæ, B.C. 406. Not long after the execution of the generals, the Athenians repented of their unjust sentence, and decreed the institution of criminal accusations against Callixenus, but he escaped from Athens. On the restoration of democracy, 403, Callixenus took advantage of the general amnesty, and returned to Athens, but no man would give him either water or light for his fire, and he perished miserably of hunger.

CALLON (Κάλλων). 1. An artist of Ægina, flourished B.C. 516.—2. An artist of Elis, lived before B.C. 436.

CALOR. 1. A river in Samnium, flows past Beneventum, and falls into the Vulturnus.—2. (Now Calore), a river in Lucania, falls into the Silarus.

CALPE (Κάλπη: now Gibraltar), a mountain in the south of Spain, on the Straits, between the Atlantic and Mediterranean. This and Mount Abyla, opposite to it, on the African coast, were called the Columns of Hercules. Vid. ABYLA.

CALPE (Κάλπη: now Kırpek), a river, promontory, and town on the coast of Bithynia, between the rivers Psilis and Sangarius.

CALPURNIA, daughter of L. Calpurnius Piso, consul B.C. 58, and last wife of the dictator Cæsar, to whom she was married in 59. The reports respecting the conspiracy against Cæsar's life filled Calpurnia with the liveliest apprehensions; she in vain entreated her husband not to leave home on the Ides of March, 44.

CALPURNIA GENS, plebeian, pretended to be descended from Calpus, a son of Numa. It was divided into the families of BESTIA, BIBULUS, FLAMMA, and PISO.

CALPURNIUS, T. SICIULUS, the author of eleven Eclogues in Latin verse, which are close imitations of Virgil, perhaps lived about A.D. 290.—Editions: In the Poeta Latini Minores of Wernsdorff; and by Glæser, Gotting, 1842.

[CALUS, more correctly CAUS, (Καός), a city of Arcadia, on the River Ladon, containing a temple of Æsculapius.]

CALVA, a surname of Venus at Rome, probably in honor of the Roman women, who are said, during the war with the Gauls, to have cut off their hair for the purpose of making bow-strings.

CALVENTIUS, an Insubrian Gaul, of the town of Placentia, whose daughter married L. Piso, the father of L. Piso Cæsoninus, consul B.C. 58. In his speech against the latter, Cicero upbraids him with the low origin of his mother, and calls him Cæsoninus Semiplacentinus Calventius.

CALVINUS, DOMITIUS. 1. CN., curule ædile B.C. 299, consul 283, and dictator and censor 280. In his consulship he, together with his colleague Dolabella, defeated the Gauls and Etruscans, and hence received the surname Maximus.—2. CN., tribune of the plebs, 59, when he supported Bibulus against Cæsar, prætor 56, and consul 53, through the influence of Pompey. In the civil war he joined Cæsar. In 49 he fought under Curio in Africa; and in 48 he fought under Cæsar in Greece, and commanded the centre of Cæsar's army at the battle of Pharsalia. In 47 he had the command of Asia, and in 46 he fought in Africa against the Pompeian party. After Cæsar's death (44) he fought under Octavianus and Antony against the republicans. In 40 he was consul a second time, and in 39 went as proconsul to Spaiu, where he defeated the revolted Cerretani.

CALVINUS, L. SEXTIUS, consul B.C. 124, defeated the Salluvii and other people in Transalpine Gaul, and in 123 founded the colony of Aquæ Sextiæ (now Aix).

CALVINUS, T. VETURIUS, twice consul, B.C. 334 and 321. In his second consulship he and his colleague Sp. Postumius Albinus were defeated by the Sabines at Claudium. For details, vid. ALBINUS, No. 3.

CALVISIUS SABIŪS. Vid. SABIŪS.

CALVUS, LICINIUS. Vid. LICINIUS.

[CALÛBE, a priestess of Juno, whose form Allecto assumed when she excited Turruo to war against Æneas.]

CALÛCADNUS (Καλύκαδνος). 1. (Now Ghink Sooyoo), a considerable river of Cilicia Tracheia, navigable as far up as Seleucia.—2. The promontory of this name, mentioned by Polybius (xxii, 26) and Livy (xxxviii, 38), appears to be the same as ANEMURIUM.

CALYDNÆ (Καλύδναι νῆσοι). 1. Two small islands off the coast of Troas, between Tenedos and the Promontorium Lectum.—2. A group of islands off the coast of Caria, northwest of Cos, belonging to the Sporades. The largest of them was called Calydna, and afterward Calymna (now Kalimno).

CALÛDŌN (Καλύδών: Καλυδώνιος), an ancient town of Ætolia, on the Evænus, in the land of the Curetes, said to have been founded by Ætolus or his son Calydon. The surrounding country produced wine, oil, and corn; and in the mountains in the neighborhood the celebrated hunt of the Calydonian boar took place. The inhabitants were removed by Augustus to NICOPOLIS.

CALYMNA. Vid. CALYDNÆ, No. 2.

CALYNDIA (Κάλυνδα: Καλυνδέει), a city of Caria, east of Caunus, and sixty stadia (six geographical miles) from the sea. The Calyndians formed a part of the fleet of Xerxes, under their king Damasithymus; afterward they were subject to the Caunians; and both cities were added by the Romans to the territory of Rhodes.

CALYPSO (Καλψώ), daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, or of Nereus, or, according to Homer, of Atlas, was a nymph inhabiting the island of Ogygia, on which Ulysses was shipwrecked. Calypso loved the unfortunate hero, and promised him immortality if he would remain with her. Ulysses refused, and after she had detained him seven years, the gods compelled her to allow him to continue his journey homeward.

CAMALODŪNUM (now Colchester), the capital of the Trinobantes in Britain, and the first Roman colony in the island, founded by the Emperor Claudius, A.D. 43.

CAMARINA (Καμάρινα: Καμαρινάιος: now Camerina), a town on the southern coast of Sicily, at the mouth of the Hipparis, founded by Syracuse, B.C. 599. It was several times destroyed by Syracuse; and in the first Punic war it was taken by the Romans, and most of the inhabitants sold as slaves. Scarcely any vestiges of the ancient town remain. In the neighbor hood was a marsh, which the inhabitants drained contrary to the command of an oracle, and thus opened a way to their enemies to take the town: hence arose the proverb μη κίνει Καμπύνα, νε νοσείας Camarinam.

CAMBŪNI MONTES (now Bolutza), the mountains which separate Macedonia and Thessaly.

CAMBŪSĒYE (Καμβούση), a district of Armenia Major, on the borders of Iberia and Colchis.

CAMBŪSES (Καμβύσης). 1. Father of CYRUS the Great.—2. Second king of Persia, succeeded his father Cyrus, and reigned B.C. 529–522. In 525 he conquered Egypt; but an army, which he sent against the Ammonians perished in the sands, and the forces, which he led in person against the Ethiopians south of Egypt, were compelled by failure of provisions to return. On his return to Memphis he treated the Egyptians with great cruelty; he insulted their religion, and slew their god Apis with his own hands. He also acted tyrannically toward his own family and the Persians in general. He caused his own brother Smerdis to be murdered; but a Magian personated the deceased prince, and set up a claim to the throne. Vid. SMERDIS. Cambyses forthwith set out from Egypt against this pretender, but died in Syria, at a place named Ebatana, of an accidental wound in the thigh, 522.

CAMBŪSES (Καμβύσης). 1. (Now Iora), a river of Iberia and Albania, which, after uniting with the Alazon (now Alasan), falls into the Cyrus.—2. A small river of Media, falling into the Caspian between the Araxes and the Amardus.

CAMENÆ (not Camænæ), also called Casmænæ, Carmenæ. The name is connected with carmen, a "prophecy." The Camenæ accordingly were prophetic nymphs, and they belonged to the religion of ancient Italy, although later traditions represent their worship as introduced into Italy from Areadia, and some accounts identify them with the Muses. The most important of these goddesses was CARMENTA or CARMENTIS, who had a temple at the foot of the Capitoline Hill, and altars near the porta Carmentalis. Respecting festivals, vid. Dict. of Ant., art. CARMENTALLA. The traditions which assigned a Greek origin to her worship state that her original name was Niostrate, and that she was by Mereury (Hermes) the mother of EVANDER, with whom she fled to Italy.

CAMERĪA (Camerinus), an ancient town of Latium, conquered by Tarquinius Priseus.

CAMERĪNUM or CAMARĪNUM, more anciently CAMERTES (Cameretes; now Camerino), a town in Umbria, on the borders of Picenum, an ally of the Romans against the Etruscans, B.C. 308, and also an ally of the Romans in the second Punic war, subsequently a Roman colony.

CAMERĪNUS, the name of a patrician family of the Sulpicia gens, the members of which frequently held the consulship in the early times of the republic (B.C. 500, 490, 461, 393, 345). After B.C. 345 the Camerini disappear from history for 400 years, but they are mentioned again as one of the noblest Roman families in the early times of the empire.

CAMERĪNUS, a Roman poet, contemporary with Ovid, wrote a poem on the capture of Troy by Hercules.

CAMĪCUS (Καμικός: Καμίκιος), an ancient town of the Sicani, on the southern coast of Sicily, on a river of the same name, occupied the site of the citadel of AGRIGENTUM.

CAMILLA, daughter of King Metabus, of the Volseian town of Privernum, was one of the swift-footed servants of Diana, accustomed to the chase and to war. She assisted Turnus against Æneas, and, after slaying numbers of the Trojans, was at length killed by Aruns.

CAMILLUS, FURIUS. 1. M., one of the great heroes of the Roman republic. He was censor B.C. 403, in which year Livy erroneously places his first consular tribunate. He was consular tribune for the first time in 401, and for the second time in 398. In 396 he was dictator, when he gained a glorious victory over the Faliscans and Fidenates, took Veii, and entered Rome in triumph, riding in a chariot drawn by white horses. In 394 he was consular tribune for the third time, and reduced the Faliscans. The story of the schoolmaster who attempted to betray the town of Faleri to Camillus belongs to this campaign. In 391 Camillus was accused of having made an unfair distribution of the booty of Veii, and went voluntarily into exile to Ardea. Next year (390) the Gauls took Rome, and laid siege to Ardea. The Romans in the Capitol recalled Camillus, and appointed him dictator in his absence. Camillus hastily collected an army, attacked the Gauls, and defeated them completely. Vid. BRENNUS. His fellow-citizens saluted him as the second Romulus. In 389 Camillus was dictator a third time, and defeated the Volseians, Æquians, and other nations. In 386 he was consular tribune for the fourth, in 384 for the fifth, and in 381 for the sixth time. In 368 he was appointed dictator a fourth time to resist the rogations of C. Licinius Stolo. Next year, 367, he was dictator a fifth time, and, though eighty years of age, he completely defeated the Gauls. He died of the pestilence, 365. Camillus was the great general of his age, and the resolute champion of the patrician order. His history has received much legendary and traditional fables, and requires a careful critical sifting.—2. SP., son of No. 1, first prætor 367.—3. L., also son of No. 1, was dictator 350, in order to hold the comitia, and consul 349, when he defeated the Gauls.—4. L., son of No. 2, consul 338, when he took Tibur, and, in conjunction with his colleague Mænius, completed the subjugation of Latium. In 325 he was consul a second time.—5. M., proconsul of Africa in the reign of Tiberius, defeated the Numidian Tæfarinas, A.D. 17.—6. M., surnamed SCRIBONIANUS, consul A.D. 32, under Tiberius. At the beginning of the reign of Claudius he was legate of Dalmatia, where he revolted, but was conquered, 42, sent into exile, and died 53.

CAMĪRUS (Κάμειρος: Καμειρένς), a Dorian town on the western coast of the island of Rhodes, said to have been founded by Camirus, son of Cereaphus and Cydippe, and the principal town in the island before the foundation of Rhodes. It was the birth-place of the poet Pindar.

CAMĪSA (Κάμισα), a fortress in Cappadoeia twenty-three Roman miles east of Sebaste, [destroyed in the time of Strabo, but rebuilt at a later period.]

[CAMISSARES, a Carian, father of the celebrated Datames, was made satrap of part of Cilicia bordering on Cappadocia by Artaxerxes Mnemon: he fell in the war of Artaxerxes against the Cadusii, B.C. 385.]

CAMENÆ. Vid. CAMENÆ.

CAMPANIA (Campanus: now Terra di Lavoro), district of Italy, the name of which is probably derived from campus, "a plain," was bounded on the northwest by Latium, north and east by Samnium, southeast by Lucania, and south and southwest by the Tyrrhenian Sea. It was separated from Latium by the River Liris, and from Lucania at a later time by the River Silarus, though in the time of Augustus it did not extend further south than the promontory of Minerva. In still earlier times the Ager Campanus included only the country round Capua. The country along the coast from the Liris to the Promontory of Minerva is a plain inclosed by the Apennines, which sweep round it in the form of a semicircle. Campania is a volcanic country, to which circumstance it was mainly indebted for its extraordinary fertility, for which it was celebrated in antiquity above all other lands. It produced corn, wine, oil, and every kind of fruit in the greatest abundance, and in many parts crops could be gathered three times in the year. The fertility of the soil, the beauty of the scenery, and the softness of the climate, the heat of which was tempered by the delicious breezes of the sea, procured for Campania the epithet Felix, a name which it justly deserved. It was the favorite retreat in summer of the Roman nobles, whose villas studded a considerable part of its coast, especially in the neighborhood of BALE. The principal river was the VULTURNUS: the minor rivers were the LIRIS, SAVO, CLANTUS, SEBETHUS, SARNUS, and SILARUS. The chief lakes were LUCRINUS, ACHERUSIA, AVERNUS, and LITERNA, most of them craters of extinct volcanoes. The earliest inhabitants of the country were the AUSONES and OSCI or OPICI. They were subsequently conquered by the Etruscans, who became the masters of almost all the country. In the time of the Romans we find three distinct people, besides the Greek population of CUMÆ: 1. The Campani, properly so called, a mixed race, consisting of Etruscans and the original inhabitants of the country, dwelling along the coast from Sinuessa to Pæstum. They were the ruling race: their history is given under CAPUA, their chief city. 2. SIDICINI, an Ausonian people, in the northwest of the country, on the borders of Samnium. 3. PICENTINI, in the southeast of the country.

[CAMPANUS, one of the leaders of the Tungri in the war of Civilis against the Romans in A. D. 71.]

CAMPE (Κάμπη), a monster which guarded the Cyclopes in Tartarus, was killed by Jupiter (Zeus) when he wanted the assistance of the Cyclopes against the Titans.

[CAMPI CANINI, a tract of country in the land of the Ræti, corresponding to the modern Tessin valley.]

[CAMPI DIOMĒDEI or DIOMEDIS, a district of Apulia. Vid. DIOMĒDES and CANUSIUM.]

CAMPI LAPIDĒI (πεδίον λιθώδες: now la Crau), "Plain of Stones" in the south of Gaul, east of the Rhone, near the Mediterranean, and on the road from Arles to Marseilles. These stones were probably deposited by the Rhone and the Druentia (now Durance) when their course was different from what it is at present. This singular plain was known even to Æschylus, who says that Jupiter (Zeus) rained down these stones from heaven to assist Hercules in his fight with the Ligurians, after the hero had shot away all his arrows. A sweet herbage grows underneath and between the stones, and consequently, in ancient as well as in modern times, flocks of sheep were pastured on this plain.

CAMPI MACRI (Μακροὶ Κάμποι), the "Long Plains," a tract of country between Parma and Modena, celebrated for the wool of its sheep. There appears to have been a place of the same name, where annual meetings of the neighboring people were held even in the time of Strabo.

[CAMPI PHLEGRÆI, a volcanic district of Campania, extending from Puteoli to Cumæ, and containing Mount Vesuvius.]

CAMPI RAUDII, a plain in the north of Italy, near Verona, where Marius and Catulus defeated the Cimbrî, B.C. 101.

[CAMPŌDŪNUM (Καμπόδονον: now Kempton), a city of ancient Rætia.]

CAMPUS MARTIUS, the "Plain of Mars," frequently called the CAMPUS simply, was, in its widest signification, the open plain at Rome outside the city walls, lying between the Tiber and the hills Capitolinus, Quirinal, and Pincius; but it was more usually used to signify the northwest portion of the plain lying in the bend of the Tiber, which nearly surrounded it on three sides. The southern portion of the plain, in the neighborhood of the Circus Flaminius, was called CIRCUS FLAMINIUS, or CAMPUS FLAMINIUS, or PRATA FLAMINIA. The Campus Martius is said to have belonged originally to the Tarquins, and to have become the property of the state, and to have been consecrated to Mars upon the expulsion of the kings. Here the Roman youths were accustomed to perform their gymnastic and warlike exercises, and here the comitia of the centuries were held. At a later time it was surrounded by porticoes, temples, and other public buildings. It was included within the city walls by Aurelian. Some modern writers make three divisions of the Campus Martius, and suppose that there was a portion of the plain lying between the Campus Martius proper and the Circus Flaminius, called CAMPUS TIBERINUS or CAMPUS MINOR, but this supposition does not rest on sufficient evidence. The Campus Minor mentioned by Catullus (lv, 3) probably refers to another Campus altogether. Respecting the other Campi, vid. ROMA.

ΚΑΝΑΪΕ (Κανάκη), daughter of Æolus and Enarcte, bore several children to Neptune (Poseidon).

ΚΑΝΑΧΟΣ (Κάναχος). 1. A Sicyonian artist, flourished B.C. 540-508, and executed, among other works, a colossal statue of Apollo Phileus at Miletus, which was carried to Ecbatana by Xerxes, 479.—2. A Sicyonian artist, probably grandson of the former, from whom he is not distinguished by the ancients. He and Patrocles cast the statues of two Spartans, who had fought in the battle of Ægospotamos, B.C. 405.

CANÆ (Κάναί: now Kanot-Köi), a sea-port of Æolis, in Asia Minor, opposite to Lesbos. [Near this was the Promontory Canæ, the termination of a range of mountains called by this same name; also named Herod. Æga.]

CANASTRUM or CANASTRÆUM (Κανάστρον, Καναστραίων, sc. ἄκρατήριον, ἢ Καναστραῖη ἄκρη: now Cape Paillari), the southeastern extremity of the peninsula Pallene in Macedonia.

CANDACE (Κανδάκη), a queen of the Æthiopians of Meroë, invaded Egypt B.C. 22, but was driven back and defeated by Petronius, the Roman governor of Egypt. Her name seems to have been common to all the queens of Æthiopia.

CANDAULES (Κανδαύλης), also called Myrsilus, last Heraclid king of Lydia. His wife compelled Gyges to put her husband to death, in consequence of personal exposure. Gyges then married the queen and mounted the throne, B. C. 716.

CANDĀVĪA, CANDĀVĪI MONTES (now Crasta), the mountains separating Illyrium from Macedonia, across which the Via Ægnatia ran.

CANDĪDĪUM PROMONTORIUM (now Ras-el-Abiad, Cape Bianco), northwest of Hippo Zaritus, on the northern coast of Zeugitana, in Africa, forms the western headland of the Sinus Hipponensis.

[CANENS, daughter of Janus, married Picus, king of Latium in Italy. Vid. PICUS.]

CANĪCŪLA. Vid. CANIS.

CANĪDĪA, whose real name was Gratidia, was a Neapolitan female, held up by Horace to contempt as an old sorceress. (Epod., 5, 17; Sat., i, 8.)

CANINŪS GALLUS. Vid. GALLUS.

CANINŪS REBILUS. Vid. REBILUS.

CANIS (Κύνων), the constellation of the Great Dog. The most important star in this constellation was specially named Canis or Canicula, and also Strius. About B.C. 400 the heliacal rising of Sirius at Athens, corresponding with the entrance of the sun into the sign Leo, marked the hottest season of the year, and this observation being taken on trust by the Romans, without considering whether it suited their age and country, the Canes Caniculares became proverbial among them, as the Dog Days are among ourselves. The constellation of the Little Dog was called Procyon (Προκύων), literally translated Ante canem, Antecanis, because in Greece this constellation rises heliacally before the Great Dog. When Boötes was regarded as Iearius (vid. ARCTOS), Procyon became Mæra, the dog of Iearius.

CANNÆ (Cannensis: now Canne), a village in Apulia, northeast of Canusium, situated in an extensive plain east of the Aufidus and north of the small river Vergellus, memorable for the defeat of the Romans by Hannibal, B.C. 216.

CANNINEFATES. Vid. BATAVI.

CANŪBUS or CANŪPUS (Κάνωβος or Κάνωπος), according to Grecian story, the helmsman of Menelaus, who, on his return from Troy, died in Egypt, and was buried on the site of the town of Canobus, which derived its name from him.

CANŪBUS or CANŪPUS (Κάνωβος, Κάνωπος: Κανωβίτης: ruins west of Aboukir), an important city on the coast of Lower Egypt, near the westernmost mouth of the Nile, which was hence called the Canopic Mouth (τὸ Κανωβικὸν στόμα). It was one hundred and twenty stadia (twelve geographical miles) east of Alexandria, and was (at least at one time) the capital of the Nomos Menelaïtes. It had a great temple of Serapis, and a considerable commerce; and its inhabitants were proverbial for their luxury (Κανωβισμός). After the establishment of Christianity, the city rapidly declined.

CANTĀBRI, a people in the north of Spain. The Romans originally gave this name to all the people on the northern coast of Spain; but when they became better acquainted with the country, the name was restricted to the people bounded on the east by the Astures and on the west by the Autrigones. The Cantabri were a fierce and warlike people, and were only subdued by Augustus after a struggle of several years (B.C. 25-19).

CANTĀRUS (Κάνθαρος). 1. A statuary and embosser of Sicyon, flourished about B.C. 268.—[2. CANTĀRUS, a comic poet of Athens, probably of the old comedy, of whom a few fragments are extant, collected in Meineke's Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i, p. 462-3.]

[CANTĀRUS (Κάνθαρος), one of the three subdivisions of the Piræus, the harbor of Athens, so called from its resemblance to a κάνθαρος.]

CANTHUS (Κάνθος), an Argonaut, son of Canethus or of Abas of Eubœa, was slain in Libya by Cephalion or Caphaurus.

CANTIUM (Cantii: now Kent), a district of Britain nearly the same as the modern Kent, but included LONDONIUM: [the eastern extremity of this district formed the Cantium Promontorium, now North Foreland.]

CANULĒICUS, C., tribune of the plebs B.C. 445, proposed the law establishing connubium, or the right of intermarriage, between the patricians and plebs. He also proposed that the people should have the right of choosing the consuls from either the patricians or the plebs; but this proposal was not carried, and it was resolved instead, that military tribunes, with consular power, should be elected from either order in place of the consuls.

CANŪSIUM (Canusinus: now Canosa), a town in Apulia, on the Aufidus, and on the high road from Rome to Brundisium, founded, according to tradition, by Diomedes, whence the surrounding country was called Campus Diomedis. It was, at all events, a Greek colony, and both Greek and Oscan were spoken there in the time of Horace. (Canusini more bilinguis, Hor., Sat., i, 10, 30.) Canusium was a town of considerable importance, but suffered greatly, like most of the other towns in the south of Italy, during the second Punic war. Here the remains of the Roman army took refuge after their defeat at Cannæ, B.C. 216. It was celebrated for its mules and its woollen manufactures, but it had a deficient supply of water. (Hor., Sat., i, 5, 91.) There are still ruins of the ancient town near Canosa.

CANŪTIUS or CANNŪTIUS. 1. P., a distinguished orator, frequently mentioned in Cicero's oration for Cluentius.—2. TI., tribune of the plebs B.C. 44, a violent opponent of Antony and, after the establishment of the triumvirate, of Octavianus also. He was taken prisoner at the capture of Perusia, and was put to death by Octavianus, 40.

CAPĀNEUS (Καπανεύς), son of Hipponous and Astynome or Laodice, and father of Sthenelus, was one of the seven heroes who marched from Argos against Thebes. He was struck by Jupiter (Zeus) with lightning, as he was scaling the walls of Thebes, because he had dared to defy the god. While his body was burning, his wife, Evadne, leaped into the flames and destroyed herself.

[CAPARA (now las Ventas da Caparra), a city of Lusitania, in the territory of the Vettones.]

CAPPELLA, the star. Vid. CAPRA.

CAPPELLA, MARTIANUS MINEUS FELIX, a native of Carthage, probably flourished toward the close of the fifth century of our era. He is the author of a work in nine books, composed in a medley of prose and various kinds of verse, after the fashion of the Satyra Menippea of Varro. It is a sort of encyclopædia, and was much esteemed in the Middle Ages. The first two books, which are an introduction to the rest, consist of an allegory, entitled the Nuptials of Philology and Mercury, while in the remaining seven are expounded the principles of the seven liberal arts, Grammar, Dialectics, Rhetoric, Geometry, Arithmetic, Astronomy, and Music, including Poetry.—Editions: By Hugo Grotius, Lugd. Bat., 1599; and by Köpp, Francf., 1836.

CAPENA (Capenas, -atis: now Civitucola, an uninhabited hill), an ancient Etruscan town founded by and dependent on Veii, submitted to the Romans B.C. 395, the year after the conquest of Veii, and subsequently became a Roman municipium. In its territory was the celebrated grove and temple of Feronia, on the small river Capenas. Vid. FERONIA.

[CAPHAEUS (Κάφαυρος, son of Amphithemis and the nymph Tritonis, slew the Argonaut Canthus.]

[CAPHIRA (Κάφειρα, daughter of Oceanus, is said to have reared Neptune (Poseidon) in Rhodes.]

CAPHYÆ (Καφύαι: Καφνεύς, Καφύντης), a town in Arcadia, northwest of Orchomenus.

• CAPITO, C. ATREIUS. 1. Tribune of the plebs B.C. 55, when he opposed the triumvirs.—2. Son of No. 1, an eminent Roman jurist, was appointed Curator aquarum publicarum in A.D. 13, and held this office till his death, 22. He gained the favor of both Augustus and Tiberius by flattery and obsequiousness. He wrote numerous legal works, which are cited in the Digest and elsewhere. Capito and his contemporary Labeo were reckoned the highest legal authorities of their day, and were the founders of two legal schools, to which most of the great jurists belonged. The schools took their respective names from distinguished disciples of those jurists. The followers of Capito were called from Masurius Sabinus, Sabiniani; and afterward from Cassius Longinus Cassiani. The followers of Labeo took from Proculus the name Proculiani.

CAPITO, C. FONTEIUS. 1. A friend of M. Antony, accompanied Mæcenas to Brundisium, B.C. 37, when the latter was sent to effect a reconciliation between Octavianus and Antony. (Hor. Sat., i, 5, 32.) Capito remained with Antony, and went with him to the East.—[2. C. Fonteius, son of No. 1, was consul in A.D. 12, together with Germanicus, and afterward had, as proconsul, the administration of the province of Asia; he was accused subsequently on account of his conduct in Asia, but was acquitted.]

CAPITOLINUS, JULIUS, one of the Scriptores Historiæ Augustæ, lived in the reign of Diocletian (A.D. 284-305), and wrote the lives of nine emperors: 1. Antoninus Pius; 2. M. Aurelius; 3. L. Verus; 4. Pertinax; 5. Clodius Albius; 6. Opilius Macrinus; 7. The two Maximii; 8. The three Gordiani; 9. Maximus and Balbinus. The best editions of the Scriptores Historiæ Augustæ are by Salmasius, Par., 1620; Schrevelius, Lugd. Bat., 1671.

CAPITOLINUS, MANLIUS. Vid. MANLIUS.

CAPITOLINUS MONS. Vid. CAPITOLIUM, ROMA.

CAPITOLINUS, PETILLIUS, was, according to the Scholiast on Horace (Sat., i, 4, 94), intrusted with the care of the temple of Jupiter on the Capitol (whence he was called Capitolinus), and was accused of having stolen the crown of Jupiter, but was acquitted by the judges in consequence of his being a friend of Augustus. The surname Capitolinus appears, however, to have been a regular family-name of the gens.

CAPITOLINUS, QUINTIUS. Vid. QUINTIUS.

CAPITOLIUM, the temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus at Rome, was situated on the Mons Capitolinus, which derived its name from the temple. This hill is in figure an irregular oblong, with two more elevated summits at the northern and southern ends. The northern summit, which is somewhat higher and steeper, was the ARX or citadel of Rome, and is now occupied by the church of Ara Celi; while the southern summit, which is now covered in part by the Palazzo Caffarelli, was the site of the CAPITOLIUM. The temple is said to have been called the Capitolium, because a human head (caput) was discovered in digging the foundations. The building of it was commenced by Tarquinius Priscus, and it was finished by Tarquinius Superbus, but was not dedicated till the third year of the republic, B.C. 507, by the consul M. Horatius. It was burned down in the civil wars, 83, but was rebuilt by Sulla, and was dedicated by Q. Catulus, 69. It was burned down a second time by the soldiers of Vitellius, A.D. 69, and was rebuilt by Vespasian; but it was burned down a third time in the reign of Titus, 80, and was again rebuilt by Domitian with greater splendor than before. The Capitol contained three cells under the same roof: the middle cell was the temple of Jupiter, hence described as "media qui sedet æde Deus" (Ov. ex Pont., iv, 9, 32), and on either side were the cells of his attendant deities, Juno and Minerva. The Capitol was one of the most imposing buildings at Rome, and was adorned as befitting the majesty of the king of the gods. It was in the form of a square, namely, two hundred feet on each side, and was approached by a flight of one hundred steps. The gates were of bronze, and the ceilings and tiles gilt. The gilding alone cost Domitian twelve thousand talents. In the Capitol were kept the Sibylline books. Here the consuls, upon entering on their office, offered sacrifices and took their vows; and hither the victorious general, who entered the city in triumph, was carried in his triumphal car, to return thanks to the father of the gods. Although the words Arx Capitoliumque are properly used to signify the whole hill, yet we sometimes find the term Arx applied alone to the whole hill, since the hill itself constituted a natural citadel to the city, and sometimes the term Capitolium to the whole hill, on account of the importance and reverence attaching to the temple. Moreover, as the Capitol was nearly as defensible as the Arx, it is sometimes called Arx Tarpeia or Capitolina, but the epithet Tarpeia or Capitolina is applied to distinguish it from the Arx properly so called.

CAPPADŌCĪA (Καππαδοκία: Καππάδοξ, Cappadox), a district of Asia Minor, to which different boundaries were assigned at different times. Under the Persian empire it included the whole country inhabited by a people of Syrian origin, who were called (from their complexion) White Syrians (Λευκόσυροι), and also Cappadocees, which appears to have been a word of Persian origin. Their country seems to have embraced the whole northeastern part of Asia Minor east of the Halys and north of the Taurus. Afterward (but whether under the Persians or after the Macedonian conquest, is a disputed point) the country was divided into two parts, which were named respectively from their proximity to the Euxine and to the Taurus, the northern part being called Cappadocia ad Pontum, and then simply PONTUS, the southern part Cappadocia ad Taurum, and then simply Cappadoceia; the former was also called Cappadocia Minor, and the latter Cappadocia Major. Under the Persian Empire, the whole country was governed by a line of hereditary satraps, who traced their descent from Anaphas, an Achæmenid, one of the seven chieftains that slew the pseudo-Smerdis, and who soon raised themselves to the position of tributary kings. After a temporary suspension of their power during the wars between the successors of Alexander, when Ariarathes I. was defeated and slain by Perdicas (B.C. 322), the kings of southern Cappadocia (respecting the other part, vid. PONTUS) recovered their independence under Ariarathes II., whose history and that of his successors will be found under ARIARATHES and ARIOBARZANES. In A.D. 17, Archelaus, the last king, died at Rome, and Tiberius made Cappadocia a Roman province. VID. ARCHELAUS, No. 6. Soon afterward the districts of Cataonia and Melitene, which had before belonged to Cilicia, were added to Cappadocia, and the province then comprised the ten præfectures of Melitene, Cataonia, Cilicia, Tyanitis, Garsauritis, Laviuiseuc, Sargarausene, Saranravene, Chamanene, and Morimene.

There were other divisions under the later emperors. Cappadocia was a rough and generally sterile mountain region, bordered by the chains of the PARYADES on the north, the SCYDISSSES on the east, and the TAURUS on the south, and intersected by that of the ANTI-TAURUS, on the side of whose central mountain, ARGÆUS, stood the capital Mazaca, afterward CÆSAREA AD ARGÆUM. Its chief rivers were the HALYS and the MELAS. Its fine pastures supported abundance of good horses and mules.

CAPPĀDŌX (Καππάδοξ; now Konax), a tributary of the Halys, rising in Mount Lithrus, in the chain of Paryadres, and forming the north-western boundary of Cappadocia, on the side of Galatia.

CAPRA or CAPELLA (Αἴξ), the brightest star in the constellation of the Auriga or Charioteer, is sometimes called Olenia Capella, because it rested on the shoulder (ἐπὶ τῆς ὠλένης) of the Auriga. This star was said to have been originally the nymph or goat who nursed the infant Jupiter (Zeus) in Crete. VID. ÆGA, AMALTHEA. Its heliacal rising took place soon before the winter solstice, and thus it was termed signum pluviale.

CAPRĀĪA or CAPRĀSĪA. 1. (Now Capraja), a small island off the coast of Etruria, between Populonia and the northern extremity of Corsica, inhabited only by wild goats, whence its name: called by the Greeks Αἴγυλον.—2. (Now Cabrera), a small island off the south of the Balearis Major (now Majorca), dangerous to ships.—3. VID. ÆGATES.—4. VID. FORTUNATÆ INSULÆ.

CAPRĒÆ (now Capri), a small island, nine miles in circumference, off Campania, at the southern entrance of the Gulf of Puteoli, and two and a half miles from the Promontory of Minerva, from which the island had been separated by an earthquake. It is composed of calcareous rocks, which rise to two summits, the highest of which is between one thousand six hundred and one thousand seven hundred feet above the sea. The scenery is beautiful, and the climate soft and genial. According to tradition, it was originally inhabited by the Telebœ, but afterward belonged to the inhabitants of Neapolis, from whom Augustus either purchased it or obtained it in exchange for the island Pithecusa. Here Tiberius lived the last ten years of his reign, indulging in secret debauchery, and accessible only to his creatures. He erected many magnificent buildings on the island, the chief of which was the villa Jovis, and the ruins of which are still to be seen.

CAPRĒA (Καπρία), a large salt lake in Pamphylia, near the coast, between Perge and Aspendus.

CAPRICORNUS (Αἰγόκερως), the Goat, a sign of the zodiac, between the Archer and the Waterman, is said to have fought with Jupiter against the Titans.

CAPRUS (Κάπρος). 1. (Now Little Zab), a river of Assyria, rising in Mount Zagros (now Mountains of Kurdistan), and flowing south-west into the Tigris, opposite to Canaa.—2. A little river of Phrygia, rising at the foot of Mount Cadmus, and flowing north into the Lyens.

CAPSA (Capsetānis; now Ghafsah), a strong and ancient city in the southwest of Byzacena, in Northern Africa, in a fertile oasis, surrounded by a sandy desert abounding in serpents. Its foundation was ascribed by tradition to the Libyan Hercules. In the war with Jugurtha, who used it as a treasure-city, it was destroyed by Marius; but it was afterward rebuilt and erected into a colony.

CAPŪA (Capuanus, Capuensis, but more commonly Campānus; now Capua), originally called VULTURNUM, the chief city of Campania after the fall of CUMÆ, is said to have derived its name from Capys. Vid. CAPYS, No. 2. Capua was either founded or colonized by the Etruscans, according to some, fifty years before the foundation of Rome, and it became at an early period the most prosperous, wealthy, and luxurious city in the south of Italy. In B.C. 420 it was conquered by the warlike Samnites; and the population, which had always been of a mixed nature, now consisted of Ausonians, Oscans, Etruscans, and Samnites. At a later time, Capua, again attacked by the Samnites, placed itself under the protection of Rome, 343. It revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, 216, but was taken by the Romans in 211, was fearfully punished, and never recovered its former prosperity. It was now governed by a præfectus, who was sent annually to the city from Rome. It received a Roman colony by the lex agraria of Julius Cæsar, 59, and under Nero a colony of veterans was settled there. It was subsequently destroyed by the barbarians who invaded Italy. The modern town of Capua is built about three miles from the ancient one, the site of which is indicated by the ruins of an amphitheatre.

CAPUT VADA PROMONTORIUM. Vid. BRACHODES.

CAPYS (Κάπυς). 1. Son of Assaracus and Hieromemone, and father of Anchises.—2. A companion of Æneas, from whom Capua was said to have derived its name.

CAPYS SILVIUS. Vid. SILVIUS.

CAPŪTIUM or CAPITIUM (now Capizzi), called by Cicero Capitina Civitas, a town in Sicily near Mount Ætna.

CAR (Κάρ), son of Phoroneus, and king of Megara, from whom the acropolis of this town was called Caria.

[CARA (now Cares, near Puente la Reyna), a city of the Vascones in Hispania Tarraconensis.]

CARACALLA, emperor of Rome A.D. 211–217, was son of Septimius Severus and his second wife Julia Domna, and was born at Lyons A.D. 188. He was originally called Bassianus after his maternal grandfather, but afterward Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, which became his legal name, and appears on medals and inscriptions. Caracalla was a nickname derived from a long tunic worn by the Gauls, which he adopted as his favorite dress after he became emperor. In 198, Caracalla, when ten years old, was declared Augustus, and in the same year accompanied his father Severus in the expedition against the Parthians. He returned with Severus to Rome in 202, and married Plautilla, daughter of Plautianus, the prætorian præfect. In 208 he went with Severus to Britain; and on the death of the latter at York, 211, Caracalla and his brother Geta succeeded to the throne, according to their father's arrangements. Caracalla's first object was to obtain the sole government by the murder of his brother; and after making several unsuccessful attempts upon the life of Geta, he at length pretended to be reconciled with him, and having thus thrown him off his guard, he caused him to be murdered in the arms of his mother, 212. The assassination of Geta was followed by the execution of many of the most distinguished men of the state, whom Caracalla suspected of favoring his brother's cause: the celebrated jurist Papinian was one of his victims. His cruelties and extravagances knew no bounds; and after exhausting Italy by his extortions, he resolved to visit the different provinces of the empire, which became the scenes of fresh atrocities. In 214 he visited Gaul, Germany, Dacia, and Thrace; and, in consequence of a campaign against the Alemanni, he assumed the surname Alemannicus. In 215 he went to Syria and Egypt; his sojourn at Alexandria was marked by a general slaughter of the inhabitants, in order to avenge certain sarcastic pleasantries in which they had indulged against himself and his mother. In 216 he crossed the Euphrates, laid waste Mesopotamia, and returned to Edessa, where he wintered. Next year he again took the field, intending to cross the Tigris, but was murdered near Edessa by Macrinus, the prætorian præfect. Caracalla gave to all free inhabitants of the empire the name and privileges of Roman citizens.

CARACTÆCUS, king of the Silures in Britain, bravely defended his country against the Romans, in the reign of Claudius. He was at length defeated by the Romans, and fled for protection to Cartimandua, queen of the Brigantes; but she betrayed him to the Romans, who carried him to Rome, A.D. 51. When brought before Claudius, he addressed the emperor in so noble a manner that the latter pardoned him and his friends.

CARĀLIS or CARĀLES (Caralitānus: now Cagliari), the chief town of Sardinia, with an excellent harbor, situated on the SINUS CARALITANUS and on a promontory of the same name (now Capo S. Elia). It was founded by the Carthaginians; under the Romans it was the residence of the prætor, and at a later period the Roman franchise.

CĀRANBIS (Κάρανβις ἄκρα: now Kerempe), a promontory, with a city of the same name, on the coast of Paphlagonia, almost exactly opposite the Kriu Metopou, or southern promontory of the Chersonesus Taurica (now Crimea). An imaginary line joining these two headlands would make an almost equal division of the Euxine, which was hence called διόμηθάσσα. (Soph., Antig., 978.)

CARĀNUS (Κάρανος). 1. Of Argos, a descendant of Hercules, and a brother of Phidon, is said to have settled at Edessa in Macedonia with an Argive colony about B.C. 750, and to have become the founder of the dynasty of Macedonian kings.—2. Son of Philip and half-brother of Alexander the Great.—3. A general of Alexander the Great.

CARASĪUS, born among the Menapii in Gaul, was intrusted by Maximian with the command of the fleet which was to protect the coasts of Gaul against the ravages of the Franks. But Maximian, having become dissatisfied with the conduct of Carausius in this command, gave orders for the execution of the latter. Carausius forthwith crossed over to Britain, where he assumed the title of Augustus, A.D. 287. After several ineffectual attempts to subdue him, Diocletian and Maximian acknowledged him as their colleague in the empire, and he continued to reign in Britain till 293, when he was murdered by his chief officer, Allectus.

CARBO, PAPIRĪUS. 1. C., a distinguished orator, and a man of great talents, but of no principle. He commenced public life as one of the three commissioners or triumvirs for carrying into effect the agrarian law of Tiberius Gracchus. His tribuneship of the plebs, B.C. 131, was characterized by the most vehement opposition to the aristocracy; and he was thought even to have murdered Scipio Africanus, the champion of the aristocratical party, 129. But after the death of C. Gracchus (121), he suddenly deserted the popular party, and in his consulship (120) actually undertook the defence of Opimius, who had murdered C. Gracchus. In 119 Carbo was accused by L. Ælcinius Crassus, who brought a charge against him, and as he foresaw his condemnation, he put an end to his life.—2. Cn., consul 113, was defeated by the Cimbri near Norcia, and being afterward accused by Marcus Antonius, he put an end to his own life.—3. C., with the surname ARVINA, son of No. 1, was a supporter of the aristocracy. In his tribuneship (90), Carbo and his colleague, Marcus Plautius Silvanus, carried a law (Lex Papiria Plautia), giving the Roman franchise to the citizens of the federate towns. Carbo was murdered in 82, by the prætor Brutus Damasippus, at the command of the younger Marius. Vid. BRUTUS, No. 10.—4. Cn., son of No. 2, was one of the leaders of the Marian party. He was thrice consul, namely, in 85, 84, and 82. In 82 he carried on war against Sulla and his generals, but was at length obliged to abandon Italy: he fled to Sicily, where he was taken prisoner, and put to death by Pompey at Lilybæum in the course of the same year.

CARCASSO (now Carcassone), a town of the Tectosages in Gallia Narbonensis, [possessing the Jus Latii, used by Cæsar in his Gallic wars as a place of arms.]

CARCĀTHĪŪCERTA (Καρκαθίόκερτα: now Kart-purt or Diarbekr), the capital of the district of Sophene in Armenia Major.

CARCĪNUS (Καρκίνος). 1. A tragic poet and a contemporary of Aristophanes (Nub., 1263; Pax, 794).—2. A younger tragic poet, lived about B.C. 380; [Suidas attributed to him one hundred and sixty tragedies, but we possess the titles and fragments of nine only, and some fragments of uncertain dramas: all that remains of this poet has been collected and published in Wagner's Tragic. Græc. Fragm. (Didot's Bibliotheca), p. 84–88.]

CARDĀMĪLE (Καρδαμύλη: Καρδαμυλίτης). 1. A town in Messenia, one of the seven towns promised by Agamemnon to Achilles.—2. An island near, or perhaps a town in, Chios.

CARDĒA, a Roman divinity protecting the hinges of doors (cardo), was a nymph beloved by Janus, who rewarded her for her favors by giving her the protection of the hinges of doors, and the power of preventing evil demons from entering houses. Ovid (Past., vi, 101, seq.) counts this goddess with CARNA.

CARDĪA (Καρδία: Καρδιανός), a town on the western side of the Thracian Chersonese, on the Gulf of Melas, founded by Miletus and Clazomenæ, and subsequently colonized by the Athenians under Miltiades. It was destroyed by Lysimachus, who built the town of LYSIMACHIA in its immediate neighborhood. Cardia was the birth-place of Eumenes and of the historian Hieronymus.

CARDUCHI (Καρδοῦχοι), a powerful and warlike people in the southeast of Greater Armenia, or the northeastern margin of the Tigris valley, probably the same as the Γορδωνάιοι and Γορδωνοί of the late geographers and the Kurds of modern times. They dwelt in the mountains which divided Assyria on the northeast from Armenia (Mountains of Kurdistan), and were never thoroughly subdued by the Persians, Greeks, or Romans.

CARĒSUS (Κάρησος), a town of the Troad, on a river of the same name flowing into the Æsepus: destroyed before the time of Strabo: [the surrounding district was called CARESENE.]

[CARFULĒNUS, D., called CARSULEIUS by Appian, served under Julius Cæsar in the Alexandrine war, B.C. 47, in which he is spoken of as a man of great military skill. He subsequently took an active part in the war against Antony, and fell in the battle of Mutina.]

CĀRIA (Καρία: Κάρ, pl. οὶ Κάρες), a district of Asia Minor, in its southwestern corner, bounded on the north and northeast by the mountains Messogis and Cadmus, which divided it from Lydia and Phrygia, and adjacent to Phrygia and Lycia on the east and southeast. It is intersected by low mountain chains running out far into the sea in long promontories, the northernmost of which was called Mycale or Troglidium (opposite to Samos); the next Posidium (on which stood Miletus and Branchidæ); the next is the long tongue of land terminated by the two headlands of Zephyrium and Termerium (with Halicarnassus on its southern side); next the Cnidian Chersonesus, terminated by the Cape Troipium and the city of Cnidus; then the Rhodian Chersonesus, the southern point of which was called Cynossema, opposite to Rhodes; and, lastly, Pedalion or Artemisium, forming the western headland of the Bay of Glæucus. The chief gulfs formed by these promontories were the Mæandrian, between Troglidium and Posidium; the Iassian, between Posidium and Zephyrium; and the Ceraunian or Dorian, between Termerium and Troipium. The valleys between these mountain chains were well watered and fertile. The chief river was the Mæander, between the chains of Messogis and Latmus, to the south of which the country was watered by its tributaries, the Marsyas, Harpasus, and Mosynus, besides some streams flowing west and south into the sea, the most considerable of which was the Calbis. Vid. the articles. The chief products of the country were corn, wine, oil, and figs; for the last of which, Cannus, on the southern coast, was very famous. An extensive commerce was carried on by the Greek colonies on the coast. Even before the great colonization of the coasts of Asia Minor, Dorian settlements existed on the Troipian and Cnidian promontories, and this part of Caria, with the adjacent islands, received at that time other Dorian colonies, and obtained the name of Doris; while to the north of the Iassian Gulf the coast was occupied by Ionian colonies, and thus formed the southern part of IONIA. The inhabitants of the rest of the country were Carians (Kāpes) a wide-spread race of the Indo-Germanic stock, nearly allied to the Lydians and Mysians, which appears, in the earliest times of which we know any thing, to have occupied the greater part of the western coast of Asia Minor and several islands of the Ægean, in conjunction with the LELEGES, from whom the Carians are not easily distinguishable. The connection between the Carians, Lydians, and Mysians is attested by their common worship of Zeus Carios at Mylasa: the Carians had also a common sanctuary of Zeus Chrysaoreus. Their language was reckoned by the Greeks as a barbarian tongue (i. e., unintelligible), though it early received an intermixture of Greek. The people were considered mean and stupid, even for slaves. The country was governed by a race of native princes, who fixed their abode at Halicarnassus after its exclusion from the Dorian confederacy. Vid. HALICARNASSUS. These princes were subject allies of Lydia and Persia, and some of them rose to great distinction in war and peace. Vid. ARTEMISIA, MAUSOBUS, and ADA. After the Macedonian conquest, the southern portion of the country became subject to Rhodes (vid. RHODUS), and the northern part to the kings of PERGAMUS. Under the Romans, Caria formed a part of the province of ASIA.

CARINÆ. Vid. ROMA.

CARINUS, M. AURELIUS, the elder of the two sons of Carus, was associated with his father in the government, A.D. 283, and remained in the west, while his father and brother Numerianus proceeded to the east to carry on war against the Persians. On the death of his father, in the course of the same year, Carinus and Numerianus succeeded to the empire. In 284 Numerianus was slain, and Carinus marched into Mesia to oppose Diocletian, who had been proclaimed emperor. A decisive battle was fought near Margum, in which Carinus gained the victory, but, in the moment of triumph, he was slain by some of his own officers, whose wives he had seduced, 285. Carinus was one of the most profligate and cruel of the Roman emperors.

CARMĀNA (Kārmāna: now Kerman, ruins), the capital of Carmania Propria, 3° longitude east of Persepolis.

CARMĀNĪA (Karmanīa: Karmanīos, Karmanītis: now Kirman), a province of the ancient Persian empire bounded on the west by Persis, on the north by Parthia, on the east by Gedrosia, and on the south by the Indian Ocean. It was divided into two parts, C. Propria and C. Deserta, the former of which was well watered by several small streams, and abounded in corn, wine, and cattle. The country also yielded gold, silver, copper, salt, and cinnamon. The people were akin to the Persians.

CARMĀNOR (Karmanōr), a Cretan, said to have purified Apollo and Diana (Artemis) after slaying the monster Python.

CARMĒLUS and -UM (Kārmēλος: now Jebel-

Elyas), a range of mountains in Palestine, branching off, on the northern border of Samaria, from the central chain (which extends south and north between the Jordan and the Mediterranean), and running north and northwest through the southwest part of Galilee, till it terminates in the promontory of the same name (now Cape Carmel), the height of which is twelve hundred feet above the Mediterranean.

CARMENTA, CARMENTIS. Vid. CAMENÆ.

CARMO (now Carmona), a fortified town in Hispania Bætica, northeast of Hispalis.

CARNA, a Roman divinity, whose name is probably connected with caro, flesh, for she was regarded as the protector of the physical well-being of man. Her festival was celebrated on the first of June, and was believed to have been instituted by Brutus in the first year of the republic. Ovid confounds this goddess with CARDEA.

CARNĒADES (Karneādes), a celebrated philosopher, born at Cyrene about B.C. 213, was the founder of the Third or New Academy at Athens. In 155 he was sent to Rome, with Diogenes and Critolaus, by the Athenians, to depreciate the fine of five hundred talents which had been imposed on the Athenians for the destruction of Oropus. At Rome he attracted great notice from his eloquent declamations on philosophical subjects, and it was here that he first delivered his famous orations on Justice. The first oration was in commendation of the virtue, and the next day the second answered all the arguments of the first, and showed that justice was not a virtue, but a matter of compact for the maintenance of civil society. Thereupon Cato moved the senate to send the philosopher home to his school, and save the Roman youth from his demoralizing doctrines. Carneades died in 129, at the age of eighty-five. He was a strenuous opponent of the Stoics, and maintained that neither our senses nor our understanding supply us with a sure criterion of truth.

CARNĒUS (Karneios), a surname of Apollo, under which he was worshipped by the Dorians, is derived by some from Carnus, a son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Latona (Leto), and by others from Carnus, an Acamanian soothsayer. The latter was murdered by HIPPOTES, and it was to propitiate Apollo that the Dorians introduced his worship under the surname of Carneus. The festival of the Carnēa, in honor of Apollo, was one of the great national festivals of the Spartans. Vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v.

CARNI, a Celtic people, dwelling north of the Veneti in the Alpes Carniæ. Vid. p. 48, b.

CARNUNTUM (Karunōs, -ōnōs: ruins between Deutsch-Altenburg and Petronell), an ancient Celtic town in Upper Pannonia on the Danube, east of Vindobona (now Vienna), and subsequently a Roman municipium or a colony. It was one of the chief fortresses of the Romans on the Danube, and was the residence of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius during his wars with the Marcomanni and Quadi. It was the station of the Roman fleet on the Danube and the regular quarters of the fourteenth legion. It was destroyed by the Germans in the fourth century, but was rebuilt, and was finally destroyed by the Hungarians in the Middle Ages.

CARNUS. Vid. CARNEUS.

CARNUTES or -I, a powerful people in Gallia

Lugdunensis, between the Liger and Sequana: their capital was GENABUM.

CARPASIA (Καρπασία: now Karpassi), a town in the southeast of Cyprus.

CARPATES, also called ALPES BASTARNICÆ (now Carpathian Mountains), the mountains separating Dacia from Sarmatia.

CARPATHUS (Κάρπαθος: now Scarpanto), an island between Crete and Rhodes, in the sea named after it Mare Carpathium: its chief towns were Posidium and Nisyros.

[CARPENTORACE (now Carpentras, with many Roman remains), a city of the Memini in Gallia Narbonensis, at a late period also called Colonia Julia Meminorum.]

CARPETANI, a powerful people in Hispania Tarraconensis, with a fertile territory on the rivers Anas and Tagus, in the moderu Castille and Estremadura: their capital was TOLETUM.

CARPI or CARPIANI, a German people between the Carpathian Mountains and the Danube.

[CARPIS (Κάρπις), a tributary of the Ister, on the southern side.]

CARRÆ or CARRHÆ (Κάρραι: Haran or Charran of Scripture: now Harran), a city of Osroëne in Mesopotamia, not far from Edessa. It was here that Crassus met his death after his defeat by the Parthians, B.C. 53.

CARRINAS or CARINAS. I. C., one of the commanders of the Marian party, fought B.C. 83 against Pompey, and in 82 against Sulla and his generals. After the battle at the Colline gate at Rome, in which the Marian army was defeated, Carrinas took to flight, but was seized and put to death.—2. C., son of No. 1, was sent by Cæsar, in 45, into Spain against Sextus Pompeius, but he did not accomplish any thing. In 43 he was consul, and afterward served as one of the generals of Octavianus against Sextus Pompeius in Sicily in 36, and as procousul in Gaul in 31.—3. SECUNDUS, a rhetorician, expelled by Caligula from Rome because he had, by way of exercise, declaimed against tyrants in his school.

[CARRUCA, a town of Hispania Bætica, northward from Munda.]

CARSEOLI (Carscolanus: now Carsoli), a town of the Æqui in Latium, colonized by the Romans at an early period.

CARSULE (Carsulanus: now Monte Castrilli), a town in Umbria, originally of considerable importance, but afterward declined.

[CARTALO. Vid. CARTHAGO.]

CARTEIA (also called Carthæa, Carpia, Carpeus, Καρτία: now Crantia), more anciently TARTESSUS, a celebrated town and harbor in the south of Spain, at the head of the gulf of which Mount Calpe forms one side, founded by the Phœnicians, and colonized B.C. 170 by four thousand Roman soldiers, whose mothers were Spanish women.

CARTENNA or CARTINNA (now Tennez), a colony on the coast of Mauretania Cæsariensis in northern Africa, founded by Augustus.

CARTHEA (Καρθαία: now Poles, ruins), a town on the south side of the island of Ceos, where considerable ruins are found at the present day.

CARTHAGO, MAGNA CARTHAGO (Καρχιδών: Καρχηδόσιος, Carthaginensis, Pœnus: ruins near El-Marsa, northeast of Tunis), one of the most celebrated cities of the ancient world, stood in the recess of a large bay (Sinus Carthaginensis), inclosed by the headlands Apollinis and Mercurii (now Cape Farina and Cape Bon), in the middle and northernmost part of the north coast of Africa, in latitude about 36° 55' north, and longitude about 10° 20' east. The coast of this part of Africa has been much altered by the deposits of the River Bagradas and the sand which is driven seaward by the northwest winds. In ancient times Carthage stood upon a peninsula surrounded by the sea on all sides except the west; but now the whole space between the northern side of this peninsula and the southern side of the Apollinis Promontorium (now Cape Farina) is filled up and converted into a marsh; Utica, which was on the sea-shore, being left some miles inland; and the course of the Bagradas itself being turned considerably north of its original channel, so that, instead of flowing about half way between Utica and Carthage, it now runs close to the ruins of Utica, and falls into the sea just under Cape Farina. The northeastern and southeastern sides of the peninsula are still open to the sea, which has, indeed, rather encroached here, for ruins are found under water. The southern side of the peninsula was formed by an inclosed bay, connected with the sea only by a narrow opening (now called the Goletta, or, in Arabic, Haket-el-Wad, i. e., Throat of the River), which still forms the port of Tunis (ancient Tunes), which stands at its furthest end; but it is nearly choked up with the deposit of the sewers of the city. The circuit of the old peninsula may be estimated at about thirty miles; the width of the isthmus is three miles. The greatest circumference of the city itself was probably about fifteen miles. The original city appears to have stood on the northeastern part of the peninsula, between Ras Ghannart and Ras Bousaid (now Cape Carthage), where the remains of cisterns are seen under water: these, and the aqueduct, whose ruins may be traced for fifty-two miles to Zaghuwan, are the only remains of the old city. Its port, called Cothon, was on the north west side of the peninsula, where a little village (now inland) still retains the name of El-Marsa, i. e., the Port. The Roman city, which was built after the destruction of the original Carthage, lay to the south of it. The Tyrian colony of Carthage was founded, according to tradition, about one hundred years before the building of Rome, that is, about B.C. 853. There were several more ancient Phœnician colonies along the same coast, between two of which, Utica and Tunes, the new settlement was fixed, about twenty-seven miles (Roman) from the former, and ten from the latter. The mythical account of its foundation is given under Dido. The part of the city first built was called, in the Phœnician language, Betzura or Bosra, i. e., a castle, which was corrupted by the Greeks into Byrsa (Βύρσα), i. e., a hide, and hence probably arose the story of the way in which the natives were cheated out of the ground. As the city grew, the Byrsa formed the citadel: it stood on a low hill; but its site can no longer be identified, as there are several such hills within the circuit of the ancient city. The Cothon, or Port, is said to have been excavated, and the quarter of the city adjoining to it built forty years later,

B.C. 813. This Othou was the inner harbor, and was used for ships of war: the outer harbor, divided from it by a tongue of land three hundred feet wide, was the station for the merchant ships. The fortifications of the city consisted of a single wall on the side toward the sea, where the steep shore formed a natural defence, and a triple wall of great height, with battlements and towers, on the land side; on this side were barracks for forty thousand soldiers, and stables for three hundred elephants and four thousand horses. Beyond the fortifications was a large suburb, called Magara or Magalia, containing many beautiful gardens and villas. The aqueduct already mentioned is supposed, on good grounds, to have been built at an early period of the existence of the city. The most remarkable buildings mentioned within the city were the temple of the god whom the Greeks and Romans identified with Æsculapius, and that of Apollo (Baal or the Sun) in the market-place. The population of Carthage, at the time of the third Punic war, is stated at seven hundred thousand. The constitution of Carthage was a municipal oligarchy, somewhat resembling that of Venice. The two chief magistrates, called Suffetes (probably the same word as the Hebrew Shophetim, i. e., Judges) appear to have been elected for life; the Greek and Roman writers call them kings. The generals and foreign governors were usually quite distinct from the suffetes, but the two offices were sometimes united in the same person. The governing body was a senate, partly hereditary and partly elective, within which there was a select body of one hundred or one hundred and four, called Gerusia, whose chief office was to control the magistrates, and especially the generals returning from foreign service, who might be suspected of attempts to establish a tyranny. The Gerusia was first formed about B.C. 400, when the power of the house of Mago excited suspicion; and its efficacy was shown in the defeat of the attempts made by Hanno (B.C. 340) and Hamilcar (B.C. 306) to seize the supreme power. Its members are said by Aristotle to have been elected by the pentarchies, bodies of which we have very little information, but which appear to have been committees of five, chosen from the most eminent members of the senate, and intrusted with the control of the various departments of the government. Important questions, especially those on which the senate and the suffetes disagreed, were referred to a general assembly of the citizens; but concerning the mode of proceeding in this assembly, and the extent of its powers, we know very little. It seems to have elected the magistrates, the senate having either the power of previous nomination or of a veto, it is not clear which. The generals were chosen by the gerusia, and approved by the assembly of the citizens. The general tone of social morality at Carthage appears to have been high, at least during its earlier history: there was a censorship of public morals, under the care of the gerusia; and all the magistrates were required, during their term of office, to abstain from wine: the magistrates were also unpaid. Their punishments were very severe, and the usual mode of inflicting death was by crucifixion. The religion of Carthage was that of the mother country: especial mention is made of the cruel rites of their tutelary deity Melanthe (i. e., king of the city, no doubt the same as Moloch), which were abolished by the treaty with Gelon of Syracuse, B.C. 480; and also of the worship of Ashtaroth and Astarte, and Æsculapius. The chief occupations of the people were commerce and agriculture: in the former they rivalled the mother city, Tyre; and the latter they pursued with such success that the country around the city was one of the best cultivated districts in the ancient world, and a great work on agriculture, in twenty-eight books, was composed by Mago, a suffete. The revenues of the state were derived from the subject provinces; and its army was composed of mercenaries from the neighboring country, among whom the Numidian cavalry were especially distinguished. Of the History of Carthage a brief sketch will suffice, as the most important portions of it are related in the ordinary histories of Rome. The first colonists preserved the characters of peaceful traders, and maintained friendly relations with the natives of the country, to whom they long continued to pay a rent or tribute for the ground on which the city was built. Gradually, however, as their commerce brought them power and wealth, they were enabled to reduce the natives of the district round the city, first to the condition of allies, and then to that of tributaries. Meanwhile, they undertook military expeditions at sea, and possessed themselves, first of the small islands near their own coast, and afterward of Malta, and the Lipari and Balearic Islands: they also sent aid to Tyre, when it was besieged by Nebuchadnezzar (B.C. 600), and took part in wars between the Etruscans and the Phœœan colonies. On the coast of Africa they founded numerous colonies, from the Pillars of Hercules to the bottom of the Great Syrtis, where they met the Greek colonists of Cyrenaica: the people of these colonies became intermixed with the Libyans around them, forming a population who are called Libyo-Phœœians. In connection with their commercial enterprises, they no doubt sent forth various expeditions of maritime discovery, among which we have mention of two, which were undertaken during the long peace which followed the war with Gelon in B.C. 480, to explore the western coasts of Europe and Africa respectively. The record of the latter expedition, under Hanno, is still preserved to us in a Greek translation, (vid. HANNO), from which we learn that it reached probably as far south as 10° north latitude, if not further. The relations of the Carthaginians with the interior of Northern Africa appear to have been very extensive, but the country actually subject to them, and which formed the true Carthaginian territory, was limited to the district contained between the River Tusca (now Zain) on the west, and the lake and river Trion, at the bottom of the Lesser Syrtis, on the south, corresponding very nearly to the modern regency of Tunis; and even within this territory there were some ancient Phœœian colonies, which, though in alliance with Carthage, preserved their independent municipal government, such as Hippo Zaritus, Utica, Hadrumete-tum, and Leptis. The first great development of the power of Carthage for foreign conquest was made by Mago (about B.C. 550-500), who is said to have first established a sound discipline in the armies of the republic, and to have freed the city from the tribute which it still paid to the Libyans. His sons, Hasdrubal and Hamilcar, reduced a part of the island of Sardinia, where the Carthaginians founded the colonies of Caralis and Sulci; and by this time the fame of Carthage had spread so far, that Darius is said to have sent to ask her aid against the Greeks, which, however, was refused. The Carthaginians, however, took advantage of the Persian war to attempt the conquest of Sicily, whither Hamilcar was sent with a great force, in B.C. 480, but his army was destroyed and himself killed in a great battle under the walls of Himera, in which the Sicilian Greeks were commanded by Gelon, the tyrant of Syracuse, and which was said to have been fought on the same day as the battle of Salamis. Their next attempt upon Sicily, in B.C. 410, led to a protracted war, which resulted in a treaty between the Syracusans, under Timoleon, and the Carthaginians, by which the latter were confirmed in the possession of the western part of the island, as far as the River Halicus. From B.C. 310-307 there was another war between Syracuse and the Carthaginians, which was chiefly remarkable for the bold step taken by Agathocles, who invaded the Carthaginian territory in Africa, and thus, though unable to maintain himself there, set an example which was followed a century later by Scipio, with fatal results to Carthage. Passing over the wars with PRRHUS and HIERO, we come to the long struggle between Rome and Carthage, known as the Punic Wars, which are fully related in the histories of Rome. Vid. also HAMILCAR. The first lasted from B.C. 265-242, and resulted in the loss to Carthage of Sicily and the Lipari Islands. It was followed by a fierce contest of some years between Carthage and her disbanded mercenaries, which is called the Libyan War, and which was terminated by Hamilcar Barca. After a hollow peace, during which the Romans openly violated the last treaty, and the Carthaginians conquered Spain as far as the Iberus (now Ebro), the Second Punic War, the decisive contest between the two rival states, which were too powerful to co-exist, began with the siege of Saguntum (B.C. 218), and terminated (B.C. 201) with a peace by which Carthage was stripped of all her power. Vid. HANNIBAL, SCIPIO. Her destruction was now only a question of time, and, though she serupulously observed the terms of the last peace for fifty years, in spite of every provocation from the Romans and their ally Masinissa, the king of Numidia, a pretext was at length found for a new war (B.C. 149), which lasted only three years, during which the Carthaginians, driven to despair by the terms proposed to them, sustained a siege so destructive, that out of seven hundred thousand persons who were living in the city at its commencement, only fifty thousand surrendered to the Romans. The city was razed to the ground, and remained in ruins for thirty years. At the end of that time a colony was established on the old site by the Grec-chi, which remained in a feeble condition till the times of Julius and Augustus, under whom a new city was built south of the former, on the southeasterly side of the peninsula, with the name of COLONIA CARTHAGO. It soon grew so much as to cover a great part (if not the whole) of the site of the ancient Tyrian city: it became the first city of Africa, and occupied an important place in ecclesiastical as well as in civil history. It was taken by the Vandals in A.D. 439, retaken by Belisarius in A.D. 533, and destroyed by the Arab conquerors in A.D. 698. Respecting the territory of Carthage under the Romans, vid. AFRICA, No. 2.

CARTHAGO NOVA (Καρχηδών ή νέα: now Carthagen), a town on the eastern coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, founded by the Carthaginians under Hasdrubal, B.C. 243, and subsequently conquered and colonized by the Romans, from which time its full name was Colonia Victrix Julia Nova Carthago. It is situated on a promontory running out into the sea, and possesses one of the finest harbors in the world: at the entrance of the harbor, was a small island called SCOMBEARIA, from the great number of scombri or mackerel caught here, from which such famous pickle was made. In ancient times Carthago Nova was one of the most important cities in all Spain; its population was numerous, its trade flourishing, and its temples and other public buildings handsome and imposing. It was, together with Tarraco, the residence of the Roman governor of the province. In the neighborhood were valuable silver mines; and the country produced an immense quantity of Spartum or broom, whence the town bore the surname Spartaria, and the country was called Campus Spartarius.

[CARTHÁLO. 1. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet in the first Punic war.—2. The Carthaginian commander of the cavalry in the army of Hannibal. He was slain by a Roman soldier after laying down his arms at the capture of Tarentum by the Romans.]

[CARTISMANDUA or CARTIMANDUA, queen of the Brigantes in Britannia, betrayed to the Romans Caractacus, who had fled to her for protection when defeated by the proprætor Ostorius, A.D. 50. She afterward repudiated her husband Venutius, and gave her hand and kingdom to his armor-bearer, Velloceatus. Venutius, supported by a great portion of the Brigantes, took up arms, and finally succeeded in regaining the sovereignty, though Cartismandua was rescued and protected by the Romans.]

CARURA (τὰ Καρούρα: now Sarikivi), a Phrygian city, in the territory of Caria, on the left bank of the Mæander, celebrated for its hot springs and its temple of Meu Carus.

CARUS, M. AURELIUS, Roman emperor A.D. 282-283, probably born at Narbo in Gaul, was præfectus prætorio under Probus, and on the murder of the latter was elected emperor. After defeating the Sarmatians, Carus invaded the Persian dominions, took Selencia and Ctesiphon, and was preparing to push his conquests beyond the Tigris, when he was struck dead by lightning, toward the close of 283. He was succeeded by his sons CARINUS and NUMERIANUS. Carus was a victorious general and able ruler.

CARUSA (ἡ Καρούσα; now Kerzeh), a city on the coast of Paphlagonia, south of Sinope.

CARVENTUM, a town of the Volsci, to which the CARVENTANA ARX, mentioned by Livy, belonged; a town of the Volsci, between Signina and the sources of the Treverus.

CARVILIUS MAXIMUS. 1. Sp., twice consul, B.C. 293 and 273, both times with L. Papirius Cursor. In their first consulship they gained brilliant victories over the Samnites, and in their second they brought the Samnite war to a close.—2. Sp., son of the preceding, twice consul, 234 and 228, was alive at the battle of Cannæ, 216, after which he proposed to fill up the vacancies in the senate from the Latins. This Carvilius is said to have been the first person at Rome who divorced his wife.

CARYÆ (Καρίαί: Καρύτης, fem. Καρύτις), a town in Laconia, near the borders of Arcadia, originally belonged to the territory of Tegea in Arcadia. It possessed a temple of Artemis (Diana) Caryatis, and an annual festival in honor of this goddess was celebrated here by the Lacedæmonian maidens with national dances. Respecting the female figures in architecture called Caryatides, vid. Diel. of Ant., s. v.

CARYANDA (τὸ Καριάνδα: Καρυανδεύς: now Karakoyan), a city of Caria, on a little island, once probably united with the main land, at the northwestern extremity of the peninsula on which Halicarnassus stood. It once belonged to the Ionian league; and it was the birth-place of the geographer Seylax.

CARYÄTIS. Vid. CARYÆ.

CARYSTIUS (Καρύστιος), a Greek grammarian of Pergamum, lived about B.C. 120, and wrote numerous works, all of which are lost.

CARYSTUS (Κάρυστος: Καρύστιος: now Karysto or Castel Rosso), a town on the southern coast of Eubœa, at the foot of Mount Oeche, founded by Dryopes; called, according to tradition, after Carystus, son of Chiron. In the neighborhood was excellent marble, which was exported in large quantities, and the mineral called Asbestos was also found here.

CASCA, P. SERVILIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 44, was one of the conspirators against Cæsar, and aimed the first stroke at his assassination. He fought in the battle of Philippi (42), and died shortly afterward. C. Casca, the brother of the preceding, was also one of the conspirators against Cæsar.

[CASCANTUM (now Cascente), a municipium of the Vascones in Hispania Tarraconensis.]

CASCELLIUS, A., an eminent Roman jurist (Hor., Ar. Poët., 371), contemporary with Cæsar and Augustus, was a man of stern republican principles, and spoke freely against the proscriptions of the triumvirs.

CASILINUM (Casilinas, -ätis), a town in Campania, on the Vulturinus, and on the same site as the modern Capua, celebrated for its heroic defence against Hannibal B.C. 216. It received Roman colonists by the Lex Julia, but had greatly declined in the time of Pliny.

CASINUM (Casinas, -ätis: now St. Germano), a town in Latium, on the River CASINUS, and on the Via Latina, near the borders of Campania; colonized by the Romans in the Samnite wars; subsequently a municipium: its citadel, containing a temple of Apollo, occupied the same site as the celebrated convent Mente Cassino the ruins of an amphitheatre are found at St Germano.

[CASINUS, a small river on the borders of Latium and Campania, emptying into the Liris.]

CASIÖTIS. Vid. CASIUS.

CASIUS. 1. (Now Ras Kasaroun), a mountain on the coast of Egypt, east of Pelusium, with a temple of Jupiter on its summit. Here also was the grave of Pompey. At the foot of the mountain, on the land side, on the high road from Egypt to Syria, stood the town of Casium (now Katicli). The surrounding district was called Casiötis.—2. (Now Jebel Okrah), a mountain on the coast of Syria, south of Antioch and the Orontes, five thousand three hundred and eighty feet above the level of the sea. The name of Casiötis was applied to the district on the coast south of Casius, as far as the northern border of Phœnicia.

CASMËNA, -Æ (Κασμένη, Herod.: Κασμένα, Thuc.: Κασμεναίος), a town in Sicily, founded by Syracuse about B.C. 643.

CASPËRIA or CASPËRÛLA, a town of the Sabinæ, northwest of Cures, on the River Himella (now Aspra).

CASPËE PORTE or PYLÆ (Κάσπια πύλαι, i. e., the Caspian Gates), the principal pass from Media into Parthia and Hyrcania, through the CASPII MONTES, was a deep ravine, made practicable by art, but still so narrow that there was only room for a single wagon to pass between the lofty overhanging walls of rock, from the sides of which a constant drip of salt water fell upon the road. The Persians erected iron gates across the narrowest part of the pass, and maintained a guard for its defence. This pass was near the ancient Rhagæ or Arsacia; but there were other passes through the mountains round the Caspian, which are called by the same name, especially that on the western shore of the Caspian, through the Caucasus, near Derbent, which was usually called Albanicæ or Caucasicæ Portæ. The Caspian Gates, being the most important pass from Western to Central Asia, were regarded by many of the ancients as a sort of central point, common to the boundaries between Western and Eastern Asia, and Northern and Southern Asia; and distances were reckoned from them.

CASPËI (Κάσπιοι), the name of certain Scythian tribes near the Caspian Sea, is used rather loosely by the ancient geographers. The Caspii of Strabo are on the west side of the sea, and their country, Caspiæ, forms a part of Albania. Those of Herodotus and Ptolemy are in the east of Media, on the borders of Parthia, in the neighborhood of the CASPËE PYLÆ. Probably it would not be far wrong to apply the name generally to the people round the south western and southern shores of the Caspian in and about the CASPII MONTES.

CASPËI MONTES (τὰ Κάσπια ὄρη: now Elburz Mountains) or CASIÛS MONS, is a name applied generally to the whole range of mountains which surround the Caspian Sea, on the south and southwest, at the distance of from fifteen to thirty miles from its shore, on the borders of Armenia, Media, Hyrcania, and Parthia; and more specifically to that part of this range south of the Caspian, in which was the pass called CASPLE PYLE. The term was also loosely applied to other mountains near the Caspian, especially, by Strabo, to the eastern part of the Caucasus, between Colchis and the Caspian.

CASPIRI or CASPIRAI (Κάσπειροι, Κασπιαῖοι), a people of India, whose exact position is doubtful: they are generally placed in Cashmeer and Nepaul.

CASPIUM MARE (ἡ Κασπία θάλασσα, the Caspian Sea), also called HYRCANUM, ALBANUM, and SCYTHICUM, all names derived from the people who lived on its shores, is a great salt-water lake in Asia, according to the ancient division of the continents, but now on the boundary between Europe and Asia. Its average width from east to west is about two hundred and ten miles, and its length from north to south, in a straight line, is about seven hundred and forty miles; but as its northern part makes a great bend to the east, its true length, measured along a curve drawn through its middle, is about nine hundred miles; its area is about one hundred and eighty thousand square miles. The notions of the ancients about the Caspian varied very much; and it is curious that two of the erroneous opinions of the later Greek and Roman geographers, namely, that it was united both with the Sea of Aral and with the Arctic Ocean, expressed what, at some remote period, were probably real facts. Their other error, that its greatest length lay west and east, very likely arose from its supposed union with the Sea of Aral. Another consequence of this error was the supposition that the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes flowed into the Caspian. That the former really did so at some time subsequent to the separation of the two lakes (supposing that they were once united) is pretty well established; but whether this has been the case within the historical period can not be determined (vid. Oxus). The country between the two lakes has evidently been greatly changed, and the sand-hills which cover it have doubtless been accumulated by the force of the east winds bringing down sand from the steppes of Tartary. Both lakes have their surface considerably below that of the Black Sea, the Caspian being nearly three hundred and fifty feet, and the Aral about two hundred feet, lower than the level of the Black Sea, and both are still sinking by evaporation. Moreover, the whole country between and around them for a considerable distance is a depression, surrounded by lofty mountains on every side, except where the valley of the Irish and Obi stretches away to the Arctic Ocean. Besides a number of smaller streams, two great rivers flow into the Caspian; the Rha (now Volga) on the north, and the united Cyrus and Amxes (now Kour) on the west; but it loses more by evaporation than it receives from these rivers.

[CASPIUS MONS (τὸ Κάσπιον ὄρος). Vid. CASPII MONTES.]

CASSANDANE (Κασσανδάνη), wife of Cyrus the Great and mother of Cambyses.

CASSANDER (Κάσσανδρος), son of Antipater. His father, on his death-bed (B.C. 319), appointed Polysperchon regent, and conferred upon Cassander only the secondary dignity of chiliarch. Being dissatisfied with this arrangement, Cassander strengthened himself by an alliance with Ptolemy and Antigonus, and entered into war with Polysperchon. In 318 Cassander obtained possession of Athens and most of the cities in the south of Greece. In 317 he was recalled to Macedonia to oppose Olympias. He kept her besieged in Pydna throughout the winter of 317, and on her surrender in the spring of the ensuing year he put her to death. The way now seemed open to him to the throne of Macedon. He placed Roxana and her young son, Alexander Ægus, in custody at Amphipolis, not thinking it safe as yet to murder them; and he connected himself with the regal family by a marriage with Thessalonica, half-sister to Alexander the Great. In 315 Cassander joined Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus in their war against Antigonus, of whose power they had all become jealous. This war was, upon the whole, unfavorable to Cassander, who lost most of the cities in Greece. By the general peace of 311, it was provided that Cassander was to retain his authority in Europe till Alexander Ægus should be grown to manhood. Cassander thereupon put to death the young king and his mother Roxana. In 310 the war was renewed, and Hercules, the son of Alexander by Barsine, was brought forward by Polysperchon as a claimant to the Macedonian throne; but Cassander bribed Polysperchon to murder the young prince and his mother, 309. In 306 Cassander took the title of king, when it was assumed by Antigonus, Lysimachus, and Ptolemy. In the following years, Demetrius Polioretetes, the son of Antigonus, carried on the war in Greece with great success against Cassander; but in 302 Demetrius was obliged to pass into Asia, to support his father; and next year, 301, the decisive battle of Ipsus was fought, in which Antigonus and Demetrius were defeated, and the former slain, and which gave to Cassander Macedonia and Greece. Cassander died of dropsy in 297, and was succeeded by his son Philip.

CASSANDRA (Κασσάνδρα), daughter of Priam and Hecuba, and twin-sister of Helenus. She and her brother, when young, were left asleep in the sanctuary of Apollo, when their ears were purified by serpents, so that they could understand the divine sounds of nature and the voices of birds. Cassandra sometimes used to sleep afterward in the same temple; and when she grew up, her beauty won the love of Apollo. The god conferred upon her the gift of prophecy, upon her promising to comply with his desires; but when she had become possessed of the prophetic art, she refused to fulfill her promise. Thereupon the god, in anger, ordained that no one should believe her prophecies. She predicted to the Trojans the ruin that threatened them, but no one believed her; she was looked upon as a mad woman, and according to a late account, was shut up and guarded. On the capture of Troy she fled into the sanctuary of Minerva (Athena), but was torn away from the statue of the goddess by Ajax, son of Oileus, and, according to some accounts, was even ravished by him in the sanctuary. On the division of the booty, Cassandra fell to the lot of Agamemnon, who took her with him to Mycenæ. Here she was killed by Clytemnestra.

CASSIPEA, CASSIOPĒA, or CASSIŌPE (Κασσιπέα, Κασσιόπεια, Κασσιόπη), wife of Cepheus in Æthiopia, and mother of Andromeda, whose beauty she extolled above that of the Nereids. VID. ANDROMEDA. She was afterward placed among the stars.

CASSIODŌRUS, MAGNUS AURĒLIUS, a distinguished statesman, and one of the few men of learning at the downfall of the Western Empire, was born about A.D. 468, at Scylacium in Bruttium, of an ancient and wealthy Roman family. He enjoyed the full confidence of Theodorie the Great and his successors, and under a variety of different titles he conducted for a long series of years the government of the Ostrogothic kingdom. At the age of seventy he retired to the monastery of Viviers, which he had founded in his native province, and there passed the last thirty years of his life. His time was devoted to study and to the composition of elementary treatises on history, metaphysics, the several liberal arts, and divinity, while his leisure hours were employed in the construction of philosophical toys, such as sundials, water-clocks, &c. Of his numerous writings the most important is his Variarum (Epistolarum) Libri XII, an assemblage of state papers drawn up by Cassiodorus in accordance with the instructions of Theodorie and his successors. The other works of Cassiodorus are of less value to us. The principal are, 1. Chronicon, a summary of Universal History; 2. De Orthographia Liber; 3. De Arte Grammatica ad Donati Mentem; 4. De Artibus ac Disciplinis Liberalium Literarum, much read in the Middle Ages; 5. De Anima; 6. Libri XII. De Rebus Gestis Gothorum, known to us only through the abridgment of Jornandes; 7. De Institutione Divinarum Literarum, an introduction to the profitable study of the Scriptures. There are also several other ecclesiastical works of Cassiodorus extant. The best edition of his collected works is by D. Garet, Rouen, 1679, 2 vols. fol., reprinted at Venice, 1729.

CASSIŌPE (Κασσιόπη), a town in Coreyta, on a promontory of the same name, with a good harbor and a temple of Jupiter (Zeus).

CASSITĒRIDES. VID. BRITANNIA, p. 149, a.

CASSIUS, the name of one of the most distinguished of the Roman gentes, originally patrician, afterwards plebeian. 1. SP. CASSIUS VISCELLINUS, thrice consul: first, B.C. 502, when he conquered the Sabines; again, 493, when he made a league with the Latins; and, lastly, 486, when he made a league with the Hernicans, and carried his celebrated agrarian law, the first which was proposed at Rome. It probably enacted that the portion of the patricians in the public land should be strictly defined, and that the remainder should be divided among the plebeians. In the following year he was accused of aiming at regal power, and was put to death. The manner of his death is related differently, but it is most probable that he was accused before the comitia curiata by the quæstors parricidii, and was sentenced to death by his fellow-patricians. His house was razed to the ground, and his property confiscated. His guilt is doubtful; he had made himself hateful to the patricians by his agrarian law, and it is most likely that the accusation was invented for the purpose of getting rid of a dangerous opponent. He left three sons; but, as all the subsequent Cassii are plebeians, his sons were perhaps expelled from the patrician order, or may have voluntarily passed over to the plebeians, on account of the murder of their father.—2. C. CASS. LONGINUS, consul 171, obtained as his province Italy and Cisalpine Gaul, and without the authority of the senate attempted to march into Macedonia through Illyriæ, but was obliged to return to Italy. In 154 he was censor with M. Messala; and a theatre, which these censors had built, was pulled down by order of the senate, at the suggestion of P. Scipio Nasica, as injurious to public morals.—3. Q. CASS. LONGINUS, prætor urbanus B.C. 167, and consul 164, died in his consulship.—4. L. CASS. LONGINUS RAVILLA, tribune of the plebs, 137, when he proposed a law for voting by ballot (tabellaria lex); consul 127, and censor 125. He was very severe and just as a judex.—5. L. CASS. LONGINUS, prætor 111, when he brought Jugurtha to Rome; consul 107, with C. Marius, and received as his province Gallia Narbonensis, in order to oppose the Cimbri, but was defeated and killed by the Tigurini.—6. L. CASS. LONGINUS, tribune of the plebs 104, brought forward many laws to diminish the power of the aristocracy.—7. C. CASS. LONGINUS VARUS, consul 73, brought forward with his colleague M. Terentius, a law (lex Terentia Cassia), by which corn was to be purchased and then sold in Rome at a small price. In 72 he was defeated by Spartacus near Mutina; in 66 he supported the Manilian law for giving the command of the Mithradatic war to Pompey; and in his old age was proscribed by the triumvirs and killed, '43.—8. C. CASS. LONGINUS, the murderer of Julius Cæsar. In 53 he was quæstor of Crassus in his campaign against the Parthians, in which he greatly distinguished himself by his prudence and military skill. After the death of Crassus, he collected the remains of the Roman army, and made preparations to defend Syria against the Parthians. In 52 he defeated the Parthians, who had crossed the Euphrates, and in 51 he again gained a still more important victory over them. Soon afterward he returned to Rome. In 49 he was tribune of the plebs, joined the aristocratic party in the civil war, and fled with Pompey from Rome. In 48 he commanded the Pompeian fleet; after the battle of Pharsalia he went to the Hellespont, where he accidentally fell in with Cæsar, and surrendered to him. He was not only pardoned by Cæsar, but in 44 was made prætor, and the province of Syria was promised him for the next year. But Cassius had never ceased to be Cæsar's enemy; it was he who formed the conspiracy against the dictator's life, and gained over M. Brutus to the plot. After the death of Cæsar, on the 14th of March, 44 (vid. CÆSAR), Cassius remained in Italy for a few months, but in July he went to Syria, which he claimed as his province, although the senate had given it to Dolabella, and had conferred upon Cassius Cyrene in its stead. He defeated Dolabella, who put an end to his own life; and, after plundering Syria and Asia most unmercifully, he crossed over to Greece with Brutus in

42, in order to oppose Octavianus and Antony. At the battle of Philippi, Cassius was defeated by Antony, while Brutus, who commanded the other wing of the army, drove Octavianus off the field; but Cassius, ignorant of the success of Brutus, commanded his freedman to put an end to his life. Brutus mourned over his companion, calling him the last of the Romans. Cassius was married to Junia Tertia or Tertulla, half-sister of M. Brutus. Cassius was well acquainted with Greek and Roman literature; he was a follower of the Epicurean philosophy; his abilities were considerable, but he was vain, proud, and revengeful.—9. L. CASS. LONGINUS, brother of No. 8, assisted M. Latrensis in accusing Cn. Plancius, who was defended by Cicero in 54. He joined Cæsar at the commencement of the civil war, and was one of Cæsar's legates in Greece in 48. In 44 he was tribune of the plebs, but was not one of the conspirators against Cæsar's life. He subsequently espoused the side of Octavianus, in opposition to Antony; and on their reconciliation in 43, he fled to Asia: he was pardoned by Antony in 41.—10. Q. CASS. LONGINUS, the frater (as Cicero calls him, by which he probably means first-cousin) of No. 8. In 54 he went as the quaestor of Pompey into Spain, where he was universally hated on account of his rapacity and cruelty. In 49 he was tribune of the plebs, and a warm supporter of Cæsar, but was obliged to leave the city and take refuge in Cæsar's camp. In the same year he accompanied Cæsar to Spain, and after the defeat of Afranius and Petreius, the legates of Pompey, Cæsar left him governor of Further Spain. His cruelty and oppressions excited an insurrection against him at Corduba, but this was quelled by Cassius. Subsequently two legions declared against him, and M. Marcellus, the quaestor, put himself at their head. He was saved from this danger by Lepidus, and left the province in 47, but his ship sank, and was lost, at the mouth of the Iberus.—11. L. CASS. LONGINUS, a competitor with Cicero for the consulship for 63; was one of Catiline's conspirators, and undertook to set the city on fire; he escaped the fate of his comrades by quitting Rome before their apprehension.—12. L. CASS. LONGINUS, consul A.D. 30, married to Drusilla, the daughter of Germanicus, with whom her brother Caligula afterward lived. Cassius was proconsul in Asia A.D. 40, and was commanded by Caligula to be brought to Rome, because an oracle had warned the emperor to beware of a Cassius: the oracle was fulfilled in the murder of the emperor by Cassius Chærea.—13. C. CASS. LONGINUS, the celebrated jurist, governor of Syria A.D. 50, in the reign of Claudius. He was banished by Nero in A.D. 66, because he had, among his ancestral images, a statue of Cassius, the murderer of Cæsar. He was recalled from banishment by Vespasian. Cassius wrote ten books on the civil law (Libri Juris Civilis), and Commentaries on Vitellius and Urseus Ferox, which are quoted in the Digest. He was a follower of the school of Ateius Capito; and as he reduced the principles of Capito to a more scientific form, the adherents of this school received the name of Cassiani.—14. L. CASS. HEMINA, a Roman annalist, lived about B.C. 140, and wrote a history of Rome from the earliest times to the end of the third Punic war.—15. CASS. PARMENIS, so called from Parma, his birth-place, was one of the murderers of Cæsar, B.C. 43; took an active part in the war against the triumvirs; and, after the death of Brutus and Cassius, carried over the fleet which he commanded to Sicily, and joined Sextus Pompey; upon the defeat of Pompey he surrendered himself to Antony, whose fortunes he followed until after the battle of Actium, when he went to Athens, and was there put to death by the command of Octavianus, B.C. 30. Cassius was a poet, and his productions were prized by Horace (Ep. i. 4, 3). He wrote two tragedies, entitled Thyestes and Brutus, epigrams, and other works.—16. CASS. ERUSCUS, a poet censured by Horace (Sat. i. 10, 61), must not be confounded with No. 15.—17. CASS. AVIDIUS, an able general of M. Aurelius, was a native of Syria. In the Parthian war (A.D. 162-165) he commanded the Roman army as the general of Verus, and after defeating the Parthians he took Seleucia and Ctesiphon. He was afterward appointed governor of all the Eastern provinces, and discharged his trust for several years with fidelity; but in A.D. 175 he proclaimed himself emperor. He reigned only a few months, and was slain by his own officers before Marcus Aurelius arrived in the East. Vir. p. 132, a.—18. DIONYSIUS CASSIUS, of Utica, a Greek writer, lived about B.C. 40, and translated into Greek the work of the Carthaginian Mago on agriculture.—19. CASS. FELIX, a Greek physician, probably lived under Augustus and Tiberius; wrote a small work entitled Ἱατρικὰ Ἀπορίαι καὶ Προβλήματα Φυσικὰ, Quæstiones Medicæ et Problemata Naturalia: printed in Ideler's Physici et Medici Græci Minores, Berol., 1841.—20. CASS. CHÆREA. Vir. CHÆREA.—21. CASS. DION. Vir. DION CASSIUS.—22. CASS. SEVERUS. Vir. SEVERUS.

CASSIVELANUS, a British chief, ruled over the country north of the Tamesis (now Thames), and was intrusted by the Britons with the supreme command on Cæsar's second invasion of Britain, B.C. 54. He was defeated by Cæsar, and was obliged to sue for peace.

CASSŌPE (Κασσώπη: Κασσωπαίος: now Cassopo or Agioi Saranta), a town in Thesprotia, near the coast.

CASTĀBĀLA (τὰ Καστάβαλα). 1. [Now Dajakel or Chokel; according to Leake, Nigide], a city of Cappadocia, near Tyana, celebrated for its temple of Artemis (Diana) Perasia.—2. A town in Cilicia Campestris, near Issus.

CASTĀLIA (Καστάλια), a celebrated fountain on Mount Parnassus, in which the Pythia used to bathe; sacred to Apollo and the Muses, who were hence called Castalides; said to have derived its name from Castalia, daughter of Achelous, who threw herself into the fountain when pursued by Apollo.

[CASTELLUM often occurs as the designation of a place: 1. CASTELLUM CATTORUM (now Cassel), a place in the territory of the Catti in Germany.—2. CASTELLUM DRUSI ET GERMANICI (now Altkanigstein), a fortress built by Drusus and Germanicus in the territory of the Mattiaci.—3. CASTELLUM MENAPIORUM (now Kessel), a fortress of the Menapii in Gallia Belgica, on the Meuse.—4. CASTELLUM MORINORUM (now Moulin Cassel), a fortress of the Morini in Gallia Belgica.]

[CASTHANÆA (Κασθαναία), a city of Magnesia in Thessaly, at the foot of Mount Pelion (Hdt.); elsewhere it is written Castanea. From this place chestnuts, Castanea nucea, were said to have derived their name.]

[CASTIANIRA (Καστιανειρα), wife of Priam, and mother of Gorgythion, famed for her beauty.]

[CASTICUS, mentioned in Cæsar as having seized the government of the Sequani, at the instigation of Orgetorix, about B. C. 50.]

CASTOR, brother of Pollux. Vid. DIOSCURI.

CASTOR (Κάστωρ). 1. A Greek grammarian, surnamed Philorhæmus, probably lived about B. C. 150, and wrote several books; a portion of his τέχνη ρητορική is still extant, and printed in Walz's Rhetores Græci, vol. iii., p. 712, seq.—2. Grandson of Deiotarus. Vid. DEIOTARUS.

CASTRÀ, a "camp," the name of several towns, which were originally the stationary quarters of the Roman legions. 1. CONSTANTIA, in Gaul, near the mouth of the Sequana (now Seine)—2. HANNIBALIS, in Bruttium, on the southeastern coast, north of Selyciacium, arose out of the fortified camp which Hannibal maintained there during the latter years of the second Punic war.—3. HERCULIS, in Batavia, perhaps near Heussen.—4. MINERVÆ (now Castro), in Calabria, with a temple of Minerva, south of Hydruntum; the most ancient town of the Salentini, subsequently colonized by the Romans; its harbor was called Portus Veneris (now Porto Badisco).—5. VETERA (now Xanten), in Gallia Belgica, on the Rhine: many Roman remains have been found at Xanten.—6. CORNĒLIÆ (now Gellah), a place in the Carthaginian territory (Zeugitana) in northern Africa, where Scipio Africanus the elder established his camp when he invaded Africa in the second Punic war. It was between Utica and Carthage, on the northern side of the River Bagradas, but its site is now south of the river, in consequence of the alterations described under CARTHAGO.

CASTRUM. 1. INUI, a town of the Rutuli, on the coast of Latium, confounded by some writers with No. 2.—2. NOVUM (now Torre di Chiarucina), a town in Etruria, and a Roman colony on the coast.—NOVUM (now Giulia Nova), a town in Picenum, probably at the mouth of the small river Batinum (now Salinello), colonized by the Romans B. C. 264, at the commencement of the first Punic war.—[4. CASTRUM TIBERII, a landing-place on an island in the Lacus Brigantinus, used by Tiberius as a place of arms during his war with the Vindelici.]

CASTULO (Κασταλὺν: now Cazlona), a town of the Oretani, on the Bætis, and near the frontiers of Bætica, at the foot of a mountain which bore a great resemblance to Parnassus, was under the Romans an important place, a municipium with the Jus Latii, and included in the jurisdiction of Carthago Nova: its inhabitants were called Cæsari venales. In the mountains (Saltus Castulonensis) in the neighborhood were silver and lead mines. The wife of Hannibal was a native of Castulo.

CASUENTUS (now Basiento), a river in Lucania, flows into the sea near Metapontum.

[CASUS (Κάσος: now Caso), one of the Spo-

rades Insulæ, south of Carpathos, containing a city with the same name as the island.]

CASYSTES (Κασύστης: now Chismeh), a fine sea-port on the coast of Ionia; the harbor of ERYTHRÆ.

CATABATHMUS MAGNUS (Καταβαθμός, i. e., descent: now Marsa Sollern, i. e., Port of the Ladder), a mountain and sea-port, at the bottom of a deep bay on the northern coast of Africa (about 25° 5' east longitude), was generally considered the boundary between Egypt and Cyrenaica. Ptolemy distinguishes from this a place called Catabathmus Parvus, in the interior of Africa, near the borders of Egypt, above Paratonium.

CĀTĀDŪPA OR -I (τὰ Κατάδουπα, οἱ Κατάδουποι), a name given to the cataracts of the Nile, and also to the parts of Æthiopia in their neighborhood. Vid. NILUS.

CATALAUNI OR CATELAUNI, a people in Gaul in the modern Champagne, mentioned only by later writers: their capital was DUROCATELAUNI OR CATELAUNI (now Châlons sur Marne), in the neighborhood of which Attila was defeated by Aëtius and Theodorie, A. D. 451.

CATAMĪTUS, the Roman name for Ganymedes, of which it is only a corrupt form.

CATĀNA OR CATĪNA (Κατάνη: Katanaios: now Catania), an important town in Sicily, on the eastern coast, at the foot of Mount Ætna, founded B. C. 730 by Naxos, which was itself founded by the Chalcidians of Eubœa. In B. C. 476 it was taken by Hiero I, who removed its inhabitants to Leontini, and settled five thousand Syracusans and five thousand Peloponnesians in the town, the name of which he changed into Ætna. Soon after the death of Hiero (467), the former inhabitants of Catania again obtained possession of the town, and called it by its original name, Catania. Subsequently Catania was conquered by Dionysius, was then governed by native tyrants, next became subject to Agathocles, and finally, in the first Punic war, fell under the dominion of Rome. It was colonized by Augustus with some veterans. Catania frequently suffered from earthquakes and eruptions of Mount Ætna. It is now one of the most flourishing cities in Sicily.

CĀTĀŌNĪA (Καταονία), a district in the southeastern part of Cappadoëia, to which it was first added under the Romans, with Melitene, which lies east of it. These two districts form a large and fertile plain, lying between the Anti-Taurus and the Taurus and Amanus, and watered by the River Pyramus. Cataonia had no large towns, but several strong mountain fortresses.

CATABRHACTES (Καταβράκτης). 1. (Now Duden-Soo), a river of Pamphylia, which descends from the mountains of Taurus in a great broken waterfall (whence its name, from καταβρίγγωμι), and which, after flowing beneath the earth in two parts of its course, falls into the sea east of Attalia.—2. The term is also applied, first by Strabo, to the cataracts of the Nile, which are distinguished as C. Major and C. Minor (vid. NILUS), in which use it must, of course, be regarded as a common noun, equivalent to the Latin cataraëta, but whether derived from the name of the Pamphylia river, or at once from the Greek verb, can not be determined.

CATELAUNI. Vid. CATALAUNI.

CATHÆI (Kαθαίοι), a great and warlike people of India iutra Ganges, upon whom Alexander made war. Some of the best Orientalists suppose the name to be that, not of a tribe, but of the warrior caste of the Hindoos, the Kshatriyas.

CATILINA, L. SERGIUS, the descendant of an ancient patrician family which had sunk into poverty. His youth and early manhood were stained by every vice and crime. He first appears in history as a zealous partisan of Sulla; and during the horrors of the proscription, he killed, with his own hand, his brother-in-law, Q. Cæcilius, a quiet, inoffensive man, and put to death by torture M. Marius Gratidianus, the kinsman and fellow-townsmen of Cicero. He was suspected of an intrigue with the vestal Fabia, sister of Terentia, and was said and believed to have made away with his first wife, and afterward with his son, in order that he might marry Aurelia Orestilla, who objected to the presence of a grown-up step-child; but, notwithstanding this infamy, he attained to the dignity of prætor in B.C. 68, was governor of Africa during the following year, and returned to Rome in 66, in order to sue for the consulship. The election for 65 was carried by P. Autronius Pætus and P. Cornelius Sulla, both of whom were soon after convicted of bribery, and their places supplied by their competitors and accusers, L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Manlius Torquatus. Catiline had been disqualified for becoming a candidate, in consequence of an impeachment for oppression in his province, preferred by P. Clodius Pulcher, afterward so celebrated as the enemy of Cicero. Exasperated by their disappointment, Autronius and Catiline formed a project, along with Cn. Piso, to murder the new consuls when they entered upon their office upon the first of January. This design is said to have been frustrated solely by the impatience of Catiline, who, upon the appointed day, gave the signal prematurely, before the whole of the armed agents had assembled. Encouraged rather than disheartened by a failure which had so nearly proved a triumph, Catiline now determined to organize a more extensive conspiracy, in order to overthrow the existing government, and to obtain for himself and his followers all places of power and profit. Having been acquitted in 65 upon his trial for extortion, he was left unfettered to mature his plans. The time was propitious to his schemes. The younger nobility were thoroughly demoralized, with ruined fortunes, and eager for any change which might relieve them from their embarrassments; the Roman populace were restless and discontented, ready to follow at the bidding of any demagogue; while many of the veterans of Sulla, who had squandered their ill-gotten wealth, were now anxious for a renewal of those scenes of blood which they had found so profitable. Among such men Catiline soon obtained numerous supporters; and his great mental and physical powers, which even his enemies admitted, maintained his ascendancy over his adherents. The most distinguished men who joined him, and were present at a meeting of the conspirators which he called in June, 64, were P. Cornelius Lentulus Sura, who had been consul in B.C. 71, but, having been passed over by the censors, had lost his seat in the senate, which he was now seeking to recover by standing a second time for the prætorship; C. Corneilius Cethegus, distinguished throughout by his headstrong impetuosity and sanguinary violence; P. Autronius, spoken of above; L. Cassius Longinus, at this time a competitor for the consulship; L. Vargunteius, who had been one of the colleagues of Cicero in the quaestorship, and had subsequently been condemned for bribery; L. Calpurnius Bestia, tribune elect; Publius and Servius Sulla, nephews of the dictator; M. Porcius Læna, &c. The first object of Catiline was to obtain the consulship for himself and C. Antonius, whose co-operation he confidently anticipated. But in this object he was disappointed: Cicero and Antonius were elected consuls. This disappointment rendered him only more vigorous in the prosecution of his designs; more adherents were gained, and troops were levied in various parts of Italy, especially in the neighborhood of Fesulæ, under the superintendence of C. Manlius, one of the veteran centurions of Sulla. Meantime Cicero, the consul, was unrelaxing in his efforts to preserve the state from the threatened danger. Through the agency of Fulvia, the mistress of Curius, one of the conspirators, he became acquainted with every circumstance as soon as it occurred, and was enabled to counteract all the machinations of Catiline. Cicero, at the same time, gained over his colleague Antonius by promising him the province of Macedonia. At length Cicero openly accused Catiline, and the senate, now aware of the danger which threatened the state, passed the decree, "that the consuls should take care that the republic received no harm," in virtue of which the consuls were invested for the time being with absolute power, both civil and military. In the consular elections which followed soon afterward, Catiline was again rejected. On the night of the 6th of November, B.C. 63, he met the ringleaders of the conspiracy at the dwelling of M. Porcius Læna, and informed them that he had resolved to wait no longer, but at once to proceed to open action. Cicero, informed as usual of these proceedings, summoned the senate on the 8th of November, and there delivered the first of his celebrated orations against Catiline, in which he displayed a most intimate acquaintance with all the proceedings of the conspirators. Catiline, who was present, attempted to justify himself, but scarcely had he commenced when his words were drowned by the shouts of "enemy" and "parriicide" which burst from the whole assembly. Finding that he could at present effect nothing at Rome, he quitted the city in the night (8th-9th November), and proceeded to the camp of Manlius, after leaving the chief control of affairs at Rome in the hands of Lentulus and Cethegus. On the 9th, when the flight of Catiline was known, Cicero delivered his second speech, addressed to the people in the forum, in which he justified his recent conduct. The senate declared Catiline and Manlius public enemies, and soon afterward Cicero obtained legal evidence of the guilt of the conspirators within the city, through the ambassadors of the Allobroges. These men had been solicited by Lentulus to join the plot, and to induce their own countrymen to take part in the insurrection. They revealed what they had heard to Q. Fabius Sanga, the patron of their state, who in his turn acquainted Cicero. By the instructions of the latter, the ambassadors affected great zeal in the undertaking, and having obtained a written agreement, signed by Lentulus, Cethegus, and Statilius, they quitted Rome soon after midnight on the 3d of December, but were arrested on the Milvian bridge by Cicero's order. Cicero instantly summoned the leaders of the conspiracy to his presence, and conducted them to the senate, which was assembled in the temple of Concord (4th of December). He proved the guilt of the conspirators by the testimony of witnesses and their own signatures. They were thereupon assigned to the charge of certain senators. Cicero then summoned the people, and delivered what is called his third oration against Catiline, in which he informed them of all that had taken place. On the following day, the nones (5th) of December, the day so frequently referred to by Cicero in after times with pride, the senate was called together to deliberate respecting the punishment of the conspirators. After an animated debate, of which the leading arguments are expressed in the two celebrated orations assigned by Sallust to Cæsar and to Cato, a decree was passed that Lentulus and the conspirators should be put to death. The sentence was executed the same night in the prison. Cicero's speech in the debate in the senate is preserved in his fourth oration against Catiline. The consul Antonius was then sent against Catiline, and the decisive battle was fought early in 62. Antonius, however, unwilling to fight against his former associate, gave the command on the day of battle to his legate, M. Petreius. Catiline fell in the engagement, after fighting with the most daring valor. The history of Catiline's conspiracy has been written by Sallust.

[CATILLUS (Virg., Æn., vii., 670) and CATILUS (Hor., Od., i., 18, 2), son of Amphiarus, with his brothers Cōras and Tiburtus migrated to Italy, and there founded the city Tibur (now Tivoli), on the Anio.]

CATIUS. [1. Q. CATIUS, plebeian ædile B.C. 210 with L. Porcius Licinius; served under C. Claudius Nero against Hasdrubal, B.C. 207; and was subsequently sent to Delphi to present to the temple there some of the booty obtained in the victory over Hasdrubal.]—2. An Epicurean philosopher, a native of Gallia Transpadana (Insuber), composed a treatise in four books on the nature of things and on the chief good (de Rerum Natura et de summo Bono); died B.C. 45.

CATO, DIONYSIUS, the author of a small work, entitled Disticha de Moribus ad Filium, consisting of a series of sententious moral precepts. Nothing is known of the author or the time when he lived, but many writers place him under the Antonines. The best edition is by Arntzenius, Amsterdam, 1754.

CATO, PORCIUS. 1. M., frequently surnamed CENSORIUS or CENSOR, also CATO MAJOR, to distinguish him from his great-grandson Cato Uticensis (vid. No. 8). Cato was born at Tusculum, B.C. 234, and was brought up at his father's farm, situated in the Sabine territory. In 217 he served his first campaign, in his seventeenth year, and during the remaining years of the second Punic war he greatly distinguished himself by his courage and military abilities. In the intervals of war he returned to his Sabine farm, which he had inherited from his father, and there led the same frugal and simple life, which characterized him to his last days. Encouraged by L. Valerius Flaccus, a young nobleman in the neighborhood, he went to Rome, and became a candidate for office. He obtained the quaestorship in 204, and served under the proconsul Scipio Africanus in Sicily and Africa. From this time we may date the enmity which Cato always displayed toward Scipio; their habits and views of life were entirely different; and Cato, on his return to Rome, denounced in the strongest terms the luxury and extravagance of his commander. On his voyage home he is said to have touched at Sardinia, and to have brought the poet Ennius from the island to Italy. In 199 he was ædile, and in 198 prætor; he obtained Sardinia as his province, which he governed with justice and economy. He had now established a reputation for pure morality and strict virtue. In 195 he was consul with his old friend and patron L. Valerius Flaccus. He carried on war in Spain with the greatest success, and received the honor of a triumph on his return to Rome in 194. In 191 he served, under the consul M. Aelilius Glabrio, in the campaign against Antiochus in Greece, and the decisive victory at Thermopylæ was mainly owing to Cato. From this time Cato's military career, which had been a brilliant one, appears to have ceased. He now took an active part in civil affairs, and distinguished himself by his vehement opposition to the Roman nobles, who introduced into Rome Greek luxury and refinement. It was especially against the Scipios that his most violent attacks were directed, and whom he pursued with the bitterest animosity. He obtained the condemnation of L. Scipio, the conqueror of Antiochus, and compelled his brother P. Scipio to quit Rome in order to avoid the same fate. Vid. SCIPIO. In 184 he was elected censor with L. Valerius Flaccus, having been rejected in his application for the office in 189. His censorship was a great epoch in his life. He applied himself strenuously to the duties of his office, regardless of the enemies he was making; but all his efforts to stem the tide of luxury which was now setting in proved unavailing. His strong national prejudices appear to have diminished in force as he grew older and wiser. He applied himself in old age to the study of Greek literature, with which in youth he had no acquaintance, although he was not ignorant of the Greek language. But his conduct continued to be guided by prejudices against classes and nations, whose influence he deemed to be hostile to the simplicity of the old Roman character. He had an antipathy to physicians, because they were mostly Greeks, and therefore unfit to be trusted with Roman lives. When Athens sent Carneades, Diogenes, and Critolaus as ambassadors to Rome, he recommended the senate to send them from the city on account of the dangerous doctrines taught by Carneades. Vid.

CARNEADES. Cato retained his bodily and mental vigor in his old age. In the year before his death he was one of the chief instigators of the third Punic war. He had been one of the Roman deputies sent to Africa to arbitrate between Masinissa and the Carthaginians, and he was so struck with the flourishing condition of Carthage that on his return home he maintained that Rome would never be safe as long as Carthage was in existence. From this time forth, whenever he was called upon for his vote in the senate, though the subject of debate bore no relation to Carthage, his words were Delenda est Carthago. Very shortly before his death, he made a powerful speech in accusing Galba on account of his cruelty and perfidy in Spain. He died in 149, at the age of eighty-five. Cato wrote several works, of which only the De Re Rustica has come down to us, though even this work is not exactly in the form in which it proceeded from his pen: it is printed in the Scriptores Rei Rusticæ, edited by Gesner (Lips., 1773-4), and Schneider (Lips., 1794-7). His most important work was entitled Origines, but only fragments of it have been preserved. The first book contained the history of the Roman kings; the second and third treated of the origin of the Italian towns, and from these two books the whole work derived its title. The fourth book treated of the first Punic war, the fifth book of the second Punic war, and the sixth and seventh continued the narrative to the year of Cato's death.—2. M., son of No. 1, by his first wife Licinia, and thence called Licinianus, was distinguished as a jurist. In the war against Perseus, 168, he fought with great bravery under the consul Æmilius Paulus, whose daughter, Æmilia Tertia, he afterward married. He died when prætor designatus, about 152.—3. M., son of No. 1, by his second wife Salonia, and thence called Salonianus, was born 154, when his father had completed his eightieth year.—4. M., son of No. 2, consul 118, died in Africa in the same year.—5. C., also son of No. 2, consul 114, obtained Macedonia as his province, and fought unsuccessfully against the Seordisei. He was accused of extortion in Macedonia, and was sentenced to pay a fine. He afterward went to Tarraco in Spain, and became a citizen of that town.—6. M., son of No. 3, tribunus plebis, died when a candidate for the prætorship.—7. L., also son of No. 3, consul 89, was killed in battle against the Socii.—8. M., son of No. 6, by Livia, great-grandson of Cato the Censor, and surnamed UTICENSIS from Utica, the place of his death, was born B.C. 95. In early childhood he lost both his parents, and was brought up in the house of his mother's brother, M. Livius Drusus, along with his sister Porcia and the children of his mother by her second husband, M. Servilius Cæpio. In early years he discovered a stern and unyielding character; he applied himself with great zeal to the study of oratory and philosophy, and became a devoted adherent of the Stoic school; and among the profligate nobles of the age he soon became conspicuous for his rigid morality. He served his first campaign as a volunteer, 72, in the servile war of Spartacus, and afterward, about 67, as tribunus militum in Macedonia. In 65 he was questor when he corrected numerous abuses which had crept into the administration of the treasury. In 63 he was tribune of the plebs, and supported Cicero in proposing that the Catilinarian conspirators should suffer death. Vid. CATILINA. He now became one of the chief leaders of the aristocratic party, and opposed with the utmost vehemence the measures of Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus. In order to get rid of him, he was sent to Cyprus in 58 with the task of uniting that island to the Roman dominions. He returned in 56, and continued to oppose the triumvirs; but all his efforts were vain, and he was rejected when he became a candidate for the prætorship. On the breaking out of the civil war (49), he was intrusted, as proprætor, with the defence of Sicily; but, on the landing of Curio with an overwhelming force, he abandoned the island and joined Pompey in Greece. After Pompey's victory at Dyrræhium, Cato was left in charge of the camp, and thus was not present at the battle of Pharsalia (48). After this battle he set sail for Coreyra, and thence crossed over to Africa, where he joined Metellus Scipio, after a terrible march across the desert. The army wished to be led by Cato; but he yielded the command to the consular Scipio. In opposition to the advice of Cato, Scipio fought with Cæsar, and was utterly routed at Thapsus (April 6th, 46). All Africa now, with the exception of Utica, submitted to Cæsar. Cato wanted the Romans in Utica to stand a siege; but when he saw that they were inclined to submit, he resolved to die rather than fall alive into the hands of the conqueror. Accordingly, after spending the greater part of the night in perusing Plato's Phædo several times, he stabbed himself below the breast. In falling, he overturned an abacus: his friends, hearing the noise, ran up, found him bathed in blood, and, while he was fainting, dressed his wound. When, however, he recovered feeling, he tore open the bandages, let out his entrails, and expired at the age of 49. Cato soon became the subject of biography and panegyric. Shortly after his death appeared Cicero's Cato, which provoked Cæsar's Anticato. In Lucan the character of Cato is a personification of godlike virtue. In modern times the closing events of his life have been often dramatized; and few dramas have gained more celebrity than the Cato of Addison.—9. M., a son of No. 8, fell at the battle of Philippi, 42.

CATO, VALERIUS, a distinguished grammarian and poet, lost his property in his youth during the usurpation of Sulla. He is usually considered the author of an extant poem in one hundred and eighty-three hexameter verses, entitled Direx; edited by Putsch, Jena, 1828.

[CATREUS (Karpeús) or CRETEUS, son of Minos and Creta.]

CATTI or CHATTI, whose name is connected with the old German word cat or cad, "war," one of the most important nations of Germany, bounded by the Visurgis (now Weser) on the east, the Agri Decumates on the south, and the Rhine on the west, in the modern Hesse and the adjacent countries. They were a branch of the Hermiones, and are first mentioned by Cæsar under the erroneous name of Suevi. Although defeated by Drusus, Germanicus, and other Roman generals, they were never completely subjugated by the Romans; and their power was greatly augmented on the decline of the Chersici. Their capital was MATTIUM.

[CATUALDA, a noble youth of the Gotones, in the time of Tiberius, who drove Maroboduus from the throne of the Marcomanni, and was himself driven out in turn by the Hermunduri under the command of Vibilins.]

CATULLUS, VALERIUS, a Roman poet, born at Verona or in its immediate vicinity, B.C. 87. Catullus inherited considerable property from his father, who was the friend of Julius Cæsar; but he squandered a great part of it by indulging freely in the pleasures of the metropolis. In order to better his fortunes, he went to Bithynia in the train of the prætor Memmius, but it appears that the speculation was attended with little success. It was probably during this expedition that his brother died in the Troad—a loss which he deplors in the affecting elegy to Hortalus. On his return he continued to reside at Rome or at his country-seats on the promontory of Sirmio and at Tibur. He probably died about B.C. 47. The extant works of Catullus consist of one hundred and sixteen poems, on a variety of topics, and composed in different styles and metres. Some are lyrical, others elegies, and others epigrams; while the Nuptials of Peleus and Thetis, in four hundred and nine hexameter lines, is an heroic poem. Some of his poems are translations or imitations from the Greek, as, for instance, his De Coma Berenices, which was taken from Callimachus. In consequence of the intimate acquaintance which Catullus displays with Greek literature and mythology, he was called doctus by Tibullus, Ovid, and others. Catullus adorned all he touched, and his shorter poems are characterized by original invention and felicity of expression.—Editions: By Volpi, Patav., 1710; by Doering, Altona, 1834. 2d ed.; and by Lachmann, Berol., 1829.

CATULUS, LUTATIUS, 1. C., consul B.C. 242, defeated as proconsul in the following year the Carthaginian fleet off the Ægates Insulæ, and thus brought the first Punic war to a close, 241.—2. Q., consul 102 with C. Marius IV., and as proconsul next year gained along with Marius a decisive victory over the Cimbrî near Vercellæ (now Vercelli), in the north of Italy. Catulus claimed the entire honor of this victory, and asserted that Marius did not meet with the enemy till the day was decided; but at Rome the whole merit was given to Marius. Catulus belonged to the aristocratical party; he espoused the cause of Sulla; was included by Marius in the proscription of 87; and as escape was impossible, put an end to his life by the vapors of a charcoal fire. Catulus was well acquainted with Greek literature, and famed for the grace and purity with which he spoke and wrote his own language. He was the author of several orations, of an historical work on his own consulship and the Cimbric war, and of poems; but all these have perished with the exception of two epigrams.—3. Q., son of No. 2, a distinguished leader of the aristocracy, also won the respect and confidence of the people by his upright character and conduct. Being consul with M. Lepidus in 78, he resisted the efforts of his colleague to abrogate the acts of Sulla, and the following spring he defeated Lepidus in the battle of the Milvian bridge, and forced him to take refuge in Sardinia. He opposed the Gabinian and Manilian laws which conferred extraordinary powers upon Pompey (67 and 66). He was censor with Crassus in 65, and died in 60.

CATRIGES, a Ligurian people in Gallia Narbonensis, near the Cottian Alps; their chief towns were EBUDUNUM and CATRIGÆ or CATORIMAGUS (now Chorges.)

CATUS DECIANUS, procurator of Britain in the reign of Nero, was by his extortion one of the chief causes of the revolt of the people under Boadicea, A.D. 62. He fled to Gaul.

CAUCA (now Coca), a town of the Vaccæi in Hispania Tarraconensis; birth-place of the Emperor Theodosius I.

[CAUCALUS (Καυκάλος), of Chios, a rhetorician, brother of the historian Theopompus, wrote a eulogium on Hercules, which no longer exists.]

CAUCĀSĪLĒ PYLĒ. Vid. CAUCASUS.

CAUCĀSUS, CAUCASI MONTES (ὁ Καυκάσος, τὸ Καυκάσιον ὄρος, τὰ Καυκάσια ὄρη: now Caucasus). 1. A great chain of mountains in Asia, extending west-northwest and east-southeast from the eastern shore of the Pontus Euxinus (now Black Sea) to the western shore of the Caspian. Its length is about seven hundred miles; its greatest breadth one hundred and twenty, its least sixty or seventy. Its greatest height exceeds that of the Alps, its loftiest summit (now Mount Elbrooz, nearly in 43° north latitude and 43° east longitude) being sixteen thousand eight hundred feet above the sea, and to the east of this are several other summits above the line of perpetual snow, which in the Caucasus, is from ten to eleven thousand feet above the sea. The western part of the chain is much lower, no summit west of Mount Elbrooz rising above the snow line. At both extremities the chain sinks down to low hills. There are two chief passes over the chain, both of which were known to the ancients: the one, between its eastern extremity and the Caspian, near Derbent, was called Albaniz and sometimes CASPIÆ PYLÆ; the other, nearly in the centre of the range, was called Caucasiz Pylæ (now Pass of Dariel). In ancient times, as is still the case, the Caucasus was inhabited by a great variety of tribes, speaking different languages (Strabo says, at least seventy), but all belonging to that family of the human race which has peopled Europe and Western Asia, and which has obtained the name of Caucasian from the fact that in no other part of the world are such perfect examples of it found as among the mountaineers of the Caucasus. That the Greeks had some vague knowledge of the Caucasus in very early times, is proved by the myths respecting Prometheus and the Argonauts, from which it seems that the Caucasus was regarded as at the extremity of the earth, on the border of the River Oceanus. The account which Herodotus gives is good as far as it goes (I., 203); but it was not till the march of Pompey, in the Mithradatic War, extended to the banks of the Cyrus and Araxes, and to the foot of the great chain, that means were obtained for that accurate description of the Caucasus which Strabo gives in his eleventh book

The country about the east part of the Caucæus was called ALBANIA; the rest of the chain divided IBERIA and COLCHIS, on the south, from SARMATIA ASIATICA on the north.—2. When the soldiers of Alexander advanced to that great range of mountains which formed the northern boundary of Ariana, the Paropamisus, they supposed that they had reached the great Caucasian chain at the extremity of the world mentioned by the early poets, and they applied to it the name of Caucæus; afterward, for the sake of distinction, it was called Caucæus Indicus. Vid. PAROPAMISUS.

CAUCI. Vid. CHAUCI.

CAUCONES (Καυκωνες), the name of communities both in Greece and Asia, but whether of the same or different tribes cannot be determined with certainty. The Caucones in the northwest of Greece, in Elis and Achaia, were supposed by the ancient geographers to be an Arcadian people. The Caucones in the northwest of Asia Minor are mentioned by Homer as allies of the Trojans, and are placed in Bithynia and Paphlagonia by the geographers who regarded them as Pelasgians, as though some thought them Seythians.

CAUDŪM (Caudinus), a town in Samnium, on the road from Capua to Beneventum. In the neighborhood were the celebrated FURCULÆ CAUDINÆ, or Caudine Forks, narrow passes in the mountains, where the Roman army surrendered to the Samnites, and was sent under the yoke, B.C. 321: it is now called the valley of Arpaia.

CAULŌN or CAULŌNĪA (Cauloniata; now Castel Vetere), a town in Bruttium, northeast of Loeri, originally called Aulon or Aulonia; founded by the inhabitants of Croton or by the Achaean; destroyed by Dionysius the elder, who removed its inhabitants to Syraeusa, and gave its territory to Loeri; afterward rebuilt, but again destroyed in the war with Pyrrhus; rebuilt a third time, and destroyed a third time in the second Punic war. It was celebrated for its worship of the Delphian Apollo. Its name is preserved in the hill Caulone, in the neighborhood of Castel Vetere.

CAUNUS (ἡ Καῦνος; Καῦνιος; now Kaigues), one of the chief cities of Caria, on its southern coast, a little east of the mouth of the Calbis, in a very fertile but unhealthy situation. It had a citadel called Imbros, an inclosed harbor for ships of war, and safe roads for merchant vessels. It was founded by the Cretans. Its dried figs (Caunæa figs) were highly celebrated. The painter Protogenes was born here.

[CAURA (now Coria), a town of Hispania Baetica, between the Batis and Anas.]

CAURUS, the Argestes (Ἀργέστης) of the Greeks, the northwestern wind, is in Italy a stormy wind.

CAVĀRES or -I, a people in Gallia Narbonensis, east of the Rhone, between the Druentia and the Isara.

CAVARĪNUS, a Senonian, whom Cæsar made king of his people, was expelled by his subjects and compelled to fly to Cæsar, B.C. 54.

CAÿSTRUS (Καῦστρωσ, Ion. Καῦστρωσ; now Kara Su, i. e., the Black River, or Kuchuk-Meinder, i. e., Little Meander), a celebrated river of Lydia and Ionia, rising in the Cilbani Mountains (the eastern part of Tmolus), and flowing between the ranges of Tmolus and Messogis into the Ægean, a little northwest of Ephesus. To this day it abounds in swans, as it did in Homer's time. The valley of the Caystrus is called by Homer "the Asian meadow," and is probably the district to which the name of Asia was first applied. There was an inland town of the same name on its southern bank.

[CEA. Vid. CEOS.]

CEBENNA MONS or GEBENNA (τὸ Κέμμενον ὄρος; now Cevennes), mountains in the south of Gaul, two thousand stadia in length, extending north as far as Lugdunum, and separating the Arverni from the Helvi: Cæsar found them in the winter covered with snow six feet deep.

CEBES (Κέβης), of Thebes, a disciple and friend of Socrates, was present at the death of his teacher. He wrote three philosophical works, one of which, entitled Πίναξ or Picture [commonly cited by its Latin title, Cebetis Tabula, i. e., Picat], is extant. This work is an allegorical picture of human life, which is explained by an old man to a circle of youths. The drift of the book is to show that only the development of our mind and the possession of real virtue can make us happy. Few works have enjoyed a greater popularity. Of the numerous editions, the best are by Schweighauser, Argeut, 1806, and by Coraes in his edition of Epictetus, Paris, 1826.

[CEBREN (Κελρήν), a river of the Troad, said to have been so called from Cebren, father of Asterope. Vid. CEBRENE.]

CEBRENE (Κελρήνη; Κελρήνιος and Κελρηνιεύς), a city in the Troad, on mount Ida, which fell into decay when Antigonus transplanted its inhabitants to Alexandria Tros. A little river, which flowed past it, was called Cebren (Κελρήν) and the surrounding district Cebrenia (Κελρηνία).

[CEBRĪONES (Κελρήνιος), a son of Priam by a female slave; charioteer of Hector, and slain by Patroclus.]

CECROPIA. Vid. ATHENS, p. 122, a.

CECROPS (Κέκροψ), a hero of the Pelasgic race, said to have been the first king of Attica. He was married to Agraulos, daughter of Aetæus, by whom he had a son, Erysichthon, who succeeded him as king of Athens, and three daughters, Agraulos, Herse, and Pandrosos. In his reign Neptune (Poseidon) and Minerva (Athena) contended for the possession of Attica, but Cecrops decided in favor of the goddess. Vid. ATHENA. Cecrops is said to have founded Athens, the citadel of which was called Cecropia after him, to have divided Attica into twelve communities, and to have introduced the first elements of civilized life; he instituted marriage, abolished bloody sacrifices, and taught his subjects how to worship the gods. He is sometimes called διφνής or geminus, an epithet which some explain by his having instituted marriage, while others suppose it to have reference to the legends, in which the upper part of his body was represented as that of a man, and the lower part as that of a serpent. The later Greek writers describe Cecrops as a native of Sais in Egypt, who led a colony of Egyptians into Attica, and thus introduced from Egypt the arts of civilized life; but this account is rejected by some of the ancients themselves, and by the ablest modern critics.

CECRYPHALIA (Κεκρυφάλεια), a small island in the Saronic Gulf, between Ægina and Epidaurus.

CEDERÆ (Κεδραία or -εΐα, Κεδραΐτης or -αίος), a town of Cæna, on the Cæremic Gulf.

CEDERËUS, ΓΕΩΡΓΙÛΣ, a Byzantine writer, of whose life nothing is known, the author of an historical work, which begins with the creation of the world, and goes down to A.D. 1057. The last edition is by Bekker, Bonn, 1838-39.

[CELÆDON (Κελάδων), a tributary of the Alpheus in Elis.]

CELÆNE (Κελαναί, Κελανίτης), the greatest city of southern Phrygia, before the rise of its neighbor, Apamea Cibotus, reduced it to insignificance. It lay at the sources of the rivers Mæander and Marsyas. In the midst of it was a citadel built by Xerxes, on a precipitous rock, at the foot of which, in the Agora of the city, the Marsyas took its rise, and near the river's source was a grotto celebrated by tradition as the scene of the punishment of Marsyas by Apollo. Outside of the city was a royal palace, with pleasure gardens and a great park (παράδεισος) full of game, which was generally the residence of the satrap. The Mæander took its rise in the very palace, and flowed through the park and the city, below which it received the Marsyas.

CELÆNO (Κελανώ). 1. A Pleiad, daughter of Atlas and Pleione, beloved by Neptune (Poseidon).—2. One of the Harpies. Vid. HARPYLÆ.

CELËIA (now Cilly), an important town in the southeastern part of Noricum, and a Roman colony with the surname Claudia, was in the Middle Ages the capital of a Slavonic state called Zellia; hence the modern name of the town, which possesses Roman remains.

CĒLENDĒRIS (Κελένδερις; now Khelindreh), a sea-port town of Cilicia, said to have been founded by Sandarus the Syrian, and afterwards colonized by the Samians.

CELENA, a town of Campania, mentioned by Virgil (Æn., vii., 739), but nowhere else.]

CELER, together with Severus, the architect of Nero's immense palace, the golden house. He and Severus began digging a canal from the Lake Avernus to the mouth of the Tiber.

CELER, P. EGNATIUS. Vid. BAREA.

CELETRUM (now Kastoria), a town in Macedonia, on a peninsula of the Lacus Castoris, probably the same town afterward called DIOCLESIANOPOLIS.

CELEUS (Κελεύς), king of Eleusis, husband of Metanira, and father of Demophon and Triptolemus. He received Ceres (Demeter) with hospitality at Eleusis when she was wandering in search of her daughter. The goddess, in return, wished to make his son Demophon immortal, and placed him in the fire in order to destroy his mortal parts; but Metanira screamed aloud at the sight, and Demophon was destroyed by the flames. Ceres (Demeter) then bestowed great favors upon Triptolemus. Vid. TRIPTOLEMUS. Celeus is described as the first priest and his daughters as the first priestesses of Ceres (Demeter) at Eleusis.

CELSA (now Velilla, ruins near Xelsa), a town in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the Iberus, with a stone bridge over this river, and a Roman colony with the name Victrix Julia Celsa.

CELSUS. 1. One of the thirty tyrants, usurped the purple in Africa, and was slain on the seventh day of his reign, A.D., 265.—2. An Epicurean philosopher, lived in the time of the Antonines, and was a friend of Lucian. He is supposed to be the same as the Celsus who wrote the work against Christianity called Λόγος ἀληθής, which acquired so much notoriety from the answer written to it by Origen. Vid. ORIGENES.—3. A. CORNELIUS CELSUS, probably lived under the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. He wrote several works of which only one remains entire, his treatise De Medicæna, "On Medicine," in eight books. The first two books are principally occupied by the consideration of diet, and the general principles of therapeutics and pathology; the remaining books are devoted to the consideration of particular diseases and their treatment; the third and fourth to internal diseases; the fifth and sixth to external diseases and to pharmaceutical preparations; and the last two to those diseases which more particularly belong to surgery. The work has been much valued from the earliest times to the present day.—Editions: By Milligan, Edinb., 1826; by Ritter and Albers, Colon. ad Rhén., 1835.—4. JULIUS CELSUS, a scholar at Constantinople in the seventh century after Christ, made a recension of the text of Cæsar's Commentaries. Many modern writers have attributed to him the life of Cæsar, which was, in reality, written by Petrarck.—5. P. JUVENTIUS CELSUS, two Roman jurists, father and son, both of whom are cited in the Digest. Very little is known of the elder Celsus. The younger Celsus, who was the more celebrated, lived under Nerva and Trajan, by whom he was highly favored. He wrote Digesta in thirty-nine books, Epistolæ, Questiones, and Institutiones in seven books.—6. P. MARIUS CELSUS, an able general, first of Galba and afterward of Otho. After the defeat of Otho's army at the battle of Bedriacum, Celsus was pardoned by Vitellius, and was allowed by him to enter on the consulship in July (A.D. 69).

CELTÆ, a powerful race, which occupied a great part of Western Europe. The Greek and Roman writers call them by three names, which are probably only variations of one name, namely, CELTÆ (Κελταί, Κελτοί), GALATÆ (Γαλάται), and GALLI (Γάλλοι). Their name was originally given to all the people of Northern and Western Europe who were not Iberians, and it was not till the time of Cæsar that the Romans made any distinction between the Celts and the Germans: the name of Celts then began to be confined to the people between the Pyrenees and the Rhine. The Celts belonged to the great Indo-Germanic race, as their language proves. Like the other Indo-Germanic races they came from the East, and, at a period long antecedent to all historical records, settled in the west of Europe. The most powerful part of the nation appears to have taken up their abode in the centre of the country called after them GALLIA, between the Garumna in the south and the Sequana and Matrona in the north. From this country they spread over various parts of Europe, and they appear in early times as a migratory race, ready to abandon their homes, and settle in any district which their swords could win. Besides the Celts in Gallia, there were eight other different settlements of the nation, which may be distinguished by the following names: 1. Iberian Celts, who crossed the Pyrenees and settled in Spain. Vid. CELTIBERI.—2. British Celts, the most ancient inhabitants of Britain. Vid. BRITANNIA.—3. Belgic Celts, the earliest inhabitants of Gallia Belgica, at a later time much mingled with Germans.—4. Italian Celts, who crossed the Alps at different periods, and eventually occupied the greater part of the North of Italy, which was called after them GALLIA CISALPINA.—5. Celts in the Alps and on the Danube, namely, the Helvetii, Gothini, Osi, Vindelici, Ræti, Norici, and Carni.—6. Illyrian Celts, who, under the name of Scordisci, settled on Mount Scordus.—7. Macedonian and Thracian Celts, who had remained behind in Macedonia when the Celts invaded Greece, and who are rarely mentioned.—8. Asiatic Celts, the Tolistoboi, Troemi, and Tectosages, who founded the kingdom of GALATIA. Some ancient writers divided the Celts into two great races, one consisting of the Celts in the south and centre of Gaul, in Spain, and in the north of Italy, who were the proper Celts, and the other consisting of the Celtic tribes on the shores of the ocean and in the east as far as Scythia, who were called Gauls: to the latter race the Cimbri belonged, and they are considered by some to be identical with the Cimmerii of the Greeks. This two-fold division of the Celts appears to correspond to the two races into which the Celts are at present divided in Great Britain, namely, the Gael and the Kymry, who differ in language and customs, the Gael being the inhabitants of Ireland and the north of Scotland, and the Kymry of Wales. The Celts are described by the ancient writers as men of large stature, of fair complexion, and with flaxen or red hair. They were brave and warlike, impatient of control, and prone to change. They fought with long swords; their first charge in battle was the most formidable, but if firmly resisted they usually gave way. They were long the terror of the Romans: once they took Rome, and laid it in ashes (B.C. 390). For details respecting their later history and political organization, vid. GALLIA.

CELTIBERI (Κελτιβήρες), a powerful people in Spain, consisting of Celts, who crossed the Pyrenees at an early period, and became mingled with the Iberians, the original inhabitants of the country. They dwelt chiefly in the central part of Spain, in the highlands which separate the Iberus from the rivers which flow toward the west, and in which the Tagus and the Durius rise. They were divided into various tribes, the AREVACÆ, BERONES, and PELENDONES, which were the three most important, the LUSONES, BELLI, DITTANI, &c. Their chief towns were SEGOBRIGA, NUMANTIA, BILBILIS, &c. Their country, called CELTIBERIA, was mountainous and unproductive. They were a brave and warlike people, and proved formidable enemies to the Romans. They submitted to Scipio Africanus in the second Punic war, but the oppressions of the Roman governors led them to rebel, and for many years they successfully defied the power of Rome. They were reduced to submission on the capture of Numantia by Scipio Africanus the younger (B.C. 134), but they again took up arms under Sertorius, and it was not till his death (72) that they began to adopt the Roman customs and language.

CELTICI. 1. A Celtic people in Lusitania, between the Tagus and Anas.—2. A Celtic people in Gallæcia, near the promontory Nerium, which was called Celticum after them (now Cape Finisterre).

CENÆUM (Κηναίων ἄκρον: now Kanaia or Litar), the northwestern promontory of Eubœa, opposite Thermopylæ, with a temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Cenæus.

CENCHRÆÆ (Κεγχρῆαι). 1. (Now Kenkri), the eastern harbor of Corinth, on the Saronic Gulf, important for the trade and commerce with the East.—2. A town in Argolis, south of Argos, on the road to Tegea.

[CENCHRÏUS (Κέγχρως), a river of Ionia, flowing through the territory of Ephesus.]

CENOMANI, a powerful Gallic people, originally a branch of the AUERCI, crossed the Alps at an early period, and settled in the north of Italy in the country of Brixia, Verona, and Mantua and extended north as far as the confines of Rætia. They were at constant feud with the neighboring tribes of the Insubres, Boii, &c., and hence usually assisted the Romans in their war with these people.

CENSORINUS. 1. One of the thirty tyrants, assumed the purple at Bologna A.D. 270, but was shortly afterward put to death by his own soldiers.—2. Author of a treatise entitled de Die Natali, which treats of the generation of man, of his natal hour, of the influence of the stars and geni upon his career, and discusses the various methods employed for the division and calculation of time. The book is dedicated to Q. Cerellius, and was composed A.D. 238. A fragment of Metris and lost tracts of Accentibus and de Geometria are ascribed to this Censorinus.—Editions: By Havercamp, Lug. Bat., 1743; by Gruber, Noremb., 1805.

CENSORINUS, MARCIUS. 1. C., son of C. Marcus Rutilus, first plebeian dictator (B.C. 356), was originally called Rutilus, and was the first member of the family who had the surname Censorinus. He was consul in B.C. 310, and conducted the war in Samnium. He was censor 294, and a second time 265, the only instance in which a person held the office of censor twice.—2. L., consul 149, the first year of the third Punic war, conducted the war against Carthage with his colleague M. Manilius.—3. C., one of the leaders of the Marian party, fought against Sulla in the battle near the Colline gate, was taken prisoner, and put to death by Sulla's order. Censorinus was one of the orators of his time, and versed in Greek literature.—4. L., a partisan of M. Antony, prætor 43, and consul 39.—5. C., consul B.C. 8, died in Asia A.D. 2, while in attendance upon C. Caesar, the grandson of Augustus.

CENTAURI (Κένταυροι), that is, the Bull-killers, were an ancient race, inhabiting Mount Pelion in Thessaly. They led a wild and savage life, and are hence called φῆρες or θήρες in Homer. In later accounts they were represented as half horses and half men. Their origin is variously related. According to the most ancient account, Centaurs, the offspring of Ixion and a cloud, begot the Hippocentaurs by mixing with Magnesian mares. From most accounts it would appear that the Centaurs and Hippocentaurs were originally regarded as two distinct classes of beings, although the name of Centaurs is applied to both by ancient as well as modern writers. The Centaurs are particularly celebrated in ancient story for their fight with the Lapithæ, which arose at the marriage-feast of Pirithous. This fight is sometimes placed in connection with a combat of Hercules with the Centaurs. It ended by the Centaurs being expelled from their country, and taking refuge on Mount Pindus, on the frontiers of Epirus. Chiron is the most celebrated among the Centaurs. Vid. CIMON. We know that hunting the bull on horseback was a national custom in Thessaly, and that the Thessalians were celebrated riders. Hence may have arisen the fable that the Centaurs were half men and half horses, just as the Americans, when they first saw a Spaniard on horseback, believed horse and man to be one being. The Centaurs were frequently represented in ancient works of art, and generally as men from the head to the loins, while the remainder of the body is that of a horse with its four feet and tail.

[CENTIMĀNI (Ἑκατόγχειρες, "the hundred-handed," the three giants Cottus, Egæon or Briareus, and Gyges, sons of Cælus (Uranus) and Terra (Ge). They had a hundred hands and fifty heads, and were of extraordinary strength and terrible size. They helped Jupiter (Zeus) conquer the Titans, and had to guard the latter when cast, fettered, into Tartarus.]

CENTRITES (Κεντρίτης: now Bedlis), a small river of Armenia, which it divided from the land of the Carduchi, north of Assyria. It rises in the mountains south of the Arsissa Palus (now Lake Van), and flows into the Tigris.

[CENTRIONES (Κέντρωνας), an Alpine nation in Gallia Narbonensis, through whose country ran the public route from Italy to Lugdunum in Gallia.]

CENTUMĀLUS, FULVĪUS. 1. CN., legate of the dictator M. Valerius Corvus B.C. 301; consul 298, when he gained a victory over the Samnites; and prætor 295, when he defeated the Etruscans.—2. CN., consul 229, defeated the Illyrians subject to the queen Teuta.—3. CN., curule ædile 214; prætor 213, with Suessula as his province; and consul 211; in the next year he was defeated by Hannibal near Herdonia in Apulia, and was killed in the battle.—4. M., prætor urbanus 192, superintended the preparations for the war against Antiochus the Great.

CENTUM CELLE (now Civita Vecchia), a seaport town in Etruria, first became a place of importance under Trajan, who built a villa here and constructed an excellent harbor. It was destroyed by the Saracens in the ninth century, but was rebuilt on its ancient site, and was hence called Civita Vecchia.

Κεντούριε (τὰ Κεντούριπα, αἱ Κεντούριπαι:

Κεντούριπινος, in Thuc. οἱ Κεντούριπες, Centuripi uns: now Centorbi), an ancient town of the Siculi in Sicily, at the foot of Mount Ætna, on the road from Catania to Panormus, and not far from the River Symæthus; in its neighborhood a great quantity of corn was grown, and it became under the Romans one of the most flourishing cities in the island.

CEOS, also CEA or OIA (Κέως, Ion. Κέος: Κείος, Ion. Κῆτος, Cēus: now Zeas), an island in the Ægean Sea, one of the Cyclades, between the Attic promontory Suuim and the island Cythnus, celebrated for its fertile soil and its genial climate. It was inhabited by Ionians, and originally contained four towns, Iulis, Carthæa, Coressus, and Præessa; but the two latter perished by an earthquake. Simonides was a native of Iulis in Ceos, whence we read of the Cea munera nenia. (Hor., Carm., ii., 1, 38.)

CEPHĀLE (Κεφαλή), an Attic demus, on the right bank of the Erasinus, belonging to the tribe Acamantis.

CEPHALLĒNĪA (Κεφαλληνία, Κεφαληνία: Κεφαλήν, pl. Κεφαλήνες: now Cephalonia), called by Homer SAME (Σάμη) or SAMOS (Σάμος), the largest island in the Ionian Sea, separated from Ithaca on the east by a narrow channel, contains 348 square miles. It is said to have been originally inhabited by Typhians, and to have derived its name from the mythical CEPHALUS. Even in Homer its inhabitants are called Cephalenes, and are the subjects of Ulysses; but the name Cephalenia first occurs in Herodotus. The island is very mountainous (παικαλοέσση); and the highest mountain, called Ænos, on which stood a temple of Jupiter (Zeus), rises more than four thousand feet above the sea. Cephalenia was a tetrapolis, containing the four towns SAME, PALE, CRANI, and PRONI. It never attained political importance. In the Persian wars the inhabitants of Pale are alone mentioned. In the Peloponnesian war Cephalenia surrendered to the Athenians. Same ventured to oppose the Romans, but was taken by M. Fulvius B.C. 189. In modern times the island was for a long while in possession of the Venetians, but is now one of the seven Ionian islands under the protection of Great Britain.

CEPHALĒDĪUM (Κεφαλοίδιον: Cephalceditānus: now Cefali or Cephalu), a town on the northern coast of Sicily, in the territory of Himera.

CEPHĀLUS (Κέφαλος). 1. Son of Mercury (Hermes) and Herse, was carried off by Aurora (Eos), who became by him the mother of Titonus in Syria.—2. Son of Deion and Diomedæ, and husband of Procris or Proene, daughter of Erechtheus, whom he tenderly loved. He was beloved by Aurora (Eos), but as he rejected her advances from love to his wife, she advised him to try the fidelity of Procris. The goddess then metamorphosed him into a stranger, and sent him with rich presents to his house. Procris was tempted by the brilliant presents to yield to the stranger, who then discovered himself to be her husband, whereupon she fled in shame to Crete. Diana (Artemis) made her a present of a dog and a spear, which were never to miss their object, and then sent her back to Cephalus in the disguise of a youth. In order to obtain this dog and spear, Cephalus promised to love the youth, who then made herself known to him as his wife Procris. This led to a reconciliation between them. Procris, however, still feared the love of Aurora (Eos) and therefore jealously watched Cephalus when he went out hunting, but on one occasion he killed her by accident with the never-erring spear. A somewhat different version of the same story is given by Ovid. (Met., vii., 685, seq.) Subsequently Cephalus fought with Amphitryon against the Teleboans, upon the conquest of whom he was rewarded with the island which he called after his own name Cephalenia.—3. A Syracusan, and father of the orator Lysias, came to Athens at the invitation of Pericles. He is one of the speakers in Plato's Republic.—4. An eminent Athenian orator of the Collytean demus, flourished B.C. 402.

CEPHEUS (Κηφεύς). 1. King of Æthiopia, son of Belus, husband of Cassiopea, and father of Andromeda, was placed among the stars after his death.—2. Son of Alens and Neæra or Cleobule, one of the Argonauts. He was king of Tegea in Arcadia, and perished, with most of his sons, in an expedition against Hercules.

CEPHISSIA or CEPHISSIÄ (Κηφισία more correct than Κηφισσία: Κηφισεύς: now Κίφισία), one of the twelve Cæropeian towns of Attica, and afterward a demus belonging to the tribe Erechtheis, northeast of Athens, on the western slope of Mount Pentelieus.

CEPHISODÖRUS (Κηφισόδωρος). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, flourished B.C. 402. [A few fragments of his comedies are given by Meinecke, Fragm. Com. Græc., vol. i., p. 484-6.]—2. An Athenian orator, a disciple of Isocrates, wrote an apology for Isocrates against Aristotle, entitled αἰ πρὸς Ἀριστοτέλη ἀντιγραφαί.

CEPHISODÖTUS (Κηφισόδοτος). 1. An Athenian general and orator, is mentioned on various occasions from B.C. 371 to 355.—2. An Athenian sculptor, whose sister was the first wife of Phocion, flourished 372. He belonged to that younger school of Attic artists who had abandoned the stern and majestic beauty of Phidias, and adopted a more animated and graceful style.—3. An Athenian sculptor, usually called the Younger, a son of the great Praxiteles, flourished 300.

CEPHISÖPHON (Κηφισοφών), a friend of Euripides, is said not only to have been the chief actor in his dramas, but also to have aided him with his advice in the composition of them.

CEPHISUS or CEPHISSUS (Κηφισός, Κηφισσός). 1. (Now Μαυρονερο), the chief river in Phocis and Bœotia, rises near Lilea in Phocis, flows through a fertile valley in Phocis and Bœotia, and falls into the Lake Copais, which is hence called Cephisia in the Iliad (v., 709). Vid. COPAIS.—2. The largest river in Attica, rises in the western slope of Mount Pentelieus, and flows past Athens on the west into the Saronic Gulf near Phalerum.—[3. Another river of Attica, in the territory of Eleusis, called, for distinction's sake, C. Eleusinius].—4. There was also a river of this name in Argolis, Salamis, Sieyouia, and Seyros.

[CERÏ (Κήποι, i. e., the Gardens), a city of Asiatic Sarmatia, on the island formed by an arm of the River Anticites and the Mæotis (now the island Taman): it was a settlement of the Milesians, and probably called Κήποι from its pleasant situation.

CER (Κήρ), the personified necessity of death (Κήρ or Κήρες θανάτου). The Κήρες are described by Homer as formidable, dark and hateful, because they carry off men to the joyless house of Hades. According to Hesiod, they are the daughters of Nyx (Night) and sisters of the Mæræ, and punish men for their crimes.

CERÄMUS (ή Κέραμος: now Keramo), a Dorian seaport town on the northern side of the Cnidian Chersonesus, on the coast of Caria, from which the Ceramic Gulf (ή Κεραμεικός κόλπος: now Gulf of Kos, or Golfo di Stanco) took its name. Vid. CARIA.

CERÄSUS (Κερασσούς: Κερασσώντιος) [ruins near Skefië; the modern Kheresoun is the ancient Pharnacia, q. v.]: a flourishing colony of Sinope, on the coast of Pontus, at the mouth of a river of the same name; chiefly celebrated as the place from which Enrope obtained both the cherry and its name. Lucullus is said to have brought back plants of the cherry with him to Rome, but this refers probably only to some particular sorts, as the Romans seem to have had the tree much earlier. Cerasus fell into decay after the foundation of Pharnacia.

CERÄTA (τὰ Κέρατα), the Horns, a mountain on the frontiers of Attica and Megaris.

CERAUNÏ MONTES (Κεραυνία ὄρη: now Khim ara), a range of mountains extending from the frontier of Illyrium along the coast of Epirus, derived their name from the frequent thunderstorms which occurred among them (κεραυνός). These mountains made the coast of Epirus dangerous to ships. They were also called Acroceraunia, though this name was properly applied to the promontory separating the Adriatic and Ionian Seas. The inhabitants of these mountains were called Ceraunii.

CERBERUS (Κέρβερος), the dog that guarded the entrance of Hades, is mentioned as early as the Homeric poems, but simply as "the dog," and without the name of Cerberus. (Il., viii., 368; Od., xi., 623.) Hesiod calls him a son of Typhaon and Echidna, and represents him with fifty heads. Later writers describe him as a monster with only three heads, with the tail of a serpent, and with serpents round his neck. Some poets, again, call him many-headed or hundred-headed. The den of Cerberus is usually placed on the further side of the Styx, at the spot where Charon landed the shades of the departed.

CERCASÖRUM, or -US, or -ESÛRA (Κερκάσωρος πόλις, Herod.: Κερκίσουρα, Strab.: now El-Arkas), a city of Lower Egypt, on the western bank of the Nile, at the point where the river divided into its three principal branches, the eastern or Pelusiac, the western or Canopic, and the northern between them.

CERCÉTÆ or -Ï (Κερκείται, probably the Circassians), a people of Sarmatia Asiatica, beyond the Chimerian Bosphorus, on the eastern coast of the Palus Mæotis (now Sea of Azov).

CERCETÏUS, a mountain in Thessaly, part of the range of Pindus.

[CERCIDAS (Κερκιδάς), a poet, philosopher, and legislator for his native city, Megalopolis. He was a disciple of Diogenes, whose death he recorded in some Meliambic lines. He appears to be the same person as Cercidas the Areadian, who is mentioned by Demosthenes among those Greeks who, by their cowardice and corruption, enslaved their states to Philip.]

CERCINA and CERCINĪTIS (Κερκίνα, Κερκινίτις: now Karkenah Is., Ramlah and Gherba) two low islands off the northern coast of Africa, in the mouth of the Lesser Syrtis, united by a bridge, and possessing a fine harbor. Cercina was the larger, and had on it a town of the same name.

CERCINE (Κερκίνη: now Kara-dagh), a mountain in Macedonia, between the Axios and Strymon, forming the boundary between Sintice and Pæonia.

CERCINĪTIS (Κερκινίτις), a lake in Macedonia, near the mouth of the Strymon, through which this river flows.

CERCINIUM, a town in Thessaly, on the Lake Bœbeia.

CERCO, Q. LUTATIUS, consul with A. Manlius Torquatus B.C. 241, in which year the first Punic war was brought to a close by the victory of C. Lutatius Catulus at the Ægates. Cerco, in conjunction with his colleague, subdued the Falisci or people of Falerii, who revolted from the Romans.

CERCOPES (Κέρκωπες), droll and thievish gnomes, robbed Hercules in his sleep, and were taken prisoners by him, and either given to Omphale, or killed, or set free again. Some placed them at Thermopylæ (Herod., vii, 216); but the comic poem Cercopes, which bore the name of Homer, probably placed them at Æchalia in Eubœa. Others transferred them to Lydia, or the islands called Pithecusæ, which derived their name from the Cercopes who were changed into monkeys by Jupiter (Zeus) for having deceived him.

CERCOPS (Κέρκωψ). 1. One of the oldest Orphic poets, also called a Pythagorean, was the author of an epic poem "on the descent of Orpheus to Hades."—2. Of Miletus, the contemporary and rival of Hesiod, is said to have been the author of an epic poem called Ægimius, which is also ascribed to Hesiod.

CERCYON (Κερκίων), son of Neptune (Poseidon) or Vulcan (Hephestus), a cruel tyrant at Eleusis, put to death his daughter ALOPE, and killed all strangers whom he overcame in wrestling; he was, in the end, conquered and slain by Theseus.

CERDYLIUM (Κερδύλιον) a small town in Macedonia, on the right bank of the Strymon, opposite Amphipolis.

CEREALIS, PETILIUS. 1. Served under Vettius Bolanus, in Britain, A.D. 61; was one of the generals who supported the claim of Vespasian to the empire, 69; suppressed the revolt of Civilis on the Rhine, 70; and was governor of Britain, 71, when he conquered a great part of the Brigantes.—[2. C. ANICIUS, consul designatus A.D. 65, proposed in the senate, after the detection of Piso's conspiracy, that a temple should be built to Nero as quickly as possible at the public expense. Next year he fell under Nero's suspicions, was condemned, and put himself to death.]

CERETÆ, (now Cerretano), a town of the Hernici in Latium, between Sora and Anagnina.

CERES. Vid. DEMETER.

CERILLI (Cirella Vecchia), a town in Bruttium, on the coast, a little south of the mouth of the Laus.

CERINTHUS (Κήρινθος), a town on the eastern coast of Eubœa, on the River Budorus.

CERNE (Κέρνη: Κερναίος: now probably Arguin), an island off the western coast of Africa, to which the Phœnicians appear to have traded. Its position is uncertain, and Strabo even denied its existence.

CERON, a fountain in Histiaëotis in Thessaly said to have made all the sheep black which drank of it.

CERRETANI, an Iberian people in Hispania Tarraconensis, inhabited the modern Cerdagne in the Pyrenees, and were subsequently divided into the two tribes of the Juliani and Augustani; they were celebrated for their hams.

CERSOBLEPTES (Κερσοβλέπτης), son of Cotys, king of Thrace, on whose death, in B.C. 358, he inherited the kingdom in conjunction with Berisades and Amadocus, who were probably his brothers. As an ally of the Athenians, Cersobleptes became involved in war with Philip, by whom he was frequently defeated, and was at length reduced to the condition of a tributary, 343.

CERSUS (Κέρσος: now Merkes), a river of Cilicia, flowing through the Pylæ Syro-Ciliciæ, into the eastern side of the Gulf of Issus.

[CERTIMA, a fortified town of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis, captured by Tiberius Gracchus.]

CERTŌNIUM (Κερτόνιον), a town in Mysia, mentioned only by Xenophon (Anab., vii., 8, § 8).

CERVIDIUS SCÆVOLA. Vid. SCÆVOLA.

[CERYNITES, a river of Achaia, flowing from the mountain Cerynea in Arcadia.]

CERYX (Κήρυξ), an Attic hero, son of Mercury (Hermes) and Aeglauros, from whom the priestly family of the Ceryces at Athens derived their origin.

[CESTRINE (Κεστρίνη), a district of Epirus, said to have derived its name from Cestrinus, q. v.]

[CESTRINUS (Κεστρίνος), son of Hellenus and Andromache, succeeded his father in the sovereignty of Epirus.]

CETRUS (Κέστρος: now Ak-su), a considerable river of Pamphylia, flowing from the Taurus southward into the Mediterranean. It was navigable in its lower course at least as far as the city of Perge, which stood on its western bank, sixty stadia (ten geographical miles) above its mouth.

CETËI (Κήτειοι), a people of Mysia, the old inhabitants of the country about Pergamus, mentioned by Homer (Od., xi, 521). Their name is evidently connected with that of the River CETUS.

CETHEGUS, CORNELIUS, an ancient patrician family. They seem to have kept up an old fashion of wearing their arms bare, to which Lucan (ii, 543) alludes when he describes the associate of Catiline by the words exsertique manus vesana Cethegi. [Horace, however, by his cinctuâ Cethegi (Ars Poet., 50), refers to the earlier members of the family.] 1. M., curule ædile and pontifex maximus B.C. 213; prætor 211, when he had the charge of Apulia; censor 209, and consul 204. In the next year he commanded as proconsul in Cisalpine Gaul, where ne defeated Mago, brother of Hannibal. He died 196. His eloquence was rated very high, so that Ennius gave him the name of Suave m-dulla, and Horace twice refers to him as an ancient authority for the usage of Latin words (Epist., ii, 2, 116; Ars. Poët., 50).—2. C., commanded in Spain as proconsul 200; was ædile 199; consul 197, when he defeated the Insu-brians and Cenomanians in Cisalpine Gaul; and censor 194.—3. P., eurlæ ædile 187, prætor 185, and consul 181. The grave of Numa was discovered in his consulship.—4. M., consul 160, when he drained a part of the Pontine Marshes.—5. P., a friend of Marius, proscribed by Sulla 88, but in 83 went over to Sulla and was pardoned.—6. C., one of Catiline's crew, was a profligate from his early youth. When Catiline left Rome, 63, after Cicero's first speech, Cethegus stayed behind under the orders of Lentulus. His charge was to murder the leading senators; but the tardiness of Lentulus prevented any thing being done. Cethegus was arrested and condemned to death with the other conspirators.

CËTÏUS (Κήτειος), a small river of Mysia, flowing from the north through the district of Elaitis, and falling into the Cæicus close to Pergamus.

[CETO (Κητώ), daughter of Pontus and Gæa (Terra), wife of Phoreys; mother of the Grææ and of the Gorgons.]

CEUTRÔNES or CENTRÔNES, a people in Gallia Belgica, dependents of the Nervii.

CËYX (Κήϋξ), king of Trachys, husband of Alcyone. His death is differently related. Vid. ALCYONE. He was the father of Hippasus, who fell fighting as the ally of Hercules.

[CHËA (Χία: now Chaiappa), a city of Triphylia in Elis, in the plain of Æpasium: it was probably the Φειά of Homer (Il., vii, 135). Vid. PHEIA.]

CHABÔRAS. Vid. ABORRHAS.

CHABRIAS (Χαβρίας), a celebrated Athenian general. In B.C. 392 he succeeded Iphicrates in the command of the Athenian forces at Corinth. In 388 he assisted Evagoras in Cyprus against the Persians. In 378 he was one of the commanders of the forces sent to the aid of Thebes against Agesilaus, when he adopted for the first time that manœuvre for which he became so celebrated, ordering his men to await the attack with their spears pointed against the enemy and their shields resting on one knee. A statue was afterward erected at Athens to Chabrias in this posture. In 376 he gained an important victory off Naxos over the Lacedæmonian fleet under the command of Pollis. In 361 he took the command of the naval force of Tachos, king of Egypt, who was in rebellion against Persia. In 358 he was sent as the Athenian commander in Thrace, but was compelled by Charidemus to make a peace unfavorable to Athens. On the breaking out of the Social war in 357, Chabrias commanded the Athenian fleet. At the siege of Chios he sailed into the harbor before the rest of the fleet, and, when his ship was disabled, he refused to save his life by abandoning it, and fell fighting.

CHERËA, C. CASSIUS, tribune of the prætorian cohorts, formed the conspiracy by which the Emperor Caligula was slain, A.D. 41. Charea was put to death by Claudius upon his accession.

[CHËRECRATES (Χαιρεκράτης), a disciple of Socrates, who is well spoken of by Xenophon in an enumeration of those whose lives testified to the excellence of the instruction of Socrates (Mem., i, 2, § 48).]

CHËRËMON (Χαιρήμων). 1. One of the most celebrated of the later tragic poets at Athens, flourished B.C. 380. He is erroneously called a comic poet by some writers. There are three epigrams ascribed to Chæremón in the Greek Anthology. [The fragments of his plays have been collected and published by Bartsch, Mogunt., 1843, 4to.]—2. Of Alexandria, a Stoic philosopher, chief librarian of the Alexandrian library, was afterward called to Rome, and became the preceptor of Nero, in conjunction with Alexander of Ægæ. He wrote a history of Egypt, on Hieroglyphics, on Comets, and a grammatical work. Martial (xi, 56) wrote an epigram upon him. [The fragments of Chæremón are given by Müller, Fragm. Hist. Græc., vol. iii, p. 495-99.]

CHËRËPHON (Χαιρέφών), a well-known disciple of Socrates, was banished by the thirty tyrants, and returned to Athens on the restoration of democracy, B.C. 403. He was dead when the trial of Socrates took place, 399.

[CHËRËIPPUS (Χαιρίππος), a Greek, a friend of Cicero and his brother Quintus, whom he accompanied to his province of Asia.]

CHËRONËA (Χαιρώνεια: Χαιρωνεύς: now Capurna), the Homeric ARNE according to Pausanias, a town in Bœotia on the Cephissus, near the frontier of Phœcis, memorable for the defeat of the Athenians by the Bœotians, B.C. 447, still more for Philip's victory over the Greeks, 338, and for Sulla's victory over the army of Mithradates, 86. Chæronea was the birth-place of Plutarch. Several remains of the ancient city are to be seen at Capurna, more particularly a theatre excavated in the rock, an aqueduct, and the marble lion (broken in pieces), which adorned the sepulchre of the Bœotians who fell at the battle of Chæronea.

CHALËUM (Χάλαιον: Χαλαίος), a port-town of the Locri Ozolæ on the Crissæan Gulf, on the frontiers of Phœcis.

CHALASTRA (Χαλάστρα, in Herod. Χαλέστρη: Χαλαστραίος: now Oulacia), a town in Mygdonia in Macedonia, at the mouth of the River Axios.

CHALCE, or -Æ, or -IA (Χάλκη, Χάλκαι, Χαλκία Χαλκαίος or -ίτης: now Charki), an island of the Carpathian Sea, near Rhodes, with a town of the same name, and a temple of Apollo.

CHALCEDON (Χαλκηδών, more correctly Καλχηδών: Χαλκηδόσιος: ruins, now Chalkedon, Greek; Kadi-Kioi, Turk.), a Greek city of Bithynia, on the coast of the Propontis at the entrance of the Bosphorus, nearly opposite to Byzantium, was founded by a colony from Megara in B.C. 685. After a long period of independence (only interrupted by its capture by the Persians and its recovery by the Athenians), it became subject to the kings of Bithynia, and suffered by the transference of most of its inhabitants to the city of Nicomedia (B.C. 140). The Romans restored its fortifications, and made it the chief city of the province of Bithynia, or Pontica Prima. Afte: various fortunes under the empire, it was entirely destroyed by the Turks. The fourth œcumenical council of the Church met here, A.D. 451.

CHALCIDICE (Χαλκιδίκη). 1. A peninsula, in Macedonia, between the Thracian and Strymonic gulfs, runs out into the sea like a three-pronged fork, terminating in three smaller peninsulas, PALLENE, SITHONIA, and ACTE or ATHOS. It derived its name from Chalcidian colonists. Vid. CHALCIS, No. 1.—[2. A district of Syria. Vid. CHALCIS, No. 3.]

CHALCIDIUS, a Platonic philosopher, who lived probably in the sixth century of the Christian era, translated into Latin the Timæus of Plato, on which he likewise wrote a voluminous commentary; edited by Meursius, Leyden, 1617, and by Fabricius, Hamburg, 1718, at the end of the second volume of the works of Hippolytus.

CHALCIGÆUS (Χαλκίγειος), "the goddess of the brazen house," a surname of Minerva (Athena) at Sparta, from the brazen temple which she had in that city.

CHALCIS (Χαλκίς: Χαλκιδεύς, Chalcidensis). 1. (Now Egripo or Negroponte), the principal town of Eubœa, situated on the narrowest part of the Euripus, and united with the main land by a bridge. It was a very ancient town, originally inhabited by Abantes or Curetes, and colonized by Attic Ionians under Cothus. Its flourishing condition at an early period is attested by the numerous colonies which it planted in various parts of the Mediterranean. It founded so many cities in the peninsula in Macedonia between the Strymonic and Thracian Gulfs, that the whole peninsula was called Chalcidice. In Italy it founded Cumæ, and in Sicily Naxos. Chalcis was usually subject to Athens during the greatness of the latter city, and afterward passed into the hands of the Macedonians, Antiochus, Mithradates, and the Romans. It was a place of great military importance, as it commanded the navigation between the north and south of Greece, and hence it was often taken and retaken by the different parties contending for the supremacy in Greece. The orator Isæus and the poet Lycophron were born at Chalcis, and Aristotle died here.—2. (Now Galata), a town in Ætolia, at the mouth of the Evenus, situated at the foot of the mountain Chalcis, and hence also called Hypo-chalcis.—3. (Now Kinnesrin, ruins), a city of Syria, in a fruitful plain, near the termination of the River Chalus; the chief city of the district of Chalcidice, which lay to the east of the Orontes.—4. A city of Syria, on the Belus, in the plain of Marsyas.

CHALCOCONDYLES, or, by contraction, CHALCONDYLES, LAONICUS or NICOLAUS, a Byzantine historian, flourished A.D. 1446, and wrote a history of the Turks and of the later period of the Byzantine empire, from the year 1298 down to the conquest of Corinth and the invasion of the Peloponnesus by the Turks in 1463, thus including the capture of Constantinople in 1453; edited by Fabrot, Paris, 1650. [It is also included in the new edition of the Byzantine historians, and edited by Imm. Bekker, Bonn, 1843.]

[CHALCĒDON (Χαλκῆδων), king of the Abantes in Eubœa, father of Elpenor, and one of the authors of Heleñ.]

[CHALCON (Χάλκων), a Myrmidon father of Bathycles.]

CHALDÆA (Χαλδαία: Χαλδαίος), in the narrower sense, was a province of Babylouia, about the lower course of the Euphrates, the border of the Arabian Desert, and the head of the Persian Gulf. It was intersected by numerous canals, and was extremely fertile. In a wider sense, the term is applied to the whole of Babylonia, and even to the Babylonian empire, on account of the supremacy which the Chaldæans acquired at Babylon. Vid. BABYLON. Xenophon mentions Chaldæans in the mountains north of Mesopotamia; and we have other statements respecting this people, from which it is very difficult to deduce a clear view of their early history. The most probable opinion is, that their original seat was in the mountains of Armenia and Kurdistan, whence they descended into the plains of Mesopotamia and Babylonia. Respecting the Chaldæans as the ruling class in the Babylonian monarchy, vid. BABYLON.

[CHALONĪTIS (Χαλωνίτις), a district in the southeast of Assyria, around Mount Zagros, with a city called Chala.]

CHALUS (Χάλος: now Koveik), a river of Northern Syria, flowing south past Berœa and Chalcis, and terminating in a marshy lake.

CHĀLYBES (Χάλυβες), a remarkable Asiatic people, about whom we find various statements in the ancient writers. They are generally represented, both in the early poetic legends and in the historical period, as dwelling on the southern shore of the Black Sea, about Themiserya and the Thermodon (and probably to a wider extent, for Herodotus clearly mentions them among the nations west of the Halys), and occupying themselves in the working of iron. Xenophon mentions Chalybes in the mountains on the borders of Armenia and Mesopotamia, who seem to be the same people that he elsewhere calls Chaldæans; and several of the ancient geographers regarded the Chalybes and Chaldæi as originally the same people.

CHĀLYBON (Χαλυβών: Old Testament Helbon), a considerable city of Northern Syria, probably the same as BERœA. The district about it was called Chalybonitis.

CHAMĒLĒON (Χαμαιλέων), a Peripatetic philosopher of Heraclea on the Pontus, one of the immediate disciples of Aristotle, wrote works on several of the ancient Greek poets, and likewise on philosophical subjects.

CHAMĀVI, a people in Germany, who were compelled by the Roman conquests to change their abodes several times. They first appear in the neighborhood of the Rhine, but afterward migrated east, defeated the Brueteri, and settled between the Weser and the Harz. At a later time they dwelt on the Lower Rhine, and are mentioned as auxiliaries of the Franks.

CHĀONES (Χάονες), a Pelasgian people, one of the three communities which inhabited EPIRUS, were at an early period in possession of the whole of the country, but subsequently dwelt along the coast from the River Thyamis to the Acrocœraunian promontory, which district was therefore called CHAONIA. By the poets Chœonius is used as equivalent to Epirot.

CHAOS (Χάος), the vacant and infinite space which existed, according to the ancient cosmogonies, previous to the creation of the world, and out of which the gods, men, and all things arose. Chaos was called the mother of Erebus and Nyx.

CHARADRA (Χαράδρα : Χαράδραιος). 1. A town in Phocis, on the River Charadrus, situated on an eminence not far from Lilæa.—2. A town in Epirus, northwest of Ambracia.—3. A town in Messenia, built by Pelops.

CHARADRUS (Χαράδρος). 1. A small river in Phocis, a tributary of the Cephissus.—2. A small river in Argolis, a tributary of the Inachus.—3. A small river in Messenia, rises near (Echalia).—[4. A small stream of Achaia, near Argyre, now Velvitsi.]

CHARAX (Χάραξ), of Pergamus, an historian, wrote a work in forty books, called Ἑλληνικά, and another named Χρονικά. [The fragments of his works have been collected by Müller, Fragm. Hist. Græc., vol. iii., p. 636-45.]

CHĀRAX (Χάραξ, i. e., a palisaded camp : Χαρακρός), the name of several cities, which took their origin from military stations. The most remarkable of them stood at the mouth of the Tigris. Vid. ALEXANDREA, No. 4. There were others, which only need a bare mention, in the Chersonesus Tanica, in Northern Media, near Celæna in Phrygia, in Corsica, and on the Great Syrtis in Africa, and a few more.

CHARAXUS (Χάραξος) of Mytilene, son of Seamandronimus and brother of Sappho, fell in love with Rhodopis.

CHARES (Χάρης). 1. An Athenian general, who for a long series of years contrived by profuse corruption to maintain his influence with the people, in spite of his very disreputable character. In B.C. 367 he was sent to the aid of the Phliasians, who were hard pressed by the Arcadians and Argives, and he succeeded in relieving them. In the Social war, after the death of Chabrias, 356, he had the command of the Athenian fleet along with Iphicrates and Timotheus. His colleagues having refused, in consequence of a storm, to risk an engagement, Chares accused them to the people, and they were recalled. Being now left in the sole command, and being in want of money, he entered into the service of Artabazus, the revolted satrap of Western Asia, but was recalled by the Athenians on the complaint of Artaxerxes III. In the Olynthian war, 349, he commanded the mercenaries sent from Athens to the aid of Olynthus. In 340 he commanded the force sent to aid Byzantium against Philip; but he effected nothing, and was accordingly superseded by Phocion. In 338 he was one of the Athenian commanders at the battle of Chæronea. When Alexander invaded Asia in 334, Chares was living at Sigeum; and in 333 he commanded for Darius at Mytilene.—2. Of Mytilene, an officer at the court of Alexander the Great, wrote a history of Alexander in ten books. [His fragments are given by Geier in his Scriptores Hist. Alexandri, Lips., 1844, p. 293-308.]—3. Of Lindus in Rhodes, a statuarius in bronze, the favorite pupil of Lysippus, flourished B.C. 290. His chief work was the statue of the Sun, which, under the name of "The Colossus of Rhodes," was celebrated as one of the seven wonders of the world. Its height was upward of one hundred and five English feet; it was twelve years in erecting, B.C. 292-280, and cost three hundred talents. It stood at the entrance of the harbor of Rhodes, but there is no authority for the statement that its legs extended over the mouth of the harbor. It was overthrown and broken to pieces by an earthquake fifty-six years after its erection, B. C. 224. The fragments remained on the ground eight hundred and ninety-six years, till they were sold by the general of the Calif Othman IV. to a Jew of Emesa, who carried them away on nine hundred camels, A.D. 672.

CHARICLES (Χαρικλής). 1. An Athenian demagogue, son of Apollodorus, was one of the commissioners appointed to investigate the affair of the mutilation of the Hermæ, B.C. 415; was one of the commanders of the Athenian fleet, 413; and one of the thirty tyrants on the capture of Athens by Lysander, 404.—2. An eminent physician at Rome, attended the Emperor Tiberius.

CHARICLO (Χαρικλώ). 1. A nymph, daughter of Apollo, wife of the Centaur Chiron, and mother of Carystus and Ocyroë.—2. A nymph, wife of Eueres and mother of Tiresias.

CHARIDÆMUS (Χαρίδημος). 1. Of Oreus in Eubœa, of mean origin, became the captain of a band of mercenaries, and served in this capacity under the Athenian generals Iphicrates and Timotheus. He next entered the service of the satrap Artabazus, who had revolted against Artaxerxes III., and subsequently of Cotys, king of Thrace, whose daughter he married. On the murder of Cotys, 358, Charidemus adhered to the cause of his son Cersobleptes, and on behalf of the latter carried on the struggle with the Athenians for the possession of the Chersonesus. In 349 he was appointed by the Athenians commander in the Olynthian war, but next year was superseded and replaced by Chares.—2. An Athenian, one of the orators whose surrender was required by Alexander in B.C. 335, after the destruction of Thebes, fled to Asia, and took refuge with Darius, by whose orders he was put to death, 333, shortly before the battle of Issus.

CHARILĀUS or CHARILLUS (Χαρίλαος, Χάριλλος), king of Sparta, son of Polydectes, is said to have received his name from the general joy excited by the justice of his uncle Lysurgus when he placed him, yet a new-born infant, on the royal seat, and bade the Spartans acknowledge him for their king. He carried on war against Argos and Tegea; he was taken prisoner by the Tegeans, but was dismissed without ransom on giving a promise (which he did not keep) that the Spartans should abstain in future from attacking Tegea.

CHARIS (Χάρις), the personification of Grace and Beauty. In the Iliad (xviii., 382) Charis is described as the wife of Vulcan (Hephaestus), but in the Odyssey Venus (Aphrodite) appears as the wife of Vulcan (Hephaestus), from which we may infer, if not the identity of Aphrodite and Charis, at least a close connection in the notions entertained about the two divinities. The idea of personified grace and beauty was at an early period divided into a plurality of beings, and even in the Homeric poems the plural Charites occurs several times. The Charites, called Gratiæ by the Romans, are usually described as the daughters of Jupiter (Zeus), and as three in number, namely, Euphrosyne, Aglaia, and Thalia. The names of the Charites sufficiently express their character. They were the goddesses who enhanced the enjoyments of life by refinement and gentleness. They are most-ly described as in the service of other divinities, and they lend their grace and beauty to every thing that delights and elevates gods and men. The gentleness and gracefulness which they impart to man's ordinary pleasures are expressed by their moderating the exciting influence of wine (Hor., Carm., iii., 19, 15), and by their accompanying Venus (Aphrodite) and Cupid (Eros). Poetry, however, is the art which is especially favored by them, and hence they are the friends of the Muses, with whom they live together in Olympus. In early times the Charites were represented dressed, but afterward their figures were always naked: specimens of both representations of the Charites are still extant. They appear unsuspecting maidens in the full bloom of life, and they usually embrace each other.

CHARISIUS. 1. AURELIUS ARCADIVS, a Roman jurist, lived in the reign of Constantine the Great, and wrote three works, De Testibus, De Muneribus civilibus, and De Officio Praefecti praetorio, all of which are cited in the Digest.—2. FLAVIUS SOSPATER, a Latin grammarian, who flourished A.D. 400, author of a treatise in five books, drawn up for the use of his son, entitled Institutiones Grammaticae, which has come down to us in a very imperfect state. Edited by Putschius in Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui, Hanov., 1605, and by Lindemanu, in Corpus Grammat. Latin. Veterum, Lips., 1840.

CHARITES. Vid. CHARIS.

CHARITON (Χαρίτων), of Aphrodisias, a town of Caria, the author of a Greek romance, in eight books, on the Loves of Chæreas and Callirrhoe. The name is probably feigned (from χάρις and Ἀφροδίτη), as the time and position of the author certainly are. He represents himself as the secretary of the orator Athenagoras, evidently referring to the Syracusan orator mentioned by Thucydides (vi., 35, 36) as the political opponent of Hæroclætes. Nothing is known respecting the real life or the time of the author; but he probably did not live earlier than the fifth century after Christ. Edited by D'Orville, 3 vols., Amst., 1750, with a valuable commentary; reprinted with additional notes by Beck, Lips., 1783.

CHARMANDE (Χαρμάνδη: near Haditha or Hit), a great city of Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates.

CHARMIDES (Χαρμίδης). 1. An Athenian, son of Glaucon, cousin to Critias, and uncle by the mother's side to Plato, who introduces him in the dialogue which bears his name as a very young man at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. In B.C. 404 he was one of the Ten, and was slain fighting against Thrasybulus at the Piræus.—2. Called also CHARMADAS by Cicero, a friend of Philo of Larissa, in conjunction with whom he is said by some to have been the founder of a fourth academy. He flourished B.C. 100.

[CHARMINUS (Χαρμίνος), a naval commander of the Athenians, who was defeated by the Spartan admiral Astyocleus near Syme, B.C. 411, with a loss of six ships.—2. A Lacedæmonian, was sent by Thibron, the Spartan harmost in Asia, to the Greeks who had served under Cyrus, then at Selymbria and in the service of Seuthes, to induce them to enter the Lacedæmonian service against Persia, B.C. 339.]

CHARON (Χάρων). 1. Son of Erebus, conveyed in his boat the shades of the dead across the rivers of the lower world. For this service he was paid with an obolus or danæe, which coin was placed in the mouth of every corpse previous to its burial. He is represented as an aged man with a dirty beard and a mean dress.—2. A distinguished Theban, concealed Pelopidas and his fellow-conspirators in his house when they returned to Thebes with the view of delivering it from the Spartans, B.C. 379.—3. An historian of Lampsacus, flourished B.C. 464, and wrote works on Æthiopia, Persia, Greece, &c., the fragments of which are collected by Müller, Fragm. Histor. Græc., vol. i., p. 32–35, Paris, 1841.

CHARONDAS (Χαρώνδας), a law-giver of Catania, who legislated for his own and the other cities of Chalcidian origin in Sicily and Italy. His date is uncertain. He is said by some to have been a disciple of Pythagoras; and he must have lived before the time of Anaxilans, tyrant of Rhegium, B.C. 494–476, for the Rhegians used the laws of Charondas till they were abolished by Anaxilans. The latter fact sufficiently refutes the common account that Charondas drew up a code of laws for Thurii, since this city was not founded till 443. A tradition relates that Charondas one day forgot to lay aside his sword before he appeared in the assembly, thereby violating one of his own laws, and that, on being reminded of this by a citizen, he exclaimed, "By Zeus, I will establish it," and immediately stabbed himself. The laws of Charondas were probably in verse.

CHAROPS (Χάρωψ). 1. A chief among the Epirots, sided with the Romans in their war with Philip V., B.C. 198.—2. A grandson of the above. He received his education at Rome, and after his return to his own country adhered to the Roman cause; but he is represented by Polybius as a monster of cruelty. He died at Brundisium, 157.—[3. Son of the Trojan Hippasus, slain by Ulysses.—4. Son of an Æschylus, who was the first decennial archon in Athens, B.C. 752.]

CHARYBDIS. Vid. SCYLLA.

CHASŪARI, or CHASŪARĪ, or CHATTŪARĪ, a people of Germany, allies or dependents of the Cherusci. Their position is uncertain. They dwelt north of the Chatti; and in later times they appear between the Rhine and the Maas as a part of the Franks.

CHATTI. Vid. CATTI.

CHAUCI or CAUCI, a powerful people in the northeast of Germany, between the Amisia (now Emis) and the Albis (now Elbe), divided by the Visurgis (now Weser), which flowed through their territory, into Majores and Minores, the former west and the latter east of that river. They are described by Tacitus as the noblest and the justest of the German tribes. They formed an alliance with the Romans A.D. 5, and assisted the latter in their wars against the Cherusci; but this alliance did not last long. They were at war with the Romans in the reigns of Claudius and Nero, but were never subdued. They are mentioned for the last time in the third century, when they devastated Gaul, but their name subsequently became merged in the general name of Saxons.

CHELIDON, the mistress of C. Verres, often mentioned by Cicero.

CHELIDŌNIS (Χελιδόνις), wife of Cleonymus, to whom she proved unfaithful in consequence of a passion for Acretatus, son of Areus I.

CHELIDŌNĪE INSULÆ (Χελιδόνια νῆσοι: now Khelidoni), a group of five (Strabo only mentions three) small islands, surrounded by dangerous shallows, off the promontory called Hieræ or Chelidonia (now Khelidoni), on the southern coast of Lycia.

CHELOXĀTAS (Χελωνάτας: now Cape Tornese), a promontory in Elis, opposite Zacynthus, the most westerly point of the Peloponnesus.

CHEMMIS, afterward Πανδρόλις (Χέμμις, Πανδρόλις: Χεμμίτης: ruins at Ekhemim). 1. A great city of the Thebais, or Upper Egypt, on the eastern bank of the Nile, celebrated for its manufacture of linen, its stone-quarries, and its temples of Pan and Perseus. It was the birth-place of the poet Nonnus.—[2. An island in a deep lake near the city Buto, in Lower Egypt, containing a spacious temple of Apollo. Herodotus, in speaking of it, says that the Egyptians told him that it was a floating island, but that he, for his part, never saw it float about or even move.]

CHEXŌBOCĪA (Χηνοβοσκία: ruins at Kasees-Said), a city of Upper Egypt, on the right bank of the Nile, opposite Diospolis Parva.

CHEOPS (Χεὸψ), an early king of Egypt, godless and tyrannical, reigned fifty years, and built the first and largest pyramid by the compulsory labor of his subjects.

CHEPHREN (Χεφρήν), king of Egypt, brother and successor of Cheops, whose example of tyranny he followed, reigned fifty-six years, and built the second pyramid. The Egyptians so hated the memory of these brothers, that they called the pyramids, not by their name, but by that of Philiton, a shepherd who at that time fed his flocks near the place.

CHEPSIPHON (Χεψίφρων) or CRESIPHON, an architect of Cnosus in Crete, in conjunction with his son Metagenes, built, or commenced building, the great temple of Diana (Artemis) at Ephesus. He flourished B.C. 560.

CHERSONĒSUS (Χερσονήσος, Att. Χερρόνησος), "a land-island," that is, "a peninsula" (from χέρσος, "land," and νῆσος, "island"). 1. CH. THACICA (now Peninsula of the Dardanelles or of Gallipoli), usually called at Athens "The Chersonesus" without any distinguishing epithet, the narrow slip of land, four hundred and twenty stadia in length, running between the Hellespont and the Gulf of Melas, and connected with the Thracian main land by an isthmus, which was fortified by a wall thirty-six stadia across, near Cardia. The Chersonese was colonized by the Athenians under Miltiades, the contemporary of Pisistratus.—2. TABLICA or SCYTHICA (now Crimea), the peninsula between the Pontus Euxinus, the Cimmerian Bosphorus, and the Palus Mæotis, united to the main land by an isthmus forty stadia in width. The ancients compared this peninsula with the Peloponnesus both in form and size. It produced a great quantity of corn, which was exported to Athens and other parts of Greece. The eastern part of the peninsula was called Τρηχίη or the Rugged (Herod., iv., 99). Respecting the Greek kingdom established in this country, see BOSPORUS. There was a town on the southern coast of this peninsula called Chersonesus, founded by the inhabitants of the Pontic Heracleia, and situated on a small peninsula, called ἡ μικρὰ Χερ., to distinguish it from the larger, of which it formed a part.—3. CIMBRICA (now Jutland). Vid. CIMBRI.—[4. CHERSONESUS AUREA. Vid. AUREA CHERSONESUS.]—5. (Now Cape Chersonisi), a promontory in Argolis, between Epidaurus and Træzen.—6. (Now Chersoneso), a town in Crete, on the Promontory Zephyrium, the harbor of Lyctus in the interior.

CHERUSCI, the most celebrated of all the tribes of ancient Germany. The limits of their territory cannot be fixed with accuracy, since the ancients did not distinguish between the Cherusi proper and the nations belonging to the league, of which the Cherusi were at the head. The Cherusi proper dwelt on both sides of the Visurgis (now Weser), and their territories extended to the Harz and the Elbe. They were originally in alliance with the Romans, but they subsequently formed a powerful league of the German tribes for the purpose of expelling the Romans from the country, and under the chief Arminius they destroyed the army of Varus and drove the Romans beyond the Rhine, A.D. 9. In consequence of internal dissensions among the German tribes the Cherusi soon lost their influence. Their neighbors, the CATTI, succeeded to their power.

CHEŒIUM (Χήσιον), a promontory of Samos, with a temple of Diana (Artemis), who was worshipped here under the surname of Χησιεύς. Near it was a little river Chesius, flowing past a town of the same name.

CHILON (Χείλων, Χίλων). 1. Of Laedæmon, son of Damagetus, and one of the Seven Sages, flourished B.C. 590. It is said that he died of joy when his son gained the prize for boxing at the Olympic games. The institution of the Ephorality is erroneously ascribed by some to Chilon.—[2. A Spartan of the royal house of the Eurypontids, who, on the death of Cleomenes III., being passed over in the selection of king, excited a revolution and slew the ephori; but, the people not sustaining him, he was compelled to take refuge in Achaia.]

CHIMÆRA (Χίμαιρα), a fire-breathing monster, the fore part of whose body was that of a lion, the hind part that of a dragon, and the middle that of a goat. According to Hesiod, she was a daughter of Typhaon and Echidna, and had three heads, one of each of the three animals before mentioned. She made great havoc in Lycia and the surrounding countries, and was at length killed by Bellerophon. Virgil places her, together with other monsters, at the entrance of Orus. The origin of the notion of this fire-breathing monster must probably be sought for in the volcano of the name of Chimæra, near Phaselis, in Lycia. In the works of art recently discovered in Lycia, we find several representations of the Chimæra in the simple form of a species of lion still occurring in that country.

ΧΙΜΕΡΙΟΝ, a promontory and harbor of Thesprotia in Epirus.

ΧΙΡΩΝ (Χίρων), of Heraclæa on the Pontus, a disciple of Plato, put to death Clearchus, the tyrant of his native town, and was in consequence killed, B.C. 353. There are extant thirteen letters which are ascribed to Chiron, but which are undoubtedly of later origin. Edited by Coberus, Lips., and Dresd., 1765, and by Orelli, in his edition of Memnon, Lips., 1816.

ΧΙΩΝΕ (Χίωνη). 1. Daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, became by Neptune (Poseidon) the mother of Eumolpus.—2. Daughter of Dædalion, beloved by Apollo and Mercury (Hermes), gave birth to twins, Autolyeus and Philammon, the former a son of Mercury (Hermes) and the latter of Apollo. She was killed by Diana (Artemis) for having compared her beauty to that of the goddess.

ΧΙΩΝΙΔΕΣ (Χιωνιδῆς and Χιωνιδῆς), an Athenian poet of the old comedy, flourished B.C. 460, and was the first poet who gave the Athenian comedy that form which it retained down to the time of Aristophanes. [His fragments are given by Meineke, Comic Græc. Fragm., vol. i., p. 3-5, edit. minor.

ΧΙΟΣ (Χίος; Χίος, Chios: now Greek Khio, Italian Seio, Turkish Saki-Andassi, i. e., Mastic-island), one of the largest and most famous islands of the Ægean, lay opposite to the peninsula of Clazomenæ, on the coast of Ionia, and was reckoned at nine hundred stadia (ninety geographical miles) in circuit. Its length from north to south is about thirty miles, its greatest breadth about ten, and the width of the strait, which divides it from the main land, about eight. It is said to have borne, in the earliest times, the various names of Æthalia, Maeris, and Pityusa, and to have been inhabited by Tyrrhenian Pelasgians and Leleges. It was colonized by the Ionians at the time of their great migration, and became an important member of the Ionian league; but its population was mixed. It remained an independent and powerful maritime state, under a democratic form of government, till the great naval defeat of the Ionian Greeks by the Persians, B.C. 494, after which the Chians, who had taken part in the fight with one hundred ships, were subjected to the Persians, and their island was laid waste and their young women carried off into slavery. The battle of Mycale, 479, freed Chios from the Persian yoke, and it became a member of the Athenian league, in which it was for a long time the closest and most favored ally of Athens; but an unsuccessful attempt to revolt, in 412, led to its conquest and devastation. It recovered its independence, with Cos and Rhodes, in 358, and afterward shared the fortunes of the other states of IONIA. Chios is covered with rocky mountains, clothed with the richest vegetation. It was celebrated for its wine, which was among the best known to the ancients, its figs, gum-mastic, and other natural products, also for its marble and pottery, and for the beauty of its women; and the luxurious life of its inhabitants. Of all the states which aspired to the honor of being the birth-place of Homer, Chios [alone, with any plausibility, contested the claim with Smyrna, though the latter is generally considered by modern critics to have the best claim: Vid. HOMERUS:] and it numbered among its natives the tragedian Ion, the historian Theopompus, the poet Theocritus, and other eminent men. Its chief city, Chios (now Khio), stood on the eastern side of the island, at the foot of its highest mountain, Pelinæus: the other principal places in it were Posidium, Phanaæ, Notium, Elæus, and Leuconium.

ΧΙΡΗΣΘΡΟΣ (Χειρίσθορος), a Laedæmonian, was sent by the Spartans to aid Cyrus in his expedition against his brother Artaxerxes, B.C. 401. After the battle of Cunaxa and the subsequent arrest of the Greek generals, Chiriso-phus was appointed one of the new generals, and, in conjunction with Xenophon, had the chief conduct of the retreat.

ΧΙΡΩΝ (Χείρων), the wisest and justest of all the Centaurs, son of Saturn (Cronos) and Philyra, and husband of Naïs or Chariclo, lived on Mount Pelion. He was instructed by Apollo and Diana (Artemis), and was renowned for his skill in hunting, medicine, music, gymnastics, and the art of prophecy. All the most distinguished heroes of Grecian story, as Pelæus, Achilles, Diomedes, &c., are described as the pupils of Chiron in these arts. His friendship with Pelæus, who was his grandson, is particularly celebrated. Chiron saved him from the other Centaurs, who were on the point of killing him, and he also restored to him the sword which Acæstus had coucealed. Chiron further informed him in what manner he might gain possession of Thetis, who was destined to marry a mortal. Hercules, too, was his friend; but one of the poisoned arrows of this hero was nevertheless the cause of his death. While fighting with the other Centaurs, one of the poisoned arrows of Hercules struck Chiron, who, although immortal, would not live any longer, and gave his immortality to Prometheus. According to others, Chiron, in looking at one of the arrows, dropped it on his foot, and wounded himself. Jupiter (Zeus) placed Chiron among the stars.

ΧΙΡΩΝΕ (Χίρωνη), a surname of Diana (Artemis), derived either from the Attic demus of Chitone, or because the goddess is represented with a short chiton.

ΧΙΩΔΕ (Χίωδη), the Blooming, a surname of Ceres (Demeter) as the protectress of the green fields: hence Sophocles (Ed. Col., 1600) calls her Δημήτηρ εὐχλοος.

[CHLOREUS, a priest of Cybele, followed Æneas from Troy into Italy, and was slain by Turnus.]

ΧΛΩΡΙΣ (Χλωρίς). 1. Daughter of the Theban Amphion and Niobe: she and her brother Amyclas were the only children of Niobe not killed by Apollo and Diana (Artemis). She is often confounded with No. 2.—2. Daughter of Amphion of Orchomenos, wife of Neleus, king of Pylos, and mother of Nestor.—3. Wife of Zephyrus, and goddess of flowers, identical with the Roman Flora.

ΧΡΩΔΡΕΝΗ (Χοαρηνή), a fertile valley in the west of Parthia, on the borders of Media, between two ranges of the Caspii Montes CHŌASPES (Χοάσπης). Now Kerah or Kara-Su, a river of Susiana, falling into the Tigris. Its water was so pure that the Persian kings used to carry it with them in silver vessels when on foreign expeditions. It is wrongly identified by some geographers with the EULEUS.—2. (Now Attock), a river in the Paropamisus, falling into the Cophes (now Cabul), apparently identical with the Suanstus of Ptolemy and the Guræus of Arrian; and if so, the Choës of Arrian is probably the Kama; but the proper naming of these rivers is very difficult.

CHERĀIDES (Χοιράδες), two small rocky islands off the coast of Italy, near Tarentum.

CHERĪLUS (Χοιρίλος or Χοιρίλος). 1. Of Athens, a tragic poet, contemporary with Thespis, Phrynichus, and Æschylus, exhibited tragedies for forty years, B.C. 523-483, and gained the prize thirteen times.—2. Of Samos, the author of an epic poem on the Persian wars: the chief action of the poem appears to have been the battle of Salamis. He was born about 470, and died at the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, consequently not later than 399, which was the last year of Archelaus. [The fragments of Chærilus are given by Næke, Choerili Samii Fragmenta, Lips., 1817.]—3. Of Iasos, a worthless epic poet in the train of Alexander the Great, is said to have received from Alexander a gold stater for every verse of his poem. (Hor., Ep., ii., 1, 232; Art. Poët., 357.)

CHOES. Vid. CHOASPES, No. 2.

CHOLLIDÆ (Χολλείδαι or Χολλείδης, -ίδης), a demus in Attica belonging either to the tribe Leontis or Acamantis.

CHŌNĪA (Χωνία), the name in early times of a district in the south of Italy, inhabited by the CHŌNES (Χώνες), an Enotrian people, who derived their name from the town of CHŌNE (Χώνη). Chonia appears to have included the southeast of Lucania, and the whole of the east of Bruttium as far as the promontory Zephyrium.

CHŌRASMĪ (Χοράσμοι), a people of Sogdiana, who inhabited the banks and islands of the lower course of the Oxus. They were a branch of the Sææ or Massagete.

CHOSROES. 1. King of Parthia. Vid. ARSACES, No. 25.—2. King of Persia. Vid. SASSANIDES.

[CHROMIS (Χρόμις), son of Midon, was, with Eunomus, leader of the Mysians in the Trojan war. Three or four other persons of this name are mentioned in the Æneid of Virgil and in Ovid.]

[CHROMIUS (Χρομίος). 1. Son of Neleus and Chloris; slain by Hercules.—2. Son of Priam, slain, together with his brother Echeleon, by Diomedes.—3. Son of Agesidamus, a Syracusan, conqueror at the Nemean games. Two or three other persons of this name of no importance are mentioned in the Iliad.]

CHRŪSA or -E (Χρῦσα, -η), a city on the coast of the Troad, near Thebes, with a temple of Apollo Smintheus; celebrated by Homer, but destroyed at an early period, and succeeded by another city of the same name, on a height further from the sea, near Hamaxitos. This second city fell into decay in consequence of the removal of its inhabitants to ALEXANDREA TROAS.

CHRYSANTAS (Χρυσάντας), described by Xenophon in the Cyropædia as a brave and wise Persian, high in the favor of Cyrus, who rewarded him with the satrapy of Lydia and Ionia.

[CHRYSANTHIS (Χρυσανθίς), an Argive female, who informed Cærus, when she came to Argos, of the abduction of her daughter.]

CHRYSÆOR (Χρυσάωρ). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Medusa, husband of Callirrhœ, and father of Geryones and Echidna.—2. The god (or goddess) with the golden sword, a surname of several divinities, as Apollo, Diana (Artemis), and Ceres (Demeter).

CHRYSAS (Χρῦσας; now Dittaino), a small river in Sicily, an affluent of the Symæthus, was worshipped as a god in Assorus, in the neighborhood of which there was a Favum Chryseæ.

CHRYSÆIS (Χρυσήϊς), daughter of Chryses, priest of Apollo at Chrysa, was taken prisoner by Achilles at the capture of Lyrnessus or the Hypoplacian Thebe. In the distribution of the booty she was given to Agamemnon. Her father Chryses came to the camp of the Greeks to solicit her ransom, but was repulsed by Agamemnon with harsh words. Thereupon Apollo sent a plague into the camp of the Greeks, and Agamemnon was obliged to restore her to her father to appease the anger of the god. Her proper name was Astynome.

CHRYSÆS. Vid. CHRYSÆIS.

CHRYSIPPUS (Χρῦσιππος). 1. Son of Pelops and Axioche, was hated by his step-mother Hippodamia, who induced her sons Atreus and Thyestes to kill him.—2. A Stoic philosopher, son of Apollonius of Tarsus, born at Soli in Cilicia, B.C. 200. When young, he lost his paternal property and went to Athens, where he became the disciple of the Stoic Cleanthes. Disliking the Academic scepticism, he became one of the most strenuous supporters of the principle that knowledge is attainable and may be established on certain foundations. Hence, though not the founder of the Stoic school, he was the first person who based its doctrines on a plausible system of reasoning, so that, it was said, "if Chrysippus had not existed, the Porch could not have been." He died 207, aged seventy-three. He possessed great acuteness and sagacity, and his industry was so great that he is said to have seldom written less than five hundred lines a day, and to have left behind him seven hundred and five works. [His fragments have been collected by Baguet, De Chrysippi vita et reliquiis, Lovanii, 1822, 4to.]—3. Of Cnidus, a physician, sometimes confounded with the Stoic philosopher, but he lived about a century earlier. He was son of Erineus, and pupil of Eudoxus of Cnidus: his works, which are not now extant, are quoted by Galen.—[4. A learned freedman of Cicero, who ordered him to attend upon his son in B.C. 52; but as he left young Marcus without the knowledge of his patron, Cicero determined to declare his manumission void. He afterward appears, however, to have been in favor again with his patron. 5. A freedman of the architect Cyrus, and himself also an architect.]

CHRYSŌCĒRAS, the "Golden Horn," the promontory on which part of Constantinople was built.

CHRYSŌGŌNUS, L. CORNELIUS, a favorite freedman of Sulla, and a man of profligate character, was the false accuser of Sextus Roscius, whom Cicero defended, B.C. 80.

CHRYSŌPOLIS (Χρυσόπολις. now Scutari) a fortified place on the Bosphorus, opposite to Byzantium, at the spot where the Bosphorus was generally crossed. It was originally the port of Chalcedon.

CHRYSORRHŌAS (Χρυσόρροας; now Barrada), also called BARDINES, a river of Cœle-Syria, flowing from the eastern side of Anti-Libanus, past Damascus, into a lake now called Bahr-el-Merj.

CHRYSOSTŌMUS, JOANNES (Χρυσόστομος, "gold-en-mouthed," so surnamed from the power of his eloquence,) usually called St. CHRYSOSTOM, was born at Antioch, of a noble family, A.D. 347. He received instruction in eloquence from Libanius; and after being ordained deacon (381) and presbyter (386) at Antioch, he became so celebrated as a preacher that he was chosen archbishop of Constantinople on the death of Nectarius, 397. Chrysostom soon gave great offence at Constantinople by the simplicity of his mode of living, by the sternness with which he rebuked the immorality of the higher classes, and by the severity which he showed to the worldly-minded monks and clergy. Among his enemies was the Empress Eudoxia; and they availed themselves of a dispute which had arisen between Chrysostom and Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria, to accuse Chrysostom of Origenism, and to obtain his deposition by a synod held at Chalcedon in 403. But the same causes which had brought on Chrysostom the hatred of the higher orders had made him the idol of the people. A few days after he had left the city an earthquake happened, which the enraged people considered as a proof of the divine anger at his banishment. Eudoxia, fearing a popular insurrection, recalled him, but two months after his return he again excited the anger of the empress, and was banished a second time to the desolate town of Cucusus on the borders of Isauria and Cilicia. He met with much sympathy from other churches, and his cause was advocated by Innocent, bishop of Rome; but all this excited jealousy at Constantinople, and he was ordered to be removed to Pityus in Pontus. He died on the journey at Comana in Pontus, 407, in the sixtieth year of his age. His bones were brought back to Constantinople in 438, and he received the honor of canonization. His works are most voluminous. They consist of, 1. Homilies, Sermons on different parts of Scripture and points of doctrine and practice. 2. Commentaries on the Scriptures. 3. Epistles. 4. Treatises on various subjects, e. g., the Priesthood, Providence, &c. 5. Liturgies. The best edition of his works is by Montfaucon, Paris, 1718-38, 13 vols. folio: [reprinted Paris, 1835-40, 13 vols. royal 8vo.]

[CHRYSOTHEÏMIS (Χρυσόθεμις), a daughter of Agamemnon, offered by him in marriage to Achilles to bring about a reconciliation.]

CHTHONÏUS (Χθόνιος) and CHTHONÏA (Χθονία), epithets of the gods and goddesses of the lower world (from χθών, "the earth"), as Hades, Hecate, Demeter, Persephone, &c.

CHYTRI (Χύτρι). 1. (Now Chytri), a town in Cyprus, on the road from Cerynia to Salamis.—2. Warm springs at Salamis.

CΙΛΙΣΑ, a border fortress of the Romans in Lesser Armenia.

CIBĂLE or CIBĂLIS, a town in Pannonia, on the Lake Hiuleas, between the Dravus and Savaus, near which Constantine gained a decisive victory over Licinius, A.D. 314: the birth-place of Valentinian and Gratian.

CIBŪTUS. Vid. ALEXANDREA, No. 1; APAMEA, No. 3.

CIBŪRA (Kίβυρα: Kίβυράτης; now Cibyrate), 1. MAGNA (ή μεγάλη): ruins at Buruz or Aron-don?, a great city of Phrygia Magna, in the fertile district of Milyas, on the borders of Caria, said to have been founded by the Lydians, but afterward peopled by the Pisidians. In Strabo's time four native dialects were spoken in it besides Greek, namely, those of the Lydians, the Pisidians, the Milyæ, and the Solymi. Under its native princes, the city ruled over a large district called Cibyrātis (Kίβυράτης), and could send into the field an army of thirty thousand men. In B.C. 83 it was added to the Roman empire, and was made the seat of a conventus juridicus. After being nearly destroyed by an earthquake, it was restored by Tiberius, under the names Cæsarea and Civitas Cibyratica. The city was very celebrated for its manufactures, especially in iron.—2. PARVA (K. μικρά: now Ibura), a city of Pamphylia, on the borders of Cilicia.

CICERŌNIUS, C., secretary of the elder Scipio Africanus, was a candidate for the prætorship, B.C. 174, along with Scipio's son, but resigned in favor of the latter. He was prætor in the following year, and conquered the Corsicans, but was refused a triumph. In 172 and 167 he was one of the ambassadors sent to the Illyrian king Gentius, and in 168 he dedicated on the Alban Mount a temple to Juno Moneta.

CICĒRO, TULLIUS. 1. M., grandfather of the orator, lived at his native town Arpinum, which received the full Roman franchise in B.C. 188.—2. M., son of No. 1, also lived at Arpinum, and died 64.—3. L., brother of No. 2, was a friend of Marcus Antonius the orator.—4. L., son of No. 3, school-fellow of the orator, died 68, much regretted by his cousin.—5. M., the orator, eldest son of No. 2 and Helvia, was born on the third of January, B.C. 106, at the family residence in the vicinity of Arpinum. He was educated along with his brother Quintus, and the two brothers displayed such aptitude for learning that his father removed with them to Rome, where they received instruction from the best teachers in the capital. One of their most celebrated teachers was the poet Arelius of Antioch. After receiving the manly gown (91) the young Marcus was placed under the care of Q. Mucius Sævola, the augur, from whom he learned the principles of jurisprudence. In 89 he served his first and only campaign under Cn. Pompeius Strabo in the Social war. During the civil wars between Marius and Sulla, Cicero identified himself with neither party, but devoted his time to the study of law, philosophy, and rhetoric. He received instruction in philosophy from Phædrus the Epicurean, Philo, the chief of the New Academy, and Diodotus the Stoic, and in rhetoric from Molo the Rhodian. Having carefully cultivated his powers, Cicero came forward as a pleader in the forum as soon as tranquillity was restored by the final overthrow of the Marian party. His first extant speech was delivered in 81, when he was twenty-six years of age, on behalf of P. Quintius. Next year (80) he defended Sextus Roscius of Ameria, charged with parricide by Chrysogonus, a favorite freedman of Sulla. Shortly afterward (79) Cicero went to Greece, ostensibly for the improvement of his health, which was very delicate, but perhaps because he dreaded the resentment of Sulla. He first went to Athens, where he remained six months, studying philosophy under Antiochus of Ascalon, and rhetoric under Demetrius Syrus; and here he made the acquaintance of Pomponius Atticus, who remained his firm friend to the close of his life. From Athens he passed over to Asia Minor, receiving instruction from the most celebrated rhetoricians in the Greek cities of Asia; and finally passed some time at Rhodes (78), where he once more placed himself under the care of Molo. After an absence of two years, Cicero returned to Rome (77), with his health firmly established, and his oratorical powers greatly improved. He again came forward as an orator in the forum, and soon obtained the greatest distinction. His success in the forum paved for him the way to the high offices of state. In 75 he was quaesitor in Sicily under Sex. Peducæus, prætor of Lilybæum, and discharged the duties of his office with an integrity and impartiality which secured for him the affections of the provincials. He returned to Rome in 74, and for the next four years was engaged in pleading causes. In 70 he distinguished himself by the impeachment of VERRES, and in 69 he was eulædile. In 66 he was prætor, and while holding this office he defended Cluentius in the speech still extant, and delivered his celebrated oration in favor of the Manilian law, which appointed Pompey to the command of the Mithradatic war. Two years afterward he gained the great object of his ambition, and, although a novus homo, was elected consul with C. Antonius as a colleague. He entered upon the office on the first of January, 63. Hitherto Cicero had taken little part in the political struggles of his time. As far as he had interfered in public affairs, he had sided with the popular party, which had raised him to power; but he appears never to have had any real sympathy with that party; and as soon as he had gained the highest office in the state he deserted his former friends, and connected himself closely with the aristocracy. The consulship of Cicero was distinguished by the outbreak of the conspiracy of Catiline, which was suppressed and finally crushed by Cicero's prudence and energy. Vid. CATILINA. For this service Cicero received the highest honors; he was addressed as "father of his country," and thanksgivings in his name were voted to the gods. But as soon as he had laid down the consulship, the friends of the conspirators, who had been condemned to death by the senate, and whose sentence had been carried into execution by Cicero, accused him loudly of having put Roman citizens to death illegally. Cicero had clearly been guilty of a violation of the fundamental principles of the Roman constitution, which declared that no citizen could be put to death until sentence by the whole body of the people assembled in the comitia. Cicero's enemies were not slow in availing themselves of this vulnerable point. The people, whose cause he had deserted, soon began to show unequivocal signs of resentment against him. Shortly afterward (62) he mortally offended Clodius by bearing witness against him, when the latter was accused of a violation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea. Clodius vowed deadly vengeance against Cicero. To accomplish his purpose more securely, Clodius was adopted into a plebeian family, was then elected tribune of the plebs, and as tribune (58) brought forward a bill, interdicting from fire and water (i. e., banishing) any one who should be found to have put a Roman citizen to death untried. The triumvirs, Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus, left Cicero to his fate; and despairing of offering any successful opposition to the measure of Clodius, Cicero voluntarily retired from Rome before it was put to the vote, and crossed over to Greece. He took up his residence at Thessalonica in Macedonia. Here he gave way to unmanly despair; and his letters during this period are filled with groans, sobs, and tears. Meanwhile his friends at Rome had not deserted him; and, notwithstanding the vehement opposition of Clodius, they obtained his recall from banishment in the course of next year. In August, 57, Cicero landed at Brundisium, and in September he was again at Rome, where he was received with distinguished honor. Taught by experience, Cicero would no longer join the senate in opposition to the triumvirs, and retired to a great extent from public life. In 52 he was compelled, much against his will, to go to the East as governor of Cilicia. Here he distinguished himself by his integrity and impartial administration of justice, but, at the same time, made himself ridiculous by the absurd vanity which led him to assume the title of imperator and to aspire to the honors of a triumph on account of his subduing some robber tribes in his province. He returned to Italy toward the end of 50, and arrived in the neighborhood of Rome on the fourth of January, 49, just as the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey broke out. After long hesitating which side to join, he finally determined to throw in his lot with Pompey, and crossed over to Greece in June. After the battle of Pharsalia (48), Cicero abandoned the Pompeian party and returned to Brundisium, where he lived in the greatest anxiety for many months, dreading the vengeance of Cæsar. But his fears were groundless: he was not only pardoned by Cæsar, but, when the latter landed at Brundisium in September, 47, he greeted Cicero with the greatest kindness and respect, and allowed him to return to Rome. Cicero now retired into privacy, and during the next three or four years composed the greater part of his philosophical and rhetorical works. The murder of Cæsar on the 15th of March, 44, again brought Cicero into public life. He put himself at the head of the republican party, and in his Philippic orations attacked M. Antony with unmeasured vehemence. But this proved his ruin. On the formation of the triumvirate between Octavianus, Antony, and Lepidus (27th of November, 43), Cicero's name was in the list of the proscribed. Cicero was warned of his danger while at his Tusculan villa, and embarked at Antium, intending to escape by sea, but was driven by stress of weather to Circeii, from whence he coasted along to Formiæ, where he landed at his villa. From Formiæ his attendants carried him in a litter toward the shore, but were overtaken by the soldiers before they could reach the coast. They were ready to defend their master with their lives, but Cicero commanded them to desist, and, stretching forward, called upon his executioners to strike. They instantly cut off his head and hands, which were conveyed to Rome, and, by the orders of Antony, nailed to the Rostra. Cicero perished on the 7th of December, 43, and, at the time of his death, had nearly completed his sixty-fourth year. By his first wife, Terentia, Cicero had two children, a daughter, TULLIA, whose death in 45 caused him the greatest sorrow, and a son Marcus. Vid. No. 7. His wife Terentia, to whom he had been united for thirty years, he divorced in 46, in consequence, it would appear, of some disputes connected with pecuniary transactions; and soon afterward he married a young and wealthy maiden, PUBLILIA, his ward, but, as might have been anticipated, found little comfort in this new alliance, which was speedily dissolved. As a statesman and a citizen Cicero can not command our respect. He did good service to his country by the suppression of the conspiracy of Catiline; but this was almost the only occasion on which he showed vigor and decision of character. His own letters condemn him. In them his inordinate vanity, pusillanimity, and political tergiversation appear in the clearest colors. It is as an author that Cicero deserves the highest praise. In his works the Latin language appears in the greatest perfection. They may be divided into the following subjects: I. RHETORICAL WORKS: 1. Rhetoricorum s. De Inventione Rhetorica Libri II. This appears to have been the earliest of Cicero's prose works. It was intended to exhibit in a systematic form all that was most valuable in the works of the Greek rhetoricians, but it was never completed.—2. De Partitione Oratoria Dialogus. A catechism of Rhetoric, according to the method of the middle Academy, by way of question and answer, drawn up by Cicero for the instruction of his son Marcus, written in 46.—3. De Oratore ad Quintum Fratrem Libri III. A systematic work on the art of Oratory, written in 55 at the request of his brother Quintus. This is the most perfect of Cicero's rhetorical works. Best edition by Ellendt, Regiomont., 1840.—4. Brutus s. De Claris Oratoribus. It contains a critical history of Roman eloquence, from the earliest times down to Hortensius inclusive. Editions by Meyer, Halle, 1838, and by Ellendt, Regiomont., 1844.—5. Ad M. Brutum Orator, in which Cicero gives his views of a faultless orator: written 45. Edited by Meyer, Lips., 1827.—6. De Optimo Genere Oratorum. An introduction to Cicero's translation of the orations of Æschines and Demosthenes in the case of Ctesiphon: the translation itself has been lost.—7. Topica ad C. Trebatium. An abstract of the Topics of Aristotle, illustrated by examples derived chiefly from Roman law instead of from Greek philosophy: it was written in July, 44.—8. Rhetorico- rum ad C. Herennium Libri IV. The author of this work is uncertain, but it was certainly not written by Cicero.—II. PHILOSOPHICAL WORKS. I. POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY: 1. De Republica Libri VI. A work on the best form of government and the duty of the citizen, in the form of a dialogue founded on the Republic of Plato; written in 54. This work disappeared in the tenth or eleventh century of our era with the exception of the episode of the Somnium Scipionis, which had been preserved by Macrobius; but in 1822, Angelo Mai found among the Palimpsests in the Vatican a portion of the lost treasure. Thus the greater part of the first and second books, and a few fragments of the others were discovered. Editions by Mai, Rome, 1822, and by Creuzer and Moser, Frankf., 1826.—2. De Legibus Libri III. A dialogue, founded on the Laws of Plato; probably written 52. A portion of the three books is lost, and it originally consisted of a greater number. Edited by Moser and Creuzer, Frankfort, 1824, and by Bake, Lugd. Bat., 1842.—II. PHILOSOPHY OF MORALS: 1. De Officiis Libri III. Written in 44 for the use of his son Marcus, at that time residing at Athens. The first two books were chiefly taken from Panætius, and the third book was founded upon the work of the Stoic Heecato; but the illustrations are taken almost exclusively from Roman history and Roman literature. Edited by Beier, Lips., 1820-1821, 2 vols.—2. Cato Major s. De Senectute, addressed to Atticus, and written at the beginning of 44: it points out how the burden of old age may be most easily supported.—3. Lælius s. De Amicitia, written after the preceding, to which it may be considered as forming a companion: also addressed to Atticus. [Edited by Beier, Lips., 1828, and by Seyffert, Brandenburg, 1844.]-4. De Gloria Libri II, written 44, is now lost, though Petrarck possessed a MS. of the work.—5. De Consolatione s. De Luctu minuendo, written 45, soon after the death of his daughter Tullia, is also lost.—III. SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY: 1. Academicorum Libri II, a treatise upon the Academic philosophy, written 45. Edited by Goerenz, Lips., 1810, and Orelli, Turic., 1827.—2. De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum Libri V. Dedicated to M. Brutus, in which are discussed the opinions of the Epicureans, Stoics, and Peripatetics, on the Supreme Good, that is, the fnis, or end, toward which all our thoughts and actions are, or ought to be, directed. Written in 45. Edited by Otto, Lips., 1831, and by Madvig, Copenhagen, 1839.—3. Tusculanarum Disputationum Libri V. This work, addressed to M. Brutus, is a series of discussions on various important points of practical philosophy, supposed to have been held in the Tusculanum of Cicero. Written in 45. Edited by Kühner, Jenæ, 1846, third edition, and by Moser, Hannover, 3 vols., 1836-1837.—4. Paradoxa, six favorite Paradoxes of the Stoics explained in familiar language, written early in 46. [Edited by Moser, Göttingen, 1846.]-5. Hortensius s. De Philosophia, a dialogue in praise of philosophy, of which fragments only are extant, written in 45.—6. Timæus s. De Universo, a translation of Plato's Timæus, of which we possess a fragment.—IV. THEOLOGY: 1. De Natura Deorum Libri III. An account of the speculations of the Epicureans, the Stoics, and the Academicians, on the existence, attributes, and providence of a Divine Being; dedicated to M. Brutus, and written early in 44; edited by Moser and Creuzer, Lips., 1818.—2. De Divinatione Libri II., a continuation of the preceding work. It presents the opinions of the different schools of philosophy upon the reality of the science of divination. Written in 44, after the death of Cæsar; edited by Creuzer, Kayser, and Moser, Frankf., 1828.—3. De Fato Liber Singularis, only a fragment.—III. ORATIONS. The following is a list of Cicero's extant speeches, with the date at which each was delivered. Some account of each oration is given separately with the biography of the person principally concerned. 1. Pro P. Quintio, B.C. 81.—2. Pro Sex. Roscio Amerino, 80.—3. Pro Q. Roscio Comædo, 76.—4. Pro M. Tullio, 71.—5. In Q. Cæciliam, 70.—6. In Verrem Actio I, 5th of August, 70.—7. In Verrem Actio II. Not delivered.—8. Pro M. Fonteio, 69.—9. Pro A. Cæcilia, 69, probably.—10. Pro Lege Manilia, 66.—11. Pro A. Cluentio Avito, 66.—12. Pro C. Cornelio, 55.—13. Oratio in Toga Candida, 64.—14. De Lege Agraria, three orations, 63.—15. Pro C. Rabirio, 63.—16. In Catilinam, four orations, 63.—17. Pro Murena, 63.—18. Pro P. Cornelio Sulla, 62.—19. Pro A. Licinio Archia, 61.—20. Pro L. Valerio Flacco, 59.—21. Post Reditum in Senatu, 5th of September, 57.—22. Post Reditum ad Quirites, 6th or 7th of September, 57.—23. Pro Domo sua ad Pontifices, 29th of September, 57.—24. De Haruspicum Responsis, 56.—25. Pro P. Sextio, 55.—26. In Vatinius, 56.—27. Pro M. Cælio Rufo, 56.—28. Pro L. Cornelio Balbo, 56.—29. De Provinciis Consularibus, 56.—30. In L. Pisonem, 55.—31. Pro Cn. Plaucio, 55.—32. Pro C. Rabirio Postumo, 54.—33. Pro M. Æmilio Scauro, 54.—34. Pro T. Annio Milone, 52.—35. Pro M. Marcello, 47.—36. Pro Q. Ligario, 46.—37. Pro Rege Deiotaro, 45.—38. Oraciones Philippicæ, fourteen orations against M. Antonius, 44 and 43.—IV. EPISTLES. Cicero, during the most important period of his life, maintained a close correspondence with Atticus, and with a wide circle of literary and political friends and connections. We now have upward of eight hundred letters, undoubtedly genuine, extending over a space of twenty-six years, and commonly arranged in the following manner: 1. Epistolarum ad Familiares s. Epistolarum ad Diversos Libri XVI., a series of four hundred and twenty-six epistles, commencing with a letter to Pompey, written in 62, and terminating with a letter to Cassius, July, 43. They are not placed in chronological order, but those addressed to the same individuals, with their replies, where these exist, are grouped together, without reference to the date of the rest.—2. Epistolarum ad T. Pomponium Atticum Libri XVI., a series of three hundred and ninety-six epistles addressed to Atticus, of which eleven were written in 68, 67, 65, and 62, the remainder after the end of 62, and the last in November, 44. They are, for the most part, in chronological order, although dislocations occur here and there.—3. Epistolarum ad Q. Fratrem Libri III., a series of twenty-nine epistles addressed to his brother, the first written in 59, the last in 54.—4. We find in most editions Epistolarum ad

Brutum Liber, a series of eighteen epistles, all written after the death of Cæsar. To these are added eight more, first published by Cratander. The genuineness of these two books is doubtful. The most useful edition of Cicero's letters is by Schütz, 6 vols. 8vo, 1809-1812, in which they are arranged in chronological order. Cicero also wrote a great number of other works on historical and miscellaneous subjects, all of which are lost. He composed several poems, most of them in his earlier years, but two at a later period, containing a history of his consulship, and an account of his exile and recall. A line in one of his poems contained the unlucky jingle so well known to us from Juvenal (x., 122), O fortunatam natam me consule Romam. The best edition of the collected works of Cicero is by Orelli, Turic., 1826-1837, 9 vols. 8vo, in thirteen parts.—6. Q., brother of the orator, was born about 102, and was educated along with his brother. In 67 he was ædile, in 62 prætor, and for the next three years governed Asia as proprætor. He returned to Rome in 58, and warmly exerted himself to procure the recall of his brother from banishment. In 55 he went to Gaul as legatus to Cæsar, whose approbation he gained by his military abilities and gallantry: he distinguished himself particularly by the resistance he offered to a vast host of Gauls, who had attacked his camp, when he was stationed for the winter with one legion in the country of the Nervii. In 51 he accompanied his brother as legate to Cilicia; and on the breaking out of the civil war in 49 he joined Pompey. After the battle of Pharsalia he was pardoned by Cæsar. He was proscribed by the triumvirs, and was put to death in 43. Quintus wrote several works, which are all lost, with the exception of an address to his brother, entitled De Petitione Consulatus. Quintus was married to Pomponia, sister of Atticus; but, from incompatibility of temper, their union was an unhappy one.—7. M., only son of the orator and his wife Terentia, was born 65. He accompanied his father to Cilicia, and served in Pompey's army in Greece, although he was then only sixteen years of age. In 45 he was sent to Athens to pursue his studies, but there fell into irregular and extravagant habits. On the death of Cæsar (44) he joined the republican party, served as military tribune under Brutus in Macedonia, and after the battle of Philippi (42) fled to Sex. Pompey in Sicily. When peace was concluded between the triumvirs and Pompey in 39, Cicero returned to Rome, was favorably received by Octavianus, who at length assumed him as his colleague in the consulship (B.C. 30, from 13th of September). By a singular coincidence, the dispatch announcing the capture of the fleet of Antony, which was immediately followed by his death, was addressed to the new consul in his official capacity, and thus, says Plutarch, "the divine justice reserved the completion of Antony's punishment for the house of Cicero."—8. Q., son of No. 6, and of Pomponia, sister of Atticus, was born 66 or 67, and perished with his father in the proscription, 43.

CICHERUS (Κίχυρος), called ΕΡΗΥΡΑ (Ἐφύρη) in Homer, a town of Thesprotia in Epirus, between the Acherusian Lake and the sea.

[CICERUS, MESSIUS, a native of Campania, a character introduced by Horace (fifth satire of the first book) in a ridiculous controversy with the slave Sarmetus.]

CICŌNES (Κίκονες), a Thracian people on the Hebrus, and near the coast.

[CICYNETHUS (Κικύνθηος; now Pontiko), an island and city in the Pagasæus Siuus.]

CICYNA (Κίκυννα; Κικυννούς), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Cecropis, and afterward to the tribe Acamantis.

CILICIA (Κιλικία; Κίλιξ, fem. Κίλισσα), a district in the southeast of Asia Minor, bordering to the east on Syria, to the north on Cappadocia and Lycæonia, to the northwest and west on Pisidia and Pamphylia. On all sides, except the west, it is inclosed by natural boundaries, namely, the Mediterranean on the south, Mount Amanus on the east, and Mount Taurus on the north. The western part of Cilicia is intersected by the offshoots of the Taurus, while in its eastern part the mountain chains inclose much larger tracts of level country: and hence arose the division of the country into C. Aspera (Κ. ἡ τραχεία, or τραχειώτις), and C. Campestris (Κ. ἡ πεδιάς); the latter was also called Cilicia Propria (ἡ ἰδίως Κ.). Numerous rivers, among which are the PYRAMUS, SARUS, CYDNUS, CALYCADNUS, and smaller mountain streams, descend from the Taurus. The eastern division, through which most of the larger rivers flow, was extremely fertile, and the narrower valleys of Cilicia Aspera contained some rich tracts of land; the latter district was famed for its fine breed of horses. The first inhabitants of the country are supposed to have been of the Syrian race. The mythical story derived their name from Cilix, the son of Agenor, who started, with his brothers Cadmus and Phœnix, for Europe, but stopped short on the coast of Asia Minor, and peopled with his followers the plain of Cilicia. The country remained independent till the time of the Persian Empire, under which it formed a satrapy, but appears to have been still governed by its native princes. Alexander subdued it on his march into Upper Asia; and, after the division of his empire, it formed a part of the kingdom of the Seleucidae; its plains were settled by Greeks, and the old inhabitants were for the most part driven back into the mountains of C. Aspera, where they remained virtually independent, practicing robbery by land and piracy by sea, till Pompey drove them from the sea in his war against the pirates, and, having rescued the level country from the power of Tigranes, who had overrun it, he erected it into a Roman province, B.C. 67-66. The mountain country was not made a province till the reign of Vespasian. The people bore a low character among the Greeks and Romans. The Carians, Cappadocians, and Cilicians were called the three bad K's.

CILICIAE PYLE or PORTÆ (αἱ Πύλαι τῆς Κιλικίας; now Kolimboghaz), the chief pass between Cappadocia and Cilicia, through the Taurus, on the road from Tyana to Tarsus. This was the way by which Alexander entered Cilicia.

CILICIUM MARE (ἡ Κιλικία θάλασσα), the north-eastern portion of the Mediterranean, between Cilicia and Cyprus, as far as the Gulf of Issus.

CILIX (Κίλιξ), son of Agenor and Telephassa, was, with his brothers, Cadmus and Phœnix, sent out by their father in search of Europa, who had been carried off by Jupiter (Zeus). Cilix settled in the country called after him Cilicia.

CILLA (Κίλλα) a small town in the Troad, on the River Cilleus, at the foot of Mount Cillæus, in the range of Gargarus, celebrated for its temple of Apollo surnamed Cillæus. Its foundation was ascribed to Pelops.

CILNIÏ, a powerful family in the Etruscan town of Arretium, were driven out of their native town in B.C. 301, but were restored by the Romans. The Cilnii were nobles or Lucumonies in their state, and some of them in ancient times may have held even the kingly dignity. (Compare Hor., Carm., i., 1.) The name has been rendered chiefly memorable by C. Cilnius Mæcenas. Vid. MÆCENAS.

[CILIO or CHILO, P. MAGIUS. 1. A friend and client of M. Claudius Marcellus, whom he murdered at the Piræus, B.C. 45, at the instigation, as some asserted, of Cæsar, but more probably from anger at being refused a sum of money which Cilo wished to obtain from Marcellus to relieve him from his embarrassments.—2. JUNIUS, procurator of Pontus in the reign of Claudius, brought the Bosphoran Mithradates to Rome in A.D. 50, and received afterward the consular insignia.]

CIMBER, C. ANNIÛS, had obtained the prætorship from Cæsar, and was one of Antony's supporters, B.C. 43, on which account he is attacked by Cicero. He was charged with having killed his brother, whence Cicero calls him ironically Philadelphus.

CIMBER, L. TILLIÛS (not Tullius), a friend of Cæsar, who gave him the province of Bithynia, but subsequently one of Cæsar's murderers, B. C. 44. On the fatal day, Cimber was foremost in the ranks, under pretext of presenting a petition to Cæsar praying for his brother's recall from exile. After the assassination, Cimber went to his province and raised a fleet, with which he rendered service to Cassius and Brutus.

CIMBRI, a Celtic people, probably of the same race as the Cymry. Vid. CELTÆ. They are generally, but incorrectly, supposed to have inhabited the peninsula which was called after them CHERSONESUS CIMBRICA (now Jutland); the greatest uncertainty, however, prevailed among the ancients respecting their original abode. In conjunction with the Teutoni and Ambroues, they migrated south, with their wives and children, toward the close of the second century B.C.; and the whole host is said to have contained three hundred thousand fighting men. They defeated several Roman armies, and caused the greatest alarm at Rome. In B.C. 113 they defeated the consul Papirius Carbo near Norcia, and then crossed over into Gaul, which they ravaged in all directions. In 109 they defeated the consul Junius Silanus, in 107 the consul Cassius Longinus, who fell in the battle, and in 105 they gained their most brilliant victory near the Rhone over the united armies of the consul Cn. Mallius and the proconsul Servilius Cæpio. Instead of crossing the Alps, the Cimbri, fortunately for Rome, marched into Spain, where they remained two or three years. The Romans meantime had been making preparations to resist their formidable foes, and had placed their troops under the command of Marius. The barbarians returned to Gaul in 102. In that year the Teutoni were defeated, and cut to pieces by Marius, near Aquæ Sextiæ (now Aix) in Gaul; and next year (101) the Cimbri and their allies were likewise destroyed by Marius and Catulus, in the decisive battle of the Campi Raudii, near Verecellæ, in the north of Italy. In the time of Augustus, the Cimbri, who were then a people of no importance, sent an embassy to the emperor.

CIMINUS or CIMINIUS MONS (now Monte Cimino, also Monte Fogliano), a range of mountains in Etruria, thickly covered with wood, (Saltus Ciminius, Silva Ciminius), near a lake of the same name, northwest of Tarquinii, between the Lacus Vulsiniensis and Soracte.

[CIMMERIÏCUM (Κιμμερικόν, Strab.; τὰ Κιμμέρια γέγη, Herod.; and Κιμμερικὴ Κόμη, Strab.: now Eski-Krimin), a village in the Tauric or Cimmerian Chersonesus, west of Kaffa: in its neighborhood was Mons Cimmerius (now Aghirmisch-Dagh).]

CIMMĒRĪ (Κιμμέριοι), the name of a mythical and of an historical people. The mythical Cimmerii, mentioned by Homer, dwelt in the furthest west on the ocean, enveloped in constant mists and darkness. Later writers sought to localize them, and accordingly placed them either in Italy near the Lake Avernus, or in Spain, or in the Tauric Chersonesus. The historical Cimmerii dwelt on the Palus Mæotis (now Sea of Azov), in the Tauric Chersonesus, and in Asiatic Sarmatia. Driven from their abodes by the Scythians, they passed into Asia Minor on the northeast, and penetrated west as far as Æolis and Ionia. They took Sardis B.C. 635 in the reign of Ardys, king of Lydia, but they were expelled from Asia by Alyattes, the grandson of Ardys.

CIMMĒRĪUS BOSPORUS. Vid. BOSPORUS.

CIMŌLUS (Κίμωλος: Κιμώλιος: now Cimoli or Argentiere), an island in the Ægean Sea, one of the Cyclades, between Siphnos and Melos, celebrated for its fine white earth, used by fullers for cleaning cloths.

CIMON (Κίμων). 1. Son of Stesagoras, and father of Miltiades, victor at Marathon, gained three Olympic victories with his four-horse chariot, and after his third victory was secretly murdered by order of the sons of Pisistratus.—2. Grandson of the preceding, and son of the great Miltiades. On the death of his father (B.C. 489), he was imprisoned because he was unable to pay his fine of fifty talents, which was eventually paid by Callias on his marriage with Elpinice, Cimon's sister. Cimon first distinguished himself on the invasion of Greece by Xerxes (480), and after the battle of Plateæ was brought forward by Aristides. He frequently commanded the Athenian fleet in their aggressive wars against the Persians. His most brilliant success was in 466, when he defeated a large Persian fleet, and on the same day landed and routed their land forces also on the River Enrymedon in Pamphylia. The death of Aristides and the banishment of Themistocles left Cimon without a rival at Athens for some years. But his influence gradually declined as that of Pericles increased. In 461

Cimon marched at the head of some Athenian troops to the assistance of the Spartans, who were hard pressed by their revolted subjects. The Athenians were deeply mortified by the insulting manner in which their offers of assistance were declined, and were enraged with Cimon, who had exposed them to this insult. His enemies, in consequence, succeeded in obtaining his ostracism this year. He was subsequently recalled, in what year is uncertain, and through his intervention a five years' truce was made between Athens and Sparta, 450. In 449 the war was renewed with Persia; Cimon received the command, and with two hundred ships sailed to Cyprus: here, while besieging Citium, illness or the effects of a wound carried him off. Cimon was of a cheerful convivial temper, frank and affable in his manners. Having obtained a great fortune by his share of the Persian spoils, he displayed unbounded liberality. His orchards and gardens were thrown open; his fellow demusmen were free daily to his table, and his public bounty verged on ostentation. With the treasure he brought from Asia the southern wall of the citadel was built, and at his own private charge the foundation of the long walls to the Piræus was laid down.—3. Of Cleonæ, a painter of great renown, flourished about B.C. 460, and appears to have been the first painter of perspective.

CINÁDON (Κινάδων), the chief of a conspiracy against the Spartan peers (βουοι) in the first year of Agesilaus II. (B.C. 398–397). The plot was discovered, and Cinadon and the other conspirators were put to death.

CINÆTHON (Κιναιθών), of Laedæmon, one of the most fertile of the Cyclic poets, flourished B.C. 765.

CINÁRA or CINÁRUS (now Zinara), a small island in the Ægean Sea, east of Naxos, celebrated for its artichokes (κινάρα).

CINCINNÁTUS, L. QUINTIUS, a favorite hero of the old Roman republic, and a model of old Roman frugality and integrity. He lived on his farm, cultivating the land with his own hand. In B.C. 460 he was appointed consul suffectus in the room of P. Valerius. In 458 he was called from the plough to the dictatorship, in order to deliver the Roman consul and army from the perilous position in which they had been placed by the Æquians. He saved the Roman army, defeated the enemy, and, after holding the dictatorship only sixteen days, returned to his farm. In 439, at the age of eighty, he was a second time appointed dictator to oppose the alleged machinations of Sp. Mælius. Several of the descendants of Cincinatus held the consulship and consular tribunate, but none of them is of sufficient importance to require a separate notice.

CINCĪUS ALIMENTUS. Vid. ALIMENTUS.

CINĒAS (Κινέας). [1. A Thessalian prince, contemporary with and an ally of the Pisistratids, born at Conium in Phrygia].—2. A Thessalian, the friend and minister of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus. He was the most eloquent man of his day, and reminded his hearers of Demosthenes, whom he heard speak in his youth. Pyrrhus prized his persuasive powers so highly, that "the words of Cineas (he was wont to say) had won him more cities than his own arms"

The most famous passage in his life is his embassy to Rome, with proposals of peace from Pyrrhus, after the battle of Heraclea (B.C. 280). Cineas spared no arts to gain favor. Thanks to his wonderful memory, on the day after his arrival he was able (we are told) to address all the senators and knights by name. The senate, however, rejected his proposals mainly through the dying eloquence of old App. Claudius Cæcus. The ambassador returned and told the king that there was no people like that people—their city was a temple, their senate an assembly of kings. Two years after (278), when Pyrrhus was about to cross over into Sicily, Cineas was again sent to negotiate peace. He appears to have died in Sicily shortly afterward.

CINESIAS (Κίνηςιας), a dithyrambic poet of Athens, of no merit, ridiculed by Aristophanes and other comic poets. But he had his revenge, for he succeeded in procuring the abolition of the Choragia, as far as regarded comedy, about B.C. 390.

CINGA (now Cinca), a river in Hispania Tarraconensis, falls with the Sicoris into the Iberus.

CINGĒTŌRIX. 1. A Gaul, one of the first men in the city of the Treviri (now Trèves, Trier), attached himself to the Romans, though son-in-law to Indutiomarus, the head of the independent party. When this leader had been put to death by Cæsar, he became chief of his native city.—[2. Cæsar (B. G., v., 22) mentions another Cingetorix, a chief of the Kentish Britons.]

CINGŪLUM (Cingulaus: now Cingolo), a town in Picenum, on a rock, built by Labienus shortly before the breaking out of the civil war, B.C. 49.

CINNA, CORNĒLIUS. 1. L., the famous leader of the popular party during the absence of Sulla in the East (B.C. 87–84). In 87 Sulla allowed Cinna to be elected consul with Cn. Octavius, on condition of his taking an oath not to alter the constitution as then existing. But as soon as Sulla had left Italy, he began his endeavor to overpower the senate, and to recall Marius and his party. He was, however, defeated by his colleague Octavius in the forum, was obliged to fly the city, and was deposed by the senate from the consulate. But he soon returned; with the assistance of Marius, who came back to Italy, he collected a powerful army, and laid siege to Rome. The capture of the city, and the massacre of Sulla's friends which followed, more properly belong to the life of MARIUS. For the next three years (86, 85, 84) Cinna was consul. In 84 Sulla prepared to return from Greece; and Cinna was slain by his own troops, when he ordered them to cross over from Italy to Greece, where he intended to encounter Sulla.—2. L., son of No. 1, joined M. Lepidus in his attempt to overthrow the constitution of Sulla, 78; and on the defeat and death of Lepidus in Sardinia, he went with M. Perperna to join Sertorius in Spain. Cæsar procured his recall from exile. He was made prætor by Cæsar in 44, but was, notwithstanding, one of the enemies of the dictator. Though he would not join the conspirators, he approved of their act; and so great was the rage of the mob against him, that they nearly murdered him. Vid. below, CINNA, HELVIUS.

CINNA, C. HELVIUS, a poet of considerable renown, the friend of Catullus. In B.C. 44 he was tribune of the plebs, when he was murdered by the mob, who mistook him for his namesake Cornelius Cinna, though he was at the time walking in Cæsar's funeral procession. His principal work was an epic poem entitled Smyrna.

CINNĀMUS, JOANNES (Ἰωάννης Κίνναμος), one of the most distinguished Byzantine historians, lived under the Emperor Manuel Comnenus (who reigned A.D. 1143–1180), and wrote the history of this emperor and of his father Calo-Joannes, in six books, which have come down to us. Edited by Du Cange, Paris, 1670, fol., and by Meineke, Bonn, 1836, 8vo.

CINYPS or CINYPHUS (Κίνυψ, Κινύφος): now Wad-Khakan or Kinifo, a small river on the northern coast of Africa, between the Syrtes, forming the eastern boundary of the proper territory of the African Tripolis. The district about it was called by the same name, and was famous for its fine-haired goats.

CINYRAS (Κινύρας), son of Apollo, king of Cyprus, and priest of the Paphian Venus (Aphrodite), which latter office remained hereditary in his family, the Cinyradae. He was married to Metharne, the daughter of the Cyprian king Pygmalion, by whom he had several children, and among them was Adonis. According to some traditions, he unwittingly begot Adonis by his own daughter Smyrna, and killed himself on discovering the crime he had committed. According to other traditions, he had promised to assist Agamemnon; but as he did not keep his word, he was cursed by Agamemnon, and perished in a contest with Apollo.

CIPUS or CIPPUS, GENŪCIUS, a Roman prætor, on whose head it is said that horns suddenly grew, as he was going out of the gates of the city, and, as the haruspices declared that if he returned to the city he would be king, he imposed voluntary exile upon himself.

CIRCE (Κίρκη), a mythical sorceress, daughter of Helios (the Sun) by the Oceanid Perse, and sister of Æetes, lived in the island of Æeæ. Ulysses tarried a whole year with her, after she had changed several of his companions into pigs. By Ulysses she became the mother of Agrius and Telegonus. The Latin poets relate that she metamorphosed Scylla, and Picus, king of the Ausonians.

CIRCEII (Circæiensis: now Circello, and the ruins Citta Vecchia), an ancient town of Latium, on the Promontory CIRCEIUM, founded by Tarquinius Superbus, never became a place of importance, in consequence of its proximity to the unhealthy Pontine marshes. The oysters caught off Circæii were celebrated. (Hor., Sat. ii., 4, 33; Juv., iv., 140.) Some writers suppose Circe to have resided on this promontory and that hence it derived its name.

CIRCESIUM (Κιρκήσιον: now Kerkesia), a city of Mesopotamia, on the eastern bank of the Euphrates, at the mouth of the Aborrhæ: the extreme border fortress of the Roman empire.

CIRCUS. Vid. ROMA.

CIRPHIS (Κίρφης), a town in Phocis, on a mountain of the same name, which is separated by a valley from Parnassus.

CIRRA. Vid. CRISSA.

CIRTA, afterward CONSTANTĪNA (ruins at Con stantinich), a city of the Massylii in Numidia, fifty Roman miles from the sea; the capital of Syphax, and of Masinissa and his successors. Its position on a height, surrounded by the River Ampsagas, made it almost impregnable, as the Romans found in the Jugurthine, and the French in the Algerine wars. It was restored by Constantine the Great, in honor of whom it received its later name.

[CISPIUS, M. 1. Tribune of the plebs B.C. 57, the year in which Cicero was recalled from banishment, took an active part in Cicero's favor. He was afterward defended by Cicero when accused of bribery (ambitus), but could not obtain a verdict in his favor.—2. L., one of Caesar's officers in the African war, commanded part of the fleet, B.C. 46.]

[CISSA (Κίσσα), a city of the Jacetani in Hispania Tarraconensis; called by Livy (xxi., 60) Scissum (where for Scissis Alschevski writes Cissis), and probably the Cinna of Ptolemy.]

CISSEUS (Κισσεύς). 1. A king in Thrace, and father of Theano, or, according to others, of Hecuba, who is hence called Cisseis (Κισσηίς).—[2. Son of Melampus, fought on the side of Turnus, and was slain by Æneas.]

CISSIA (Κισσία), a very fertile district of Susiana, on the Choaspes. The inhabitants (Κισσιῶται) were a wild free people, resembling the Persians in their manners.

CISSES (Κισσός), a town in Macedonia, on a mountain of the same name, south of Thessalonica, to which latter place its inhabitants were transplanted by Cassander.

CISTHENE (Κισθήνη). 1. A town on the coast of Mysia, on the promontory of Pyrrha, on the Gulf of Adramyttium.—2. (Now Castel-Rosso), an island and town on the coast of Lycia.—3. In the mythical geography of Æschylus (Prom., 799) the "plains of Cisthene" are made the abode of the Gorgons.

CITHÆRON (Κιθαρόν: now Citharon, and its highest summit Elatia), a lofty range of mountains, separated Bœotia from Megaris and Attica. It was covered with wood, abounded in game, and was the scene of several celebrated legends in mythology. It was said to have derived its name from Cithæron, a mythical king of Bœotia. Its highest summit was sacred to the Cithæronian Jupiter (Zeus), and here was celebrated the festival called Dadala. Vid. Dict. of Ant. s. v.

CITHARISTA, a sea-port town (now Ceireste), and a promontory (now Cape d'Aigle) in Gallia Narbonensis, near Massilia.

CITIUM (Κίτιον: Κιτιεύς). 1. (Ruins near Larnea), one of the nine chief towns of Cyprus, with a harbor and salt-works, two hundred stadia from Salamis, near the mouth of the Tetus: here Cimón, the celebrated Athenian, died, and Zeuo, the founder of the Stoic school, was born.—2. A town in Macedonia, on a mountain Citius, northwest of Berea.

CIUS (Κίος: Κίος or Κεϊός, Ciānus: now Ghio, also Ghemlio and Kemlik). 1. An ancient city in Bithyia, on a bay of the Propontis called Ciānus Sinus, was colonized by the Milesians, and became a place of much commercial importance. It joined the Ætolian league, and was destroyed by Philip III., king of Macedonia, but was rebuilt by Prusias, king of Bithyia, from whom it was called PRUSIAS.—[2. A river of Lower Mœsia, flowing into the Ister or Danube.]

[CIVICA CEREREALIS, under the Emperor Domitian, proconsul of Asia: he was put to death by the emperor's orders, just before A.D. 90.]

CIVILIS, CLAUDIUS, sometimes called JULIUS, the leader of the Batavi in their revolt from Rome, A.D. 69–70. He was of the Batavian royal race, and, like Hannibal and Sertorius, had lost an eye. His brother, Julius Paulus, was put to death on a false charge of treason by Fonteius Capito (A.D. 67 or 68), who sent Civilis in chains to Nero at Rome, where he was heard and acquitted by Galba. He was afterward prefect of a cohort, but under Vitellius he became an object of suspicion to the army, and with difficulty escaped with his life. He vowed vengeance. His countrymen, who were shamefully treated by the officers of Vitellius, were easily induced to revolt, and they were joined by the Canninefates and Frisii. He took up arms under pretence of supporting the cause of Vespasian, and defeated in succession the generals of Vitellius in Gaul and Germany, but he continued in open revolt even after the death of Vitellius. In 70 Civilis gained fresh victories over the Romans, but was at length defeated in the course of the year by Petilius Cerealis, who had been sent into Germany with an immense army. Peace was concluded with the Batavi on terms favorable to the latter, but we do not know what became of Civilis.

CIZARA (Κίζαρα), a mountain fortress in the district of Phazemonitis in Pontus; once a royal residence, but destroyed before Strabo's time.

CLADĀUS (Κλάδαος or Κλάδεος), a river in Elis, flows into the Alphæus at Olympia.

CLAMPETĪA, called by the Greeks LAMPETIA (Λαμπητία, Λαμπέτεια), a town of Brutium, on the western coast: in ruins in Pliny's time.

CLANIS. 1. (Now Chiano), a river of Etruria, rises south of Arretium, forms two small lakes near Clusium, west of Lake Trasimenum, and flows into the Tiber east of Vulturnus.—2. The more ancient name of the Liris.—3. (Now Glan in Steiermark), a river in the Noric Alps.

CLANICUS. Vid. LITERNUS.

CLĀRUS (ἡ Κλάρος: ruins near Zille), a small town on the Ionian coast, near Colophon, with a celebrated temple and oracle of Apollo, surnamed Clarius.

[CLĀRUS, one of the companions of Æneus.]

CLARUS, SEX. ERUCIUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, fought under Trajan in the East, and took Seleucia, A.D. 115. His son Sextus was a patron of literature, and was consul under Antoninus Pius, A.D. 146.

CLASSICUS, JULIUS, a distinguished man of the Treviri, was prefect of an ala of the Treviri in the Roman army under Vitellius, A.D. 69, but afterward joined Civilis in his rebellion against the Romans. Vid. CIVILIS.

CLASTĪDIUM (now Casteggio or Schiateggio), a fortified town of the Auanes in Gallia Cispadana, not far from the Po, on the road from Dertona to Placentia.

CLATERNA, a fortified town in Gallia Cispadana, not far from Bononia: its name is retained in the small river Quaderna.

CLAUDĪA. 1. QUIŪTA, a Roman matron, not a Vestal Virgin, as is frequently stated. When the vessel conveying the image of Cybele from Pessinus to Rome had stuck fast in a shallow at the mouth of the Tiber, the soothsayers announced that only a chaste woman could move it. Claudia, who had been accused of incontinence, took hold of the rope, and the vessel forthwith followed her, B.C. 204.—2. Or CLONIA, eldest of the three sisters of P. Clodius Pulcher, the enemy of Cicero, married Q. Mareius rex.—3. Or CLODIA, second sister of P. Clodius, married Q. Metellus Celer, but became infamous for her debaucheries, and was suspected of having poisoned her husband. Cicero in his letters frequently calls her Βοῶπις.—4. Or CLODIA, youngest sister of P. Clodius, married L. Lucullus, to whom she proved unfaithful. All three sisters are said to have had incestuous intercourse with their brother Publius.

CLAUDIÆ GENS, patrician and plebeian. The patrician Claudii were of Sabine origin, and came to Rome in B.C. 504, when they were received among the patricians. Vid. CLAUDIUS, No. 1. They were noted for their pride and haughtiness, their disdain for the laws, and their hatred of the plebeians. They bore various surnames, which are given under CLAUDIUS, with the exception of those with the cognomen NERO, who are better known under the latter name. The Plebeian Claudii were divided into several families, of which the most celebrated was that of MARCELLUS.

CLAUDIÆUS, CLAUDIUS, the last of the Latin classic poets, flourished under Theodosius and his sons Arcadius and Honorius. He was a native of Alexandria, and removed to Rome, where we find him in A.D. 395. He enjoyed the patronage of the all-powerful Stilicho, by whom he was raised to offices of honor and emolument. A statue was erected to his honor in the Forum of Trajan by Arcadius and Honorius, the inscription on which was discovered at Rome in the fifteenth century. He also enjoyed the patronage of the Empress Serena, through whose interposition he gained a wealthy wife. The last historical allusion in his writings belongs to 404; whence it is supposed that he may have been involved in the misfortunes of Stilicho, who was put to death in 408. He was a heathen. His extant works are, 1. The three panegyrics on the third, fourth, and sixth consulships of Honorius. 2. A poem on the nuptials of Honorius and Maria. 3. Four short Peseennine lays on the same subject. 4. A panegyric on the consulship of Probinus and Olybrius. 5. The praises of Stilicho, in two books, and a panegyric on his consulship, in one book. 6. The praises of Serena, the wife of Stilicho. 7. A panegyric on the consulship of Flavius Mallius Theodorus. 8. The Epithalamium of Palladius and Celerina. 9. An invective against Rufinus, in two books. 10. An invective against Eutropius, in two books. 11. De Bello Gildonico, the first book of an historical poem on the war in Africa against Gildo. 12. De Bello Getico, an historical poem on the successful campaign of Stilicho against Alaric and the Goths, concluding with the battle of Pollentia. 13. Raptus Proserpine, three books of an unfinished epic on the rape of Proserpina. 14. Gigantomachia, a fragment extending to one hundred and twenty-eight lines only. 15. Five short epistles. 16. Eidyllia a collection of seven poems, chiefly on subjects connected with natural history. 17. Epigrammata, a collection of short occasional pieces. The Christian hymns found among his poems in most editions are certainly spurious. The poems of Claudian are distinguished by purity of language and real poetical genius. The best edition is by Burmann, Amst., 1760.

CLAUDIŪPŪLIS (Κλαυδιόπολις), the name of some cities called after the Emperor Claudius, the chief of which were, 1. In Bithynia (vid. BITHYNIUM). 2. A colony in the district of Cætonia, in Cappadocia.

CLAUDIŪS, patrician. Vid. CLAUDIA GENS. 1. APP. CLAUDIŪS SABINŪS REGILENSIS, a Sabine of the town of Regillum or Regilli, who in his own country bore the name of Attus Clausus, being the advocate of peace with the Romans, when hostilities broke out between the two nations, withdrew with a large train of followers to Rome, B.C. 504. He was received into the ranks of the patricians, and lands beyond the Anio were assigned to his followers, who were formed into a new tribe called the Claudian. He exhibited the characteristics which marked his descendants, and showed the most bitter hatred toward the plebeians. He was consul 495, and his conduct toward the plebeians led to their secession to the Mons Sacer, 494.—2. APP. CL. SAB. REGILL, son of No. 1, consul 471, treated the soldiers whom he commanded with such severity that his troops deserted him. Next year he was impeached by two of the tribunes, but, according to the common story, he died or killed himself before the trial.—3. C. CL. SAB. REGILL, brother of No. 2, consul 460, when App. Herdonius seized the Capitol. Though a staunch supporter of the Patricians, he warned the decemvir Appius against an immoderate use of his power. His remonstrances being of no avail, he withdrew to Regillum, but returned to defend Appius when impeached.—4. APP. CL. CRASSUS REGILL SAB, the decemvir, commonly considered son of No. 2, but more probably the same person. He was consul 451, and on the appointment of the decemvirs in that year, he became one of them, and was reappointed the following year. His real character now betrayed itself in the most tyrannous conduct toward the plebeians, till his attempt against Virginia led to the overthrow of the decemvirate. Appius was impeached by Virginius, but did not live to abide his trial. He either killed himself, or was put to death in prison by order of the tribunes.—5. APP. CLAUDIUS CÆCUS, became blind before his old age. In his censorship (312), to which he was elected without having been consul previously, he built the Appian aqueduct, and commenced the Appian road, which was continued to Capua. He retained the censorship four years in opposition to the law which limited the length of the office to eighteen months. He was twice consul in 307 and 296; and in the latter year he fought against the Samnites and Etruscans. In his old age, Appius, by his eloquent speech, induced the senate to reject the terms of peace which Cineas had proposed on behalf of Pyrrhus. Appius was the earliest Roman writer in prose and verse whose name has come down to us. He was the author of a poem known to Cicero through the Greek, and he also wrote a legal treatise, De Usurpationibus. He left four sons and five daughters. [Some fragments of his speeches are given by Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta, Zurich, 1842, p. 105-6.]—6. APP. CL. CADEX, brother of No. 5, derived his surname from his attention to naval affairs. He was consul 264, and conducted the war against the Carthaginians in Sicily.—7. P. CL. PULCHER, son of No. 5, consul 249, attacked the Carthaginian fleet in the harbor of Drepanum, in defiance of the auguries, and was defeated, with the loss of almost all his forces. He was recalled and commanded to appoint a dictator, and thereupon named M. Claudius Glycias or Glicia, the son of a freedman, but the nomination was immediately superseded. He was impeached and condemned.—8. C. CL. CENHO or CENTO, son of No. 5, consul 240, and dictator 213.—9. TIB. CL. NERO, son of No. 5. An account of his descendants is given under NERO.—10. APP. CL. PULCHER, son of No. 7, ædile 217, fought at Cannæ 216, and was prætor 215, when he was sent into Sicily. He was consul 212, and died 211 of a wound which he received in a battle with Hannibal before Capua.—11. APP. CL. PULCHER, son of No. 10, served in Greece for some years under Flaminius, Bæbius, and Glabrio (197-191). He was prætor 187 and consul 185, when he gained some advantages over the Ingaunian Ligurians. He was sent as ambassador to Greece 184 and 176.—12. P. CL. PULCHER, brother of No. 11, curule ædile 189, prætor 188, and consul 184.—13. C. CL. PULCHER, brother of Nos. 11 and 12, prætor 180 and consul 177, when he defeated the Istrians and Ligurians. He was censor 160 with Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus. He died 167.—14. APP. CL. CENHO, ædile 178 and prætor 175, when he fought with success against the Celtiberi in Spain. He afterward served in Thessaly (173), Macedonia (172), and Illyricum (170).—15. APP. CL. PULCHER, son of No. 11, consul 143, defeated the Salassi, an Alpine tribe. On his return a triumph was refused him; and when one of the tribunes attempted to drag him from his car, his daughter Claudia, one of the Vestal Virgins, walked by his side up to the Capitol. He was censor 136. He gave one of his daughters in marriage to Tiberius Gracchus, and in 133, with Tiberius and C. Gracchus, was appointed triumvir for the division of the lands. He died shortly after Tiberius Gracchus.—16. C. CLAUDIUS PULCHER, curule ædile 99, prætor in Sicily 95, consul in 92.—17. APP. CL. PULCHER, consul 79, and afterward governor of Macedonia.—18. APP. CL. PULCHER, prætor 89, belonged to Sulla's party, and perished in the great battle before Rome 82.—19. APP. CL. PULCHER, eldest son of No. 18. In 70 he served in Asia under his brother-in-law Lucullus; in 57 he was prætor, and though he did not openly oppose Cicero's recall from banishment, he tacitly abetted the proceedings of his brother Publius. In 56 he was proprætor in Sardinia; and in 54 was consul with L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, when a reconciliation was brought about between him and Cicero, through the intervention of Pompey. In 53 he went as proconsul to Cilicia, which he governed with tyranny and rapacity. In 51 he was succeeded in the government by Cicero, whose appointment Appius received with displeasure. On his return to Rome he was impeached by Dolabella, but was acquitted. In 50 he was censor with L. Piso, and expelled several of Cæsar's friends from the senate. On the breaking out of the civil war, 49, he fled with Pompey from Italy, and died in Greece before the battle of Pharsalia. He was an augur, and wrote a work on the augural discipline which he dedicated to Cicero. He was also distinguished for his legal and antiquarian knowledge.—20. C. CL. PULCHER, second son of No. 18, was a legatus of Cæsar, 58, prætor 56, and proprætor in Asia 55. On his return he was accused of extortion by M. Servilius, who was bribed to drop the prosecution. He died shortly afterward.—21. P. CL. PULCHER, usually called CLODIUS and not Claudius, the youngest son of No. 18, the notorious enemy of Cicero, and one of the most profligate characters of a profligate age. In 70 he served under his brother-in-law, L. Lucullus, in Asia; but, displeased at not being treated by Lucullus with the distinction he had expected, he encouraged the soldiers to mutiny. He then betook himself to his other brother-in-law, Q. Marcius Rex, proconsul in Cilicia, and was intrusted by him with the command of the fleet. He fell into the hands of the pirates, who, however, dismissed him without ransom, through fear of Pompey. He next went to Antioch, and joined the Syrians in making war on the Arabians. On his return to Rome in 66 he impeached Catiline for extortion in his government of Africa, but was bribed by Catiline to let him escape. In 64 he accompanied the proprætor L. Murena to Gallia Transalpinga, where he resorted to the most nefarious methods of procuring money. In 62 he profaned the mysteries of the Bona Dea, which were celebrated by the Roman matrons in the house of Cæsar, who was then prætor, by entering the house disguised as a female musician, in order to meet Pompeia, Cæsar's wife, with whom he had an intrigue. He was discovered, and next year, 61, when quæstor, was brought to trial, but obtained an acquittal by bribing the judges. He had attempted to prove an alibi, but Cicero's evidence showed that Clodius was with him in Rome only three hours before he pretended to have been at Interamna. Cicero attacked Clodius in the senate with great vehemence. In order to revenge himself upon Cicero, Clodius was adopted into a plebeian family that he might obtain the formidable power of a tribune of the plebs. He was tribune 58, and, supported by the triumvirs Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus, drove Cicero into exile; but, notwithstanding all his efforts, he was unable to prevent the recall of Cicero in the following year. Vid. CICERO. In 56 Clodius was ædile, and attempted to bring his enemy Milo to trial. Each had a large gang of gladiators in his pay, and frequent fights took place in the streets of Rome between the two parties. In 53, when Clodius was a candidate for the prætorship, and Milo for the consulship, the contests between them became more violent and desperate than ever. At length, on the 20th of January, 52, Clodius and Milo met, apparently by accident, on the Appian Road near Bovilla. An affray ensued between their fol lowers, in which Clodius was murdered. The mob was infuriated at the death of their favorite; and such tumults followed at the burial of Clodius, that Pompey was appointed sole consul in order to restore order to the state. For the proceedings which followed, vid. MILO. The second wife of Clodius was the notorious FULVIA.—22. APP. CL. PULCHER, the elder son of No. 20, was one of the accusers of Milo on the death of P. Clodius, 52.—23. APP. CL. PULCHER, brother of No. 22, joined his brother in prosecuting Milo. As the two brothers both bore the prænomen Appius, it is probable that one of them was adopted by their uncle Appius. vid. No. 19.—24. SEX. CLODIUS, probably a descendant of a freedman of the Claudia gens, was a man of low condition, and the chief instrument of P. Clodius in all his acts of violence. On the death of the latter in 52, he urged on the people to revenge the death of their leader. For his acts of violence on this occasion, he was brought to trial, was condemned, and after remaining in exile eight years, was restored in 44 by M. Antonius.

CLAUDIUS I., Roman emperor A.D. 41—54. His full name was TR. CLAUDIUS DRUSUS NERO GERMANICUS. He was the younger son of Drusus, the brother of the Emperor Tiberius, and of Antonia, and was born on August 1st, B.C. 10, at Lyons in Gaul. In youth he was weak and sickly, and was neglected and despised by his relatives. When he grew up he devoted the greater part of his time to literary pursuits, but was not allowed to take any part in public affairs. He had reached the age of fifty, when he was suddenly raised by the soldiers to the imperial throne after the murder of Caligula. Claudius was not cruel, but the weakness of his character made him the slave of his wives and freedmen, and thus led him to consent to acts of tyranny which he would never have committed of his own accord. He was married four times. At the time of his accession he was married to his third wife, the notorious Valeria Messalina, who governed him for some years, together with the freedman Narcissus, Pallas, and others. After the execution of Messalina, A.D. 48, a fate which she richly merited, Claudius was still more unfortunate in choosing for his wife his niece Agrippina. She prevailed upon him to set aside his own son, Britannicus, and to adopt her son, Nero, that she might secure the succession for the latter. Claudius soon after regretted this step, and was, in consequence, poisoned by Agrippina, 54. Several public works of great utility were executed by Claudius. He built, for example, the famous Claudian aqueduct (now Aqua Claudia), the port of Ostia, and the emissary by which the water of Lake Fucinus was carried into the River Liris. In his reign the southern part of Britain was made a Roman province, and Claudius himself went to Britain in 43, where he remained, however, only a short time, leaving the conduct of the war to his generals. Claudius wrote several historical works, all of which have perished. Of these, one of the most important was a history of Etruria, in the composition of which he made use of genuine Etruscan sources.

CLAUDIUS II. (M. AURELIUS CLAUDIUS, surnamed GOTHICUS), Roman emperor A.D. 268—

270, was descended from an obscure family in Dardania or Illyria, and by his military talents rose to distinction under Decius, Valerian, and Gallienus. He succeeded to the empire on the death of Gallienus (268), and soon after his accession defeated the Alemanni in the north of Italy. Next year he gained a great victory over an immense host of Goths near Naissus in Dardania, and received, in consequence, the surname Gothicus. He died at Sirmium in 270, and was succeeded by Aurelian.

ΚΛΑΥΔΙΩΝΕΣ (αἱ Κλαυδομεναί: Κλαυδομένους: now Kelisman), an important city of Asia Minor, and a member of the Ionian Dodecaepolis, lay on the northern coast of the Ionian peninsula, upon the Gulf of Smyrna. The city was said to have been founded by the Colophonians under Paralus, on the site of the later town of Chytrium, but to have been removed further east, as a defence against the Persians, to a small island, which Alexander afterward united to the main land by a causeway. It was one of the weaker members of the Ionian league, and was chiefly peopled, not by Ionians, but by Cleonæans and Phliasians. Under the Romans it was a free city. It had a considerable commerce, and was celebrated for its temple of Apollo, Diana (Artemis), and Cybele, and still more as the birth-place of Anaxagoras.

CLEANDER (Κλέανδρος). 1. Tyrant of Gela, reigned seven years, and was murdered B.C. 498. He was succeeded by his brother Hippocrates, one of whose sons was also called Cleander. The latter was deposed by Gelon when he seized the government, 491.—2. A Lacedæmonian, harmost at Byzantium, 400, when the Greek army of Cyrus under Xenophon returned from Asia.—3. One of Alexander's officers, was put to death by Alexander in Carmania, 325, in consequence of his oppressive government in Media.—4. A Phrygian slave, and subsequently the profligate favorite and minister of Commodus. In a popular tumult, occasioned by a scarcity of corn, he was torn to death by the mob.

[CLEANDRIDAS (Κλεανδρίδας), a Spartan general, who had to flee from his native land for having acted treacherously in a war with Athens. He was condemned to death, but fled to Tauris in Italy.]

[CLEANOR (Κλεάνωρ), an Arcadian of Orchomenus, served in the Greek army of Cyrus the younger; he took an active part in conducting the retreat along with Xenophon, after the assassination of Clearchus and the other generals.]

CLEANTHES (Κλεάνθης). 1. A Stoic, born at Assos in Troas about B.C. 300. He entered life as a boxer, and had only four drachmas of his own when he began to study philosophy. He first placed himself under Crates, and then under Zeno, whose disciple he continued for nineteen years. In order to support himself, he worked all night at drawing water from gardens; but as he spent the whole day in philosophical pursuits, and had no visible means of support, he was summoned before the Areopagus to account for his way of living. The judges were so delighted by the evidence of industry which he produced, that they voted him ten minæ, though Zeno would not permit him to accept them. He was naturally slow, but his iron industry overcame all difficulties; and on the death of Zeno in 263, Cleanthes succeeded him in his school. He died about 220, at the age of eighty, of voluntary starvation. A hymn of his to Jupiter (Zeus) is still extant, and contains some striking sentiments: edited by Sturz, 1785, and Mersdorf, Lips., 1835.—2. An ancient painter of Corinth, [mentioned among the inventors of that art by Pliny and Athenagoras.]

CLEARCHUS (Κλέαρχος). 1. A Spartan, distinguished himself in several important commands during the latter part of the Peloponnesian war, and at the close of it persuaded the Spartans to send him as general to Thrace, to protect the Greeks in that quarter against the Thracians. But having been recalled by the ephors, and refusing to obey their orders, he was condemned to death. He thereupon crossed over to Cyrus, collected for him a large force of Greek mercenaries, and marched with him into Upper Asia, 401, in order to dethrone his brother Artaxerxes, being the only Greek who was aware of the prince's real object. After the battle of Cunaxa and the death of Cyrus, Clearchus and the other Greek generals were made prisoners by the treachery of Tissaphernes, and were put to death.—2. A citizen of Heraclea on the Euxine, obtained the tyranny of his native town, B.C. 365, by putting himself at the head of the popular party. He governed with cruelty, and was assassinated 353, after a reign of twelve years. He is said to have been a pupil of Plato and of Isocrates.—3. Of Soli, one of Aristotle's pupils, author of a number of works, none of which are extant, on a great variety of subjects.—4. An Athenian poet of the new comedy, whose time is unknown. [His fragments are given by Meineke, Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. ii., p. 1168-9.]

[CLEARIDAS (Κλεαρίδας), a brave young Spartan, made governor of Amphipolis by Brasidas; he took part in the battle before Amphipolis between the Spartans and Athenians, in which both Brasidas and Cleon were killed. He afterward had the charge of surrendering the city to the Athenians, but gave it, in fact, to the Amphipolitans.]

CLEMENS. 1. T. FLAVIUS, cousin of the Emperor Domitian, by whom he was put to death. He appears to have been a Christian.—2. ROMĀNUS, bishop of Rome at the end of the first century, probably the same as the Clement whom St. Paul mentions (Phil., iv., 3). He wrote two epistles in Greek to the Corinthian Church, of which the first and part of the second are extant. The second, however, is probably not genuine. The Recognitions, which bear the name of Clement, were not written by him. The epistles are printed in the Patres Apostolici, of which the most convenient editions are by Jacobson, Oxford, 1838, and by Hefele, Tübingen, 1839.—3. ALEXANDRINUS, so called from his long residence at Alexandria, was ardently devoted in early life to the study of philosophy, which had a great influence upon his views of Christianity. He embraced Christianity through the teaching of Pantænus at Alexandria, was ordained presbyter about A.D. 190, and died about 220. Hence he flourished under the reigns of Severus and Caracalla, 193-217. His three principal works constitute parts of a whole. In the Hortatory Address to the Greeks (Δόγος Προτρεπτικός, &c.) his design was to convince the heathens and to convert them to Christianity. The Pedagogue (Παιδαγωγός) takes up the new convert at the point to which he is supposed to have been brought by the hortatory address, and furnishes him with rules for the regulation of his conduct. The Stromata (Στροματεῖς) are in eight books: the title (Stromata, i. e., patch-work) indicates its miscellaneous character. It is rambling and discursive, but contains much valuable information on many points of antiquity, particularly the history of philosophy. The principal information respecting Egyptian hieroglyphics is contained in the fifth book. The object of the work was to delineate the perfect Christian or Gnostic, after he had been instructed by the Teacher, and thus prepared by sublime speculations in philosophy and theology.—Editions: By Potter, Oxon., 1715, fol., 2 vols.; by Klotz, Lips., 1830-34, 12mo, 4 vols.

CLEŒBIS. Vid. BITON.

CLEOBŪLINE (Κλεοβουλίνη) or CLEOBŪLE (Κλεοβούλη), daughter of Cleobulus of Lindus, celebrated for her skill in riddles, of which she composed a number in hexameter verse; to her is ascribed a well-known one on the subject of the year: "A father has twelve children, and each of these thirty daughters, on one side white, and on the other side black, and though immortal they all die."

CLEOBŪLUS (Κλεοβούλος), one of the Seven Sages, of Lindus in Rhodes, son of Evagoras, lived about B.C. 580. He wrote lyric poems, as well as riddles, in verse; he was said by some to have been the author of the riddle on the year, generally attributed to his daughter Cleobuline. He was greatly distinguished for strength and beauty of person.

CLEŒCHĀRES (Κλεοχάρης), a Greek orator of Myrlea in Bithynia, contemporary with the orator Demochares and the philosopher Arcesilas, toward the close of the third century B.C.

[CLEODÆUS (Κλεοδαῖος), son of the Heraclid Hyllus, who, at the head of the Heraclids, made an unsuccessful attempt to conquer the Peloponnesus.]

CLEOMBROTUS (Κλεόμβροτος). 1. Son of Anaxandrides, king of Sparta, became regent after the battle of Thermopylæ, B.C. 480, for Plistarchus, infant son of Leonidas, but died in the same year, and was succeeded in the regency by his son Pausanias.—2. I. King of Sparta, son of Pausanias, succeeded his brother Agesipolis I., and reigned B.C. 380-371. He commanded the Spartan troops several times against the Thebans, and fell at the battle of Leuctra (371), after fighting most bravely.—3. II. King of Sparta, son-in-law of Leonidas II., in whose place he was made king by the party of Agis IV. about 243. On the return of Leonidas, Cleombrotus was deposed and banished to Tegea, about 240.—4. An Academic philosopher of Ambracia, said to have killed himself after reading the Phædon of Plato; not that he had any sufferings to escape from, but that he might exchange this life for a better.

CLEOMĒDES (Κλεομήδης). 1. Of the island Astypalæa, an athlete of gigantic strength.—2. A Greek mathematician, probably lived in the second and third centuries of the Christian era the author of a Greek treatise in two books on the Circular Theory of the Heavenly Bodies (Κυκλικῆς Θεωρίας Μετεώρων Βίβλια δύο), which is still extant. It is rather an exposition of the system of the universe than of the geometrical principles of astronomy: edited by Balfour, Burdighal, 1605; by Bake, Lugd. Bat., 1820; and by Schmidt, Lips., 1832.

CLEOMĒNES (Κλεομένης). 1. King of Sparta, son of Anaxandrides, reigned B.C. 520-491. He was a man of an enterprising but wild character. His greatest exploit was his defeat of the Argives, in which six thousand Argive citizens fell; but the date of this event is doubtful. In 510 he commanded the forces by whose assistance Hippias was driven from Athens, and not long after he assisted Isagoras and the aristocratical party against Clisthenes. By bribing the priestess at Delphi, he effected the deposition of his colleague DEMARATUS, 491. Soon afterward he was seized with madness and killed himself.—2. King of Sparta, son of Cleombrotus I., reigned 370-309; but during this long period we have no information about him of any importance.—3. King of Sparta, son of Leonidas II., reigned 236-222. While still young, he married Agiatis, the widow of Agis IV.; and following the example of the latter, he endeavored to restore the ancient Spartan constitution, and to regenerate the Spartan character. He was endowed with a noble mind, strengthened and purified by philosophy, and possessed great energy of purpose. His first object was to gain for Sparta her old renown in war; and for that purpose he attacked the Achæans, and carried on war with the league with great success. Having thus gained military renown, he felt himself sufficiently strong in the winter of 226-225 to put the ephors to death and restore the ancient constitution. The Achæans now called in the aid of Antigonus Dosis, king of Macedonia, and for the next three years Cleomenes carried on war against their united forces. He was at length completely defeated at the battle of Sellasia (222), and fled to Egypt, where he was kindly received by Ptolemy Euergetes, but on the death of that king he was imprisoned by his successor Philopator. He escaped from prison, and attempted to raise an insurrection, but finding no one join him, he put himself to death, 220.

CLEOMĒNES. 1. A Greek of Naucratis in Egypt, appointed by Alexander the Great uo-march of the Arabian district (νομαρχ) of Egypt, and receiver of the tribute from the districts of Egypt, B.C. 331. His rapacity knew no bounds, and he collected immense wealth by his extortions. After Alexander's death he was put to death by Ptolemy, who took possession of his treasures.—2. A sculptor, son of Apollodorus of Athens, executed the celebrated statue of the Venus de Medici, as appears from an inscription on the pedestal. He lived between B.C. 363 and 146.

CLEON (Κλέων) son of Cleænetus, was originally a tanner, and first came forward in public as an opponent of Pericles. On the death of this great man, B.C. 429, Cleon became the favorite of the people, and for about six years of the Peloponnesian war (428-422) was the head of the party opposed to peace. He is represented by Aristophanes as a demagogue of the lowest kind, mean, ignorant, cowardly, and venal; and this view of his character is confirmed by Thucydides. But much weight can not be attached to the satire of the poet; and the usual impartiality of the historian may have been warped by the sentence of his banishment, if it be true, as has been conjectured with great probability, that it was through Cleon that Thucydides was sent into exile. Cleon may be considered as the representative of the middle classes of Athens, and by his ready, though somewhat coarse eloquence, gained great influence over them. In 427 he strongly advocated in the assembly that the Mytilenæans should be put to death. In 424 he obtained his greatest glory by taking prisoners the Spartans in the island of Sphacteria, and bringing them in safety to Athens. Puffed up by this success, he obtained the command of an Athenian army, to oppose Brasidas in Thrace; but he was defeated by Brasidas, under the walls of Amphipolis, and fell in the battle, 422. The chief attack of Aristophanes upon Cleon was in the Knights (424), in which Cleon figures as an actual dramatis persona, and, in default of an artificer bold enough to make the mask, was represented by the poet himself with his face smeared with wine lees.

CLEΩΝÆ (Κλεωναί: Κλεωναίος). 1. An ancient town in Argolis, on the road from Corinth to Argos, on a river of the same name which flows into the Corinthian Gulf, and at the foot of Mount Apesas; said to have been built by Cleones, son of Pelops.—2. A town in the peninsula Athos in Chalcidice.—3. Vid. ΗΥΑΜΠΟΛΙΣ.

CLEONŶMUS (Κλεώνυμος). 1. An Athenian, frequently attacked by Aristophanes as a pestilent demagogue.—2. A Spartan, son of Sphodrias, much beloved by Archidamus, the son of Agesilaus: he fell at Leuctra, B.C. 371.—3. Younger son of Cleomenes II., king of Sparta, was excluded from the throne on his father's death, 309, in consequence of his violent and tyrannical temper. In 303 he crossed over to Italy to assist the Tarentines against the Lucanians. He afterward withdrew from Italy, and seized Corcyra; and in 272 he invited Pyrrhus to attempt the conquest of Sparta. Vid. ΑCΡΟΤΑΤΥΣ.—[4. A Theban, celebrated for his victories at the Isthmian games.]

CLEOPATRA (Κλεοπάτρα). 1. (Myth.) Daughter of Idas and Marpessa, and wife of Meleager, is said to have hanged herself after her husband's death, or to have died of grief. Her real name was Alcyone.—2. (Hist.) Niece of Attalus, married Philip, B.C. 337, on whose murder she was put to death by Olympias.—3. Daughter of Philip and Olympias, and sister of Alexander the Great, married Alexander, king of Epirus, 336. It was at the celebration of her nuptials that Philip was murdered. Her husband died 326. After the death of her brother she was sought in marriage by several of his generals, and at length promised to marry Ptolemy; but, having attempted to escape from Sardis, where she had been kept for years in a state of honorable captivity, she was assassinated by Antigonus.—4. Daughter of Antiochus III. the Great, married Ptolemy V. Epiphanes, 193.—5. Daughter of Ptolemy V. Epiphanes and No. 4, married her brother Ptolemy VI. Philometor, and on his death, 146, her other brother Ptolemy VI. Physcon. She was soon afterward divorced by Physcon, and fled into Syria.—6. Daughter of Ptolemy VI. Philometor and of No. 5, married first Alexander Balas (150), the Syrian usurper, and on his death Demetrius Nicator. During the captivity of the latter in Parthia, jealous of the connection which he there formed with Rhodogune, the Parthian princess, she married Antiochus VII. Sidetes, his brother, and also murdered Demetrius on his return. She likewise murdered Seleucus, her son by Nicator, who, on his father's death, assumed the government without her consent. Her other son by Nicator, Antiochus VIII. Grypus, succeeded to the throne (125) through her influence; and he compelled her to drink the poison which she had prepared for him also. Vid. ANTIOCHUS VIII. She had a son by Sidetes, Antiochus IX., surnamed Cyzicenus.—7. Another daughter of Ptolemy VI. Philometor and No. 5, married her uncle Physcon when the latter divorced her mother. On the death of Physcon she reigned in conjunction with her elder son, Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrus, and then in conjunction with her younger son Alexander. She was put to death by the latter in 89.—8. Daughter of Ptolemy Physcon and No. 7, married first her brother Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrus, and next Antiochus IX. Cyzicenus. She was put to death by Tryphæna, her own sister, wife of Antiochus Grypus.—9. Usually called SELENE, another daughter of Ptolemy Physcon, married first her brother Lathyrus (on her sister No. 8 being divorced); secondly, Antiochus XI. Epiphanes; and thirdly, Antiochus X. Eusebes.—10. Daughter of Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrus, usually called Berenice. Vid. BERENICE, No. 4.—11. Eldest daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, celebrated for her beauty and fascination, was seventeen at the death of her father (51), who appointed her heir of his kingdom in conjunction with her younger brother, Ptolemy, whom she was to marry. She was expelled from the throne by Pothinus and Aehillas, his guardians. She retreated into Syria, and there collected an army, with which she was preparing to enter Egypt, when Cæsar arrived in Egypt in pursuit of Pompey, 47. Her charms gained for her the support of Cæsar, who replaced her on the throne in conjunction with her brother. This led to the Alexandrine war, in the course of which young Ptolemy perished. Cleopatra thus obtained the undivided rule. She was, however, associated by Cæsar with another brother of the same name, and still quite a child, to whom she was also nominally married. She had a son by Cæsar, called CÆSARION, and she afterward followed him to Rome, where she appears to have been at the time of his death, 44. She then returned to Egypt, and in 41 she met Antony in Cilicia. She was now in her twenty-eighth year, and in the perfection of matured beauty, which, in conjunction with her talents and eloquence, completely won the heart of Antony, who henceforth appears as her devoted lover and slave. He returned with her to Egypt, but was obliged to leave her for a short time, in order to marry Octavia, the sister of Octavianus. But Octavia was never able to gain his affections; he soon deserted his wife and returned to Cleopatra, upon whom he conferred the most extravagant titles and honors. In the war between Octavianus and Antony, Cleopatra accompanied her lover, and was present at the battle of Actium (31), in the midst of which she retreated with her fleet, and thus hastened the loss of the day. She fled to Alexandria, where she was joined by Antony. Seeing Antony's fortunes desperate, she entered into negotiations with Augustus, and promised to make away with Antony. She fled to a mausoleum she had built, and then caused a report of her death to be spread. Antony, resolving not to survive her, stabbed himself, and was drawn up into the mausoleum, where he died in her arms. She then tried to gain the love of Augustus, but her charms failed in softening his colder heart. Seeing that he was determined to carry her captive to Rome, she put an end to her own life, either by the poison of an asp, or by a poisoned comb, the former supposition being adopted by most writers. She died in the thirty-ninth year of her age (B.C. 30), and with her ended the dynasty of the Ptolemies in Egypt, which was now made a Roman province.—12. Daughter of Antony and No. 11, born with her twin brother Alexander in 40, along with whom she was carried to Rome after the death of her parents. Augustus married her to Juba, king of Numidia.—13. A daughter of Mithradates, married Tigranes, king of Armenia.

CLEOPATRIS. Vid. ARESINOË, No. 6.

CLĒOPHON (Κλεοφών), an Athenian demagogue, of obscure, and, according to Aristophanes, of Thracian origin, vehemently opposed peace with Sparta in the latter end of the Peloponnesian war. During the siege of Athens by Lysander, B.C. 404, he was brought to trial by the aristocratical party, and was condemned and put to death.

[CLEOPOMPUS (Κλεόπομπος), son of Clinias, a leader of the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war.]

CLEOSTRĀTUS (Κλεόστρατος), an astronomer of Tenedos, said to have introduced the division of the zodiac into signs, probably lived between B.C. 548 and 432.

CLEVUM, also GLEVUM and GLEBON (now Gloucester), a Roman colony in Britain.

CLĪDES (αἱ Κλειδες: now Cape S. Andre), "the Keys," a promontory on the northeast of Cyprus, with two islands of the same name lying off it.

CLIMAX (Κλίμαξ: now Ekder), the name applied to the western termination of the Taurus range, which extends along the western coast of the Pamphylian Gulf, north of Phaselis in Lyeia. Alexander made a road between it and the sea. There were other mountains of the same name in Asia and Africa.

CLIMBERRUM. Vid. AUSOI.

CLINIAS (Κλεινίας) 1. Father of the famous Aleibiades, fought at Artemisium B.C. 480, in a ship built and manned at his own expense: he fell 447, at the battle of Coronea.—2. A younger brother of the famous Alcibiades.—3. Father of Aratus of Sicyon, was murdered by Abantidas, who seized the tyranny, 264.—4. A

Pythagorean philosopher of Tarentum, a contemporary and friend of Plato. [A fragment of his writings, preserved by Stobæus, is given in Orelli's Opusc. Græc. Vett. Sent., ii, p. 324.]

CLIO. Vid. MUSÆ.

CLISTHÈNES (Κλεισθένης). 1. Tyrant of Sicily. In B.C. 595, he aided the Amphictyons in the sacred war against Cirrha, which ended, after ten years, in the destruction of the guilty city. He also engaged in war with Argos. His death can not be placed earlier than 582, in which year he won the victory in the chariot-race at the Pythian games. His daughter Agarista was given in marriage to Megacles the Alæmonid.—2. An Athenian, son of Megacles and Agarista, and grandson of No. 1, appears as the head of the Alæmonid clan on the banishment of the Pisistratidæ. Finding, however, that he could not cope with his political rival Isagoras except through the aid of the commons, he set himself to increase the power of the latter. The principal change which he introduced was the abolition of the four ancient tribes and the establishment of ten new ones in their stead, B.C. 510. He is also said to have instituted ostracism. Isagoras and his party called in the aid of the Spartans, but Clistheus and his friends eventually triumphed.—3. An Athenian, whose foppish and effeminate profligacy brought him under the lash of Aristophanes.

[CLITAGÓRA (Κλειταγόρα), a lyric poetess of Laconia or Thessaly, mentioned in the Vespæ of Aristophanes.]

CLITARCHUS (Κλειταρχος). 1. Tyrant of Eretria in Eubœa, was supported by Philip against the Athenians, but was expelled from Eretria by Phœon, B.C. 341.—2. Son of the historian Dinon, accompanied Alexander the Great in his Asiatic expedition, and wrote a history of it. This work was deficient in veracity and inflated in style, but appears nevertheless to have been much read. [The fragments of his history are collected by Geier, Alex. Hist. Scrip., p. 160—90.]

CLITERNUM or CLITERNIA (Cliternius), a town of the Frentani, in the territory of Larinum.

CLITOMACHUS (Κλειτόμαχος). 1. A Carthaginian by birth, and called Hasdrubal in his own language, came to Athens in the fortieth year of his age, and there studied under Carneades, on whose death he became the head of the New Academy, B.C. 129. Of his works, which amounted to four hundred books, only a few titles are preserved. His main object in writing them was to make known the philosophy of his master Carneades. When Carthage was taken in 146, he wrote a work to console his unfortunate countrymen.—[2. A Theban athlete, who gained several victories at the Olympian and Pythian games.—3. Of Ægina, an athlete who conquered in wrestling at the Isthmian games.]

CLITON or CLITONIUM (Κλειτών: Κλειτόριος: ruins near Mazi), a town in the north of Arcadia, on a river of the same name, a tributary of the Aroanius: there was a fountain in the neighborhood, the waters of which are said to have given to persons who drank of them a dislike for wine. (Ōv., Mel., xv., 322.)

CLITUMNUS (now Clitumno), a small river in Umbria, springs from a beautiful rock in a grove of cypress-trees, where was a sanctuary of the god Clitumnus, and falls into the Tinia, a tributary of the Tiber.

CLITUS (Κλειτός or Κλειτός). [1. (Mythological) A Trojan, son of Pisenor, slain by Teucer.—2. Son of Mantius, carried off by Aurora on account of his beauty.]—3. (Historical) Son of Bardylis, king of Illyria, defeated by Alexander the Great, B.C. 335.—4 A Macedonian, one of Alexander's generals and friends, surnamed the Black (Μέλας). He saved Alexander's life at the battle of Granicus, 334. In 328 he was slain by Alexander at a banquet when both parties were heated with wine, and Clitus had provoked the king's resentment by insolent language. Alexander was inconsolable at his friend's death.—5. Another of Alexander's officers, surnamed the White (Λευκός), to distinguish him from the above.—6. An officer who commanded the Macedonian fleet for Antipater in the Lamian war, 323, and defeated the Athenian fleet. In 321 he obtained from Antipater the satrapy of Lydia, from which he was expelled by Antigonus, 319. He afterward commanded the fleet of Polysperchon, and was at first successful, but his ships were subsequently destroyed by Antigonus, and he was killed on shore, 318.

CLOACĪNA or CLUACĪNA, the "Purifier" (from cloare or clvere, "to wash" or "purify"), a surname of Venus at Rome.

[CLOANTHES, one of the followers of Æneas, from whom the Roman Cluentii pretended to deduce the origin of their name and family.]

[CLODIA. Vid. CLAUDIA.]

CLŌDIUS, another form of the name Claudius, just as we find both caudex and codex, claustrum and clostrum, cauda and coda. Vid. CLAUDIUS.

CLŌDIUS ALBINUS. Vid. ALBINUS.

CLŌDIUS MACER. Vid. MACER.

CLÆLIA, a Roman virgin, one of the hostages given to Porsena, is said to have escaped from the Etruscan camp, and to have swum across the Tiber to Rome. She was sent back by the Romans to Porsena, who was so struck with her gallant deed that he not only set her at liberty, but allowed her to take with her a part of the hostages. Porsena also rewarded her with a horse adorned with splendid trappings, and the Romans with the statue of a female on horseback, which was erected in the Sacred Way.

CLÆLIA or CLUĪLIA GENS, of Alban origin, said to have been received among the patricians on the destruction of Alba. A few of its members, with the surname Sculus, obtained the consulship in the early years of the republic.

CLONAS (Κλονάς), a poet, and one of the earliest musicians of Greece, either an Arcadian or a Bœotian, probably lived about B.C. 620.

CLŌNIUS (Κλώνιος). 1. A leader of the Bœotians in the war against Troy, slain by Agenor.—[2. A companion of Æneas, slain by Turnus.—3. Another companion of Æneas, slain by Messapus.]

[CLONUS, an artist mentioned by Virgil as the maker of a belt presented to Pallas, son of Evander, on which were represented in gold the fifty daughters of Danaus.]

CLOTA ÆSTUĀRIUM (now Frith of Clyde), on the western coast of Scotland.

LOTHO. Vid. MOIRÆ.

CLUENTIUS HABITUS, A., of Larinum, accused in B.C. 74 his own step-father, Staius Albius Oppianicus, of having attempted to procure his death by poison. Oppianicus was condemned, and it was generally believed that the judges had been bribed by Cluentius. In 66, Cluentius was himself accused by young Oppianicus, son of Staius Albius, who had died in the interval, of three distinct acts of poisoning. He was defended by Cicero in the oration still extant.

CLŪNĪA (ruins on a hill between Corūna del Conde and Pennalba de Castro), a town of the Arevacæ in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a Roman colony.

CLŪPĒA or CLŪPĒA. Vid. ASPIS.

CLUSIUM (Clusinus: now Chiusi), one of the most powerful of the twelve Etruscan cities, situated on an eminence above the River Clanis, and southwest of the LACUS CLUSINUS (now Lago di Chiusi). It was more anciently called CAMERS or CAMARS, whence we may conclude that it was founded by the Umbrian race of the Camertes. It was the royal residence of Persena, and in its neighborhood was the celebrated sepulchre of this king in the form of a labyrinth, of which such marvellous accounts have come down to us. (Vid. Dict. of Ant. art. LABYRINTHUS.) Subsequently Clusium was in alliance with the Romans, by whom it was regarded as a bulwark against the Gauls. Its siege by the Gauls, B.C. 391, led, as is well known, to the capture of Rome itself by the Gauls. Clusium probably became a Roman colony, since Pliny speaks of Clusini Veteres et Novi. In its neighborhood were warm baths. (Hor., Ep., i, 15, 9.)

CLŪSĪUS (now Chiese), a river in Cisalpine Gaul, a tributary of the Ollius, forming the boundary between the Cenomani and Insubres.

CLUVIUS, a family of Campanian origin, of which the most important person was M. CLUVIUS RUFUS, consul suffectus A.D. 45, and governor of Spain under Galba, A.D. 69, on whose death he espoused the cause of Vitellius. He was an historian, and wrote an account of the times of Nero, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius.

CLYMĒNE (Κλυμένη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and wife of Iapetus, to whom she bore Atlas, Prometheus, and others.—2. Daughter of Iphis or Minyas, wife of Phylæus or Cephalus, to whom she bore Iphiclus and Aleimede. According to Hesiod and others, she was the mother of Phaëthon by Helios.—3. A relative of Menelaus and a companion of Helena, with whom she was carried off by Paris.—[4. Daughter of Catreus, mother of Palamedes.—5. One of the Nereids enumerated by Homer (Il., xviii., 47.)]

[CLYMĒNUS. 1. King of the Minyæ, in Orchomenos; he was slain by the Thebans at a festival of Neptune (Poseidon) at Thebes.—2. Son of Cæneus, king of Arcadia, married Epicaeste of Argos, by whom he had Harpalæe and several other children.—3. A companion of Phineus at the nuptials of Perseus.]

[CLYSŌNŪMUS (Κλυσώνυμος), son of Amphidamas of Opus, was unintentionally slain by Patroclus, who had to seek refuge on this account at the court of Pelæus.]

CLYTEMNESTRA (Κλυταιμνήστρα), daughter of Tyndareus and Leda, sister of Castor, and half-sister of Pollux and Helena. She was married to Agamemnon. During her husband's absence at Troy she lived in adultery with Ægisthus, and on his return to Mycenæ she murdered him with the help of Ægisthus. Vid. AGAMEMNON. She was subsequently put to death by her son Orestes, who thus avenged the murder of his father. For details, vid. ORESTES.

[CLYTIÉ (Κλυτία, Ion. Κλυτή). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys.—2. A female beloved by Apollo, died from grief at the unfaithfulness of that god, and was changed by him into a heliotrope.—3. Mother of King Chaleon in the island of Cos.]

[CLYTIUS (Κλυτίος). 1. Son of Laomedon, brother of Priam.—2. Son of Alemæon and father of Piræus.—3. Son of the Cæbalion king Eurytus, slain by Æetes in the Argonautic expedition.—4. A partisan of Phineus, slain by Theseus.—5. One of the companions of Æneas, son of Æolus, slain by Turnus. Two other heroes of this name are mentioned in the Æneid.]

[CLYTOMĒDES (Κλυτομήδης), son of Enops, conquered by Nestor in boxing.]

[CLYTONĒUS (Κλυτόνηος), son of King Alcinous, surpassed all his contemporaries in running.]

CNĒMIS (Κνημῖς), a range of mountains on the frontiers of Phocis and Loeris, from which the northern Loerians were called Epimenidii. A branch of these mountains runs out into the sea, forming the promontory CNĒMIDES (Κνημίδες) with a town of the same name upon it, opposite the promontory Cænæum in Eubœa.

CNĒPH (Κνήφ) or CNŪPHIS (Κνωφίς), an Egyptian divinity, worshipped in the form of a serpent, and regarded as the creator of the world.

CNĪDUS or GNĪDUS (Κνίδος; Κνίδιος; ruins at Cape Κνίδο), a celebrated city of Asia Minor, on the promontory of Triopium, on the coast of Caria, was a Lacedæmonian colony, and the chief city of the Dorian Hexapolis. It was built partly on the main land and partly on an island joined to the coast by a causeway, and had two harbors. It had a considerable commerce; and it was resorted to by travellers from all parts of the civilized world, that they might see the statue of Venus (Aphrodite) by Praxiteles, which stood in her temple here. The city possessed also temples of Apollo and Neptune (Poseidon.) The great naval defeat of Pisander by Conon (B.C. 394) took place off Cnidus. Among the celebrated natives of the city were Ctesias, Eudoxus, Sostratus, and Agatharchides. It is said to have been also called, at an early period, Triopia, from its founder Triopas, and, in later times, Stadia.

CNŌSUS or GNŌSUS, subsequently CNOSSUS or GNOSSUS (Κνωσός, Γνωσός, Κνωσσός, Γνωσσός; Κνώσιος, Κνώσιος; now Μακρο Τεϊκίη), an ancient town of Crete, and the capital of King Minos, was situated in a fertile country on the River CÆRATUS (which was originally the name of the tow), at a short distance from the northern coast. It was at any early time colonized by Dorians, and from it Dorian institutions spread over the island. Its power was weakened by the growing importance of Gortyn and Cydonia; and these towns, when united, were more than a match for Cnosus. Cnosus is frequently mentioned by the poets in consequence of its connection with Minos, Ariadne, the Mi notaur, and the Labyrinth; and the adjective Cnosius is frequently used as an equivalent to Cretan.

COBUS or COHIBUS (Κόβος), a river of Asia, flowing from the Caucasus into the eastern side of the Euxine.

COCĀLUS (Κόκαλος), a mythical king of Sicily, who kindly received Dædalus on his flight from Crete; and, [when Minos subsequently came thither in pursuit of him, put that monarch to death.] According to others, [Minos] was killed by the daughters of Cocalus.

COCCÆUS NERVA. Vid. NERVA.

COCHE (Κωχή), a city on the Tigris, near Ctesiphon.

COCINTHUM or COCINTUM (now Punta di Stilo), a promontory on the southeast of Bruttium, in Italy, with a town of the same name upon it.

COCELES, HORĀTIUS, that is, Horatius the "one-eyed," a hero of the old Roman lays, is said to have defended the Sublician bridge along with Sp. Lartius and T. Hermipius against the whole Etruscan army under Porsena, while the Romans broke down the bridge behind them. When the work was nearly finished Horatius sent back his two companions. As soon as the bridge was quite destroyed, he plunged into the stream and swam across to the city in safety amid the arrows of the enemy. The state raised a statue to his honor, which was placed in the comitium, and allowed him as much land as he could plough round in one day. Polybius relates that Horatius defended the bridge alone, and perished in the river.

COCOSSĀTES, a people in Aquitania in Gaul, mentioned along with the Tarbelli.

COCYLĪUM (Κοκύλιον), an Æolian city in Mysia, whose inhabitants (Κοκυλίται) are mentioned by Xenophon, but which was abandoned before Pliny's time.

COCYTUS (Κόκυτος) a river in Epirus, a tributary of the Acheron. Like the Acheron, the Cocytus was supposed to be connected with the lower world, and hence came to be described as a river in the lower world. Homer (Od., x., 513) make the Cocytus a tributary of the Styx; but Virgil (Æn., vi., 295) represents the Acheron as flowing into the Cocytus.

CODĀNUS SINUS, the southwestern part of the Baltic, whence the Danish islands are called CODANONIA.

CODOMANNUS. Vid. DARIUS.

CODRUS (Κόδρος). 1. Son of Melanthus, and last king of Athens. When the Dorians invaded Attica from Peloponnesus (about B.C. 1068 according to mythical chronology), an oracle declared that they should be victorious if the life of the Attic king was spared. Codrus thereupon resolved to sacrifice himself for his country. He entered the camp of the enemy in disguise, commenced quarrelling with the soldiers, and was slain in the dispute. When the Dorians discovered the death of the Attic king, they returned home. Tradition adds, that as no one was thought worthy to succeed such a patriotic king, the kingly dignity was abolished, and Medon, son of Codrus, was appointed archon for life instead.—2. A Roman poet, ridiculed by Virgil. Juvenal also speaks of a wretched poet of the same name. The name is probably fictitious, and appears to have been applied by the Roman poets to those poetasters who annoyed other people by reading their productions to them.

CŒLA (τὰ κοῖλα τῆς Εὐβοίας), "the Hollows of Eubœa," the western coast of Eubœa, between the promontories Caphareus and Chersonesus, very dangerous to ships; here a part of the Persian fleet was wrecked, B.C. 480.

CŒLE (Κοίλη), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Hippothooutis, a little way beyond the Melitian gate at Athens; here Cimon and Thucydides were buried.

CŒLĒSYRIA (ἡ Κοίλη Συρία, i. e., Hollow Syria), was the name given after the Macedonian conquest to the great valley (El-Bukaa) between the two ranges of Mount Lebanon (Libanus and Anti-Libanus), in the south of Syria, bordering upon Phœnicia on the west, and Palestine on the south. In the wars between the Ptolemies and the Seleucidæ, the name was applied to the whole of the southern portion of Syria, which became subject for some time to the kings of Egypt; but, under the Romans, when Phœnicia and Judæa were made distinct provinces, the name of Cœlesyria was confined to Cœlesyria proper, together with the district east of Anti-Libanus, about Damascus, and a portion of Palestine east of the Jordan; and this is the most usual meaning of the term. Under the later emperors it was considered as a part of Phœnicia, and was called Phœnicæ Libanesia. The country was for the most part fertile, especially the eastern district about the River Chrysorrhœas: the valley of Cœlesyria proper was watered by the Leontes. The inhabitants were a mixed people of Syrians, Phœnicians, and Greeks, called Syrophœnicians (Συροφωίνικες).

CŒLĒTE or CŒLALETE, a people of Thrace, divided into Majores and Minores, in the district CŒLETICA, between the Hebrus and the Gulf of Melas.

CŒLIUS. Vid. CÆLIUS.

CŒLOSSA (Κοῖλωσσα), a mountain in the Sicyonian territory, near Phlius, an offshoot of the Arcadian mountain Cylleus.

CŒLIUS (Κοῖλος λιμῆν) or CŒLA (Κοῖλα), a seaport town in the Thracian Chersonese, near which was the Κυνὸς σῆμα, or the grave of Hecuba. Vid. CYNOSSEMA.

CŒNUS (Κοῖνος), son-in-law of Parmenion, one of the ablest generals of Alexander the Great, died on the Hyphasis, B.C. 327.

CŒNYRA (Κοῖνυρα), a place in the island Thasos, opposite Samothrace.

[CŒRĀNUS (Κοῖρανός). 1. A Lycian, slain by Ulysses in the Trojan war.—2. Charioteer of Meriones, slain by Hector.—3. A Stoic philosopher, flourished in the reign of the Emperor Nero.]

[CŒUS (Κοῖος), son of Uranus (Cœlus) and Gæa (Terra), one of the most powerful of the Titans.]

CŒS (Κῶς), of Mytilene, dissuaded Darius Hystaspis, in his Scythian expedition, from breaking up his bridge of boats over the Danube. For this good counsel he was rewarded by Darius with the tyranny of Mytilene. On the breaking out of the Ionian revolt, B.C. 501, he was stoned to death by the Mytilenæans.

[COLANICA (now Lanark), a city of the Damii in Britannia Barbara.]

COLĀPIS (Κόλαψ in Dion Cass.: now Kulpa), a river in Pannonia, flows into the Savus: on it dwelt the COLĀPIANI.

COLCHIS (Κολχίς: Κόλχος), a country of Asia, [comprising the modern Mingrelia and part of Imireti], bounded on the west by the Euxine, on the north by the Caucasus, on the east by Iberia; on the south and southwest the boundaries were somewhat indefinite, and were often considered to extend as far as Trapezus (now Trebizond). The land of Colchis (or Ἄα) and its river Phasis are famous in the Greek mythology. Vid. ARGONAUTÆ. The name of Colchis is first mentioned by Æschylus and Pindar. The historical acquaintance of the Greeks with the country may be ascribed to the commerce of the Milesians. It was a very fertile country, and yielded timber, pitch, hemp, flax, and wax, as articles of commerce; but it was most famous for its manufactures of linen, on account of which, and of certain physical resemblances, Herodotus supposed the Colchians to have been a colony from Egypt. The land was governed by its native princes until Mithradates Eupator made it subject to the kingdom of Pontus. After the Mithradatic war it was overrun by the Romans, but they did not subdue it till the time of Trajan. Under the later emperors the country was called Lazica, from the name of one of its principal tribes, the Lazi.

COLĪAS (Κωλιὰς), a promontory on the western coast of Attica, twenty stadia south of Phalerum, with a temple of Aphrodite, where some of the Persian ships were cast after the battle of Salamis. Colias is usually identified with the cape called the Three Towers, (Τρεῖς Πύργοι), but it ought to be placed southeast, near Ἄγιος Κοσμάς.

COLLĀTĪA (Collatinus). 1. (Now Castellaccio), a Sabine town in Latium, near the right bank of the Anio, taken by Tarquinius Priscus.—2. A town in Apulia, only mentioned under the empire.

COLLATĪNUS, L. TARQUĪNĪUS, son of Egerius, and nephew of Tarquinius Priscus, derived the surname Collatinus from the town Collatia, of which his father had been appointed governor. He was married to Lucretia, and it was the rape of the latter by Sextus Tarquinius that led to the detronement of Tarquinius Superbus. Collatinus and L. Junius Brutus were the first consuls; but, as the people could not endure the rule of any of the hated race of the Tarquins, Collatinus resigned his office, and retired from Rome to Lavinium.

COLLĪNA PORTA. Vid. ROMA.

COLLYTUS (Κόλλυτός, also Κολυττός: Κόλλυτεύς), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Ægeis, was included within the walls of Athens, and formed one of the districts into which the city was divided: it was the demus of Plato, and the residence of Timon the misanthrope.

COLOË (Κολόη), a lake in Lydia, generally called Gygæa. Vid. GYGÆA PALUS.]

COLŌNÆ (Κολωνάϊ), a small town in the Troad, mentioned in Greek history, but destroyed before the time of Pliny.

COLŌNĪA AGRIPPĪNA or AGRIPPĪNENSIS (now Cologne on the Rhine), originally the chief town of the Ubii, and called Oppidum or Civitas Ubiorum, was a place of small importance till A.D.

51, when a Roman colony was planted in the town by the Emperor Claudius, at the instigation of his wife Agrippina, who was born here, and from whom it derived its new name. Its inhabitants received the jus Italicum. It soon became a large and flourishing city, and was the capital of Lower Germany. At Cologne there are still several Roman remains, an ancient gate with the inscription C. C. A. A., i. e., Colonia Claudia Augusta Agrippinensis, the foundations of the Roman walls, &c.

COLŌNĪA EQUESTRIS. Vid. NOVIODUNUM.

COLŌNUS (Κολωνός: Κολωνεύς, -νίτης, -νιάτης), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Ægeis; afterward to the tribe Antiochis, ten stadia, or a little more than a mile, northwest of Athens; near the Academy, lying on and round a hill; celebrated for a temple of Neptune (Poseidon) (hence called Κολωνός Ἰππείους), a grove of the Eumenides, and the tomb of Œdipus. Sophocles, who was a native of this demus, has described the scenery and religious associations of the spot in his Œdipus Coloneus. There was a hill at Athens called Colonus Agoræus (Κολωνός ὁ ἀγοραῖος).

CŌLŌPHŌN (Κολοφών: ruins at Zille), one of the twelve Ionian cities of Asia Minor, was said to have been founded by Mopsus, a grandson of Tiresias. It stood about two miles from the coast, on the River Halesus, which was famous for the coldness of its water, between Lebedus and Ephesus, one hundred and twenty stadia (twelve geographical miles) from the former, and seventy stadia (seven geographical miles) from the latter: its harbor was called Notium. It was one of the most powerful members of the Ionian confederacy, possessing a considerable fleet and excellent cavalry; but it suffered greatly in war, being taken at different times by the Lydians, the Persians, Lysimachus, and the Cilician pirates. It was made a free city by the Romans after their war with Antiochus the Great. Besides claiming to be the birth-place of Homer, Colophon was the native city of Mimmerius, Hermesianax, and Nicander. It was also celebrated for the oracle of Apollo Clarius in its neighborhood. Vid. CLARIUS.

CŌLOSSÆ (Κολοσσαί, afterward Κολασσαί: Κολοσσῆς, Strab., Κολοσσαεύς, New Testament; ruins at Khonas), a city of Great Phrygia, on the River Lycus, once of great importance, but so reduced by the rise of the neighboring cities of Laodicea and Hierapolis that the later geographers do not even mention it, and it might have been forgotten but for its place in the early history of the Christian Church. In the Middle Ages it was called Xῶνα, and hence the modern name of the village on its site.

COLŌTES (Κολώτης). 1. Of Lampsacus, a hearer of Epicurus, against whom Plutarch wrote two of his works.—2. A sculptor of Paros, flourished B.C. 444, and assisted Phidias in executing the colossus of Jupiter (Zeus) at Olympia.—[3. A painter of Teos, a contemporary and rival of Timanthes, B.C. 396.]

COLUMELLA, L. JUNIUS MODERĀTUS, a native of Gades in Spain, and a contemporary of Seneca. We have no particulars of his life; it appears, from his own account, that at some period of his life he visited Syria and Cilicia; but Rome appears to have been his ordinary residence. He wrote a work upon agriculture (De Re Rustica), in twelve books, which is still extant. It treats not only of agriculture proper, but of the cultivation of the vine and the olive, of gardening, of rearing cattle, of bees, &c. The tenth book, which treats of gardening, is composed in dactylic hexameters, and forms a sort of supplement to the Georgics. There is also extant a work De Arboribus, in one book. The style of Columella is easy and ornate. The best edition of his works is by Schneider, in the Scriptores Rei Rusticæ, 4 vols. 8vo, Lips., 1794.

COLUMNÆ HERCULIS. Vid. ABYLA, CALPE.

COLUTHUS (Κόλουθος), a Greek epic poet of Lycopolis in Egypt, lived at the beginning of the sixth century of our era. He is the author of an extant poem on "the Rape of Helen" (Ἐλένης ἀρπαγή), consisting of three hundred and ninety-two hexameter lines. Edited by Bekker, Berl., 1816, and Schæfer, Lips., 1825.

[COLYMBAS (Κολυμβάς), one of the daughters of Pierus. Vid. PIERIDES.]

COLYTTUS. Vid. COLLYTUS.

COMANA (Κόμανα). 1. C. Pontica (ruins at Gumnik), a flourishing city of Pontus, upon the River Iris, celebrated for its temple of Diana (Artemis) Taurica, the foundation of which tradition ascribed to Orestes. The high-priests of this temple took rank next after the king, and their domain was increased by Pompey after the Mithradatic war.—2. CAPADOCIE, or C. CHRYSÉ (now Bostan), lay in a narrow valley of the Anti-Taurus, in Cataonia, and was also celebrated for a temple of Diana (Artemis) Taurica, the foundation of which was likewise ascribed by tradition to Orestes.

[COMARUS (Κόμαρος), a harbor of Epirus, on the Ambracius Sius, in the district of Molossis.]

COMBRÆA (Κώμβρεια), a town in the Macedonian district of Crossæa.

[COMÈTES (Κομήτης). 1. Father of the Argonaut Asterion—2. One of the Lapithæ, slain at the marriage festival of Pirithous.]

COMINIUM, a town in Samnium, destroyed by the Romans in the Samnite wars.

[COMINIUS, P. 1. A Roman knight, who, with his brother L. or C., accused C. Cornelius of majestas, B.C. 66: the matter did not come to trial, but next year they renewed the accusation, and Cornelius, who was defended by Cicero, was acquitted. The speech delivered by Cominius was extant in the time of Asconius, who praises it; Cominius is also well spoken of by Cicero as a lively and clear speaker.—2. One of Cæsar's officers, taken prisoner near Thapsus, in crossing over to Africa, B.C. 47.]

COMMAGÈNE (Κομμαγενή), the northeastern-most district of Syria, was bounded on the east and southeast by the Euphrates, on the north and northwest by the Taurus, and on the south by Cyrrhesticæ. It formed a part of the Greek kingdom of Syria, after the fall of which it maintained its independence under a race of kings who appear to have been a branch of the family of the Seleucidæ, and was not united to the Roman Empire till the reign of Vespasian. Under Constantine, if not earlier, it was made a part of Cyrrhesticæ. The district was remarkable for its fertility.

COMIUS, king of the Atrebatæ, was advanced to that dignity by Cæsar, who had great confidence in him. He was sent by Cæsar to Britain to accompany the ambassadors of the British states on their return to their native country, but he was cast into chains by the Britons, and was not released till the Britons had been defeated by Cæsar, and found it expedient to sue for peace. In B.C. 52 he joined the other Gauls in their great revolt against the Romans, and continued in arms even after the capture of Alesia.

COMMŌDUS, L. CEIŌNIUS, was adopted by Hadrian, A.D. 136, when he took the name of L. ÆLIUS VERUS CÆSAR. His health was weak; he died on the first of January, 138, and was interred in the mausoleum of Hadrian. His son, L. Aurelius Verus, was the colleague of Antoninus Pius in the empire. Vid. VERUS.

COMMŌDUS, L. AURĒLIUS, Roman emperor A.D. 180–192, son of M. Aurelius and the younger Faustina, was born at Lanuvium 161, and was thus scarcely twenty when he succeeded to the empire. He was an unworthy son of a noble father. Notwithstanding the great care which his father had bestowed upon his education, he turned out one of the most sanguinary and licentious tyrants that ever disgraced a throne. It was after the suppression of the plot against his life, which had been organized by his sister Lucilla, 183, that he first gave uncontrolled sway to his ferocious temper. He resigned the government to various favorites, who followed each other in rapid succession (Perennis, Cleander, Lætus, and Eclectus), and abandoned himself without interruption to the most shameful debauchery. But he was at the same time the slave of the most childish vanity, and sought to gain popular applause by fighting as a gladiator, and slew many thousands of wild beasts in the amphitheatre with bow and spear. In consequence of these exploits he assumed the name of Hercules, and demanded that he should be worshipped as that god, 191. In the following year his concubine Marcia found on his tablets, while he was asleep, that she was doomed to perish, along with Lætus and Eclectus, and other leading men in the state. She forthwith administered poison to him; but, as its operation was slow, Narcissus, a celebrated athlete, was introduced, and by him Commodus was strangled on the 31st of December, 192.

COMNĒNA. Vid. ANNA COMNENA.

COMPLŪTUM (now Alcala de Henares), a town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, between Segovia and Bilbilis.

COMPSA (Compsanus; now Conza); a town of the Hirpini in Samnium, near the sources of the Aufidus.

COMUM (Comens; now Como), a town in Gallia Cisalpina, at the southern extremity of the western branch of the Lacus Larius (now Lago di Como). It was originally a town of the Insubrian Gauls, and was colonized by Pompeius Strabo, by Cornelius Scipio, and by Julius Cæsar. Cæsar settled there six thousand colonists, among whom were five hundred distinguished Greek families; and this new population so greatly exceeded the number of the old inhabitants, that the town was called Novum Comum, a name, however, which it did not retain. Comum was a place of importance, and carried on considerable commerce with the north. It was celebrated for its iron manufactures; it was the birth-place of the younger Pliny.

[CONCĀNI, a people of Hispania among the Cantabri; said by Horace to delight in the blood of horses (Od. 3, 4, 34): their chief city was Concāna (now Santillana or Onis).]

CONCORDĪA, a Roman goddess, the personification of concord, had several temples at Rome. The earliest was built by Camillus in commemoration of the reconciliation between the patricians and plebeians, after the enactment of the Licinian rogations, B.C. 367. In this temple the senate frequently met. Concordia is represented on coins as a matron, holding in her left hand a cornucopia, and in her right either an olive branch or a patera.

CONDĀTE, the name of many Celtic towns, said to be equivalent in meaning to Confluentes, i. e., the union of two rivers.

CŌNON (Κόνων). 1. A distinguished Athenian general, held several important commands in the latter part of the Peloponnesian war. After the defeat of the Athenians by Lysander at Ægos Potami (B.C. 405), Conon, who was one of the generals, escaped with eight ships, and took refuge with Evagoras in Cyprus, where he remained for some years. He was subsequently appointed to the command of the Persian fleet along with Pharnabazus, and in this capacity was able to render the most effectual service to his native country. In 394 he gained a decisive victory over Pisander, the Spartan admiral, off Cnidus. After clearing the Ægean of the Spartans, he returned to Athens in 393, and commenced restoring the long walls and the fortifications of Piræus. When the Spartans opened their negotiations with Tiribazus, the Persian satrap, Conon was sent by the Athenians to counteract the intrigues of Antalcidas, but was thrown into prison by Tiribazus. According to some accounts, he was sent into the interior of Asia, and there put to death; but according to the most probable account, he escaped to Cyprus, where he died.—2. Son of Timotheus, grandson of the preceding, lived about 318.—3. Of Samos, a distinguished mathe-matician and astronomer, lived in the time of the Ptolemies Philadelphus and Euergetes (B. C. 283-222), and was the friend of Archimedes, who praises him in the highest terms. None of his works are preserved.—4. A grammarian of the age of Augustus, author of a work entitled Διηγῆσεις, a collection of fifty narratives relating to the mythical and heroic period. An epitome of the work is preserved by Photius.—[Editions: By Teucher, Lips., 1802; and by Westermann in Scriptores Poeticæ Historiæ Græci, Brunsvigæ, 1843.]

CŌNŌPA (Κωνόπα: Κωνοπέες, -πίτης, -παίος), a village in Ætolia, on the Achelous, enlarged by Arsinoë, wife of Ptolemy II, and called after her name.

CONSENTES DII, the twelve Etruscan gods who formed the council of Jupiter. They consisted of six male and six female divinities: we do not know the names of all of them, but it is certain that Juno, Minerva, Summanus, Vulcan, Saturn, and Mars were among them.

CONSENTĪA (Consentinus: now Cosenza), chief town of the Bruttii on the River Crathis: here Alaric died.

CONSENTĪUS, P., a Roman grammarian, probably flourished in the fifth century of the Christian era, and is the author of two extant grammatical works, one published in the Collection of grammarians by Putschius, Hanov., 1605 (De Duabus Partibus Orationis, Nomine et Verbo), and the other (De Barbarismis et Metaplasmis) by Buttman, Berol., 1817.

CONSIDĪUS LONGUS, C. 1. Proprætor in Africa, left his province shortly before the breaking out of the civil war B.C. 49, intrusting the government to Q. Ligarius. He returned to Africa soon afterward, and held Adrumetum for the Pompeian party. After the defeat of the Pompeians at Thapsus, he attempted to fly into Mauretania, but was murdered by the Gætulians.—[2. Q. C. GALLUS, a contemporary of Cicero, one of the judges in the case of Verres, praised by Cicero for his integrity and knowledge of law.—3. P., served under Cæsar in his first campaign in Gaul, B.C. 58, and is spoken of as an experienced soldier.]

[CONSILĪNUM (now Consignano), a city of the Bruttii, north of Locri.]

CONSTANS, youngest of the three sons of Constantine the Great and Fausta, received after his father's death (A.D. 337) Illyricum, Italy, and Africa as his share of the empire. After successfully resisting his brother Constantine, who was slain in invading his territory (340), Constans became master of the whole West. His weak and profligate character rendered him an object of contempt, and he was slain in 350 by the soldiers of the usurper MAGNENTIUS.

CONSTANTĪA. 1. Daughter of Constantius Chlorus and half-sister of Constantine the Great, married to Licinius, the colleague of Constantine in the empire.—2. Daughter of Constantius II. and grand-daughter of Constantine the Great, married the Emperor Gratian.

CONSTANTĪA, the name of several cities, all of which are either of little consequence, or better known by other names. 1. In Cyprus, named after Constantius (vid. SALAMIS). 2. In Phœnicia, after the same (vid. ANTARADUS). 3. In Palestine, the port of GAZA, named after the sister of Constantine the Great, and also called Majuma. 4. In Mesopotamia. Vid. ANTONI-NOPOLIS.

CONSTANTINA, daughter of Constantine the Great and Fausta, married to Hannibalianus, and after the death of the latter to Gallus Cæsar.

CONSTANTINA, the city. Vid. CIERTA.

CONSTANTINŌPŪLIS (Κωνσταντίνου πόλις: now Constantinople), built on the site of the ancient BYZANTIUM by Constantine the Great, who called it after his own name, and made it the capital of the Roman empire. It was solemnly consecrated A.D. 330. It was built in imitation of Rome. Thus it covered seven hills, was divided into fourteen regiones, and was adorned with various buildings in imitation of the capital of the Western world. Its extreme length was about three Roman miles; and its walls included eventually a circumference of thirteen or fourteen Roman miles. It continued the capital of the Roman empire in the East till its capture by the Turks in 1453. An account of its topography and history does not fall within the scope of the present work.

CONSTANTINUS. I. I. Surnamed "the Great," Roman emperor A.D. 306-337, eldest son of the Emperor Constantius Chlorus and Helena, was born A.D. 272, at Naissus (now Nissa), a town in Upper Mæsia. He was early trained to arms, and served with great distinction under Galerius in the Persian war. Galerius became jealous of him and detained him for some time in the East; but Constantine at last contrived to join his father in Gaul just in time to accompany him to Britain on his expedition against the Picts, 306. His father died at York in the same year, and Constantine laid claim to a share of the empire. Galerius, who dreaded a struggle with the brave legions of the West, acknowledged Constantine as master of the countries beyond the Alps, but with the title of Cæsar only. The commencement of Constantine's reign, however, is placed in this year, though he did not receive the title of Augustus till 308. Constantine took up his residence at Treviri (now Trèves), where the remains of his palace are still extant. He governed with justice and firmness, beloved by his subjects, and feared by the neighboring barbarians. It was not long, however, before he became involved in war with his rivals in the empire. In the same year that he had been acknowledged Cæsar (306), Maxentius, the son of Maximian, had seized the imperial power at Rome. Constantine entered into a close alliance with Maxentius by marrying his sister Fausta. But in 310 Maximian formed a plot against Constantine, and was put to death by his son-in-law at Massilia. Maxentius resented the death of his father, and began to make preparations to attack Constantine in Gaul. Constantine anticipated his movements, and invaded Italy at the head of a large army. The struggle was brought to a close by the defeat of Maxentius at the village of Saxa Rubra, near Rome, on the 27th of October, 312. Maxentius tried to escape over the Milvian bridge into Rome, but perished in the river. It was in this campaign that Constantine is said to have been converted to Christianity. On his march to Rome, either at Antun in Gaul, or near Andernach on the Rhine, or at

Verona, he is said to have seen in the sky a luminous cross with the inscription ἐν τούτῳ νίκα, BY THIS, CONQUER; and on the night before the last and decisive battle with Maxentius, a vision is said to have appeared to Constantine in his sleep, bidding him inscribe the shields of his soldiers with the sacred monogram of the name of Christ. The tale of the cross seems to have grown out of that of the vision, and even the latter is not entitled to credit. It was Constantine's interest to gain the affections of his numerous Christian subjects in his struggle with his rivals; and it was probably only self-interest which led him at first to adopt Christianity. But, whether sincere or not in his conversion, his conduct did little credit to the religion which he professed. The miracle of his conversion was commemorated by the imperial standard of the Labarum, at the summit of which was the monogram of the name of Christ. Constantine, by his victory over Maxentius, became the sole master of the West. Meantime important events took place in the East. On the death of Galerius in 311, Licinius and Maximinus had divided the East between them; but in 313 a war broke out between them, Maximinus was defeated, and died at Tarsus. Thus there were only two emperors left, Licinius in the East and Constantine in the West; and between them also war broke out in 314, although Licinius had married in the preceding year Constantia, the half-sister of Constantine. Licinius was defeated at Cibalis in Pannonia and afterward at Adrianople. Peace was then concluded on condition that Licinius should resign to Constantine Illyricum, Macedonia, and Achaia, 314. This peace continued undisturbed for nine years, during which time Constantine was frequently engaged in war with the barbarians on the Danube and the Rhine. In these wars his son Crispus greatly distinguished himself. In 323 the war between Constantine and Licinius was renewed. Licinius was again defeated in two great battles, first near Adrianople, and again at Chalcedon. He surrendered himself to Constantine on condition of having his life spared, but he was shortly afterward put to death at Thessalonica by order of Constantine. Constantine was now sole master of the empire. He resolved to remove the seat of empire to Byzantium, which he called after his own name Constantinople, or the city of Constantine. The new city was solemnly dedicated in 330. Constantine reigned in peace for the remainder of his life. In 325 he supported the orthodox bishops at the great Christian council of Nicæa (Nice), which condemned the Arian doctrine by adopting the word ὁμοούσιον. In 324 he put to death his eldest son Crispus on a charge of treason, the truth of which, however, seems very doubtful. He died in May, 337, and was baptized shortly before his death by Eusebius. His three sons Constantine, Constantius, and Constans succeeded him in the empire.—2. II. Roman emperor 337-340, eldest of the three sons of Constantine the Great by Fausta, received Gaul, Britain, Spain, and part of Africa at his father's death. Dissatisfied with his share of the empire, he made war upon his younger brother Constans, who governed Italy, but was defeated and slain near Aquileia.—3. A usurper, who assumed the purple in Britain in the reign of Arcadius and Honorius, 407. He also obtained possession of Gaul and Spain, and took up his residence in the former country. He reigned four years, but was defeated in 411 by Constantius, the general of Honorius, was taken prisoner and carried to Ravenna, where he was put to death.—4. Constantine is likewise the name of many of the later emperors of Constantinople. Of these Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus, who reigned 911–959, was celebrated for his literary works, many of which have come down to us.

CONSTANTIUS. I. I. Surnamed CHLORUS, "the pale," Roman emperor A.D. 305–306, was the son of Eutropius, a noble Dardanian, and of Claudia, daughter of Crispus, brother of Claudius II. He was one of the two Cæsars appointed by Maximian and Diocletian in 292, and received the government of Britain, Gaul, and Spain, with Treviri (now Trèves), as his residence. At the same time he married Theodora, the daughter of the wife of Maximian, divorcing for that purpose his wife Helena. As Cæsar he rendered the empire important services. His first effort was to reunite Britain to the empire, which, after the murder of Carausius, was governed by Allectus. After a struggle of three years (293–296) with Allectus, Constantius established his authority in Britain. He was equally successful against the Alemanni, whom he defeated with great loss. Upon the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian in 305, Constantius and Galerius became the Augusti. Constantius died fifteen months afterward (July, 306), at Eboracum (now York), in Britain, on an expedition against the Picts, in which he was accompanied by his son Constantine, afterward the Great, who succeeded him in his share of the government.—2. II. Roman emperor 337–361, third son of Constantine the Great by his second wife Fausta. On the death of his father in 337, he received the East as his share of the empire. Upon his accession he became involved in a serious war with the Persians, which was carried on with a few interruptions during the greater part of his reign. This war prevented him from taking any part in the struggle between his brothers Constantine and Constans, which ended in the defeat and death of the former, and the accession of the latter to the sole empire of the West, 340. After the death of Constans in 350, Constantius marched into the West in order to oppose Magnentius and Vetranio, both of whom had assumed the purple. Vetranio submitted to Constantius, and Magnentius was finally crushed in 353. Thus the whole empire again became subject to one ruler. In 354 Constantius put to death his cousin Gallus, whom he had left in command of the East, while he marched against the usurpers in the West. In 355 Constantius made Julian, the brother of Gallus, Cæsar, and sent him into Gaul to oppose the barbarians. In 360 Julian was proclaimed Augustus by the soldiers at Paris. Constantius prepared for war and set out for Europe, but died on his march in Cilicia, 362. He was succeeded by Julian.—3. III. A distinguished general of Honorius, emperor of the West A.D. 421. He defeated the usurper Constantine in 411, and also fought successfully against the barbarians. He was rewarded for these services with the hand of Placidia, the sister of Honorius. In 421 he was declared Augustus by Honorius, but died in the seventh month of his reign.

CONSUS, an ancient Roman divinity, who was identified by some in later times with Neptune. Hence Livy (i, 9) calls him Neptunus Equestris. He was regarded by some as the god of secret deliberations, but he was most probably a god of the lower world. Respecting his festival of the Consualia, vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v.

[CONTESTANI, a people of Hispania Tarraconensis, in the eastern part of modern Murcia and western part of Valencia: in their territory lay Carthago Nova.]

CONTREBIA, one of the chief towns of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis, southeast of Saragossa.

CONVÈNÆ, a people in Aquitania near the Pyrenees and on both sides of the Garumna, a mixed race which had served under Sertorius, and were settled in Aquitania by Pompey. They possessed the Jus Latii. Their chief town was LUGDUNUM (now St. Bertrand de Comminges), situated on a solitary rock: in its neighborhood were celebrated warm baths, ÆQUÆ CONVENARUM (now Bagnères).

ΚΟΡÆ (Κόπαι: Κωπαίεις: near Topoglia), an ancient town in Bœotia, on the northern side of the Lake Copais, which derived its name from this place. It was originally situated on an island in the lake, which island was subsequently connected with the main land by a mole.

ΚΟΡÆΙΣ (Κωπαίς λίμνη), a lake in Bœotia, and the largest lake in Greece, formed chiefly by the River Cephissus, the waters of which are emptied into the Eubæan Sea by several subterraneous canals, called Katabothra by the modern Greeks. The lake was originally called CEPHISIS, under which name it occurs in Homer, and subsequently different parts of it were called after the towns situated on it, Haliartus, Orchomenus, Onchestus, Copæ, &c.; but the name Copais eventually became the most common, because near Copæ the waters of the lake are the deepest and are never dried up. In the summer the greater part of the lake is dry, and becomes a green meadow, in which cattle are pastured. The eels of this lake were much prized in antiquity, and they retain their celebrity in modern times.

ΚΟΡΗΗ or ΚΟΡΗΕΣ (Κωρήν, Arrian, Κώρης, Strab.: now Cabul), the only grand tributary river which flows into the Indus from the west. It was the boundary between India and Ariana.

ΚΟΡΘΝΙΟΣ, C., prætor B.C. 49, fought on the side of Pompey; he was proscribed by the triumvirs in 43, but his wife obtained his pardon from Antony by the sacrifice of her honor.

ΚΟΡΡΑΤΗΣ (Κορράτης: now Abzal), a river of Susiana, flowing from the north into the Pasitigris on its western side.

ΚΟΡΡΕΥΣ (Κορρείς), son of Pelops, who, after murdering Iphitus, fled from Elis to Mycenæ, where he was purified by Eurystheus.

ΚΟΡΤΟΣ (Κορτός: ruins at Κοφί), a city of the Thebais or Upper Egypt, lay a little to the east of the Nile, some distance below Thebes. Under the Ptolemies it was the central point of the commerce with Arabia and India, by way of Berenice and Myos-Hormos. It was destroyed by Diocletian, but again became a considerable place. The neighborhood was celebrated for its emeralds and other precious stones, and produced also a light wine.

CŌRA (Coranus; now Cori), an ancient town in Latium, in the Volseian Mountains, southeast of Velitræ, said to have been founded by the Argive Corax. At Cori there are remains of Cyclopien walls and of an ancient temple.

CŌRĀCĒSIUM (Κορακῆσιον; now Alaya), a very strong city of Cilicia Aspera, on the borders of Pamphylia, standing upon a steep rock, and possessing a good harbor. It was the only place in Cilicia which opposed a successful resistance to Alexander, and, after its strength had been tried more than once in the wars of the Seleucide, it became at last the head-quarters of the Cilician pirates, and was taken by Pompey.

[CŌRĀLIUS (Κοράλιος, also Κονάριος). 1. A river of Thessaly, flowing into the Peneus.—2. A river of Bœotia, near Coronæ, flowing into the Copais Lacus.]

CORASSIÆ (Κορασσία), a group of small islands in the Icarian Sea, southwest of Icaria. They must not be confounded, as they often are, with the islands CORSÆ or CORSÆ (Κόρσαι or Κόρσαι), off the Ionian coast, and opposite the promontory Ampelos in Samos.

CORAX (Κόραξ), a Sicilian rhetorician, who acquired so much influence over the citizens by his oratorical powers that he became the leading man in Syracuse after the expulsion of Thrasylus, B.C. 467. He wrote the earliest work on the art of rhetoric, and his treatise (entitled Τέχνη) was celebrated in antiquity.

[CŌRAX (Κόραξ). 1. (Now Coraca or Vardhusi according to Leake), a mountain in Ætolia, near Naupactus.—2. (Now Cape Aynda?), a promontory of Chersonesus Taurica.]

[CORBIO. 1. (Now Berga), a city of Hispania Tarraconensis.—2. A city in the territory of the Æqui in Latium, captured by Coriolanus; at a later period by the Volsci.]

CORBULO, CN. DOMITIUS, a distinguished general under Claudius and Nero. In A.D. 47 he carried on war in Germany with success, but his fame rests chiefly upon his glorious campaigns against the Parthians in the reign of Nero. Though beloved by the army, he continued faithful to Nero, but his only reward was death. Nero, who had become jealous of his fame and influence, invited him to Corinth. As soon as he landed at Cenchræ, he was informed that orders had been issued for his death, whereupon he plunged his sword into his breast, exclaiming, "Well deserved!"

CORCYRA (Κέρκυρα, later Κόρκυρα; Kerkyraios; now Corfu, from the Byzantine Κορυφώ), an island in the Ionian Sea, off the coast of Æpirus, about thirty-eight miles in length, but of very unequal breadth. It is generally mountainous, but possesses many fertile valleys. Its two chief towns were Coreyra, the modern town of Corfu, in the middle of the eastern coast, and Cassiope, north of the former. The ancients universally regarded this island as the Homeric SCHEERIA (Σχερίη), where the enterprising and sea-loving Phœacians dwelt, governed by their king Alcinoüs. The island is said to have also borne the name of DREPANE (Δρεπάνη), or the "Sickle," in ancient times. About B.C. 700 it was colonized by the Corinthians under Chersicrates, one of the Bacchiadæ, who drove out the Liburnians, who were then inhabiting the island. It soon became rich and powerful by its extensive commerce; it founded many colonies on the opposite coast, Epidamnus, Apollonia, Leucas, Anactorium; and it exercised such influence in the Ionian and Adriatic Seas as to become a formidable rival to Corinth. Thus the two states early became involved in war, and about B.C. 664 a battle was fought between their fleets, which is memorable as the most ancient sea-fight on record. At a later period, Coreyra, by invoking the aid of Athens against the Corinthians, became one of the proximate causes of the Peloponnesian war, 431. Shortly afterward her power declined in consequence of civil dissensions, in which both the aristocratical and popular parties were guilty of the most horrible atrocities against each other. At last it became subject to the Romans with the rest of Greece. Corfu is at present one of the seven Ionian islands under the protection of Great Britain, and the seat of government.

CORCYRA NIGRA (now Curzola, in Slavonic Karkar), an island off the coast of Illyricum, sur-named the "Black" on account of its numerous forests, to distinguish it from the more celebrated Coreyra. It contained a Greek town of the same name, founded by Cuidos.

CORDŪBA (now Cordova), one of the largest cities in Spain, and the capital of Bætica, on the right bank of the Bætis; made a Roman colony B.C. 152, and received the surname Patricia, because some Roman patricians settled there; taken by Cæsar in 45 because it sided with the Pompeians; birth-place of the two Senecas and of Lucan. In the Middle Ages it was the capital of the kingdom of the Moors, but is now a decaying place with 55,000 inhabitants.

CORDUËNE. Vid. GORDYENE.

CORDUS, CREMŪTIUS, a Roman historian under Augustus and Tiberius, was accused in A.D. 25 of having praised Brutus and denominated Cassius "the last of the Romans." As the emperor had determined upon his death, he put an end to his own life by starvation. His works were condemned to be burned, but some copies were preserved by his daughter Marcia and by his friends.

CORE (Κόρη), the Maiden, a name by which Persephone is often called. Vid. PERSEPHONE.

CORESSUS (Κόρσος). 1. A lofty mountain in Ionia, forty stadia (four geographical miles) from Ephesus, with a place of the same name at its foot.—2. A town in the island of Ceos. Vid. CEOS.

CORFINIUM (Corfiniensis), chief town of the Peligni in Samnium, not far from the Aternus, strongly fortified, and memorable as the place which the Italians in the Social war destined to be the new capital of Italy in place of Rome, on which account it was called Italia.

CORINNA (Κόριννα) a Greek poetess, of Tanagra in Bœotia, sometimes called the Theban on account of her long residence in Thebes. She flourished about B.C. 490, and was a contemporary of Pindar, whom she is said to have instructed, and over whom she gained a victory at the public games at Thebes. Her poems were written in the Æolic dialect. They were collected in five books, and were chiefly lyrical. Only a few fragments have been preserved; [published in the collections of Schneidewin, Poete Elegiaci, Götting, 1839, and of Bergk, Poete Lyrici Græci, Lips., 1843.]

CORINTHIACUS ISTHMUS (Ἰσθμὸς Κόρινθου), often called simply the ISTHMUS, lay between the Corinthian and Saronic Gulfs, and connected the Peloponnesus with the main land or Hellas proper. In its narrowest part it was forty stadia or five Roman miles across: here was the temple of Neptune (Poseidon), and here the Isthmian games were celebrated; and here, also, was the Diolkos (Διόλκος), or road by which ships were dragged across from the Bay of Schœnus to the harbor of Lechæum. Four unsuccessful attempts were made to dig a canal across the Isthmus, namely, by Demetrius Polioretetes, Julius Cæsar, Caligula, and Nero.

CORINTHIACUS SINUS (Κορινθιακὸς ἢ Κόρινθος, κόλπος: now Gulf of Lepanto), the gulf between the north of Greece and Peloponnesus, begins, according to some, at the mouth of the Achælus in Ætolia and the promontory Araxus in Achaia, according to others at the straits between Rhium and Antirrhium. In early times it was called the Crissæan Gulf (Κρυσσαῖος κόλπος), and its eastern part the Aleyonian Sea (ἡ Ἀλκυονίς θάλασσα).

CORINTHUS (Κόρινθος: Κορίνθιος), called in Homer ΕΡΗΥΡΑ (Ἐφήρη), a city on the above-mentioned isthmus. Its territory, called CORINTHIA (Κορινθία), embraced the greater part of the Isthmus, with the adjacent part of the Peloponnesus: it was bounded north by Megaris and the Corinthian Gulf, south by Argolis, west by Sicyonia and Phliasia, and east by the Saronic Gulf. In the north and south the country is mountainous, but in the centre it is a plain with a solitary and steep mountain rising from it, the ACROCORINTHUS (Ἀκροκόρινθος), nineteen hundred feet in height, which served as the citadel of Corinth. The city itself was built on the northern side of this mountain; and the walls, which included the Acrocorinthus, were eighty-six stadia in circumference. It had two harbors, CENCHRÆE and SCHœNUS on the east, or Saronic Gulf, and one, LECHÆUM, on the west or Corinthian Gulf. Its favorable position between two seas, the difficulty of carrying goods round Peloponnesus, and the facility with which they could be transported across the Isthmus, raised Corinth in very early times to great commercial prosperity, and made it the emporium of the trade between Europe and Asia. Its navy was numerous and powerful. At Corinth the first triremes were built, and the first sea-fight on record was between the Corinthians and their colonists the Coreyræans. Its greatness at an early period is attested by numerous colonies, Ambracia, Coreyra, Apollonia, Potidæa, &c. It was adorned with magnificent buildings, and in no other city of Greece, except Athens, were the fine arts prosecuted with so much vigor and success. Its commerce brought great wealth to its inhabitants; but with their wealth, they became luxurious and licentious. Thus the worship of Venus (Aphrodite) prevailed in this city, and in her temples a vast number of courtesans was maintained. Corinth was originally inhabited by the Æolic race. Here ruled the Æolic Sisyphus and his descendants. On the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, the royal power passed into the hands of the Heraclid Alætes. The conquering Dorians became the ruling class, and the Æolian inhabitants subject to them. After Aletes and his descendants had reigned for five generations, royalty was abolished, and in its stead was established an oligarchical form of government, confined to the powerful family of the Bacchiadæ. This family was expelled B.C. 655 by CRYSELUS, who became tyrant, and reigned thirty years. He was succeeded, 625, by his son PERIANDER, who reigned forty years. On the death of the latter, 585, his nephew Psammeticus reigned for three years, and on his fall in 581, the government again became an aristocracy. In the Peloponnesian war Corinth was one of the bitterest enemies of Athens. In 346 Timophanes attempted to make himself master of the city, but he was slain by his brother Timoleon. It maintained its independence till the time of the Macedonian supremacy, when its citadel was garrisoned by Macedonian troops. This garrison was expelled by Aratus in 243, whereupon Corinth joined the Achæan league, to which it continued to belong till it was taken and destroyed in 146 by L. Mummius, the Roman consul, who treated it in the most barbarous manner. Its inhabitants were sold as slaves; its works of art, which were not destroyed by the Roman soldiery, were conveyed to Rome; its buildings were razed to the ground; and thus was destroyed the lumen totius Græciæ, as Cicero calls the city. For a century it lay in ruins; only the buildings on the Acropolis and a few temples remained standing. In 46 it was rebuilt by Cæsar, who peopled it with a colony of veterans and descendants of freedmen. It was now called Colonia Julia Corinthus; it became the capital of the Roman province of Achaia, and soon recovered much of its ancient prosperity, but, at the same time, it became noted for its former licentiousness, as we see from St. Paul's epistles to the inhabitants. The site of Corinth is indicated by seven Doric columns, which are the only remains of the ancient city.

CORIOLANUS, the hero of one of the most beautiful of the early Roman legends. His original name was C. or Cn. Marcius, and he received the surname Coriolanus from the heroism he displayed at the capture of the Volscian town of Corioli. His haughty bearing toward the commons excited their fear and dislike, and when he was a candidate for the consulship they refused to elect him. After this, when there was a famine in the city, and a Greek prince sent corn from Sicily, Coriolanus advised that it should not be distributed to the commons, unless they gave up their tribunes. For this he was impeached and condemned to exile, B.C. 491. He now took refuge among the Volseians, and promised to assist them in war against the Romans. Attius Tullius, the king of the Volseians, appointed Coriolanus general of the Volscian army. Coriolanus took many towns, and advanced unresisted till he came to the fossa Cluilia, or Cluilian dike close to Rome, 489. Here he encamped, and the Romans, in alarm, sent to him embassy after embassy, consisting of the most distinguished men of the state. But he would listen to none of them. At length the noblest matrons of Rome, headed by Veturia, the mother of Coriolanus, and Volturnia, his wife, with his two little children, came to his tent. His mother's reproaches, and the tears of his wife and the other matrons, bent his purpose. He led back his army, and lived in exile among the Volscians till his death, though other traditions relate that he was killed by the Volscians on his return to their country.

CORIOLI (Coriolanus), a town in Latium, capital of the Volsci, from the capture of which, in B.C. 493, C. Marcins obtained the surname of Coriolanus.

CORMĀSA (Κόρμασα), an inland town of Pamphylia or of Pisidia, taken by the consul Manlius.

CORNĒLIA. 1. One of the noble women at Rome, guilty of poisoning the leading men of the state, B.C. 331.—2. Elder daughter of P. Scipio Africanus the elder, married to P. Scipio Nasica.—3. Younger sister of No. 2, married to Ti. Sempronius Gracchus, censor 169, was by him the mother of the two tribunes Tiberius and Caius. She was virtuous and accomplished, and united in her person the severe virtues of the old Roman matron, with the superior knowledge and refinement which then began to prevail in the higher classes at Rome. She superintended with the greatest care the education of her sons, whom she survived. She was almost idolized by the people, who erected a statue to her, with the inscription CORNELIA, MOTHER OF THE GRACCHI.—4. Daughter of L. Cinna, married to C. Cæsar, afterward dictator. She bore him his daughter Julia, and died in his questorship, 68.—5. Daughter of Metellus Scipio, married first to P. CASSIUS, the son of the triumvir, who perished in the expedition against the Parthians, 53. Next year she married Pompey the Great, by whom she was tenderly loved. She accompanied Pompey to Egypt after the battle of Pharsalia, and saw him murdered. She afterward returned to Rome, and received from Cæsar the ashes of her husband, which she preserved on his Alban estate.

CORNĒLIA ORESTILLA. Vid. ORESTILLA.

CORNĒLIA GENS, the most distinguished of all the Roman gentes. All its great families belonged to the patrician order. The names of the patrician families are, ARVINA, CETHEGUS, CINNA, COSSUS, DOLABELLA, LENTULUS, MALUGINENSIS, MAMMULA, MERULA, RUFINUS, SCIPIO, SISENNA, and SULLA. The names of the plebeian families are ALBUS and GALLUS, and we also find various cognomens, as CHRYSOGONUS, &c., given to freedmen of this gens.

CORNĒLIUS NEPOS. Vid. NEPOS.

CORNŪCŪLUM (Corniculanus), a town in Latium, in the mountains north of Tibur, taken and destroyed by Tarquinius Priscus, and celebrated as the residence of the parents of Servius Tullius.

CORNIFICIUS. 1. Q., a friend of Cicero, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 69, and one of Cicero's competitors for the consulship in 64.

When the Catilinarian conspirators were arrested, Cethegus was committed to his care.—2. Q., son of No. 1. In the civil war (48) he was questor of Cæsar, who sent him into Illyriæ with the title of prætor: he reduced this province to obedience. In 45 he was appointed by Cæsar governor of Syria, and in 44 governor of the province of Old Africa, where he was at the time of Cæsar's death. He maintained this province for the senate, but on the establishment of the triumvirate was defeated and slain in battle by T. Sextius. Cornificius was well versed in literature. Many have attributed to him the authorship of the "Rhetorica ad Herennium," usually printed with Cicero's works; but this is only a conjecture. The Cornificius who is mentioned by Quintilian as the author of a work on rhetoric was probably a different person from the one we are speaking of.—3. L., one of the generals of Octavianus in the war against Sex. Pompey, and consul 35.

CORNUS, a town on the west of Sardinia.

CORNŪTUS, L. ANNEUS, a distinguished Stoic philosopher, was born at Leptis in Libya. He came to Rome, probably as a slave, and was emancipated by the Annæi. He was the teacher and friend of the poet Persius, who has dedicated his fifth satire to him, and who left him his library and money. He was banished by Nero, A.D. 68, for having too freely criticised the literary attempts of the emperor. He wrote a large number of works, all of which are lost: the most important of them was on Aristotle's Categories.—[Editions: by Osann, Cornutus (Phurmutus) de Natura Deorum, Götting, 1844.]

CORŒBUS (Κόρβορος). 1. A Phrygian, son of Mygdon, loved Cassandra, and for that reason fought on the side of the Trojans: he was slain by Neoptolemus or Diomedes.—2. An Elean, who gained the victory in the stadium at the Olympic games, B.C. 776: from this time the Olympiads began to be reckoned.

CORŒNE (Κορώνη; Κορωνεύς, -ναεύς; now Coron), a town in Messenia on the western side of the Messenian Gulf, founded B.C. 371 by the Messenians after their return to their native country, with the assistance of the Thebans: it possessed several public buildings, and in its neighborhood was a celebrated temple of Apollo.

CORŒNEA (Κορώνεια; Κορωναιος, Κορώνειος, -υιος). 1. (Near modern Camari), a town in Bœotia, southwest of the Lake Copais, situate on a height between the rivers Phalarus and Coralus; a member of the Bœotian league; in its neighborhood was the temple of Athena Itonia, where the festival of the Pambœotia was celebrated. Near Coronea the Bœotians gained a memorable victory over the Athenians under Tolmides, B.C. 447; and here Agesilaus defeated the allied Greeks, 394.—2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly.

CORŒNIS (Κορωνίς). 1. The mother of Æsculapius.—2. Daughter of Phoroneus, king of Phocis, metamorphosed by Minerva (Athena) into a erow when pursued by Neptune (Poseidon).

[CORONTA (Κορόντρα), a city of Aearmania, at the mouth of the Achelous.]

CORŒNUS (Κόρωνος). 1. Son of Cæneus, and one of the princes of the Lapithæ; slain by Heracles.—2. Son of Thersander, grandson of Sisypus, reputed founder of CORŒNEA.]

CORSÆ. Vid. CORASSÆ.

CORSIA (Κορσεία, also Κορσαι), a town in Bœotia, on the borders of Phocis.

CORSICA, called CYRENUS by the Greeks (Κύρνος; Κύριος, Κυρναίος, Corsus: now Corsica), an island north of Sardinia, spoken of by the ancients as one of the seven large islands in the Mediterranean. The ancients, however, exaggerate for the most part the size of the island; its greatest length is one hundred and sixteen miles, and its greatest breadth about fifty-one. It is mountainous, and was not much cultivated in antiquity. A range of mountains running from south to north separates it into two parts, of which the eastern half was more cultivated, while the western half was covered almost entirely with wood. Honey and wax were the principal productions of the island; but the honey had a bitter taste, from the yew-trees with which the island abounded (Cyrenas tazos, Virg., Ecl., ix., 30). The inhabitants were a rude mountain race, addicted to robbery, and paying little attention to agriculture. Even in the time of the Roman empire their character had not much improved, as we see from the description of Seneca, who was banished to this island. The most ancient inhabitants appear to have been Iberians; but in early times Ligurians, Tyrrhenians, Carthaginians, and even Greeks (vid. ALERIA), settled in the island. It was subject to the Carthaginians at the commencement of the first Punic war, but soon afterward passed into the hands of the Romans, and subsequently formed a part of the Roman province of Sardinia. The Romans founded several colonies in the island, of which the most important were MARIANA and ALERIA.

CORSŌTE (Κορσωτή; ruins at Ersey), a city of Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, near the mouth of the Mascas or Saocoras (now Wady-el-Seba), which Xenophon found already deserted.

CORTŪNA (Cortonensis; now Cortona), one of the twelve cities of Etruria, lay northwest of the Trasimene Lake, and was one of the most ancient cities in Italy. It is said to have been originally called Corythus from its reputed founder Corythus, who is represented as the father of Dardanus. It is also called Croton, Cothornia, Cyrtonium, &c. The Creston mentioned by Herodotus (i., 57) was probably Creston in Thrace and not Cortona, as many modern writers have supposed. Cortona is said to have been originally founded by the Umbrians, then to have been conquered by the Pelasgians, and subsequently to have passed into the hands of the Etruscans. It was afterward colonized by the Romans, but under their dominion sunk into insignificance. The remains of the Pelasgic walls of this city are some of the most remarkable in all Italy: there is one fragment one hundred and twenty feet in length, composed of blocks of enormous magnitude.

CORUNCANIUS, Tl., consul B.C. 280, with P. Valerius Lavinius, fought with success against the Etruscans and Pyrrhus. He was the first plebeian who was created pontifex maximus. He was one of the most remarkable men of his age, possessed a profound knowledge of political and civil law, and was the first person at Rome who gave regular instruction in law.

CORVINUS MESSALA. Vid. MESSALA.

CORVUS, M. VALERIUS, one of the most illustrious men in the early history of Rome. He obtained the surname of Corvus, or "Raven," because, when serving as military tribune under Camillus, B.C. 349, he accepted the challenge of a gigantic Gaul to single combat, and was assisted in the conflict by a raven which settled upon his helmet, and flew in the face of the barbarian. He was six times consul B.C. 348, 346, 343, 335, 300, 299, and twice dictator, 342, 301, and by his military abilities rendered the most memorable services to his country. His most brilliant victories were gained in his third consulship, 343, when he defeated the Samnites at Mount Gaurus and at Suessula; and in his other consulships he repeatedly defeated the Etruscans and other enemies of Rome. He reached the age of one hundred years, and is frequently referred to by the later Roman writers as a memorable example of the favors of fortune.

CORYBANTES, priests of Cybele or Rhea in Phrygia, who celebrated her worship with enthusiastic dances, to the sound of the drum and the cymbal. They are often identified with the Curetes and the Idæan Dactyli, and thus are said to have been the nurses of Jupiter (Zeus) in Crete. They were called Galli at Rome.

CORYCĪA (Κορυκία or Κορυκίς), a nymph who became by Apollo the mother of Lyceus or Lycæus, and from whom the Corycian cave in Mount Parnassus was believed to have derived its name. The Muses are sometimes called by the poets Corycides Nymphae.

CORŪCEUS (Κώρυκος; Κώρυκιος, Coryceius). 1. (Now Koraka), a high rocky hill on the coast of Ionia, forming the southwestern promontory of the Erythræan peninsula.—2. A city of Pamphylia, near Phaselis and mount Olympus: colonized afresh by Attalus II. Philadelphus; taken, and probably destroyed, by P. Servilius Isauricus.—3. (Ruins opposite the island of Khorgos), a city in Cilicia Aspera, with a good harbor, between the mouths of the Lamus and the Calycadnus. Twenty stadia (two geographical miles) from the city was a grotto or glen in the mountains, called the Corycian Cave (Κορυκίον ἄντρον), celebrated by the poets, and also famous for its saffron. At the distance of one hundred stadia (ten geographical miles) from Coryceus was a promontory of the same name.

CORŪDALLUS (Κορυδαλλεύς; Κορυδαλλεύς), a demus in Attica belonging to the tribe Hippothontis, situate on the mountain of the same name, which divides the plain of Athens from that of Eleusis.

CORŪPHASIUM (Κορυφάσιον), a promontory in Messenia, inclosing the harbor of Pylos on the north, with a town of the same name upon it (now Old Navarino).

CORŪTIUS (Κόρυθος). 1. An Italian hero, son of Jupiter, husband of Electra, and father of Iasius and Dardanus, is said to have founded Corythius (now Cortona).—[2. Son of Marmarus, wounded Pelates with a javelin at the marriage festival of Perseus.]

CŌS, CŌS, CŌS'S (Κῶς, Κῶος; Κῶος, Cŏis; now Kos, Stanco), one of the islands called Sporades, lay off the coast of Caria, at the mouth of the Ceramic Gulf, opposite to Halicarnassus. In early times it was called Merōpis and Nymphæa. It was colonized by Æolians, but became a member of the Dorian confederacy. Its chief city, Cos, stood on the northeast side of the island, in a beautiful situation, and had a good harbor. Near it stood the Aesclepiæum, or temple of Aesclepius (Æsculapius), to whom the island was sacred, and from whom its chief family, the Aesclepiadæ, claimed their descent. The island was very fertile; its chief productions were wine, ointments, and the light transparent dresses called "Cœ vestes." It was the birthplace of the physician Hippocrates, who was an Aesclepiad, of the poet Philetas, and of the painter Apelles, whose pictures of Antigonus and of Venus Andromene adorned the Aesclepiæum. Under the Romans, Cos was favored by Claudius, who made it a free state, and by Antoninus Pius, who rebuilt the city of Cos after its destruction by an earthquake.

CŒSA or COSSA (Cossanus). 1. (Now Ansedonia, about five miles southeast of Orbetello), a city of Etruria, near the sea, with a good harbor, called Herculis Portus, was a very ancient place, and after the fall of Falerii one of the twelve Etruscan cities. It was colonized by the Romans B.C. 273, and received in 197 an addition of one thousand colonists. There are still extensive ruins of its walls and towers, built of polygonal masonry.—2. A town in Lucania, near Thurii.—[3. (Now Cosa), or COSAS, a river of Latium, near Frusino.]

COSCONIUS. 1. C., prætor in the Social war, B.C. 89, defeated the Samnites.—2. C., prætor in the consulship of Cicero, 63; governed in the following year the province of Further Spain; was one of the twenty commissioners in 59, to carry into execution the agrarian law of Julius Cæsar, but died in this year.—3. C., tribune of the plebs 59, ædile 57, and one of the judges at the trial of P. Sextius, 56.

COSMAS (Κοσμάς), commonly called INDICOPLEUSTES (Indian navigator), an Egyptian monk, flourished in the reign of Justinian, about A.D. 535. In early life he followed the employment of a merchant, and visited many foreign countries, of which he gave an account in his Τοπογραφία Χριστιανική, Topographia Christiana, in twelve books, of which the greater part is extant.

COSRŒS. 1. King of Parthia. Vid. ARSACES, No. 25.—2. King of Persia. Vid. SASSANIDÆ.

COSSÆA (Κοσσαία), a district in and about Mount Zagros, on the northeast side of Susiana, and on the confines of Media and Persia, inhabited by a rude, warlike, predatory people, the Cossæi (Κοσσαίοι), whom the Persian kings never subdued, but, on the contrary, purchased their quiet by paying them tribute. Alexander conquered them (B.C. 325–324), and with difficulty kept them in subjection; after his death they soon regained their independence. Their name is supposed to have been the origin of the modern name of Susiana, Khuzistan, and is possibly connected with the Cush of the Old Testament.

COSUS, CORNĒLIUS, the name of several illustrious Romans in the early history of the republic. Of these the most celebrated was Ser. Cornelius COSMUS, consul B.C. 428, who killed Lar Tolumnius, the king of the Veii, in single combat, and dedicated his spoils in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius—the second of the three instances in which the spolia opima were won.

COSUTIUS, a Roman architect, who rebuilt, at the expense of Antiochus Epiphanes, the temple of the Olympian Jupiter (Zeus) at Athens, about B.C. 168, in the most magnificent Corinthian style.

COSYRA (now Pantelaria), also written Cosyra, Cosyrus, Cosura, Cossura, a small island in the Mediterranean near Malta.

CŒTHON. Vid. CARTHAGO.

CŒRISO, a king of the Dacians, conquered in the reign of Augustus by Lentulus.

CORTA, AURĒLIUS. 1. C., consul B.C. 252 and 248, in both of which years he fought in Sicily against the Carthaginians with success.—2. C., consul 200, fought against the Boii and the other Gauls in the north of Italy.—3. L., tribune of the plebs 154, and consul 144.—4. L., consul 119, opposed C. Marius, who was then tribune of the plebs.—5. C., was accused under the lex Varia, 91, of supporting the claims of the Italian allies, and went into voluntary exile. He returned to Rome when Sulla was dictator, 82; and in 75 he was consul with L. Octavius. He obtained the government of Gaul, and died immediately after his return to Rome. He was one of the most distinguished orators of his time, and is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers in the De Oratore, and the De Natura Deorum, in the latter of which works he maintains the cause of the Academies.—6. M., brother of No. 5, consul 74, with L. Licinius Lucullus, obtained Bithynia for his province, and was defeated by Mithradates near Chalecedon.—7. L., brother of Nos. 5 and 6, prætor 70, when he carried the celebrated law (lex Aurelia judicaria) which intrusted the judicia to the senators, equites, and tribuni ærarii. He was consul 65 with L. Manlius Torquatus, after the consuls elect, P. Sulla and P. Autronius Pætus, had been condemned of ambitus. He supported Cicero during his consulship, and proposed his recall from exile. In the civil war he joined Cæsar, whom he survived.

CORTA, L. AURUNCULĒIUS, one of Cæsar's legates in Gaul, perished along with Sabinus in the attack made upon them by Ambiorix, B.C. 54. Vid. AMBIORIX.

CORTIUS, son of Donnus, king of several Ligurian tribes in the Cottian Alps, which derived their name from him. Vid. ALPES. He submitted to Augustus, who granted him the sovereignty over twelve of the tribes, with the title of Præfectus. Cortius thereupon made roads over the Alps, and erected (B.C. 8) at Segusio (now Susa) a triumphal arch in honor of Augustus, extant at the present day. His authority was transmitted to his son, upon whom Claudius conferred the title of king. On his death his kingdom was made a Roman province by Nero.

CŒRUS, a giant with one hundred hands, son of Uranus (Cælus) and Gæa (Terra).

[COTYÆUM or COTIÆUM (Κοτύαιον or Κοτιάιον: now Kütayak), a city of Phrygia Epicetetus on the Thymbris.]

COTYLA, L. VARIUS, one of Antony's most intimate friends, fought on his side at Mutina, B. C. 43.

CŒTYLUS (Κότυλος), the highest peak of Mount

Ida in the Troad, containing the sources of the rivers Seamander, Granicus, and Æsepus.

CŌTYŌRA (Κοτύωρα), a colony of Sinope, in the territory of the Tibareni, on the coast of Pontus Polemoniacus, at the west end of a bay of the same name, celebrated as the place where the ten thousand Greeks embarked for Sinope. The foundation of Pharnacia reduced it to insignificance.

COTYS or COITTO (Κότυς or Κοιττώ), a Thracian divinity, whose festival, the Colyttia (vid. Dict. of Ant. s. v.), resembled that of the Phrygian Cybele, and was celebrated with licentious revelry. In later times her worship was introduced at Athens and Corinth. Those who celebrated her festival were called Baptæ, from the purifications which were originally connected with the solemnity.

COTYS (Κότυς). 1. King of Thrace B.C. 382-358, was for a short time a friend of the Athenians, but carried on war with them toward the close of his reign. He was cruel and sanguinary, and was much addicted to gross luxury and drunkenness. He was murdered by two brothers whose father he had injured.—2. King of the Odrysæ in Thrace, assisted Perseus against Rome, B.C. 168. His son was taken prisoner and carried to Rome, whereupon he sued for peace and was pardoned by the Romans.—3. A king of Thrace, who took part against Cæsar with Pompey, 48.—4. King of Thrace, son of Rhæmetaleas, in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. He carried on war with his uncle Rhescuporis, by whom he was murdered, A.D. 19. Ovid, during his exile at Tomi, addressed an epistle to him (Ex Pont. ii., 9).

CRAGUS (Κράγος), a mountain consisting of eight summits, being a continuation of Taurus to the west, and forming, at its extremity, the southwestern promontory of Lycia (now Yedy-Booroon, i. e., Seven Capes). Some of its summits show traces of volcanic action, and the ancients had a tradition to the same effect. At its foot was a town of the same name, on the sea-shore, between Pydna and Patara. Parallel to it, north of the River Glaucus, was the chain of Auticragus. The greatest height of Cragus exceeds three thousand feet.

[CRAMBŪSA (Κράμβουσα). 1. A city of Lycia, at the foot of the Lycian Olympus, one hundred stadia (ten geographical miles) from Phaselis.—2. An island on the coast of Cilicia, not far from the promontory Coryceus.]

CRANÆ (Κρανῆ), the island to which Paris first carried Helen from Peloponnesus (Hom., Il., iii., 445), is said by some to be an island off Gythium in Laconia, by others to be the island Helena off Attica, and by others, again, to be Cythera.

CRANŪS (Κραναός), king of Attica, the son-in-law and successor of Cecrops. He was deprived of his kingdom by his son-in-law Amphictyon.

CRANI or CRANIUM (Κράνιοι, Κρανιον: Κράνιος: now Krania, near Argostoli), a town of Cephallenia, on the southern coast.

CRANŌN or CRANNŌN (Κρανών, Κρανών: Κρανώνιος: now Sarliki or Teres), in ancient times EPHYRA, a town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, not far from Larissa.

CRANTOR (Κράντωρ), of Soli in Cilicia, an Academic philosopher, studied at Athens under Xenocrates and Polemo, and flourished B.C. 300. He was the author of several works, all of which are lost, and was the first who wrote commentaries on Plato's works. Most of his writings related to moral subjects (Hor., Ep., i., 2, 4). One of his most celebrated works was On Grief, of which Cicero made great use in the third book of his Tusculan Disputations, and in the Consolatio, which he composed on the death of his daughter Tullia.

CRASSIPES FURIUS, Cicero's son-in-law, the second husband of Tullia, whom he married B. C. 56, but from whom he was shortly afterward divorced.

CRASSUS, LICINIUS. 1. P., prætor B.C. 176, and consul 171, when he carried on the war against Perseus.—2. C., brother of No. 1, prætor 172, and consul 168.—3. C., probably son of No. 2, tribune of the plebs 145, was distinguished as a popular leader.—4. P., surnamed Dives or Rich, elected pontifex maximus 212, curule ædile 211, prætor 208, and consul 205, with Scipio Africanus, when he carried on war against Hannibal in the south of Italy. He died 183.—5. P., surnamed Dives Mucianus, son of P. Mucius Scævola, was adopted by the son of No. 4. In 131 he was consul and pontifex maximus, and was the first priest of that rank who went beyond Italy. He carried on war against Aristonicius in Asia, but was defeated and slain. He was a good orator and jurist.—6. M., surnamed Agelastus, because he is said never to have laughed, was grandfather of Crassus the triumvir.—7. P., surnamed Dives, son of No. 5, and father of the triumvir. He was the proposer of the lex Licinia, to prevent excessive expense in banquets, but in what year is uncertain. He was consul 97, and carried on war in Spain for some years. He was censor 89 with L. Julius Cæsar. In the civil war he took part with Sulla, and put an end to his own life when Marius and Cinna returned to Rome at the end of 87.—8. M., surnamed Dives, the triumvir, younger son of No. 7. His life was spared by Cinna after the death of his father; but, fearing Cinna, he afterward escaped to Spain, where he concealed himself for eight months. On the death of Cinna in 84, he collected some forces and crossed over into Africa, whence he passed into Italy in 83 and joined Sulla, on whose side he fought against the Marian party. On the defeat of the latter, he was rewarded by donations of confiscated property, and thus greatly increased his patrimony. His ruling passion was money, and he devoted all his energies to its accumulation. He was a keen and sagacious speculator. He bought multitudes of slaves, and, in order to increase their value, had them instructed in lucrative arts. He worked silver mines, cultivated farms, and built houses, which he let at high rents. In 71 he was appointed prætor in order to carry on the war against Spartacus and the gladiators; he defeated Spartacus, who was slain in the battle, and he was honored with an ovation. In 70 Crassus was consul with Pompey; he entertained the populace at a banquet of ten thousand tables, and distributed corn enough to supply the family of every citizen for three months. He did not, however, co-operate cordially with Pompey, of whose superior influence he was jealous. He was afterward reconciled to Pompey by Cæsar's mediation, and thus was formed between them, in 60, the so-called triumvirate. (Vid. p. 158, a.) In 55 Crassus was again consul with Pompey, and received the province of Syria, where he hoped both to increase his wealth and to acquire military glory by attacking the Parthians. He set out for his province before the expiration of his consulship, and continued his march notwithstanding the unfavorable omens which occurred to him at almost every step. After crossing the Euphrates in 54, he did not follow up the attack upon Parthia, but returned to Syria, where he passed the winter. In 53 he again crossed the Euphrates; he was misled by a crafty Arabian chieftain to march into the plains of Mesopotamia, where he was attacked by Surenas, the general of the Parthian king, Orodes. In the battle which followed Crassus was defeated with immense slaughter, and retreated with the remainder of his troops to Carrhæ (the Haran of Scripture). The moinous threats of his troops compelled him to accept a perfidious invitation from Surenas, who offered a pacific interview, at which he was slain, either by the enemy, or by some friend who desired to save him from the disgrace of becoming a prisoner. His head was cut off and sent to Orodes, who caused melted gold to be poured into the mouth of his fallen enemy, saying, "Sate thyself now with that metal of which in life thou wast so greedy."—9. M., surnamed Dives, son of No. 8, served under Cæsar in Gaul, and, at the breaking out of the civil war in 49, was præfect in Cisalpine Gaul.—10. P., younger son of No. 8, was Cæsar's legate in Gaul from 58 to 55. In 54 he followed his father to Syria, and fell in the battle against the Parthians.—11. L., the celebrated orator. At the age of twenty-one (B.C. 119), he attracted great notice by his prosecution of C. Carbo. He was consul in 95 with Q. Scævola, when he proposed a law to compel all who were not citizens to depart from Rome: the rigor of the law was one of the causes of the Social war. He was afterward proconsul of Gaul. In 92 he was censor, when he caused the schools of the Latin rhetoricians to be closed. He died in 91, a few days after opposing in the senate the consul L. Philippus, an enemy of the aristocracy. Crassus was fond of elegance and luxury. His house upon the Palatium was one of the most beautiful at Rome, and was adorned with costly works of art. As an orator he surpassed all his contemporaries. In the treatise De Oratore Cicero introduces him as one of the speakers, and he is understood to express Cicero's own statements. [The fragments of his orations are collected and published by Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta, p. 291–317, Zurich, 1842.]

CRASTINUS, one of Cæsar's veterans, commenced the battle of Pharsalia B.C. 48, and died fighting bravely in the foremost line.

[CRATÆIS (Κραταῖς), according to one legend, the mother of Scylla; goddess of sorcerers and enchanters.]

[CRATÆMENES (Κραταμένης), a native of Chalcis, founded the city of Zancle in Sicily.]

CRATÆRUS (Κρατερῆς). 1. A distinguished general of Alexander the Great, on whose death (B.C. 323) he received, in common with Antipater, the government of Macedonia and Greece. He arrived in Greece in time to render effectual assistance to Antipater in the Lamian war. At the close of this war he married Phila, the daughter of Antipater. Soon after, he accompanied Antipater in the war against the Ætoli-ans, and in that against Perdiccas in Asia. He fell in a battle against Eumenes in 321.—2. Brother of Antigonos Gonatas, compiled historical documents relative to the history of Attica.—3. A Greek physician, who attended the family of Atticus, mentioned also by Horace (Sat., ii., 3, 161).

CRATES (Κράτης). 1. An Athenian poet of the old comedy, began to flourish B.C. 449, and was one of the most celebrated of the comic poets. He excelled chiefly in mirth and fun, and was the first Attic poet who brought drunken persons on the stage. [His fragments are collected and edited by Meineke, Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. i., p. 78–86, edit. minor.]—2. Of Tralles, an orator or rhetorician of the school of Isocrates.—3. Of Thebes, a pupil of the Cynic Diogenes, and one of the most distinguished of the Cynic philosophers, flourished about 320. Though heir to a large fortune, he renounced it all, and lived and died as a true Cynic, disregarding all external pleasures, and restricting himself to the most absolute necessities. He received the surname of the "Door-opener," because it was his practice to visit every house at Athens and rebuke its inmates. He married Hipparchia, the daughter of a family of distinction, who threatened to commit suicide when her parents opposed her union with the philosopher. He wrote several works which are lost, for the epistles extant under his name are not genuine.—4. Of Athens, the pupil and friend of Polemo, and his successor in the chair of the Academy, about 270. He was the teacher of Arcesilaüs, Theodorus, and Bion Borysthædites.—5. Of Mallus in Cilicia, a celebrated grammarian. He was brought up at Tarsus, whence he removed to Pergamos, where he founded the Pergamene school of grammar, in opposition to the Alexandrian. He wrote a commentary on the Homeric poems, in opposition to Aristarchus, and supported the system of anomaly (ἀνωμαλία) against that of analogy (ἀναλογία). He also wrote commentaries on the other Greek poets, and works on other subjects, of which only fragments have come down to us. In 157 he was sent by Attalus as an ambassador to Rome, where he introduced for the first time the study of grammar. [His fragments have been published by C. F. Wegener, De Aula Attalica Litt. Artiumque fœditrice, vol. i., Havniæ, 1836.]

[CRATESIPPIDAS (Κρατησιππίδας), a Lacedæmonian admiral, seized the citadel of Chios, and effected the restoration of the Chian exiles; he was succeeded by Lysander.]

CRATHIS (Κράθις). 1. (Now Crata), a river in Achaia, rises in a mountain of the same name in Arcadia, receives the Styx flowing down from Nonacris, and falls into the Corinthian Gulf near Egæ.—2. (Now Crati), a river in lower Italy, forming the boundary on the east between Lucania and Bruttii, and falling into the sea near Sybaris. At its mouth was a celebrated temple of Minerva: its waters were fabled to dye the hair blonde.

CRATĪNUS (Κρατῖνος). 1. One of the most celebrated of the Athenian poets of the old comedy, was born B.C. 519, but did not begin to exhibit till 454, when he was sixty-five years of age. He exhibited twenty-one plays, and gained nine victories. He was the poet of the old comedy. He gave it its peculiar character, and he did not, like Aristophanes, live to see its decline. Before his time the comic poets had aimed at little beyond exciting the laughter of their audience: he was the first who made comedy a terrible weapon of personal attack, and the comic poet a severe censor of public and private vice. He is frequently attacked by Aristophanes, who charges him with habitual intemperance, an accusation which was admitted by Cratinus himself, who treated the subject in a very amusing way in his Ἰπυρίνη. This play was acted in 423, when the poet was ninety-six years of age: it gained the prize over the Comus of Amipsias and the Clouds of Aristophanes. Cratinus died in the following year at the age of ninety-seven. [His fragments are given by Meueke, Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. i., p. 7-78, edit. minor.]—2. The younger, an Athenian poet of the middle comedy, a contemporary of Plato the philosopher, flourished as late as 324. [His fragments are given by Meueke, Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. ii., p. 684-7, edit. minor.]

CRATIPPUS (Κρατίππος). 1. A Greek historian and contemporary of Thucydides, whose work he completed.—2. A Peripatetic philosopher of Mytilene, a contemporary of Pompey and Cicero, the latter of whom praises him highly. He accompanied Pompey in his flight after the battle of Pharsalia, B.C. 48. He afterward settled at Athens, where young M. Cicero was his pupil in 44. Through the influence of Cicero, Cratippus obtained from Cæsar the Roman citizenship.

CRATOS (Κράτος), the personification of strength, a son of [Pallas and the Oceanid Styx, represented as placed near the throne of Jupiter (Zeus) for having aided him against the Titans.]

CRATYLUS (Κρατύλος), a Greek philosopher, a pupil of Heraclitus, and one of Plato's teachers. Plato introduces him as one of the speakers in the dialogue which bears his name.

CREMÉLA, a small river in Etruria, which falls into the Tiber a little above Rome: memorable for the death of the three hundred Fabii.

CREMNA (Κρήμνα: ruins at Gherme), a strongly fortified city of Pisidia, built on a precipitous rock in the Taurus range, and noted for repeated obstinate defences: a colony under Augustus.

CREMNI (Κρημνοί), an emporium of the free Scythians on the western side of the Palus Mæotis.

CREMŌNA (Cremonensis: now Cremona), a Roman colony in the north of Italy, north of the Po, and at no great distance from the confluence of the Addua and the Po, was founded, together with Placentia, B.C. 219, as a protection against the Gauls and Hannibal's invading army. It soon became a place of great importance, and one of the most flourishing cities in the north of Italy; but, having espoused the cause of Vitellius, it was totally destroyed by the troops of Vespasian, A.D. 69. It was rebuilt by Vespasian, but never recovered its former greatness.

CREMŌNIS JUGUM. Vid. ALPES.

CREMŪTIUS CORDUS. Vid. CORDUS.

[CRENÆ (Κρήναι, i. e., the springs: now Armyro), a place near Argos Amphilocheium in Acarnania.]

[CRENIDES (Κρηνίδες), earlier name of the city Philippi. Vid. PHILIPPI.]

CREON (Κρέων). 1. King of Corinth, son of Lycæthus, whose daughter, Glauce or Creusa, married Jason. Medæa, thus forsaken, sent Glauce a garment which burned her to death when she put it on; the palace took fire, and Creon perished in the flames.—2. Son of Menœcus, and brother of Jocaste, the wife of Laius. After the death of Laius, Creon governed Thebes for a short time, and then surrendered the kingdom to Œdipus, who had delivered the country from the Sphinx. Vid. ŒDIPUS. When Eteocles and Polyneices, the sons of Œdipus, fell in battle by each other's hands, Creon became king of Thebes. His cruelty in forbidding burial to the corpse of Polyneices, and his sentencing Antigone to death for disobeying his orders, occasioned the death of his own son Hæmon. For details, vid. ANTIGONE.—[3. Father of Lycomedes, mentioned in the Iliad.—4. Father of Scopas, who ruled in Thessalian Craon.]

[CREONTĪDES, patronymic from Creon, as Lycomedes, &c. Vid. CREON, No. 3.]

CRĒŌPHYLUS (Κρεώφυλος), of Chios, one of the earliest epic poets, said to have been the friend or son-in-law of Homer. The epic poem Οἰχαλία or Οἰχαλίας ἄλωσις, ascribed to him, related the contest which Hercules, for the sake of Iole, undertook with Eurytus, and the capture of Cæhalia.

CRĒSHONTES (Κρησόβοντης), an Heraclid, son of Aristomachus, and one of the conquerors of Peloponnesus, obtained Messenia for his share. During an insurrection of the Messenians, he and two of his sons were slain. A third son, Æpytus, avenged his death. Vid. ÆPYTUS.

CRĒSTŌNĪA (Κρηστονία: ἡ Κρηστονική), a district in Macedonia between the Axios and Strymon, near Mount Cercine, inhabited by the CRĒSTONÆI (Κρηστοναῖοι), a Thracian people: their chief town was CRĒSTON or CRĒSTŌNE (Κρηστόν, Κρηστόνη), founded by the Pelasgians. This town is erroneously supposed by some writers to be the same as CORONA in Italy.

CRĒTA (Κρήτη: Κρηταῖος: Creteus: now Candia), one of the largest islands in the Mediterranean Sea, nearly equidistant from Europe, Asia, and Africa, but always reckoned as part of Europe. Its length from east to west is about one hundred and sixty miles: its breadth is very unequal, being in the widest part about thirty-five miles, and in the narrowest only six. A range of mountains runs through the whole length of the island from east to west, sending forth Æpurs north and south: in the centre of the island rises Mount Ida far above all the others. Vid. IDA. The rivers of Crete are numerous, but are little more than mountain-torrents, and are for the most part dry in summer. The country was celebrated in antiquity for its fertility and salubrity. Crete was inhabited at an early period by a numerous and civilized population. Homer speaks of its hundred cities (Κρήτη εκατόπολις, Π. ii, 649); and, before the Trojan war, mythology told of a king Minos who resided at Cnosus, and ruled over the greater part of the island. He is said to have given laws to Crete, and to have been the first prince who had a navy, with which he suppressed piracy in the Ægean. After his descendants had governed the island for some generations, royalty was abolished, and the cities became independent republics, of which Cnosus and Gortyna were the most important, and exercised a kind of supremacy over the rest. The ruling class were the Dorians, who settled in Crete about sixty years after the Dorian conquest of Peloponnesus, and reduced the former inhabitants, the Pelasgians and Achæans, to subjection. The social and political institutions of the island thus became Dorian, and many of the ancients supposed that the Spartan constitution was borrowed from Crete. The chief magistrates in the cities were the Cosmi, ten in number, chosen from certain families: there was also a Gerusia, or senate; and an Ecclesia, or popular assembly, which, however, had very little power. (For details, vid. Dict. of Ant. art. Cosmi.) At a later time the power of the aristocracy was overthrown, and a democratical form of government established. The ancient Doric customs likewise disappeared, and the people became degenerate in their morals and character. The historian Polybius accuses them of numerous vices, and the Apostle Paul, quoting the Cretan poet Epimenides, describes them as "always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies" (Titus, i, 12). The Cretans were celebrated as archers, and frequently served as mercenaries in the armies of other nations. The island was conquered by Q. Metellus, who received in consequence the surname Creticus (B.C. 68-66), and it became a Roman province. Crete and Cyrenaica subsequently formed one province.

CRETEUS or CATREUS (Κρητεύς), son of Minos by Pasiphaë or Crete, and father of Althemenes.

CRETHEUS (Κρηθεύς), son of Æolus and Enarete, husband of Tyro, and father of Æson, Phereas, Amythaon, and Hippolyte: he was the founder of Iolcus.

[CRETHON (Κρήθων), son of Diocles of Phæra, slain by Æneas before Troy.]

CRÉTÏPÏLIS (Κρητόπολις), a town in the district of Milyas in Asia Minor, assigned sometimes to Pisidia, sometimes to Pamphylia.

CRËÛSA (Κρέουσα). 1. A Naiad, daughter of Oceanus, became by Penes the mother of Hypsenes and Stilbe.—2. Daughter of Erechtheus and Praxithea, wife of Xuthus, and mother of Achæus and Ion. She is said to have been beloved by Apollo, whence Ion is sometimes called her son by this god.—3. Daughter of Priam and Hecuba, wife of Æneas, and mother of Ascanius. She perished on the night of the capture of Troy, having been separated from her husband in the confusion.—4. (Or Glauce), a daughter of Creon, who fell a victim to the vengeance of Medea. Vid. CREON, No. 1.

CREUSIS or CREUSA (Κρεΐσις, Κρέουσα: Κρευσεύς), a town on the eastern coast of Bœotia, the harbor of Thespiæ.

CRIMISA or CRIMISSA (Κρίμισα, Κρίμισσα: now Capo dell' Alice), a promontory on the eastern coast of Bruttium, with a town of the same name upon it, said to have been founded by Philoctetes, a little south of the River CRIMISUS.

CRIMISUS or CRIMISSUS (Κριμισός, Κριμισσός), a river in the west of Sicily, falls into the Hypsa: on its banks Timolcou defeated the Carthaginians, B.C. 339.

CRINÁGORAS (Κριναγόρας), of Mytilene, the author of fifty epigrams in the Greek Anthology, lived in the reign of Augustus.

[CRISPINA, wife of the Emperor Commodus having proved unfaithful, she was banished to Caprea, and there put to death.]

[CRISPINILLA, CALVIA, a Roman female of rank, notorious for her intrigues at the court of Nero; she is called by Tacitus Nero's instructor in voluptuousness. Notwithstanding her intrigues and plots, she managed to escape with impunity, and even to be in favor in the succeeding reigns of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius.]

CRISFINUS, a person ridiculed by Horace (Sat., i, l. 120), is said to have written bad verses on the Stoic philosophy, and to have been surnamed Aretalogus.

CRISPUS, FLAVIUS JULIUS, eldest son of Constantine the Great, was appointed Cæsar A.D. 317, and gained great distinction in a campaign against the Franks and in the war with Licinius; but, having excited the jealousy of his step-mother Fausta, he was put to death by his father, 326.

CRISPUS PASSIENUS, husband of Agrippina, and step-father of the Emperor Nero, was distinguished as an orator.

CRISPUS, VIBIUS, of Vercelli, a contemporary of Quintilian, and a distinguished orator. [The few fragments that remain of his speeches have been collected by Meyer, Orat. Roman. Fragm., p. 585-588.]

CRISA or CRISA (Κόισσα, Κρίσα: Κρισσαίος), and CIRRHIA (Κίρρα: Κίρρατος), towns in Phœcis, regarded by some ancient, as well as by some modern writers, as the same; but it seems most probable that Crissa was a town inland south-west of Delphi, and that Cirrha was its port on the Crissæan Gulf. The inhabitants of the towns levied contributions upon the pilgrims frequenting the Delphic oracle, in consequence of which the Amphictyons declared war against them, B.C. 595, and eventually destroyed them. Their territory, the rich Crissæan plain, was declared sacred to the Delphic god, and was forbidden to be cultivated. The cultivation of this plain by the inhabitants of Amphissa led to the Sacred war, in which Philip was chosen general of the Amphictyons, 338. Crissa remained in ruins, but Cirrha was afterward rebuilt, and became the harbor of Delphi.

CRITIAS (Κριτίας). 1. Son of Dropides, a contemporary and relation of Solon's.—2. Son of Callæsebrus, and grandson of the above, was one of the pupils of Socrates, by whose instructions he profited but little in a moral point of view. He was banished from Athens, and on his return he became leader of the oligarchical party. He was one of the thirty tyrants established by the Spartans B.C. 404, and was conspicuous above all his colleagues for rapacity and cruelty. He was slain at the battle of Mynychia in the same year, fighting against Thrasybulus and the exiles. He was a distinguished orator, and some of his speeches were extant in the time of Cicero. He also wrote poems, dramas, and other works. Some fragments of his elegies are still extant, [and have been collected by Bach, Critiæ carmina, etc., quæ supersunt, Lips., 1827.]

CRITŌLĀUS (Κριτόλαος). 1. Of Phaselis in Lycia, studied philosophy at Athens under Aristotle of Ceos, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school. In B.C. 155 he was sent by the Athenians as ambassador to Rome with Carneades and Diogenes. Vid. CARNEADES. He lived upward of eighty-two years, but we have no further particulars of his life.—2. General of the Achaean League, 147, distinguished by his bitter enmity to the Romans. He was defeated by Metellus, and was never heard of after the battle.

CRITON (Κρίτων). 1. Of Athens, a friend and disciple of Socrates, whom he supported with his fortune. He had made every arrangement for the escape of Socrates from prison, and tried, in vain, to persuade him to fly, as we see from Plato's dialogue named after him. Criton wrote seventeen dialogues on philosophical subjects, which are lost.—[2. A comic poet of the new comedy, of whose plays a few fragments remain, collected by Meineke, Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. ii., p. 1153-4, edit. minor.]—3. A physician at Rome in the first or second century after Christ, perhaps the person mentioned by Martial (Épigr., xl., 60, 6): he wrote several medical works.

CRĪŪ-MĒTŌRON (Κρίων μέτωπον), i. e., "Ram's Front." 1. A promontory at the south of the Tauric Chersonesus.—2. (Now Capo Krio), a promontory at the southwest of Crete.

CRĪUS (Κρίος), one of the Titans, son of Uranus (Cælus) and Ge (Terra).

CRŌDŌDĪŌPOLIS (Κροκοδείλων πόλις). 1. (Now Embschunda?), a city of Upper Egypt, in the Nomos Aphroditopolites.—2. Vid. ARSINOË, No. 7.

CROCUS, the beloved friend of Smilax, was changed by the gods into a saffron plant.

CROCYLĒA (τῆ Κροκύλεια), according to Homer (Il., ii., 633), a place in Ithaca, but according to Strabo, in Leucas in Acarnania.

[CROCYLION (Κροκύλιον), according to Thucydides (3, 96), a place in Ætolia, otherwise unknown.]

CROCUS (Κροίσος), last king of Lydia, son of Alyattes, reigned B.C. 560-546, but was probably associated in the kingdom during his father's life. The early part of his reign was most glorious. He subdued all the nations between the Ægean and the River Halys, and made the Greeks in Asia Minor tributary to him. The fame of his power and wealth drew to his court at Sardis all the wise men of Greece, and among them Solon, whose interview with the king was celebrated in antiquity. In reply to the question who was the happiest man he had ever seen, the sage taught the king that no man should be deemed happy till he had finished his life in a happy way. Alarmed at the growing power of the Persians, Croesus sent to consult the oracle of Apollo at Delphi whether he should march against the Persians. Upon the reply of the oracle, that, if he marched against the Persians, he would overthrow a great empire, he collected a vast army and marched against Cyrus. Near Sinope an indecisive battle was fought between the two armies; whereupon he returned to Sardis, and disbauded his forces, commanding them to reassemble in the following spring. But Cyrus appeared unexpectedly before Sardis; Croesus led out the forces still remaining with him, but was defeated, and the city was taken after a siege of fourteen days. Croesus, who was taken alive, was condemned to be burned to death. As he stood before the pyre, the warning of Solon came to his mind, and he thrice uttered the name of Solon. Cyrus inquired who it was that he called on; and, upon hearing the story, repented of his purpose, and not only spared the life of Croesus, but made him his friend. Croesus survived Cyrus, and accompanied Cambyses in his expedition against Egypt.

CROMMŪŌN or CROMŪŌN (Κρομμύων, Κρομύων), a town in Megaris, on the Saronic Gulf, afterward belonged to Corinth; celebrated in mythology on account of its wild sow, which was slain by Theseus.

[CROMNA (Κρόμνα), a town and fortress on the coast of Paphlagonia, between Cytorus and Amastris.]

[CROMNI or CROMI (Κρόμνοι, and in Pausanias Κρόνιοι), a stronghold in Arcadia, on the borders of Messenia, in the district named from it CROMIUS (Κρομίτις) its inhabitants were removed to Megalopolis.]

CRONIUS MOUNTAIN (Κρόνιον ὄρος), a mountain in Elis, near Olympia, with a temple of Cronus (Saturn.)

CRONUS (Κρόνος), the youngest of the Titans, son of Cælus (Uranus) and Terra (Ge), father by Rhea of Hestia, Ceres (Demeter), Juno (Hera), Pluto (Hades), Neptune (Poseidon), and Jupiter (Zeus). At the instigation of his mother, Saturn (Cronus) unmanned his father for having thrown the Cyclopes, who were likewise his children by Terra (Ge), into Tartarus. Out of the blood thus shed sprang up the Eriuyes. When the Cyclopes were delivered from Tartarus, the government of the world was taken from Cælus (Uranus) and given to Saturn (Cronus), who in his turn lost it through Jupiter (Zeus), as was predicted to him by Terra (Ge) and Cælus (Uranus). Vid. ZEUS. The Romans identified their Saturnus with Cronus. Vid. SATURNUS.

CROPIA (Κρωπεία), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Leontis.

[CROSSÆA (Κροσσαία), a district of Macedonia, on the eastern coast of the Thermaicus Sinus: it was also called Krovais.]

CROTŌN or CROTŌNA (Crotoniensis, Crotonensis, Crotoniata: now Crotona), a Greek city on the eastern coast of Bruttium, on the River Æsarus, and in a very healthy locality, was founded by the Achæans under Myscellus of Ægæ, assisted by the Spartans, B.C. 710. Its extensive commerce, the virtue of its inhabitants, and the excellence of its institutions, made it the most powerful and flourishing town in the south of Italy. It owed much of its greatness to Pythagoras, who established his school here. Gymnastics were cultivated here in greater perfection than in any other Greek city; and one of its citizens, Milo, was the most celebrated athlete in Greece. It attained its greatest power by the destruction of Syonaris in 510; but it subsequently declined in consequence of the severe defeat it sustained from the Locrians on the River Sagrus. It suffered greatly in the wars with Dionysius, Agathocles, and Phyrrius; and in the second Punic war a considerable part of it had ceased to be inhabited. It received a colony from the Romans in 195.

CRUSTUMĒRIA, -RĪUM, also CRUSTUMĪUM (Crustuminus), a town of the Sabines, situated in the mountains near the sources of the Allia, was conquered both by Romulus and Tarquinius Priscus, and is not mentioned in later times.

CREATUS. Vid. MOLLIONES.

CTĒSIAS (Κτησίας), of Chidus in Caria, a contemporary of Xenophon, was private physician of Artaxerxes Mneon, whom he accompanied in his war against his brother Cyrus, B.C. 401. He lived seventeen years at the Persian court, and wrote in the Ionic dialect a great work on the history of Persia (Περσικῶν), in twenty-three books. The first six contained the history of the Assyrian monarchy down to the foundation of the kingdom of Persia. The next seven contained the history of Persia down to the end of the reign of Xerxes, and the remaining ten carried the history down to the time when Ctesias left Persia, i. e., to the year 398. All that is now extant is a meagre abridgment in Photius and a number of fragments preserved in Diodorus and other writers. The work of Ctesias was compiled from Oriental sources, and its statements are frequently at variance with those of Herodotus. Ctesias also wrote a work on India (Ἰνδικῶν) in one book, of which we possess an abridgment in Photius. This work contains numerous fables, but it probably gives a faithful picture of India, as it was conceived by the Persians. The abridgment which Photius made of the Persica and Indica of Ctesias has been printed separately by Lion, Göttingen, 1823, and by Bähr, Frankfort, 1824.

CTĒSĪNĪUS (Κτησίβιος), celebrated for his mechanical inventions, lived at Alexandria in the reigns of Ptolemy Philadelphus and Euergetes, about B.C. 250. His father was a barber, but his own taste led him to devote himself to mechanics. He is said to have invented a clepsydra or water-clock, a hydraulic organ (ὕδραυλις), and other machines, and to have been the first to discover the elastic force of air and apply it as a moving power. He was the teacher, and has been supposed to have been the father of Hero Alexandrinus.—[2. A Greek historian, who probably lived at the time of the first Ptolemies; according to Apollodorus, he lived to the age of one hundred and four years, but according to Lucian, to the age of one hundred and twenty-four.]

CTĒSĪPHŌN (Κτησιφῶν), son of Leosthenes of Anaphlystus, was accused by Æschines for having proposed the decree that Demosthenes should be honored with the crown. Vid. ÆSCHINES.

CTĒSĪPHŌN (Κτησιφῶν: Κτησιφώντιος: ruins at Takti Kesra), a city of Assyria, on the eastern bank of the Tigris, three Roman miles from Seleucia on the western bank, first became an important place under the Parthians, whose kings used it for some time as a winter residence, and afterward enlarged and fortified it, and made it the capital of their empire. It is said to have contained at least one hundred thousand inhabitants. In the wars of the Romans with the Parthians and Persians, it was taken, first by Trajan (A.D. 115), and by several of the later emperors, but Julian did not venture to attack it, even after his victory over the Persians before the city.

CTESIPPUS (Κτήσιππος). 1. Two sons of Hercules, one by Deianira, and the other by Astydamia.—2. Son of Polythereses of Same, one of the suitors of Penelope, killed by Philæus, the cow-herd.—[3. A Greek historian, of uncertain date; Plutarch quotes his history of the Scythians, but nothing further is known of him.—4. A pupil of Socrates, who is often mentioned by Plato.]

[CTĒSIUS (Κτήσιος), son of Ormenus, and father of Eumæus, whom the Phœnicians carried off from him, and sold to Laërtes in Ithaca.]

[CRĪMĒNE (Κριμένη), sister of Ulysses, youngest child of Laërtes.]

[CUCCUS (Κουκουσός) or COCUS (Κοκκουσός), a place in Cappadocia, to which St. Chrysostom was banished. Vid. CHRYSOSTOMUS.]

[CŪDA (now Coa), a tributary of the Durius, in Hispania Tarraconensis.]

CULĀRO, afterward called GRATIANŌPŌLIS (now Grenoble) in honor of the Emperor Gratian, a town in Gallia Narbonensis, on the Isara (now Isère.)

CULLĒO or CULĒO, Q. TERENTIŪS. 1. A senator of distinction, was taken prisoner in the second Punic war, and obtained his liberty at the conclusion of the war B.C. 201. To show his gratitude to P. Scipio, he followed his triumphal car, wearing the pileus or cap of liberty, like an emancipated slave. In 187 he was prætor peregrinus, and in this year condemned L. Scipio Asiaticus, on the charge of having misappropriated the money gained in the war with Antiochus.—2. Tribune of the plebs, 58, exerted himself to obtain Cicero's recall from banishment. In the war which followed the death of Cæsar (43), Cullco was one of the legates of Lepidus.

CUMÆ (Κύμη: Κυμαῖος, Cumānus). 1. A town in Campania, and the most ancient of the Greek colonies in Italy and Sicily, was founded by Cyme in Æolis, in conjunction with Chalcis and Eretria in Eubœa. Its foundation is placed in B.C. 1050, but this date is evidently too early. It was situated on a steep hill of Mount Gaurus, a little north of the promontory Misenum. It became in early times a great and flourishing city; its commerce was extensive; its territory included a great part of the rich Campanian plain; its population was at least sixty thousand; and its power is attested by its colonies in Italy and Sicily, Putcoli, Palæopolis afterward Neapolis, Zancle afterward Messina. But it had powerful enemies to encounter in the Etruscans and the Italian nations. It was also weakened by internal dissensions, and one of its citizens, Aristodemus, made himself tyrant of the place. Its power became so much reduced that it was only saved from the attacks of the Etruscans by the assistance of Hiero, who annihilated the Etruscan fleet, 474. It maintained its independence till 417, when it was taken by the Campanians, and most of its inhabitants sold as slaves. From this time

CAPUA became the chief city of Campania; and although Cumæ was subsequently a Roman municipium and a colony, it continued to decline in importance. At last the Acropolis was the only part of the town that remained, and this was eventually destroyed by Narses in his wars with the Goths. Cumæ was celebrated as the residence of the earliest Sibyl, and as the place where Tarquinius Superbus died. Its ruins are still to be seen between the Lago di Patria and Fusaro.—[2. A city of Æolis. Vid. CYME.]

CUNAXA (Κούναξα), a small town in Babylonia, on the Euphrates, famous for the battle fought here between the younger Cyrus and his brother Artaxerxes Mnemon, in which the former was killed (B.C. 401). Its position is uncertain. Plutarch (Artax., 8) places it five hundred stadia (fifty geographical miles) above Babylon; Xenophon, who does not mention it by name, makes the battle field three hundred and sixty stadia (thirty-six geographical miles) from Babylon.

[CUNEUS. 1. Ager (now Algarve), the southern part of Lusitania, where the Conii dwelt, from whom it was probably so called, and not from its wedge-like shape.—2. Promontorium (now Cabo di S. Maria), the southern point of the Cuneus Ager.]

[CUPIDO. Vid. EROS.]

CUPINIENSIS, attacked by Horace (Sat., i, 2, 36), is said by the Scholiast to have been a friend of Augustus, but is probably a fictitious name.

CUPRA (Cuprensia). 1. MARITIMA (now Marano), at the mouth of the Monecchia, a town in Picenum, with an ancient temple of Juno, founded by the Pelasgians and restored by Hadrian.—2. MONTANA, a town near No. 1, in the mountains.

CŪRES (Gen. Curium), an ancient town of the Sabines, celebrated as the birth-place of T. Tatius and Numa Pompilius: from this town the Romans are said to have derived the name of Quirites.

CURĒTES (Κουρήτης), a mythical people, said to be the most ancient inhabitants of Aearnania and Ætolia; the latter country was called Curetis from them. They also occur in Crete as the priests of Jupiter (Zeus), and are spoken of in connection with the Corybantes and Idæan Dactyli. The infant Jupiter (Zeus) was intrusted to their care by Rhea; and by clashing their weapons in a warlike dance, they drowned the cries of the child, and prevented his father Saturn (Cronus) from ascertaining the place where he was concealed.

CURĪAS. Vid. CURIUM.

CURĪATĪI, a celebrated Alban family. Three brothers of this family fought with three Roman brothers, the Horatii, and were conquered by the latter. In consequence of their defeat, Alba became subject to Rome.

CURĪATŪS MATERNUS. Vid. MATERNUS.

CURĪO, C. SCRIBONIUS. 1. Prætor B.C. 121, was one of the most distinguished orators of his time.—2. Son of No. 1, tribune of the plebs B.C. 90; afterward served under Sulla in Greece; was prætor 82; consul 76; and after his consulship obtained the province of Macedonia, where he carried on war against the barbarians as far north as the Danube. He was a personal enemy of Cæsar, and supported P. Clodius when the latter was accused of violating the sacra of the Bona Dea. In 57 he was appointed pontifex maximus, and died 53. He had some reputation as an orator, and was a friend of Cicero.—3. Son of No. 2, also a friend of Cicero, was a most profligate character. He was married to Fulvia, afterward the wife of Antony. He at first belonged to the Pompeian party, by whose influence he was made tribune of the plebs, 50; but he was bought over by Cæsar, and employed his power as tribune against his former friends. On the breaking out of the civil war (49), he was sent by Cæsar to Sicily with the title of prætor. He succeeded in driving Cato out of the island, and then crossed over to Africa, where he was defeated and slain by Juba and P. Attius Varus.

CURĪOSOLĪTÆ, a Gallic people on the ocean in Armorica, near the Veneti, in the country of the modern Corseult, near St. Malo.

CURĪUM (Κούριον: Kouριεις: ruins near Piscopeia), a town on the southern coast of Cyprus, near the promontory CURĪAS, west of the mouth of the Lycus.

CURĪUS DENTĀTUS. Vid. DENTATUS.

CURĪUS, M'. 1. An intimate friend of Cicero and Atticus, lived for several years as a negotiator at Patræ in Peloponnesus. In his will he left his property to Atticus and Cicero. Several of Cicero's letters are addressed to him.—[2. Q., a Roman senator, who was candidate for the consulship B.C. 64, but lost his election, and for his vices was ejected from the senate: he joined the conspiracy of Catiline, and it was through his mistress Fulvia, to whom he related their designs, that Cicero obtained the information which enabled him to crush the conspiracy.]

CURSOR, L. PAPĪRIUS. 1. A distinguished Roman general in the second Samnite war, was five times consul (B.C. 333, 320, 319, 315, 313), and twice dictator (325, 309). He frequently defeated the Samnites, but his greatest victory over them was gained in his second dictatorship. Although a great general, he was not popular with the soldiers on account of his severity.—2. Son of No. 1, was, like his father, a distinguished general. In both his consulships (293, 272) he gained great victories over the Samnites, and in the second he brought the third Samnite war to a close.

CURĪUS, METTUS or METRĪUS, a distinguished Sabine, fought with the rest of his nation against Romulus. According to one tradition, the Lacus Curtius, which was part of the Roman forum, was called after him; because in the battle with the Romans he escaped with difficulty from a swamp, into which his horse had plunged. But the more usual tradition respecting the name of the Lacus Curtius related that in B.C. 362 the earth in the forum gave way, and a great chasm appeared, which the soothsayers declared could only be filled up by throwing into it Rome's greatest treasure; that thereupon M. Curtius, a noble youth, mounted his steed in full armor; and declaring that Rome possessed no greater treasure than a brave and gallant citizen, leaped into the abyss, upon which the earth closed over him.

CURTIVS MONTANUS. Vid. MONTANUS.

CURTIVS RUFUS, Q., the Roman historian of Alexander the Great. Respecting his life, and the time at which he lived, nothing is known with certainty. Some critics place him as early as the time of Vespasian, and others as late as Constantine; but the earlier date is more probable than the later. The work itself, entitled De Rebus Gestis Alexandri Magni, consisted of ten books, but the first two are lost, and the remaining eight are not without considerable gaps. It is written in a pleasing though somewhat declamatory style. It is taken from good sources, but the author frequently shows his ignorance of geography, chronology and tactics. The best editions are by Zumpt, Berlin, 1826, small edition; Müttel, Berlin, 1843; [and by Zumpt, Berlin, 1849, with copious commentary.]

CUTILLÆ AQUÆ. Vid. AQUÆ, No. 3.

CYÂNË (Κυάνη), a Sicilian nymph and playmate of Proserpina (Persëphone), changed into a fountain through grief at the loss of the goddess.

CYANËS INSÛLÆ (Κυάνεια νήσου or πέτραι, now Urek-Jaki), two small rocky islands at the entrance of the Thracian Bosphorus into the Euxine, the ΠΛΑΝΤÆ (Πλαγκταί) and ΣΥΜΠΛËΓΑΔΕ8 (Συμπληγάδες) of mythology, so called because they are said to have been once movable and to have rushed together, and thus destroyed every ship that attempted to pass through them. After the ship Argo had passed through them in safety, they became stationary. Vid. p. 91, a.

CYAXARES (Κυαζάρης), king of Media B.C. 634-594, son of Phraortes, and grandson of Deiocēs. He was the most warlike of the Median kings, and introduced great military reforms. He defeated the Assyrians, who had slain his father in battle, and he laid siege to Ninus (Nineveh). But while he was before the city, he was defeated by the Scythians, who held the dominion of Upper Asia for twenty-eight years (634-607), but were at length driven out of Asia by Cyaxares. After the expulsion of the Scythians, Cyaxares again turned his arms against Assyria, and with the aid of the King of Babylon (probably the father of Nebuchadnezzar), he took and destroyed Ninus in 606. He subsequently carried on war for five years against Alyattes, king of Lydia. Vid. ALYATTES. Cyaxares died in 594, and was succeeded by his son Astyages. Xenophon speaks of a Cyaxares II, king of Media, son of Astyages, respecting whom, vid. CYRUS.

CYBËLÆ. Vid. RHEA.

CYBISTRA (τὰ Κύβιστρα), an ancient city of Asia Minor, several times mentioned by Cicero (Ep. ad Fam., xv., 2, 4; ad Att., v., 18, 20), who describes it as lying at the foot of Mount Taurus, in the part of Cappadocia bordering on Cilicia. Strabo places it three hundred stadia (thirty geographical miles) from Tyana. Mention is made of a place of the same name (now Kara Hisar), between Tyana and Cæsarea ad Argæum; but this latter can hardly be believed to be identical with the former.

CYCLADES (Κυκλάδες), a group of islands in the Ægean Sea, so called because they lay in a circle (ἐν κύκλῳ) around Delos, the most important of them. According to Strabo they were twelve in number; but their number is increased by other writers. The most important of them were DELOS, CEOS, CYTHNOS, SERIPHOS, RHENIA, SIPHROS, CIMOLO8, NAXOS, PAROS, SYROS, MYCONOS, TENOS, ANDROS.

CYCLOPES (Κύκλωπες), that is, creatures with round or circular eyes, are described differently by different writers. Homer speaks of them as a gigantic and lawless race of shepherds in Sicily, who devoured human beings and cared nought for Jupiter (Zeus): each of them had only one eye in the centre of his forehead: the chief among them was POLYPHEMUS. According to Hesiod, the Cyclopes were Titans, sons of Cœlus (Uranus) and Terra (Ge), were three in number, ARGES, STERIOPE8, and BRONTES, and each of them had only one eye on his forehead. They were thrown into Tartarus by Saturn (Cronus), but were released by Jupiter (Zeus), and, in consequence, they provided Jupiter (Zeus) with thunderbolts and lightning, Pluto with a helmet, and Neptune (Poseidon) with a trident. They were afterward killed by Apollo for having furnished Jupiter (Zeus) with the thunderbolts to kill Æsculapius. A still later tradition regarded the Cyclopes as the assistants of Vulcan (Hephestus). Volcanoes were the work-shops of that god, and Mount Ætna in Sicily and the neighboring isles were accordingly considered as their abodes. As the assistants of Vulcan (Hephestus), they make the metal armor and ornaments for gods and heroes. Their number is no longer confined to three; and besides the names mentioned by Hesiod, we also find those of PYRACMON and ACAMAS. The name of Cyclopians walls was given to the walls built of great masses of unhewn stone, of which specimens are still to be seen at Mycenæ and other parts of Greece, and also in Italy. They were probably constructed by the Pelasgians; and later generations, being struck by their grandeur, ascribed their building to a fabulous race of Cyclopes.

CYCNUS (Κύκνος). 1. Son of Apollo by Hyrie, lived in the district between Pleuron and Calydon, and was beloved by Phyllius; but as Phyllius refused him a bull, Cyenus leaped into a lake and was metamorphosed into a swan.—2. Son of Neptune (Poseidon), was king of Colonæ in Troas, and father of Tenes and Hemithea. His second wife, Philonome, fell in love with Tenes, her step-son, and as he refused her offers, she accused him to his father, who threw Tenes with Hemithea in a chest into the sea. Tenes escaped and became king of Tenedos. Vid. TENES. In the Trojan war both Cyenus and Tenes assisted the Trojans, but both were slain by Achilles. As Cyenus could not be wounded by iron, Achilles strangled him with the thong of his helmet, or killed him with a stone. When Achilles was going to strip Cyenus of his armor, the body disappeared, and was changed into a swan.—3. Son of Mars (Ares), and Pelopia, slain by Hercules at Itono.—4. Son of Mars (Ares) and Pyrene, likewise killed by Hercules.—5. Son of Sthenelus, king of the Ligurians, and a friend and relation of Phæthon. While he was lamenting the fate of Phæthon on the banks of the Eridanus, he was metamorphosed by Apollo into a swan, and placed among the stars.

CYDIAS. 1. A celebrated painter from the island of Cythnus, B.C. 364, whose picture of the Argonauts was exhibited in a porticus by Agrippa at Rome.—[2. An Athenian orator, a contemporary of Demosthenes; an oration of his, περὶ τῆς Σάμου κληρουχίας, is mentioned by Aristotle.—3. An early Greek poet, classed by Plutarch with Minnermus and Archilochus. His fragments are given in the collections of Schneidevin and Bergk.]

CYDIPPE. Vid. ACONTIUS.

CYDNUS (Κύδνος: now Tersooa-Chai), a river of Cilicia Campestris, rising in the Taurus, and flowing through the midst of the city of Tarsus, where it is one hundred and twenty feet wide (Kinneir: Xenophon says two plethra—two hundred and two feet). It was celebrated for the clearness and coldness of its water, which was esteemed useful in gout and nervous diseases, but by bathing in which Alexander nearly lost his life. At its mouth the river spread into a lagune, which formed the harbor of Tarsus, but which is now choked with sand. In the Middle Ages the river was called Hierax.

CYDŌNIA, more rarely CYDŌNIS (Κυδωνία, Κυδωνίς: Κυδωνιάτης: now Khania), one of the chief cities of Crete, the rival and opponent of Cnosus and Gortyna, was situated on the north-western coast, and derived its name from the CYDŌNES (Κύδωνες), a Cretan race, placed by Homer in the western part of the island. At a later time a colony of Zaeynthians settled in Cydonia; they were driven out by the Samians about B.C. 524, and the Samians were in their turn expelled by the Æginetans. Cydonia was the place from which quinces (Cydonia mala) were first brought to Italy, and its inhabitants were some of the best Cretan archers (Cydonio arcu, Hor., Carm., iv., 19, 17).

[CYDRARA (Κύδραρα), a city on the borders of Phrygia and Lydia, where a monument was set up by Cræsus to mark the boundaries.]

CYLLARUS (Κύλλαρος), a beautiful centaur, killed at the wedding feast of Pirithous. The horse of Castor was likewise called Cyllarus.

CYLLENE (Κυλλήνη). 1. (Now Zyria), the highest mountain in Peloponnesus on the frontiers of Arcadia and Achaia, sacred to Hermes (Mercury), who had a temple on the summit, was said to have been born there, and was hence called Cyllenius.—2. (Now Chiarenza), a seaport town of Elis.

CYLON (Κύλων), an Athenian of noble family, married the daughter of Theagenes, tyrant of Megara, and gained an Olympic victory B.C. 640. Encouraged by the Delphic oracle, he seized the Acropolis, intending to make himself tyrant of Athens. Pressed by famine, Cylon and his adherents were driven to take refuge at the altar of Minerva (Athena), whence they were induced to withdraw by the archon Megacles, the Alcæonid, on a promise that their lives should be spared. But their enemies put them to death as soon as they had them in their power.

CYME (Κύμη: Κυμαίος: now Sandakli), the largest of the Æolian cities of Asia Minor, stood upon the coast of Æolis, on a bay named after it Cumæus (also Elaiticus) Sinus (ὁ Κυμαίος κόλπος: now Gulf of Sandakli), and had a good harbor. It was founded by a colony of Locrians from Mount Phricus, and hence it had the epithet Φρικωνίς. It was the native place of Ephorus, and the mother city of Side in Pamphylia and of Cumæ in Campania.

[CYMŌDŌCE (Κυμοδόκη), one of the Nereids (Hom. and Hes.); in Virgil, one of those nymphs into whom Cybele metamorphosed the ships of Æneas.]

[CYMOTHŌĒ (Κυμοθήη), one of the Nereids.]

CYNA. Vid. CYNANE.

CYNÆGĪRUS (Κυναιγιερός), brother of the poet Æschylus, distinguished himself by his valor at the battle of Marathon, B.C. 490. According to Herodotus, when the Persians were endeavoring to escape by sea, Cynægirus seized one of their ships to keep it back, but fell with his right hand cut off. In the later versions of the story, Cynægirus is made to perform still more heroic deeds.

CYNĒTHĒ (Κύναιθα: Κυναιθεός, -θαιεύς), a town in the north of Arcadia, whose inhabitants, unlike the other Arcadians, had a dislike to music, to which circumstance Polybius attributes their rough and demoralized character.

CYNANE, CYNA, or CYNNA (Κυνάνη, Κίνα, Κύννα), half-sister to Alexander the Great, daughter of Philip by Audata, an Illyrian woman. She was married to her cousin Amyntas; and after the death of Alexander she crossed over to Asia, intending to marry her daughter Eurydice to Arrhidæus, who had been chosen king. Her project alarmed Perdicas, by whose order she was put to death.

CYNĒSIŪ or CYNĒTES (Κυνήσιοι, Κύνητες), a people, according to Herodotus, dwelling in the extreme west of Europe, beyond the Celts, apparently in Spain.

[CYNICŪ. Vid. DIOGENES, ANTISTHENES.]

CYNISCA (Κυνίσκα), daughter of Archidamus II., king of Sparta, was the first woman who kept horses for the games, and the first who gained an Olympic victory.

CYNŌPŌLIS (Κυνός πόλις: now Samallout), a city of the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, on an island in the Nile; the chief seat of the worship of Anubis. There was a city of the same name in the Delta.

CYNOS (Κύνος: Κύνιος, Κυναιός), the chief sea-port in the territory of the Locri Opuntii.

CYNOSARGES (τὸ Κυνόσαργες), a gymnasium, sacred to Hercules, outside Athens, east of the city, and before the gate Diomæa, for the use of those who were not of pure Athenian blood. Here taught Antisthenes, the founder of the Cynic school.

CYNOSCĒPHĀLE (Κυνός κεφαλαί), "Dogs' Heads." 1. Two hills near Scotussa in Thessaly, where Flaminius gained his celebrated victory over Philip of Macedonia, B.C. 197.—2. A hill between Thebes and Thespiæ, in Bœotia.

CYNOSSEMA (Κυνός σῆμα), "Dog's Tomb," a promontory in the Thracian Chersouscus, near Madytus, so called because it was supposed to be the tomb of Hecuba, who had been previously changed into a dog.

CYNOSŪRA (Κυνόσουρα), an Idæan nymph, and one of the nurses of Jupiter (Zeus), who placed her among the stars. Vid. ARCTOS.

CYNOSŪRA (Κυνόσουρα), "Dog's Tail," a promontory in Attica, south of Marathon.

CYNTHIA and CYNTHIUS (Κυνθία and Κύνθιος), surnames respectively of Diana (Artemis) and Apollo, which they derived from Mount Cynthus in the island of Delos, their birth-place.

CYNTRIA (Κυνουρία: Κυνούριος), a district on the frontiers of Argolis and Laconia, for the possession of which the Argives and Spartans carried on frequent wars, and which the Spartans at length obtained about B.C. 550. Vid. p. 92, a. The inhabitants were Ionians.

CYPARISSIA (Κυπαρισσία). 1. A town in Mesenia, on the western coast, south of the River Cyparissus, and on a promontory and bay of the same name. Homer (Il., ii., 593) speaks of a town CYPARISSĒIS (Κυπαρισσήεις) subject to Nestor, which is probably the same as the preceding, though Strabo places it in Triphylia.— 2. A town in Laconia, on a peninsula near the Asoptus.

CYPARISSUS (Κυπάρισσος), son of Telephus, beloved by Apollo or Silvanus. Having inadvertently killed his favorite stag, he was seized with immoderate grief, and metamorphosed into a cypress.

CYPARISSUS (Κυπάρισσος), a small town in Phocis, on Parnassus, near Delphi.

CYPHANTA (τὸ Κύφαντα), a town on the eastern coast of Laconia, near Prasias.

CYPRIS, CYPRIS, surnames of Venus (Aphrodite), from the island of CYPRUS.

CYPRIANUS, a celebrated father of the Church, was a native of Africa. He was a heathen by birth, and before his conversion to Christianity he taught rhetoric with distinguished success. He was converted about A.D. 246, and was ordained a presbyter 247, and was raised to the bishopric of Carthage 248. When the persecution of Decius burst forth (250), Cyprian fled from the storm, and remained two years in retirement. A few years afterward the emperor Valerian renewed the persecution against the Christians. Cyprian was banished by Paternus the proconsul to the maritime city of Curubis, where he resided eleven months. He was then recalled by the new governor, Galerius Maximus, and was beheaded in a spacious plain without the walls A.D. 258. He wrote several works which have come down to us. They are characterized by lucid arrangement, and eloquent, though declamatory style. The best editions are by Fell, Oxford, 1682, fol., to which are subjoined the Annales Cypriani of Pearson; and that commenced by Baluze, and completed by a monk of the fraternity of St. Maur, Paris, 1726, fol. [A convenient and useful edition is that published in the collection of Caillau and Guillon, Paris, 1829, 8vo.]

CYPRUS (Κύπρος: Κύπριος: now Cyprus, called by the Turks Kebriis), a large island in the Mediterranean, south of Cilicia, and west of Syria. It is called by various names in the poets, Cerastia or Cerastis, Macaria, Sphecia, Acamantis, Amathusia, and also Paphos. The island is of a triangular form; its length from east to west is about one hundred and forty miles; its greatest breadth, which is in the western part, is about fifty miles from north to south, but it gradually narrows towards the east. A range of mountains, called Olympus by the ancients, runs through the whole length of the island from east to west, and rises in one part more than seven thousand feet in height. The plains are chiefly in the south of the island, and were celebrated in ancient as well as in modern times for their fertility. The largest plain, called the Salaminian plain, is in the eastern part of the island, near Salamis. The rivers are little more than mountain torrents, mostly dry in summer. Cyprus was colonized by the Phœnicians at a very early period; and Greek colonies were subsequently planted in the island, according to tradition soon after the Trojan war. We read at first of nine independent states, each governed by its own king, SALAMIS, CITIUM, AMATHUS, CURIUM, PAPHOS, MARIUM, SOLI, LAPETHUS, CERYNIA. The island was subdued by Amasis, king of Egypt, about B.C. 540. Upon the downfall of the Egyptian monarchy, it became subject to the Persians; but EVAGORAS of Salamis, after a severe struggle with the Persians, established its independence about 385, and handed down the sovereignty to his son NICOLES. It eventually fell to the share of the Ptolemies in Egypt, and was governed by them, sometimes united to Egypt, and sometimes by separate princes of the royal family. In 58 the Romans made Cyprus one of their provinces, and sent M. Cato to take possession of it. Cyprus was one of the chief seats of the worship of Aphrodite (Venus), who is hence called Cypriis or Cypria, and whose worship was introduced into the island by the Phœnicians.

CYPSĒLA (τὰ Κύψελα: Κυψέλιος, -ληνός). 1. A town in Arcadia, on the frontiers of Laconia.— 2. (Now Ipsalla), a town in Thrace, on the Hebrus and the Egnatia Via.

CYPSĒLUS (Κύψελος). 1. Father of Merope and grandfather of Ægyptus. Vid. ÆPYTUS.— 2. Of Corinth, son of Ætïon. The mother of Cypselus belonged to the house of the Bacchiadæ, that is, to the Doric nobility of Corinth. According to tradition, she married Ætïon, because, being ugly, she met with no one among the Bacchiadæ who would have her as his wife. As the oracle of Delphi had declared that her son would prove formidable to the ruling party at Corinth, the Bacchiadæ attempted to murder the child. But his mother concealed him in a chest (κυνψέλη), from which he derived his name Cypselus. When he had grown up to manhood, he expelled the Bacchiadæ, with the help of the people, and then established himself as tyrant. He reigned thirty years, B.C. 656–625, and was succeeded by his son Periander. The celebrated chest of Cypselus, consisting of cedar wood, ivory, and gold, and richly adorned with figures in relief, is described at length by Pausanias (v., 17, &c.).

CYRAUNIS (Κύραυνις), an island off the northern coast of Africa, mentioned by Herodotus (iv., 95); probably the same as CERCINE.

CYRENÆICA (ἡ Κυρρηαία, ἡ Κυρρηαία χώρα, Herod.: now Derna or Jebel-Akhdar, i. e., the Green Mountain, the northeastern part of Tripoli), a district of Northern Africa, between Marmarica on the east and the Regio Syrtica on the west, was considered to extend in its widest limits from the Philænorum Archæ at the bottom of the Great Syrtis to the Chersonesus Magna or northern headland of the Gulf of Platea (now Gulf of Bomba), or even to the Catabathmus Magnus (now Marsa Sollum); but the part actually possessed and cultivated by the Greek colonists can only be considered as beginning at the northern limit of the sandy shores of the Great Syrtis, at Boreum Promontorium (now Ras Teyonas, south of Ben-Ghazi), between which and the Chersonesus Magna the country projects into the Mediterranean in the form of a segment of a circle, whose chord is above one hundred and fifty miles long and its are above two hundred. From its position, formation, climate, and soil, this region is perhaps one of the most delightful on the surface of the globe. Its centre is occupied by a moderately elevated table-land, whose edge runs parallel to the coast, to which it sinks down in a succession of terraces, clothed with verdure, intersected by mountain streams running through ravines filled with the richest vegetation, exposed to the cool sea-breezes from the north, and sheltered by the mass of the mountain from the sands and hot winds of the Sahara. These slopes produced the choicest fruits, vegetables, and flowers, and some very rare plants, such as the silphium, yielding the ὄρος Κυρηναίος. The various harvests, at the different elevations, lasted for eight months of the year. With these physical advantages, the people naturally became prone to luxury. Their country was, however, exposed to actual ravages by locusts. The belt of mountainous land extends inward from the coast about seventy or eighty miles. The first occupation of this by the Greeks, of which we have any clear account, was effected by BARRUS, who led a colony from the island of Thera, and first established himself on the island of Platea at the eastern extremity of the district, and afterward built CYRENE (B.C. 631), where he founded a dynasty, which ruled over the country during eight reigns, though with comparatively little power over some of the other Greek cities. Of these the earliest founded were TEUCHIRA and HESPERIS, then BARCA, a colony from Cyrene; and these, with Cyrene itself and its port APOLLONIA, formed the original Libyan Pentapolis, though this name seems not to have come into general use till under the Ptolemies. The comparative independence of Barca, and the temporary conquest of the country by the Persians under Cambyses, diminished the power of the later kings of Cyrene, and at last the dynasty was overthrown and a republic established in the latter part of the fifth century B.C. When Alexander invaded Egypt, the Cyrenæans formed an alliance with him; but their country was made subject to Egypt by Ptolemy, the son of Lagus. It appears to have flourished under the Ptolemies, who pursued their usual policy of raising new cities at the expense of the ancient ones, or restoring the latter under new names. Thus Hesperis became Berenice, Teuchira was called Arsinoë, Barca was entirely eclipsed by its port, which was raised into a city under the name of Ptolemais, and Cyrene suffered from the favors bestowed upon its port Apollonia. The country was now usually called Pentapolis, from the five cities of Cyrene, Apollonia, Ptolemais, Arsinoë, and Berenice. In B.C. 95 the last Egyptian governor, Apion, an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Physcon, made the country over to the Romans, who at first gave the cities their freedom, and afterward formed the district under the name of Cyrenaica, with the island of Crete, into a province. Under Constantine Cyrenaica was separated from Crete, and made a distinct province under the name of Libya Superior. The first great blow to the prosperity of the country was given by the murderous coufiet which ensued on an insurrection of the Jews (who had long settled here in great numbers) in the reign of Trajan. As the Roman empire declined, the attacks of the native Libyan tribes became more frequent and formidable, and the sufferings caused by their inroads and by locusts, plague, and earthquakes, are most pathetically described by Synesius, bishop of Ptolemais, in the fifth century. In the seventh century the country was overrun by the Persians, and soon afterward it fell a final prey to the great Arabian invasion.

CYRENE (Κυρήνη), daughter of Hypseus, mother of Aristæus by Apollo, was carried by the god from Mount Pelion to Libya, where the city of Cyrene derived its name from her.

CYRĒNĒ (Κυρήνη: Κυρηναίος: now Ghrenehah, with very large ruins), the chief city of CYRENAICA in Northern Africa, was founded by BATTUS (B.C. 631) over a fountain consecrated to Apollo, and called Cyre (Κύρη: Ἀπόλλωνος κρήνη), which supplied the city with water, and then ran down to the sea through a beautiful ravine. The city stood eighty stadia (eight geographical miles) from the coast, on the edge of the upper of two terraces of table-land, at the height of eighteen hundred feet above the sea, in one of the finest situations in the world. The road which connected it with its harbor, Apollonia, still exists, and the ruins of Cyrene, though terribly defaced, are very extensive, comprising streets, aqueducts, temples, theatres, tombs, paintings, sculpture, and inscriptions. In the face of the terrace on which the city stands is a vast subterranean necropolis. For the history of the city and surrounding country, vid. CYRENAICA. Among its celebrated natives were the philosopher Aristippus, the poet Callimachus, and the Christian bishop and orator Synesius.

[CYRENIUS. vid. QUIRINIUS.]

CYRESCHĀTA or CYRĒPŌLIS (Κυρέσχατα, Κύρα, Κύρον πόλις), a city of Sogdiana, on the Jaxartes, the furthest of the colonies founded by Cyrus, and the extreme city of the Persian empire: destroyed, after many revolts, by Alexander. Its position is doubtful, but it was probably not far from Alexandreschata (now Kokand).

[CYRENUS (Κύρονος), Greek name of Corsica. vid. CORSICA.]

[CYROPOLIS (Κύρον πόλις). vid. CYRESCHATA.]

CYRILLUS (Κύριλλος). 1. Bishop of Jerusalem, A.D. 351–386, was a firm opponent of the Arians, by whose influence he was banished three times from Jerusalem. His works are not numerous. The most important are lectures to catechumens, &c., and a letter to the Emperor Constantius, giving an account of the luminous cross which appeared at Jerusalem, 351. The best editions are by Miles, Oxford, 1703, fol., and by Touttee, Paris, 1720, fol.—2. Bishop of Alexandria A.D. 412–444, of which city he was a native. He was fond of power, and of a restless and turbulent spirit. He perscuted the Jews, whom he expelled from Alexandria; and after a long-protracted struggle he procured the desposition of Nestorius, bishop of Constantiople. He was the author of a large number of works, many of which are extant; but in a literary view they are almost worthless. The best edition is by Aubert, Paris, 1638, 6 vols., fol.

CYRRHESTICE (Κυρρηστική), the name given under the Seleucidæ to a province of Syria, lying between Commagene on the north and the plain of Antioch on the south, between Mount Amanus on the west and the Euphrates on the east. After the time of Constantine, it was united with Commagene into one province, under the name of Euphratesia.

CYRRHUS or CYRUS (Κύρρος, Κύρος: now Korus?), a city of Syria, founded under the Seleucidæ, and called after the city of the same name in Macedonia; chiefly remarkable as the residence and see of Theodoret, who describes its poverty, which he did much to relieve. Justinian rebuilt the walls, and erected an aqueduct.

CYRRHUS, a town in Macedonia, near Pella.

CYRUS (Κύρος). 1. THE ELDER, the founder of the Persian empire. The history of his life was overlaid in ancient times with fables and romances, and is related differently by Herodotus, Ctesias, and Xenophon. The account of Herodotus best preserves the genuine Persian legend, and is to be preferred to those of Ctesias and Xenophon. It is as follows: Cyrus was the son of Cambyses, a noble Persian, and of Mandane, daughter of the Median king Astyages. In consequence of a dream, which seemed to portend that his grandson should be master of Asia, Astyages sent for his daughter when she was pregnant; and, upon her giving birth to a son, he committed it to Harpagus, his confidential attendant, with orders to kill it. Harpagus gave it to a herdsman of Astyages, who was to expose it. But the wife of the herdsman having brought forth a still-born child, they substituted the latter for the child of Mandane, who was reared as the son of the herdsman. When he was ten years old, his true parentage was discovered by the following incident. In the sports of his village, the boys chose him for their king. One of the boys, the son of a noble Median named Artembares, disobeyed his commands, and Cyrus caused him to be severely scourged. Artembares complained to Astyages, who sent for Cyrus, in whose person and courage he discovered his daughter's son. The herdsman and Harpagus, being summoned before the king, told him the truth. Astyages forgave the herdsman, but revenged himself on Harpagus by serving up to him at a banquet the flesh of his own son. As to his grandson, by the advice of the Magians, who assured him that his dreams were fulfilled by the boy's having been a king in sport, he sent him back to his parents in Persia. When Cyrus grew up, he conspired with Harpagus to dethrone his grandfather. He induced the Persians to revolt from the Median supremacy, and at their head marched against Astyages. The latter had given the command of his forces to Harpagus, who deserted to Cyrus. Astyages thereupon placed himself at the head of his troops, but was defeated by Cyrus and taken prisoner, B.C. 559. The Medes accepted Cyrus for their king, and thus the supremacy which they had held passed to the Persians. It was probably at this time that Cyrus received that name, which is a Persian word (Kohr), signifying the Sun. Cyrus now proceeded to conquer the other parts of Asia. In 526 he overthrew the Lydian monarchy, and took Cræsus prisoner. Vid. CRÆSUS. The Greek cities in Asia Minor were subdued by his general Harpagus. He next turned his arms against the Assyrian empire, of which Babylon was then the capital. After defeating the Babylonians in battle, he laid siege to the city, and after a long time he took it by diverting the course of the Euphrates, which flowed through the midst of it, so that his soldiers entered Babylon by the bed of the river. This was in 538. Subsequently he crossed the Araxes, with the intention of subduing the Massagetæ, a Scythian people, but he was defeated and slain in battle. Tomyris, the queen of the Massagetæ, cut off his head, and threw it into a bag filled with human blood, that he might satiate himself (she said) with blood. He was killed in 529. He was succeeded by his son CAMBYSES. Xenophon represents Cyrus as brought up at his grandfather's court, as serving in the Median army under his uncle Cyaxares II., the son and successor of Astyages, of whom Herodotus and Ctesias know nothing; as making war upon Babylon simply as the general of Cyaxares; as marrying the daughter of Cyaxares; and at length dying quietly in his bed, after a sage and Socratic discourse to his children and friends. Xenophon's account is preserved in the Cyropædia, in which he draws a picture of what a wise and just prince ought to be. The work must not be regarded as a genuine history. In the East Cyrus was long regarded as the greatest hero of antiquity, and hence the fables by which his history is obscured. His sepulchre at Pasargadæ was visited by Alexander the Great. The tomb has perished, but the name is found on monuments at Murghab, north of Persepolis.—2. THE YOUNGER, the second of the four sons of Darius Nothus, king of Persia, and of Parysatis, was appointed by his father commander of the maritime parts of Asia Minor, and satrap of Lydia, Phrygia, and Cappadocia, B.C. 407. He assisted Lysander and the Lacedæmonians with large sums of money in their war against the Athenians. Cyrus was of a daring and ambitious temper. On the death of his father and the accession of his elder brother Artaxerxes Mneion, 404, Cyrus formed a plot against the life of Artaxerxes. His design was betrayed by Tissaphernes to the king, who condemned him to death; but, on the intercession of Parysatis, he spared his life and sent him back to his satrapy. Cyrus now gave himself up to the design of dethroning his brother. He collected a powerful native army, but he placed his chief reliance on a force of Greek mercenaries. He set out from Sardis in the spring of 401, and, having crossed the Euphrates at Thapsacus, marched down the river to the plain of Cunaxa, five hundred stadia from Babylon. Here he found Artaxerxes prepared to meet him. Artaxerxes had from four hundred thousand to a million of men; Cyrus had about one hundred thousand Asiatics and thirteen thousand Greeks. The battle was at first altogether in favor of Cyrus. His Greek troops on the right routed the Asiatics who were opposed to them; and he himself pressed forward in the centre against his brother, and had even wounded him, when he was killed by one of the king's body-guard. Artaxerxes caused his head and right hand to be struck off, and sought to have it believed that Cyrus had fallen by his hand. The character of Cyrus is drawn by Xenophon in the brightest colors. It is enough to say that his ambition was gilded by all those brilliant qualities which win men's hearts.—3. An architect at Rome, who died on the same day as Clodius, 52.

CYRUS (Κύρος: now Kour), one of the two great rivers of Armenia, rises in the Caucasus, flows through Iberia, and after forming the boundary between Albania and Armenia, unites with the Araxes, and falls into the western side of the Caspian. There were small rivers of the same name in Media and Persia.

CΥΤΑ or CΥΤΑΕΑ (Κύτα, Κύταια: Κυταίος, Κυταίεύς), a town in Colchis on the River Phasis, where Medea was said to have been born.

CΥTHĒRA (Κύθηρα: Κυθήριος: now Cerigo), a mountainous island off the southwestern point of Laconia, with a town of the same name in the interior, the harbor of which was called SCANĒĒA (Σκανώεα). It was colonized at an early time by the Phœnicians, who introduced the worship of Venus (Aphrodite) into the island, for which it became celebrated. This goddess was hence called CΥTHĒRĒA, CΥTHĒRĒIS; and, according to some traditions, it was in the neighborhood of this island that she first rose from the foam of the sea. The Argives subsequently took possession of Cythera, but were driven out of it by the Lacedæmonians, who added it to their dominions.

CΥTHĒRĒIS, a celebrated courtesan, the mistress of Antony, and subsequently of the poet Gallus, who mentioned her in his poems under the name of Lycoris.

[CΥTHĒRIUS (Κυθήριος), a river of Pisatis in Elis, a tributary of the Alpheus.]

CΥTHĒRUS (Κύθηρος: Κυθήριος), one of the twelve ancient towns of Attica, and subsequently a demus, belonging to the tribe Pandionis.

CΥTHINUS (Κύθνος: Κύθνιος: now Thermia), an island in the Ægean Sea, one of the Cyclades, with a town of the same name, celebrated for its cheese, and also for its warm springs, whence its modern name.

CΥTINIUM (Κυτίμιον: Κυτιμίτης), one of the four cities in Doris, on Parnassus.

CΥTŌRUS or -UM (Κύτωρος or -ον: now Kidros), a town on the coast of Paphlagonia, between Amastri and the promontory Carambis, was a commercial settlement of the people of Sinope. It stood upon or near the mountain of the same name, which is mentioned by the Romans as abounding in box-trees.

CΥZICIUS (Κύζικος), son of Æneus and Ænete, the daughter of Eusorus, or son of Eusorus, or son of Apollo by Stilbe. He was king of the Doliones at Cyzicus on the Propontis. For his connection with the Argonauts, vid. p. 90, b.

CΥZICIUS (Κύζικος: Κυζικηνός: ruins at Bal Kiz or Chizico), one of the most ancient and powerful of the Greek cities in Asia Minor, stood upon an island of the same name in the Propontis (now Sea of Marmara). This island, the earlier name of which was Aretonnēsus (Ἀρετωννῆσος), lay close to the shore of Mysia, to which it was united by two bridges, and afterward (under Alexander the Great) by a mole, which has accumulated to a considerable isthmus. The city of Cyzicus stood on the southern side of the island, at the northern end of the isthmus, on each side of which it had a port. Tradition ascribed the foundation of the city to the Doliones, a tribe of Thessalian Pelasgians, who had been driven from their homes by the Æolians. It was said to have been afterward colonized by the Milesians. It was one of the finest cities of the ancient world for the beauty of its situation and the magnificence of its buildings: it possessed an extensive commerce, and was celebrated for the excellence of its laws and government. Its staters were among the most esteemed gold coins current in Greece. It took no conspicuous place in history till about twenty-two years after the peace of Antalcidas, when it made itself independent of Persia. It preserved its freedom under Alexander and his successors, and was in alliance with the kings of Pergamus, and afterward with the Romans. Its celebrated resistance against Mithradates, when he besieged it by sea and land (B.C. 75), was of great service to the Romans, and obtained for it the rank of a "libera civitas," which it lost again under Tiberius. Under Constantine it became the chief city of the new province of Hellespontus. It was greatly injured by an earthquake in A.D. 443, and finally ruined by its conquest by the Arabians in 675.

[DABRŌNA (now Blackwater), a river of Hi bernia.]

DACHINABĀDES (Δαχιναβάδης), a general name for the southern part of the Indian peninsula, derived from the Sanscrit dakshina, the south wind, and connected with the modern name Deccan.

DĀCĪA (Dacus), as a Roman province, was bounded on the south by the Danube, which separated it from Mœsia, on the north by the Carpathian Mountains, on the west by the River Tysia (now Theiss), and on the east by the River Hierasus (now Pruth), thus comprehending the modern Transylvania, Wallachia, Moldavia, and part of Hungary. The Daci were of the same race and spoke the same language as the Getae, and are therefore usually said to be of Thracian origin. They were a brave and warlike people. In the reign of Augustus they crossed the Danube and plundered the allies of Rome, but were defeated and driven back into their own country by the generals of Augustus. In the reign of Domitian they became so formidable under their king DECERBALUS, that the Romans were obliged to purchase a peace of them by the payment of tribute. Trajan delivered the empire from this disgrace; he crossed the Danube, and after a war of five years (A.D. 101-106), conquered the country, made it a Roman province, and colonized it with inhabitants from all parts of the empire. At a later period Dacia was invaded by the Goths; and as Aurelianus considered it more prudent to make the Danube the boundary of the empire, he resigned Dacia to the barbarians, removed the Roman inhabitants to Mœsia, and gave the name of Dacia (Aureliani) to that part of the province along the Danube where they were settled.

ΔΑΚΤΥΛΙ (Δάκτυλοι), fabulous beings, to whom the discovery of iron and the art of working it by means of fire were ascribed. Their name Dactyls, that is, Fingers, is accounted for in various ways: by their number being five or ten, or by the fact of their serving Rhea just as the fingers serve the hand, or by the story of their having lived at the foot (ἐν δακτύλοις) of Mount Ida in Phrygia as the original seat of the Dactyls, whence they are usually called Idaean Dactyls. In Phrygia they were connected with the worship of Rhea. They are sometimes confounded or identified with the Curetes, Corybantes, Cabiri, and Telchines. This confusion with the Cabiri also accounts for Samothrace being in some accounts described as their residence. Other accounts transfer them to Mount Ida in Crete, of which island they are said to have been the original inhabitants. Their number appears to have been originally three: Celmis (the smelter), Damnameneus (the hammer), and Aemon (the anvil). Their number was afterward increased to five, ten (five male and five female), fifty-two, and one hundred.

ΔΑΔΑΣΤΑΝΑ (ἡ Δαδαστῆνα: now Torbaleh or Kestabeg?), a fortress on the borders of Bithynia and Galatia, where the Emperor Jovian died suddenly, A.D. 364.

[ΔΑΔΙΧÆ (Δαδίκαι), a tribe of the Persian empire, who formed part of the seventh satrapy of Darius.]

ΔΑΔΑΛΑ (τὰ Δαίδαλα), a city in Asia Minor, upon the Gulf of Glaucus, on the borders of Caria and Lycia. The same name was given to a mountain overhanging the town.

[ΔΑΔΑΛΙΟΝ (Δαιδάλιον), son of Lucifer, and father of Chione, who was slain by Diana. Dædalion, out of grief at her death, threw himself from Parnassus, but was changed into a falcon.]

ΔΑΔΑΛΟΣ (Δαίδαλος). 1. A mythical personage, under whose name the Greek writers personified the earliest development of the arts of sculpture and architecture, especially among the Athenians and Cretans. The ancient writers generally represent Dædalus as an Athenian, of the royal race of the Erechthidæ. Others called him a Cretan, on account of the long time he lived in Crete. He is said to have been the son of Metion, the son of Eupalamus, the son of Erechtheus. Others make him the son of Eupalamus or of Palamaon. His mother is called Aleippe, or Iphinoë, or Phrasimede. He devoted himself to sculpture, and made great improvements in the art. He instructed his sister's son, Calos, Talus, or Perdix, who soon came to surpass him in skill and ingenuity, and Dædalus killed him through envy. Vid. PERDIX.

Being condemned to death by the Areopagus for this murder, he went to Crete, where the fame of his skill obtained for him the friendship of Miuos. He made the well-known wooden cow for Pasiphaë; and when Pasiphaë gave birth to the Minotaur, Dædalus constructed the labyrinth at Cnosus in which the monster was kept. For his part in this affair, Dædalus was imprisoned by Minos; but Pasiphaë released him, and, as Minos had seized all the ships on the coast of Crete, Dædalus procured wings for himself and his son Icarus, and fastened them on with wax. Dædalus himself flew safe over the Ægean, but, as Icarus flew too near the sun, the wax by which his wings were fastened on was melted, and he dropped down and was drowned in that part of the Ægean which was called after him the Icarian Sea. Dædalus fled to Sicily, where he was protected by Cocalus, the king of the Sicani. When Miuos heard where Dædalus had taken refuge, he sailed with a great fleet to Sicily, where he was treacherously murdered by Cocalus or his daughters. According to some accounts, Dædalus first alighted in his flight from Crete at Cumæ in Italy, where he erected a temple to Apollo, in which he dedicated the wings with which he had fled from Crete. Several other works of art were attributed to Dædalus, in Greece, Italy, Libya, and the islands of the Mediterranean. They belong to the period when art began to be developed. The name of Dadala was given by the Greeks to the ancient wooden statues, ornamented with gilding and bright colors and real drapery, which were the earliest known forms of the images of the gods, after the mere blocks of wood or stone, which were at first used for symbols of them.—2. Of Sicyon, a statuary in bronze, son and disciple of Patrocles, flourished B.C. 400.

ΔΑΪΧÆ (Δάαι), a great Scythian people, who led a nomad life over a great extent of country on the east of the Caspian, in Hyrcania (which still bears the name of Daghestan), on the banks of the Margus, the Oxus, and even the Jaxartes. Some of them served as cavalry and horse-archers in the armies of Darius Codomanus, Alexander, and Antiochus the Great, and they also made good foot-soldiers.

ΔΑΙΜΑΧΟΣ (Δαίμαχος), of Plataeæ, was sent by Seleucus as ambassador to Sandrocottus, king of India, about B.C. 312, and wrote a work on India, which is lost.

[ΔΑΪΦΙΑΝΤΟΣ (Δαίφαντος), a Theban, slain at Mantinea; his bravery and skill were indicated by the fact that Epaminondas, when mortally wounded, named him as the one best qualified to succeed to the command.]

ΔΑΛΜΑΤΙΑ or ΔΕΛΜΑΤΙΑ (Δαλματία: Δαλματίς, more anciently Δαλματιεύς: now Dalmata), a part of the country along the eastern coast of the Adriatic Sea included under the general name of Illyricum, was separated from Liburnia on the north by the Titus (now Kerka), and from Greek Illyria on the south by the Drilo (now Drino), and extended inland to the Bebian mountains and the Drinus, thus nearly corresponding to the modern Dalmatia. The capital was DALMINIUM or DELMINIUM, from which the country derived its name. The next most important town was SALONA, the residence of Diocletian. The Dalmatians were a brave and warlike people and gave much trouble to the Romans. In B.C. 119 their country was overrun by L. Metellus, who assumed, in consequence, the surname Dalmaticus, but they continued independent of the Romans. In 39 they were defeated by Asinius Pollio, of whose Dalmaticus triumphus Horace speaks (Carm., ii, 1, 16); but it was not till the year 23 that they were finally subdued by Statilius Taurus. They took part in the great Pannonian revolt under their leader Bato; but, after a three years' war, were again reduced to subjection by Tiberius, A.D. 9.

DAMAGĒTUS (Δαμάγητος), king of Ialysus in Rhodes, married, in obedience to the Delphic oracle, the daughter of Aristomenes of Messene, and from this marriage sprang the family of the Diagoridæ, who were celebrated for their victories at Olympia. Vid. ARISTOMENES.

[DAMAGON (Δαμάγων), a Spartan, who, with Leon and Alcidas, superintended the planting of the Lacedæmonian colony Heraclea in Phthiotis, B.C. 426.]

DĀMĀLIS OR BOUS (Δάμαλις, ἡ Βοῦς), a small place in Bithynia, on the shore of the Thracian Bosphorus, north of Chalcedon; celebrated by tradition as the landing-place of Io, the memory of whose passage was preserved by a bronze cow set up here by the Chalcedonians.

DAMARĀTUS. Vid. DEMARATUS.

[DAMASCĒNUS, NICOLAUS. Vid. NICOLAUS.]

DAMASCĪUS (Δαμάσκιος), the Syrian, of Damascus, whence he derived his name, the last of the renowned teachers of the Neo-Platonic philosophy at Athens, was born about A.D. 480. He first studied at Alexandria and afterward at Athens, under Marinus and Zeudotus, whom he succeeded. When Justinian closed the heathen schools of philosophy at Athens in 529, Damascius emigrated to King Chosroës of Persia. He afterward returned to the west, since Chosroës had stipulated in a treaty that the heathen adherents of the Platonic Philosophy should be tolerated by the Byzantine emperor. The only work of Damascius which has been printed is entitled "Doubts and Solutions of the first Principles," edited by Kopp, Francof., 1828, 8vo.

DAMASCUS (ἡ Δαμασκός; Δαμασκηνός; now Damashk, Damascus, Esh-Sham), one of the most ancient cities of the world, mentioned as existing in the time of Abraham (Gen., xiv, 15), stood in the district afterward called Cœle-Syria, upon both banks of the River Chrysorrhœos or Bardines (now Burada), the waters of which, drawn off by canals and aqueducts, fertilized the plain around the city. This plain is open on the south and east, and sheltered on the west and north by an offshoot of the Antilibanus; its fruits were celebrated in ancient, as in modern times; and altogether the situation of the city is one of the finest on the globe. In the earliest times, except during the short period for which David subjected it to the Hebrew monarchy, Damascus was the seat of an independent kingdom, called the kingdom of Syria, which was subdued by the Assyrians, and passed successively under the dominion of the Babylonians, the Persians, the Greek kings of Syria, and the Romans, the last of whom obtained possession of it after the conquest of Tigranes, and assigned it to the province of Syria. It flourished greatly under the emperors, and is called by Julian (Epist. 24) "the Eye of all the East." Diocletian established in it a great factory for arms; and hence the origin of the fame of Damascus blades. Its position on one of the high roads from Lower to Upper Asia gave it a considerable trade. The surrounding district was called Δαμασκηνή.

DAMASIPPUS, L. JUNIUS BRUTUS. Vid. BRUTUS, No. 10.

DAMASIPPUS LICĪNIŪS. 1. A Roman senator, fought on the side of the Pompeians in Africa, and perished B.C. 47.—2. A contemporary of Cicero, who mentions him as a lover of statues, and speaks of purchasing a garden from Damasippus. He is probably the same person as the Damasippus ridiculed by Horace. (Sat., ii, 3, 16, 64.) It appears from Horace that Damasippus had become bankrupt, in consequence of which he intended to put an end to himself; but he was prevented by the Stoic Stertinius, and then turned Stoic himself, or at least affected to be one by his long beard. The Damasippus mentioned by Juvenal (Sat., viii, 147, 151, 167) is a fictitious name, under which the satirist ridiculed some noble lover of horses.

[DAMASITHĪMUS (Δαμασίθιμος), son of Candaules, prince of Calynda in Caria, followed Xerxes to Greece, and perished at the battle of Salamis.]

DAMASTES (Δαμάστης), of Sigæum, a Greek historian, and a contemporary of Herodotus and Hellanicus of Lesbos; his works are lost.

[DAMASTORIDES (Δαμαστορίδης), patronymic from Damastor, as Tlepolemus in the Iliad, and Agelaus in the Odyssey.]

[DAMASUS (Δάμασος). 1. A Trojan, slain by Polyætus.—2. D. SCOMBRUS, a celebrated rhetorician of Tralles in Cilicia.]

DAMĪA. Vid. ALEXESIA.

DAMNŌNĪ. 1. OR DUMNONIĪ OR DUMNUNĪ, a powerful people in the southwest of Britain, in habiting Cornwall, Devonshire, and the western part of Somersetshire, from whom was called the promontory DAMNONIUM, also OCRĪNUM, (now Cape Lizard) in Cornwall.—2. OR DAMNĪ, a people in north Britain, inhabiting parts of modern Perth, Argyle, Stirling, and Dumbarton-shires.

DAMO (Δαμῷ), a daughter of Pythagoras and Theano, to whom Pythagoras intrusted his writings, and forbade her to give them to any one. This command she strictly observed, although she was in extreme poverty, and received many requests to sell them.

DAMOCELES (Δαμοκλῆς), a Syracusan, one of the companions and flatterers of the elder Dionysius. Damocles having extolled the great felicity of Dionysius on account of his wealth and power, the tyrant invited him to try what his happiness really was, and placed him at a magnificent banquet, in the midst of which Damocles saw a naked sword suspended over his head by a single horse-hair—a sight which quickly dispelled all his visions of happiness. The story is alluded to by Horace. (Carm., iii, 1, 17.)

[DAMOCRĪTUS (Δαμοκρίτος), of Calydon, a general of the Ætolian league, B.C. 200, opposed the Romans and sided with the Macedonians; he subsequently fell into the hands of the Romans, and was thrown into prison, from which he escaped by night, but, being pursued, threw himself on his own sword.]

DAMON (Δάμων). 1. Of Athens, a celebrated musician and sophist. He was a pupil of Lamprus and Agathocles, and the teacher of Pericles, with whom he lived on the most intimate terms. He is also said to have taught Socrates, but this statement is more doubtful. In his old age he was banished from Athens, probably on account of the part he had taken in politics.—2. A Pythagorean, and friend of PHINTIAS (not Pythias). When the latter was condemned to die for a plot against Dionysius I. of Syracuse, he asked leave of the tyrant to depart for the purpose of arranging his domestic affairs, promising to find a friend who would be pledge for his appearance at the time appointed for his punishment. To the surprise of Dionysius, Damon unhesitatingly offered himself to be put to death instead of his friend, should he fail to return. Phintias arrived just in time to redeem Damon, and Dionysius was so struck with this instance of firm friendship on both sides, that he pardoned the criminal, and entreated to be admitted as a third into their bond of brotherhood.

DAMŌXĒNUS (Δαμόξενος), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, and perhaps partly of the middle. [Some fragments remain, which have been collected by Meineke, Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. ii, p. 1149–53, edit. minor.]

DANA (Δάνα), a great city of Cappadocia (Xen., Anab., i, 2, § 20), probably the same as the later TYANA.

DĀNĀĒ (Δανάη) daughter of Acrisius and mother of Perseus. Vid. ACRIISIUS. An Italian legend related that Danaë came to Italy, built the town of Ardea, and married Pilumnus, by whom she became the mother of Daunus, the ancestor of Turnus.

DANASTRIS. Vid. TYRAS.

DĀNĀUS (Δαναός), son of Belus and twin-brother of Ægyptus. Belus had assigned Libya to Danaüs, but the latter, fearing his brother and his brother's sons, fled with his fifty daughters to Argos. Here he was elected king by the Argives, in place of Gelanor, the reigning monarch. The story of the murder of the fifty sons of Ægyptus by the fifty daughters of Danaüs (the Danaides) is given under ÆGYPTUS. There was one exception to the murderous deed. The life of Lynceus was spared by his wife Hypermnestra; and, according to the common tradition, he afterward avenged the death of his brothers by killing his father-in-law, Danaüs. According to the poets, the Danaides were punished in Hades by being compelled everlastingly to pour water into a sieve (inane lymphae dotium fundo percuntis imo, Hor., Carm., iii., 11, 26). From Danaüs the Argives were called Danaï, which name, like that of the Argives, was often applied by the poets to the collective Greeks.

[DĀNĀRĪ (Δανάρριοι) and DĀNĀRĪĒ, a people on the coasts of the Palus Mæotis and the Euxine, traces of whose name appear to remain in the modern DRANDI.]

DANŪBIUS (now Danube, in German Donau), also DANUVIUS on coins and inscriptions, called ISTER (Ἴστρος) by the Greeks, one of the chief rivers of Europe, rises in the Black Forest, and, after flowing one thousand seven hundred and seventy miles, falls into the Black Sea. It is mentioned by Hesiod, but the Greeks knew very little about it. According to Herodotus, it rises at the city Pyrene, among the Celts, and flows through the whole of Europe. The Romans first obtained some accurate information concerning the river at the commencement of the empire. Tiberius, in his campaign against the Vindelicians, visited the sources of the Danube, which, according to Tacitus, rises in MOUNT ABNOBA. The Danube formed the northern boundary of the empire, with the exception of the time that DACIA was a Roman province. In the Roman period, the upper part of the river, from its source as far as Vienna, was called Danubius, while the lower part to its entrance in the Black Sea was named Ister.

DAORSI or DAORIZI (Δαορίζοι), a tribe in Dalmatia.

DAPHNĒ PĒLŪSĪĒ (Δάφνη αἱ Πελρῦσαι: now Safnas), a border fortress of Lower Egypt against Arabia and Syria, stood on the right hand of the Nile, sixteen Roman miles southwest of Pelusium. Many Jews settled here after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians.

DAPHNĒ (Δάφνη). 1. Daughter of the river-god Ladon in Arcadia, by Ge (the earth), or of the river-god Peneus in Thessaly. She was extremely beautiful and was loved by Apollo and Leucippus, son of Cœnomaus, but she rejected both their suits. In order to win her, Leucippus disguised himself as a maiden, but Apollo's jealousy caused his discovery, and he was killed by the companions of Daphne. Apollo now pursued Daphne, and she was on the point of being overtaken by him: she prayed for aid, and was metamorphosed into a laurel-tree (δάφνη), which became, in consequence, the favorite tree of Apollo.—2. Daughter of Tiresias, better known under the name of Manto. Vid. MANTO.

DAPHNĒ (Δάφνη). 1. (Now Beit-el-Moie, or Babyla?) a beautiful spot, five miles south of Antioch in Syria, to which it formed a sort of park or pleasure garden. Here was a grove of laurels and cypresses, eighty stadia in circuit, watered by fresh springs, and consecrated by Seleucus Nicator to Apollo, to whom also a magnificent temple was built by Antiochus Epiphanes, and adorned with a splendid statue of the god by Bryaxis. To this temple were attached periodical games and the privilege of asylum. Daphne was a royal residence of the Seleucidæ and of the later Roman emperors, and a favorite resort of the people of Antioch, who, however, carried the pleasures they enjoyed here so far beyond the bounds of moderation, that the phrase Daphnici mores passed into a proverb. It was from this place that Antoch received its distinguishing name, 'A. ἐπὶ Δάφνης.—2. A place in Upper Galilee, on the Lake Semehonitis.

DAPHNIS (Δάφνης). 1. A Sicilian hero, to whom the invention of bucolic poetry is ascribed. He was son of Mercury (Hermes) by a nymph. His mother placed him when an infant in a charming valley in a laurel grove, from which he received the name of Daphnis. He was brought up by nymphs; was taught by Pan to play on the flute; he became a shepherd, and tended his flocks on Mount Ætna winter and summer. A Naiad fell in love with him, and made him swear that he would never love any other maiden, threatening him with blindness if he broke his oath. For a time the handsome shepherd resisted the numerous temptations to which he was exposed, but at last he forgot himself, having been made intoxicated by a princess. The Naiad accordingly punished him with blindness, or, as others relate, changed him into a stone. Previous to this time he had composed bucolic poetry, and with it delighted Diana (Artemis) during the chase. After having become blind, he invoked his father to help him. The god accordingly raised him up to heaven, and caused a well to gush forth on the spot where this happened. The well bore the name of Daphnis, and at it the Sicilians offered an annual sacrifice.—[2. Tyrant of Abydos, one of those who were left by Darius in charge of the bridge of boats over the Danube, and who refused to destroy the bridge as urged by Miltiades.]

DAPHNŪS (Δάφνους -οὔντος: Δαφνούσιος), a town of the Locri Opuntii on the coast, in earlier times belonging to Phocis.

DARĀDAX (Δαράδαξ: now Abu-Ghalgal?), a river of Upper Syria, flowing into the Euphrates, thirty parasangs from the River Chalos, and fifteen from Thapsacus.

[DARDĀNES (Δαρδανεῖς), a people of Media, on the Gyndes, mentioned by Herodotus (i, 189), otherwise unknown.]

DARDĀNI (Δάρδανοι: Δαρδανῆται, Strab.), a people in Upper Mœsia, who also occupied part of Illyriëum, and extended as far as the frontiers of Macedonia.

DARDĀNĪA (Δαρδανία), a district of the Troad, lying along the Hellespont, southwest of Abydos, and adjacent on the land side to the territories of Ilium and Seepsis. Its people (Δάρδανοι) appear in the Trojan war, and their name is often interchanged with that of the Trojans, especially by the Roman poets. Vid. DARDANUS.

DARDĀNŪS (Δάρδανος). 1. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Electra. His native place in the various traditions is Areadia, Crete, Troas, or Italy. Dardanus is the mythical ancestor of the Trojans, and through them of the Romans. The Greek traditions usually make him a king in Areadia. He first emigrated to Samothrace, and afterward passed over to Asia, where he received a tract of land from King Teucer, on which he built the town of Dardania. He married Batea, daughter of Teucer, or Arisbe of Crete, by whom he became the father of Erichthonius. His grandson was Tros, who removed to Troy the Palladium, which had belonged to his grandfather. According to the Italian traditions, Dardanus was the son of Corythus, an Etruscan prince of Corythus

(now Cortona), or of Jupiter (Zeus) by the wife of Corythus; and, as in the Greek tradition, he afterward emigrated to Phrygia.—[2. A Stoic philosopher, who, with Mnesarchus, stood at the head of the Stoic school at Athens; contemporary with the Academic Antiochus of Asealon.]

DARDĀNŪS (ἡ Δάρδανος: Δαρδανεύς), also -UM and -IUM, a Greek city in the Troad on the Hellespont, near the Promontorium Dardanis or Dardanium and the mouth of the River Rhodius, twelve Roman miles from Ilium, and nine (or seventy stadia) from Abydos. It was built by Æolian colonists, at some distance from the site of the ancient city Dardania (Δαρδανίη), which is mentioned by Homer (Il., ii, 216) as founded by Dardanus before the building of Ilium. The Romans, after the war with Antiochus the Great, made Dardanus and Ilium free cities, as an act of filial piety. The peace between Sulla and Mithradates was made here, B.C. 84. From Dardanus arose the name of the Castles of the Dardanelles, after which the Hellespont is now called.

DARES (Δάρης). 1. A priest of Vulcan (Hephestus) at Troy, mentioned in the Iliad (v, 9), to whom was ascribed in antiquity an Iliad, which was believed to be more ancient than the Homeric poems. This work, which was undoubtedly the composition of a sophist, is lost; but there is extant a Latin work in prose in forty-four chapters, on the destruction of Troy, bearing the title Daretis Phrygii de Excidio Trojæ Historia, and purporting to be a translation of the work of Dares by Cornelius Nepos. But the Latin work is evidently of much later origin; it is the production of a person of little education and of bad taste; and it is supposed by some to have been written even as late as the twelfth century. It is usually printed with Dietsy Cretensis; the best edition is by Dederich, Bonn, 1837, 8vo.—[2. A Trojan, companion of Æneas, distinguished for his skill in boxing; vanquished and driven from the field by the aged Entellus.]

DARIŪS (Δαρειός). 1. King of Persia, B.C. 521–485, was the son of Hystaspes, satrap of the province of Persia, and of the royal family of the Achemenidæ. He was one of the seven Persian chiefs who destroyed the usurper Smerdis. The seven chiefs agreed that the one of them whose horse neighed first at an appointed time and place, should become king; and as the horse of Darius neighed first, he was declared king. He married Atossa and Artystone, the two daughters of Cyrus, and Parmys, the daughter of Cyrus's son Smerdis, and Phædime, the daughter of Otanes, one of the seven chiefs. He then began to set in order the affairs of his vast empire, which he divided into twenty satrapies, assigning to each its amount of tribute. Persia proper was exempted from all taxes, except those which it had formerly been used to pay. It was in the reign of Darius that the consolidation of the empire was effected, for Cyrus and Cambyses had been engaged in continual wars. A few years after his accession the Babylonians revolted, but after a siege of twenty months, Babylon was taken by a stratagem of Zoræus, about 516. The reduction of Babylon was followed by the invasion of Scythia (about 508). Darius crossed the Danube, and marched far into the interior of modern Russia; but, after losing a large number of men by famine, and being unable to meet with the enemy, he was obliged to retreat. On his return to Asia, he sent part of his forces, under Megabazus, to subdue Thrace and Macedonia, which thus became subject to the Persian empire. The most important event in the reign of Darius was the commencement of the great war between the Persians and the Greeks. The history of this war belongs to the biographies of other men. In 501 the Ionian Greeks revolted; they were assisted by the Athenians, who burned Sardis, and thus provoked the hostility of Darius.

Vid. ARISTAGORAS, HISTÆUS. In 492 Mardonius was sent with a large army to invade Greece, but he lost a great part of his fleet off Mount Athos, and the Thracians destroyed a vast number of his land forces. Vid. MARDONIUS. He was, in consequence, recalled, and Datis and Artaphernes appointed to the command of the invading army. They took Eretria in Eubœa, and landed in Attica, but were defeated at Marathon by the Athenians under the command of Miltiades. Vid. MILTIADES. Darius now resolved to call out the whole force of his empire for the purpose of subduing Greece; but, after three years of preparation, his attention was called off by the rebellion of Egypt. He died in 485, leaving the execution of his plans to his son Xerxes.—II. King of Persia, 424–405, named OCHUS (Ὠχος), before his accession, and then surnamed NOTHUS (Νοθος), or the Bastard, from his being one of the bastard sons of Artaxerxes I. Darius obtained the crown by putting to death his brother SOGDIANUS, who had murdered Xerxes II. He married Parysatis, daughter of Xerxes I., by whom he had two sons, Artaxerxes II., who succeeded him, and Cyrus the younger. Darius was governed by eunuchs, and the weakness of his government was shown by repeated insurrections of his satraps. In 414 the Persians were expelled from Egypt by Amyrteus, who reigned there six years, and at whose death (408) Darius was obliged to recognize his son Pausiris as his successor.—III. Last king of Persia, 336–331, named CODOMANNUS before his accession, was the son of Arsames and Sisygambis, and a descendant of Darius II. He was raised to the throne by Bagoas, after the murder of ARSES. The history of his conquest by Alexander the Great, and of his death, is given in the life of ALEXANDER.

[DASCON (Δάσκων), a Syracusan, founder of Camarina.]

DASCON (Δάσκων; Δασκόνιος), a fortress near Syracuse, situated on a bay of the same name.

[DASCŪLES (Δασκύλης), father of Gyges.]

DASCŪLUM (Δασκύλιον or -ειον; Δασκυλίτης; now Diaskili), a town of Bithynia, on the Propontis, near a lake called Dascylitis.

DASĒA (Δασέα, also Δασίαι; Δασεύτης), a small town in Arcadia, near Megalopolis.

DASSARĒTĪ or DASSARĪTĒ, DASSARĒTE (Δασσαρήτιοι, Δασσαρήται), a people in Greek Illyria, on the borders of Macedonia: their chief town was LYCHNIDUS (Λύχνιδος), on a hill, on the northern side of the Lake LYCHNITIS, which was so called after the town.

DATĀMES (Δατάμης), a distinguished Persian general, a Carian by birth, son of Camissares by a Scythian mother. He succeeded his father as satrap of Cilicia, under Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon), but, in consequence of the machinations of his enemies at the Persian court, he threw off his allegiance to the king, and made common cause with the other satraps who had revolted from Persia. He defeated the generals who were sent against him, but was assassinated by Mithradates, son of Ariobarzanes, about B.C. 362. Cornelius Nepos, who has written his life, calls him the bravest and most able of all barbarian generals, except Hamilcar and Hannibal.

DĀTIS (Δᾶτις), a Mede, commanded, along with Artaphernes, the Persian army of Darius, which was defeated at Marathon, B.C. 490.

DATUM or DATVS (Δάτων, Δάτος; Δατηρός; now Esqui-Cavallo), a Thracian town on the Strymonic Gulf, subject to Macedonia, with gold mines in Mount Pangæus in the neighborhood, whence came the proverb a 'Datum of good things.'

DAULIS or DAULIA (Δαυλί, -λις, Δαυλία; Δαυλιεύς, Δαυλίος; now Dauvli), an ancient town in Phocis, on the road from Chæronœa and Orchomenus to Delphi, situated on a lofty hill: celebrated in mythology as the residence of the Thracian king TEREUS, and as the scene of the tragic story of PHILOMELA and PROCNE. Hence DAULIAS (Δαυλιας) is the surname both of Procne and Philomela.

DAUNĪA. Vid. APULIA.

DAUNVS (Δαῖνος). I. Son of Lycaon, and brother of Iapyx and Peuceetius. The three brothers crossed over from Illyria, and settled in Apulia, which was divided into three parts, and named after them. The poets sometimes gave the name of Daunia to the whole of Apulia: Horace (Carm., i., 22, 14) uses the adjective Daunias (sc. terra).—2. Son of Pilumnus and Danaë, wife of Venilia, and ancestor of Turnus.

[DECĀPŌLIS (Δεκάπολις), in Palestine, east of the Jordan, an association composed of the ten cities, Philadelphia, Damascus, Raphana, Seythopolis, Gadara, Hippon, Dion, Pella, Galasa, and Canatha, which, not being inhabited by Jews, formed a confederation for mutual protection against the Asmonean princes of Judæa.]

DECĒBĀLVVS (Δεκέβαλος), a celebrated king of the Dacians during the reigns of Domitian and Trajan. For four years (A.D. 86–90) he carried on war against the Romans with such success, that Domitian was at length glad to conclude peace with him by the payment of an annual tribute. Trajan refused to continue this disgraceful payment, and renewed the war. He defeated the Dacians, and compelled Deccebalus to sue for peace, which was granted (101–103). But in 104 the war broke out again; Deccebalus was again defeated, and put an end to his life; and Dacia became a Roman province, 106.

DEĒĒLEA or -IA (Δεκέλεια; Δεκελεύς; now Biala-Castro), a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Hypothoëntis, lay northwest of Athens, on the borders of Bœotia, near the sources of the Cephisus. In the nineteenth year of the Peloponnesian War (B.C. 413), the Peloponnesians under Agis seized and fortified Decelen, and thereby annoyed the Athenians in many ways during the remainder of the war.

DECENTIUS MAGNUS, brother or cousin of Magnentius, by whom he was created Cæsar, A.D. 351. After the death of MAGNENTIUS, he put an end to his own life, 353.

DECETIA (now Desize), a city of the Ædui, in Gallia Lugdunensis, on an island in the Liger (now Loire).

DECĪATES, a Ligurian people on the coast and about the sources of the Druentia (now Durance). Their chief city, Deciatum (Δεκίητρον), lay between Nicæa and Antipolis.

DECIDIUS SAXA. Vid. SAXA.

DECĪUS MRS, P., plebeians. 1. Consul B.C. 340 with T. Manlius Torquatus in the great Latin war. Each of the consuls had a vision at the night before fighting with the Latins, announcing that the general of one side and the army of the other were devoted to death. The consuls thereupon agreed that the one whose wing first began to waver should devote himself and the army of the enemy to destruction. Decius commanded the left wing, which began to give way, whereupon he devoted himself and the army of the enemy to destruction, according to the formula prescribed by the pontifex maximus, then rushed into the thickest of the enemy, and was slain, leaving the victory to the Romans.—2. Son of the preceding, four times consul, 312, 308, 297, and 295. In his fourth consulship he commanded the left wing at the battle of Sentinum, where he was opposed to the Gauls, and when his troops began to give way, he imitated the example of his father, devoted himself and the enemy to destruction, and fell as a sacrifice for his nation.—3. Son of No. 2, consul 279, in the war against Pyrrhus. According to some, he sacrificed himself in battle like his father and grandfather, but this is not true, for he survived the war with Pyrrhus.

DECĪUS, a Roman emperor, A.D. 249–251, whose full name was C. MESSIUS QUINTUS TRAIANUS DECĪUS, was born at Bubalia, in Pannonia. He was sent by the Emperor Philippus in 249 to restore subordination in the army of Mœsia, but the troops compelled him to accept the purple under threats of death. Decius still assured Philippus of his fidelity; but the latter not trusting these professions, hastened to meet his rival in the field, was defeated near Verona, and slain. The short reign of Decius was chiefly occupied in warring against the Goths. He fell in battle against the Goths together with his son in 251. In his reign the Christians were persecuted with great severity.

DECŪMATES AGRĪ. Vid. AGRĪ DECUMATES.

DEĪXĪNĪRA (Δηϊάνειρα), daughter of Althæa by either Æneus, or Bæolus, (Dionysus), or Dexamenus, and sister of Meleager. Achelous and Heracles both loved Deianira, and fought for the possession of her. Heracles was victorious, and she became his wife. She was the unwilling cause of her husband's death by presenting him with the poisoned robe which the centaur Nessus gave her. In despair, she put an end to her own life. For details, vid. HERCULES.

[DEĪCOON (Δηϊκόων), a Trojan hero, friend of Æneas, slain by Agamemnon.]

DEĪDŪMĪA (Δηϊδούμεια). 1. Daughter of Lycop-

medes in the island of Scyros. When Achilles was concealed there in maiden's attire, she became by him the mother of Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus.—2. Wife of Pirithous, commonly called HIPPODAMIA.—[3. Daughter of Bellerophon, wife of Euander, and mother of Sarpedon; she is called by Homer (Il., vi., 197) Laodamia.]—4. Sister of Pyrrhus, married Demetrius Poliorcetes.

DEĪŌCĒS (Δηϊόκης), first king of Media, after the Medes had thrown off the supremacy of the Assyrians, was the son of Phraortes, and reigned B.C. 709–656. He built the city of Ecbatana, which he made the royal residence. His administration of justice was severe, and he kept a body of spies and informers throughout the whole country. He was succeeded by his son PHRAORTES.

[DEĪŌCHUS (Δηϊόχος), a Greek, slain before Troy by Paris.]

DEĪŌN (Δηϊών), son of Æolus and Enarete, king in Phocis, husband of Diomede, and father of Asteropia, Ænetus, Actor, Phylæus, and Cephalus.

DEĪŌNE (Δηϊώνη), mother of Miletus, who is hence called DEĪONIDES. (Ov., Met., ix., 442.)

[DEIONEUS (Δηϊονεύς). 1. Father of Dia, the wife of Ixion, by whom he was thrown into a pit filled with fire, and there perished.—2. A son of Eurytus of Cæhalia, whom Theseus married to Perigune, the daughter of Siuis.]

[DEĪŌPEA, a beautiful nymph, whom Juno promised to Æolus if he would aid her in destroying the fleet of Æneas.]

[DEIŌPITES (Δηϊοπίτης), a son of Priam, slain by Ulysses (Il., xi, 420); Apollodorus calls him Δηϊόπτης.]

DEIŌTĀRUS (Δηϊόταρος). 1. Tetrarch of Galatia, adhered firmly to the Romans in their wars in Asia against Mithradates, and was rewarded by the senate with the title of king, and the addition of Armenia Minor to his dominions. In the civil war he sided with Pompey, and was present at the battle of Pharsalia. B.C. 48. In 47 he applied to Domitius Calvinus, Cæsar's legate in Asia, for aid against Pharusæes, who had taken possession of Armenia Minor. When Cæsar, in the same year, came into Asia from Egypt, Deiotarus received him with submission, and endeavored to excuse the aid he had given to Pompey. Cæsar deprived him of part of his dominions, but allowed him to retain his regal title. Two years afterward (45) his grandson Castor accused him of having formed a design against Cæsar's life, when he received Cæsar in Galatia. He was defended by Cicero before Cæsar, in the house of the latter at Rome, in the speech (pro Rege Deiotaro) still extant. The result of the trial is not known. After Cæsar's death he obtained from Antony the restitution of his dominions by paying Fulvia a large sum of money. In 42 he joined the party of Brutus and Cassius, and died shortly afterward at a great age.—2. Son and successor of the above. In the war between Antony and Octavianus he took part with the former, but went over from him to the enemy in the battle of Actium, 31.

DEĪPĪŌBE (Δηϊφύβη), the Sibyl at Cumæ, daughter of Glaucus. Vid. SIBYLLA.

DEĪPĪŌBUS (Δηϊφύβος). 1. A son of Priam and Hecuba, and, next to Hector, the bravest among the Trojans. He always supported Paris in his refusal to deliver up Helen to the Trojans; and he married her after the death of Paris. Accordingly, on the fall of Troy, the vengeance of the Greeks was chiefly directed against him. His house was one of the first committed to the flames, and he was slain and fearfully mangled by Menelaus, [the marks of which mutilation his shade still bore in the lower world when encountered by Æneas; who, before leaving Troy, had erected a cenotaph to his memory on Cape Rhœteum.—2. Son of Hippolytus in Amyclæ, who purified Hercules of the murder of Iphitus.]

DEIPHONTES (Δηϊφοντης), son of Antimachus, and husband of Hymetho, the daughter of Temenus the Heraclid, became king of Argos after Temenus had been murdered by his own sons. Pausanias (ii, 19) gives a different account.

[DEIPYLE (Δηϊπύλη), daughter of Adrastus, king of Argos, wife of Tydeus, and mother of Diomedes.]

[DEIPYLLUS (Δηϊπύλλος), a Greek, companion of Diomedes in the Trojan war.]

[DEIPYRUS (Δηϊπύρος), a Greek warrior, slain by Helenus before Troy.]

DELIUM (Δήλιον: now Dhilessi), a town on the coast of Bœotia, in the territory of Tanagra, near the Attic frontier, named after a temple of Apollo, similar to that at Delos. The Athenians used it as a fortress in the early part of the Peloponnesian War, and in B.C. 424 they were defeated here by the Bœotians.

DEIUS and DELIA (Δήλιος, Δήλια), surnames of Apollo and Diana (Artemis) respectively, from the island of DELOS.

DELLIUS, Q., a Roman eque, who frequently changed sides in the civil wars. In B.C. 44 he joined Dolabella in Asia, afterward went over to Cassius, and then united himself to M. Antony. He deserted to Octavianus shortly before the battle of Actium, 31. He appears to have become a personal friend of Octavianus and Mæcenas, and is therefore addressed by Horace in one of his Odes (ii, 3). He wrote a history of Antony's war against the Parthians, in which he had himself fought.

DELMATIUS or DALMATIUS. 1. Son of Constantinus Chlorus and his second wife Theodora. From his half-brother, Constantine the Great, he received the title of censor: he died before A.D. 335.—2. Son of the preceding, was created Cæsar by Constantine the Great, 335; and, upon the division of the empire, received Thrace, Macedonia, and Achaia as his portion. He was put to death in 337 on the death of Constantine.

DELOS or DELUS (ή Δήλος: Δήλιος: now Delo, Deli, Dili, or Sdilli) the smallest of the islands called Cyclades, in the Ægean Sea, lay in the strait between Rhenea and Myconus. It was also called, in earlier times, Asteria, Ortygia, and Chlomydia. According to a legend, founded, perhaps, on some tradition of its late volcanic origin, it was called out of the deep by the trident of Neptune. (Poseidon), but was a floating island until Jupiter (Zeus) fastened it by adamantine chains to the bottom of the sea, that it might be a secure resting-place to Latona (Leto) for the birth of Apollo and Diana (Artemis). Apollo afterward obtained possession of Delos by giving Calauria to Neptune Poseidon) in exchange for it; and it became the most holy seat of the worship of Apollo. Such is the mythical story: we learn from history that Delos was peopled by the Ionians, for whom it was the chief centre of political and religious union in the time of Homer: it was also the seat of an Amphictyony, comprising the surrounding islands. In the time of Pisistratus, Delos became subject to the Athenians: it was made the common treasury of the Greek confederacy for carrying on the war with Persia; but the transference of the treasury to Athens, and the altered character of the league, reduced the island to a condition of absolute political dependence upon Athens. It still possessed, however, a very extensive commerce, which was increased by the downfall of Corinth, when Delos became the chief emporium for the trade in slaves; and it was one of the principal seats of art in Greece, especially for works in bronze, of which metal one of the most esteemed mixtures was called the Delian. An especial sanctity was attached to Delos from its connection with the worship of Apollo; and the peculiar character assigned to the island by the traditions of its origin was confirmed by the remarkable fact that, though of volcanic origin, and in the midst of islands very subject to earthquakes, Delos enjoyed an almost entire exemption from such visitations, so that its being shaken by an earthquake was esteemed a marked prodigy. The city of Delos stood on the west side of the island, at the foot of Mount Cynthus (whence the god's surname of Cynthius), near a little river called Inopus. It contained a temple of Latona (Leto), and the great temple of Apollo. The latter was built near the harbor, and possessed an oracle. Though enriched with offerings from all Greece, and defended by no fortifications, it was so protected from plunder by the sanctity of the place, that even the Persians when sailing against Greece, not only passed it by uninjured, but sent rich presents to the god. With this temple were connected games, called Delia, which were celebrated every four years, and were said to have been founded by Theseus. A like origin is ascribed to the sacred embassy (θεωρία) which the Athenians sent to Delos every year. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. THEORI. The temple and oracle were visited by pilgrims from every quarter, even from the regions of Scythia. The greatest importance was attached to the preservation of the sanctity of the island. It was twice purified by the Athenians; once under Pisistratus, when all tombs within sight of the temple were taken away; and again in B.C. 426, when all human and animal remains were removed entirely from the island, which was henceforth forbidden to be polluted by births or deaths, or by the presence of dogs: all persons about to die or to bring forth children were to be removed to the adjacent island of Rhenea. Delos continued in a flourishing condition, and under the rule of the Athenians, who were confirmed in the possession of it by the Romans, until the Mithradatic War, when Menophanes, one of the generals of Mithradates, inflicted upon it a devastation from which it never again recovered.

DELPHI (οἱ Δελφοί: Δελφός: Delphicus: now

Kastri), a small town in Phocis, but one of the most celebrated in Greece, on account of its oracle of Apollo. It was sixteen stadia in circumference, was situated on a steep declivity on the southern slope of Mount Parnassus, and its site resembled the caeua of a great theatre. It was shut in on the north by a barrier of rocky mountains, which were cleft in the centre into two great cliffs with peaked summits, between which issued the waters of the Castalian spring. It was originally called ΠΥΘΟ (Πυθώ), by which name it is alone mentioned in Homer. The origin of the name of Delphi is uncertain. The ancients derived it from an eponymous hero, Delphus, a descendant of Deucalion; but it has been conjectured that Delphi is connected with adelphos, "brother," and that it was indebted for its name to the twin peaks mentioned above. Delphi was colonized at an early period by Doric settlers from the neighboring town of Lycorëa, on the heights of Parnassus. The government was an oligarchy, and was in the hands of a few distinguished families of Doric origin. From them were taken the chief magistrates, the priests, and a senate consisting of a very few members. Delphi was regarded as the central point of the whole earth, and was hence called the "navel of the earth." It was said that two eagles sent forth by Jupiter, one from the east and another from the west, met at Delphi at the same time. Delphi was the principal seat of the worship of Apollo. Besides the great temple of Apollo, it contained numerous sanctuaries, statues, and other works of art. The Pythian games were also celebrated here, and it was one of the two places of meeting of the Amphictyonic council. The temple of Apollo was situated at the northwestern extremity of the town. The first stone temple was built by Trophonius and Agamodes; and when this was burned down B.C. 548, it was rebuilt by the Amphictyons with still greater splendor. The expense was defrayed by voluntary subscriptions, to which even Anasis, king of Egypt, contributed. The architect was Spitharus of Corinth; the Alæmonidæ contracted to build it, and liberally substituted Parian marble for the front of the building, instead of the common stone which they had agreed to employ. The temple contained immense treasures; for not only were rich offerings presented to it by kings and private persons, who had received favorable replies from the oracle, but many of the Greek states had in the temple separate thesauri, in which they deposited, for the sake of security, many of their valuable treasures. The wealth of the temple attracted Xerxes, who sent part of his army into Phocis to obtain possession of its treasures, but the Persians were driven back by the god himself, according to the account of the Delphians. The Phocians plundered the temple to support them in the war against Thebes and the other Greek states (357-346); and it was robbed at a later time by Brennus and by Sulla. In the centre of the temple there was a small opening (χάσμα) in the ground, from which, from time to time, an intoxicating vapor arose, which was believed to come from the well of Cassotis. No traces of this chasm or of the mephitic exhalations are now any where observable. Over this chasm there stood a tripod, on which the priestess, called Pythia, took her seat whenever the oracle was to be consulted. The words which she uttered after inhaling the vapor were believed to contain the revelations of Apollo. They were carefully written down by the priests, and afterward communicated in hexameter verse to the persons who had come to consult the oracle. If the Pythia spoke in prose, her words were immediately turned into verse by a poet employed for the purpose. The oracle is said to have been discovered by its having thrown into convulsions some goats which had strayed to the mouth of the cave. For details respecting the oracle and its influence in Greece, vid. Dict. of Ant., art. ORACULUM.

[DELPHICUS, appellation of Apollo, from Delphi (Ovid, Met., ii., 543).]

DELPHINES. Vid. DELPHINIUS.

DELPHINIUM (Δελφίνιον). 1. A temple of Apollo Delphinus at Athens, said to have been built by Ægeus, in which the Ephetæ sat for trying cases of intentional, but justifiable homicide.—2. The harbor of Oropus in Attica, on the borders of Boeotia, called ὁ ἱερὸς λιμὴν.—3. A town on the eastern coast of the island Chios.

DELPHINIUS (Δελφίνιος), a surname of Apollo, derived either from his slaying the dragon Delphines (usually called Python), or because in the form of a dolphin (δελφίς), or riding on a dolphin, he showed the Cretan colonists the way to Delphi.

DELPHUS (Δελφός). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Melanthe, to whom the foundation of Delphi was ascribed.—2. Son of Apollo and Celæno, who is also said to have founded Delphi.

DĒMĀDES (Δημάδης, a contraction of Δημεύδης), an Athenian orator, was of very low origin, but rose by his talents to a prominent position at Athens. He belonged to the Macedonian party, and was a bitter enemy of Demosthenes. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Chæronëa, B.C. 338, and was dismissed by Philip with distinguished marks of honor. After Philip's death he was the subservient supporter of Alexander, but, notwithstanding, frequently received bribes from the opposite party. He was put to death by Antipater in 318, because the latter had discovered a letter of Demades, urging the enemies of Antipater to attack him. Demades was a man without principle, and lived in a most profligate and dissolute manner. But he was a brilliant orator. He always spoke extempore, and with such irresistible force, that he was a perfect match for Demosthenes himself. There is extant a large fragment of an oration bearing the name of Demades (περὶ δωδεκαετίας), in which he defends his conduct during the period of Alexander's reign. It is printed in the collections of the Attic orators, but its genuineness is doubtful. Cicero and Quintilian both state that Demades left no orations behind him.

[DEMARATA, daughter of Hiero, king of Syracuse, married to Andronodorus, the guardian of Hieronymus, on whose assassination she endeavored to persuade her husband to seize on the sovereign power: she was afterward put to death.]

DĒMARĀTUS (Δημάρατος, Dor. Δημάρατος). 1. King of Sparta, reigned from about B.C. 510 to 491. He was at variance with his unscrupulous lous colleague Cleomenes, who at length accused him before the Ephors of being an illegitimate son of Ariston, and obtained his deposition by bribing the Delphic oracle, B.C. 491. Demaratus thereupon repaired to the Persian court, where he was kindly received by Darius. He accompanied Xerxes in his invasion of Greece, and recommended the king not to rely too confidently upon his countless hosts. His family continued long in Asia.—2. A merchant-noble of Corinth, and one of the Bacchiadae. When the power of his clan had been overthrown by Cypselus, about B.C. 657, he fled from Corinth, and settled at Tarquinii in Etruria, where he married an Etruscan wife, by whom he had two sons, Aruns and Lucumo, afterward L. Tarquinus Priseus.

DEMËTÆ, a people of Britain, in the southwest of Wales: their chief towns were Maridunum (now Carmarthen) and Luentinum.

DEMËTËR (Δημήτηρ), the Roman Ceres, one of the great divinities of the Greeks, was the goddess of the earth, and her name probably signified Mother-Earth (γῆ μήτηρ). She was the protectress of agriculture and of all the fruits of the earth. She was the daughter of Cronus (Saturn) and Rhea, and sister of Zeus (Jupiter), by whom she became the mother of Persephone (Proserpina). Zeus (Jupiter), without the knowledge of Demeter (Ceres), had promised Persephone (Proserpina) to Aidoneus (Pluto); and while the unsuspecting maiden was gathering flowers in the Nysian plain in Asia, the earth suddenly opened, and she was carried off by Aidoneus (Pluto). Her mother, who heard only the echo of her voice, immediately set out in search of her daughter. For nine days she wandered about without obtaining any tidings of her, but on the tenth she met Hecate, who told her that she had heard the cries of Persephone (Proserpina), but did not know who had carried her off. Both then hastened to Helios (the Sun), who revealed to them that it was Aidoneus (Pluto) who had carried off Persephone (Proserpina) with the consent of Zeus (Jupiter). Thereupon Demeter (Ceres), in her anger, avoided Olympus, and dwelt upon earth among men, conferring blessings wherever she was kindly received, and severely punishing those who repulsed her. In this manner she came to Celeus at Eleusis. Vid. CELEUS. As the goddess still continued angry, and did not allow the earth to produce any fruits, Zeus (Jupiter) first sent Iris and then all the gods to persuade Demeter (Ceres) to return to Olympus. But she was deaf to all their entreaties, and refused to return to Olympus, and to restore fertility to the earth, till she had seen her daughter again. Zeus (Jupiter) accordingly sent Hermes (Mercury) into Erebus to fetch back Persephone (Proserpina). Aidoneus (Pluto) consented, but gave Persephone (Proserpina) part of a pomegranate to eat. Hermes (Mercury) then took her to Eleusis to her mother, who received her with unbounded joy. At Eleusis both were joined by Hecate, who henceforth became the attendant of Persephone (Proserpina). Demeter (Ceres) now returned to Olympus with her daughter; but as the latter had eaten in the lower world, she was obliged to spend one third of the year with Aidoneus (Pluto), but was allowed to continue with her mother the remainder of the year. The earth now brought forth fruit again. Before Demeter (Ceres) left Eleusis, she instructed Triptolemus, Diocles, Eumolpus, and Celeus in the mode of her worship and in the mysteries. This is the ancient legend as preserved in the Homeric hymn, but it is variously modified in later traditions. In the Latin poets the scene of the rape is near Enna in Sicily; and Ascalaphus, who had alone seen Persephone (Proserpina) eat any thing in the lower world, revealed the fact, and was, in consequence, turned into an owl by Demeter (Ceres). Vid. ASCALAPHUS. In the Iliad and Odyssey there is no mention of this legend, and there appears no connection between Demeter (Ceres) and Persephone (Proserpina). The meaning of the legend is obvious. Persephone (Proserpina), who is carried off to the lower world, is the seed-corn, which remains concealed in the ground part of the year; Persephone (Proserpina), who returns to her mother, is the corn which rises from the ground and nourishes men and animals. Later philosophical writers, and perhaps the mysteries also, referred the disappearance and return of Persephone (Proserpina) to the burial of the body of man and the immortality of his soul. The other legends about Demeter (Ceres) are of less importance. To escape the pursuit of Poseidon (Neptune), she changed herself into a mare, but the god effected his purpose, and she became the mother of the celebrated horse Arion. Vid. ARION, No. 2. According to some traditions, she also bore to Poseidon (Neptune) a daughter Despœna (i. e., Persephone). She fell in love with Iasion, and lay with him in a thrice-ploughed field in Crete: their offspring was Plutus (Wealth). Vid. IASION. She punished with fearful hunger Erysichthon, who had cut down her sacred grove. Vid. ERSICHTHON. The chief seats of the worship of Demeter (Ceres) and Persephone (Proserpina) were Attica, Arcadia and Sicily. In Attica she was worshipped with great splendor. The Athenians pretended that agriculture was first practiced in their country, and that Triptolemus of Eleusis, the favorite of Demeter (Ceres), was the first who invented the plough and sowed corn. Vid. TRIPTOLEMUS. Every year at Athens the festival of the Eleusinia was celebrated in honor of these goddesses. The festival of the Thesmophoria was also celebrated in her honor as well at Athens as at other parts of Greece: it was intended to commemorate the introduction of the laws and the regulations of civilized life, which were ascribed to Demeter (Ceres), since agriculture is the basis of civilization. Vid. Dict. of Ant., arts. ELEUSINIA, THESMOPHORIA. In works of art Demeter (Ceres) was represented sometimes in a sitting attitude, sometimes walking, and sometimes riding in a chariot drawn by horses or dragons, but always in full attire. Around her head she wore a garland of corn-ears or a simple riband, and in her hand she held a sceptre, corn-ears, or a poppy, sometimes also a torch and the mystic basket. The Romans received from Sicily the worship of Demeter (Ceres), to whom they gave the name of Ceres. The first temple of Ceres at Rome was vowed by the dictator A. Postumius Albinus, B.C. 496, for the purpose or averting a famine with which Rome was threatened during a war with the Latins. The Romans instituted a festival with games in honor of her (vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v., CERESIA). She was looked upon by the Romans much in the same light as Tellus. Pigs were sacrificed to both divinities in the seasons of sowing and in harvest time, and also at the burial of the dead. Her worship acquired considerable political importance at Rome. The property of traitors against the republic was often made over to her temple. The decrees of the senate were deposited in her temple for the inspection of the tribunes of the people. If we further consider that the ædiles had the special superintendence of this temple, it is very probable that Ceres, whose worship was, like the plebians themselves, introduced into Rome from without, had some peculiar relations to the plebeian order.

DEMETRIAS (Δημητριάς; Δημητριάς). 1. A town in Magnesia in Thessaly, on the innermost recess of the Pagasæan Bay, founded by Demetrius Polioretetes, and peopled by the inhabitants of Iolæus and the surrounding towns: it soon became one of the most important towns in the north of Greece, and is frequently mentioned in the wars between the Macedonians and Romans.—2. A town in Assyria, not far from Arbela.—3. An Athenian tribe, added to the ten old tribes, B.C. 307, and named in honor of Demetrius Polioretetes.

DEMETRIUS (Δημήτριος). 1. A Greek of the island of Pharos in the Adriatic. He was a general of Teuta, the Illyrian queen, and treacherously surrendered Coreyra to the Romans, who rewarded him with a great part of the dominions of Teuta, B.C. 228. Subsequently he ventured on many acts of piratical hostility against the Romans, thinking that they were too much occupied with the Gallic war and the impending danger of Hannibal's invasion to take notice of him. The Romans, however, immediately sent the consul L. Æmilius Paulus over to Illyria (219), who took Pharos itself, and obliged Demetrius to fly for refuge to Philip, king of Macedonia. At the court of this prince he spent the remainder of his life.—2. Younger son of Philip V., king of Macedonia, was sent as a hostage to Rome after the battle of Cynoscephalæ (198). Five years afterward he was restored to his father, who subsequently sent him as his ambassador to Rome. But, having incurred the jealousy of his father and his brother, Perseus, by the favorable reception he had met with from the Romans, he was secretly put to death by his father's order.

I. Kings of Macedonia. 1. Surnamed POLIORCETES (Πολιορκητής), or the Besieger, son of Antigonus, king of Asia, and Stratonice. At an early age he gave proofs of distinguished bravery. He accompanied his father in his campaigns against Eumenes (B.C. 317, 316), and a few years afterward was left by his father in the command of Syria, which he had to defend against Ptolemy. In 312 he was defeated by Ptolemy near Gaza, but soon after retrieved his disaster in part by defeating one of the generals of Ptolemy. In 311 a general peace was concluded among the successors of Alexander, but it was only of short duration. In 307 Demetrius was dispatched by his father with a powerful fleet and army to wrest Greece from Cassander and Ptolemy. He met with great success. At Athens he was received with enthusiasm by the people as their liberator. Demetrius the Phalerean, who had governed the city for Cassander, was expelled; and the fort at Munychia taken. Demetrius took up his abode for the winter at Athens, where divine honors were paid him under the title of "the Preserver" (Ὁ Σωτήρ). He was recalled from Athens by his father to take the command of the war in Cyprus against Ptolemy. Here also he was successful, and in a great naval battle he annihilated the fleet of Ptolemy (306). Next year (305) he laid siege to Rhodes, because the Rhodians had refused to support him against Ptolemy. It was in consequence of the gigantic machines which Demetrius constructed to assault the walls of Rhodes that he received the surname of Polioretetes. But all his exertions were unavailing, and after the siege had lasted above a year, he at length concluded a treaty with the Rhodians (304). Demetrius then crossed over to Greece, which had meanwhile been almost conquered by Cassander. He soon compelled Cassander to evacuate all Greece south of Thermopylæ, and for the next two years continued to prosecute the war with success. But in 302 he was obliged to return to Asia in order to support his father Antigonus. In 301 their combined forces were totally defeated by those of Lysimachus and Seleucus in the battle of Ipsus, and Antigonus himself slain. Demetrius, to whose impetuosity the loss of the battle would seem to be in great measure owing, fled to Ephesus, and from thence set sail for Athens; but the Athenians declined to receive him into their city. The jealousy of his enemies soon changed the face of his affairs; and Ptolemy having entered into a closer union with Lysimachus, Seleucus married Stratonice, daughter of Demetrius. By this alliance Demetrius obtained possession of Cilicia, and he had never lost Cyprus, Tyre and Sidon. In 297 he determined to make an effort to recover his dominions in Greece. He appeared with a fleet on the coast of Attica, but was at first unsuccessful. The death of Cassander, however, in the course of the same year, gave a new turn to affairs. Demetrius made himself master of Ægina, Salamis, and finally of Athens, after a long blockade (295). In 294 he marched into Peloponnesus against the Spartans, and was on the point of taking their city when he was suddenly called away by the state of affairs in Macedonia. Here the dissensions between Antipater and Alexander, the two sons of Cassander, had led Alexander to call in foreign aid to his support: and he sent embassies at once to Demetrius and to Pyrrhus. Pyrrhus was the nearest at hand, and had already defeated Antipater and established Alexander on the throne, when Demetrius arrived with his army. He was received with apparent friendliness, but mutual jealousies quickly arose. Demetrius caused the young king to be assassinated at a banquet, and was thereupon acknowledged as king by the Macedonian army. Demetrius kept possession of Macedonia for seven years (294–287). His reign was a series of wars. In 292 he marched against the Thebans, who had risen against him and took their city. In 291 he took advantage of the captivity of Lysimachus among the Getae to invade Thraee; but he was recalled by the news of a fresh insurrection in Bœotia. He repulsed Pyrrhus, who had attempted by invading Thessaly to effect a diversion in favor of the Bœotians, and again took Thebes after a long siege (290). In 289 he carried on war against Pyrrhus and the Ætolians, but he concluded peace with Pyrrhus that he might march into Asia with the view of recovering his father's dominions. His adversaries, however, forestalled him. In 287 Ptolemy sent a powerful fleet against Greece, while Pyrrhus (notwithstanding his recent treaty) on the one side, and Lysimachus on the other, simultaneously invaded Macedonia. Demetrius was deserted by his own troops, who proclaimed Pyrrhus king of Macedonia. He then crossed over to Asia, and, after meeting with alternate success and misfortune, was at length obliged to surrender himself prisoner to Seleucus (286). That king kept him in confinement, but did not treat him with harshness. Demetrius died in the third year of his imprisonment and the fifty-sixth of his age (283). He was one of the most remarkable characters of his age: in restless activity of mind, fertility of resource, and daring promptitude in the execution of his schemes, he has, perhaps, never been surpassed. His besetting sin was his unbounded licentiousness. Besides Lamia and his other mistresses, he was regularly married to four wives, Phila, Eurydice, Deidamia, and Ptolemæis, by whom he left four sons. The eldest of these, Antigonus Gonatas, eventually succeeded him on the throne of Macedonia.—3. Son of Antigonus Gonatas, succeeded his father, and reigned B.C. 239–229. He carried on war against the Ætolians, and was opposed to the Achaean League. He was succeeded by Antigonus Dositheus.

II. Kings of Syria. 1. SOTER (reigned B.C. 162–150), was the son of Seleucus IV. Philopater, and grandson of Antiochus the Great. While yet a child, he had been sent to Rome by his father as a hostage, and remained there during the whole of the reign of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes. After the death of Antiochus, being now twenty-three years old, he demanded of the senate to be set at liberty; but, as his request was refused by the senate, he fled secretly from Rome, by the advice of the historian Polybius, and went to Syria. The Syrians declared in his favor; and the young king Antiochus V. Eupator, with his tutor Lysias, was seized by his own guards and put to death. By valuable presents Demetrius obtained from the Romans his recognition as king; but, having alienated his own subjects by his luxury and intemperance, they sided with an impostor of the name of Balas, who took the title of Alexander. By him Demetrius was defeated in battle and slain. He left two sons, Demetrius Nicator and Antiochus Sidetes, both of whom subsequently ascended the throne.—2. NICATOR (B.C. 146–142, and again 128–125), son of Demetrius Soter. He had been sent by his father for safety to Cnidus when Alexander Balas invaded Syria, and, after the death of his father, he continued in exile for some years. With the assistance of Ptolemy Philometor he defeated Balas and recovered his kingdom; but having, like his father, rendered himself odious to his subjects by his vices and cruelties, he was driven out of Syria by Tryphon, who set up Antiochus, the infant son of Alexander Balas, as a pretender against him. Demetrius retired to Babylon, and from thence marched against the Parthians, by whom he was defeated and taken prisoner, 138. He remained as a captive in Parthia ten years, but was kindly treated by the Parthian king Mithradates (Arsaces VI.), who gave him his daughter Rhodogune in marriage. Meanwhile his brother, Antiochus VII. Sidetes, having overthrown the usurper Tryphon, engaged in war with Parthia, in consequence of which Phraates, the successor of Mithradates, brought forward Demetrius, and sent him into Syria to operate a diversion against his brother. In the same year Antiochus fell in battle, and Demetrius again obtained possession of the Syrian throne, 128. Having engaged in an expedition against Egypt, Ptolemy Ptolemy set up against him the pretender Alexander Zebina, by whom he was defeated and compelled to fly. His wife Cleopatra, who could not forgive him his marriage with Rhodogune in Parthia, refused to afford him refuge at Ptolemæis, and he fled to Tyre, where he was assassinated, 125.—3. EUCERUS, son of Antiochus VIII. Grypus, and grandson of Demetrius II. During the civil wars that followed the death of Antiochus Grypus (96), Demetrius and his brother Philip for a time held the whole of Syria. But war broke out between them; Demetrius was taken prisoner and sent to Parthia, where he remained in captivity till his death.

III. Literary. 1. Of ADRAMYTTIUM, surnamed Ixion, a Greek grammarian of the time of Augustus, lived partly at Pergamus and partly at Alexandria, and wrote commentaries on Homer and Hesiod and other works.—2. MAGNES, that is, of Magnesia, a Greek grammarian, and a contemporary of Cicero and Atticus. He wrote a work on concord (Περὶ ὁμωνοίας), and another on poets and other authors who bore the same name (Περὶ ὁμωνύμων ποιητῶν καὶ συγγραφέων).—3. PHALEREUS, so called from his birth-place, the Attic demos of Phalerus, where he was born about B.C. 345. His parents were poor, but by his talents and perseverance he rose to the highest honors at Athens, and became distinguished both as an orator, a statesman, a philosopher, and a poet. He was educated, together with the poet Menander, in the school of Theophrastus. He began his public career about 325, and acquired great reputation by his eloquence. In 317 the government of Athens was intrusted to him by Cassander, and he discharged the duties of his office for ten years with such general satisfaction, that the Athenians conferred upon him the most extraordinary distinctions, and erected no less than three hundred and sixty statues to his honor. But during the latter period of his administration he seems to have become intoxicated with his good fortune, and he abandoned himself to dissipation. When Demetrius Pelioreetes approached Athens in 307, Demetrius Phalereus was obliged to take flight, and his enemies induced the Athenians to pass sentence of death upon him. He went to Ptolemy Lagi at Alexandria, with whom he lived for many years on the best terms; and it was probably owing to the influence of Demetrius that the Great Alexandrine library was formed. His successor, Ptolemy Philadelphus, was hostile towards Demetrius, because he had advised his father to appoint another of his sons as his successor. He banished Demetrius to Upper Egypt, where he is said to have died from the bite of a snake. Demetrius Phalereus was the last among the Attic orators worthy of the name; but even his orations bore evident marks of the decline of oratory, and were characterized rather by grace and elegance than by force and sublimity. His numerous writings, the greater part of which was probably composed in Egypt, embraced subjects of the most varied kinds; but none of them has come down to us, for the work on elocution (περὶ ἐρμηνείας), extant under his name, is probably the work of an Alexandrine Sophist of the name of Demetrius. [Best edition by Fr. Goeller, Lips., 1837.]—4. Of SCERPIS, a Greek grammarian of the time of Aristarchus, wrote a learned commentary on the Catalogue in the second book of the Iliad.—5. Of SENUUM, a Cynic philosopher, lived from the reign of Caligula to that of Domitian, and was banished from Rome in consequence of the freedom with which he rebuked the powerful.

[DEMO (Δημώ), a daughter of Celeus and Metanira.]

[DEMO (Δήμων). 1. Author of an Attis, or history of Attica, and probably, also, of a work on proverbs: his fragments are collected in Siebelis, Phanodemi, Demonis, &c., Fragmenta, Lips., 1812; and by Müller, Fragm. Hist. Græc., vol. i, p. 378-83.—2. Son of Demosthenes's sister, of the demos of Pæania in Attica, distinguished himself as an orator; he belonged, like his uncle, to the anti-Macedonian party.]

DEMOCŒDES (Δημοκῆδης), a celebrated physician of Crotona. He practiced medicine successively at Ægina, Athens, and Samos. He was taken prisoner, along with Polyocrates, in B.C. 522, and was sent to Susa to the court of Darius. Here he acquired great reputation by curing the king's foot, and the breast of the queen Atossa. Notwithstanding his honors at the Persian court, he was always desirous of returning to his native country. In order to effect this, he pretended to enter into the views and interests of the Persians, and procured by means of Atossa that he should be sent with some nobles to explore the coast of Greece, and ascertain in what parts it might be most successfully attacked. When they arrived at Tarentum, the king, Aristophilides, out of kindness to Democædes, seized the Persians as spies, which afforded the physician an opportunity of escaping to Crotona. Here he settled, and married the daughter of the famous wrestler Milo, the Persians having followed him to Crotona, and in vain demanded that he should be restored.

DEMŒCHÆRES (Δημοχᾶρης), an Athenian, son of the sister of Demosthenes. He was probably trained by his uncle in oratory, and inherited his patriotic sentiments. After the restoration of the Athenian democracy in B.C. 307 by Demetrius Poliorcetes, Demochares was at the head of the patriotic party, and took an active part in public affairs for the next twenty or thirty years. He left behind him several orations, and an extensive history of his own times.

DEMŒCLES (Δημοκλῆς), an Attic orator, and an opponent of Demochares.

[DEMŒDOBON (Δημοκόβων), a son of Priam by a female slave; came from Abydus to assist his father against the Greeks, but was slain by Ulysses.]

DEMŒCRATES (Δημοκράτης), a Pythagorean philosopher, of whose life nothing is known, the author of an extant collection of moral maxims, called the golden sentences (γνώμαι χρυσαί). They are printed with DEMŒHILLUS, No. 3.

DEMOCRITUS (Δημόκριτος), a celebrated Greek philosopher, was born at Abdera, in Thrace, about B.C. 460. His father, Hegesistratus—or, as others called him, Damasippus or Athenocritus—was possessed of so large a property that he was able to entertain Xerxes on his march through Abdera. Democritus spent the inheritance which his father left him on travels into distant countries, which he undertook to satisfy his extraordinary thirst for knowledge. He travelled over a great part of Asia, and spent some time in Egypt. The many anecdotes preserved about Democritus show that he was a man of a most sterling and honorable character. His diligence was incredible: he lived exclusively for his studies, and his disinterestedness, modesty, and simplicity are attested by many features which are related of him. Notwithstanding the great property he had inherited from his father, he died in poverty, but highly esteemed by his fellow-citizens. He died in 261 at a very advanced age. There is a tradition that he deprived himself of his sight, that he might be less disturbed in his pursuits; but this tradition is one of the inventions of a later age, which was fond of piquant anecdotes. It is more probable that he may have lost his sight by too severe application to study. This loss, however, did not disturb the cheerful disposition of his mind, which prompted him to look, in all circumstances, at the cheerful side of things, which later writers took to mean that he always laughed at the follies of men. His knowledge was most extensive. It embraced not only the natural sciences, mathematics, mechanics, grammar, music, and philosophy, but various other useful arts. His works were composed in the Ionic dialect, though not without some admixture of the local peculiarities of Abdera. They are nevertheless much praised by Cicero on account of the liveliness of their style, and are in this respect compared even with the works of Plato. The fragments of them are collected by Mullaeh, Democriti Abderite Operum Fragmenta, Berlin, 1843. Leucippus appears to have had most influence upon the philosophical opinions of Democritus, and these two philosophers were the founders of the theory of atoms. In order to explain the creation of all existing things, Democritus maintained that there was in infinite space an infinite number of atoms or elementary particles, homogeneous in quality, but heterogeneous in form. He further taught that these atoms combine with one another, and that all things arise from the infinite variety of the form, order, and position of the atoms in forming combinations. The cause of these combinations he called chance (τύχη), in opposition to the νοῖς of Anaxagoras; but he did not use the word chance in its vulgar acceptation, but to signify the necessary succession of cause and effect. In his ethical philosophy Democritus considered the acquisition of peace of mind (εὐθυμία) as the end and ultimate object of our actions.

ΔΕΜΟΔΟΥΣ (Δημόδοκος). 1. The celebrated bard at the court of Alcinoüs, who sang of the loves of Mars (Ares) and Venus (Aphrodite), while Ulysses sat at the banquet of Alcinoüs. He is also mentioned as the bard who advised Agamemnon to guard Clytemnestra, and to expose Ægisthus in a desert island. Later writers, who looked upon this mythical minstrel as an historical person, related that he composed a poem on the destruction of Troy, and on the marriage of Vulcan (Hephestus) and Venus (Aphrodite).—[2. A Trojan warrior, who came with Æneas to Italy; he was slain by Halesus.—3. A friend of Socrates, father of Theages, mentioned in the Theages of Plato.]

ΔΗΜΟΛΕΩΝ (Δημολέων). 1. A Centaur, slain by Theseus at the nuptials of Pirithous.—2. A brave Trojan, son of Antenor, slain by Achilles.]

ΔΗΜΟΛΕΪΣ, a Greek, slain by Æneas on the banks of the Simois, and whose coat of mail Æneas offered as the second prize at the games celebrated by him in Sicily.]

ΔΗΜΟΝ (Δήμων). Vid. DEMO.]

ΔΗΜΟΝΑΞ (Δημόναξ), of Cyprus, a Cypriote philosopher in the time of Hadrian. We owe our knowledge of his character to Lucian, who has painted it in the most glowing colors, representing him as almost perfectly wise and good. Demonax appears to have been free from the austerity and moroseness of the sect, though he valued their indifference to external things. He was nearly one hundred years old at the time of his death.

ΔΗΜΟΝΗΣΙ ΙΝΣΥΛΕ (Δημόνησοι), a group of islands in the Propontis (now Sea of Marmara), belonging to Bithynia; of these the most important were Pityödes and Chalceitis, also called Demonesus.

ΔΗΜΟΡΗΛΙΣ (Δημόρηλος). 1. Son of Ephorus, continued his father's history by adding to it the history of the Sacred War.—2. An Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, from whose Ὀυαγός Plautus took his Asinaria.—3. A Pythagorean philosopher, of whose life nothing is known, wrote a work entitled βίου δειράτεια, part of which is extant in the form of a selection, entitled γνωμικὰ ὁμοιώματα. Best edition by Orelli, in his Opusc. Græc. Vet. Sentent., Lips., 1819.

ΔΗΜΟΡΗΘΩΝ or ΔΗΜΟΡΗΘΩΝ (Δημόρων or Δημοφών). 1. Son of Celeus and Metanira, whom Ceres (Demeter) wished to make immortal. For details, vid. CELEUS.—2. Son of Theseus and Phædra, accompanied the Greeks against Troy, and there procured the liberation of his grandmother Æthra, who lived with Helen as a slave. On his return from Troy he gained the love of Phyllis, daughter of the Thracian king Sithon, and promised to marry her. Before the nuptials were celebrated, he went to Attica to settle his affairs, and as he tarried longer than Phyllis had expected, she thought that she was forgotten, and put an end to her life; but she was metamorphosed into a tree. Demophon became king of Athens. He marched out against Diomedes, who, on his return from Troy, had landed on the coast of Attica, and was ravaging it. He took the Palladium from Diomedes, but had the misfortune to kill an Athenian in the struggle. For this murder he was summoned before the court ἐπὶ Παλλαδίῳ—the first time that a man was tried by that court.—[3. A companion of Æneas, slain by Camilla in Italy.]

ΔΗΜΟΣΘΗΝΗΣ (Δημοσθένης). 1. Son of Alcisthenes, a celebrated Athenian general in the Peloponnesian War. In B.C. 426 he was sent with a fleet to ravage the coast of Peloponnesus; he afterward landed at Naupactus, and made a descent into Ætolia; he was at first unsuccessful, and was obliged to retreat; but he subsequently gained a brilliant victory over the Ambraciots. In 425, though not in office, he sailed with the Athenian fleet, and was allowed by the Athenian commanders to remain with five ships at Pylos, which he fortified in order to assail the Lacedæmonians in their own territories. He defended Pylos against all the attempts of the Lacedæmonians, till he was relieved by an Athenian fleet of forty ships. The Spartans, who in their siege of the place had occupied the neighboring island of Sphacteria, were now cut off and blockaded. Later in the same year he rendered important assistance to Cleon, in making prisoners of the Spartans in the island of Sphacteria, though the whole glory of the success was given to Cleon. In 413 he was sent with a large fleet to Sicily, to assist Nicias. Fortune was unfavorable to the Athenians. Demosthenes now counselled an immediate departure, but Nicias delayed returning till it was too late. The Athenian fleet was destroyed, and when Demosthenes and Nicias attempted to retreat by land, they were obliged to surrender to the enemy with all their forces. Both commanders were put to death by the Syracusans. 2. The greatest of Athenian orators, was the son of Demosthenes, and was born in the Attic demos of Pæania, about B.C. 385. At seven years of age he lost his father, who left him and his younger sister to the care of three guardians, Aphobus and Demophon, two relations, and Therippides, an old friend. These guardians squandered the greater part of the property of Demosthenes, and neglected his education to a great extent. He nevertheless received instruction from the orator Isæus; but it is exceedingly doubtful whether he was taught by Plato and Isocrates, as some of the ancients stated. At the age of eighteen Demosthenes called upon his guardians to render him an account of their administration of his property; but by intrigues they contrived to defer the business for two years. At length, in 364, Demosthenes accused Aphobus before the archon, and obtained a verdict in his favor. Aphobus was condemned to pay a fine of ten talents. Emboldened by this success, Demosthenes ventured to come forward as a speaker in the public assembly. His first effort was unsuccessful, and he is said to have been received with ridicule; but he was encouraged to persevere by the actor Satyrus, who gave him instruction in action and declamation. In becoming an orator, Demosthenes had to struggle hard against the greatest physical disadvantages. His voice, was weak and his utterance defective; he could not pronounce the ρ , and constantly stammered, whence he derived the nickname of Βάταλος. It was only owing to the most unwearied exertions that he succeeded in overcoming the obstacles which nature had placed in his way. Thus it is said that he spoke with pebbles in his mouth, to cure himself of stammering; that he repeated verses of the poets as he ran up hill, to strengthen his voice; that he declaimed on the sea-shore, to accustom himself to the noise and confusion of the popular assembly; that he lived for months in a cave under ground, engaged in constantly writing out the history of Thucydides, to form a standard for his own style. These tales are not worthy of much credit; but they nevertheless attest the common tradition of antiquity respecting the great efforts made by Demosthenes to attain to excellence as an orator. It was about 355 that Demosthenes began to obtain reputation as a speaker in the public assembly. It was in this year that he delivered the oration against Leptines, and from this time we have a series of his speeches on public affairs. His eloquence soon gained him the favor of the people. The influence which he acquired he employed for the good of his country, and not for his own aggrandizement. He clearly saw that Philip had resolved to subjugate Greece, and he therefore devoted all his powers to resist the aggressions of the Macedonian monarch. For fourteen years he continued the struggle against Philip, and neither threats nor bribes could turn him from his purpose. It is true he failed; but the failure must not be considered his fault. The history of his struggle is best given in the life of Philip. Vid. PHILIPPUS. It is sufficient to relate here that it was brought to a close by the battle of Chæronæa (338), by which the independence of Greece was crushed. Demosthenes was present at the battle, and fled like thousands of others. His enemies reproached him with his flight, and upbraided him as the cause of the misfortunes of his country; but the Athenians judged better of his conduct, requested him to deliver the funeral oration upon those who had fallen at Chæronæa, and celebrated the funeral feast in his house. At this time many accusations were brought against him. Of these one of the most formidable was the accusation of Ctesiphon by Æschines, but which was in reality directed against Demosthenes himself. Æschines accused Ctesiphon for proposing that Demosthenes should be rewarded for his services with a golden crown in the theatre. Æschines maintained that the proposal was not only made in an illegal form, but that the conduct of Demosthenes did not give him any claim to such a distinction. The trial was delayed for reasons unknown to us till 330, when Demosthenes delivered his oration on the crown (περὶ στεφάνου). Æschines was defeated and withdrew from Athens. Vid. ÆSCHINES. Meantime important events had taken place in Greece. The death of Philip in 336 roused the hopes of the patriots, and Demosthenes, although he had lost his daughter only seven days before, was the first to proclaim the joyful tidings of the king's death, and to call upon the Greeks to unite their strength against Macedonia. But Alexander's energy, and the frightful vengeance which he took upon Thebes, compelled Athens to submit and sue for peace. Alexander demanded the surrender of Demosthenes and the other leaders of the popular party, and with difficulty allowed them to remain at Athens. During the life of Alexander, Athens made no open attempt to throw off the Macedonian supremacy. In 325 Harpalus fled from Babylon with the treasure intrusted to his care by Alexander, and came to Athens, the protection of which he purchased by distributing his gold among the most influential demagogues. The reception of such an open rebel was viewed as an act of hostility toward Macedonia itself; and accordingly Antipater called upon the Athenians to deliver up the rebel and to try those who had accepted his bribes. Demosthenes was one of those who were suspected of having received money from Harpalus. His guilt is doubtful; but he was condemned, and thrown into prison, from which, however, he escaped, apparently with the connivance of the Athenian magistrates. He now resided partly at Trœzene and partly in Ægina, looking daily across the sea toward his beloved native land. But his exile did not last long. On the death of Alexander (323) the Greek states rose in arms against Macedonia. Demosthenes was recalled from exile; a trireme was sent to Ægina to fetch him, and his progress to the city was a glorious triumph. But in the following year (322) the confederate Greeks were defeated by Antipater at the battle of Cranon, and were obliged to sue for peace. Antipater demanded the surrender of Demosthenes, who thereupon fled to the island of Calauria, and took refuge in the temple of Neptune (Poseidon). Here he was pursued by the emissaries of Antipater; he thereupon took poison, which he had for some time carried about his person, and died in the temple, 322. There existed sixty-five orations of Demosthenes in antiquity; but of these only sixty-one have come down to us, including the letter of Philip, which is strangely enough counted as an oration. Several of the orations, however, are spurious, or at least of very doubtful authenticity. Besides these orations, there are fifty-six Exordia to public orations, and six letters which bear the name of Demosthenes, but are probably spurious. The oration may be divided into the following classes: (I.) Seventeen Political Orations (λόγοι συμβουλευτικοί), of which the twelve Philippic orations are the most important. They bear the following titles: 1. The first Philippic, delivered 352. 2-4. The three Olynthian orations, delivered 349. 5. On the Peace, 349. 6. The second Philippic, 344. 7. On Halonesus, 343, not genuine, probably written by Hegesippus. 8. On the affairs of the Chersonesus, 342. 9. The third Philippic, 342. 10. The fourth Philippic, not genuine, 341. 11. On the letter of Philip, 340, also spurious. 12. The letter of Philip.—(II.) Forty-two Judicial Orations (λόγοι δικανικοί), of which the most important are, Against Midias, written 355, but never delivered; Against Leptines, 355; On the dishonest conduct of Æschines during his embassy to Philip (Περὶ τῆς Παραπρεθείας), 342; On the Crown, 330.—(III.) Two Shou Speeches (λόγοι ἐπιδεικτικοί), namely the Επι, ταφιος and Ἐρωτικός, both of which are spurious. The orations of Demosthenes are contained in the collections of the Attic orators by Reiske, Lips., 1770-1775; [Demosthenes separately, with additions by Schæffer, Lond., 1822-3, 9 vols. 8vo]; Bekker, Oxon., 1823; Dobson, Lond., 1828; Baier and Sauppe, Turic., 1845.

[DEMOSTRATUS (Δημόστρατος), an Athenian orator and popular leader, at whose proposal Alcibiades, Nicias, and Lamachus were placed at the head of the Sicilian expedition.]

[DEMŪCHUS (Δημοῦχος), son of Philetor, slain by Achilles before Troy.]

DENSELĒTĒ or DENTHELĒTĒ (Δενθηλήται), a Thracian people on the Hæmus, the strymon and Nessus.

DENTĀTUS, M. CURĪUS, a favorite hero of the Roman republic, was celebrated in later times as a noble specimen of old Roman frugality and virtue. He was of Sabine origin, and the first of his family who held any high offices of state (consequently a homo novus). He was consul B.C. 290 with P. Cornelius Rufinus. The two consuls defeated the Samnites, and brought the Samnite wars to a close. In the same year Dentatus also defeated the Sabines, who appear to have supported the Samnites. In 283 he fought as prætor against the Senones. In 275 he was consul a second time, and defeated Pyrrhus near Beneventum and in the Arusinian plain so completely that the king was obliged to quit Italy. The booty which he gained was immense, but he would keep nothing for himself. In 274 he was consul a third time, and conquered the Lucanians, Samnites, and Bruttians, who still continued in arms after the defeat of Pyrrhus. Dentatus now retired to his small farm in the country of the Sabines, and cultivated the land with his own hands. Once the Samnites sent an embassy to him with costly presents; they found him sitting at the hearth and roasting turnips. He rejected their presents, telling them that he preferred ruling over those who possessed gold to possessing it himself. He was censor in 272, and in that year executed public works of great importance. He commenced the aqueduct which carried the water from the River Anio into the city (Aniensis Vetus); and by a canal he carried off the water of the Lake Velinus into the River Nar, in consequence of which the inhabitants of Reate gained a large quantity of excellent land.

DEO (Δηώ), another name for Ceres (Demeter); hence her daughter Proserpina (Persephone) is called by the patronymic DĒōis and DĒōINE.

DERBE (Δέρβη: Δερβήτης, Δερβαίος), a town in Lycaonia, on the frontiers of Isauria. It is first mentioned as the residence of the tyrant Antipater of Derbe, a friend of Cicero, whom Amyntas put to death.

DERBICĒ or DERBICES (Δερβίκαί or Δέρβικες), a Scythian people in Margiana, dwelling on the Oxus, near its entrance into the Caspian Sea. They worshipped the earth as a goddess, neither sacrificed or ate any female animals, and killed and ate all their old men above seventy years of age.

[DERCENUS, an early king of Laurentum, in Latium; according to some, the same with Latinus.]

DERCĒTIS, DERCĒTO (Δερκέτις, Δερκετώ), also called Atargatis, a Syrian goddess. She offended Venus (Aphrodite), who, in consequence, inspired her with love for a youth, to whom she bore a daughter Semiramis; but, ashamed of her frailty, she killed the youth, exposed her child in a desert, and threw herself into a lake near Ascalon. Her child was fed by doves, and she herself was changed into a fish. The Syrians thereupon worshipped her as a goddess. The upper part of her statue represented a beautiful woman, while the lower part terminated in the tail of a fish. She appears to be the same as Dagon mentioned in the Old Testament as a deity of the Philistines.

DERCYLLĪDAS (Δερκυλλίδας), a Spartan, succeeded Thimbron, B.C. 399, in the command of the army which was employed in the protection of the Asiatic Greeks against Persia. He carried on the war with success. Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus were at length glad to sue for peace. In 396 he was superseded by Agesilaus.

[DERDAS (Δέρδας). 1. A Macedonian chieftain, who joined with Philip, brother of Perdiccas II., in rebellion against him.—2. A prince of Elymæa in Macedonia in the time of Amyntas II.; sided with the Spartans in their war with Olynthus, through fear of the growing power of that city.]

DERTŪNA (now Tortona), an important town in Liguria, and a Roman colony with the surname Julia, on the road from Genua to Placentia.

DERTŪSA (now Tortosa), a town of the Ilereones, on the Iberus, in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a Roman colony.

DESPĒNA (Δέσποινα), the mistress, a surname of several divinities, as Venus (Aphrodite), Ceres (Demeter), and more especially Proserpina (Persephone), who was worshipped under this name in Arcadia.

DEUCĀLĪON (Δευκαλίων). 1. Son of Prometheus and Clymene, king of Phthia, in Thessaly. When Jupiter (Zeus), after the treatment he had received from Lycaon, had resolved to destroy the degenerate race of men, Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha were, on account of their piety, the only mortals saved. On the advice of his father, Deucalion built a ship, in which he and his wife floated in safety during the nine days' flood, which destroyed all the other inhabitants of Hellas. At last the ship rested on Mount Paruassus in Phœcis, or, according to other traditions, on Mount Othrys in Thessaly, on Mount Athos, or even on Ætna in Sicily. When the waters had subsided, Deucalion offered up a sacrifice to Jupiter (Zeus) Phyxius (Φύξιος), and he and his wife then consulted the sanctuary of Themis how the race of man might be restored. The goddess bade them cover their heads and throw the boues of their mother behind them. After some doubts and scruples respecting the meaning of this command, they agreed in interpreting the bones of their mother to mean the stones of the earth. They accordingly threw stones behind them, and from those thrown by Deucalion there sprang up men, from those thrown by Pyrrha, women. Deucalion then descended from Parnassus, and built his first abode at Opus or at Cynus. Deucalion became by Pyrrha the father of Hellen, Amphictyon, Protogenia, and others.—2. Son of Minos and Pasiphaë, father of Idomeneus, was an Argonaut, and one of the Calydonian hunters.—[3. A Trojan, slain by Achilles.]

DEVA. 1. (Now Chester), the principal town of the Cornavii in Britain, on the Seteia, (now Dee), and the head-quarters of the Legio XX. Vietrix.—2. (Now Dee), an estuary in Scotland, on which stood the town Devana, near the modern Aberdeen.

DEXĀMĒNUS (Δεξάμενος), a Centaur, who lived in Bura in Achaia. According to others, he was King of Olenus, and father of Deianira, who is usually represented as daughter of Eneus.

DEXIPPUS (Δέξιππος). 2. Called also Dioxippus, a physician of Cos, one of the pupils of Hippocrates, lived about B.C. 380, and attended the children of Hecatomnus, prince of Caria.—2. P. HERENNIUS, a Greek rhetorician and historian, was a native of Attica, and held the highest offices at Athens. He distinguished himself in fighting against the Goths when they invaded Greece in A.D. 262. He was the author of three historical works: 1. A history of Macedonia from the time of Alexander. 2. A chronological history from the mythical ages down to the accession of Claudius Gothicus, A.D. 268. 3. An account of the war of the Goths or Scythians, in which Dexippus himself had fought. The fragments of Dexippus, which are considerable, are published by Bekker and Niebuhr in the first volume of the Scriptores Historie Byzantinae, Bonn, 1829, 8vo.—3. A disciple of the philosopher Iamblichus, lived about A.D. 350, and wrote a commentary on the Categories of Aristotle, of which a Latin translation appeared at Paris, 1549, 8vo, and at Venice, 1546, fol., after the work of Porphyry In Prædicam. Arist.

DIA (Δία), daughter of Deioneus and wife of Ixion. By Ixion, or, according to others, by Jupiter (Zeus), she became the mother of Pirithous.

DIA (Δία). 1. The ancient name of Naxos.—2. An island near Amorgos.—3. (Now Standia), a small island off Crete, opposite the harbor of Cnosus.—4. An island in the Arabian Gulf, on the western coast of Arabia.

DIABLINTES. Vid. AULERCI.

DIACRĪA (ἡ Διακρία), a mountainous district in the northeast of Attica, including the plain of Marathon. Vid. ATTICA. The inhabitants of this district (Διακρηίς, Διακρίοι), formed one of the three parties into which the inhabitants of Attica were divided in the time of Solon: they were the most democratical of the three parties.

DIADUMENĪANUS or DIADUMĒNUS, son of the Emperor Macrinus, received the title of Cæsar when his father was elevated to the purple, A.D. 217, and was put to death in the following year about the same time with Macrinus.

DILEUS (Δίλαος), of Megalopolis, general of the Achaean league B.C. 149 and 147, took an active part in the war against the Romans. On the death of Critolaüs in 146, he succeeded to the command of the Achæans, but was defeated by Mummius near Corinth, whereupon he put an end to his own life, after slaying his wife to prevent her falling into the enemy's power.

DILĠGŪRAS (Διγούρας). 1. Son of Damagetus, of Ialysus in Rhodes, was very celebrated for his own victories and those of his sons and grandsons, in the Grecian games. His fame was celebrated by Pindar in the seventh Olympic ode. He was victor in boxing twice in the Olympian games, four times in the Isthmian, twice in the Nemean, and once at least in the Pythian. He had, therefore, the high honor of being a περιοδονίκης, that is, one who had gained crowns at all the four great festivals. When an old man, he accompanied his sons, Acusilaüs and Damagetus, to Olympia. The young men, having both been victorious, carried their father through the assembly, while the spectators showered garlands upon him, and congratulated him as having reached the summit of human happiness. He gained his Olympic victory B.C. 464.—2. Surnamed the ATHEIST (ἄθεος), a Greek philosopher and poet, was the son of Teleclides, and was born in the island of Melos, one of the Cyclades. He was a disciple of Democritus of Abdera, and in his youth he acquired considerable reputation as a lyric poet. He was at Athens as early as B.C. 424, for Aristophanes in the Clouds (v. 830), which were performed in that year, alludes to him as a well-known character. In consequence of his attacks upon the popular religion, and especially upon the Eleusian mysteries, he was formally accused of impiety B.C. 411, and, fearing the results of a trial, fled from Athens. He was condemned to death in his absence, and a reward set upon his head. He first went to Pallene, and afterward to Corinth, where he died. One of the works of Diagoras was entitled Φρόγιοι λόγοι, in which he probably attacked the Phrygian divinities.

DIĀNA, an ancient Italian divinity, whom the Romans identified with the Greek Artemis. Her worship is said to have been introduced at Rome by Servius Tullius, who dedicated a temple to her on the Aventine; and she appears to have been originally worshipped only by the plebeians. At Rome Diana was the goddess of light, and her name contains the same root as the word dies. As Dianus (Janus), or the god of light, represented the sun, so Diana, the goddess of light, represented the moon. The attributes of the Greek Artemis were afterward ascribed to the Roman Diana. Vid. ARTEMIS.

DIĀNĪUM. 1. (Now Gianuti), a small island in the Tyrrhenian Sea, opposite the Gulf of Cosa.—2. (Now Denia), called ΗΜΕΡΟΣΚΟΠΙΟΝ (Ἡμεροσκοπιεῖον) by Strabo, a town in Hispania Tarraconensis, on a promontory of the same name (now Cape Martin), founded by the Massilians. Here stood a celebrated temple of Diana, from which the town derived its name; and here Sertorius kept most of his military stores.

DICEA (Δίκαια), a town in Thrace, on the Lake Bistonis.

DICEARCHĪA. Vid. PUTEOLI.

DICEARCHIUS (Δικαρχος), a celebrated Peripatetic philosopher, geographer, and historian, was born at Messana in Sicily, but passed the greater part of his life in Greece Proper, and especially in Peloponnesus. He was a disciple of Aristotle and a friend of Theophrastus. He wrote a vast number of works, of which only fragments are extant. His most important work was entitled Βίος τῆς Ἑλλάδος: it contained an account of the geography, history, and moral and religious condition of Greece. See Fuhr, Dicaearchi Messeniæ quæ supersunt composita et illustrata, Darmstadt, 1841.

DICE (Δίκη), the personification of justice, a daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Themis, and the sister of Eunomia and Eirene. She was considered as one of the Horæ, and is frequently called the attendant or counsellor (πάρεδρος or ξίβεδρος) of Jupiter (Zeus). In the tragedians she appears as a divinity who severely punishes all wrong, watches over the maintenance of justice, and pierces the hearts of the unjust with the sword made for her by Æsa. In this capacity she is closely connected with the Erinyes, though her business is not only to punish injustice, but also to reward virtue.

DICTÆUS. Vid. DICTE.

DICTAMNUM (Δίκταμνον), a town on the northern coast of Crete, with a sanctuary of Dictynna, from whom the town itself was also called Dictynna.

DICTE (Δίκη: now Lasthî), a mountain in the east of Crete, where Jupiter (Zeus) is said to have been brought up. Hence he bore the surname Dictæus. The Roman poets frequently employ the adjective Dictæus as synonymous with Cretan.

DICTYNNA (Δίκτυννα), a surname both of Britomartis and Diana, which two divinities were subsequently identified. The name is connected with δίκτυον, a hunting-net, and was borne by Britomartis and Diana as goddesses of the chase. One tradition related that Britomartis was so called because, when she had thrown herself into the sea to escape the pursuit of Minos, she was saved in the nets of fishermen.

[DICTYS (Δίκτης). 1. A Tyrrhenian, changed by Bacchus (Dionysus) into a dolphin.—2. A Centaur, slain at the nuptials of Pirithoüs.—3. Son of Peristhenes or of Magnes and a Naiad, who, with his brother Polydectes, preserved Danaë and her son Perseus in the island Seriphus.]

DICTYS CRETENSIS, the reputed author of an extant work in Latin on the Trojan war, divided into six books, and entitled Ephemeris Belli Trojani, professing to be a journal of the leading events of the war. In the preface to the work we are told that it was composed by Dictys of Cnosus, who accompanied Idomeneus to the Trojan war, and was inscribed in Phœnician characters on tablets of lime-wood or paper made from the bark. The work was buried in the same grave with the author, and remained undisturbed till the sepulchre was burst open by an earthquake in the reign of Nero, and the work was discovered in a tin case. It was carried to Rome by Eupraxis, whose slaves had discovered it, and it was translated into Greek by order of Nero. It is from this Greek version that the extant Latin work professes to have been translated by a Q. Septimius Romanus. Although its alleged origin and discovery are quite unworthy of credit, it appears nevertheless to be a translation from a Greek work, which we know to have been extant under the name of Dictys, since it is frequently quoted by the Byzantine writers. The work was probably written in Greek by Eupraxis in the reign of Nero, but at what time the Latin translation was executed is quite uncertain. The work contains a history of the Trojan war, its causes and consequences, from the birth of Paris down to the death of Ulysses. The compiler not unfrequently differs widely from Homer, adding many particulars, and recording many events of which we find no trace elsewhere. All miraculous events and supernatural agency are entirely excluded. The compilations ascribed to Dictys and Dares (vid. DARES) are of considerable importance in the history of modern literature, since they are the chief fountains from which the legends of Greece first flowed into the romances of the Middle Ages, and then mingled with the popular tales and ballads of England, France, and Germany. The best edition of Dictys is by Dederich, Bonn, 1835.

DIDIUS. 1. T., prætor in Macedonia B.C. 100 where he defeated the Scordiseans, consul 98, and subsequently proconsul in Spain, where he defeated the Celtiberians. He fell in the Marsic war, 89.—2. C., a legate of Cæsar, fell in battle in Spain fighting against the sons of Pompey, 46.—3. M. DIDIUS SALVIUS JULIÄNUS, bought the Roman empire of the prætorian guards, when they put up the empire for sale after the death of Pertinax, A.D. 193. Flavius Sulpeianus, præfect of the city, and Didius bid against each other, but it was finally knocked down to Didius upon his promising a donative to each soldier of twenty-five thousand sesterces. Didius, however, held the empire for only two months, from March 25th to June 1st, and was murdered by the soldiers when Severus was marching against the city.

DIDO (Διδώ), also called ELISSA, the reputed founder of Carthage. She was daughter of the Tyrian king Belus or Agenor or Mutgo, and sister of Pygmalion, who succeeded to the crown after the death of his father. Dido was married to her uncle, Acerbas or Sichæus, a priest of Hercules, and a man of immense wealth. He was murdered by Pygmalion, who coveted his treasures; but Dido secretly sailed from Tyre with the treasures, accompanied by some noble Tyrians, who were dissatisfied with Pygmalion's rule. She first went to Cyprus, where she carried off eighty maidens to provide the emigrants with wives, and then crossed over to Africa. Here she purchased as much land as might be covered with the hide of a bull; but she ordered the hide to be cut up into the thinnest possible strips, and with them she surrounded a spot on which she built a citadel called Byrsa (from βύρσα, i. e., the hide of a bull). Around this fort the city of Carthage arose, and soon became a powerful and flourishing place. The neighboring king Hiarbas, jealous of the prosperity of the new city, demanded the hand of Dido in marriage, threatening Carthage with war in case of refusal. Dido had vowed eternal fidelity to her late husband; but, seeing that the Carthaginians expected her to comply with the demands of Hiarbas, she pretended to yield to their wishes, and under pretence of soothing the manes of Acerbas by expiatory sacrifices, she erected a funeral pile, on which she stabbed herself in presence of her people. After her death she was worshipped by the Carthaginians as a divinity. Virgil has inserted in his Æneid the legend of Dido with various modifications. According to the common chronology, there was an interval of more than three hundred years between the capture of Troy (B.C. 1184) and the foundation of Carthage (B.C. 853); but Virgil nevertheless makes Dido a contemporary of Æneas, with whom she falls in love on his arrival in Africa. When Æneas hastened to seek the new home which the gods had promised him, Dido, in despair, destroyed herself on a funeral pile.

DIDYME. Vid. ÆOLLE INSULÆ.

DIDYMUS (Δίδυμος), a celebrated Alexandrine grammarian, a contemporary of Julius Cæsar and Augustus, was a follower of the school of Aristarchus, and received the surname χαλκίερος on account of his indefatigable and unwearied application to study. He is said to have written four thousand works, the most important of which were commentaries on Homer. The greater part of the extant Scholiaminora on Homer was at one time considered the work of Didymus, but is really taken from the commentaries of Didymus and of other grammarians.

DIESPITER. Vid. JUPITER.

DIGENTIA (now Licenza), a small stream in Latium, beautifully cool and clear, which flows into the Anio near the modern Vicovaro. It flowed through the Sabine farm of Horace. Near its source, which was also called Digentia (fons etiam rivo dare nomen idoneus, Hor., Ep., i., 16, 12), stood the house of Horace (vicinus tecto jugis aque fons, Hor., Sat., ii., 6, 2).

DIMALLUM, a town in Greek Illyria.

DINARCHUS (Δειναρχος), the last and least important of the ten Attic orators, was born at Corinth about B.C. 361. He was brought up at Athens, and studied under Theophrastus. As he was a foreigner, he could not come forward himself as an orator, and was therefore obliged to content himself with writing orations for others. He belonged to the friends of Phocion and the Macedonian party. When Demetrius Polioretetes advanced against Athens in 307, Dinarchus fled to Chalcis in Eubœa, and was not allowed to return to Athens till 292, where he died at an advanced age. Only three of his speeches have come down to us: they all refer to the question about HARPALUS. They are printed in the collections of the Attic orators, [and separately by Mætzner, Berlin, 1842, 8vo.]

DINDYMENE. Vid. DINDYMUS.

DINDYMUS or DINDYMA, -ORUM (Δίνδυμος; τὸ Δίνδυμα). 1. A mountain in Phrygia, on the frontiers of Galatia, near the town Pessinus, sacred to Cybele, the mother of the gods, who is hence called Dindymene.—2. A mountain in Mysia, near Cyzius, also sacred to Cybele.

[DINIAS (Δεινίας), a Greek historian of uncertain date, who wrote a work on Argolis (Ἀργολικὰ): a few fragments are collected by Müller, Fragm. Hist. Græc., vol. iii., p. 24–26.]

DINOCRATES (Δεινοκράτης), a distinguished Macedonian architect in the time of Alexander the Great. He was the architect of the new temple of Diana (Artemis) at Ephesus, which was built after the destruction of the former temple by Herostratus. He was employed by Alexander, whom he accompanied into Egypt, in the building of Alexandria. He formed a design for cutting Mount Athos into a statue of Alexander; but the king forbade the execution of the project. The right hand of the figure was to have held a city, and in the left there would have been a basin, in which the water of all the mountain streams was to pour, and thence into the sea. He commenced the erection of a temple to Arsinoë, the wife of Ptolemy II., of which the roof was to be arched with loadstones, so that her statue, made of iron, might appear to float in the air, but he died before completing the work.

[DINOMACHE (Δεινομάχη), daughter of Megacles, granddaughter of Clisthenes, and mother of Alcibiades.]

DINOMACHUS (Δεινόμαχος), a philosopher, who agreed with CALLIPHON in considering the chief good to consist in the union of virtue with bodily pleasure.

DINOMENES (Δεινομένης). 1. A statuary, whose statues of Io and Callisto stood in the Aeropolis at Athens in the time of Pausanias: he flourished B.C. 400.—[2. Father of Hiero, Gelon, and Thrasylbulus, born at Ætna, a city of Sicily.—3. One of the guards of Hieronymus of Syracuse, whom he aided in assassinating; he was afterward elected one of the generals of the Syracusans.]

DIXON (Δείων, Δίων), father of the historian Clitarchus, wrote himself a history of Persia, [to which Nepos refers as the most trustworthy authority on the subject: the fragments of his work are collected by Müller, Fragm. Hist. Græc., vol. ii., p. 88–95.]

DIO. Vid. DION.

DIOCESARËA (Διοκαισάρεια; now Sefurieh), more anciently ΣΕΡΡΗΘΙΣ (Σέρρωρις), in Galilee, was a small place until Herodes Antipas made it the capital of Galilee, under the name of Diocesarea. It was destroyed in the fourth century by Gallus, on account of an insurrection which had broken out there.

DIOCLEA or DOCLEA (Δόκλεα), a place in Dalmatia, near Salona, the birth-place of Diocletian.

DIOCLES (Διοκλής). 1. A brave Athenian, who lived in exile at Megara. Once in a battle he protected with his shield a youth whom he loved, but he lost his own life in consequence. The Megarians rewarded him with the honors of a hero, and instituted the festival of the Dioclea, which they celebrated in the spring of every year.—2. A Syracusan, the leader of the popular party in opposition to Hermocrates. In B.C. 412 he was appointed with several others to draw up a new code of laws. This code, which was almost exclusively the work of Diocles, became very celebrated, and was adopted by many other Sicilian cities.—3. Of Carystus in Eubœa, a celebrated Greek physician, lived in the fourth century B.C. He wrote several medical works, of which only some fragments remain; [edited by Frænkel, Berlin 1840, 8vo.—4. Of Preparthus, the earliest Greek historian who wrote about the foundation of Rome, and whom Q. Fabius Pictor is said to have followed in a great many points.]

DIOCLETIANŌPŌLIS. Vid. CELETRUM.

DIOCLETIANUS, VALERIUS, Roman emperor A.D. 284–305, was born near Salona, in Dalmatia, in 245, of most obscure parentage. From his mother, Doilea, or Dioclea, who received her name from the village where she dwelt, he inherited the appellation of Docles or Diocles, which, after his assumption of the purple, was expanded into Diocletianus, and attached as a cognomen to the high patrician name of Valerius. Having entered the army, he served with high reputation under Probus and Aurelian, followed Carus to the Persian war, and, after the fate of Numerianus became known at Chaleedon, was proclaimed emperor by the troops, 284. He slew with his own hands Arrius Aper, who was arraigned of the murder of Numerianus, in order, according to some authorities, that he might fulfil a prophecy delivered to him in early youth by a Gaulish Druidess, that he should mount a throne as soon as he had slain the wild boar (Aper). Next year (285) Diocletian carried on war against Carinus, on whose death he became undisputed master of the empire. But as the attacks of the barbarians became daily more formidable, he resolved to associate with himself a colleague in the empire, and accordingly selected for that purpose Maximianus, who was invested with the title of Augustus in 286. Maximian had the care of the Western Empire, and Diocletian that of the Eastern. But as the dangers which threatened the Roman dominions from the attacks of the Persians in the East, and the German and other barbarians in the West, became still more imminent, Diocletian made a still further division of the empire. In 292, Constantius Chlorus and Galerius were proclaimed Cæsars, and the government of the Roman world was divided between the two Augusti and the two Cæsars. Diocletian had the government of the East, with Nicomedia as his residence; Maximian, Italy and Africa, with Milan as his residence; Constantius, Britain, Gaul, and Spain, with Treves as his residence; Galerius, Illyricum, and the whole line of the Danube, with Sirmium as his residence. The wars in the reign of Diocletian are related in the lives of his colleagues, since Diocletian rarely commanded the armies in person. It is sufficient to state here that Britain, which had maintained its independence for some years under CARAUSIUS and ALLECTUS, was restored to the empire (296); that the Persians were defeated and obliged to sue for peace (298); and that the Marcomanni and other barbarians in the north were also driven back from the Roman dominions. But after an anxious reign of twenty-one years Diocletian longed for repose. Accordingly, on the first of May, 305, he abdicated at Nicomedia, and compelled his reluctant colleague Maximian to do the same at Milan. Diocletian retired to his native Dalmatia, and passed the remaining eight years of his life near Salona in philosophic retirement, devoted to rural pleasures and the cultivation of his garden. He died 313. One of the most memorable events in the reign of Diocletian was his fierce persecution of the Christians (303) to which he was instigated by his colleague Galerius.

ΔΙΟΔΩΡΟΣ (Διόδωρος). 1. Surnamed ΚΡΟΝΟΣ, of Iasus in Caria, lived at Alexandria in the reign of Ptolemy Soter, who is said to have given him the surname of Cronus on account of his inability to solve at once some dialectic problem proposed by Stilpo, when the two philosophers were dining with the king. Diodorus is said to have taken that disgrace so much to heart, that, after his return from the repast, and writing a treatise on the problem, he died in despair. According to another account, he derived his surname from his teacher Apollonius Cronus. He belonged to the Megaric school of philosophy, of which he was the head. He was celebrated for his great dialectic skill, for which he is called ὁ διαλεκτικός, or διαλεκτικώτατος.—2. SICULUS, of Agyrium in Sicily, was a contemporary of Julius Cæsar and Augustus. In order to collect materials for his history, he travelled over a great part of Europe and Asia, and lived a long time at Rome. He spent altogether thirty years upon his work. It was entitled Βιβλιοθήκη Ἱστορικῆ, The Historical Library, and was a universal history, embracing the period from the earliest mythical ages down to the beginning of Cæsar's Gallic wars. It was divided into three great sections, and into forty books. The first section, which consisted of the first six books, contained the history of the mythical times previous to the Trojan war. The second section, which consisted of eleven books, contained the history from the Trojan war down to the death of Alexander the Great. The third section, which contained the remaining twenty-three books, treated of the history from the death of Alexander down to the beginning of Cæsar's Gallic wars. Of this work only the following portions are extant entire: the first five books, which contain the early history of the Eastern nations, the Egyptians, Æthiopians, and Greeks; and from book eleven to book twenty, containing the history from the second Persian war, B.C. 480, down to 302. Of the remaining portion there are extant a number of fragments and the Excerpta, which are preserved partly in Photius, and partly in the Eclogæ made at the command of Constantine Porphyrogenitus. The work of Diodorus is constructed upon the plan of annals, and the events of each year are placed one after the other, without any internal connection. In compiling his work Diodorus exercised no judgment or criticism. He simply collected what he found in his different authorities, and thus jumbled together history, mythus, and fiction: he frequently misunderstood authorities, and not seldom contradicts in one passage what he has stated in another. But, nevertheless, the compilation is of great importance to us, on account of the great mass of materials which are there collected from a number of writers whose works have perished. The best editions are by Wesseling, Amsterd., 1746, 2 vols. fol., reprinted at Bipont, 1793, 4to., 11 vols. 8vo.; and by Dindorf, Lips., 1828, 6 vols. 8vo.—3. Of Sinope, an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, flourished 353.—4. Of Tyre, a peripatetic philosopher, a disciple and follower of Critolaüs, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school at Athens. He flourished B.C. 110.

ΔΙΟΔΩΤΟΣ (Διόδοτος), a Stoic philosopher and a teacher of Cicero, in whose house he lived for many years at Rome. In his later years, Diodotus became blind: he died in Cicero's house, B.C. 59, and left to his friend a property of about one hundred thousand sesterces.

ΔΙΟΓΕΝΗΣ (Διογένης). 1. Of APOLLONIA in Crete, an eminent natural philosopher, lived in the fifth century B.C., and was a pupil of Anaximenes. He wrote a work in the Ionic dialect, entitled Περὶ Φύσεως, On Nature, in which he appears to have treated of physical science in the largest sense of the words.—2. The BABYLONIAN, a Stoic philosopher, was a native of Seleucia in Babylonia, was educated at Athens under Chrysippus, and succeeded Zeno of Tarsus as the head of the Stoic school at Athens. He was one of the three ambassadors sent by the Athenians to Rome in B.C. 155. Vid. CARNADES, CRITOLAUS. He died at the age of eighty-eight.—3. The CYNIC philosopher, was born at Sinope, in Pontus, about B.C. 412. His father was a banker named Icesias or Ictas, who was convicted of some swindling transaction, in consequence of which Diogenes quitted Sinope and went to Athens. His youth is said to have been spent in dissolute extravagance; but at Athens his attention was arrested by the character of Antisthenes, who at first drove him away. Diogenes, however, could not be prevented from attending him even by blows, but told him that he would find no stick hard enough to keep him away. Antisthenes at last relented, and his pupil soon plunged into the most frantic excesses of austerity and moroseness. In summer he used to roll in hot sand, and in winter to embrace statues covered with snow; he wore coarse clothing, lived on the plainest food, slept in porticoes or in the street, and finally, according to the common story, took up his residence in a tub belonging to the Metroum, or temple of the Mother of the Gods. The truth of this latter tale has, however, been reasonably disputed. In spite of his strange eccentricities, Diogenes appears to have been much respected at Athens, and to have been privileged to rebuke any thing of which he disapproved. He seems to have ridiculed and despised all intellectual pursuits which did not directly and obviously tend to some immediate practical good. He abused literary men for reading about the evils of Ulysses, and neglecting their own; musicians for stringing the lyre harmoniously while they left their minds discordant; men of science for troubling themselves about the moon and stars, while they neglected what lay immediately before them; orators for learning to say what was right, but not to practice it. On a voyage to Ægina he was taken prisoner by pirates, and carried to Crete to be sold as a slave. Here, when he was asked what business he understood, he answered, "How to command men." He was purchased by Xenias of Corinth, over whom he acquired such influence that he soon received from him his freedom, was intrusted with the care of his children, and passed his old age in his house. During his residence at Corinth his celebrated interview with Alexander the Great is said to have taken place. The conversation between them began by the king's saying, "I am Alexander the Great;" to which the philosopher replied, "And I am Diogenes the Cynic." Alexander then asked whether he could oblige him in any way, and received no answer except, "Yes, you can stand out of the sunshine." We are further told that Alexander admired Diogenes so much that he said, "If I were not Alexander, I should wish to be Diogenes." Diogenes died at Corinth at the age of nearly ninety, B.C. 323.—4. LÆRTIUS of Laërte in Cilicia, of whose life we have no particulars, probably lived in the second century after Christ. He wrote the Lives of the Philosophers in ten books: the work is entitled περὶ βίων, δογμαίων, καὶ ἀποφθεγμαίων τῶν ἐν φιλοσοφίᾳ ἐδόκιμισάντων. According to some allusions which occur in it, he wrote it for a lady of rank, who occupied herself with philosophy, and who, according to some, was Arria, the friend of Galen. In this work Diogenes divides the philosophy of the Greeks into the Ionic—which commences with Anaximander and ends with Chitomachus, Chrysippus, and Theophrastus—and the Italian, which was founded by Pythagoras, and ends with Epicurus. He reckons the Socratic school, with its various ramifications, as a part of the Ionic philosophy, of which he treats in the first seven books. The Eleatics, with Heraclitus and the Sceptics, are included in the Italian philosophy, which occupies the eighth and ninth books. Epicurus and his philosophy are treated of in the tenth book with particular minuteness, which has led some writers to the belief that Diogenes himself was an Epicurean. The work is of great value to us, as Diogenes made use of a great number of writers on the history of philosophy, whose works are now lost; but it is put together without plan, criticism, or connection, and the author had evidently no conception of the real value and dignity of philosophy. The best editions are by Meibom, Amsterdam, 1692, 2 vols. 4to, and Hübner [and Jacobitz, with the commentary of Casaubou], Lips., 4 vols. 8vo, 1828-1833.—5. ENOMĀUS, a tragic poet, who began to exhibit at Athens B.C. 404.

DIOPENIĀNUS (Διογενειανός), of Heraclæa on the Pontus, a distinguished grammarian in the reign of Hadrian, wrote a Greek Lexicon, from which the Lexicon of Hesychius seems to have been almost entirely taken. A portion of it is still extant, containing a collection of proverbs first printed by Schottus, with the proverbs of Zenobius and Suidas, Antv., 1612, 4to, and subsequently in other editions of the Paræmiographi Græci.

DIOMĒA (τῷ Διόμεια; Διομειεύς, Διομείς), a demus in Attica belonging to the tribe Ægeis, with a temple of Hercules; the Diomean gate in Athens led to this demus. Vid. p. 122, b.

DIOMEDEÆ INSŪLÆ, five small islands in the Adriatic Sea, north of the promontory Garganum in Apulia, named after Diomedes. Vid. DIOMEDES. The largest of these, called Diomedea Insula or Trimerus (now Tremiti), was the place where Julia, the grand-daughter of Augustus, died.

DIOMĒDES (Διομήδης). 1. Son of Tydeus and Deïpyle, whence he is constantly called Tydides (Τυδείδης), succeeded Adrastus as king of Argos.—Homeric Story. Tydeus fell in the expedition against Thebes, while his son Diomedes was yet a boy; but Diomedes was afterward one of the Epigoni who took Thebes. He went to Troy with eighty ships, and was, next to Achilles, the bravest hero in the Greek army. He enjoyed the especial protection of Minerva (Atheu); he fought against the most distinguished of the Trojans, such as Hector and Æneas, and even with the gods who espoused the cause of the Trojans. He thus wounded both Venus (Aphrodite) and Mars (Ares).—Later Stories. Diomedes and Ulysses carried off the palladium from the city of Troy, since it was believed that Troy could not be taken so long as the palladium was within its walls. Diomedes carried the palladium with him to Argos; but, according to others, it was taken from him by Demophon in Attica, where he landed one night on his return from Troy, without knowing where he was. Vid. DEMOPHON. Another tradition stated that Diomedes restored the palladium to Æneas. On his arrival in Argos Diomedes found his wife Ægialea living in adultery with Hippolytus, or, according to others, with Cometes or Cyllabarus. This misfortune befell him through the anger of Venus (Aphrodite), whom he had wounded before Troy. He therefore quitted Argos, either of his own accord, or he was expelled by the adulterers, and went to Ætolia. He subsequently attempted to return to Argos, but on his way home a storm threw him on the coast of Daunia in Italy, where he was kindly received by Daunus, the king of the country. Diomedes assisted Daunus in his war against the Messapians, married Euippe, the daughter of Daunus, and settled in Daunia, where he died at an advanced age. He was buried in one of the islands off Cape Garganum, which were called after him the Diomedean Islands. His companions were inconsolable at his loss, and were metamorphosed into birds (Aves Diomedæ), which, mindful of their origin, used to fly joyfully toward the Greek ships, but to avoid those of the Romans. According to others, Diomedes returned to Argos, or disappeared in one of the Diomedean islands, or in the country of the Heneti. A number of towns in the eastern part of Italy, such as Beneventum, Argos Hippion (afterward Argyripa or Arpi), Venusia, Canusium, Venafrum, Brundisium, &c., were believed to have been founded by Diomedes. A plain of Apulia, near Salapia and Canusium, was called Diomedii Campi after him. He was worshipped as a divine being, especially in Italy, where statues of him existed at Argyripa, Metapontum, Thurii, and other places.—2. Son of Mars (Ares) and Cyrene, king of the Bistones in Thraee, killed by Hercules on account of his mares, which he fed with human flesh.

DIOMÉDES, a Latin grammarian, probably lived in the fourth or fifth century after Christ, and is the author of an extant work, De Oratione et Partibus Orationis et Vario Genere Metrorum libri III., printed in the Grammaticæ Latinæ Auctores Antiqui of Putschius, 4to, Hanov., 1605; [and in the Scriptores rei metricæ of Gaisford, Oxford, 1837, 8vo; but only the 3d book.]

ΔΙΟΜΕΔΩΝ (Διομέδων), an Athenian commander during the Peloponnesian war. He was one of the commanders at the battle of Arginusæ (B.C. 406), and was put to death, with five of his colleagues, on his return to Athens.

DION (Δίων), a Syracusan, son of Hipparinus, and a relation of Dionysius. His sister Aristomache was the second wife of the elder Dionysius; and Dion himself was married to Arete, the daughter of Dionysius by Aristomache. Dion was treated by Dionysius with the greatest distinction, and was employed by him in many services of trust and confidence. Of this close connection and favor with the tyrant he seems to have availed himself to amass great wealth. He made no opposition to the succession of the younger Dionysius to his father's power, but he became an object of suspicion to the youthful tyrant, to whom he also made himself personally disagreeable by the austerity of his manners. Dion appears to have been naturally a man of a proud and stern character, and having become an ardent disciple of Plato when that philosopher visited Syracuse in the reign of the elder Dionysius, he carried to excess the austerity of a philosopher, and viewed with undisguised contempt the debaucheries and dissolute pleasures of his nephew. From these he endeavored to withdraw him by persuading him to invite Plato a second time to Syracuse; but the philosopher, though received at first with the utmost distinction, failed in obtaining a permanent hold on the mind of Dionysius; and the intrigues of the opposite party, headed by Philistus, were successful in procuring the banishment of Dion. Dion retired to Athens, where he lived in habitual intercourse with Plato and his disciples; but Plato having failed in procuring his recall (for which purpose he had a third time visited Syracuse), and Dionysius having confiscated his property, and compelled his wife to marry another person, he determined on attempting the expulsion of the tyrant by force. He sailed from Zacynthus with only a small force, and obtained possession of Syracuse without opposition during the absence of Dionysius in Italy. Dionysius returned shortly afterward, but found himself obliged to quit Syracuse and sail away to Italy, leaving Dion undisputed master of the city, B.C. 356. His despotic conduct, however, soon caused great discontent, and the people complained with justice that they had only exchanged one tyrant for another. He caused his chief opponent, Heraclides, to be put to death, and confiscated the property of his adversaries. Callippus, an Athenian, who had accompanied him from Greece, formed a conspiracy against him, and caused him to be assassinated in his own house, 353.

DION CASSIUS, the historian, was the son of a Roman senator, Cassius Apronianus, and was born A.D. 155, at Nicæa in Bithynia. He also bore the surname Cocecianus, which he derived from the orator Dion Chrysostomus Cocecianus, his maternal grandfather. He was educated with great care; he accompanied his father to Cilicia, of which he had the administration, and after his father's death he went to Rome, about 180. He was straightway made a senator, and frequently pleaded in the courts of justice. He was ædile and quæstor under Commodus, and prætor under Septimius Severus, 194. He accompanied Caracalla on his journey to the East; he was appointed by Macrinus to the government of Pergamus and Smyrna, 218; was consul about 220; proconsul of Africa 224, under Alexander Severus, by whom he was sent as legate to Dalmatia in 226, and to Pannonia in 227. In the latter province he restored strict discipline among the troops, which excited the discontent of the prætorians at Rome, who demanded his life of Alexander Severus. But the emperor protected him and raised him to his second consulship, 229. Dion, however, retired to Campania, and shortly afterward ob-taunted permission of the emperor to return to his native town Nieæa, where he passed the remainder of his life and died. Dion wrote several historical works, but the most important was a History of Rome (Ῥωμαϊκὴ ἱστορία), in eighty books, from the landing of Æneas in Italy to A.D. 229, the year in which Dion returned to Nieæa. Unfortunately, only a comparatively small portion of this work has come down to us entire. Of the first thirty-four books we possess only fragments; but since Zonaras, in his Annals, chiefly followed Dion Cassius, we may regard the Annals of Zonaras as to some extent an epitome of Dion Cassius. Of the thirty-fifth book we possess a considerable fragment, and from the thirty-sixth book to the fifty-fourth the work is extant complete, and embraces the history from the wars of Lucullus and Cn. Pompey against Mithradates, down to the death of Agrippa, B.C. 10. Of the remaining books we have only the epitomes made by Xiphilinus and others. Dion Cassius treated the history of the republic with brevity, but gave a more minute account of those events, of which he had been himself an eye-witness. He consulted original authorities, and displayed great judgment and discrimination in the use of them. He had acquired a thorough knowledge of his subject, and his notions of the ancient Roman institutions were far more correct than those of his predecessors, such as Dionysius of Halicarnassus. The best editions are by Reimar, Hamb., 1750-52, 2 vols. fol., and by Sturz, Lips., 1824, 9 vols. 8vo.

DION CHRYSOSTOMUS, that is, the golden-mouthed, a surname given to him on account of his eloquence. He also bore the surname Cocceianus, which he derived from the Emperor Cocceius Nerva, with whom he was very intimate. He was born at Prusa, in Bithynia, about the middle of the first century of our era. He received a careful education, increased his knowledge by travelling in different countries, and came to Rome in the time of Vespasian, but, having incurred the suspicions of Domitian, was obliged to leave the city. On the advice of the Delphic oracle, he put on a beggar's dress, and in this condition visited Thrace, Mysia, Scythia, and the country of the Gætæ. After the murder of Domitian, A.D. 96, Dion used his influence with the army stationed on the frontier in favor of his friend Nerva, and seems to have returned to Rome immediately after his accession. Trajan also entertained the highest esteem for Dion, and showed him the most marked favor. Dion died at Rome about A.D. 117. Dion Chrysostomus is the most eminent of the Greek rhetoricians and sophists in the time of the Roman empire. There are extant eighty of his orations; but they are more like essays on political, moral, and philosophical subjects than real orations, of which they have only the form. We find among them λόγοι περὶ βασιλείας or λόγοι βασιλικοί, four orations addressed to Trajan on the virtues of a sovereign; Διογένης ἢ περὶ τυραννίδος, on the troubles to which men expose themselves by deserting the path of nature, and on the difficulties which a sovereign has to encounter; essays on slavery and freedom; on the means of attaining eminence as an orator; political discourses addressed to various towns; on subjects of ethics and practical philosophy; and, lastly, orations on mythical subjects and show-speeches. All these orations are written in pure Attic Greek, and, although tainted with the rhetorical embellishments of the age, are distinguished by their refined and elegant style. The best editions are by Reiske, Lips., 1784, 2 vols., and by Emperius, Bruns, 1844.

DIONÆA. Vid. DIONE.

DIONE (Διώνη), daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, or of Cælus (Uranus) and Terra (Ge), or of Æther and Terra (Ge). She was beloved by Jupiter (Zeus), by whom she became the mother of Aphrodite (Venus). She received her daughter in Olympus when she was wounded by Diomedes. Venus (Aphrodite) is hence called DIONÆA, and this epithet is frequently applied to any thing sacred to Venus (Aphrodite). Hence we find Dionæum antrum (Hor., Carm., ii., 1, 39), and Dionæus Cæsar (Virg., Ecl., ix., 47), because Cæsar claimed descent from Venus, who is sometimes also called Dione.

DIONYSIUS (Διονύσιος). I. Historical. 1. The Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, son of Hermocrates, born B.C. 430. He was born in a private but not low station, and began life as a clerk in a public office. He was one of the partisans of Hermocrates, the leader of the aristocratical party, and was severely wounded in the attempt which Hermocrates made to effect by force his restoration from exile. He subsequently served in the great war against the Carthaginians, who had invaded Sicily under Hannibal, the son of Giseo, and successively reduced and destroyed Selinus, Himera, and Agrigentum. These disasters, and especially the failure of the Syracusan general, Daphnæus, to relieve Agrigentum, had created a general spirit of discontent and alarm, of which Dionysius skillfully availed himself. He succeeded in procuring a decree for deposing the existing generals, and appointing others in their stead, among whom was Dionysius himself, B.C. 406. His efforts were from this time directed toward supplanting his new colleagues and obtaining the sole direction of affairs. These efforts were crowned with success. In the following year (405), the other generals were deposed, and Dionysius, though only twenty-five years of age, was appointed sole general, with full powers. From this period we may date the commencement of his reign, or tyranny, which continued without interruption for thirty-eight years. His first step was to procure the appointment of a body guard, which he speedily increased to the number of one thousand men; at the same time, he induced the Syracusans to double the pay of all the troops, and took every means to ingratiate himself with the mercenaries. By his marriage with the daughter of Hermocrates, he secured to himself the support of all the remaining partisans of that leader. He converted the island of Ortygia into a strong fortress, in which he took up his own residence. After concluding a peace with Carthage, and putting down a formidable insurrection in Syracuse, he began to direct his arms against the other cities of Sicily. Naxos, Catana, and Leontini successively fell into his power, either by force or treachery. For several years after this he made preparations for renewing the war with Carthage. In 397 he declared war against Carthage. At first he met with great success, but in 395 his fleet was totally defeated, and he was obliged to shut himself up within the walls of Syracuse, where he was besieged by the Carthaginians both by sea and land. A pestilence shortly after broke out in the Carthaginian camp, and greatly reduced the enemy, whereupon Dionysius suddenly attacked the enemy both by sea and land, defeated the army, and burned great part of their fleet. The Carthaginians were now obliged to withdraw. In 393 they renewed the war with no better success, and in 392 they concluded a peace with Dionysius. This treaty left Dionysius at leisure to continue the ambitious projects in which he had previously engaged against the Greek cities in Italy. He formed an alliance with the Lucanians, and crossed over into Italy. He subdued Caulonia, Hipponium and Rhegium, 387. He was in close alliance with the Locrians; and his powerful fleets gave him the command both of the Tyrrhenian and Adriatic Seas. He was now at the summit of his greatness, and during the twenty years that elapsed from this period to his death, he possessed an amount of power and influence far exceeding those enjoyed by any other Greek before the time of Alexander. During this time he was twice engaged again in war with Carthage, namely, in 383, when a treaty was concluded, by which the River Halycus was fixed as the boundary of the two powers; and again in 368, in the middle of which war Dionysius died at Syracuse, 367. His last illness is said to have been brought on by excessive feasting; but, according to some accounts, his death was hastened by his medical attendants, in order to secure the succession for his son. After the death of his first wife, Dionysius had married almost exactly at the same time—some said even on the same day—Doris, a Locrian of distinguished birth, and Aristomæche, a Syracusan, the daughter of his supporter Hipparinus, and the sister of Dion. By Doris he had three children, of which the eldest was the successor, Dionysius. The character of Dionysius has been drawn in the blackest colors by many ancient writers; he appears, indeed, to have become a sort of type of a tyrant, in its worst sense. In his latter years he became extremely suspicious, and apprehensive of treachery even from his nearest friends, and is said to have adopted the most excessive precautions to guard against it. Many of these stories have, however, an air of great exaggeration. (Cic., Tusc., v., 20.) He built the terrible prison called Lautumia, which was cut out of the solid rock in the part of Syracuse named Epipolæ. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. LAUTUMIÆ. Dionysius was fond of literature and the arts. He adorned Syracuse with splendid temples and other public edifices, so as to render it unquestionably the greatest of all Greek cities. He was himself a poet, and repeatedly contended for the prize of tragedy at Athens. Here he several times obtained the second and third prizes; and, finally, just before his death, bore away the first prize at the Lenæa, with a play called "The Ransom of Hector." He sought the society of men distinguished in literature and philosophy, entertaining the poet Philoxenus at his table, and inviting Plato to Syracuse. He, however, soon after sent the latter away from Sicily in disgrace; and though the story of his having caused him to be sold as a slave, as well as that of his having sent Philoxenus to the stone quarries for ridiculing his bad verses, are probably gross exaggerations, they may well have been so far founded in fact that his intercourse with these persons was interrupted by some sudden burst of capricious violence.—2. The Younger, son of the preceding, succeeded his father as tyrant of Syracuse, B.C. 367. He was at this time under thirty years of age; he had been brought up at his father's court in idleness and luxury, and studiously precluded from taking any part in public affairs. The ascendancy which Dion, and, through his means, Plato, obtained for a time over his mind, was undermined by flatterers and the companions of his pleasures. Yet his court was at this time a great place of resort for philosophers and men of letters: besides Plato, whom he induced by the most urgent entreaties to pay him a second visit, Aristippus of Cyrene, Eudoxus of Cnidus, Speusippus, and others, are stated to have spent some time with him at Syracuse; and he cultivated a friendly intercourse with Archytas and the Pythagoreans of Magna Græcia. Dion, who had been banished by Dionysius, returned to Sicily in 357, at the head of a small force, with the avowed object of dethroning Dionysius. The latter was absent from Syracuse at the time that Dion landed in Sicily; but he instantly returned to Syracuse, where the citadel still held out for him. But, finding it impossible to retain his power, he sailed away to Italy with his most valuable property, and thus lost the sovereignty after a reign of twelve years, 356. He now repaired to Loeri, the native city of his mother, Doris, where he was received in the most friendly manner; but he made himself tyrant of the city, and is said to have treated the inhabitants with the utmost cruelty. After remaining at Loeri ten years, he availed himself of the internal dissensions at Syracuse to recover possession of his power in that city, 346. The Locrians took advantage of his absence to revolt against him, and wreaked their vengeance in the most cruel manner on his wife and daughters. He continued to reign in Syracuse for the next three years, till Timoleon came to Sicily to deliver the Greek cities of the island from the tyrants. As he was unable to resist Timoleon, he surrendered the citadel into the hands of the latter on condition of being allowed to depart in safety to Corinth, 343. Here he spent the remainder of his life in a private condition, and is said to have frequented low company, and sunk gradually into a very degraded and abject state. According to some writers, he was reduced to support himself by keeping a school; others say that he became one of the attendants on the rites of Cybele, a set of mendicant priests of the lowest class.—3. Tyrant of Heraclea on the Euxine, son of Clearchus, succeeded his brother Timotheus in the tyranny about B.C. 338. He is said to have been the mildest and justest of all the tyrants that had ever lived. He married Amastris, niece of Darius. In 306 he assumed the title of king, and died shortly afterward at the age of 55. He is said to have been choked by his own fat.

II. Literary. 1. Surnamed AREOPAGITA, because he was one of the council of the Areopagus, was converted by St. Paul's preaching at Athens. There are extant several works under his name, which, however, could scarcely have been written before the fifth century of our era.—2. CATO. Vid. CATO.—3. Surnamed CHALCUS (ὁ Χαλκοῦς), an Attic poet and orator, who derived his surname from his having advised the Athenians to coin brass money for the purpose of facilitating traffic. Of his oratory we know nothing; but his poems, chiefly elegies, are often referred to and quoted. He was one of the leaders of the colony to Thurii in Italy, B.C. 444.—4. Of HALICARNASSUS, a celebrated rhetorician, came to Rome about B.C. 29, for the purpose of making himself acquainted with the Latin language and literature. He lived at Rome on terms of friendship with many distinguished men, such as Q. Ælius Tubero, and the rhetorician Cæcilius; and he remained in the city for twenty-two years, till his death, B.C. 7. His principal work, which he composed at Rome at the later period of his life, was a history of Rome in twenty-two books, entitled Ῥωμαϊκὴ Ἀρχαιολογία. It contained the history of Rome from the mythical times down to B.C. 264, in which year the history of Polybius begins with the Punic wars. The first nine books alone are complete; of the tenth and eleventh we have the greater part; and of the remaining nine we possess nothing but fragments and extracts. Dionysius treated the early history of Rome with great minuteness. The eleven books extant do not carry the history beyond B.C. 441, so that the eleventh book breaks off very soon after the decemviral legislation. This peculiar minuteness in the early history, however, was, in a great measure, the consequence of the object he had proposed to himself, and which, as he himself states, was to remove the erroneous notions which the Greeks entertained with regard to Rome's greatness. Dionysius had no clear notions about the early constitution of Rome, and was led astray by the nature of the institutions which he saw in his own day, and thus makes innumerable mistakes in treating of the history of the constitution. He introduces numerous speeches in his work, which, though written with artistic skill, nevertheless show that Dionysius was a rhetorician, not an historian, and still less a statesman. Dionysius also wrote various rhetorical and critical works, which abound with the most exquisite remarks and criticisms on the works of the classical writers of Greece. They show that he was a greater critic than historian. The following are the extant works of this class: 1. Τέχνη ὁπτορικὴ, addressed to one Echeerates, part of which is certainly spurious. 2. Περὶ συνθέσεως ὀνομάτων, treats of oratorical power, and on the combination of words according to the different styles of oratory. 3. Τῶν ἀρχαίων κρίσεις, contains characteristics of poets, from Homer down to Euripides, of some historians, such as Herodotus, Thucydides, Philistus, Xenophon, and Theopompus, and, lastly, of some philosophers and orators. 4. Περὶ τῶν ἀρχαίων ἄποδρων ὑπομηματισμοῖ, contains criticisms on the most eminent Greek orators, of which we now possess only the first three sections; on Lysias, Isocrates, and Isæus. The other three sections treated of Demosthenes, Hyperides, and Æschines; but they are lost, with the exception of the first part of the fourth section, which treated of the oratorical power of Demosthenes. 5. Ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς Ἀμμαίων, a letter to his friend Ammæus, in which he shows that most of the orations of Demosthenes had been delivered before Aristotle wrote his Rhetoric, and consequently that Demosthenes had derived no instruction from Aristotle. 6. Ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς Γναῖον Πομπήϊον, was written by Dionysius with a view of justifying the unfavorable opinion which he had expressed upon Plato, and which Pompey had censured. 7. Περὶ τοῦ Θουκυδίδου χαρακτήρος καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν τοῦ συγγραφέως ἰδιωμάτων, was written by Dionysius at the request of his friend Tubero, for the purpose of explaining more minutely what he had written on Thucydides. As Dionysius in this work looks at the great historian from his rhetorical point of view, his judgment is often unjust and incorrect. 8. Περὶ τῶν τοῦ Θουκυδίδου ἰδιωμάτων, addressed to Ammæus. 9. Δείναρχος, a very valuable treatise on the life and orations of Dinarehus. The best editions of the complete works of Dionysius are by Sylburg, Frankfurt, 1586, 2 vols. fol., reprinted at Leipzig, 1691; by Hudson, Oxon., 1704, 2 vols. fol.; and by Reiske, Lips., 1774, 6 vols. 8vo.—5. Of HERACLEA, son of Theopantus, was a pupil of Zeno, and adopted the tenets of the Stoics; but, in consequence of a most painful complaint, he abandoned the Stoic philosophy, and joined the Eleatics, whose doctrine, that ἡδονή and the absence of pain was the highest good, had more charms for him than the austere ethics of the Stoa. This renunciation of his former creed drew upon him the nickname of μεταθέμενος, i. e., the renegade. He died in his eightieth year of voluntary starvation. He wrote several works, all of which are lost. Cicero censures him for having mixed up verses with his prose, and for his want of elegance and refinement.—6. Of MAGNESIA, a distinguished rhetorician, taught in Asia between B.C. 79 and 77, when Cicero visited the East.—7. Of MILETUS, one of the earliest Greek historians, and a contemporary of Hecateus, wrote a history of Persia.—8. of MYTILENE, surnamed Scytobrachion, taught at Alexandria in the first century B.C. He wrote a prose work on the Argonauts, which was consulted by Diodorus Siculus.—9. Surnamed PERIÈGÈTES, from his being the author of a περίγησις τῆς γῆς, which is still extant; probably lived about A.D. 300. The work contains a description of the whole earth, in hexameter verse, and is written in a terse and elegant style. It enjoyed great popularity in ancient times. Two translations or paraphrases of it were made by Romans, one by Rufus Festus Avienus (vid. AVIENUS), and the other by the grammarian Priscian. Vid. PRISCIANUS. The best edition of the original is by Bernhardt, Lips., 1828.—10. Of SINOPE, an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy.—11. Surnamed THRAX, from his father being a Thracian, was himself a native either of Alexandria or Byzantium. He is also called a Rhodian, because at one time he resided at Rhodes, and gave instructions there. He also taught at Rome, about B.C. 80. He was a very celebrated grammarian; but the only one of his works which has come down to us is a small treatise entitled τέχνη γραμματική, which became the basis of all subsequent grammars, and was a standard book in grammar schools for many centuries.

III. Artists. 1. Of Argos, a statuary, flourished B.C. 476.—2. Of Colophon, a painter, contemporary with Polygnotus of Thasos, whose works he imitated in every other respect except in grandeur. Aristotle (Poët., 2) says that Polygnotus painted the likenesses of men better than the originals, Pausan made them worse, and Dionysius just like them (ὁμοίους). It seems from this that the pictures of Dionysius were deficient in the ideal.

[DIONYSODORUS (Διονυσόδωρος), a Bœotian, who is mentioned by Diodorus Siculus as the author of a history of Greece which came down to the time of Philip of Macedonia.]

DIONYSOPOLIS (Διονύσου πόλις), a town in Phrygia, belonging to the conventus juridicus of Aramen, founded by Attalus and Eumenes.

DIONYSUS (Διώνυσος or Διώνυσος), the youthful, beautiful, but effeminate god of wine. He is also called, both by Greeks and Romans, BACCHUS (Βάκχος), that is, the noisy or riotous god, which was originally a mere epithet or surname of Dionysus, and does not occur till after the time of Herodotus. According to the common tradition, Dionysus (Bacchus) was the son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Semele, the daughter of Cadmus of Thebes, though other traditions give him a different parentage and a different birth-place.* It was generally believed that when Semele was pregnant, she was persuaded by Juno (Hera), who appeared to her in disguise, to request the father of the gods to appear to her in the same glory and majesty in which he was accustomed to approach his own wife Juno (Hera). Jupiter (Zeus) unwillingly complied, and appeared to her in thunder and lightning. Semele was terrified and overpowered by the sight, and being seized by the flames, she gave premature birth to a child. Jupiter (Zeus) saved the child from the flames, sowed him up in his thigh, and thus preserved him till he came to maturity. Various epithets which are given to the god refer to that occurrence, such as πυργενής, μηροβράχης, μηροστράφης, and ignigena. After the birth of Bacchus (Dionysus), Jupiter (Zeus) intrusted him to Mercury (Hermes), or, according to others, to Proserpina (Persephone) or Rhea, who took the child to Ino and Athamas at Orchomenos, and persuaded them to bring him up as a girl. Juno (Hera) was now urged on by her jealousy to throw Ino and Athamas into a state of madness. Jupiter (Zeus), in order to save his child, changed him into a ram, and carried him to the nymphs of Mount Nysa, who brought him up in a cave, and were afterward rewarded by Jupiter (Zeus), by being placed as Hyades among the stars. Mount Nysa, from which the god was believed to have derived his name, was placed in Thrace; but mountains of the same name are found in different parts of the ancient world where he was worshipped, and where he was believed to have introduced the cultivation of the vine.

Various other nymphs are also said to have reared him. When he had grown up, Juno (Hera) drove him mad, in which state he wandered about through various parts of the earth. He first went to Egypt, where he was hospitably received by King Proteus. He thence proceeded through Syria, where he flayed Damascus alive for opposing the introduction of the vine. He then traversed all Asia, teaching the inhabitants of the different countries of Asia the cultivation of the vine, and introducing among them the elements of civilization. The most famous part of his wanderings in Asia is his expedition to India, which is said to have lasted several years. On his return to Europe he passed through Thrace, but was ill received by Lyeurgus, king of the Edones, and leaped into the sea to seek refuge with Thetis, whom he afterward rewarded for her kind reception with a golden urn, a present of Vulcan (Hephaestus). All the host of Bacchantic women and Satyrs who had accompanied him were taken prisoners by Lyeurgus, but the women were soon set free again. The country of the Edones thereupon ceased to bear fruit, and Lyeurgus became mad and killed his own son, whom he mistook for a vine. After this his madness ceased, but the country still remained barren, and Bacchus (Dionysus) declared that it would remain so till Lyeurgus died. The Edones, in despair, took their king and put him in chains, and Bacchus (Dionysus) had him torn to pieces by horses. He then returned to Thebes, where he compelled the women to quit their houses, and to celebrate Bacchic festivals on Mount Cithæron, or Parnassus. Pentheus, who then ruled at Thebes, endeavored to check the riotous proceedings, and went out to the mountains to seek the Bacchic women; but his own mother, Agave, in her Bacchic fury, mistook him for an animal, and tore him to pieces. Bacchus (Dionysus) next went to Argos, where the people first refused to acknowledge him, but, after punishing the women with phrensy, he was recognized as a god, and temples were erected to him. His last feat was performed on a voyage from Icaria to Naxos. He hired a ship which belonged to Tyrrhenian pirates; but the men, instead of landing at Naxos, steered toward Asia to sell him there as a slave. Thereupon the god changed the masts and oars into serpents, and himself into a lion; ivy grew around the vessel, and the sound of flutes was heard on every side; the sailors were seized with madness, leaped into the sea, and were metamorphosed into dolphins. After he had thus gradually established his divine nature throughout the world, he took his mother out of Hades, called her Thyone, and rose with her into Olympus. Various mythological beings are described as the offspring of Dionysus (Bacchus); but among the women, both mortal and immortal, who won his love, none is more famous in ancient history than Ariadne. Vid. ARIADNE. The extraordinary mixture of traditions respecting the history of Dionysus (Bacchus) seems evidently to have arisen from the traditions of different times and countries, referring to analogous divinities, and transferred to the Greek Dionysus. The worship of Dionysus (Bacchus) was no part of the original religion of Greece, and his mystic worship is comparatively of late origin. In Homer he does not appear as one of the great divinities, and the story of his birth by Jupiter (Zeus) and the Bacchic orgies are not alluded to in any way; Dionysus (Bacchus) is there simply described as the god who teaches man the preparation of wine, whence he is called the "drunken god" (μαιώμενος), and the sober king Lycurgus will not, for this reason, tolerate him in his kingdom. (Hom., Il., vi., 132; Od., xviii., 406; comp. xi., 325.) As the cultivation of the vine spread in Greece, the worship of Dionysus (Bacchus) likewise spread further; the mystic worship was developed by the Orphici, though it probably originated in the transfer of Phrygian and Lydian modes of worship to that of Dionysus (Bacchus). After the time of Alexander's expedition to India, the celebration of the Bacchic festivals assumed more and more their wild and dissolute character. As far as the nature and origin of the god Dionysus (Bacchus) are concerned, he appears in all traditions as the representative of the productive, overflowing, and intoxicating power of nature, which carries man away from his usual quiet and sober mode of living. Wine is the most natural and appropriate symbol of that power, and it is therefore called "the fruit of Dionysus." Dionysus (Bacchus) is, therefore, the god of wine, the inventor and teacher of its cultivation, the giver of joy, and the disperser of grief and sorrow. As the god of wine, he is also both an inspired and an inspiring god, that is, a god who has the power of revealing the future to man by oracles. Thus it is said that he had as great a share in the Delphic oracle as Apollo, and he himself had an oracle in Thracæ. Now, as prophetic power is always combined with the healing art, Dionysus (Bacchus) is, like Apollo, called ἰατρός, or ὑγιατής, and is hence invoked as a θεὸς σωτήρ against raging diseases. The notion of his being the cultivator and protector of the vine was easily extended to that of his being the protector of trees in general, which is alluded to in various epithets and surnames given him by the poets of antiquity, and he thus comes into close connection with Ceres (Demeter). This character is still further developed in the notion of his being the promoter of civilization, a law-giver, and a lover of peace. As the Greek drama had grown out of the dithyrambic choruses at the festivals of Dionysus (Bacchus), he was also regarded as the god of tragic art, and as the protector of theatres. The orgiastic worship of Dionysus (Bacchus) seems to have been first established in Thracæ, and to have thence spread southward to Mount Helicon and Parnassus, to Thebes, Naxos, and throughout Greece, Sicily, and Italy, though some writers derived it from Egypt. Respecting his festivals and the mode of their celebration, and especially the introduction and suppression of his worship at Rome, vid. Dict. of Ant., art. DIONYSIA. In the earliest times the Græces, or Charities were the companions of Dionysus (Bacchus). This circumstance points out the great change which took place in the course of time in the mode of his worship, for afterward we find him accompanied in his expeditions and travels by Bacchantic women, called Lenæ, Mænades, Thy-ades, Mimallones, Clodones, Bassaræ or Bassarides, all of whom are represented in works of art as raging with madness or enthusiasm, in vehement motions, their heads thrown backward, with dishevelled hair, and carrying in their hands thyrsus-staffs (entwined with ivy, and headed with pine-cones), cymbals, swords, or serpents. Sileni, Pans, satyrs, centaurs, and other beings of a like kind, are also the constant companions of the god. The temples and statues of Dionysus (Bacchus) were very numerous in the ancient world. The animal most commonly sacrificed to him was the ram. Among the things sacred to him, we may notice the vine, ivy, laurel, and asphodel; the dolphin, serpent, tiger, lynx, panther, and ass; but he hated the sight of an owl. In later works of art he appears in four different forms: 1. As an infant handed over by Mercury (Hermes) to his nurses, or fondled and played with by satyrs and Bacchæ. 2. As a manly god with a beard, commonly called the Indian Bacchus. He there appears in the character of a wise and dignified Oriental monarch; his beard is long and soft, and his Lydian robes (βασσάρια) are long and richly folded. 3. The youthful or so-called Theban Bacchus was carried to ideal beauty by Praxiteles. The form of his body is manly and with strong outlines, but still approaches to the female form by its softness and roundness. The expression of the countenance is languid, and shows a kind of dreamy longing; the head, with a diadem, or a wreath of vine or ivy, leans somewhat on one side; his attitude is easy, like that of a man who is absorbed in sweet thoughts, or slightly intoxicated. He is often seen leaning on his companions, or riding on a panther, ass, tiger, or lion. The finest statue of this kind is in the villa Ludovisi. 4. Bacchus with horns, either those of a ram or of a bull. This representation occurs chiefly on coins, but never in statues.

DIOPHĀNES (Διοφάνης). 1. Of Mytilene, a distinguished Greek rhetorician, came to Rome, where he instructed Tiberius Gracchus, and became his intimate friend. After the murder of Gracchus, Diophanes was also put to death.—2. Of Niceæ, in Bithynia, in the first century B.C., abridged the agricultural work of Cassius Dionysius for the use of King Deiotarus.

DIOPHANTUS (Διοφάντος). 1. An Attic orator and contemporary of Demosthenes, with whom he opposed the Macedonian party.—2. Of Alexandria, the only Greek writer on Algebra. His period is unknown; but he probably ought not to be placed before the end of the fifth century of our era. He wrote Arithmetica in thirteen books, of which only six are extant, and one book, De Multangulis Numeris, on polygonal numbers. These books contain a system of reasoning on numbers by the aid of general symbols, and with some use of symbols of operation; so that, though the demonstrations are very much conducted in words at length, and arranged so as to remind us of Euclid, there is no question that the work is algebraical; not a treatise on algebra, but an algebraical treatise on the relations of integer numbers, and on the solution of equations of more than one variable in integers. Editions by Bachet de Meziriac, Paris, 1621, and by Fermat, Toulouse, 1670, fol.

ΔΙΟΠΙΘΗΣ (Διοπιθήης). 1. A half-fanatic, half-impostor, who made at Athens an apparently thriving trade of oracles; he was much satirized by the comic poets.—2. An Athenian general, father of the poet Menander, was sent out to the Thracian Chersonesus about B.C. 344, at the head of a body of Athenian settlers or κληροῦχοι. In the Chersonese he became involved in disputes with the Cardians, who were supported by Philip. The latter sent a letter of remonstrance to Athens, and Diopithes was arraigned by the Macedonian party, but was defended by Demosthenes in the oration, still extant, on the Chersonese, B.C. 341, in consequence of which he was permitted to retain his command.

[ΔΙΩΡΕΣ (Διώρας), son of Amarynceus, leader of the Epeii before Troy; slain by Pirus.—2. Father of Automedon, who was the armor-bearer of Achilles.—3. Son of Priam, brother of Amyceus, slain with his brother in Italy by Turnus.—4. A Trojan, companion of Æneas, gained one of the prizes in the funeral games in honor of Anchises.]

ΔΙΟΣΚΟΡΙΔΙΣ INSULA (Διοσκορίδου νῆσος; now Socotra), an island off the southern coast of Arabia, near the Promontory Syagrus. The island itself was marshy and unproductive, but it was a great commercial emporium; and the northern part of the island was inhabited by Arabian, Egyptian, and Greek merchants.

ΔΙΟΣΚΟΡΙΔΕΣ (Διοσκορίδης). 1. A disciple of Isocrates, and a Greek grammarian, wrote upon Homer.—2. The author of 39 epigrams in the Greek Anthology, seems to have lived in Egypt about the time of Ptolemy Euergetes.—3. PEDACIUS or PEDANIUS, of Amzarba in Cilicia, a Greek physician, probably lived in the second century of the Christian era. He has left behind him a Treatise on Materia Medica (Περὶ Ἰατρικῆς), in five books, a work of great labor and research, and which for many ages was received as a standard production. It consists of a description of all the articles then used in medicine, with an account of their supposed virtues. The other works extant under the name of Dioscorides are probably spurious. The best edition is by Sprengel, Lips., 1829, 1830, 2 vols. 8vo.—4. Surnamed ΦΙΛΑΟΣ on account of the moles or freckles on his face, probably lived in the first century B.C.

ΔΙΟΣΚΟΥΡΙ (Διός κουροι), that is, sons of Jupiter (Zeus), the well-known heroes CASTOR (Κάστωρ) and POLLUX or Polydeuces (Πολυδέυκης). The two brothers were sometimes called CASTORES by the Romans. According to Homer, they were the sons of Leda and Tyndareus, king of Lacedæmon, and consequently brothers of Helen. Hence they are often called by the patronymic Tyndaridae. Castor was famous for his skill in taming and managing horses, and Pollux for his skill in boxing. Both had disappeared from the earth before the Greeks went against Troy. Although they were buried, says Homer, yet they came to life every other day, and they enjoyed honors like those of the gods. According to other traditions, both were the sons of Jupiter (Zeus) and Leda, and were born at the same time with their sister Helen out of an egg. Vid. LEDA. According to others, again, Pollux and Helen only were children of Jupiter

(Zeus), and Castor was the son of Tyndareus. Hence Pollux was immortal, while Castor was subject to old age and death like every other mortal. They were born, according to different traditions, at different places, such as Amyclæ, Mount Taygétus, the island of Pepheros, or Thalamæ. The fabulous life of the Dioscouri is marked by three great events. 1. Their expedition against Athens. Theseus had carried off their sister Helen from Sparta, and kept her in confinement at Aphidnæ, under the superintendence of his mother Æthra. While Theseus was absent from Attica, the Dioscouri marched into Attica, and ravaged the country round the city. Academus revealed to them that Helen was kept at Aphidnæ; the Dioscouri took the place by assault, carried away their sister Helen, and made Æthra their prisoner. 2. Their part in the expedition of the Argonauts, as they had before taken part in the Calydonian hunt. During the voyage of the Argonauts, it once happened that when the heroes were detained by a vehement storm, and Orpheus prayed to the Samothracian gods, the storm suddenly subsided, and stars appeared on the heads of the Dioscouri. On their arrival in the country of the Bebryces, Pollux fought against Amyceus, the gigantic son of Neptune (Poseidon), and conquered him. During the Argonautic expedition they founded the town of Dioscurias. 3. Their battle with the sons of Aphareus. Once the Dioscouri, in conjunction with Idas and Lynceus, the sons of Aphareus, had carried away a herd of oxen from Areadia. Idas appropriated the herd to himself, and drove it to his home in Messene. The Dioscouri then invaded Messene, drove away the cattle of which they had been deprived, and much more in addition. Hence arose a war between the Dioscouri and the sons of Aphareus, which was carried on in Messene or Laconia. Castor, the mortal, fell by the hands of Idas, but Pollux slew Lynceus, and Jupiter (Zeus) killed Idas by a flash of lightning. Pollux then returned to his brother, whom he found breathing his last, and he prayed to Jupiter (Zeus) to be permitted to die with him. Jupiter (Zeus) gave him the option either to live as his immortal son in Olympus, or to share his brother's fate, and to live alternately one day under the earth, and the other in the heavenly abodes of the gods. According to a different form of the story, Jupiter (Zeus) rewarded the attachment of the two brothers by placing them among the stars as Gemini. These heroic youths received divine honors at Sparta. Their worship spread from Peloponnesus over Greece, Sicily, and Italy. Their principal characteristic was that of θεοὶ σωτῆρες, that is, mighty helpers of man, whence they were sometimes called ἀνακτες or ἀνακτες. They were worshipped more especially as the protectors of travellers by sea, for Neptune (Poseidon) had rewarded their brotherly love by giving them power over winds and waves, that they might assist the shipwrecked (fratres Helena, lucida sidera, Hor., Carm., i., 3). Whenever they appeared they were seen riding on magnificent white steeds. They were regarded as presidents of the public games. They were further believed to have invented the war-dance and warlike music, and poets and bards were favored by them. Owing to their warlike character, it was customary at Sparta for the two kings, whenever they went to war, to be accompanied by symbolic representations of the Dioscuri (δόκανα). Respecting their festivals, vid. Dict. of Ant., arts. ΑΝΑΚΙΑ, DIOSCURIA. Their usual representation in works of art is that of two youthful horsemen with egg-shaped helmets, crowned with stars, and with spears in their hands. At Rome, the worship of the Dioscuri was introduced at an early time. They were believed to have assisted the Romans against the Latins in the battle of Lake Regillus; and the dictator, A. Postumius Albius, during the battle vowed a temple to them. It was erected in the Forum, on the spot where they had been seen after the battle, opposite the temple of Vesta. It was consecrated on the 15th of July, the anniversary of the battle of Regillus. The equites regarded the Dioscuri as their patrons. From the year B.C. 305, the equites went every year, on the 15th of July, in a magnificent procession on horseback, from the temple of Mars through the main streets of the city, across the Forum, and by the ancient temple of the Dioscuri.

DIOSKOURIAS (Διοσκουριάς: Διοσκουριεύς: now Iskuriá or Iskaur), an important town in Colchis, on the River Anthemus, northwest of the Phasis, founded by the Milesians, was a great emporium for all the surrounding people: under the Romans it was called Sebastopolis.

DIOS-HIERON (Διὸς Ἱερὸν: Διοσιερίτης), a small town on the coast of Ionia, between Lebedus and Colophon.

DIOSPOLIS (Διὸς πόλις: Διοσπολίτης). 1. D. MAGNA, the later name of Thebes in Egypt. vid. THEBÆ.—2. D. PARVA, called by Pliny Jovis Oppidum, the capital of the Nomos Diospolites in Upper Egypt.—3. A town in Lower Egypt, in the Delta, near Mendes, in the midst of marshes.—4. (Now Ludd, Lydd), the name given by the Greek and Roman writers to the LYDDA of the Scriptures.—5. A town in Pontus, originally called CABIRA.

DIOWIS, an ancient Italian (Umbrian) name of Jupiter.

DIPHILUS (Δίφιλος), one of the principal Athenian comic poets of the new comedy, and a contemporary of Menander and Philemon, was a native of Sinope. He is said to have exhibited one hundred plays. Though, in point of time, Diphilus belonged to the new comedy, his poetry seems to have had more of the character of the middle. This is shown, among other indications, by the frequency with which he chose mythological subjects for his plays, and by his bringing on the stage the poets Archilochus, Hipponax, and Sappho. The Roman comic poets borrowed largely from Diphilus. The Cæina of Plautus is a translation of his Κληρούμενοι. His Συναποθηήσκοντες was translated by Plautus in the lost play of the Commorientes, and was partly followed by Terence in his Adelphi. The Rudens of Plautus is also a translation of a play of Diphilus, but the title of the Greek play is not known. [The fragments of Diphilus are edited by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. ii, p. 1066-96, edit. minor.]

DIPÆNUS and SCYLLIS (Δίπαινος καὶ Σκύλλης), very ancient Greek statuaries, who are always mentioned together, flourished about B.C. 560. They were natives of Crete, whence they went to Sicily, which was for a long time the chief seat of Grecian art. Their disciples were Teetæus and Angelion, Learchus of Rhegium, Doryclidas and his brother Medon, Dontas, and Theocles, who were all four Lacedæmonians. Dipænus and Scyllis are sometimes called sons of Dædalus, by which we are only to understand that they belonged to the Dædalian style of art. vid. DÆDALUS.

DIRÆ, a name of the Furiæ. vid. EUMENIDES. DIRCE (Δίρκη), daughter of Helios and wife of Lycus. Her story is related under AMPHION. [DIRÆ or DĒRĒ (Δειρή). vid. BERENICE, No. 4.] DIRPHYS (Δίρφυς), a mountain in Eubœa.

DIS, contracted from Dives, a name sometimes given to Pluto, and hence also to the lower world.

DIUM (Δίον: Διεύς, Διαστῆς). 1. An important town in Macedonia, on the Thermaic Gulf, so called after a temple of Jupiter (Zeus). Here were placed the equestrian statues by Lysippus of the Macedonians who had fallen at the battle of the Granicus.—2. A town in Chalcidice in Macedonia, on the Strymonic Gulf.—3. A town in Eubœa, not far from the promontory Cænæum.

DIVICO, the leader of the Helvetians in the war against L. Cassius in B.C. 107, was at the head of the embassy sent to Julius Cæsar, nearly fifty years later, B.C. 58, when he was preparing to attack the Helvetians.

DIVITIÆCUS, an Ædian noble and brother of Dumnorix, was a warm adherent of the Romans and of Cæsar, who, in consideration of his entreaties, pardoned the treason of Dumnorix in B.C. 58. In the same year he took the most prominent part among the Gallic chiefs in requesting Cæsar's aid against Ariovistus; he had some time before gone even to Rome to ask the senate for their interference, but without success. During this visit he was the guest of Cicero.

DIVODURUM (now Metz), subsequently Mediomatrici, and still later Metis or Mettis, the capital of the Mediomatrici in Gallia Belgica.

DIVONA. vid. CADURCI.

DIYLLUS (Διύλλος), an Atheuian, who wrote a history of Greece and Sicily in twenty-six or twenty-seven books, from the seizure of the Delphic temple by Philomelus. The exact period at which he flourished can not be ascertained, but he belongs to the age of the Ptolemies.

DOBÆRUS (Δόβρος), a town in Pæonia in Macedonia, east of the River Echedorus.

DOCIMIA or DOCIMÆUM (Δοκιμία, Δοκιμειον: Δοκιμείος, Δοκιμηρός), a town in Phrygia, not far from Synada: in its neighborhood were celebrated marble quarries.

DODONA (Δωδώνη), the most ancient oracle in Greece, was situated in Epirus, and probably at the southeastern extremity of the Lake of Joannina, near Kastritza. It was founded by Pelasgians, and was dedicated to Jupiter (Zeus). The responses of the oracle were given from lofty oaks or beech trees, probably from a grove consisting of these trees. The will of the god was declared by the wind rustling through the trees; and, in order to render the sounds more distinct, brazen vessels were suspended on the branches of the trees, which, being set in motion by the wind, came in contact with one another. These sounds were in early times interpreted by men, but afterward, when the worship of Dione became connected with that of Jupiter (Zeus), by two or three aged women, who were called πελειάδες or πέλαιαι, because pigeons were said to have brought the command to found the oracle. There were, however, also priests, called Selli or Helli, who had the management of the temple. The oracle of Dodona had less influence in historical times than in the heroic age. It was chiefly consulted by the neighboring tribes, the Ætolians, Acarnanians, and Epirots, and by those who would not go to Delphi on account of its partiality for the Dorians. In B.C. 219, the temple was destroyed by the Ætolians, and the sacred oaks cut down. But the town continued to exist, and we hear of a bishop of Dodona in the council of Ephesus.

DOLABELLA, CORNELIUS. 1. P., consul B.C. 283, conquered the Senones.—2. CN., curule ædile 165, in which year he and his colleague, Sextus Julius Cæsar, had the Heeyra of Terence performed at the festival of the Megalesia. In 159 he was consul.—3. CN., a partisan of Sulla, by whom he was made consul, 81. He afterward received Macedonia for his province. In 77 he was accused by the young Julius Cæsar of having been guilty of extortion in his province, but he was acquitted.—4. CN., prætor urbanus 81, when the cause of P. Quintus was tried: Cicero charges him with having acted on that occasion unjustly. The year after he had Cilicia for his province; C. Malleolus was his quæstor, and the notorious Verres his legate. Dolabella not only tolerated the extortions and robberies committed by them, but shared in their booty. On his return to Rome, Dolabella was accused by M. Æmilius Scaurus of extortion in his province, and on that occasion Verres deserted his accomplice and furnished the accuser with all the necessary information. Dolabella was condemned, and went into exile.—5. P., the son-in-law of Cicero, whose daughter Tullia he married after divorcing his wife Fabia, 51. He was one of the most profligate men of his age, and his conduct caused Cicero great uneasiness. On the breaking out of the civil war he joined Cæsar, and fought on his side at the battle of Pharsalia (48), in Africa (46), and in Spain (45). Cæsar raised him to the consulship in 44, notwithstanding the opposition of Antony. After the murder of Cæsar, he forthwith joined the assassins of his benefactor; but when Antony gave him the province of Syria, with the command against the Parthians, all his republican enthusiasm disappeared at once. On his way to his province he plundered the cities of Greece and Asia Minor, and at Smyrna he murdered Trebonius, who had been appointed by the senate proconsul of Asia. When his proceedings became known at Rome, he was declared a public enemy; and Cassius, who had received Syria from the senate, marched against him. Dolabella threw himself into Laodicæa, which was besieged by Cassius, who at length succeeded in taking it. Dolabella, in order not to fall into the hands of his enemies, ordered one of his soldiers to kill him, 43.

DOLICHE (Δολίχη). 1. The ancient name of the island Icarus.—2. A town in Thessaly, on the western slope of Olympus.—3. A town in Comagenæ, between Zeugma and Germanica, also called Dolichene, celebrated for the worship of Jupiter.—4. Or Dulichium. Vid. ECHINADES.

DOLICHIÆTE (Δολιχίστη: now Kakava), an island off the coast of Lycia, opposite the promontory Chimæra.

DOLIÖNES (Δολιῶνες), a Pelasgic people in Mysia, who dwelt between the rivers Æsepus and Rhyndacus, and in the neighborhood of Cyzicus, which was called after them Doliönis.

DOLON (Δόλων), a Trojan, sent by night to spy the Grecian camp, was taken prisoner by Ulysses and Diomedes, compelled to give intelligence respecting the Trojans, and then slain by Diomedes. The tenth book of the Iliad was therefore called Δολώνεια or Δολωνοφονία.

DOLONCI (Δόλογκοι), a Thracian people in the Thracian Chersonesus. Vid. MILITAEDES.

DOLÖPES (Δόλοπες), a powerful people in Thessaly, dwelt on the Enipeus, and fought before Troy. (Hom., Il. ix, 484.) At a later time they dwelt at the foot of Mount Pindus; and their country, called DOLORIA (Δολορία), was reckoned part of Epirus.

DOMITIA. 1. Sister of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus (vid. AHENOBARBUS, No. 10), and consequently an aunt of the Emperor Nero. She was the wife of Crispus Passienus, and was murdered in her old age by Nero, who wished to get possession of her property.—2. LEPIDA, sister of the preceding, wife of M. Valerius Messala Barbatus, and mother of Messalina, was put to death by Claudius at the instigation of Agrippina.—3. LONGINA, daughter of Domitius Corbulo, was first married to L. Lamia Æmilianus, and afterward to the Emperor Domitian. In consequence of her adulterous intercourse with Paris, an actor, Domitian repudiated her, but was afterward reconciled to her. She was privy to Domitian's murder.

DOMITIA GENS, plebeian, was divided into the two illustrious families of AHENOBARBUS and CALVINUS.

DOMITIÄNUS, or, with his full name, T. FLAVIUS DOMITIÄNUS AUGUSTUS, Roman emperor A.D. 81–96, was the younger son of Vespasian, and was born at Rome A.D. 51. When Vespasian was proclaimed emperor by the legions in the East (69), Domitian, who was then at Rome, narrowly escaped being murdered by Vitellius, and concealed himself until the victory of his father's party was decided. After the fall of Vitellius, Domitian was proclaimed Cæsar, and obtained the government of the city till the return of his father. In this short time he gave full proofs of his sanguinary and licentious temper. Vespasian intrusted Domitian with no public affairs, and during the ten years of his reign (69–79), Domitian lived as a private person on an estate near the Alban Mount, surrounded by a number of courtesans, and devoting a great part of his time to the composition of poetry and the recitation of his productions. During the reign of his brother Titus (79–81), he was also not allowed to take any part in public affairs. On the death of Titus (81), which was in all probability the work of Domitian, he was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers. During the first few years of his reign he kept a strict superintendence over the governors of provinces, enacted several useful laws, endeavored to correct the licentious conduct of the higher classes; and though he indulged himself in strange passions, his government was much better than had been expected. But his conduct was soon changed for the worse. His wars were mostly unfortunate; and his want of success both wounded his vanity and excited his fears, and thus led him to delight in the misfortunes and sufferings of others. In 83 he undertook an expedition against the Chatti, which was attended with no result, though on his return to Rome in the following year he celebrated a triumph, and assumed the name of Germanicus. In 85, Agricola, whose success and merits excited his jealousy, was recalled to Rome. Vid. AGRICOLA. From 86 to 90 he had to carry on war with Decebalus and the Dacians, who defeated the Roman armies, and at length compelled Domitian to purchase peace on very humiliating terms. Vid. DECEBALUS. It was after the Dacian war especially that he gave full sway to his cruelty and tyranny. No man of distinction was safe unless he would degrade himself to flatter the tyrant. The silent fear which prevailed in Rome and Italy during the latter years of Domitian's reign are briefly but energetically described by Tacitus in the introduction to his Life of Agricola, and his vices and tyranny are exposed in the strongest colors by the withering satire of Juvenal. All the philosophers who lived at Rome were expelled. Christian writers attribute to him a persecution of the Christians likewise, but there is some doubt upon the matter; and the belief seems to have arisen from the strictness with which he exacted the tribute from the Jews, and which may have caused much suffering to the Christians also. Many conspiracies had been formed against his life, but had been discovered. At length three officers of his court, Parthenius, Sigerius, and Entellus, whom Domitian intended to put to death, assisted by Domitia, the emperor's wife, had him murdered by Stephanus, a freedman, on the 18th of September, 96.

DOMITIUS AFER. Vid. AFER.

DOMITIUS CORBULO. Vid. CORBULO.

DOMITIUS MARSUS. Vid. MARSUS.

DOMITIUS ULPIANUS. Vid. ULPIANUS.

DOMNA, JULIA, of Emesa, was born of humble parents, and married the Emperor Septimius Severus when he was in a private station. She was beautiful and profligate, but, at the same time, gifted with strong powers of mind, and fond of literature and of the society of literary men. She had great influence over her husband, and after his death was intrusted by her son Caracalla with the administration of the most important affairs of state. After the murder of Caracalla, she was at first kindly treated by Macrinus; but, having incurred the suspicions of Macrinus, and being commanded to quit Antioch, she put an end to her own life by voluntary starvation, A.D. 217.

DONATUS. 1. A celebrated grammarian, who taught at Rome in the middle of the fourth century, and was the preceptor of Saint Jerome. His most famous work is a system of Latin Grammar, which has formed the ground-work of most elementary treatises upon the same subject, from his own time to the present day. It has been usually published in the form of two separate tracts: 1. Ars s. Editio Prima, de literis, syllabis, pedibus, et tonis; 2. Editio Secunda, de octo partibus orationis; to which are commonly annexed De barbarismo, De solecismo, De ceteris vitiis; De metaplasmo, De schematibus; De tropis; but in the recent edition of Lindemann (in Corpus Gramm. Latin., Lips., 1831) these are all combined under one general title, Donati Ars Grammatica tribus libris comprehensa. We also possess introductions (enarrationes) and scholia, by Donatus, to five out of the six plays of Terence, those to the Heautontimorumenos having been lost. They are attached to all complete editions of Terence.—2. TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS, the author of a life of Virgil in twenty-five chapters, prefixed to many editions of Virgil. Nothing is known with regard to this Donatus; but it has been conjectured that some grammarian, who flourished about the commencement of the fifth century, may have drawn up a biography which formed the ground-work of the piece we now possess.

DONUSA or DONUSIA (Δονουσία: Δονύσιος: now Stenosa), one of the smaller Sporades in the Ægean Sea, south of Naxos, subject to the Rhodians in early times. It produced green marble, whence Virgil (Æn., iii., 125) calls the island viridis. Under the Roman emperors it was used as a place of banishment.

DORA, DORUS, DORUM (τὰ Δωρα, Δωρος: Δωρίτης), called Dor in the Old Testament, the most southerly town of Phœnicia on the coast, on a kind of peninsula at the foot of Mount Carmel. It was an ancient town, formerly the residence of a Canaanitish king, and afterward belonged to the tribe of Manasseh. Under the Seleucidæ it was a strong fortress, and was included in Cœle-Syria. It subsequently fell into decay, but was restored and again made a fortified place by the Roman general Gabinus.

DORIEUS (Δωριεύς). 1. Eldest son of Anaxandrides, king of Sparta, by his first wife, was, however, born after the son of the second marriage, Cleomenes, and therefore excluded from the immediate succession. Vid. ANAXANDRIDES. On the accession of Cleomenes to the throne, Dorieus left Sparta to establish for himself a kingdom elsewhere. He led his colony first to Libya; but, driven away thence, he passed over to Eryx in Sicily, where he fell in a battle with the Egestæans and Carthaginians, about B.C. 508.—2. Son of Diagoras of Rhodes (vid. DIAGORAS), was celebrated for his victories in all the great Grecian games. He settled in Thuriæ, and from this place, after the defeat of the Athenians at Syracuse, he led thirty galleys to the aid of the Spartan cause in Greece, B.C. 412. He continued to take an active part in the war till 407, when he was captured by the Athenians; but the people, in admiration of his athletic size and noble beauty, dismissed him without so much as exacting a ransom. He is said at a later time to have been put to death by the Spartans.

DORIS (Δωρίς). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, wife of her brother Nereus, and mother of the Nereides. The Latin poets sometimes use the name of this divinity for the sea itself. (Virg. Ecol., x., 5).—2. One of the Nereides, daughter of the preceding.—[3. Born at Locri, daughter of Xenetus, wife of Dionysius the elder, and mother of the younger Dionysius of Syracuse.]

DŌRIS (Δωρίς). 1. A small and mountainous country in Greece, formerly called DRYŌPIS (Δρυπίς), was bounded by Thessaly on the north, by Ætolia on the west, by Locris on the south, and by Phocis on the east. It contained four towns, Boum, Citinium, Erineus, and Pindus, which formed the Dorian tetrapolis. These towns never attained any consequence, and in the time of the Romans were in ruins; but the country is of importance as the home of the Dorians (Δωριεῖς: Dores), one of the great Hellenic races, who claimed descent from the mythical Dorus. Vid. Dorus. The Dorians, however, had not always dwelt in this land. Herodotus relates (i, 56) that they first inhabited Phthiotis in the time of Deucalion; that next, under Dorus, they inhabited Histæotis, at the foot of Ossa and Olympus; that, expelled from thence by the Cadmeans, they settled on Mount Pindus; and that they subsequently took up their abode in Dryopis, afterward called Doris. Their fifth and last migration was to Peloponnesus, which they conquered, according to tradition, eighty years after the Trojan war. It was related that Ægimius, the king of the Dorians, had been driven from his dominions by the Lapithæ, but was reinstated by Hercules; that the children of Hercules hence took refuge in this land when they had been expelled from Peloponnesus; and that it was to restore them to their rights that the Dorians invaded Peloponnesus. Accordingly, the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians is usually called the Return of the Heraclidæ. Vid. HERACLIDÆ. The Dorians were divided into three tribes: the Hyllæis (Υλλεῖς). Pamphyli (Πάμφυλοι), and Dymænes (Δυμᾶνες). The first derived their name from Hyllus, son of Hercules, the two last from Pamphylus and Dymas, sons of Ægimius. The Dorians were the ruling class throughout Peloponnesus: the old inhabitants were reduced to slavery, or became subjects of the Dorians under the name of Periæci (Περιῶικοι). Vid. Dict. of Antiq., art PERIÆCI.—2. A district in Asia Minor, consisting of the Dorian settlements on the coast of Caria and the neighboring islands. Six of these towns formed a league, called the Dorian hexapolis, consisting of Lindus, Italysus, and Camirus in the island of Rhodes, the island Cos, and Cnidus and Halicarnassus on the main land. There were also other Dorian settlements in the neighborhood, but they were never admitted to the league. The members of the hexapolis were accustomed to celebrate a festival with games on the Triopian promontory near Cnidus, in honor of the Triopian Apollo; the prizes in those games were brazen tripods, which the victors had to dedicate in the temple of Apollo; and Halicarnassus was struck out of the league because one of her citizens carried the tripod to his own house instead of leaving it in the temple. The hexapolis thus became a pentapolis.

DORISCUS (Δορίσκος), a town in Thrace at the mouth of the Hebrus, in the midst of an extensive plain of the same name, where Xerxes reviewed his vast forces.

[DORSENNUS. Vid. DOSSENNUS.

Dorso, C. Fabius, greatly distinguished himself when the Capitol was besieged by the Gauls B.C. 390. The Fabian gens was accustomed to celebrate a sacrifice at a fixed time on the Quirinal Hill, and accordingly, at the appointed time, C. Dorso, who was then a young man, descended from the Capitol, carrying the sacred things in his hands, passed in safety through the euciny's posts, and, after performing the sacrifice, returned in safety to the Capitol.

DORUS (Δωρος), the mythical ancestor of the Dorians, is described either as the son of Hellen by the nymph Orseis, and a brother of Xuthus, and Æolus, or as a son of Apollo and Phthia, and a brother of Laodocus and Polyætetes.

[DORYCLUS (Δόρυκλος). 1. An illegitimate son of Priam, slain by the Telamonian Ajax.—2. Brother of Pheucus, king of Thrace, husband of Beroë, who is mentioned by Virgil (Æn., 5, 620.)]

DORYLÆUM (Δορύλαιον: Δορυλαεύς: now Eski-Shehr), a town in Phrygia Epictetus, on the River Thymbris, with warm baths which are used at the present day; important under the Romans as the place from which the roads diverged to Pessinus, Iconium, and Apamea.

DOSILŌDAS (Δωσιλόδας), of Rhodes, the author of two poems in the Greek Anthology, the verses of which are so arranged that each poem presents the profile of an altar.

[DOSITHEUS (Δωσίθεος), a Greek historian, of whom four works are mentioned, Σικελικά, Λυδία, Ἰταλικά, Πελοποννησιακά.]

DOSITHEÛS (Δωσίθεος), surnamed Magister, a Greek grammarian, taught at Rome about A.D. 207. He has left behind him a work entitled Ἐρμηνεύματα, of which the first and second books contain a Greek grammar written in Latin, and Greek-Latin and Latin-Greek glossaries. The third book, which is the most important, contains translations from Latin authors into Greek, and vice versâ, and has been published separately by Böcking, Bonn, 1832.

DOSSENNUS FABIVS or DORSENNUS, an ancient Latin comic dramatist, censured by Horace (Ep., ii, 1, 173) on account of the exaggerated buffoonery of his characters. It appears that the name Dossenus (like that of Macchus) was appropriated to one of the standard characters in the Atellan farces. Hence some have supposed that Dossenus in Horace is not the name of a real person.

DŌTIVM (Δώτιον: Δωτιεύς), a town and plain in Thessaly, south of Mount Ossa, on the Lake Bœbeis.

[DOTO (Δωτώ), one of the Nereids (Il., 18, 43.)]

[DORUS (Δῶρος), a leader of the Paphlagonians in the army of Xerxes, Herod.]

DRABESCUS (Δράβησκος, also Δράβισκος: now Drama), a town in the district of Edœuis in Macedonia, on the Strymon.

DRACŌN (Δράκων), a town and promontory in the island Icaria.

[DRACUS (Δράκιος), a leader of the Epeans (early inhabitants of Elis) before Troy.]

DRACON (Δράκων), the author of the first written code of laws at Athens, which were called θεσμοί, as distinguished from the νόμοι of Solon. In this code he affixed the penalty of death to almost all crimes—to petty thefts, for instance, as well as to sacrilege and murder—which gave occasion to the remark that his laws were written, not in ink, but in blood. We are told that he himself defended this extreme harshness by saying that small offences deserved death, and that he knew no severer punishment for great ones. His legislation is placed in B.C. 621. After the legislation of Solon (594), most of the laws of Dracon fell into disuse; but some of them were still in force at the end of the Peloponnesian war, as, for instance, the law which permitted the injured husband to slay the adulterer, if taken in the act. We are told that Dracon died at Ægina, being smothered by the number of hats and cloaks showered upon him as a popular mark of honor in the theatre.

[DRANCES, an Italian, favorite of Latinus, a persevering opponent of the plans of Turnus.]

DRANGĀNA (Δραγγιανή: now Sedjestán), a part of Ariana, was bounded by Gedrosia, Carmania, Arachosia, and Aria. It sometimes formed a separate satrapy, but was more usually united to the satrapies either of Arachosia, or of Gedrosia, or of Aria. The chief product of the country was tin: the chief river was the Erymanthus or Erymandrus (now Hilmend or Hindmend). In the north of the country dwelt the DRANGÆ (Δράγγαι), a warlike people, from whom the province derived its name: their capital was Propthasia. The Zarangæ, Sarangæ, or Darandæ, who are also mentioned as inhabitants of the country, are probably only other forms of the name Drangæ. The Ariaspæ inhabited the southern part of the province. Vid. ARIASPÆ.

DRAUDĀCUM (now Dardasso), a fortress of the Penestæ in Greek Illyria.

DRĀVUS (now Drave), a tributary of the Danube, rises in the Noric Alps near Aguntum, flows through Noricum and Pannonia, and, after receiving the Murus (now Muhr), falls into the Danube east of Mursa (now Esseeck).

DRĒCĀNUM (Δρέκανον), a promontory on the western side of the island Cos.

DRĒPANĪUS, LATĪNUS PACĀTUS, a friend of Ausonius, and a correspondent of Symmachus, delivered a panegyric on the Emperor Theodosius, A.D. 391, after the victory of the latter over Maximus. This panegyric, which is extant, is the eleventh in the collection of the Panegyrici Veteres.

DRĒPĀNUM (Δρέπανον: Δρεπανεύς), that is, a sickle. 1. Also DRĒPĀNA (τὰ Δρέπανα), more rarely DRĒPĀNE (now Trapani), a sea-port town in the northwestern corner of Sicily, so called because the land on which it was built was in the form of a sickle. It was founded by the Carthaginian Hamilcar at the commencement of the first Punic War, and was one of the chief naval stations of the Carthaginians. Under the Romans it was an important commercial town. It was here that Anchises died, according to Virgil.—2. A promontory in Achaia. Vid. RĪNUM.—3. The ancient name of CORCYRA.—4. Also DRĒPĀNE, a town in Bithynia, on the Sinus Astacæus, the birth-place of Helena, mother of Constantine the Great, in whose honor it was called HELENOPOLIS, and made an important place. In its neighborhood were warm medicinal baths, which Constantine the Great frequently used in the latter part of his life.

ΔΡΕΨΑ (Δρέψα, also Ἰδραψα, Δύραψα, Δράψα- κα: now Anderab or Inderab), a town in the northeast of Bactriana, on the frontiers of Sogdiana.

DRILÆ (Δριλαί), a brave people in Pontus, or the frontiers of Colchis, near Trapezus.

DRILO, a river in Illyricum, flows into the Adriatic near Lissus.

DROMICHLÆTES (Δρομικλάτης), a king of the Getæ, who took Lysimachus prisoner. Vid. LYSIMACHUS.

DRŌMOS ACHILLĒUS. Vid. ACHILLEUS DROMOS.

DRUENTĪA (now Durance), a large and rapid river in Gallia Narbonensis, rises in the Alps, and flows into the Rhone near Avenio (now Avignon).

DRŪNA (now Drôme), a small river in Gallia Narbonensis, rises in the Alps, and flows into the Rhone south of Valencia (now Valence).

DRUSILLA. 1. LIVIA, mother of the Emperor Tiberius and wife of Augustus. Vid. LIVIA.—2. Daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, married first to L. Cassius Longinus, and afterward to M. Æmilius Lepidus; but she lived in incestuous intercourse with her brother Caligula, whose passion for her exceeded all bounds. On her death in A.D. 38, he commanded that she should be worshipped, by the name Panthea, with the same honors as Venus.—3. Daughter of Herodes Agrippa I., king of the Jews, married first Azizus, king of Emesa, whom she divorced, and secondly Felix, the procurator of Judæa. She was present with her husband when St. Paul preached before Felix in A.D. 60.

DRUSUS, the name of a distinguished family of the Livia gens. It is said that one of the Livii acquired the cognomen Drusus for himself and his descendants by having slain in close combat one Drausus, a Gallic chieftain; but this statement deserves little credit.—1. M. LIVIUS DRUSUS, tribune of the plebs with C. Græchus, B.C. 122. He was a staunch adherent of the aristocracy, and after putting his veto upon the laws proposed by Græchus, he brought forward almost the very same measures, in order to gain popularity for the senate, and to impress the people with the belief that the optimates were their best friends. The success of this system earned for him the designation patronus senatus. Drusus was consul 112, obtained Macedonia as his province, and conquered the Scordisci.—2. M. LIVIUS DRUSUS, son of No. 1, an eloquent orator, and a man of great energy and ability. He was tribune of the plebs 91, in the consulship of L. Marcus Philippus and Sex. Julius Caesar. Although, like his father, he belonged to the aristocratical party, he meditated the most extensive and organic changes in the Roman state. To conciliate the people he renewed several of the measures of the Græchi. He proposed and carried laws for the distribution of corn or for its sale at a low price, and for the assignation of public land. He also gained the support of the Latini and the Socii by promising to secure for them the Roman citizenship. Thus strengthened, he proposed to transfer the judicia from the equites to the senate; but, as a compensation to the former order, he further proposed that the senate, now reduced below the regular number of three hundred, should be re-enforced by the introduction of an equal number of new members selected from the equites. This measure proved unsatisfactory to both parties. The Roman populace also were opposed to the Roman franchise being given to the Latins and the Socii. The senate, perceiving the dissatisfaction of all parties, voted that all the laws of Drusus, being carried against the auspices, were null and void from the beginning. Drusus now began to organize a formidable conspiracy against the government; but one evening, as he was entering the hall of his own house, he was stabbed, and died a few hours afterward. The assassin was never discovered, and no attempts were made to discover him. Cæpio and Philippus were both suspected of having suborned the crime; but Cicero attributes it to Q. Varius. The death of Drusus destroyed the hopes of the Socii, and was thus immediately followed by the Social War.—3. LIVIUS DRUSUS CLAUDIANUS, father of Livia, who was the mother of the Emperor Tiberius. He was one of the gens Claudia, and was adopted by a Livius Drusus. It was through this adoption that the Drusi became connected with the imperial family. The father of Livia, after the death of Cæsar, espoused the cause of Brutus and Cassius, and, after the battle of Philippi (42), being proscribed by the conquerors, he killed himself in his tent.—4. NERO CLAUDIUS DRUSUS, commonly called by the moderns DRUSUS SENIOR, to distinguish him from No. 5, was the son of Tib. Claudius Nero and Livia, and younger brother of the Emperor Tiberius. He was born in the house of Augustus three months after the marriage of Livia and Augustus, 38. Drusus, as he grew up, was more liked by the people than was his brother. His manners were affable, and his conduct without reproach. He married Antonia, the daughter of the triumvir, and his fidelity to his wife was a theme of admiration in a profligate age. He was greatly trusted by Augustus, who employed him in important offices. He carried on the war against the Germans, and penetrated far into the interior of the country. In 12 he drove the Sicambri and their allies out of Gaul, crossed the Rhine, then followed the course of the river down to the ocean, and subdued the Frisians. It was apparently during this campaign that Drusus dug a canal (Fossa Drusiana) from the Rhine, near Arnheim, to the Yssel, near Dæsbërg; and he made use of this canal to sail from the Rhine into the ocean. In his second campaign (11), Drusus subdued the Usipetes, invaded the country of the Sicambri, and passed on through the territory of the Cherusci as far as the Visurgis (now Weser). On his return he was attacked by the united forces of the Germans, and defeated them with great slaughter. In his third campaign (10) he conquered the Chatti and other German tribes, and then returned to Rome, where he was made consul for the following year. In his fourth campaign (9), which he carried on as consul, he advanced as far as the Albis (now Elbe), sweeping every thing before him. It is said that he had resolved to cross the Elbe, but was deterred by the apparition of a woman of dimensions greater than human, who said to him in the Latin tongue, "Whither goest thou, insatiable Drusus! The Fates forbid thee to advance. Away! The end of thy deeds and thy life is nigh." On the return of the army to the Rhine, Drusus died in consequence of a fracture of his leg, which happened through a fall from his horse. Upon receiving tidings of the dangerous illness of Drusus, Tiberius immediately crossed the Alps, and, after travelling with extraordinary speed, arrived in time to close the eyes of his brother. Tiberius brought the body to Italy: it was burned in the field of Mars, and the ashes deposited in the tomb of Augustus.—5. DRUSUS CÆSAR, commonly called by modern writers DRUSUS JUNIOR, was the son of the Emperor Tiberius by his first wife, Vipsania. He married Livia, the sister of Germanicus. After the death of Augustus, A.D. 14, he was sent into Pannonia to quell the mutiny of the legions. In 15 he was consul, and in 16 he was sent into Illyricum: he succeeded in fomenting dissension among the Germanic tribes, and destroyed the power of Maroboduus. In 21 he was consul a second time; and in 22 he received the tribunicia potestas, by which he was pointed out as the intended successor to the empire. But Sejanus, the favorite of Tiberius, aspired to the empire. He seduced Livia, the wife of Drusus, and persuaded her to become the murderer of her husband. A poison was administered to Drusus, which terminated his life by a lingering disease, that was supposed at the time to be the consequence of intemperance, A.D. 23.—6. DRUSUS, second son of Germanicus and Agrippina. After the death of Drusus, the son of Tiberius (vid. No. 5), Drusus and his elder brother Nero became the heirs to the imperial throne. Sejanus therefore resolved to get rid of them both. He first engaged Drusus in the plots against his elder brother, which ended in the banishment and death of that prince. vid. NERO. The turn of Drusus came next. He was accused in 30, and condemned to death as an enemy of the state. Tiberius kept him imprisoned for three years, and then starved him to death, 33.

DRYAS (Δρύας). 1. Son of the Thracian king Lycurgus, who is hence called DRYANTIDES.—[2. One of the Lapithæ, friend of Pirithous (Il., vi., 130).—3. Son of the Thracian king Lycurgus, slain by his own father in a fit of perversity brought upon him by Bacchus.]

ΔΡΥΜΕΛΑ or ΔΡΥΜΟΣ (Δρυμῆλα, Δρυμός: Δρυμῆός: now Baba?), a town in Phocis, a little south of the Cephisus, was destroyed by Xerxes.

[ΔΡΥΜΟ, a nymph, a companion of Cyrene.]

ΔΡΥΜΟΣ (Δρυμός). 1. vid. ΔΡΥΜΕΛΑ.—2. A strong place in Attica, on the frontiers of Boœtia.

DRYMUSSA (Δρυμοῦσσα: Δρυμουνισσαίος), an island in the Hærmæan Gulf, off the coast of Ionis, opposite Clazomenæ; given by the Romans to Clazomenæ.

ΔΡΥΪΠΠΗ (Δρυπίπη), daughter of King Dryops, and the playmate of the Hamadryades on Mount Ceta. She was beloved by Apollo, who, to gain possession of her, metamorphosed himself into a tortoise. Dryope took the creature into her lap, whereupon the god changed himself into a serpent. The nymphs fled away in affright, and thus Apollo remained alone with Dryope. Soon after she married Andræmon, but became, by Apollo, the mother of AMPHISSUS, who built the town of Ceta, and a temple to Apollo. Dryope was afterward carried off by the Hamadryades, and became a nymph.

ΔΡΥΟΠΕΣ (Δρύοπερ), a Pelasgic people, descended from a mythical ancestor Dryops, dwelt first in Thessaly, from the Sperchæus to Parnassus, and afterward in Doris, which was called from them ΔΡΥΟΡΙΣ (Δρυορίτ). Driven out of Doris by the Dorians, they migrated to other countries, and settled in Peloponnesus, Eubœa, and Asia Minor.

ΔΡΥΟΠΣ (Δρύοψ). 1. Son of the river-god Sperchæus and the Danaid Polydora, or of Lyeon and Dia, the daughter of Lyeon, the mythical ancestor of the Dryopes.—[2. An illegitimate son of Priam, slain by Achilles.—3. A companion of Æneas, slain by Clausus.]

ΔΡΥΟΣ ΚΕΡΒΑΛÆ (Δρύοτ Κεράλαί), a narrow pass of Mount Cithæron, between Athens and Platœa.

DŪBIS (now Doubs), a river in Gaul, rises in Mount Jurassus (now Jura), flows past Vesontio (now Besançon), and falls into the Arar (now Saône) near Cabillonum (now Châlons).

DUBIS PORTUS (now Dover), a sea-port town of the Cantii, in Britain: here was a fortress erected by the Romans against the Saxon pirates.

DUCAS, MICHAEL, a Byzantine historian, held a high office under Constantine XIII, the last emperor of Constantinople. After the capture of Constantinople A.D. 1453, he fled to Lesbos. His history extends from the death of John VI. Palæologus, 1355, to the capture of Lesbos by the Turks, 1462. The work is written in barbarous Greek, but gives a clear and impartial account of events. The best edition is by Bekker, Bonn, 1834.

DŪCĒTIŪS (Δουκέτιοτ), a chief of the Sicelians or Siceli, the native tribes in the interior of Sicily, carried on a formidable war in the middle of the fifth century B.C. against the Greeks in the island. Having been at last defeated in a great battle by the Syracusans, he repaired to Syracuse as a suppliant, and placed himself at their mercy. The Syracusans spared his life, but sent him into an honorable exile at Corinth. He returned soon afterward to Sicily, and founded the city of Calacte. He died about B.C. 440.

DŪILIŪS. 1. M., tribune of the plebs B.C. 471. He was one of the chief leaders of the plebeians, and it was on his advice that the plebeians migrated from the Aventine to the Mons Sacer, just before the overthrow of the decemvirs. He was then elected tribune of the plebs a second time, 449.—2. K., one of the decemvirs, 450, on whose overthrow he went into voluntary exile.—3. C., consul 260, with Cn. Cornelius Scipio Asina, in the first Punic War. In this year the Romans built their first fleet, using for their model a Carthaginian vessel which had been thrown on the coast of Italy. The command of this fleet was given to Scipio, who was defeated by the Carthaginians off Lipara. Thereupon Duilius was intrusted with the command, and as he perceived the disadvantages under which the clumsy ships of the Romans were laboring, he devised the well-known grappling irons, by means of which the enemy's ships might be drawn toward his, and the sea-fight thus changed into a land-fight. By this means he gained a brilliant victory over the Carthaginian fleet near Mylæ, and then prosecuted the war in Sicily with success, relieving Eggesta, and taking Macella by assault. On his return to Rome, Duilius celebrated a splendid triumph, for it was the first naval victory that the Romans had ever gained, and the memory of it was perpetuated by a column which was erected in the forum, and adorned with the beaks of the conquered ships (Columna Rostrata). It is generally believed that the original inscription which adorned the basis of the column is still extant. It was dug out of the ground in the sixteenth century, in a mutilated condition, and it has since often been printed with attempts at restoration. There are, however, in that inscription some orthographical peculiarities, which suggest that the present inscription is a later restoration of the original one. Duilius was further rewarded for this victory by being permitted, whenever he returned home from a banquet at night, to be accompanied by a torch and a flute-player.

DULGIBINI, a people in Germany, dwelt south-east of the Angrivani, on the western bank of the Weser.

DULICHĪUM. Vid. ECHINADES.

DUMNORIX, a chieftain of the Ædui, conspired against the Romans B.C. 58, but was then pardoned by Cæsar in consequence of the entreaties of his brother Divitiacus. When Cæsar was going to Britain in 54, he suspected Dumnorix too much to leave him behind in Gaul, and he insisted, therefore, on his accompanying him. Dumnorix, upon this, fled from the Roman camp with the Æduan cavalry, but was overtaken and slain.

DUNIUM. Vid. DUROTRIGES.

DŪRA (τὰ Δούρα: Δουρηνοτ). 1. A town in Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, not far from Circesium, founded by the Macedonians, and hence surnamed Niannoris; also called Eurōpus (Εύρωποτ) by the Greeks. In the time of Julian it was deserted.—2. (Now Dor), a town in Assyria, on the Tigris.

DURANIŪS (now Dordogne), a river in Aquitania, which falls into the Garumna.

DŪRIĀ (now Dora Baltea), a river which rises in the south of the Alps, flows through the country of the Salassi, bringing gold dust with it, and falls into the Po.

DURIS (Δούριτ), of Samos, the historian, was a descendant of Alcibiades, and lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He obtained the tyranny of his native island, though it is unknown by what means. He wrote a considerable number of works, of which the most important was a history of Greece, from B.C. 370 to 281. He does not appear to have enjoyed any very great reputation as an historian among the ancients. His fragments have been collected by Hulleman, Duridis Samii quæ supersunt, Traject. ad Rhen., 1841; [and by Müller, Hist. Græc. Fragm., vol. ii., p. 466-488.]

DŪRIŪS (Δούριποτ, Δώριποτ: now Duero, Douro), one of the chief rivers of Spain, rises among the Pelendones, at the foot of Mount Idubeda, near Numantia, and flows into the Atlantic; it was auriferous, and is navigable a long way from its mouth.

DUROBRIVÆ (now Rochester), a town of the Cantii in Britain.

DUROCASIS (now Dreux), a town of the Carnutes in Gallia Lugdunensis.

DUROCATELAUNI. Vid. CATALAUNI.

DUROCORTORUM (now Rheims), the capital of the Remi in Gallia Belgica, and subsequently called Remi, was a populous and powerful town.

DURONIA, a town in Samnium in Italy, west of the Caudine passes.

DUROTRIGES, a people in Britain, in Dorsetshire, and the west of Somersetshire: their chief town was Dunium (now Dorchester).

DUROVERNUM or DARVERNUM (now Canterbury), a town of the Cantii in Britain, afterward called Cantuarina.

DYARNANES or EDANES (now Brahmaputra), a river in India, falls into the Ganges on the eastern side.

DYMAS (Δύμας). 1. Son of Ægimius, from whom the Dymanes, one of the three tribes of the Dorians, were believed to have derived their name.—2. Father of Asius and of Heeuba, the wife of Priam, lived in Phrygia, on the Sangarius; Heeuba is hence called Dymantis proles (Ovid. Her., xl. 762) and Dymantis (Ib., xiii. 620).—3. A Phæacian, whose daughter was an attendant of Nausicaa.—4. A Trojan, who fought by the side of Æneas on the night of the capture of Troy; he was killed by his own friends in mistake for a Greek whose armor he had put on.]

DŪME or DYMÆ (Δύμη, Δύμαι: Δυμαῖος, Dymæus; ruins near Karavostasi), a town in the west of Achaia, near the coast; one of the twelve Achaean towns; it founded, along with Patræ, the second Achaean league; and was at a later time colonized by the Romans.

DYRAS (Δύρας), a small river in Phthiotis in Thessaly, falls into the Sinus Maliaeus.

DYRRHACHIUM (Δυρράχιον: Δυρράχιος, Δυρράχινός, Dyrrachinus; now Durazzo), formerly called EPIDAMNUS (Ἐπίδαμνος: Ἐπιδάμνιος), a town in Greek Illyria, on a peninsula in the Adriatic Sea. It was founded by the Coreyraeans, and received the name Epidamnus; but since the Romans considered this name a bad omen, as reminding them of dammum, they changed it into Dyrrhachium when they became masters of the country. Under the Romans it became an important place; it was the usual place of landing for persons who crossed over from Brundisium. Commerce and trade were carried on here with great activity, whence it is called Taberna Adriæ by Catullus (xxxvi. 15); and here commenced the great Ægnaia Via leading to the East. In the civil war it was the head-quarters of Pompey, who kept all his military stores here. In A.D. 345 it was destroyed by an earthquake.

DYSORUM (τὸ Δύσωρον), a mountain in Macedonia with gold mines, between Chalcidice and Odontantice.

DYSPONTIUM (Δυσπόντιον: Δυσπόντιος), an ancient town of Pisatis in Elis, north of the Alps, was destroyed by the Eleans, whereupon its inhabitants removed to Epidamnus and Apollonia.

E.

[EBLANA (Ἐβλانا), a city of the Eblani in

Hibernia, on the eastern coast, probably answering to the modern Dublin.]

EBŪRA. 1. Or EBŪRA CEREALIS, a small town in Hispania Bætica, perhaps in the neighborhood of the modern Sa Cruz.—2. Surnamed LIBERALITAS JULIA (now Evora), a Roman municipium in Lusitania.—3. Or EBŪRA (now S. Lucar de Barrameda), a town in Hispania Bætica, near the mouth of the Bætis.—4. A fortress of the Edetani in Hispania Tarraconensis.

EBORĀCUM or EBURĀCUM (now York), a town of the Brigantes in Britain, was made a Roman station by Agricola, and soon became the chief Roman settlement in the whole island. It was both a municipium and a colony. It was the head-quarters of the sixth legion, and the residence of the Roman emperors when they visited Britain. Here the emperors Septimius Severus and Constantius Chlorus died. Part of the ancient Roman walls still exist at York; and many Roman remains have been found in the modern city.

EBOROLĀCUM (now Evreule, on the river Sioule), a town in Aquitania.

EBRODŪNUM (now Embrun), a town in Gallia Narbonensis, in the Cottian Alps.

EBŪDÆ or HEBŪDÆ (now Hebriides), islands in the Western Ocean off Britain. They were five in number according to Ptolemy, two called Ebudæ, Maleus, Epidium, and Rieina.

EBUROMĀGUS or HEBROMAGUS (near Bram or Villerazans), a town in Gallia Narbonensis.

EBURŌNES, a German people who crossed the Rhine and settled in Gallia Belgica, between the Rhine and the Mosa (now Maas), in a marshy and woody district. They were dependants (clientes) of the Treviri, and were in Cæsar's time under the rule of Ambiorix and Cativolcus. Their insurrection against the Romans, B.C. 54, was severely punished by Cæsar, and from this time they disappear from history.

EBUROVICES. Vid. AULERCI.

EBŪSUS or EBŪSUS (now Iviza), the largest of the Pityusæ Insulæ, off the eastern coast of Spain, reckoned by some writers among the Baleares. It was celebrated for its excellent figs. Its capital, also called Ebusus, was a civitas federata, possessed an excellent harbor, was well built, and carried on a considerable trade.

ECBĀTĀNĀ (τὸ Ἐκβάτανα, Æon. and Poët. Ἄγβάτανα: now Hamadan), a great city, most pleasantly situated, near the foot of Mount Orontes, in the north of Great Media, was the capital of the Median kingdom, and afterward the summer residence of the Persian and Parthian kings. Its foundation was more ancient than any historical record: Herodotus ascribes it to Deioceus, and Diodorus to Semiramis. It had a circuit of two hundred and forty stadia, and was surrounded by seven walls, each overtopping the one before it, and crowned with battlements of different colors: these walls no longer existed in the time of Polybius. The citadel, of great strength, was used as the royal treasury. Below it stood a magnificent palace, the tiles of which were silver, and the capitals, entablatures, and wainscoting of silver and gold; treasures which the Seleucidæ coined into money, to the amount of four thousand talents. The circuit of this place was seven stadia.

[ECDIPPA (Ἐκδίππα), in the Old Testament Achsis, a city of Palestine, on the coast, between Tyre and Ptolemais.]

ECETRA (Ectranus), an ancient town of the Volsci, and, according to Diouysius, the capital of this people, was destroyed by the Romans at an early period.

[ECHECLES (Ἐχεκλῆς). 1. Son of Actor, and husband of Polyimela.—2. Of Ephesus, a Cynic philosopher, pupil of Theombrotus.]

[ECHECLUS (Ἐχεκλος). 1. Son of Agenor, slain by Achilles.—2. Another Trojan, mentioned in the Iliad, slain by Patroclus.]

[ECHECRATES (Ἐχεκράτης). 1. Father of Eetion, grandfather of Cypselus, tyrant of Corinth.—2. A philosopher, one of the latest of the Pythagorean school, a pupil of Archytas at Tarentum. When the Pythagoreans were persecuted in Magna Græcia, he went to Rhegium, and thence to Phlius. This is the same as the one mentioned in the Phædon of Plato: by some writers he is called a teacher of Plato.]

[ECHECRATIDES (Ἐχεκρατίδης). 1. Father of Orestes, king in Thessaly.—2. A Sophist, a friend of Phocion.—3. Of Methymna in Lesbos, a peripatetic philosopher, pupil of Aristotle.]

ECHÉDORUS (Ἐχέδωρος, in Herod., Ἐχέιδωρος), a small river in Macedonia, rises in Crestonia, flows through Mygdonia, and falls into the Thermaic Gulf.

ECHĒLIDÆ (Ἐχελίδαί: Ἐχελίδης), an Attic demus east of Munychia, called after a hero Echelus.

[ECHEMON (Ἐχίμων), a son of Priam, slain by Diomedes.]

ECHĒMUS (Ἐχεμος), son of Aëropus and grandson of Ceplicus, succeeded Lyeurgus as king of Arcadia. In his reign the Dorians invaded Peloponnesus, and Echemus slew, in single combat, Hyllus, the son of Hercules. In consequence of this battle, which was fought at the Isthmus, the Heraclidæ were obliged to promise not to repeat their attempt upon Peloponnesus for fifty years.

[ECHENĒUS (Ἐχέννης Od.), the oldest of the Phæacian nobles at the court of Alcinous.]

[ECHERŒLUS (Ἐχέρωλος). 1. A Trojan, son of Thalysius, slain by Antiochus.—2. Son of Anchises, dwelt in Sicily; in order to avoid going against Troy with the Greeks, he sent to Agamemnon the beautiful mare Æthe.]

ECHESTRATUS (Ἐχέστρατος), king of Sparta, son of Agis I., and father of Labotas or Leobotes.

ECHETLA (Ἐχέτλα), a town in Sicily, west of Syracuse, in the mountains.

ECHĒTUS (Ἐχετος), a cruel king of Epirus. His daughter, Metope or Amphissa, who had yielded to her lover *Æchm*odius, was blinded by her father, and *Æchm*odius was cruelly mutilated.

ECHIDNA (Ἐχίδνα), daughter of Tartarus and Terra (Ge), or of Chrysaor and Callirrhœ, or of Peiras and Styx. The upper part of her body was that of a beautiful maiden with black eyes, while the lower part was that of a serpent, of a vast size. She was a horrible and blood-thirsty monster. She became by Typhon the mother of the Chimæra, of the many-headed dog Orthus, of the hundred-headed dragon who guarded the apples of the Hesperides, of the Colchian dragon, of the Sphinx, of Cerberus

(hence called Echidnæus canis), of Scylla, of Gorgon, of the Lernæan Hydra (Echidna Lernæa), of the eagle which consumed the liver of Prometheus, and of the Nemean lion. She was killed in her sleep by Argus Panoptes. According to Hesiod, she lived with Typhon in a cave in the country of the Arimi, but another tradition transported her to Scythia, where she became by Hercules the mother of Agathyrus, Gelonus, and Seythés. (Herod., iv., 8-10.)

ECHĪNĀDES (Ἐχινάδες or Ἐχίναί: now Curzolari), a group of small islands at the mouth of the Achelous, belonging to Acarnania, said to have been formed by the alluvial deposits of the Achelous. The legend related that they were originally nymphs, who dwelt on the main land at the mouth of the Achelous, and that, on one occasion, having forgotten to present any offerings to the god Achelous when they sacrificed to the other gods, the river-god, in wrath, tore them away from the main land with the ground on which they were sacrificing, carried them out to sea, and formed them into islands. The Echinades appear to have derived their name from their resemblance to the Echinus or sea-urchin. The largest of these islands was named DULICHĪUM (Δουλίχιον). It is mentioned by Homer, and from it Megeus, son of Phyleus, went to the Trojan war. At the present day it is united to the main land.

[ECHĪNUS (Ἐχίνος: now Achina), a town and promontory in Phthiotis in Thessaly.]

ECHĪON (Ἐχίων). 1. One of the five surviving Sparti who had grown up from the dragon's teeth which Cadmus had sown. He married Agave, by whom he became the father of Pentheus: he assisted Cadmus in the building of Thebes.—2. Son of Mercury (Hermes) and Antianira, twin-brother of Erytus or Eurytus, with whom he took part in the Calydonian hunt and in the expedition of the Argonauts.—3. A celebrated Grecian painter, flourished B.C. 352. One of his most noted pictures was Semiramis passing from the state of a handmaid to that of a queen; in this picture the modesty of the new bride was admirably depicted. The picture in the Vatican, known as "the Aldobrandini Marriage," is supposed by some to be a copy from the "Bride" of Echion.

ECHO (Ἠχώ), an Oreade, who, according to the legend related by Ovid, used to keep Juno engaged by incessantly talking to her while Jupiter was sporting with the nymphs. Juno, however, found out the trick that was played upon her, and punished Echo by changing her into an echo, that is, a being with no control over its tongue, which is neither able to speak before any body else has spoken, nor to be silent when some body else has spoken. Echo in this state fell desperately in love with Narcissus; but as her love was not returned, she pined away in grief, so that, in the end, there remained nothing of her but her voice. (Ov., Met., iii., 356-401.)

[ECHOŒMUS MONS (Ἐκνομος λόφος), a mountain near Gela, in Sicily, where Phalaris had a castle, in which was kept the celebrated brazen bull.]

ECPHANTĪDES (Ἐκφαντίδης), one of the earliest poets of the old Attic comedy, flourished about B.C. 460, a little before Cratinus. The mean ing of the surname of Καπίνας, which was given to him by his rivals, seems to imply a mixture of subtlety and obscurity. He ridiculed the rudeness of the old Megaric comedy, and was himself ridiculed on the same ground by Cratinus and Aristophanes. [The few fragments of his plays remaining are given in Meineke, Fragm. Comic Græc., vol. i., p. 6-7, edit. minor.]

[ECPHANTUS (Ἐκφάντος), of Thasos, was at the head of the party which, in the twenty-third year of the Peloponnesian war, aided Thrasybulus in gaining Thasos and certain cities of Thrace.]

EDESSA or ANTIOCHIA CALLIRRHŌE (Ἐδεσσα, Ἀντιόχεια ἢ ἐπὶ Καλλιρρόῃ, or Ἀ. μιζοθύραρος: in the Old Testament, Ur: now Urkah), a very ancient city in the north of Mesopotamia, the capital of Osroëne, and the seat of an independent kingdom from B.C. 137 to A.D. 216. Vid. AEGARUS. It stood on the River Scirtus or Bar-desanes, which often inundated and damaged the city. It was here that Caracalla was murdered. Having suffered by an earthquake in the reign of Justin I., the city was rebuilt and named Justinopolis. The Edessa of Strabo is evidently a different place, namely, the city usually called Bambyce or Hierapolis.

EDĒTĀNI or SEDĒTĀNI, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, east of the Celtiberi. Their chief towns were VALENCIA, SAGUNTUM, CÆSAR-AGUSTA, and Edeta, also called Liria (now Liria).

EDŌNI or EDŌNES (Ἠδωνοὶ Ἠδωνες), a Thracian people, between the Nestus and the Strymon. They were celebrated for their orgiastic worship of Bacchus; whence Edōnis in the Latin poets signifies a female Bacchante, and Horace says (Carm., ii., 7, 26), Non ego sanius bacchabor Edonis. The poets frequently use Edoni as synonymous with Thracians.

EĒTION (Ἠτίων). 1. King of the Hypo-Placian Thebē in Cilicia, and father of Andromache, the wife of Hector. He and seven of his sons were slain by Achilles when the latter took Thebe.—[2. King of Imbros, guest-friend of Lycaon, whom Achilles had taken prisoner and sold; Ection ransomed him and sent him to Arisbe.—3. Father of Cypselus, the tyrant of Corinth.]

EGERLASTA, a town of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconensis.

EGERĪA. Vid. ÆGERIA.

EGESTA. Vid. SEGESTA.

EGNĀTĪA (now Torre d'Anazzo), a town in Apulia, on the coast, called GNATIA by Horace (Sat., i., 5, 97), who speaks of it as Lymphis (i. e., Nymphis), iratis cæstructa, probably on account of its bad or deficient supply of water. It was celebrated for its miraculous stone or altar, which of itself set on fire frankincense and wood; a prodigy which afforded amusement to Horace and his friends, who looked upon it as a mere trick. Egnatia owed its chief importance to being situated on the great high road from Rome to Brundisium. This road reached the sea at Egnatia, and from this town to Brundisium it bore the name of the VIA EGNATIA. The continuation of this road on the other side of the Adriatic from Dyrrhachium to Byzantium also bore the name of the Via Egnatia. It was the great military road between Italy and the east. Commencing at Dyrrhachium, it passed by Lychnidus, Heraclēa, Lyncestis, Edessa, Thessalonica, Amphipolis, Philippi, and, traversing the whole of Thrace, finally reached Byzantium.

EGNĀTĪ, a family of Samnite origin, some of whom settled at Teanum. 1. GELLIUS EGNATIUS, leader of the Samnites in the third Samnite war, fell in battle against the Romans B.C. 295.—2. MARIUS EGNATIUS, one of the leaders of the Italian allies in the Social War, was killed in battle, 89.—3. M. EGNATIUS RUFUS, ædile 20 and prætor 19, was executed in the following year in consequence of his having formed a conspiracy against the life of Augustus.—4. P. EGNATIUS CELER. Vid. BAREA.

EION (Ἠῶν: Ἠιονεύς: now Contessa or Rendina), a town in Thrace, at the mouth of the Strymon, twenty-five stadia from Amphipolis, of which it was the harbor. Brasidas, after obtaining possession of Amphipolis, attempted to seize Eion also, but was prevented by the arrival of Thucydides with an Athenian fleet, B.C. 424.

EĪONES (Ἠῶνες), a town in Argolis, with a harbor, subject to Mycænæ in the time of Homer, but not mentioned in later times.

[EĪONEUS (Ἠιονεύς). 1. A Greek, slain by Hector before Troy.—2. A Thracian, father of Rhesus.—3. Son of Magnes, one of the suitors of Hippodamia.]

ELĒA (Ἐλαία: now Kazlu), an ancient city on the coast of Æolis in Asia Minor, said to have been founded by Mnestheus, stood twelve stadia south of the mouth of the Cæicus, and one hundred and twenty stadia (or sixteen Roman miles) from Pergamus, to which city, in the time of the Pergamene kingdom, it served for a harbor (ἐκτίθειον). It was destroyed by an earthquake in B.C. 90. The gulf in which it stood, which forms a part of the great Gulf of Adramyttium, was named after it Sinus Elaïticus (Ἐλαιτικός κόλπος, now Gulf of Chandeli).

ELĒŪS (Ἐλαῖος, -οὔντος: Ἐλαιούσιος). 1. Or ELĒŪS (Ἐλεοῦς: now Critia), a town on the southeast point of the Thracian Chersonese, with a harbor and a heroum of Protesilaus.—2. (Now Mesolonghi), a town of Ætolia, south of Pleuron.—3. A town in Argolis.—4. A demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Hippothontis.

ELAGABĀLUS, Roman emperor A.D. 218-222, son of Julia Scæmia and Varius Marcellus, was born at Emesa about 205, and was originally called VARIUS AVITUS BASSIANUS. While almost a child, he became, along with his first cousin Alexander Severus, priest of Elagabalus, the Syro-Phœnician Sun-god, to whose worship a temple was dedicated in his native city. It was from this circumstance that he obtained the name Elagabalus, by which he is usually known. He owed his elevation to the purple to the intrigues of his grandmother Julia Mæsa, who circulated the report that Elagabalus was the offspring of a secret commerce between Scæmia and Caracalla, and induced the troops in Syria to salute him as their sovereign by the title of M. AURELIUS ANTONINUS, the 16th of May, 218. Macrinus forthwith marched against Elagabalus, but was defeated near Antioch, June 8th, and was shortly afterward put to death. Elagabalus was now acknowledged as emperor by the senate, and in the following year came to Rome. The reign of this prince, who perished at the age of eighteen, after having occupied the throne nearly four years, was characterized throughout by an accumulation of the most fantastic folly and superstition, together with impurity so bestial that the particulars almost transcend the limits of credibility. In 221 he adopted his first cousin Alexander Severus, and proclaimed him Cæsar. Having become jealous of Alexander, he attempted to put him to death, but was himself slain, along with his mother Scæmias, by the soldiers, with whom Alexander was a great favorite.

ELANA. Vid. ELANA.

ELĀRA (Ἐλάρα), daughter of Orhomenus or Mīnyas, bore to Jupiter (Zeus) the giant Tityus. Jupiter (Zeus), from fear of Juno (Hera), concealed her under the earth.

[ELĀSUS (Ἐλάσος), a Trojan, slain by Patroclus.]

ELATĒA (Ἐλάτεια : Ἐλατεΐς). 1. (Ruins near Elephtha), a town in Phocis, and the most important place in the country next to Delphi, was situated near the Cephissus in a fertile valley, which was an important pass from Thessaly to Bœotia. Elatea was thus frequently exposed to hostile attacks. It is said to have been founded by Elatus, son of Areas.—2. A town in Pelasgiotis in Thessaly, near Gonni.—3. Or ELATRĒA, a town in Ēpirus, near the sources of the Cœcytus.

ELĀTUS (Ἐλάτος). 1. Son of Areas and Lenira, king of Arcadia, husband of Laodice, and father of Stymphalus, Ēpytus, Cyllen, and Pe-reus. He resided on Mount Cyllene, and went from thence to Phocis, where he founded the town of Elatea.—2. A prince of the Lapithæ at Larissa in Thessaly, husband of Hippæa, and father of Cæneus and Polyphemus. He is sometimes confounded with the Arcadian Elatus.—[3. An ally of the Trojans, slain by Agamemnon.—4. One of the suitors of Penelope, mentioned in the Odyssey.]

ELĀVER, (now Allier), subsequently Elaris or Elauris, a river in Aquitania, a tributary of the Liger.

ELBO (Ἐλβώ), an island on the coast of the Delta in Egypt, in the midst of the marshes between the Phatnitic and the Tanitic mouths of the Nile, was the retreat of the blind Pharaoh Anysis from the Æthiopian Sabaco, and afterward of Amyrtæus from the Persians.

ELĒA. Vid. VELIA.

ELECTRA (Ἠλέκτρα), i. e., the bright or brilliant one. 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, wife of Thaumias, and mother of Iris and the Harpies, Aëlle and Ocypete.—2. Daughter of Atlas and Pleïone, one of the seven Pleiades, and by Jupiter (Zeus) mother of Iasion and Dardanus. According to an Italian tradition, she was the wife of the Italian king Corythus, by whom she had a son Iasion; whereas by Jupiter (Zeus) she was the mother of Dardanus. It was through her means, according to another tradition, that the Palladium came to Troy; and when she saw the city of her son Dardanus perishing in flames, she tore out her hair for grief, and was placed among the stars as a comet. According to others, Electra and her six sisters were placed among the stars as the seven Pleiades, and lost their brilliancy on seeing the destruction of Ilium.—3. Sister of Cadmus, from whom the Electrian gate at Thebes was said to have received its name.—4. Daughter of Agamemnon and Clytæmnestra, also called Laodice, sister of Iphigenia and Orestes. After the murder of her father by her mother, she saved the life of her young brother Orestes by sending him, under the protection of a slave, to King Strophius at Phanote in Phocis, who had the boy educated together with his own son Pylades. When Orestes had grown up to manhood, Electra excited him to avenge the death of Agamemnon, and assisted him in slaying their mother, Clytæmnestra. Vid. ORESTES. After the death of the latter, Orestes gave her in marriage to his friend Pylades. The history and character of Electra form the subject of the "Chœphori" of Æschylus, the "Electra" of Euripides, and the "Electra" of Sophocles.

ELECTRIDES INSŪLE. Vid. ERIDANUS.

ELECTRŪON (Ἠλεκτρών), son of Perseus and Andromeda, king of Mycenæ, husband of Anaxo, and father of Alemea, the wife of Amphitryon. For details, vid. AMPHITRYON.

ELECTRŪONE (Ἠλεκτρώνων). 1. Daughter of Helios and Rhodes.—2. A patronymic from Electryon, given to his daughter Alemea.

ELĒON (Ἐλεών), a town in Bœotia, near Tanagra.

ELĒOS (Ἐλεός), the personification of pity or mercy, worshipped by the Athenians alone.

ELEPHANTINE or ELEPHANTIS (Ἐλεφαντίνη, Ἐλεφαντίς : now Jezirah-el-Zahir or Jezirah-el-Assouan), an island in the Nile, with a city of the same name, opposite to Syene, and seven stadia below the Little Cataract, was the frontier station of Egypt toward Æthiopia, and was strongly garrisoned under the Persians and the Romans. The island was extremely fertile, the vine and the fig-tree never shedding their leaves: it had also great quarries. Among the most remarkable objects in it were the temple of Cnuphis and a Nilometer; and it is still celebrated for the ruins of its rock-hewn temples.

ELEPHANTIS, a Greek poetess under the early Roman emperors, wrote certain amatory works (molles Elephantidos libelli), which are referred to by Martial and Suetonius.

ELĒPHĒNOR (Ἐλεφήνωρ), son of Chalecodon and of Imenarète or Melanippe, and prince of the Abantes in Eubœa, whom he led against Troy. He was one of the suitors of Helen: he was killed before Troy by Agenor.

ELEUSIS (Ἐλευσίς, later Ἐλευσίν : Ἐλευσινός : now Leosina or Lessina). 1. A town and demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Hippothoontis, was situated northwest of Athens, on the coast, near the frontiers of Megara. It possessed a magnificent temple of Ceres (Demeter), and it gave its name to the great festival and mysteries of the Eleusinia, which were celebrated in honor of Ceres (Demeter), and Proserpina (Persephone). The Eleusinia were originally a festival peculiar to Eleusis, which was an independent state; but after the Eleusinians had been conquered by the Athenians in the reign of Erechtheus, according to tradition, the Eleusinia became a festival common to both cities, though the superintendence of the festival remained with the descendants of Eumolpus, the king of Eleusis. For an account of the festival, vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. ELEUSINIA.—2. A place in Egypt, not far from Alexandria, on the Lake Marcotis; it was so called from Eleusis in Attica.]

ELEUTHĒRÆ (Ἐλευθεραί: Ἐλευθερεύς), a town in Attica, on the frontiers of Bœotia, originally belonged to the Bœotian confederacy, and afterward voluntarily united itself to Attica.

ELEUTHĒRIUS (Ἐλευθερίος), a surname of Jupiter (Zeus) as the Deliverer. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. ELEUTHERIA.

ELEUTHERNA (Ἐλευθέρινα: Ἐλευθερναίος), a town in the interior of Crete.

ELEUTHĒROS (Ἐλευθέρος: now Nahr-el-Kebir, i. e., Great River), a river forming the boundary between Syria and Phœnicæ, rose in Mount Bargylus, the northern prolongation of Lebanon, and fell into the sea between Antaradus and Tripolis.

ELICIUS, a surname of Jupiter at Rome, where King Numa dedicated to Jupiter Elicius an altar on the Aventine. The origin of the name is referred to the Etruscans, who by certain prayers and sacrifices called forth (eliciebant or evocabant) lightning, or invited Jupiter to send lightning. The object of calling down lightning was, according to Livy's explanation, to elicit prodigies (ad prodigia elicienda, Liv., i., 20).

ELIMBERRUM. Vid. AUSCI.

ELIMĒA, -IA, or ELIMEŌTIS (Ἐλιμεία, Ἐλιμία, Ἐλιμῶτις), a district of Macedonia, on the frontiers of Epirus and Thessaly, originally belonged to Illyria, and was bounded by the Cambunian Mountains on the south and the Tymphæan Mountains on the west. Its inhabitants, the ELIMĒAI (Ἐλεμιμῶται), were Epirots.

ELIS (Ἠλῖς, Dor. Ἄλις, Ἠλεία: Ἠλειος. Dor. Ἄλιος, whence Alii in Plautus), a country on the western coast of Peloponnesus, bounded by Achaia on the north, Arcadia on the east, Messenia on the south, and the Ionian Sea on the west. The country was fertile, watered by the ALPHEUS and its tributaries, and is said to have been the only country in Greece which produced flax. The PENEUS is the only other river in Elis of any importance. Elis was divided into three parts: 1. ELIS PROPER, or HOLLOW ELIS (ἡ Κοίλη Ἠλῖς), the northern part, watered by the Peneus, of which the capital was also called Elis.—2. PISĀTIS (ἡ Πισᾶτις), the middle portion, of which the capital was PISA.—3. TRIPHYLIA (ἡ Τριφυλία), the southern portion, of which PYLOS was the capital, lay between the Alpheus and the Neda. In the heroic times we find the kingdom of Nestor and the Pelidæ in the south of Elis, while the north of the country was inhabited by the Epeans (Ἐπειοί), with whom some Ætolian tribes were mingled. On the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Heraclidæ, the Ætolian chief Oxylus received Elis as his share of the conquest; and it was the union of his Ætolian and Dorian followers with the Epeans which formed the subsequent population of the country, under the general name of Eleans. Elis owed its importance in Greece to the worship of Jupiter (Zeus) at Olympia near Pisa, in honor of whom a splendid festival was held every four years. Vid. OLYMPIA. In consequence of this festival being common to the whole of Greece, the country of Elis was declared sacred, and its inhabitants possessed priestly privileges. Being exempt from war and the dangers of invasion, the Eleans became prosperous and wealthy; their towns were un-walled, and their country was richly cultivated. The prosperity of their country was ruined by the Peloponnesian war; the Athenians were the first to disregard the sanctity of the country; and from that time it frequently had to take part in the other contentions of the Greeks. The town of Elis was situated on the Peneus, and was built at the time of the Persian war by the inhabitants of eight villages, who united together, and thus formed one town. It originally had no walls, being sacred like the rest of the country, but subsequently it was fortified. The inhabitants of Elis formed a close alliance with the Spartans, and by their means destroyed the rival city of Pisa, and became the ruling city in the country, B.C. 572. In the Peloponnesian war they quarrelled with the Spartans because the latter had espoused the cause of Lepreum, which had revolted from Elis. The Eleans retaliated upon the Spartans by excluding them from the Olympic games.

ELLŌPIA (Ἐλλοπία). 1 A district in the north of Eubœa, near the promontory Cenæum, with a town of the same name, which disappeared at an early period: the whole island of Eubœa is sometimes called Ellopia.—2. An ancient name of the district about Dodona in Epirus.

[ELLOS (Ἐλλοψ), son of Iou or Tithonus, from whom Ellopia was fabled to have derived its name.]

ELŌNE (Ἠλώνη), a town of the Perrhæbi in Thessaly, afterward called Limone (Λειμώνη).

ELPENOR (Ἐλπίνωρ), one of the companions of Ulysses, who were metamorphosed by Circe into swine, and afterward back into men. Intoxicated with wine, Elpenor one day fell asleep on the roof of Circe's residence, and in his attempt to rise he fell down and broke his neck. When Ulysses was in the lower world, he met the shade of Elpenor, who implored him to burn his body. After his return to the upper world, Ulysses complied with this request of his friend.

ELPINICE (Ἐλπινίκη), daughter of Miltiades, and sister of Cimon, married Callias. Vid. CAL LIAS.

ELUSĀTES, a people in Aquitania, in the interior of the country. Their chief town was ELŪSA (near Euse or Eause). It was the birth place of Rufinus, the minister of Arcadius.

ELŪMĒI, ELŪMI. Vid. ELYMĀIS.

ELYMĀIS, a district of Susiana, extending from the River Eulæus on the west to the Orontis on the east, derived its name from the Elymæi or Elymi (Ἐλυμαῖοι, Ἐλυμοί), a warlike and predatory people, who are also found in the mountains of Great Media: in the Persian armies they served as archers. These Elymæi were probably among the most ancient inhabitants of the country north of the head of the Persian Gulf: in the Old Testament Susiana is called Elam.

ELYMI. Vid. ELYMUS, ELYMĀIS.

ELYMUS (Ἐλυμος), a Trojan, natural son of Anchises and brother of Eryx. Previous to the emigration of Æneas, Elymus and Ægestus had fled from Troy to Sicily, and had settled on the banks of the River Crimisus. When afterward Æneas also arrived there, he built for them the towns of Ægesta and Elyme. The Trojans who settled in that part of Sicily called themselves Elymi, after Elymus.

ELÝRUS (*Ελύρος), a town in the west of Crete, south of Cydonia.

ELÝSIUM (*Ηλύσιον πεδίον, later simply Ηλύσιον), the Elysian fields. In Homer (Od. iv., 563) Elysium forms no part of the realms of the dead; he places it on the west of the earth, near Ocean, and describes it as a happy land, where there is neither snow, nor cold, nor rain, and always fanned by the delightful breezes of Zephyrus. Hither favored heroes, like Menelaus, pass without dying, and live happy under the rule of Rhadamanthys. The Elysium of Hesiod and Pindar are in the Isles of the Blessed (μακάρων νήσοι), which they place in the Ocean. From these legends arose the fabulous island of ATLANTIS. The Elysium of Virgil is part of the lower world, and the residence of the shades of the Blessed.

ΕΜΛΨΘΙΑ (*Ημαθία: *Ημαθιεύς), a district of Macedonia, between the Haliaemon and the Axios, formerly part of Pæonia, and the original seat of the Macedonian monarchy. The poets frequently give the name of Emathia to the whole of Macedonia, and sometimes even to the neighboring Thessaly.

ΕΜΛΨΘΙΔΕΣ, the nine daughters of Pierus, king of Emathia.

ΕΜΛΨΘΙΩΝ (*Ημαθίων). 1. Son of Tithonus and Aurora (Eos), brother of Memnon, was slain by Hercules.—[2. An old man, slain by Chromis at the nuptials of Perseus.—3. A Trojan, slain by Ligeis in Italy.]

ΕΜΒΟΛΙΜΑ (*Εμβόλιμα), a city of the Paropamisadæ in Northern India, near the fortress of Aornos, sixteen days' march from the Indus (Q. Curt.).

[EMERITA. Vid. AUGUSTA EMERITA.]

ΕΜΕΣΑ or ΕΜΙΣΣΑ (*Εμεσα, *Εμισσα: *Εμεσηνός: now Hims or Homs), a city of Syria, on the eastern bank of the Orontes, in the province of Apamene, but afterward the capital of Phœnicæ Libanesia, was in Strabo's time the residence of independent Arabian princes; but under Caracalla it was made a colony with the Jus Italicum. It is a remarkable place in the history of the Roman empire, being the native city of Julia Donna, the wife of Septimius Severus, of Elagabalus, who exchanged the high priesthood of the celebrated temple of the Sun in this city for the imperial purple, and of the Emperor Alexander Severus; and also the scene of the decisive battle between Aurelian and Zenobia, A.D. 273.

[ΕΜΜΑΥΣ (*Εμμαυός: now Amwas, near Latron), a town of Palestine, on the road from Jerusalem to Joppa, about ten miles from Lydda: under the Romans it was called NICOPOLIS.]

ΕΜΜΕΝΙΔΕ (*Εμμενίδαι), a princely family at Agrigentum, which traced their origin to the mythical hero Polynices. Among its members we know Emmenides (from whom the family derived its name), the father of Ænesidamus, whose sons, Theron and Xenocrates, are celebrated by Pindar as victors at the great games of Greece.

ΕΜΘΔΙ ΜΟΝΤΕΣ, or ΕΜΟΔΥΣ, or -ΕΣ ΔΡ-ΟΝ (τὰ

*Ημωδὰ ὄρη, τὰ *Ημωδὸν ὄρος, or ὁ *Ημωδός. now Himalaya Mountains), a range of mountains north of India, forming the prolongation eastward of the Paropamisus.

ΕΜΠΕΔΌCLES (*Εμπεδοκλής), of Agrigentum in Sicily, flourished about B.C. 444. Although he was descended from an ancient and wealthy family, he joined the revolution in which Thrasydæus, the son and successor of Theron, was expelled. His zeal in the establishment of political equality is said to have been manifested by his magnanimous support of the poor, by his severity in persecuting the overbearing conduct of the aristocrats, and in his declining the sovereignty which was offered to him. His brilliant oratory, his penetrating knowledge of nature, and the reputation of his marvellous powers, which he had acquired by curing diseases, by his successful exertions in removing marshy districts and in averting epidemics and obnoxious winds, spread a lustre around his name. He was called a magician (γόης), and he appears to have attributed to himself miraculous powers. He travelled in Greece and Italy, and made some stay at Athens. His death is said to have been marvellous, like his life. One tradition represented him as having been removed from the earth like a divine being, and another related that he threw himself into the flames of Mount Ætna, that by his sudden disappearance he might be believed to be a god; but it was added that the volcano threw up one of his sandals, and thus revealed the manner of his death. The rhetorician Gorgias was a disciple of Empedocles. The works of Empedocles were all in verse. The two most important were a didactic poem on nature (Περὶ φύσεως), of which considerable fragments are extant, and a poem, entitled Καθαροί, which seems to have recommended good moral conduct as the means of averting epidemics and other evils. Lucretius, the greatest of all didactic poets, speaks of Empedocles with enthusiasm, and evidently makes him his model. Empedocles was acquainted with the theories of the Eleatics and the Pythagoreans; but he did not adopt the fundamental principles of either school, although he agreed with the latter in his belief in the migration of souls, and in a few other points. With the Eleatics he agreed in thinking that it was impossible to conceive any thing arising out of nothing. Aristotle with justice mentions him among the Ionic physiologists, and places him in very close relation to the atomistic philosophers and to Anaxagoras. Empedocles first established the number of four elements, which he called the roots of things.

[ΕΜΠΌΡΙΑ, also ΕΜΠΌΡΙΟΝ (*Εμπορεία *Εμπορία; *Εμπόριον), the southern and most fruitful part of Byzacium.]

ΕΜΠΌΡΙΕ or ΕΜΠΌΡΙΟΝ *Εμπορίαί, *Εμπορείον, *Εμπόριον: *Εμποριότης: now Amurîas), a town of the Indigetes in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the Pyrenees, was situated on the River Clodiantus, which formed the harbor of the town. It was founded by the Phocæans from Massilia, and was divided into two parts, at one time separated from each other by a wall; the part near the coast being inhabited by the Greeks, and the part toward the interior by the Indigetes. It was subsequently colonized by Julius Cæsar

Its harbor was much frequented: here Scipio Africanus first landed when he came to Spain in the second Punic war.

EMPŪLUM (now Ampiglione l.), a small town in Latium, near Tibur.

EMPŪSA (Ἐμπούσα), a monstrous spectre, which was believed to devour human beings. It could assume different forms, and was sent by Hecate to frighten travellers. It was believed usually to appear with one leg of brass and the other of an ass, whence it was called ὄνοσκελὶς or ὄνοκόλη. The Lamiae and Morino-lyceia, who assumed the form of handsome women for the purpose of attracting young men, and then sucked their blood like vampires and ate their flesh, were reckoned among the Empusæ.

ENÆSIMUS (Ἐναΐσιμος), a son of Hippocoon, slain by the Calydonian boar.]

ENARĒPHŌRUS (Ἐναρήφορος), son of Hippocoon, a passionate suitor of Helen when she was yet quite young. Tyndareus, therefore, intrusted the maiden to the care of Theseus. Enarephorns had a heroum at Sparta.

ENCELĀDUS (Ἐγκέλαδος), son of Tartarus and Terra (Ge), and one of the hundred-armed giants who made war upon the gods. He was killed, according to some, by a flash of lightning, by Jupiter (Zeus), who buried him under Mount Ætna; according to others, Minerva (Athena) killed him with her chariot, or threw upon him the island of Sicily.

ENCHĒLES (Ἐγγελεῖς, also Ἐγγελεῖαι Ἐγγέλιαι), an Illyrian tribe.

[ENCOLPIUS, a Latin historian, in the early part of the third century A.D. he wrote a life of Alexander Severus.]

ENDÆUS (Ἐνδαίος), an Athenian statuary, is called a disciple of Dædalus, whom he is said to have accompanied on his flight from Crete. This statement must be taken to express, not the time at which he lived, but the style of art which he practiced. It is probable that he lived in the time of Pisistratus and his sons, about B.C. 560.

ENDŪMIŌN (Ἐνδυμίον), a youth distinguished by his beauty, and renowned in ancient story for his perpetual sleep. Some traditions about Endymion refer us to Elis, and others to Caria, and others, again, are a combination of the two. According to one set of legends, he was a son of Æthlius and Calyce, or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Calyce, and succeeded Æthlius in the kingdom of Elis. Others related that he had come from Elis to Mount Latmus in Caria, whence he is called the Latmian (Latmius). As he slept on Latmus, his surprising beauty warmed the cold heart of Selene (the moon), who came down to him, kissed him, and lay by his side. His eternal sleep on Latmus is assigned to different causes; but it was generally believed that Selene had sent him to sleep, that she might be able to kiss him without his knowledge. By Selene he had fifty daughters. There is a beautiful statue of a sleeping Endymion in the British Museum.

ENGŪM (Ἐγγυον Ἐγγυῖον: Ἐγγυῖνος, Enguinus: now Gangi), a town in the interior of Sicily, near the sources of the Monalus, was originally a town of the Siculi, but it is said to have been colonized by the Creteans under Mi-nos: it possessed a celebrated temple of the great mother of the gods.

[ENIOPEUS (Ἐνιοπέυς), son of Thebæus, charioteer of Hector, slain by Diomedes.]

ENIPEUS (Ἐνιπέυς). 1. A river in Thessaly, rises in mount Othrys, receives the Apidanus near Pharsalus, and flows into the Peneus. Neptune (Poseidon) assumed the form of the god of this river in order to obtain possession of Tyro, who was in love with Enipeus. She became by Neptune (Poseidon) the mother of Pelias and Neleus. Ovid relates (Met., vi, 116) that Neptune (Poseidon), having assumed the form of Enipeus, became by Iphimedia the father of Otus and Ephialtes.—2. A small river in Pisatis (Elis), flows into the Alpheus near its mouth.—3. A small river in Macedonia, which rises in Olympus.

[ENIPO (Ἐνιπώ), a female slave, mother of the poet Archilochus.]

[ENIPE (Ἐνίπη), an ancient place in Arcadia (Il., 2, 608); entirely destroyed in the time of Strabo.]

ENNA or HENNA (Ἐννα: Ἐνναῖος: now Castro Giovanni), an ancient and fortified town of the Siculi in Sicily, on the road from Catana to Agrigentum, said to be the centre of the island (ὀμφαλὸς Σικελίας). It was surrounded by fertile plains, which bore large crops of wheat; it was one of the chief seats of the worship of Ceres (Demeter), and possessed a celebrated temple of this goddess. According to later tradition, it was in a flowery meadow in the neighborhood of Enna that Pluto carried off Proserpine (Persephone), and the cave was shown through which the god passed as he carried off his prize. Its importance gradually declined from the time of the second Punic war, when it was severely punished by the Romans, because it had attempted to revolt to the Carthaginians.

ENNIUS, Q., the Roman poet, was born at Rudia, in Calabria, B.C. 239. He was a Greek by birth, but a subject of Rome, and served in the Roman armies. In 204, Cato, who was then quæstor, found Ennius in Sardinia, and brought him in his train to Rome. In 189 Ennius accompanied M. Fulvius Nobilior during the Ætolian campaign, and shared his triumph. Through the son of Nobilior, Ennius, when far advanced in life, obtained the rights of a Roman citizen. He dwelt in a humble house on the Aventine, and maintained himself by acting as a preceptor to the youths of the Roman nobles. He lived on terms of the closest intimacy with the elder Scipio Africanus. He died 169, at the age of seventy. He was buried in the sepulchre of the Scipios, and his bust was allowed a place among the effigies of that noble house. Ennius was regarded by the Romans as the father of their poetry (alter Homerus, Hor., Epist., ii, 1, 50). Cicero calls him Summus poeta noster; and Virgil was not ashamed to borrow many of his thoughts, and not a few of his expressions. All the works of Ennius are lost with the exception of a few fragments. His most important work was an epic poem, in dactylic hexameters, entitled Annalium Libri XVIII, being a history of Rome, commencing with the loves of Mars and Rhea, and reaching down to his own times. The beautiful history of the kings in Livy may have been taken from Ennius. No great space, however, was allotted to the earliest records for the contest with Hannibal, which was described with great minuteness, commenced with the seventh book, the first Punic war being passed over altogether. He wrote numerous tragedies, which appear to have been all translations or adaptations from the Greek, the metres of the originals being in most cases closely imitated. He wrote also a few comedies, and several other works, such as Satiræ, composed in a great variety of metres, from which circumstance they probably received their name; a didactic poem, entitled Epicharmus; a panegyric on Scipio; Epigrams, &c. The best collection of the fragments of Ennius is by Hieronymus Columna, Neapol., 4to, 1590, reprinted with considerable additions by Hesselius, Amstel., 4to, 1707.

[ENNŌMUS (Ἐννομός). 1. A seer of Mysia, an ally of the Trojans, slain by Achilles.—2. A Trojan, slain by Ulysses.]

ENŌPE (Ἐνόπη), a town in Messenia, mentioned by Homer, supposed to be the same as GERENIA.

ENOPS (Ἐνοψ). 1. A herdsman, father, by a nymph, of Satnius.—2. A Greek, father of Clytemedea.]

ENTELLA (Ἐντελλὰ: Entellinus, Entellensis: now Entella), an ancient town of the Sicani in the interior of the island, on the western side, said to have been founded by Entellus, one of the companions of the Trojan Ægestus. It was subsequently seized and peopled by the Campanian mercenaries of Dionysius.

[ENTELLUS, a Trojan or Sicilian hero, famed for his skill in athletic exercises; a companion of Ægestus (Virgil's Acastes), and, though advanced in years, encountered and vanquished the Trojan Dares.]

ENYALIUS (Ἐνυάλιος), the Warlike, frequently occurs in the Iliad (never in the Odyssey) as an epithet of Mars (Ares). At a later time Enyalios and Mars (Ares) were distinguished as two different gods of war; Enyalios was looked upon as a son of Mars (Ares) and Enyo, or of Saturn (Cronos) and Rhea. The name is evidently derived from ENVO.

ENYO (Ἐνώ), the goddess of war, who delights in bloodshed and the destruction of towns, and accompanies Mars (Ares) in battles. Respecting the Roman goddess of war, vid. BELONA.

EORDÆA (Ἐορδαία, also Ἐορδαία), a district and town in the northwest of Macedonia, inhabited by the Εὐρδαί (Ἐορδαί, also Ἐορδαίαι.)

EŌS (Ἠώς, Att. Ἐως), in Latin AURORA, the goddess of the morning red, daughter of Hyperion and Thia or Euryphassa; or of Pallas, according to Ovid. At the close of every night she rose from the couch of her spouse Tithonus, and on a chariot drawn by the swift horses Lampos and Phaëthon she ascended up to heaven from the River Oceanus, to announce the coming light of the sun to the gods as well as to mortals. In the Homeric poems Eos not only announces the coming Sun, but accompanies him throughout the day, and her career is not complete till the evening; hence she came to be regarded as the goddess of the daylight, and was completely identified by the tragic writers with Hæmera. She carried off several youths distinguished for their beauty, such as ORION, CEPHALUS, and TITHONUS, whence she is called by Ovid Tithenia conjux. She bore Memnon to Tithonus. Vid. MEMNON. By Astræus she became the mother of Zephyrus, Boreas, Notus, Heosphorus and other stars.

EPAMINONDAS (Ἐπαμεινώνδας, Ἐπαμινώνδας), the Theban general and statesman, son of Polymnis, was born and reared in poverty, though his blood was noble. His close and enduring friendship with Pelopidas is said to have originated in the campaign in which they served together on the Spartan side against Mantinea, where Pelopidas having fallen in a battle, apparently dead, Epaminondas protected his body at the imminent risk of his own life, B.C. 385. After the Spartans had been expelled from Thebes, 379, Epaminondas took an active part in public affairs. In 371 he was one of the Theban commanders at the battle of Leuctra, so fatal to the Lacedæmonians, in which the success of Thebes is said to have been owing mainly to the tactics of Epaminondas. He it was who most strongly urged the giving battle, while he employed all the means in his power to raise the courage of his countrymen, not excluding even omens and oracles, for which, when unfavorable, he had but recently expressed his contempt. In 369 he was one of the generals in the first invasion of Peloponnesus by the Thebans; and before leaving Peloponnesus he restored the Messenians to their country and established a new city, named Messene. On their return home Epaminondas and Pelopidas were impeached by their enemies, on a capital charge of having retained their command beyond the legal term. The fact itself was true enough; but they were both honorably acquitted, Epaminondas having expressed his willingness to die if the Thebans would record that he had been put to death because he had humbled Sparta and taught his countrymen to face and to conquer her armies. In 368 he again led a Theban army into the Peloponnesus, but did not advance far, and on his return was repulsed by Chabrias in an attack which he made on Corinth. In the same year we find him serving, but not as general, in the Theban army which was sent into Thessaly to rescue Pelopidas from Alexander of Pheræ, and which was saved from utter destruction only by the ability of Epaminondas. In 367 he was sent at the head of another force to release Pelopidas, and accomplished his object without even striking a blow, and by the mere prestige of his name. In 366 he invaded the Peloponnesus for the third time, and in 362 for the fourth time. In the latter year he gained a brilliant victory over the Lacedæmonians at Mantinea, but in the full career of victory he received a mortal wound. He was told that his death would follow directly on the javelin being extracted from the wound; and he would not allow this to be done till he had been assured that his shield was safe, and that the victory was with his countrymen. It was a disputed point by whose hand he fell: among others, the honor was assigned to Gryllus, the son of Xenophon. Epaminondas was one of the greatest men of Greece. He raised Thebes to the supremacy of Greece, which she lost almost as soon as he died. Both in public and in private life he was distinguished by integrity and uprightness, and he carried into daily practice the lessons of philosophy, of which he was an ardent student.

ΕΠΑΦΡΟΔΙΤΗΣ ('Επαφρόδιτος). 1. A freedman and favorite of the Emperor Nero. He assisted Nero in killing himself, and he was afterward put to death by Domitian. The philosopher Epictetus was his freedman.—2. M. MERITIUS EPAPHRODITUS, of Chæronea, a Greek grammarian, the slave and afterward the freedman of Modestus, the præfect of Egypt. He subsequently went to Rome, where he resided in the reign of Nero and down to the time of Nerva. He was the author of several grammatical works and commentaries.

ΕΡΑΨΟΣ ('Εραφος), son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Io, born on the River Nile, after the long wanderings of his mother. He was concealed by the Curetes, at the request of Juno (Hera), but was discovered by Io in Syria. He subsequently became king of Egypt, married Memphis, a daughter of Nilus, or according to others, Casiopea, and built the city of Memphis. He had a daughter Libya, from whom Libya (Africa) received its name.

ΕΡΕΙ. Vid. ELIS.

ΕΡΕΪΤΙΟΝ ('Ερέτιον: ruins near Strobneez), a town of the Lissii in Dalmatia, with a good harbor.

ΕΡΕΪΟΣ ('Ερείος). 1. Son of Endymion, king in Elis, from whom the Epei are said to have derived their name.—Son of Panopeus, went with thirty ships from the Cyclades to Troy. He built the wooden horse with the assistance of Minerva (Athena).

ΕΡΗΨΟΣ ('Εφέσος: 'Εφέσιος: ruins near Αγασαλικ, i. e., 'Αγιος Θεόλογος, the title of St. John), the chief of the twelve Ionian cities on the coast of Asia Minor, was said to have been founded by Carians and Leleges, and to have been taken possession of by Androclus, the son of Codrus, at the time of the great Ionian migration. It stood a little south of the River Cayster, near its mouth, where a marshy plain, extending south from the river, is bounded by two hills, Prion or Lepre on the east, and Coressus on the south. The city was built originally on Mount Coressus, but, in the time of Cræsus, the people transferred their habitations to the valley, whence Lysimachus, the general of Alexander, compelled them again to remove to Mount Prion. On the northern side of the city was a lake, communicating with the Cayster, and forming the inner harbor, now a marsh; the outer harbor (πύρρονος) was formed by the mouth of the river. In the plain, east of the lake, and northeast of the city, beyond its walls, stood the celebrated temple of Diana (Artemis), which was built in the sixth century B.C., by an architect named Chersiphron, and, after being burned down by Herostratus in the night on which Alexander the Great was born (October 13-14, B.C. 356), was restored by the joint efforts of all the Ionian states, and was regarded as one of the wonders of the world: nothing now remains of the temple except some traces of its foundations. The temple was also celebrated as an asylum till Augustus deprived it of that privilege. The other buildings at Ephesus, of which there are any ruins, are the agora, theatre, odeum, stadium, gymnasium, and baths, temples of Jupiter (Zeus) Olympius and of Julius Cæsar, and a large building near the inner harbor: the foundations of the walls may also be traced. With the rest of Ionia, Ephesus fell under the power successively of Cræsus, the Persians, the Macedonians, and the Romans. It was always very flourishing, and became even more so as the other Ionian cities decayed. It was greatly favored by its Greek rulers, especially by Lysimachus, who, in honor of his second wife, gave it her name, Arsinoë, which, however, it did not long retain. Attalus II. Philadelphus constructed docks for it, and improved its harbors. Under the Romans it was the capital of the province of Asia, and by far the greatest city of Asia Minor. It is conspicuous in the early history of the Christian Church, both St. Paul and St. John having labored in it, and addressed epistles to the Church of Ephesus; and at one time its bishop possessed the rank and power of a patriarch over the churches in the province of Asia. Its position, and the excellence of its harbors, made it the chief emporium for the trade of all Asia within the Taurus; and its downfall was chiefly owing to the destruction of its harbors by the deposits of the Cayster. In the earliest times Ephesus was called by various names, Alope, Ortygia, Morzes, Smyrna Tracheia, Samornia, and Ptelea.

ΕΡΗΨΑΛΤΗΣ ('Ερήαλτης). 1. One of the Aloïdæ. Vid. ALOEUS.—2. A Malian, who in B.C. 480, when Leonidas was defending the pass of Thermopylæ, guided a body of Persians over the mountain path, and thus enabled them to fall on the rear of the Greeks.—3. An Athenian statesman, was a friend and partisan of Pericles, whom he assisted in carrying his political measures. He is mentioned in particular as chiefly instrumental in that abridgment of the power of the Areopagus which inflicted a blow on the oligarchical party, and against which the Eumenides of Æschylus was directed. His services to the democratic cause excited the rancorous enmity of some of the oligarchs, and led to his assassination during the night, probably in 456.—[4. An Athenian orator; an opponent of the Macedonians; Alexander demanded his surrender to him after the destruction of Thebes.]

ΕΡΗΨΟΣ ('Ερίππος). 1. An Athenian poet of the middle comedy. [A few fragments only remain, which are given by Meineke in his Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. ii., p. 657-66.]—2. Of Olynthus, a Greek historian of Alexander the Great.

ΕΡΗΦΟΣ ('Εφορος), of Cyme in Æolis, a celebrated Greek historian, was a contemporary of Philip and Alexander, and flourished about B. C. 340. He studied rhetoric under Isocrates, of whose pupils he and Theopompus were considered the most distinguished. On the advice of Theopompus he wrote A History (Ἱστορίαι) in thirty books, which began with the return of the Heraclidæ, and came down to the siege of Perinthus in 341. It treated of the history of the barbarians as well as of the Greeks, and was thus the first attempt at writing a universal history that was ever made in Greece. It embraced a period of seven hundred and fifty years and each of the thirty books contained a compart portion of the history, which formed a complete whole by itself. Ephorus did not live to complete the work, and it was finished by his son Demophilus. Diyllus began his history at the point at which the work of Ephorus left off. Ephorus also wrote a few other works of less importance, of which the titles only are preserved by the grammarians. Of the history likewise we have nothing but fragments. It was written in a clear and polished style, but was at the same time deficient in power and energy. Ephorus appears to have been faithful and impartial in the narration of events; but he did not always follow the best authorities, and in the latter part of his work he frequently differed from Herodotus, Thucydides, and Xenophon, on points on which they are entitled to credit. Diodorus Siculus made great use of the work of Ephorus. The fragments of his work have been published by Marx, Carlsruhe, 1815, and in Müller's Fragm. Historicor. Græc., vol. i, Paris, 1841.

[EPHYDATIA (Ἐφύδατῖα), a fountain-nymph, who carried off Hylas, the favorite of Hercules.]

EPHYRA (Ἐφύρα). 1. The ancient name of Coriuth. Vid. CORINTHUS.—2. An ancient town of the Pelasgi, near the River Selleis, in Elis.—3. A town in Thessaly, afterward called CRANON.—4. A town in Epirus, afterward called CICHYRUS.—5. A small town in the district of Agræa, in Ætolia.

[EPHYRA (Ἐφύρα), a female companion of Cyrene, the mother of Aristæus.]

EPICASTE (Ἐπικάστῃ), commonly called JOCASTE.

EPICERHĒSĪA (Ἐπικερήσια: Ἐπικερήσιος), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Ceneis.

[EPICHRIS (Ἐπίχαρις), a freedwoman of bad repute, implicated in the conspiracy of Piso against the life of Nero, A.D. 65: she was put to the severest torture in order to compel her to disclose what she knew of the conspiracy, but to no purpose: nothing could extort any confession from her, and she finally escaped further torture by strangling herself.]

EPICHRMUS (Ἐπίχαρμος), the chief comic poet among the Dorians, was born in the island of Cos about B.C. 540. His father, Elothales, was a physician, of the race of the Asclepiads. At the age of three months, Epicarmus was carried to Megara, in Sicily; thence he removed to Syracuse when Megara was destroyed by Gelon (484 or 483). Here he spent the remainder of his life, which was prolonged throughout the reign of Hieron, at whose court Epicarmus associated with the other great writers of the time, and among them with Æschylus. He died at the age of ninety (450), or, according to Lucian, ninety-seven (443). Epicarmus was a Pythagorean philosopher, and spent the earlier part of his life in the study of philosophy, both physical and metaphysical. He is said to have followed for some time his father's profession of medicine; and it appears that he did not commence writing comedies till his removal to Syracuse. Comedy had for some time existed at Megara in Sicily, which was a colony from Megara on the Isthmus, the latter of which towns disputed with the Athenians the invention of comedy. But the comedy at the Sicilian Megara before Epicarmus seems to have been little more than a low buffoonery. It was he, together with Phormis, who gave it a new form, and introduced a regular plot. The number of his comedies is differently stated at fifty-two, or at thirty-five. There are still extant thirty-five titles. The majority of them are on mythological subjects, that is, travesties of the heroic myths, and these plays no doubt very much resembled the satyric dramas of the Athenians. But besides mythology, Epicarmus wrote on other subjects, political, moral, relating to manners and customs, &c. The style of his plays appears to have been a curious mixture of the broad buffoonery which distinguished the old Megarian comedy, and of the sententious wisdom of the Pythagorean philosopher. His language was remarkably elegant: he was celebrated for his choice of epithets: his plays abounded, as the extant fragments prove, with philosophical and moral maxims. He was imitated by Crates, and also by Plautus, as we learn from the line of Horace (Epist., ii., 1, 58),

"Plautus ad exemplar Siculi properare Epicarmi."

The parasite, who forms so conspicuous a character in the plays of the new comedy, is first found in Epicarmus.

EPICRĀTES (Ἐπικράτης). 1. An Athenian, took part in the overthrow of the thirty tyrants; but afterward, when sent on an embassy to the Persian king Artaxerxes, he was accused of corruption in receiving money from Artaxerxes. He appears to have been acquitted this time; but he was tried on a later occasion, on another charge of corruption, and only escaped death by a voluntary exile. He was ridiculed by the comic poets for his large beard, and for this reason was called σακεσφόρος.—2. Of Ambracia, an Athenian poet of the middle comæ.

EPICŒTUS (Ἐπίκλειτος), of Hierapolis in Phrygia, a celebrated Stoic philosopher, was a freedman of Epaphroditus, who was himself a freedman of Nero. Vid. EPHAERODITUS. He lived and taught first at Rome, and, after the expulsion of the philosophers by Domitian, at Nicopolis in Epirus. Although he was favored by Hadrian, he does not appear to have returned to Rome; for the discourses which Arrian took down in writing were delivered by Epictetus when an old man at Nicopolis. Only a few circumstances of his life are recorded, such as his lameness, which is spoken of in different ways, his poverty, and his few wants. Epictetus did not leave any works behind him, and the short manual (Enchiridion), which bears his name, was compiled from his discourses by his faithful pupil Arrian. Arrian also wrote the philosophical lectures of his master in eight books, from which, though four are lost, we are enabled to gain a complete idea of the way in which Epictetus conceived and taught the Stoic philosophy. Vid. ARRIANUS. Being deeply impressed with his vocation as a teacher, he aimed in his discourses at nothing else but winning the minds of his hearers to that which was good, and no one was able to resist the impression which they produced.

EPICŒTUS PHRYGIA. Vid. PHRYGIA.

EPICURUS (Ἐπίκουρος), a celebrated Greek philosopher, and the founder of a philosophical school, called, after him, the Epicurean. He was a son of Neocles and Chærestrata, and was born B.C. 342, in the island of Samos, where his father had settled as one of the Athenian cleruchi; but he belonged to the Attic demos of Gargettus, and hence is sometimes called the Gargettian. (Cic., ad Fam., xv., 16.) At the age of eighteen Epicurus came to Athens, and there probably studied under Xenocrates, who was then at the head of the academy. After a short stay at Athens he went to Colophon, and subsequently resided at Mytilene and Lampsacus, in which places he was engaged for five years in teaching philosophy. In 306, when he had attained the age of thirty-five, he again came to Athens, where he purchased for eighty minæ a garden—the famous Κήποι Ἐπικούρου—in which he established his philosophical school. Here he spent the remainder of his life, surrounded by numerous friends and pupils. His mode of living was simple, temperate and cheerful; and the aspersions of comic poets and of later philosophers, who were opposed to his philosophy, and describe him as a person devoted to sensual pleasures, do not seem entitled to the least credit. He took no part in public affairs. He died in 270, at the age of seventy-two, after a long and painful illness, which he endured with truly philosophical patience and courage. Epicurus is said to have written three hundred volumes. Of these the most important was one On Nature (Περὶ Φύσεως), in thirty-seven books. All his works are lost; but some fragments of the work on Nature were found among rolls at Herculæum, and were published by Orelli, Lips., 1818. In his philosophical system, Epicurus prided himself in being independent of all his predecessors; but he was in reality indebted both to Democritus and the Cyrenaics. Epicurus made ethics the most essential part of his philosophical system, since he regarded human happiness as the ultimate end of all philosophy. His ethical theory was based upon the dogma of the Cyrenaics, that pleasure constitutes the highest happiness, and must consequently be the end of all human exertions. Epicurus, however, developed and ennobled this theory in a manner which constitutes the real merit of his philosophy, and which gained for him so many friends and admirers both in antiquity and in modern times. Pleasure with him was not a mere momentary and transitory sensation, but he conceived it as something lasting and imperishable, consisting in pure and noble mental enjoyments, that is, in ἀραξία and ἀπονία, or the freedom from pain and from all influences which disturb the peace of our mind, and thereby our happiness, which is the result of it. The summum bonum, according to him, consisted in this peace of mind; and this was based upon φρόνησις, which he described as the beginning of every thing good, as the origin of all virtues, and which he himself therefore occasionally treated as the highest good itself. In the physical part of his philosophy, he followed the atomistic doctrines of Democritus and Diogenes. His views are well known from Lucretius's poem De Rerum Natura. We obtain our knowledge and form our conceptions of things, according to him, through εἰδῶλα, i. e. images of things which are reflected from them, and pass through our senses into our minds. Such a theory is destructive of all absolute truth, and a mere momentary impression upon our senses of feelings is substituted for it. The deficiencies of his system are most striking in his views concerning the gods, which drew upon him the charge of atheism. His gods, like every thing else, consisted of atoms, and our notions of them are based upon the εἰδῶλα which are reflected from them and pass into our minds. They were and always had been in the enjoyment of perfect happiness, which had not been disturbed by the laborious business of creating the world; and as the government of the world would interfere with their happiness, he conceived them as exercising no influence whatever upon the world or man. The pupils of Epicurus were very numerous, and were attached to their master in a manner which has rarely been equalled either in ancient or modern times. But notwithstanding the extraordinary devotion of his pupils, there is no philosopher in antiquity who has been so violently attacked as Epicurus. This has been owing partly to a superficial knowledge of his philosophy, and partly to the conduct of men who called themselves Epicureans, and who, taking advantage of the facility with which his ethical theory was made the hand-maid of a sensual life, gave themselves up to the enjoyment of sensual pleasures.

ΕΠΙΣΤΡΕΔΕΣ (Ἐπικύδης), a Syracusan by origin, but born and educated at Carthage. He served, together with his elder brother Hippocrates, with much distinction in the army of Hannibal, both in Spain and Italy; and when, after the battle of Cannæ (B.C. 216), Hieronymus of Syracuse sent to make overtures to Hannibal, that general selected the two brothers as his envoys to Syracuse. They soon induced the young king to desert the Roman alliance. Upon the murder of Hieronymus shortly after, they were the leaders of the Carthaginian party at Syracuse, and eventually became masters of the city, which they defended against Marcellus. Epicydes fled to Agrigentum when he saw that the fall of Syracuse was inevitable.

ΕΠΙΔΑΜΝΟΣ. Vid. DYRRHACHIUM.

ΕΠΙΔΑΥΡΟΣ (Ἐπίδαυρος; Ἐπιδάυριος). 1. (Now Epidaurο), a town in Argolis, on the Saronic Gulf, formed with its territory ΕΠΙΔΑΥΡΙΑ (Ἐπιδάυρια), a district independent of Argos, and was not included in Argolis till the time of the Romans. It was originally inhabited by Ionians and Carians, whence it was called Epicaricus, but it was subdued by the Dorians under Deiphontes, who thus became the ruling race. Epidaurus was the chief seat of the worship of Æsculapius, and was to this circumstance indebted for its importance. The temple of this god, which was one of the most magnificent in Greece, was situated about five miles southwest of Epidaurus. A few ruins of it are still extant. The worship of Æsculapius was introduced into Rome from Epidaurus. Vid. ÆSCULAPIUS.—2. Surdamed LIMERA (ἡ Λιμυρά; now Monembasia or Old Malvasia), a town in Laconia, on the eastern coast, said to have been founded by Epidaurus in Argolis, possessed a good harbor.—3. (Now Old Ragusa), a town in Dalmatia.

EPIDĒLĪUM (Ἐπιδῆλιον), a town in Laconia, on the eastern coast, south of Epidaurus Limerā, with a temple of Apollo and an image of the god, which, once thrown into the sea at Delos, is said to have come to land at this place.

[EPIDI (Ἐπίδιοι), a people in ancient Britain, dwelt on Epidium, the long peninsula on the western coast (now Cantyre), whose southern point forms the EPIDIUM PROMONTORIUM (Ἐπίδιον, Ἄκρον, now Mull of Cantyre.]

EPĪGĒNES (Ἐπιγῆνης). 1. An Athenian poet of the middle comedy, flourished about B.C. 380.—2. Of Sieyon, who has been confounded by some with his namesake the comic poet, preceded Theopis, and is said to have been the most ancient writer of tragedy. It is probable that Epigenes was the first to introduce into the old dithyrambic and satyriacal τραγῳδία other subjects than the original one of the fortunes of Bacchus (Dionysus).—3. Of Byzantium, a Greek astronomer, mentioned by Seneca, Pliny, and Censorinus. He professed to have studied in Chaldea, but his date is uncertain.

[EPĪGEUS (Ἐπειγεύς), of Budĕum in Thessaly, followed Achilles to the Trojan war, and was slain by Hector.]

EPĪGŌNI (Ἐπιγόνιοι), that is, "the Descendants," the name in ancient mythology of the sons of the seven heroes who perished before Thebes. Vid. ADRASTUS. Ten years after their death, the descendants of the seven heroes marched against Thebes to avenge their fathers. The names of the Epigoni are not the same in all accounts; but the common lists contain Alemæon, Ægialeus, Diomedes, Promæchus, Sthenelus, Thersander, and Euryalus. Alemæon undertook the command, in accordance with an oracle, and collected a considerable body of Argives. The Thebans marched out against the enemy, under the command of Laodamas, after whose death they fled into the city. On the part of the Epigoni, Ægialeus had fallen. The seer Tiresias, knowing that the city was doomed to fall, persuaded the inhabitants to quit it, and take their wives and children with them. The Epigoni thereupon took possession of Thebes, and razed it to the ground. They sent a portion of the booty and Manto, the daughter of Tiresias, to Delphi, and then returned to Peloponnesus. The war of the Epigoni was made the subject of epic and tragic poems.

EPĪMĒNĪDES (Ἐπιμηνίδης). 1. A celebrated poet and prophet of Crete, whose history is to a great extent mythical. He was reckoned among the Curetes, and is said to have been the son of a nymph. He was a native of Phæstus in Crete, and appears to have spent the greatest part of his life at Cnosus, whence he is sometimes called a Cnosiau. There is a legend that, when a boy, he was sent out by his father in search of a sheep, and that, seeking shelter from the heat of the mid-day sun, he went into a cave, and there fell into a deep sleep, which lasted fifty-seven years. On waking and returning home, he found, to his great amazement, that his younger brother had in the mean time grown an old man. He is further said to have attained the age of 154, 157, or even of 229 years.

His visit to Athens, however, is an historical fact, and determines his date. The Athenians, who were visited by a plague in consequence of the crime of Cylon (vid. CYLON), consulted the Delphic oracle about the means of their delivery. The god commanded them to get their city purified, and the Athenians invited Epimenides to come and undertake the purification. Epimenides accordingly came to Athens, about 596, and performed the desired task by certain mysterious rites and sacrifices, in consequence of which the plague ceased. Epimenides was reckoned by some among the seven wise men of Greece; but all that tradition has handed down about him suggests a very different character from that of the seven; he must rather be ranked in the class of priestly bards and sages who are generally comprised under the name of the Orphici. Many works, both in prose and verse, were attributed to him by the ancients, and the Apostle Paul has preserved (Titus, i, 12) a celebrated verse of his against the Cretans.

EPĪMĒTHEUS. Vid. PROMETHEUS and PANDORA.

EPĪPHĀNES, a surname of Antiochus IV. and Antiochus XI, kings of Syria.

EPĪPHANĪA or -ĒA (Ἐπιφάνεια). 1. In Syria (in the Old Testament, Hamath: now Hamah), in the district of Cassiotis, on the left bank of the Orontes, an early colony of the Phœnicians; may be presumed, from its later name, to have been restored or improved by Antiochus Epiphaneus.—2. In Asia Minor (now Urzin), on the southeastern border of Cilicia, close to the Pylæ Amanides, was formerly called Celandus, and probably owed its new name to Antiochus Epiphaneus. Pompey reoccupied this city with some of the pirates whom he had conquered. There were some other Asiatic cities of the name.

EPĪPHANĪUS (Ἐπιφάνιος), one of the Greek fathers, was born near Eleutheropolis, in Palestine, about A.D. 320, of Jewish parents. He went to Egypt when young, and there appears to have been tainted with Gnostic errors, but afterward fell into the hands of some monks, and by them was made a strong advocate for the monastic life. He returned to Palestine, and lived there for some time as a monk, having founded a monastery near his native place. In A.D. 367 he was chosen bishop of Constantia, the metropolis of Cyprus, formerly called Salamis. His writings show him to have been a man of great reading, for he was acquainted with Hebrew, Syriae, Greek, Egyptian, and Latin. But he was entirely without critical or logical power; of real piety, but also of a very bigoted and dogmatical turn of mind. He distinguished himself by his opposition to heresy, and especially to Origen's errors. He died 402. His most important work is entitled Panarium, being a discourse against heresies. The best edition of his works is by Petavius, Paris, 1622, and Lips, 1682, with a commentary by Valesius.

EPĪPŌLĒ. Vid. SYRACUSÆ.

EPĪRUS (Ἠπειρος: Ἠπειρώτης, fem. Ἠπειρώτις: now Albania), that is, "the main land," a country in the northwest of Greece, so called to distinguish it from Coreyra and the other islands off the coast. Homer gives the name of Epirus to the whole of the western coast of Greece, thus including Aearnanis in it. Epirus was bounded by Illyria and Macedonia to the north, by Thessaly on the east, by Aearnanis and the Ambracian Gulf on the south, and by the Ionian Sea on the west. The principal mountains were the Aeroeraunii, forming the northwestern boundary; besides which there were the mountains Tomarus in the east, and Crania in the south. The chief rivers were the Celydnus, Thyamis, Aeheron, and Aracithus. The inhabitants of Epirus were numerous, but were not of pure Hellenic blood. The original population appears to have been Pelasgic; and the ancient oracle of Dodona in the country was always regarded as of Pelasgic origin. These Pelasgians were subsequently mingled with Illyrians who at various times invaded Epirus and settled in the country. Epirus contained fourteen different tribes. Of these the most important were the CHAONES, THESPROTI, and MOLOSSI, who gave their names to the three principal divisions of the country, CHAONIA, THESPROTIA, and MOLOSSIS. The different tribes were originally governed by their own princes. The Molossian princes, who traced their descent from Pyrrhus (Neoptolemus), son of Achilles, subsequently acquired the sovereignty over the whole country, and took the title of kings of Epirus. The first who bore this title was Alexander, who invaded Italy to assist the Tarantines against the Lucanians and Brutii, and perished at the battle of Pandosia, B.C. 326. The most celebrated of the later kings was PYRRHUS, who carried on war with the Romans. About B.C. 200 the Epirotes established a republic: and the Romans, after the conquest of Philip, 197, guaranteed its independence. But in consequence of the support which the Epirotes afforded to Antiochus and Perseus, Æmilius Paulus received orders from the senate to punish them with the utmost severity. He destroyed seventy of their towns, and sold one hundred and fifty thousand of the inhabitants for slaves. In the time of Augustus the country had not yet recovered from the effects of this devastation.

[EPÞLO, a Rutulian hero in the Æneid, slain by Aehates.]

[EPYNA ('Επύνα), queen of Cilicia, wife of King Syeunesis, brought large sums of money to Cyrus to aid him in paying his troops.]

EPÝTUS, a Trojan, father of Periphas, who was a companion of Iulus, and is called by the patronymic Epytides.

EQUESTER ('Ιππιος), a surname of several divinities, but especially of Neptune (Poseidon), who had created the horse, and in whose honor horse-races were held.

EQUUS TŪTICUS or ÆQUUM TŪTICUM, a small town of the Hirpini in Samnium, twenty-one miles from Beneventum. The Scholiast on Horace (Sat., i., 5, 87) supposes, but without sufficient reasons, that it is the town, quod versu dicere non est.

ERĒ ('Εραι: now Sighajik?), a small but strong sea-port town on the coast of Ionia, north of Teos.

ERĀNA, a town in Mount Amanus, the chief seat of the Eleutheroecilæ in the time of Cicero.

ERANNOBŌAS ('Εραννοβόας: now Gunduk), a river of India, one of the chief tributaries of the Ganges, into which it fell at Palimbothra.

ERASINĪDES ('Ερασινίδης), one of the Athenian commanders at the battle of the Arginusæ. He was among the six commanders who returned to Athens after the victory, and were put to death, B.C. 406.

ERASINUS ('Ερασινος). 1. (Now Kephalari), the chief river in Argolis, rises in the Lake Stymphalus, then disappears under the earth, rises again out of the mountain Chaon, and, after receiving the River Phrixus, flows through the Lernaean marsh into the Argolic Gulf.—2. A small river near Brauron in Attica.

ERASISTRĀTUS ('Ερασίστρατος). 1. A celebrated physician and anatomist, was born at Iulis in the island of Ceos. He was a pupil of Chrysisippus of Cnidos, of Metrodorus, and apparently of Theophrastus. He flourished from B.C. 300 to 260. He lived for some time at the court of Seleucus Nicator, king of Syria, where he acquired great reputation by discovering that the illness of Antiochus, the king's eldest son, was owing to his love for his mother-in-law, Stratonice, the young and beautiful daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes, whom Seleucus had lately married. Erasistratus afterward lived at Alexandria, which was at that time beginning to be a celebrated medical school. He gave up practice in his old age, that he might pursue his anatomical studies without interruption. He prosecuted his experiments in this branch of medical science with great success, and with such ardor that he is said to have dissected criminals alive. He had numerous pupils and followers, and a medical school bearing his name continued to exist at Smyrna, in Ionia, about the beginning of the Christian era.—2. One of the thirty tyrants in Athens.]

Ἐρατίδæ (Ἐρατίδαι), an illustrious family of Ialysus in Rhodes, to which Damagetus and his son Diagoras belonged.

ΕΡΑΤΟ (Ἐρατώ). 1. Wife of Arcas, and mother of Elatus and Aphidas. Vid. ARCAS.—2. One of the Muses. Vid. MUSÆ.

ERATOSTHÈNES (Ἐρατοσθένης), of Cyrene, was born B.C. 276. He first studied in his native city and then at Athens. He was taught by Ariston of Chios, the philosopher; Lysanias of Cyrene, the grammarian; and Callimachus, the poet. He left Athens at the invitation of Ptolemy Evergetes, who placed him over the library at Alexandria. Here he continued till the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes. He died at the age of eighty, about B.C. 196, of voluntary starvation, having lost his sight, and being tired of life. He was a man of very extensive learning, and wrote on almost all the branches of knowledge then cultivated—astronomy, geometry, geography, philosophy, history, and grammar. He is supposed to have constructed the large armilla or fixed circular instruments which were long in use at Alexandria. His works have perished, with the exception of some fragments. His most celebrated work was a systematic treatise on geography, entitled Γεωγραφικά, in three books. The first book, which formed a sort of introduction, contained a critical review of the labors of his predecessors from the earliest to his own times, and investigations concerning the form and nature of the earth, which, according to him, was an immovable globe. The second book contained what is now called mathematical geography. He was the first person who attempted to measure the magnitude of the earth, in which attempt he brought forward and used the method which is employed to the present day. The third book contained political geography, and gave descriptions of the various countries, derived from the works of earlier travellers and geographers. In order to be able to determine the accurate site of each place, he drew a line parallel with the equator, running from the pillars of Hercules to the extreme east of Asia, and dividing the whole of the inhabited earth into two halves. Connected with this work was a new map of the earth, in which towns, mountains, rivers, lakes, and climates were marked according to his own improved measurements. This important work of Eratosthenes forms an epoch in the history of ancient geography. Strabo, as well as other writers, made great use of it. Eratosthenes also wrote two poems on astronomical subjects: one entitled Ἐρημῆς or Καταστερισμοί, which treated of the constellations; and another entitled Ἡριόνη; but the poem Καταστερισμοί, which is still extant under his name, is not the work of Eratosthenes. He wrote several historical works, the most important of which was a chronological work entitled Χρονογραφία, in which he endeavored to fix the dates of all the important events in literary as well as political history. The most celebrated of his grammatical works was On the Old Attic Comedy (Περὶ τῆς Ἀρχαίας Κωμῳδίας). The best collection of his fragments is by Bernhardt, Eratosthenica, Berlin, 1822.

ERESSUS (Ἐρῆσος), a town in Sicily, north-east of Agrigentum, near the sources of the Acragas, which must not be confounded with the town Heressus, near Syracuse.

ΕΡΕΤΑ (Ἐρεκτῆ or Ἐρεκταί), a fortress in Sicily, on a hill, with a harbor near Panormus.

ERĒBUS (Ἐρέβος), son of Chaos, begot Æther and Hemera (Day) by Nyx (Night), his sister. The name signifies darkness, and is therefore applied to the dark and gloomy space under the earth, through which the shades pass into Hades.

ERECHTHĒUM. Vid. ERICHTHONIUS.

ERECHTHEUS. Vid. ERICHTHONIUS.

[EREMBI (Ἐρεμβοί), a people mentioned in the Odyssey (iv., 84) in connection with the Sidonians and Æthiopians; according to Strabo, a Troglodytic people in Arabia.]

ERĒSUS or ERESSUS (Ἐρῆσος, Ἐρῆσος; Ἐρέσιος), a town on the western coast of the island of Lesbos, the birth-place of Theophrastus and Phanias, and, according to some, of Sappho.

[ERETMEUS (Ἐρετμεύς, i. e., "rower"), a Phæacian engaged in the games celebrated during the stay of Ulysses in Phæacia.]

ERETRIA (Ἐρέτρια; Ἐρετοίεις; now Palto-Castro), an ancient and important town in Eubœa, on the Euripus, with a celebrated harbor Porthinos (now Porto Bufalo), was founded by the Athenians, but had a mixed population, among which was a considerable number of Dorians. Its commerce and navy raised it in early times to importance; it contended with Chalcis for the supremacy of Eubœa; it ruled over several of the neighboring islands, and planted colonies in Macedonia and Italy. It was destroyed by the Persians, B.C. 490, and most of its inhabitants were carried away into slavery. Those who were left behind built, at a little distance from the old city, the town of New Eretria, which, however, never became a place of importance.—2. A town in Phthiotis, in Thessaly, near Pharsalus.

[ERĒTUM (Ἐρετων, now Crestone?), an ancient city of the Sabines on the Tiber, which, under the Roman rule, sank into comparative insignificance: in Strabo's time it was little more than a village.]

[EREUTHALION (Ἐρευθαλιών), leader of the Arcadians against the Pylians, fought in the armor of Areithous; he was slain by Nestor.]

ERGINUS (Ἐργίνος), son of Clymenus, king of Orchomenos. After Clymenus had been killed at Thebes, Erginus, who succeeded him, marched against Thebes, and compelled them to pay him an annual tribute of one hundred oxen. The Thebans were released from the payment of this tribute by Hercules, who killed Erginus.

[ERIBŒA (Ἐρίβοια, poet. Ἐριβοία). 1. Second wife of Alceus, consequently step-mother of the Alceidæ: when these had confined Mars in chains, Eribœa disclosed to Mercury the place where he was imprisoned.—2. Wife of Telamon, mother of Ajax; is sometimes called Peribœa.]

ERICHTHŌNIUS (Ἐριχθόνιος) or ERECHTHEUS (Ἐρεχθεύς). In the ancient myths these two names indicate the same person; but later writers mention two heroes, one of whom is usually called Erichthonius or Erechtheus I., and the other Erechthens II. Homer knows only one Erechtheus, as an autochthon and king of Athens; and the first writer who distinguish es two personages is Plato. 1. ERICHTHONIUS or ERECHTHEUS I., son of Vulcan (Hephaestus) and Atthis, the daughter of Cranaus. Minerva (Athena) reared the child without the knowledge of the other gods, and intrusted him to Agranos, Pandrosos, and Herse, concealed in a chest. They were forbidden to open the chest, but they disobeyed the command. Upon opening the chest they saw the child in the form of a serpent, or entwined by a serpent, whereupon they were seized with madness, and threw themselves down the rock of the Acropolis, or, according to others, into the sea. When Erichthonius had grown up, he expelled Amphictyon, and became king of Athens. His wife Pasithea bore him a son, Pandion. He is said to have introduced the worship of Minerva (Athena), to have instituted the festival of the Panathenæa, and to have built a temple of Minerva (Athena) on the Acropolis. When Minerva (Athena) and Neptune (Poseidon) disputed about the possession of Attica, Erichthonius declared in favor of Minerva (Athena). He was, further, the first who used a chariot with four horses, for which reason he was placed among the stars as auriga. He was buried in the temple of Minerva (Athena), and was worshipped as a god after his death. His famous temple, the Erechthæum, stood on the Acropolis, and contained three separate temples: one of Minerva (Athena) Polias, or the protectress of the state; the Erechtheum proper, or sanctuary of Erechtheus; and the Pandrosium, or sanctuary of Pandrosos.—2. ERECHTHEUS II., grandson of the former, son of Pandion by Zenippe, and brother of Butes, Proene, and Philomela. After his father's death, he succeeded him as king of Athens, and was regarded in later times as one of the Attic eponymi. He was married to Praxithea, by whom he became the father of Cecrops, Pandoros, Metion, Orneus, Procris, Creusa, Chthonia, and Orithyia. In the war between the Eleusinians and Athenians, Enmolpus, the son of Neptune (Poseidon), was slain; whereupon Neptune (Poseidon) demanded the sacrifice of one of the daughters of Erechtheus. When one was drawn by lot, her three sisters resolved to die with her; and Erechtheus himself was killed by Jupiter (Zeus) with a flash of lightning at the request of Neptune (Poseidon).

ERICHTHŌNIUS, son of Dardanus and Batēn, husband of Astyoche or Callirhoë, and father of Tros or Assaraeus. He was the wealthiest of all mortals; three thousand mares grazed in his fields, which were so beautiful that Boreas fell in love with them. He is mentioned, also, among the kings of Crete.

ERICINIUM, a town in Thessaly, near Gomphi.

ERIDĀNUS (Ἠρίδανος), a river god, a son of Oceanus and Tethys, and father of Zeuxippe. He is called the king of rivers, and on his banks amber was found. In Homer the name does not occur, and the first writer who mentions it is Hesiod. The position which the ancient poets assign to the River Eridanus differed at different times. In later times the Eridanus was supposed to be the same as the Padus, because amber was found at its mouth. Hence the Electrides Insula, or "Amber Islands," are placed at the mouth of the Po, and here Phæ-thon was supposed to have fallen when struck by the lightning of Jupiter (Zeus). The Latin poets frequently give the name of Eridanus to the Po. Vid. PADUS.

ERIGON (Ἐρίγων), a tributary of the Axius in Macedonia, the Agrianus of Herodotus. Vid. AXIUS.

ERIGŌNE (Ἐριγόνη). 1. Daughter of Iearius beloved by Bacchus. For the legend respecting her, vid. ICAIUS.—2. Daughter of Ægisthus and Clytæmnestra, and mother of Penthilus by Orestes. Another legend relates that Orestes wanted to kill her with her mother, but that Diana (Artemis) removed her to Attica, and there made her her priestess. Others state that Erigone put an end to herself when she heard that Orestes was acquitted by the Areopagus.

ERINĒUS (Ἐρινεός or Ἐρινεόν: Ἐρινεός, Ἐρινεάτης). 1. A small but ancient town in Doris, belonging to the Tetrapolis. Vid. DORIS.—2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly.

ERINNA (Ἐριννα), a Greek poetess, a contemporary and friend of Sappho (about B.C. 612), who died at the age of nineteen, but left behind her poems which were thought worthy to rank with those of Homer. Her poems were of the epic class: the chief of them was entitled Ἥλακῆτη, the Distaff: it consisted of three hundred lines, of which only four are extant. It was written in a dialect which was a mixture of the Doric and Æolic, and which was spoken at Rhodes, where, or in the adjacent island of Telos, Erinna was born. She is also called a Lesbian and a Mytilenæan, on account of her residence in Lesbos with Sappho. There are several epigrams upon Erinna, in which her praise is celebrated, and her untimely death is lamented. Three epigrams in the Greek Anthology are ascribed to her, of which the first has the genuine air of antiquity; but the other two, addressed to Baucis, seem to be a later fabrication. Eusebius mentions another Erinna, a Greek poetess, contemporary with Demosthenes and Philip of Macedon, B.C. 352; but this statement ought probably to be rejected.

[ERIDŌPIS (Ἐριδῶπις). 1. Wife of Oileus, mother of Ajax the Locrian.—2. Daughter of Jason and Medea.]

ERĪPHUS (Ἐριφος), an Athenian poet of the middle comedy.

ERIPHŪLE (Ἐριφύλη), daughter of Talau and Lysimache, and wife of Amphiarau, whom she betrayed for the sake of the necklace of Harmonia. For details, vid. AMPHIARAUS, ALCMÆON, HARMONIA.

ERIS (Ἐρις), the goddess of discord. Homer describes her as the friend and sister of Mars (Ares), and as delighting with him in the tumult of war and the havoc and anguish of the battle-field. According to Hesiod she was a daughter of Night, and the poet describes her as the mother of a variety of allegorical beings, which are the causes or representatives of man's misfortunes. It was Eris who threw the apple into the assembly of the gods, the cause of so much suffering and war. Vid. PARIS. Virgil introduces Discordia as a being similar to the Homeric Eris; for Discordia appears in company with Mars, Bellona, and the Furies, and Virgil is evidently imitating Homer.

[ERITHUS, a friend of Phineus, slain by Perseus.]

ERIZA (τὰ Ἐρίζα : Ἐρίζηρος), a city of Caria, on the borders of Lycia and Phrygia, on the River Chaüs (or rather Caüs). The surrounding district was called Asia Erizēna.

EROS (Ἔρως), in Latin AMOR or CUPIDO, the god of Love. In order to understand the ancients properly, we must distinguish three gods of this name : 1. The Eros of the ancient cosmogonies ; 2. The Eros of the philosophers and mysteries, who bears great resemblance to the first ; and, 3. The Eros whom we meet with in the epigrammatic and erotic poets. Homer does not mention Eros, and Hesiod, the earliest author who speaks of him, describes him as the cosmogonic Eros. First, says Hesiod, there was Chaos, then came Ge, Tartarus, and Eros, the fairest among the gods, who rules over the minds and the council of gods and men. By the philosophers and in the mysteries Eros was regarded as one of the fundamental causes in the formation of the world, inasmuch as he was the uniting power of love, which brought order and harmony among the conflicting elements of which Chaos consisted. The Orphic poets described him as the son of Cronus (Saturn), or as the first of the gods who sprang from the world's egg ; and in Plato's Symposium he is likewise called the oldest of the gods. The Eros of later poets, who gave rise to that notion of the god which is most familiar to us, is one of the youngest of all the gods. The parentage of this Eros is very differently described. He is usually represented as a son of Aphrodite (Venus), but his father is either Ares (Mars), Zeus (Jupiter), or Hermes (Mercury). He was at first represented as a handsome youth ; but shortly after the time of Alexander the Great the epigrammatists and erotic poets represented him as a wanton boy, of whom a thousand tricks and cruel sports were related, and from whom neither gods nor men were safe. In this stage Eros had nothing to do with uniting the discordant elements of the universe, or with the higher sympathy of love which binds human kind together ; but he is purely the god of sensual love, who bears sway over the inhabitants of Olympus as well as over men and all living creatures. His arms consist of arrows, which he carries in a golden quiver, and of torches which no one can touch with impunity. His arrows are of different power : some are golden, and kindle love in the heart they wound ; others are blunt and heavy with lead, and produce aversion to a lover. Eros is further represented with golden wings, and as fluttering about like a bird. His eyes are sometimes covered, so that he acts blindly. He is the usual companion of his mother Aphrodite (Venus), and poets and artists represent him, moreover, as accompanied by such allegorical beings as Pothos, Himeros, Tyche, Peitho, the Charites or Muses. ANTĒROS, which literally means return-love, is usually represented as the god who punishes those who do not return the love of others ; thus he is the avenging Eros, or a deus ultor (Ov., Met., xiii., 750). But in some accounts he is described as a god opposed to Eros and struggling against him. The number of Erotēs (Amores and Cupidines) is playfully extended ad libitum by later poets, and these Erotēs are described either as sons of Aphrodite (Venus) or of nymphs. Among the places distinguished for the worship of Eros, Thespiæ in Bœotia stands foremost ; there a quinquennial festival, the Erotidia or Erotia, was celebrated in his honor. In ancient works of art, Eros is represented either as a full-grown youth of the most perfect beauty, or as a wanton and sportive boy. Respecting the connection between Eros and Psyche, vid. PSYCHE.

[EROS (Ἔρως). 1. A slave of Marc Antony, who, when Antony, having determined to destroy himself, handed him his sword for that purpose, plunged it into his own breast.—2. A comic actor, was at first hissed from the stage ; but afterward, under the instruction of Roscius, became one of the most celebrated actors of Rome.]

EROTĪANUS (Ἐρωτιανός), a Greek grammarian or physician in the reign of Nero, wrote a work still extant, entitled Τῶν παρ' Ἰπποκράτει Λέξεων Συναγωγή, Vocum, quæ apud Hippocratem sunt, Collectio, which is dedicated to Andromachus, the archiater of the emperor. The best edition is by Franz, Lips., 1780.

ERUBRUS (now Ruber), a small tributary of the Moselle, near Treves.

[ERYCINA, surname of Venus (Aphrodite). Vid. ERYX.]

[ERYMANTHE (Ἐρμάνθη), wife of Berosus, and mother of Sabba, one of the Sibyls.]

ERYMANTHUS (Ἐρύμανθος). 1. A lofty mountain in Arcadia, on the frontiers of Achaia and Elis, celebrated in mythology as the haunt of the savage Erymanthian boar destroyed by Hercules. Vid. HERCULES. The Arcadian nymph Callisto, who was changed into a she-bear, is called Erymanthis ursæ, and her son Arcas Erymanthidis ursæ custos. Vid. ARCTOS.—2. [(Now Dogana, or, according to Leake, Dhimitzana),] a river in Arcadia, which rises in the above-mentioned mountain, and falls into the Alpheus.

ERYMANTHUS or ERYMANDRUS (Ἐρύμανθος, Ἐρύμανδρος, Arrian : now Helmund), a considerable river in the Persian province of Arachosia, rising in Mount Paropamisus, and flowing southwest and west into the lake called Aria (now Zarâh). According to other accounts, it lost itself in the sand, or flowed on through Gedrosia into the Indian Ocean.

[ERYMAS (Ἐρύμας). 1. A Trojan, slain by Idomeneus.—2. Another Trojan, slain by Patroclus.—3. A companion of Æneas, slain by Turnus.]

ERYSICHTHON (Ἐρυσίχθων), that is, "the Tearer up of the Earth." 1. Son of Triopas, cut down trees in a grove sacred to Ceres (Demeter), for which he was punished by the goddess with fearful hunger.—2. Son of Cærops and Agraules, died without issue in his father's lifetime on his return from Delos, whence he brought to Athens the ancient image of Ilithyia.

[ERYTHIA (Ἐρύθειά), daughter of Geryones, after whom the island Erythæa or Erythia, near Gades was said to have been named. Vid. GADES.]

ERYTHINI (Ἐρυθίνοι), a city on the coast of Paphlagonia, between Cromna and Amastri. A range of cliffs near it was called by the same name.

ERYTHRÆ ('Ερυθραί: 'Ερυθραίος). 1. (Ruins near Pigadía), an ancient town in Bœotia, not far from Platææ and Hysia, and celebrated as the mother city of Erythræ in Asia Minor.—2. A town of the Loerí Ozolæ, but belonging to the Ætoliæ, east of Naupactus.—3. (Ruins at Ritri), one of the twelve Ionian cities of Asia Minor, stood at the bottom of a large bay, on the west side of the peninsula which lies opposite to Chios. Tradition ascribed its foundation to a mixed colony of Cretans, Lyeians, Carians, and Pamphylians, under Erythros, the son of Rhadamanthys; and the leader of the Ionians, who afterward took possession of it, was said to have been Cnopus, the son of Codrus, after whom the city was also called ΚΝΟΠΟΥΠΟΛΙΣ (Κνωπούπολις). The little river Ælous (or, rather, Ælus, as it appears on coins), flowed past the city, and the neighboring sea-port towns of Cysus or CASYSTES, and Phœnicus, formed its harbors. Erythræ contained a temple of Hercules and Minerva (Athena) Polias, remarkable for its antiquity; and on the east, near the city, was a rock called Nigrum Promontorium (ἄκρα μέλαινα), from which excellent mill-stones were hewn.

ERYTHRÆUM MARE (ἡ 'Ερυθρὰ θάλασσα, also rarely 'Ερυθραίος πόντος), was the name applied originally to the whole expanse of sea between Arabia and Africa on the west, and India on the east, including its two great gulfs (the Red Sea and Persian Gulf). In this sense it is used by Herodotus, who also distinguishes the Red Sea by the name of Ἀράβιος κόλπος. VID. ARABICUS SINUS. Supposing the shores of Africa and Arabia to trend more and more away from each other the further south you go, he appears to have called the head of the sea between them ὁ Ἀράβιος κόλπος, and the rest of that sea, as far south as it extended, and also eastward to the shores of India, ἡ 'Ερυθρὰ θάλασσα, and also ἡ Νοτίη θάλασσα; though there are, again, some indications of a distinction between these two terms, the latter being applied to the whole expanse of ocean south of the former; in one passage, however, they are most expressly identified (ii., 158). Afterward, when the true form of these seas came to be better known, through the progress of maritime discovery under the Ptolemies, their parts were distinguished by different names, the main body of the sea being called Indicus Oceanus, the Red Sea Arabicus Sinus, the Persian Gulf Persicus Sinus, and the name Erythræum Mare being confined by some geographers to the gulf between the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb and the Indian Ocean, but far more generally used as identical with Arabicus Sinus, or the corresponding genuine Latin term, Mare Rubrum (Red Sea). Still, however, even long after the commencement of our era, the name Erythræum Mare was sometimes used in its ancient sense, as in the Περίπλους τῆς 'Ερυθρᾶς θαλάσσης, ascribed to Arrian, but really the work of a later period, which is a description of the coast from Myos Hermos on the Red Sea to the shores of India. The origin of the name is doubtful, and was disputed by the ancients; it is generally supposed that the Greek 'Ερυθρὰ θάλασσα is a significant name, identical in meaning with the Latin and English names of the Red Sea; but why red no very satisfactory reason has been given; the Hebrew name signifies the sedgy sea.

[ERYTHRAS ('Ερυθρας), an ancient king (Strabo in one place calls him a Persian, in another a son of Perseus), after whom the Erythræan Sea was said to have been named.]

[ERYX ('Ερυξ), son of Neptune (Apollod.), or of Butes and Venus, consequently half brother of Æneas; king of the Elymi in Sicily; founded the city Eryx (q. v.), and built a temple in honor of his mother. He was a famous boxer, and challenged Hercules, but was slain by him.]

ERYX ('Ερυξ). 1. Also ERÏCUS Mons (now S. Giuliano), a steep and isolated mountain in the northwest of Sicily, near Drepanum. On the summit of this mountain stood an ancient and celebrated temple of Venus (Aphrodite), said to have been built by Eryx, king of the Elymi, or, according to Virgil, by Æneas, but more probably by the Phœnician, who introduced the worship of Venus (Aphrodite) into Sicily. VID. ARRHODITE. From this temple the goddess bore the surname ERYCINA, under which name her worship was introduced at Rome about the beginning of the second Punic war. At present there is standing on the summit of the mountain the remains of a castle, originally built by the Saracens.—2. The town of this name was on the western slope of the mountain. It was destroyed by the Carthaginians in the time of Pyrrhus; was subsequently rebuilt; but was again destroyed by the Carthaginians in the first Punic war, and its inhabitants removed to Drepanum.

ESDRAËLA ('Εσδραηλά) and ESDRAËLON or ESDRËLON or -OM ('Εσδραηλών or -ώμ), the Greek names for the city and valley of Jezreel in Palestine.

ESQÛLÏÆ. VID. ROMA.

ESSÏ, a people in Gaul, west of the Sequana, probably the same as the people elsewhere called ESUBII and SESUVII.

ESTÏONES, a people in Rætia Secunda or Vindelicia, whose capital was Campodunum (now Kempen), on the Iller.

[ETÆARCHUS ('Ετέαρχος). 1. An ancient king of Crete, father of Phronima, and, through her, grandfather of Battus, according to the legend of the Cyrenæans.—2. A king of the Ammonians. Both mentioned by Herodotus.

ETEOCLES ('Ετεοκλής). 1. Son of Andrus and Eviippe, or of Cephisus; said to have been the first who offered sacrifices to the Charites at Orchomenos in Bœotia.—2. A son of Œdipus and Jocaste. After his father's flight from Thebes, he and his brother Polynices undertook the government of Thebes by turns; but disputes having arisen between them, Polynices fled to Adrastus, who then brought about the expedition of the Seven against Thebes. VID. ADRASTUS. When many of the heroes had fallen, Eteocles and Polynices resolved upon deciding the contest by single combat, and both the brothers fell.

ETEOCLES ('Ετέοκλος), a son of Iphis, was, according to some traditions, one of the seven heroes who went with Adrastus against Thebes. He had to make the attack upon the Neïtian gate, where he was opposed by Megareus.

[ETEONEUS ('Ετεωνεύς), son of Boethus, attendant of Menelaus.]

[ETEONICUS (Ἐτεόνικος), a Lacedæmonian, harriost in Thasos, was driven out B.C. 410; in 389 he was harriost in Ægina.]

ETEONUS (Ἐτεωνός), a town in Bœotia, belonging to the district Parasopia, mentioned by Homer, subsequently called Searphe.

ἘΤΕΣΙΕ (Ἐτησιαί, sc. ἀνεμοί), the Etesian Winds, derived from ἔτος, "year," signified any periodical winds, but the word was used more particularly by the Greeks to indicate the northerly winds, which blew in the Ægean for forty days from the rising of the dog star.

[ETHÉMON, a friend of Phineus, from Nabateia in Arabia, slain by Perseus.]

ETIS or ETIA (Ἐτις, Ἐτεια : Ἐτιος, Ἐτειος), a town in the south of Laconia, near Bœæ, said to have been founded by Æneas, and named after his daughter Etias. Its inhabitants were transplanted at an early time to Bœæ, and the place disappeared.

ETROISSA, a town of the Edetani, in Hispania Tarraconensis.

ETRURIA or TUSCIA, called by the Greeks TYRRHĒNIA or TYRSĒNIA (Τυρρηνία, Τυρσηνία), a country in central Italy. The inhabitants were called by the Romans ETRUSCI or TUSCI, by the Greeks TYRRHĒNI or TYRSĒNI (Τυρρηννοί, Τυρσηνοί), and by themselves RASĒNA. Etruria was bounded on the north and northwest by the Apennines and the River Maera, which divided it from Liguria, on the west by the Tyrrhene Sea or Mare Inferum, on the east and south by the River Tiber, which separated it from Umbria and Latium, thus comprehending almost the whole of modern Tuscany, the Duchy of Lucca, and the Transiberine portion of the Roman states. It was intersected by numerous mountains, offshoots of the Apennines, consisting of long ranges of hills in the north, but in the south lying in detached masses, and of smaller size. The land was celebrated in antiquity for its fertility, and yielded rich harvests of corn, wine, oil, and flax. The upper part of the country was the most healthy, namely, the part at the foot of the Apennines, near the sources of the Tiber and the Arnus, in the neighborhood of Arretium, Cortona, and Perugia. The lower part of the country on the coast was marshy and unhealthy, like the Maremma at the present day. The early history of the population of Etruria has given rise to much discussion in modern times. It is admitted on all hands that the people known to the Romans under the name of Etruscans were not the original inhabitants of the country, but a mixed race. The most ancient inhabitants appear to have been Ligurians in the north and Sicilians in the south, both of whom were subsequently expelled from the country by the Umbrians. So far most accounts agree; but from this point there is great difference of opinion. The ancients generally believed that a colony of Lydians, led by Tyrsenus, son of the king of Lydia, settled in the country, to which they gave the name of their leader; and it has been maintained by some modern writers that the Oriental character of many of the Etruscan institutions is in favor of this account of their origin. But most modern critics adopt an entirely different opinion. They believe that a Pelasgic race, called Tyrrheni, subdued the Umbrians, and settled in the country, and that these Tyrrhene-Pelasgians were in their turn conquered by a powerful Rætian race, called Rasena, who descended from the Alps and the valley of the Po. Hence it was from the union of the Tyrrhene-Pelasgians and the Rasena that the Etruscan nation was formed. It is impossible, however, to come to any definite conclusion respecting the real origin of the Etruscans, since we are entirely ignorant of the language which they spoke: and the language of a people is the only means by which we can pronounce with certainty respecting their origin. But, whatever may have been the origin of the Etruscans, we know that they were a very powerful nation when Rome was still in its infancy, and that they had at an early period extended their dominion over the greater part of Italy, from the Alps and the plains of Lombardy on the one hand, to Vesuvius and the Gulf of Sarento on the other. These dominions may be divided into three great districts: Circumpadane Etruria in the north, Etruria Proper in the centre, and Campanian Etruria in the south. In each of these districts there were twelve principal cities or states, which formed a confederacy for mutual protection. Through the attacks of the Gauls in the north, and of the Sabines, Sannites, and Greeks in the south, the Etruscans became confined within the limits of Etruria Proper, and continued long to flourish in this country, after they had disappeared from the rest of Italy. Of the twelve cities which formed the confederacy in Etruria Proper, no list is given by the ancients. They were most probably CORTONA, ARRETIIUM, CLUSIUM, PERUSIA, VOLATERRÆ, VETULONTA, RUSELLE, VOLSINI, TARQUINI, VALERII, VEII, CERE, more anciently called Agylla. Each state was independent of all the others. The government was a close aristocracy, and was strictly confined to the family of the Lucumones, who united in their own persons the ecclesiastical as well as the civil functions. The people were not only rigidly excluded from all share in the government, but appear to have been in a state of vassalage or serfdom. From the noble and priestly families of the Lucumones a supreme magistrate was chosen, who appears to have been sometimes elected for life, and to have borne the title of king; but his power was much fettered by the noble families. At a later time the kingly dignity was abolished, and the government intrusted to a senate. A meeting of the confederacy of the twelve states was held annually in the spring, at the temple of Voltumna, near Volsinii. The Etruscans were a highly-civilized people, and from them the Romans borrowed many of their religious and political institutions. The three last kings of Rome were undoubtedly Etruscans, and they left in the city enduring traces of Etruscan power and greatness. The Etruscans paid the greatest attention to religion, and their religious system was closely interwoven with all public and private affairs. The principal deities were divided into two classes. The highest class were the "Shrouded Gods," who did not reveal themselves to man, and to whom all the other gods were subject. The second class consisted of the twelve great gods, six male and six female, called by the Romans Dii Consentes. They formed the council of Tina or Tinia, the Roman Jupiter, and the two other most powerful gods of the twelve were Cupra, corresponding to Juno, and Menrva or Menerva, corresponding to the Roman Minerva. Besides these two classes of gods, there was a great number of other gods, penates and lares, to whom worship was paid. The mode in which the gods were worshipped was prescribed in certain sacred books, said to have been written by TAGES. These books contained the "Etruscan Discipline," and gave minute directions, respecting the whole of the ceremonial worship. They were studied in the schools of the Lucumones, to which the Romans also were accustomed to send some of their noblest youths for instruction, since it was from the Etruscans that the Romans borrowed most of their arts of divination. In architecture, statuary, and painting, the Etruscans attained a great eminence. They were acquainted with the use of the arch at an early period, and they employed it in constructing the great cloacæ at Rome. Their bronze caudelabra were celebrated at Athens even in the times of Pericles; and the beauty of their bronze statues is still attested by the She Wolf of the Capitol and the Orator of the Florence Gallery. The beautiful vases, which have been discovered in such numbers in Etruscan tombs, can not be cited as proofs of the excellence of Etruscan workmanship, since it is now admitted by the most competent judges that these vases were either made in Greece, or by Greek artists settled in Italy. Of the private life of the Etruscans we have a lively picture from the paintings discovered in their tombs; but into this subject our limits forbid us to enter. The later history of Etruria is a struggle against the rising power of Rome, to which it was finally compelled to yield. After the capture of Veii by the dictator Camillus, B.C. 396, the Romans obtained possession of the eastern part of Etruria, and the Cimiuian forest, instead of the Tiber, now became the boundary of the two people. The defeat of the Etruscans by Q. Fabius Maximus in 310 was a great blow to their power. They still endeavored to maintain their independence, with the assistance of the Samnites and the Gauls; but after their decisive defeat by Cornelius Dolabella in 283, they became the subjects of Rome. In 91 they received the Roman franchise. The numerous military colonies established in Etruria by Sulla and Augustus destroyed to a great extent the national character of the people, and the country thus became in course of time completely Romanized.

[EUÆMON (Εὐαίμων). 1. One of the sons of Lycæon, slain by the lightning of Jupiter (Zeus).—2. Father of Eurypylos, whence the latter is called by Homer Euæmonides (Εὐαμωνίδης).]

[EUBIUS, a writer, author of erotic stories, mentioned by Ovid in his Tristia.]

EUBÆA (Εὐβοία: Εὔβοιεύς, Εὔβοεύς, fem. Εὔβοίς). 1. (Now Negropont), the largest island of the Ægean Sea, lying along the coasts of Attica, Bœotia, and the southern part of Thessaly, from which countries it is separated by the Eubœan Sea, called the Euripus in its narrowest part. Eubœa is about ninety miles in length: its extreme breadth is thirty miles, but in the narrowest part it is only four miles across. Throughout the length of the island runs a lofty range of mountains, which rise in one part as high as seven thousand two hundred and sixty six feet above the sea. It contains, nevertheless, many fertile plains, and was celebrated in antiquity for the excellence of its pasturage and corn-fields. According to the ancients, it was once united to Bœotia, from which it was separated by an earthquake. In Homer the inhabitants are called Abantes, and are represented as taking part in the expedition against Troy. In the north of Eubœa dwelt the Histiæi, from whom that part of the island was called Histiæa; below these were the Ellopii, who gave the name of Ellopia to the district, extending as far as Ægæ and Cerinthus; and in the south were the Dryopes. The centre of the island was inhabited chiefly by Ionians. It was in this part of Eubœa that the Athenians planted the colonies of Chalcis and Eretria, which were the two most important cities in the island. After the Persian wars Eubœa became subject to the Athenians, who attached much importance to its possession: and, consequently, Pericles made great exertions to subdue it, when it revolted in B.C. 445. Under the Romans Eubœa formed part of the province of Achaia. Since Cumæ in Italy was a colony from Chalcis in Eubœa, the adjective Euboicus is used by the poets in reference to the former city. Since Virgil (Æn., vi, 2) speaks of Euboicis Cumarum oris.—2. A town in the interior of Sicily, founded by Chalcis in Eubœa, but destroyed at an early period.

ΕΥΒΥΛΙΔΗΣ (Εἰβουλίδης), of Miletus, a philosopher of the Megaric school. He was a contemporary of Aristotle, against whom he wrote with great bitterness; and he is stated to have given Demosthenes instruction in dialectics. He is said to have invented the forms of several of the most celebrated false and captious syllogisms.

ΕΥΒΥΛΟΣ (Εὔβουλος). 1. An Athenian, of the demus Anaphlystus, a distinguished orator and statesman, was one of the most formidable opponents of Demosthenes. It was with him that Æschines served as secretary in the earlier part of his life.—2. An Athenian, son of Euphranon, of the Cettian demus, a distinguished poet of the middle comedy, flourished B.C. 376. He wrote one hundred and four plays, of which there are extant more than fifty titles. His plays were chiefly on mythological subjects. Several of them contained parodies of passages from the tragic poets, and especially from Euripides. [The fragments of Eubulus have been collected and edited by Meineke, Fragm. Comic Græc., vol. i., p. 594-629, edit. minor.]

[ΕΥΧΕΝΟΡ (Εὐχένωρ), a son of the Corinthian seer Polyidus, with whom he went to the Trojan war, although his father had foretold that he would thereby lose his life; he was slain by Paris.]

ΕΥΚΛΙΔΗΣ (Εὐκλείδης). 1. The celebrated mathematician, who has almost given his own name to the science of geometry, in every country in which his writings are studied; but we know next to nothing of his private history. The place of his birth is uncertain. He lived at Alexandria in the time of the first Ptolemy, B.C. 323-283, and was the founder of the Alexandrian mathematical school. He was of the Platonic sect, and well read in its doctrines. It was his answer to Ptolemy, who asked if geometry could not be made easier, that there was no royal road. Of the numerous works attributed to Euclid, the following are still extant: 1. Στοιχεία, the Elements, in thirteen books, with a fourteenth and fifteenth added by HYPSICLES. 2. Δεδομένα, the Data, containing one hundred propositions, with a preface by Marinus of Naples. 3. Εισαγωγή Ἀρμονική, a Treatise on Music; and, 4. Καταοπὴ Κανόνας, the Division of the Scale: one of these works, most likely the former, must be rejected. 5. Φαινόμενα, the Appearances (of the heavens). 6. Ὀπτικά, on Optics; and, 7. Κατοπτρικά, on Catoptrics. The only complete edition of all the reputed works of Euclid is that published at Oxford, 1703, folio, by David Gregory, with the title Ἐὐκλείδου τὰ σωζόμενα. The Elements and the Data were published in Greek, Latin, and French, in 3 vols. 4to, Paris, 1814-16-18, by Peyrard. The most convenient edition for scholars of the Greek text of the Elements is the one by August, Berol., 1826, 8vo.—2. Of Megara, was one of the chief of the disciples of Socrates, but before becoming such he had studied the doctrines, and especially the dialectics, of the Eleatics. Socrates on one occasion reproved him for his fondness for subtle and captious disputes. On the death of Socrates (B.C. 399), Euclides took refuge in Megara and there established a school which distinguished itself chiefly by the cultivation of dialectics. The doctrines of the Eleatics formed the basis of his philosophical system. With these he blended the ethical and dialectical principles of Socrates. He was the author of six dialogues, none of which, however, have come down to us. He has frequently been erroneously confounded with the mathematician of the same name. The school which he founded was called sometimes the Megarie, sometimes the Dialectic or Eristic.

[EUCRATES (Ἐὐκράτης). 1. An Athenian demagogue, who, after the death of Pericles, exercised for a time a considerable influence.—2. Brother of Nicias, the general, refused to become one of the thirty tyrants, and was put to death by them.]

EUCRATĪDES (Ἐὐκρατίδης), king of Bactria from about B.C. 181 to 161, was one of the most powerful of the Bactrian kings, and made great conquests in the north of India.

EUCTĒMON, the astronomer. Vid. METON.

EUDĀMĪDAS (Ἐὐδαμίδας). 1. I., King of Sparta, reigned from B.C. 330 to about 300. He was the younger son of Archidamus III., and succeeded his brother Agis III.—2. II., King of Sparta, was son of Archidamus IV., whom he succeeded, and father of Agis IV.—[3. A Spartan general, brother of Phœbidas, sent at the head of two thousand men to aid the Chalcidians, B.C. 383: in consequence of his brother's delay in bringing him reinforcements, he did not effect much: he was slain in the course of the war.]

EUDĒMOS (Ἐὐδήμος). 1. Of Cyprus, a Peripatetic philosopher, to whom Aristotle dedicated the dialogue Ἐὐδήμος ἢ περὶ ψυχῆς, which is lost.—2. Of Rhodes, also a Peripatetic philosopher, and one of the most important of Aristotle's disciples. He edited many of Aristotle's writings; and one of them even bears the name of Eudemus, namely, the Ἠθικά Ἐὐδήμεια, which work was in all probability a recension of Aristotle's lectures edited by Eudemus. Vid. p. 102, a.—3. The physician of Livilla, the wife of Drusus Cæsar, who assisted her and Sejanus in poisoning her husband, A.D. 23.

- EUDŌCĪA (Ἐὐδόκια). 1. Originally called ATHĒNAIS, daughter of the sophist Leontius, was distinguished for her beauty and attainments. She married the Emperor Theodosius II., A.D. 421; and on her marriage she embraced Christianity, and received at her baptism the name of Eudocia. She died at Jerusalem, A.D. 460. She wrote several works; and to her is ascribed by some the extant poem Homero-Centones, which is composed of verses from Homer, and relates the history of the fall and of the redemption of man by Jesus Christ; but its genuineness is very doubtful.—2. Of Maerembolis, wife of the Emperor Constantine XI. Duca and Romanus IV. Diogenes (A.D. 1059-1071), wrote a dictionary of history and mythology, which she called Ἰωνία, Violarium, or Bed of Violets. It was printed for the first time by Villoisou, in his Anecdota Græca, Venice, 1781. The sources from which the work was compiled are nearly the same as those used by Suidas.

[EUDORUS (Ἐὐδώρος), son of Mercury and Poly-mela, reared by his grandfather Phylas; was one of the leaders of the Myrmidons under Achilles.]

EUDOSSES, a people in Germany, near the Varni, probably in the modern Mecklenburg.

EUDOXUS (Ἐὐδοξος). 1. Of Cnidus, son of Æschines, a celebrated astronomer, geometer, physician, and legislator, lived about B.C. 366. He was a pupil of Archytas and Plato, and also went to Egypt, where he studied some time with the priests. He afterward returned to Athens, but it would appear that he must have spent some time in his native place, for Strabo says that the observatory of Eudoxus at Cnidus was existing in his time. He died at the age of fifty-three. He is said to have been the first who taught in Greece the motions of the planets; and he is also stated to have made separate spheres for the stars, sun, moon, and planets. He wrote various works on astronomy and geometry, which are lost; but the substance of his Φαινόμενα is preserved by Aratus, who turned into verse the prose work by Eudoxus with that title.—2. An Atheian comic poet of the new comedy, was by birth a Sicilian and the son of Agathoëles.—3. Of Cyzicus, a geographer, who went from his native place to Egypt, and was employed by Ptolemy Evergetes and his wife Cleopatra in voyages to India; but afterward, being robbed of all his property by Ptolemy Lathyrus, he sailed away down the Red Sea, and at last arrived at Gades. He afterward made attempts to circumnavigate Africa in the opposite direction, but without success. He lived about B.C. 130.

EUELTHON (Ἐὐέλθων), a king of Salamis in Cyprus, under whom the Persians reduced this island.]

EUGAMON (Εὐγάμων), one of the Cyclic poets, was a native of Cyrene, and lived about B.C. 568. His poem (Τηλεγονία) was a continuation of the Odyssey, and formed the conclusion of the Epic cycle. It concluded with the death of Ulysses.

EUGĀNĒI, a people who formerly inhabited Venetia on the Adriatic Sea, and were driven toward the Alps and the Lacus Benacus by the Heueti or Veneti. According to some traditions, they founded Patavium and Verona, in the neighborhood of which were the Euganei Colles. They possessed numerous flocks of sheep, the wool of which was celebrated (Juv., viii., 15.)

EUMĒMERUS (Εὐήμερος), probably a native of Messene in Sicily, lived at the court of Cassander in Macedonia about B.C. 316. Cassander furnished him with the means to undertake a voyage of discovery. He is said to have sailed down the Red Sea and round the southern coasts of Asia, until he came to an island called Panchæa. After his return he wrote a work entitled Ἐπεὶ Ἀναγραφή, or a Sacred History, in nine books. He gave this title to his work because he pretended to have his information from Ἀναγραφαί, or inscriptions in temples, which he had discovered in his travels, especially in the island of Panchæa. Euhemerus had been trained in the school of the Cyrenaics, who were notorious for their skepticism in matters connected with the popular religion; and the object of his work was to exclude every thing supernatural from the popular religion, and to dress up the myths as so many plain histories. In his work the several gods were represented as having originally been men who had distinguished themselves either as warriors or benefactors of mankind, and who after their death were worshipped as gods by the grateful people. Jupiter (Zeus), for example, was a king of Crete, who had been a great conqueror; and he asserted that he had seen in the temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Triphylus a column with an inscription detailing all the exploits of the kings Cœlus (Uranus), Saturn (Cronus), and Jupiter (Zeus). The book was written in an attractive style, and became very popular, and many of the subsequent historians, such as Diodorus, adopted his mode of dealing with myths. The great popularity of the work is attested by the circumstance that Ennius made a Latin translation of it. But the pious believers, on the other hand, called Euhemerus an atheist. The Christian writers often refer to him to prove that the pagan mythology was nothing but a heap of fables invented by men.

EULÆUS (Εὐλαῖος: Old Testament, Ulai: now Karoon), a river in Susiana, on the borders of Elymais, rising in Great Media, flowing south through Mesobate, passing east of Susa, and, after uniting with the Pasitigris, falling into the head of the Persian Gulf. Some of the ancient geographers make the Eulæus fall into the Chosæus, and others identify the two rivers.

EUMÆUS (Εὐμαιός), the faithful swineherd of Ulysses, was a son of Ctesius, king of the island of Syrie; he had been carried away from his father's house by a Phœnician slave, and Phœnician sailors sold him to Laërtes, the father of ULYSSES.

[EUMĒDES (Εὐμήδης). 1. A herald of the Trojans, father of Dolon.—2. Grandson of the preceding, accompanied Æneas to Italy, and was slain by Turnus.]

EUMĒLUS (Εὐμήλος). 1. Son of Admetus and Alcestis, went with eleven ships from Phœræ to Troy. He was distinguished for his excellent horses, which had once been under the care of Apollo, and with which Eumelus would have gained the prize at the funeral games of Patroclus if his chariot had not been broken. His wife was Iphithia, daughter of Iearius.—2. of Corinth, one of the Bœcehiadæ, an ancient Epic poet, belonged, according to some, to the Epic cycle. His name is significant, referring to his skill in poetry. He flourished about B.C. 760. His principal poem seems to have been his Corinthian History.

EUMĒNES (Εὐμένης). 1. Of CARDIA, served as private secretary to Philip and Alexander, whom he accompanied throughout his expedition in Asia, and who treated him with marked confidence and distinction. After the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), Eumenes obtained the government of Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Pontus, which provinces had never yet been conquered by the Macedonians. Eumenes entered into a close alliance with Perdiceas, who subdued these provinces for him. When Perdiceas marched into Egypt against Ptolemy, he committed to Eumenes the conduct of the war against Antipater and Craterus in Asia Minor, Eumenes met with great success; he defeated Neoptolemus, who had revolted from Perdiceas; and subsequently he again defeated the combined armies of Craterus and Neoptolemus; Craterus himself fell, and Neoptolemus was slain by Eumenes with his own hand, after a deadly struggle in the presence of the two armies. Meantime the death of Perdiceas in Egypt changed the aspect of affairs. Antigonos now employed the whole force of the Macedonian army to crush Eumenes. The struggle was carried on for some years (320–316). It was conducted by Eumenes with consummate skill, and, notwithstanding the numerical inferiority of his forces, he maintained his ground against his enemies till he was surrounded by the Argyraspids to Antigonos, by whom he was put to death, 316. He was forty-five years old at the time of his death. Of his ability, both as a general and a statesman, no doubt can be entertained; and it is probable that he would have attained a far more important position among the successors of Alexander, had it not been for the accidental disadvantage of his birth. But as a Greek of Cardia, and not a native Macedonian, he was constantly looked upon with dislike both by his opponents and companions in arms.—2. I., King of PERGAMUS, reigned B.C. 263–241, and was the successor of his uncle Philetærus. He obtained a victory near Sardis over Antiochus Soter, and thus established his dominion over the provinces in the neighborhood of his capital.—3. II., King of PERGAMUS, reigned B.C. 197–159, and was the son and successor of Attalus I. He inherited from his predecessor the friendship and alliance of the Romans, which he took the utmost pains to cultivate. He supported the Romans in their war against Antiochus; and, after the conquest of the latter (190), he received from the senate Mysia, Lydia, both Phrygias, and Lyaonia, as well as Lysimachia, and the Thracian Chersonese. By this means he was at once raised from a state of comparative insignificance to be the sovereign of a powerful monarchy. Subsequently he was involved in war with Pharnaces, king of Pontus, and Prusias, king of Bithynia, but both wars were brought to a close by the interposition of the Romans. At a later period Eumenes was regarded with suspicion by the Roman senate, because he was suspected of having corresponded secretly with Perseus, king of Macedonia, during the war of the latter with the Romans. Eumenes assiduously cultivated all the arts of peace; Pergamus became under his rule a great and flourishing city, which he adorned with splendid buildings, and in which he founded that celebrated library which rose to be a rival even to that of Alexandria.

EUMENIA (Ἐβμένεια or Ἐβμηνία: now Ishekli), a city of Great Phrygia, on the rivers Glaucus and Cludrus, north of the Mæander, named by Attalus II. after his brother and predecessor Eumenes II. There are indications which seem to connect the time of its foundation with that of the destruction of Corinth.

EUMÉNIDES (Ἐβμηνίδες), also called ERINYES, not Erinnyes (Ἐρινύες, Ἐρινύς), and by the Romans FURÆ or DIÆ, the Avenging Deities, were originally only a personification of curses pronounced upon a criminal. The name Erinys is the more ancient one; its etymology is uncertain, but the Greeks derived it from ἐρίνω or ἐρευνάω, I hunt up or persecute, or from the Arcadian ἐρινύω, I am angry; so that the Erinyes were either the angry goddesses, or the goddesses who hunt up or search after the criminal. The name Eumenides, which signifies "the well-meaning" or "soothed goddesses," is a mere euphemism, because people dreaded to call these fearful goddesses by their real name. It was said to have been first given them after the acquittal of Orestes by the Areopagus, when the anger of the Erinyes had become soothed. It was by a similar euphemism that at Athens the Erinyes were called σεμνὰ θεαί, or the respected goddesses. Homer sometimes mentions an Erinys, but more frequently Erinyes in the plural. He represents them as inhabitants of Erebus, where they remain quiet until some curse pronounced upon a criminal calls them into activity. The crimes which they punish are disobedience toward parents, violation of the respect due to old age, perjury, murder, violation of the law of hospitality, and improper conduct toward suppliants. They took away from men all peace of mind, and led them into misery and misfortune. Hesiod says that they were the daughters of Terra (Ge), and sprung from the drops of blood that fell upon her from the body of Cœlus (Uranus). Æschylus calls them the daughters of Night, and Sophocles of Darkness and Terra (Ge). In the Greek tragedians neither the names nor the number of the Erinyes are mentioned. Æschylus describes them as divinities more ancient than the Olympian gods, dwelling in the deep darkness of Tartarus, dreaded by gods and men; with bodies all black, serpents twined in their hair, and blood dripping from their eyes. Euripides and other later poets describe them as winged. With later writers their number is usually limited to three, and their names are ΤΙΣΙΠΛΩΝΗ, ΑΛΕΚΤΟ, and ΜΕΓΑΡΑ. They gradually assumed the character of goddesses who punished men after death, and they seldom appeared upon earth. The sacrifices offered to them consisted of black sheep and naphala, i. e., a drink of honey mixed with water. They were worshipped at Athens, where they had a sanctuary and a grotto near the Areopagus: their statues, however, had nothing formidable, and a festival Eumeneida was there celebrated in their honor. Another sanctuary, with a grove which no one was allowed to enter, existed at Colonus.

EUMENIUS, a Roman rhetorician of Augustodunum (now Autun) in Gaul, held a high office under Constantius Chlorus. He is the author of four orations in the "Panegyrici Veteres," namely, 1. Oratio pro instaurandis scholis, a lecture delivered on the re-establishment by Constantius Chlorus of the school at Autun, A.D. 296 or 297. 2. Panegyricus Constantio Cæsari dictus, delivered 296 or 297. 3. Panegyricus Constantino Augusto dictus, delivered 310. 4. Gratiarum actio Constantino Augusto Flaviensium nomine, delivered 311.

EUMOLPUS (Ἐβμολπος), that is, "the good singer," a Thracian bard, usually represented as a son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Chione, the daughter of Boreas. As soon as he was born, he was thrown into the sea by his mother, who was anxious to conceal her shame, but was preserved by his father Neptune (Poseidon), who had him educated in Æthiopia by his daughter Benthesiyma. When he had grown up, he married a daughter of Benthesiyma; but as he made an attempt upon the chastity of his wife's sister, he was expelled, together with his son Ismarus. They went to the Thracian king Tegyrus, who gave his daughter in marriage to Ismarus; but as Eumolpus drew upon himself the suspicion of Tegyrus, he was again obliged to take to flight, and came to Eleusis in Attica, where he formed a friendship with the Eleusinians. After the death of his son Ismarus, he returned to Thrace at the request of Tegyrus. The Eleusinians, who were involved in a war with Athens, called Eumolpus to their assistance. Eumolpus came with a numerous band of Thracians, but he was slain by Erechtheus. Eumolpus was regarded as the founder of the Eleusinau mysteries, and as the first priest of Ceres (Demeter) and Bacchus (Dionysus). He was succeeded in the priestly office by his son Ceryx (who was, according to some accounts, the son of Mercury (Hermes), and his family, the Eumolpidae, continued till the latest times the priests of Ceres (Demeter) at Eleusis. The legends connected Eumolpus with Hercules, whom he is said to have instructed in music, or initiated into the mysteries. There were so many different traditions about Eumolpus that some of the ancients supposed that there were two or three persons of that name.

[EUNÆUS, son of Clytius, a Trojan, slain by Canilla in Italy.]

EUNAPIUS (Ἐὐνάπιος), a Greek sophist, was born at Sardis A.D. 347, and lived and taught at Athens as late as the reign of Theodosius II. He wrote, 1. Lives of Sophists (Βίοι φιλοσόφων καὶ σοφιστῶν), still extant, containing twenty-three biographies of sophists, most of whom were contemporaries of Eunapius, or had lived shortly before him. Though these biographies are extremely brief, and the style is intolerably inflated, yet they supply us with important information respecting a period on which we have no other information. Eunapius was an enthusiastic admirer of the philosophy of the New Platonists, and a bitter enemy of Christianity. Edited by Boissouade, Amsterdam, 1822. 2. A continuation of the history of Dexippus (Μετὰ Δέξιππον χρονικὴ ἱστορία), in fourteen books, began with A.D. 270, and went down to 404. Of this work we have only extracts, which are published along with Dexippus. Vid. DEXIPPUS.

EUNÆUS (Ἐὐνῆος or Ἐὐνέως), a son of Jason and Hypsipyle in Lemnos, supplied the Greeks with wine during their war against Troy. He purchased Lycan of Patroclus for a silver urn.

EUNOMIA. Vid. ΗΘΥΑ.

EUNOMUS (Ἐὐνομος). 1. King of Sparta, is described by some as the father of Lycurgus and Polydectes. Herodotus, on the contrary, places him in his list after Polydectes. In all probability, the name was invented with reference to the Lycurgean Ἐὐνομία, and Eunomus, if not wholly rejected, must be identified with Polydectes.—[2. An Athenian naval commander, sent out in command of thirteen ships in B.C. 388 to act against the Lacedæmonians.]

EUNUS (Ἐὐνός), a Sicilian slave, and a native of Apamea in Syria, was the leader of the Sicilian slaves in the servile war. He first attracted attention by pretending to the gift of prophecy, and by interpreting dreams; to the effect of which he added by appearing to breathe flames from his mouth and other similar juggleries. He was proclaimed king, and soon collected formidable forces, with which he defeated several Roman armies. The insurrection now became so formidable, that for three successive years (B.C. 134–132) three consuls were sent against the insurgents, and it was not till the third year (132) that the revolt was finally put down by the consul Rupilius. Eunus was taken prisoner, and died in prison at Morgantia, of the disease called morbus pedicularis.

EUPALĪUM or EUPŌLĪUM (Ἐὐπάλιον, Ἐὐπόλιον; Ἐὐπαλιεύς), a town of the Loeri Ozolæ, north of Naucratus, subsequently included in Ætolia Epictetus.

EUPĀTOR (Ἐὐπάτωρ), a surname assumed by many of the kings in Asia after the time of Alexander the Great. Vid. ANTIOCHUS, MITHRADATES.

EUPATŌRĪUM or EUPATŌLĪA (Ἐὐπατόριον, Ἐπατορία), a town in the Chersonesus Taurica, founded by Mithradates Eupator, and named after him.

EUPHĀES (Ἐὐφᾶης), king of the Messenians, fell in battle against the Spartans in the first Messenian war. He was succeeded by ARISTODEMUS.

EIPHĒMUS (Ἐὐφήμος). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) by Europe, the daughter of Tityus, or by Meconice or Oris, a daughter of Orion or Euryotas. According to one account he was an inhabitant of Panopeus on the Cephissus in Phocis, and according to another of Hyria in Bœotia, and afterward lived at Tanarus. He was married to Laonome, the sister of Hercules; he was one of the Calydonian hunters, and the helmsman of the vessel of the Argonauts, and, by a power which his father had granted to him, he could walk on the sea just as on firm ground. He is mentioned also as the ancestor of Brutus, the founder of Cyrene.—[2. Sou of Trœzenus, an ally of the Trojans, leader of the Cicones.—3. An Athenian, sent by the Athenian commanders at Syracuse to negotiate alliance with Camarina.]

EUPHORBUS (Ἐὐφόρβος). 1. Son of Panthous, one of the bravest of the Trojans, was slain by Menelaus, who subsequently dedicated the shield of Euphorbus in the temple of Juno (Hera), near Mycenæ. Pythagoras asserted that he had once been the Trojan Euphorbus, and in proof of his assertion took down at first sight the shield of Euphorbus from the temple of Juno (Hera) (clipeo Trojana refixo tempora testatus, Hor., Carm., i., 28, 11).—2. Physician of Juba II, king of Mauretania, about the end of the first century B.C., and brother to Antonius Musa, the physician to Augustus.

EUPHŌRĪON (Ἐὐφῳρίων). 1. Father of the poet Æschylus.—2. Son of Æschylus, and himself a tragic poet.—3. Of Chalcis in Eubœa, an eminent grammarian and poet, son of Polymnetus, was born about B.C. 274. He became the librarian of Antiochus the Great, 221, and died in Syria, either at Apamea or at Antioch. The following were the most important of the poems of Euphorion in heroic verse: 1. Ἰσιόδοτος, probably an agricultural poem. 2. Μοφοπία, so called from an old name in Attica, the legends of which country seem to have been the chief subject of the poem. 3. Χιλιάδες, a poem written against certain persons, who had defrauded Euphorion of money which he had intrusted to their care. It probably derived its title from each of its books consisting of 1000 verses. He also wrote epigrams, which were imitated by many of the Latin poets, and also by the Emperor Tiberius, with whom he was a great favorite. Euphorion likewise wrote many his torical and grammatical works. All his works are lost, but the fragments are collected by Meucke, in his Analecta Alexandrina, Berol. 1843.

EUPHRĀNOR (Ἐὐφράνωρ). 1. A distinguished statuary and painter, was a native of the Corinthian isthmus, but practiced his art at Athens. He flourished about B.C. 336. His most celebrated statue was a Paris, which expressed alike the judge of the goddesses, the lover of Helen, and the slayer of Achilles; the very beautiful sitting figure of Paris, in marble, in the Museo Pio-Clementino is, no doubt, a copy of this work. His best paintings were preserved in a porch in the Ceramicus at Athens. On the one side were the twelve gods, and on the opposite wall, Theseus, with Democracy and Demos. Euphranor also wrote works on proportion and on colors (de Symmetria et Coloribus), the two points in which his own excellence seems chiefly to have consisted. Pliny says that he was the first who properly expressed the dignity of heroes by the proportions he gave to their statues. He made the bodies somewhat more slender, and the heads and limbs larger.—[2. Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, aided Cæsar in defeating the Egyptian fleet in the Alexandrine war: he perished some time after in a naval combat.]

EUPHRĀTES (Εὐφράτης), an eminent Stoic philosopher, was a native of Tyre, or, according to others, of Byzantium. He was an intimate friend of the younger Pliny. In his old age he became tired of life, and asked and obtained from Hadrian permission to put an end to himself by poison.

EUPHRĀTES (Εὐφράτης: in the Old Testament, Phrat: now El Frat), a great river of western Asia, forming the boundary of Upper and Lower Asia, consists, in its upper course, of two branches, both of which rise in the mountains of Armenia. The northern branch (now Kara-Sou), which is the true Euphrates, rises in the mountain above Erzeroum (the Mount Abus or Capotes of the ancients), and flows west and southwest to a little above latitude 39° and east of longitude 39°, where it breaks through the chain of the Anti-Taurus, and, after receiving the southern branch (now Mourad-Chai), or, as the ancients called it, the ARSANIAS, it breaks through the main chain of the Taurus between Melitene and Samosata, and then flows in a general southern direction till it reaches latitude 36°, whence it flows in a general southeast direction till it approaches the Tigris opposite to Seleneia, where the distance between the two rivers was reckoned at only two hundred stadia. Then it flows through the Plain of Babylonia, at first receding further from the Tigris, and afterward approaching it again, till it joins it about sixty miles above the mouth of the Persian Gulf, having already had its waters much diminished by numerous canals, which irrigated the country in ancient times, but the neglect of which at present has converted much of the once fertile district watered by the Euphrates into a marshy desert. The whole length of the Euphrates is between five hundred and six hundred miles. In its upper course, before reaching the Taurus, its northern branch and a part of the united stream divided Armenia Major from Colehis and Armenia Minor, and its lower course divided Mesopotamia from Syria. Its chief tributary, besides the Arsanias, was the Aborrhias.

EUPHRON (Εὐφρων). [1. A native of Sicyon, who, in the time of Epaminondas, made himself master of that city by the aid of the lower orders: driven out by the opposite party, he betook himself to Thebes, and was there murdered by his opponents, who had followed him thither.]—2. An Athenian poet of the new comedy, whose plays, however, partook largely of the character of the middle comedy. [His fragments are collected in Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. ii., p. 1128–33, edit. minor.]

EUPHRŌSYNE, one of the Charities or Graces. Vid. CHARIS.

[EUPHROS (Εὐφροσύνη), father of Antinous, who was one of the suitors of Penelope; attempting to avenge the death of his son, he was slain by Lærtæa.]

EUPŌLIS (Εὐπόλις), son of Sosipolis, an Athenian poet of the old comedy, and one of the three who are distinguished by Horace in his well-known line, "Eupolis, atque Cratinus, Aristophanesque poetæ," above all the... "alii quorum comœdia prisca virorum est." He was born about B.C. 446, and is said to have exhibited his first drama in his seventeenth year, 429, two years before Aristophanes. The date of his death is uncertain. The common story was, that Alcibiades, when sailing to Sicily, (415), threw Eupolis into the sea, in revenge for an attack which he had made upon him in his Βάπτται; but this can not be true, as we know that Eupolis produced plays after the Sicilian expedition. He probably died in 411. The chief characteristic of the poetry of Eupolis seems to have been the liveliness of his fancy, and the power which he possessed of imparting its images to the audience. In elegance he is said to have even surpassed Aristophanes, while in bitter jesting and personal abuse he emulated Cratinus. Among the objects of his satire was Socrates, on whom he made a bitter, though less elaborate attack than that in the Clouds of Aristophanes. The dead were not exempt from his abuse, for there are still extant some lines of his in which Cimon is most unmercifully treated. A close relation subsisted between Eupolis and Aristophanes, not only as rivals, but as imitators of each other. Cratinus attacked Aristophanes for borrowing from Eupolis, and Eupolis in his Βάπτται made the same charge, especially with reference to the Knights. The Scholiasts specify the last Parabasis of the Knights as borrowed from Eupolis. On the other hand, Aristophanes, in the second (or third) edition of the Clouds, retorts upon Eupolis the charge of imitating the Knights in his Maricas, and taunts him with the further indignity of jesting on his rival's baldness. [The fragments of his plays have been edited by Runkel, Phœrecratis et Eupolidis Fragm., Lips., 1829; and by Meineke, Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. i., p. 158–228, edit. minor.]

EUPOMΠΟΣ (Εὐπομπός), of Sicyon, a distinguished Greek painter, was the contemporary of Zeuxis, Parrhasius, and Timanthes, and the instructor of Pamphilus, the master of Apelles. The fame of Eupompus led to the creation of a third school of Greek art, the Sicyonian, at the head of which he was placed.

EURIPIDES (Εὐριπίδης). 1. The distinguished tragic poet, was the son of Mnesarchus and Clito, and is said to have been born at Salamis, B.C. 480, on the very day that the Greeks defeated the Persians off that island, whither his parents had fled from Athens on the invasion of Xerxes. Some writers relate that his parents were in mean circumstances, and his mother is represented by Aristophanes as a herb-seller, and not a very honest one either; but much weight can not be accorded to these statements. It is more probable that his family was respectable. We are told that the poet, when a boy, was cup-bearer to a chorus of noble Athenians at the Thargelian festival, an office for which nobility of blood was requisite. We know also that he was taught rhetoric by Prodicus, who was certainly not moderate in his terms for instruction, and who was in the habit of seeking his pupils among youths of high rank. It is said that the future distinction of Euripides was predicted by an oracle, promising that he should be crowned with "sacred garlands," in consequence of which his father had him trained to gymnastic exercises; and we learn that, while yet a boy, he won the prize at the Eleusinian and Theban contests, and offered himself, when seventeen years old, as a candidate at the Olympic games, but was not admitted because of some doubt about his age. But he soon abandoned gymnastic pursuits, and studied the art of painting, not, as we learn, without success. To philosophy and literature he devoted himself with much interest and energy, studying physics under Anaxagoras, and rhetoric, as we have already seen, under Prodicus. He lived on intimate terms with Socrates, and traces of the teaching of Anaxagoras have been remarked in many passages of his plays. He is said to have written a tragedy at the age of eighteen; but the first play, which is exhibited in his own name, was the Peliades, when he was twenty-five years of age (B.C. 455). In 441 he gained for the first time the first prize, and he continued to exhibit plays until 408, the date of the Orestes. Soon after this he left Athens for the court of Archelaüs, king of Macedonia, his reasons for which step can only be matter of conjecture. Traditionary scandal has ascribed it to his disgust at the intrigue of his wife with Cephisophon, and the ridicule which was showered upon him in consequence by the comic poets. But the whole story has been refuted by modern writers. Other causes more probably led him to accept an invitation from Archelaüs, at whose court the highest honors awaited him. The attacks of Aristophanes and others had probably not been without their effect; and he must have been aware that his philosophical tenets were regarded with considerable suspicion. He died in Macedonia in 406, at the age of seventy-five. Most testimonies agree in stating that he was torn in pieces by the king's dogs, which, according to some, were set upon him through envy by Arrhidæus and Crateuas, two rival poets. The regret of Sophocles for his death is said to have been so great, that at the representation of his next play he made his actors appear uncrowned. The accounts which we find in some writers of the profligacy of Euripides are mere idle scandal, and scarcely worthy of serious refutation. Nor does there appear to be any better foundation for that other charge which has been brought against him, of hatred to the female sex. This is said to have been occasioned by the infidelity of his wife; but, as has been already remarked, this tale does not deserve credit. He was a man of a serious and austere temper; and it was in consequence of this that the charge probably originated. It is certain that the poet who drew such characters as Antigone, Iphigenia, and, above all, Alcestis, was not blind to the gentleness, the strong affection, the self-abandoning devotedness of women. With respect to the world and the Deity, he seems to have adopted the doctrines of Anaxagoras, not unminged, apparently, with pantheistic views. Vid. ANAXAGORAS. To class him with atheists, as some have done, is undoubtedly unjust. At the same time, it must be confessed that we look in vain in his plays for the high faith of Æschylus; nor can we fail to admit that the pupil of Anaxagoras could not sympathize with the popular religious system around him, nor throw himself cordially into it. He frequently altered in the most arbitrary manner the ancient legends. Thus, in the Orestes, Menelaüs comes before us as a selfish coward, and Helen as a worthless wanton; in the Helena, the notion of Stesichorus is adopted, that the heroine was never carried to Troy at all, and that it was a mere εἰδωλον of her for which the Greeks and Trojans fought; Andromache, the widow of Hector and slave of Neoptolemus, seems almost to forget the past in her quarrel with Hermione and the perils of her present situation; and Electra, married by the policy of Ægisthus to a peasant, scolds her husband for inviting guests to dine without regard to the ill-prepared state of the larder. In short, with Euripides tragedy is brought down into the sphere of every-day life; men are represented, according to the remark of Aristotle, not as they ought to be, but as they are; and under the names of the ancient heroes, the characters of his own time are set before us; it is not Medea, or Iphigenia, or Alcestis that is speaking, but abstractedly a mother, a daughter, or a wife. All this, indeed, gave fuller scope, perhaps, for the exhibition of passion and for those scenes of tenderness and pathos in which Euripides especially excelled; and it will serve also to account, in great measure, for the preference given to his plays by the practical Socrates, who is said to have never entered the theatre unless when they were acted, as well as for the admiration felt for him by Menander and Philemon, and other poets of the new comedy. The most serious defects in his tragedies, artistically speaking, are, his constant employment of the "Deus ex machina;" the disconnection of the choral odes from the subject of the play; the extremely awkward and formal character of his prologues; and the frequent introduction of frigid γῶμαι and of philosophical disquisitions, making Medea talk like a sophist, and Hecuba like a free-thinker, and aiming rather at subtlety than simplicity. On the same principles on which he brought his subjects and characters to the level of common life, he adopted also in his style the every-day mode of speaking. According to some accounts, he wrote, in all, seventy-five plays; according to others, ninety-two. Of these, eighteen are extant, if we omit the Rhesus, which is probably spurious. A list is subjoined of the extant plays of Euripides, with their dates, ascertained or probable: Alcestis, B.C. 438. This play was brought out as the last of a tetralogy, and stood, therefore, in the place of a satyræ drama, to which indeed it bears, in some parts, great similarity, particularly in the representation of Hercules in his cups. Medea, 431. Hippolytus Coronifer, 428, gained the first prize. Hecuba, exhibited before 423. Heracleida, about 421. Supplices, about 421. Ion, of uncertain date. Hercules Furens, of uncertain date. Andromache, about 420-417. Troades, 415. Electra, about 415-418. Helena, 412. Iphigenia among the Tauri, of uncertain date. Orestes, 408. Phænissæ, of uncertain date. Bacchæ: this play was apparently written for representation in Macedonia, and therefore at a very late period of the life of Euripides. Iphigenia at Aulis: this play, together with the Bacchæ and the Alcæmon, was brought out at Athens, after the poet's death, by the younger Euripides. Cyclops, of uncertain date: it is interesting as the only extant specimen of the Greek satyric drama. Besides the plays, there are extant five letters, purporting to have been written by Euripides, but they are spurious. Editions: By Musgrave, Oxford, 1778; by Beck, Leipzig, 1778-88; by Matthiæ, Leipzig, 1813-29; and a variorum edition, Glasgow, 1821, 9 vols. 8vo. Of separate plays there have been many editions, e. g., by Porson, Elmsley, Valekenær, Monk, Pflugk, and Hermann.—2 The youngest of the three sons of the above. After the death of his father he brought out three of his plays at the great Dionysia, viz., the Alcæmon (no longer extant), the Iphigenia at Aulis, and the Bacchæ.

EURIPUS (Εὐρίπος) any part of the sea where the ebb and flow of the tide were remarkably violent, is the name especially of the narrow strait which separates Eubœa from Bœotia, in which the ancients asserted that the sea ebbed and flowed seven times in the day. The extraordinary tides of the Euripus have been noticed by modern observers; the water sometimes runs as much as eight miles an hour. At Chalcis there was a bridge over the Euripus, uniting Eubœa with the main land.

EURŌMUS (Εὐρώμος: now Jaklyis), a small town of Caria, at the foot of Mount Grion (a ridge parallel to Mount Latmus), in the conventus juridicus of Alabanda. It lay eight English miles north-west of Mylasa.

EURŌPA (Εὐρώπη), according to the Iliad (xiv, 321) a daughter of Phœnix, but according to the common tradition a daughter of the Phœnician king Agenôr. Her surpassing beauty charmed Jupiter (Zeus), who assumed the form of a bull and mingled with the herd as Europa and her maidens were sporting on the sea-shore. Encouraged by the tameness of the animal, Europa ventured to mount his back; whereupon Jupiter (Zeus) rushed into the sea and swam with her in safety to Crete. Here she became by Jupiter (Zeus) the mother of Minos, Radamanthys, and Sarpêdon. She afterward married Asterion, king of Crete, who brought up the children whom she had had by the king of the gods.

EURŌPA (Εὐρώπη), one of the three divisions of the ancient world. The name is not found in the Iliad and Odyssey, and first occurs in the Homeric hymn to Apollo (251), but even there it does not indicate the continent, but simply the main land of Hellas proper, in opposition to Peloponnesus and the neighboring islands. Herodotus is the first writer who uses it in the sense of one of the divisions of the world. The origin of the name is doubtful; but the most probable of the numerous conjectures is that which supposes that the Asiatic Greeks called it Europâ (from εἶρός, "broad," and the root ὄπ, "to see"), from the wide extent of its coast. Most of the ancients supposed the name to be derived from Europa, the daughter of Agenor. The boundaries of Europe on the east differed at various periods. In earlier times the River Phasis was usually supposed to be its boundary and sometimes even the Araxes and the Caspian Sea: but at a later period the River Tannais and the Palus Mæotis were usually regarded as the boundaries between Asia and Europe. The north of Europe was little known to the ancients, but it was generally believed, at least in later times, that it was bounded on the north by the Ocean.

EURŌPUS. Vid. TITARESIUS.

EURŌPUS (Εὐρώπος). 1. A city of Caria, afterward named Idrias.—2. (Now Yerabolus, or Kulat-el-Nejin?), a city in the district of Cyrrhæstia in Syria, on the western bank of the Euphrates, a few miles south of Zeugma; called after the town of the same name in Macedonia.—3. Europus was the earlier name of Dura Nicænoris in Mesopotamia; and, 4. It was also given by Seleucus Nicætor to Bhangæ in Media. Vid. ARSACIA.

EURŌTAS (Εὐρώτας). 1. (Now Basilipotamo), the chief river in Laconia, but not navigable, rises in Mount Borëum in Arcadia, then disappears under the earth, rises again near Seiritis, and flows southward, passing Sparta on the east, through a narrow and fruitful valley, into the Laconian Gulf.—2. Vid. TITARESIUS.

[EURŌTAS (Εὐρώτας), son of Myles, grandson of Lelex (according to Apollodorus, son of Lelex), father of Sparta, who married Lacedæmon: is said to have led, by means of a canal, the waters that had stagnated in Laconia into the sea, and to have called the stream that was thus formed the EURŌTAS.]

[EURYADES (Εὐρυάδης), one of the suitors of Penelope, slain by Telemachus.]

[EURYALE (Εὐρύαλη). 1. One of the Gorgons.—2. Daughter of Minos or Minyas, mother of Orion by Neptune (Poseidon)—3. A queen of the Amazons, who aided Æetes against the Argonauts.]

EURŪĀLUS (Εὐρύαλος). 1. Son of Mecisteus, one of the Argonauts, and of the Epigoni, accompanied Diomedes to Troy, where he slew several Trojans.—2. One of the suitors of Hippodamia.—3. A young Phæacian hero, victor in wrestling; he presented Ulysses with a beautiful sword.—4. Son-of Opheltes, a companion of Æneas, famed for his strong friendship for Nisus.]

EURYANASSA. Vid. PELOPS.

EURŪBĀTES (Εὐρυβάτης). 1. Called Eribotes by Latin writers, son of Teleon, and one of the Argonauts.—2. The herald of Ulysses, whom he followed to Troy.

EURŪĀTUS (Εὐρύβατος), an Ephesian whom Cræsus sent with a large sum of money to the Peloponnesus to hire mercenaries for him in his war with Cyrus. He, however, went over to Cyrus, and betrayed the whole matter to him. In consequence of this treachery, his name passed into a proverb among the Greeks.

EURŪBĀ (Εὐρυβία), daughter of Pontus and Terra (Ga), mother by Crius of Astræus, Pallas, and Perses.

EURYBĀDES. Vid. THEMISTOCLES.

EURYCLĒA (Εὐρύκλεια), daughter of Ops, was purchased by Laertes and brought up Telemachus. When Ulysses returned home, she recognized him by a scar, and afterward faithfully assisted him against the suitors.

[EURYCLĒS (Εὐρυκλής). 1. A ventriloquist and diviner at Athens (ἔγγραστρίμυθος).—2. A Spartan architect who constructed a celebrated bath at Corinth.]

[EURYCRATES (Εὐρυκράτης). 1. Son of King Polydorus, king of Sparta, the twelfth of the Agid line: his son and successor was Anaxander; his grandson was—2. EURYCRATES II., called also Euryeratidas, reigned during the earlier and disastrous part of the war with Tegea.]

[EURYDÁMAS (Εὐρυδάμας). 1. Son of Irus and Demionassa, one of the Argonauts; according to Apollonius Rhodius he was a son of Ctineus.—2. A Trojan skilled in the interpretation of dreams, whose two sons, Abas and Polyidus, were slain before Troy by Diomedes.—3. One of the suitors of Penelope, slain by Ulysses.]

EURÝDICE (Εὐρυδίκη). 1. Wife of Orpheus. vid. ORPHEUS.—2. An Illyrian princess, wife of Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, and mother of the famous Philip.—3. An Illyrian, wife of Philip of Macedonia, and mother of Cynane or Cynna.—4. Daughter of Amyntas, son of Perdiccas III., king of Macedonia, and Cynane, daughter of Philip. After the death of her mother in Asia (vid. CYNANE), Perdiccas gave her in marriage to the king Arrhidæus. She was a woman of a masculine spirit, and entirely ruled her weak husband. On her return to Europe with her husband, she became involved in war with Polysperchon and Olympias, but she was defeated in battle, taken prisoner, and compelled by Olympias to put an end to her life, B.C. 317.—5. Daughter of Antipater, and wife of Ptolemy the son of Lagus. She was the mother of three sons, viz., Ptolemy Ceraunus, Meleager, and a third (whose name is not mentioned); and of two daughters, Ptolemæis, afterward married to Demetrius Poliorcetes, and Lysandra, the wife of Agathoeles, son of Lysimachus.—6. An Athenian, of a family descended from the great Miltiades. She was first married to Ophellus, the conqueror of Cyrene, and after his death returned to Athens, where she married Demetrius Poliorcetes, on occasion of his first visit to that city.

EURÝLÓCHUS (Εὐρύλοχος). 1. Companion of Ulysses in his wanderings, was the only one that escaped from the house of Circe, when his friends were metamorphosed into swine. Another personage of the same name is mentioned among the sons of Ægyptus.—2. A Spartan commander in the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 426, defeated and slain by Demosthenes at Olpæ.—3. Of Lusiæ in Arcadia, an officer in the Greek army of Cyrus the younger; on one occasion protected Xenophon, whose shield-bearer had deserted him.—4. A Macedonian, son of Arseas, detected a conspiracy against Alexander the Great.]

EURÝMÉDON (Εὐρυμέδων). 1. One of the Cabiri, son of Vulcan (Hephæstus) and Cabiro, and brother of Aleon.—2. An attendant of Nestor.—3. Son of Ptolemæus, and charioteer of Agamemnon.—4. Son of Thucles, an Athenian general in the Peloponnesian war. He was one of the commanders in the expedition to Coreyra, B.C. 428, and also in the expedition to Sicily, 425. In 414 he was appointed, in conjunction with Demosthenes, to the command of the second Syracusan armament, and fell in the first of the two sea-fights in the harbor of Syracuse.

EURÝMÉDON (Εὐρυμέδων: now Kapri-Su), a small river in Pamphylia, navigable as far up as the city of ASPENDUS, through which it flowed; celebrated for the victory which Cimon gained over the Persians on its banks (B.C. 469).

[EURÝMÉDUSA (Εὐρυμέδουσα), a female slave of the Phæacian king Alcinoüs, attendant upon Nausicaa.]

EURÝMÉNÆ (Εὐρυμέναι), a town in Magnesia in Thessaly, east of Ossa.

EURÝNÓME (Εὐρυνόμη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus. When Vulcan (Hephæstus) was expelled by Juno (Hera) from Olympus, Eurynome and Thetis received him in the bosom of the sea. Before the time of Saturn (Cronos) and Rhea, Eurynome and Ophion had ruled in Olympus over the Titans.—2. A surname of Diana (Artemis) at Phigalea in Arcadia, where she was represented half woman and half fish.—[3. An old and faithful female attendant in the house of Ulysses, mentioned in the Odyssey.]

[EURÝNOMOS (Εὐρύνομος). 1. A centaur slain by Dryas at the nuptials of Pirithous.—2. Son of the Ithacan Ægyptius, one of the suitors of Penelope.]

[EURÝPHÁESSA (Εὐρυφάεσσα), sister and wife of Hyperion; by him mother of Helios, Selene, and Eös (Aurora).]

EURÝPHON (Εὐρυφών), a celebrated physician of Cnidos in Caria, was a contemporary of Hippocrates, but older. He is quoted by Galen, who says that he was considered to be the author of the ancient medical work entitled Κνίδαι Γνώμαι, and also that some persons attributed to him several works included in the Hippocratic Collection.

EURÝPHON, otherwise called EURÝTÍON (Εὐρυπών, Εὐρυτίων), a grandson of Procles, was the third king of that house at Sparta, and thenceforward gave it the name of Eurypontida.

EURÝPYLOS (Εὐρύπυλος). 1. Son of Eumæon and Ops, appears in different traditions as king either of Ormenion, or Hyria, or Cyrene. In the Iliad he is represented as having come from Ormenion to Troy with forty ships. He slew many Trojans, and when wounded by Paris he was nursed and cured by Patroclus. Among the heroes of Hyria, he is mentioned as a son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Celæno, who went to Libya, where he ruled in the country afterward called Cyrene, and there became connected with the Argonauts. He married Sterope, the daughter of Helios, by whom he became the father of Lyeaon and Leucippus.—2. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Astypalæa, king of Cos, was killed by Hercules, who, on his return from Troy, landed in Cos, and, being taken for a pirate, was attacked by its inhabitants. According to another tradition, Hercules attacked the island of Cos in order to obtain possession of Chalciope, the daughter of Eurypylus, whom he loved.—3. Son of Telephus and Astyoche, king of Mysia or Cilicia, was induced by the presents which Priam sent to his mother or wife to assist the Trojans against the Greeks. Eurypylus killed Machaon, but was himself slain by Neoptolemus.

EURÝSÁCES (Εὐρυσάκης), son of the Telamonian Ajax and Tecmessa, named after the "broad shield" of his father. An Athenian tradition related that Eurysaces and his brother Phileus had given up to the Athenians the island of Salamis, which they had inherited from their grandfather, and that the two brothers received in return the Attic franchise. Eurysaces was honored like his father, at Athens, with an altar.

EURYSTHĒNES (Εὐρυσθένης) and PROELES (Προκλήης), the twin sons of Aristodemus, were born, according to the common account before, but according to the genuine Spartan story, after their father's return to Peloponnesus and occupation of his allotment of Laconia. He died immediately after the birth of his children, and had not even time to decide which of the two should succeed him. The mother professed to be unable to name the elder, and the Lacedæmonians applied to Delphi, and were instructed to make them both kings, but give the greater honor to the elder. The difficulty thus remaining was at last removed at the suggestion of Panites, a Messenian, by watching which of the children was first washed and fed by the mother; and the first rank was accordingly given to Eurystheus and retained by his descendants. From these two brothers the two royal families in Sparta were descended, and were called respectively the Eurysthenidæ and Proclidæ. The former were also called the Agide from Agis, son of Eurystheus; and the latter Eurypontidæ from Eurypon, grandson of Procles.

EURYTHEUS. Vid. HERCULES.

[EURYTION (Εὐρυτίων). 1. Son of Irus and Deionassa, and grandson of Aetor, one of the Argonauts.—2. One of the centaurs, escaped from the fight with Hercules, but was afterward slain by that hero.—3. Son of Lyeaon, brother of Pandarus, a celebrated archer; accompanied Æneas on his voyage to Italy.]

EURYTUS (Εὐρυτός). 1. Son of Melaneus and Stratonice, was king of Cæhalia, probably the Thessalian town of this name. He was a skillful archer and married to Antioche, by whom he became the father of Iole, Iphitus, Molion or Deion, Clytius, and Toxeus. He was proud of his skill in using the bow, and is said to have instructed even Hercules in his art. He offered his daughter Iole as a prize to him who should conquer him and his sons in shooting with the bow. Hercules won the prize, but Eurytus and his sons, with the exception of Iphitus, refused to give up Iole, because they feared lest Hercules should kill the children he might have by her. Hercules accordingly marched against Cæhalia with an army, took the place, and killed Eurytus and his sons. According to Homer, on the other hand, Eurytus was killed by Apollo, whom he presumed to rival in using the bow. (Od. viii., 226.)—2. Son of Aetor and Molione of Elis. Vid. MOLIONES.—3. Son of Mercury (Hermes) and Antiaura, and brother of Echion, was one of the Argonauts.—4. An eminent Pythagorean philosopher, a disciple of Philolaus.

EUSEBIUS (Εὐσέβιος), surnamed Pamphili to commemorate his devoted friendship for Pamphilus, bishop of Cæsarea. Eusebius was born in Palestine about A.D. 264, was made bishop of Cæsarea 315, and died about 340. He had a strong leaning toward the Arians, though he signed the creed of the Council of Niceæ. He was a man of great learning. His most important works are, 1. The Chronicon (χρονικὸν παντοδαπῆς ιστορίας), a work of great value to us in the study of ancient history. It is in two books. The first, entitled χρονογραφία, contains a sketch of the history of several ancient nations, as the Chaldeans, Assyrians, Medes, Persians, Lydians, Hebrews, and Egyptians. It is chiefly taken from the work of Africanus (vid. AFRICANUS), and gives lists of kings and other magistrates, with short accounts of remarkable events from the creation to the time of Eusebius. The second book consists of synchrological tables, with similar catalogues of rulers and striking occurrences from the time of Abraham to the celebration of Constantine's Vicennalia at Nicomedia, A.D. 327, and at Rome, A. D. 328. The Greek text of the Chronicon is lost, but there is extant part of a Latin translation of it by Jerom, published by Scaliger, Leyden, 1606, of which another enlarged edition appeared at Amsterdam, 1658. There is also extant an Armenian translation, which was discovered at Constantinople, and published by Mai and Zohrab at Milan, 1818, and by Aueher, Venice, 1818.—2. The Præparatio Evangelica (εὐαγγελικῆς ἀποδείξεως παρασκευή) in fifteen books, is a collection of various facts and quotations from old writers, by which it was supposed that the mind would be prepared to receive the evidences of Christianity. This book is almost as important to us in the study of ancient philosophy as the Chronicon is with reference to history, since in it are preserved specimens from the writings of almost every philosopher of any note whose works are not now extant. Edited by R. Stephens, Paris, 1544, and again in 1628, and by F. Viger, Cologne, 1688: [more recently by Heinichen, Lips., 1842, 2 vols. 8vo.]—3. The Demonstratio Evangelica (εὐαγγελικὴ ἀπόδειξις), in twenty books, of which ten are extant, is a collection of evidences, chiefly from the Old Testament, addressed principally to the Jews. This is the completion of the preceding work, giving the arguments which the Præparatio was intended to make the mind ready to receive. Edited with the Præparatio in the editions both of R. Stephens and Viger.—4. The Ecclesiastical History (ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ιστορία), in ten books, containing the history of Christianity from the birth of Christ to the Death of Licinius, A.D. 324. Edited with the other Ecclesiastical historians by Reading, Cambridge, 1720, and separately by Burton, Oxford, 1838, [and by Heinicheu, Lips., 1827, 3 vols. 8vo.]—5. De Martyribus Palæstina, being an account of the persecutions of Diocletian and Maximin from A.D. 303 to 310. It is in one book, and generally found as an appendix to the eighth of the Ecclesiastical History.—6. Against Hierocles Hierocles had advised Diocletian to begin his persecution, and had written two books, called λόγοι φιλαληθείς, comparing our Lord's miracles to those of Apollonius of Tyana. In answering this work, Eusebius reviews the life of Apollonius by Philostratus.—7. Against Marcellus, bishop of Ancyra, in two books.—8. De Ecclesiastica Theologia, a continuation of the former work.—9. De Vita Constantini, four books, a panegyric rather than a biography. It has generally been published with the Ecclesiastical History, but edited separately by Heinichen, 1830.—10. Onomasticon de Locis Hebraicis, a description of the towns and places mentioned in Holy Scripture, arranged in alphabetical order. It was translated into Latin by Jerome.

EUSTATHIUS (Ἐυσθάτιος). 1. Of Cappadocia, a Neo-Platonic philosopher, was a pupil of Iamblichus and Edesius. In A.D. 358 he was sent by Constantius as ambassador to King Sapor, and remained in Persia, where he was treated with the greatest honor.—2. Or EUMATHIUS, probably lived as late as the twelfth century of our era. He wrote a Greek romance in eleven books, still extant, containing an account of the loves of Hysminias and Hysmieue. The tale is wearisome and improbable, and shows no power of invention on the part of its author. Edited by Gaulmin, Paris, 1617, and by Teucher, Lips., 1792.—3. Archbishop of Thessalonica, was a native of Constantinople, and lived during the latter half of the twelfth century. He was a man of great learning, and wrote numerous works, the most important of which is his commentary on the Iliad and Odyssey (Ἰλαρεκκόλα εἰς τὴν Ὀμήρου Ἰλιάδα καὶ Ὀδυσσεύειαν), or rather his collection of extracts from earlier commentators on those two poems. This vast compilation was made from the numerous and extensive works of the Alexandrian grammarians and critics; and as nearly all the works from which Eustathius made his extracts are lost, his commentary is of incalculable value to us. Editions: At Rome, 1542–1550, 4 vols. fol.; at Basle, 1559–60; at Leipzig, 1825–26, containing the commentary on the Odyssey, and at Leipzig, 1827–29, the commentary on the Iliad, in all 7 vols. 4to. There is also extant by Eustathius a commentary on Dionysius Periegetes, which is published with most editions of Dionysius. Eustathius likewise wrote a commentary on Pindar, which seems to be lost.—4. Usually called EUSTATHIUS ROMANUS, a celebrated Græco-Roman jurist, filled various high offices at Constantinople from A.D. 960 to 1000.

EUSTRATIUS (Ἐυστράτιος), one of the latest commentators on Aristotle, lived about the beginning of the twelfth century after Christ, under the Emperor Alexius Comnenus, as metropolitan of Nicæa. Of his writings only two are extant, and these in a very fragmentary state: viz., 1. A Commentary on the second book of the Analytica. 2. A Commentary on the Ethica Nicomachea.

EUTERPE. Vid. MUSE.

[EUTHYCRATES (Ἐυθυκράτης), a Greek statuary, probably about B.C. 300; a son and the most distinguished pupil of Lysippus.]

EUTHYDEMUS (Ἐυθύδημος). A sophist, was born at Chios, and migrated, with his brother Dionodorus, to Thuri in Italy. Being exiled thence, they came to Athens, where they resided many years. The pretensions of Euthydemus and his brother are exposed by Plato in the dialogue which bears the name of the former.—2. King of Bactria, was a native of Magnesia. We know nothing of the circumstances attending his elevation to the sovereignty of Bactria. He extended his power over the neighboring provinces, so as to become the founder of the greatness of the Bactrian monarchy. His dominions were invaded about B.C. 212, by Antiochus the Great, with whom he eventually concluded a treaty of peace.

EUTHYMUS (Ἐυθύμος), a hero of Locri in Italy son of Astylos or of the river-god Cænius. He was famous for his strength and skill in boxing, and delivered the town of Temesa from the evil spirit Polites, to whom a fair maiden was sacrificed every year. Euthymus himself disappeared at an advanced age in the River Cænius.

EUTŌCIUS (Ἐυτόκιος), of Ascalon, the commentator on Apollonius of Perga and on Archimedes, lived about A.D. 560. His commentaries are printed in the editions of APOLLONIUS and ARCHIMEDES.

EUTRĀPĒLUS, P. VOLUMNIUS, a Roman knight, obtained the surname of Eutranelus (Ἐυτράπελος) on account of his liveliness and wit. He was an intimate friend of Antony, and a companion of his pleasures and debauches. Cytharis, the mistress of Antony, was originally the freedwoman and mistress of Volumnius Eutranelus, whence we find her called Volumnia, and was surrendered to Antony by his friend. Eutranelus is mentioned by Horace (Epist., i., 18, 31).

EUTRĒSĪ (Ἐυτρήσιοι), the inhabitants of a district in Arcadia, north of Megalopolis.

EUTRĒSIS (Ἐυτρήσις), a small town in Bœotia, between Thespiæ and Platæa, with a temple and oracle of Apollo, who hence had the surname Eutrésites.

EUTRŌPĪTIS. 1. A eunuch, the favorite of Arcadius, became the virtual governor of the East on the death of Rufinus, A.D. 395. He was consul in 399, but in that year was deprived of his power by the intrigues of the Empress Eudoxia and Gainas the Goth; he was first banished to Cyprus, was shortly afterward recalled, and put to death at Chalcædon. The poet Claudian wrote an invective against Eutropius.—2. A Roman historian, held the office of a secretary under Constantine the Great, was patronized by Julian the Apostate, whom he accompanied in the Persian expedition, and was alive in the reign of Valentinian and Valens. He is the author of a brief compendium of Roman history in ten books, from the foundation of the city to the accession of Valens, A.D. 364, to whom it is inscribed. In drawing up this abridgment Eutropius appears to have consulted the best authorities, and to have executed his task in general with care. The style is in perfect good taste and keeping with the nature of the undertaking, being plain, precise, and simple. The best editions are by Tzschucke, Lips., 1796, and by Grosse, Hal., 1813.

EUTYCHIDES (Ἐυτυχίδης), of Sicyon, a statuary, and a disciple of Lysippus, flourished B.C. 300.

EUXINUS PONTUS. Vid. PONTUS EUXINUS.

EVADNE (Ἐβάδνη). 1. Daughter of Neptune (Poseidon) and Pitane, who was brought up by the Arcadian king Æpytus, and became by Apollo the mother of Iamus.—2. Daughter of Iphis (hence called Iphias) or Philax, and wife of Capaneus. For details, vid. CAPANEUS.

EVAGŌRAS (Ἐβγόρας), king of Salamis in Cyprus. He was sprung from a family which claimed descent from Teucer, the reputed founder of Salamis; and his ancestors appear to have been, during a long period, the hereditary rulers of that city under the supremacy of Persia.

They had, however, been expelled by a Phœnician exile, who obtained the sovereignty for himself, and transmitted it to his descendants. Evagoras succeeded in recovering his hereditary kingdom, and putting the reigning tyrant to death, about B.C. 410. His rule was distinguished for its mildness and equity, and he greatly increased the power of Salamis, especially by the formation of a powerful fleet. He gave a friendly reception to Conon, when the latter took refuge at Salamis after the defeat of the Athenians at Ægospotami, 405; and it was at his intercession that the King of Persia allowed Conon the support of the Phœnician fleet. But his growing power excited the jealousy of the Persian court, and at length war was declared against him by Artaxerxes. Evagoras received the assistance of an Athenian fleet under Chabrias, and at first met with great success; but the fortune of war afterward turned against him, and he was glad to conclude a peace with Persia, by which he resigned his conquests in Cyprus, but was allowed to retain possession of Salamis, with the title of king. This war was brought to a close in 385. Evagoras was assassinated in 374, together with his eldest son Pnytagoras. He was succeeded by his son Nicoteles. There is still extant an oration of Isocrates in praise of Evagoras, addressed to his son Nicoteles.

EVAGRIUS (Εὐάγριος), of Epiphania in Syria, born about A.D. 536, was by profession a "scholasticus" (advocate or pleader), and probably practised at Antioch. He wrote An Ecclesiastical History, still extant, which extends from A. D. 431 to 594. It is published with the other ecclesiastical historians by Reading, Camb., 1720.

EVANDER (Εὐάνδρος). 1. Son of Mereury (Hermes) by an Arcadian nymph, called Themis or Niostrata, and in Roman traditions Carmenta or Tiburtis. About sixty years before the Trojan war, Evander is said to have led a Pelasgian colony from Pallantium in Arcadia into Italy, and there to have built a town, Pallantium, on the Tiber, at the foot of the Palatine Hill, which town was subsequently incorporated with Rome. Evander taught his neighbors milder laws and the arts of peace and of social life, and especially the art of writing, with which he himself had been made acquainted by Hercules, and music; he also introduced among them the worship of the Lycæan Pan, of Ceres (Demeter), Neptune (Poseidon), and Hercules. Virgil (Æn., viii, 51) represents Evander as still alive at the time when Æneas arrived in Italy, and as forming an alliance with him against the Latins. Evander was worshipped at Pallantium in Arcadia as a hero. At Rome he had an altar at the foot of the Aventine.—2. A Phœcian, was the pupil and successor of Laeydes as the head of the Academic School at Athens, about B.C. 215.

[EVANGELUS (Εὐάγγελος). 1. A Greek comic poet of the new comedy, a fragment of one of whose plays is preserved by Athenæus; edited by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. ii, p. 1173, edit. minor.—2. A slave of Pericles, who distinguished himself by his abilities; he is said to have written a work on the science of war (Τακτικά), which was highly prized by Philo-pœmen.]

EVĒNUS (Εὐήνωσ). 1. Son of Mars (Ares) and Demonice, and father of Marpessa. For details, vid. MARPESSA.—2. Two elegiac poets of Paros. One of these poets, though it is uncertain whether the elder or the younger, was a contemporary of Socrates, whom he is said to have instructed in poetry; and Plato in several passages refers to Evenus, somewhat ironically, as at once a sophist or philosopher and a poet. There are sixteen epigrams in the Greek Anthology bearing the name of Evenus, but it is difficult to determine which of them should be assigned to the elder and which to the younger Evenus.

EVĒNUS (Εὐήνωσ; now Fidhari). 1. Formerly called Lycormas, rises in Mount Ceta, and flows with a rapid stream through Ætolia into the sea, one hundred and twenty stadia west of Antirrhium.—2. (Now Sandarli), a river of Mysia, rising in Mount Temnus, flowing south through Æolis, and falling into the Sinus Elaiticus near Pitane. The city of Adramyttium, which stood nearly due west of its source, was supplied with water from it by an aqueduct.

EVERGĒTES (Εὐεργέτης), the "Benefactor," a title of honor, frequently conferred by the Greek states upon those from whom they had received benefits. It was assumed by many of the Greek kings in Egypt and elsewhere. Vid. PROLEMÆUS.

EVĪUS (Εἰῖος), an epithet of Bacchus, given him from the cheering and animating cry εἰα, εἰοῖ (Lat. evoe), in the festivals of the god.

EXĀDĪUS (Ἐξάδιος), one of the Lapithæ, fought at the nuptials of Pirithoüs.

EXSUPERANTIUS, JULIUS, a Roman historian, who lived perhaps about the fifth or sixth century of our era. He is the author of a short tract entitled De Marii, Lepidi, ac Sertorii bellis civilibus, which many suppose to have been abridged from the Histories of Sallust. It is appended to several editions of Sallust.

EZIONGĒBER. Vid. BERENICE, No. 1.

F.

FĀBĀRIS or FARFĀRUS (now Farfara), a small river in Italy, in the Sabine territory, between Reate and Cures.

FABĀTUS, L. ROSCĪUS, one of Cæsar's lieutenants in the Gallic war, and prætor in B.C. 49. He espoused Pompey's party, and was twice sent with proposals of accommodation to Cæsar. He was killed in the battle at Mutina, B.C. 43.

FABĀTUS CALPURNIUS, a Roman knight, accused in A.D. 64, but escaped punishment. He was grandfather to Calpurnia, wife of the younger Pliny, many of whose letters are addressed to him.

FABĒRĪUS. 1. A debtor of M. Cicero.—2. One of the private secretaries of C. Julius Cæsar.

FABĪA, two daughters of M. Fabius Ambustus. The elder was married to Ser. Sulpicius, a patrician, and one of the military tribunes B.C. 376, and the younger to the plebeian C. Licinius Stolo.

FABĪA GENS, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, which traced its origin to Hercules and the Arcadian Evander. The Fabii occupy a prominent part in history soon after the commencement of the republic; and three brothers belonging to the gens are said to have been invested with seven successive consulships, from B.C. 485 to 479. The house derived its greatest lustre from the patriotic courage and tragic fate of the three hundred and six Fabii in the battle on the Cremera, B.C. 477. Vid. VIBULANUS. The principal families of this gens bore the names of AMBUSTUS, BUTEO, DORSEO, LABEO, MAXIMUS, PICTOR, and VIBULANUS.

FABIĀNUS, PAFĪRĪUS, a Roman rhetorician and philosopher in the time of Tiberius and Caligula. He wrote works on philosophy and physics, which are referred to by Seneca and Pliny.

FABRATĒRIA (Fabratorius: now Falvaterra), a town in Latium, on the right bank of the Tiber, originally belonged to the Volseians, but was subsequently colonized by the Romans.

FABRICĪ belonged originally to the Hernician town of Aletrium, where some of this name lived as late as the time of Cicero. I. C. FABRICIUS LUCIŪS, was probably the first of his family who quitted Aletrium and settled at Rome. He was one of the most popular heroes in the Roman annals, and, like Cincinnatus and Curius, is the representative of the purity and honesty of the good old times. In his first consulship, B.C. 282, he defeated the Lucanians, Bruttians, and Samnites, gained a rich booty, and brought into the treasury more than four hundred talents. Fabricius probably served as legate in the unfortunate campaign against Pyrrhus in 280, and at its close he was one of the Roman ambassadors sent to Pyrrhus at Tarentum to negotiate a ransom or exchange of prisoners. The conduct of Fabricius on this occasion formed one of the most celebrated stories in Roman history, and was embellished in every possible way by subsequent writers. So much, however, seems certain, that Pyrrhus used every effort to gain the favor of Fabricius; that he offered him the most splendid presents, and endeavored to persuade him to enter into his service, and accompany him to Greece; but that the sturdy Roman was proof against all his seductions, and rejected all his offers. On the renewal of the war in the following year (279), Fabricius again served as legate, and shared in the defeat at the battle of Asculum. In 278 Fabricius was consul a second time, and had the conduct of the war against Pyrrhus. The king was anxious for peace; and the generosity with which Fabricius sent back to Pyrrhus the traitor who had offered to poison him, afforded an opportunity for opening negotiations, which resulted in the evacuation of Italy by Pyrrhus. Fabricius then subdued the allies of the king in the south of Italy. He was censor in 275, and distinguished himself by the severity with which he attempted to repress the growing taste for luxury. His censorship is particularly celebrated from his expelling from the senate P. Cornelius Rufinus on account of his possessing ten pounds' weight of silver plate. The love of luxury and the degeneracy of morals which had already commenced, brought out still more prominently the simplicity of life and the integrity of character which distinguished Fabricius as well as his contemporary Curius Dentatus; and ancient writers love to tell of the frugal way in which they lived on their hereditary farms, and how they refused the rich presents which the Samnite ambassadors offered them.

Fabricius died as poor as he had lived; he left no dowry for his daughters, which the senate, however, furnished; and, in order to pay the greatest possible respect to his memory, the state interred him within the pomerium, although this was forbidden by the Twelve Tables.—2. L. FABRICIUS, eurator viarum in B.C. 62, built a new bridge of stone, which connected the city with the island in the Tiber, and which was, after him, called pons Fabricius. The name of its author is still seen on the remnants of the bridge, which now bears the name of ponte quattro capi.—3. Q. FABRICIUS, tribune of the plebs 57, proposed, as early as the month of January of that year, that Cicero should be recalled from exile; but this attempt was frustrated by P. Clodius by armed force.

FADUS, CUSPIS, appointed by the Emperor Claudius procurator of Judæa in A.D. 44. He was succeeded by Tiberius Alexander.

FÆSŪLÆ (Fæsulanus: now Fiesole), a city of Etruria, situated on a hill three miles northeast of Florence, was probably not one of the twelve cities of the League. Sulla sent to it a military colony; and it was the head-quarters of Catiline's army. There are still to be seen the remains of its ancient walls, of a theatre, &c.

FALACRINE or FALACRINUM, a Sabine town at the foot of the Apennines, on the Via Salaria, between Asculum and Reate, the birth-place of the Emperor Vespasian.

FALĒRII or FALĒRIUM, a town in Etruria, situated on a steep and lofty height near Mount Soracte, was an ancient Pelasgic town, and is said to have been founded by Halesus, who settled with a body of colonists from Argos. Its inhabitants were called FALISI, and were regarded by many as of the same race as the Æqui, whence we find them often called Æqui Falisei. Falerii afterward became one of the twelve Etruscan cities; but its inhabitants continued to differ from the rest of the Etruscans both in their language and customs in the time of Augustus. After a long struggle with Rome, the Faliseans yielded to Camillus, B.C. 394. They subsequently joined their neighbors several times in warring against Rome, but were finally subdued. At the close of the first Punic war, 241, they again revolted. The Romans now destroyed Falerii, and compelled the Faliseans to build a new town in the plain. The ruins of the new city are to be seen at Falleri, while the remains of the more ancient one are at Civita Castellana. The ancient town of Falerii was afterward colonized by the Romans under the name of "Colonia Etruscorum Falisea," or "Colonia Junonia Faliscorum," but it never became again a place of importance. The ancient town was celebrated for its worship of Juno Curitis or Quiritis, and it was in honor of her that the Romans founded the colony Minerva and Janus were also worshipped in the town. Falerii had extensive linen manufactories, and its white cows were prized at Rome as victims for sacrifice.

FALERNUS AGER, a district in the north of Campania, extending from the Massic hills to the River Volturnus. It produced some of the finest wine in Italy, which was reckoned only second to the wine of Setia. Its choicest variety was called Faustianum. It became fit for drinking in ten years, and might be used when twenty years old.

FALESIA PORTUS, a harbor in Etruria, south of Populonium, opposite the island Ilva.

FALISCI. Vid. FALERII.

FALISCUS, GRATIUS, a contemporary of Ovid, and the author of a poem upon the chase, entitled Cynegeticon Liber, in five hundred and forty hexameter lines. Printed in Burmann's and Wernsdorff's Poet. Lat. Min.; [and with Olympius Nemesianus, by Stern, Hææ, 1832, 8vo.]

FANNIA. 1. A woman of Minturnæ, who hospitably entertained Marius when he came to Minturnæ in his flight, B.C. 88, though he had formerly pronounced her guilty of adultery.—2. The second wife of Helvidius Priscus.

FANNIUS. 1. C., tribune of the plebs, B.C. 187.—2. L., deserted from the Roman army in 84, with L. Magius, and went over to Mithradates, whom they persuaded to enter into negotiations with Sertorius in Spain. Fannius afterward commanded a detachment of the army of Mithradates against Lucullus.—3. C., one of the persons who signed the accusation brought against P. Clodius in 61. In 59 he was mentioned by L. Vettius as an accomplice in the alleged conspiracy against Pompey.—4. C., tribune of the plebs 59, opposed the lex agraria of Cæsar. He belonged to Pompey's party, and in 49 went as prætor to Sicily.—5. C., a contemporary of the younger Pliny, the author of a work, very popular at the time, on the deaths of persons executed or exiled by Nero.

FANNIUS CÆPIO. Vid. CÆPIO.

FANNIUS STRABO. Vid. STRABO.

FANNIUS QUADRATUS. Vid. QUADRATUS.

FANUM FORTUNÆ (now Fano), an important town in Umbria, at the mouth of the Metaurus, with a celebrated temple of Fortuna, whence the town derived its name. Augustus sent to it a colony of veterans, and it was then called "Colonia Julia Fanestrin." Here was a triumphal arch in honor of Augustus.

FANFÆRUS. Vid. FABARIS.

FASCINUS, an early Latin divinity, and identical with Mutinus or Tutinus. He was worshipped as the protector from sorcery, witchcraft, and evil dæmons; and represented in the form of a phallus, the genuine Latin for which is fascinum, as this symbol was believed to be most efficacious in averting all evil influences.

FAULA or FAUNA, according to some, a concubine of Hercules in Italy; according to others, the wife or sister of Faunus. Vid. FAUNUS.

FAUNUS, son of Picus, grandson of Saturnus, and father of Latinus, was the third in the series of the kings of the Laurentes. Faunus acts a very prominent part in the mythical history of Latium, and was in later times worshipped in two distinct capacities: first, as the god of fields and shepherds, because he had promoted agriculture and the breeding of cattle; and secondly as an oracular divinity, because he was one of the great founders of the religion of the country. The festival of the Faunalia, celebrated on the fifth of December by the country people, had reference to him as the god of agriculture and cattle. As a prophetic god, he was believed to reveal the future to man, partly in dreams, and partly by voices of unknown origin, in certain sacred groves, one near Tibur, around the well Albunea, and another on the Aventine, near Rome. What Faunus was to the male sex, his wife Faula or Fauna was to the female. At Rome there was a round temple of Faunus, surrounded with columns, on Mount Cælius; and another was built to him, in B.C. 196, on the island in the Tiber, where sacrifices were offered to him on the ides of February. As the god manifested himself in various ways, the idea arose of a plurality of Fauns (Fauni), who are described as half men, half goats, and with horns. Faunus gradually came to be identified with the Arcadian Pan, and the Fauni with the Greek Satyrs.

FAUSTA. 1. CORNËLIA, daughter of the dictator Sulla, and twin sister of Faustus Sulla, was born about B.C. 88. She was first married to C. Memmius, and afterward to Milo. She was infamous for her adulteries, and the historian Sallust is said to have been one of her paramours, and to have received a severe flogging from Milo when he was detected on one occasion in the house of the latter. Villius was another of her paramours, whence Horace calls him "Sullæ gener" (Sat., i, 2, 64).—2. FLAVIA MAXIMIANA, daughter of Maximianus, and wife of Constantine the Great, to whom she bore Constantinus, Constantius, and Constans.

FAUSTINA. 1. ANNIA GALERIA, commonly distinguished as Faustina Senior, the wife of Antoninus Pius, died in the third year of his reign, A.D. 141. Notwithstanding the profligacy of her life, her husband loaded her with honors both before and after her decease. It was in honor of her that Antoninus established a hospital for the education and support of young females, who were called after her puellæ alimentariæ Faustiniæ.—2. ANNIA, or Faustina Junior, daughter of the elder Faustina, was married to M. Aurelius in A.D. 145 or 146, and she died in a village on the skirts of Mount Taurus in 175, having accompanied the emperor to Syria. Her profligacy was so open and infamous, that the good nature or blindness of her husband, who cherished her fondly while alive, and loaded her with honors after her death, appears truly marvellous.—3. ANNIA, grand-daughter or great-grand-daughter of M. Aurelius, the third of the numerous wives of Elagabalus.

FAUSTULUS. Vid. ROMULUS.

FAVENTIA (Faventinus; now Faenze), a town in Gallia Cisalpina, on the River Anemo and on the Via Æmilia, celebrated for its linen manufactures.

FAVONI PORTUS (now Porto Favone), a harbor on the coast of Corsica.

FAVONIUS, M., an imitator of Cato Uticensis, whose character and conduct he copied so servilely as to receive the nickname of Cato's ape. He was always a warm supporter of the party of the optimates, and actively opposed all the measures of the first triumvirate. On the breaking out of the civil war in B.C. 49, he joined Pompey, notwithstanding his personal aversion to the latter, and opposed all proposals of reconciliation between Cæsar and Pompey. He served in the campaign against Cæsar in Greece in 48, and after the defeat of his party at Pharsalus he accompanied Pompey in his flight, and showed him the greatest kindness and attention. Upon Pompey's death, he returned to Italy, and was pardoned by Cæsar. He took no part in the conspiracy against Cæsar's life, but after the murder of the latter he espoused the side of Brutus and Cassius. He was taken prisoner in the battle of Philippi in 42, and was put to death by Octavianus.

FAVORINUS, a philosopher and sophist in the reign of Hadrian, was a native of Arles in Gaul. He resided at different periods of his life in Rome, Greece, and Asia Minor, and obtained high distinctions. He was intimate with some of his most distinguished contemporaries, among others with Plutarch, who dedicated to him his treatise on the principles of cold, and with Herodes Atticus, to whom he bequeathed his library and house at Rome. He wrote several works on various subjects, but none of them are extant.

FEBRIS, the goddess, or, rather, the avërter of fever. She had three sanctuaries at Rome, in which amulets were dedicated which people had worn during a fever.

FEBRŪS, an ancient Italian divinity, to whom the month of February was sacred, for in the latter half of that month general purifications and lustrations were celebrated. The name is connected with februarè (to purify), and februe (purifications). Februs was also regarded as a god of the lower world, and the festival of the dead (Feralia) was celebrated in February.

FELICITAS, the personification of happiness, to whom a temple was erected by Læullus in B.C. 75, which was burned down in the reign of Claudius. Felicitas is frequently seen on Roman medals in the form of a matron, with the staff of Mercury (caduceus) and a cornucopia.

FELIX, ANTONIUS, procurator of Judæa in the reigns of Claudius and Nero, was a brother of the freedman Pallas, and was himself a freedman of the Emperor Claudius. Hence he is also called Claudius Felix. In his private and his public character alike Felix was unscrupulous and profligate. Having fallen in love with Drusilla, daughter of Agrippa I., and wife of Azizus, king of Emesa, he induced her to leave her husband; and she was still living with him in 60, when St. Paul preached before him "of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come." His government, though cruel and oppressive, was strong; he suppressed all disturbances, and cleared the country of robbers. He was recalled in 62, and succeeded by Porcius Festus; and the Jews having lodged accusations against him at Rome, he was saved from condign punishment only by the influence of his brother Pallas with Nero.

FELIX, M. MINUCIUS, a Roman lawyer, who flourished about A.D. 230, wrote a dialogue entitled Octavius, which occupies a conspicuous place among the early Apologies for Christianity. Edited by Gronovius, Lugd. Bat., 1707; by Ernesti, ibid., 1773; and by Muraltò, Turic., 1836.

FELSINA. Vid. BONONIA.

FELTRIA (Feltrinus: now Feltre), a town in Rætia, a little north of the River Plavis.

FENESTELLA, a Roman historian, who lived in the time of Augustus, and died A.D. 21, in the seventieth year of his age. His work, entitled Annales, extended to at least twenty-two books.

The few fragments preserved relate to events subsequent to the Carthaginian wars; and we know that it embraced the greater part of Cicero's career. A treatise De Sacerdotiis et Magistratibus Romanorum Libri II., ascribed to Fenestella, is a modern forgery. [The genuine fragments are published in Popma's Fragmenta Historicorum Vet. Lat., Amst., 1692, and in Havercamp's and Frotscher's editions of Sallust.]

FENNI, a savage people living by the chase, whom Tacitus (Germ., 46) reckons among the Germans. They appear to have dwelt in the further part of Eastern Prussia, and to have been the same as the modern Finns.

FERENTINUM (Ferentinas, Ferentinus). 1. (Now Ferento), a town of Etruria, south of Volsinii, the birth-place of the Emperor Otho. It is called both a colonia and a municipium. There are still remains of its walls, of a theatre, and of sepulchres at Ferento.—2. (Now Ferentino), an ancient town of the Hernici in Latium, southwest of Anagnia, colonized by the Romans in the second Punic war. There are still remains of its ancient walls. In its neighborhood was the source of the sacred brook FERENTINA, at which the Latins used to hold their meetings.

FERENTUM. Vid. FORENTUM.

FERETRĪUS, a surname of Jupiter, derived from ferire, to strike; for persons who took an oath called upon Jupiter to strike them if they swore falsely, as they struck the victim which they sacrificed to him. Others derived it from ferre, because he was the giver of peace, or because people dedicated (ferabant) to him spolia opima.

FERŌNĪA, an ancient Italian divinity, who originally belonged to the Sabines and Faliscans, and was introduced by them among the Romans. It is difficult to form a definite notion of the nature of this goddess. Some consider her to have been the goddess of liberty; others look upon her as the goddess of commerce and traffic, and others, again, regard her as a goddess of the earth or the lower world. Her chief sanctuaries were at Terracina, and near Mount Soracte.

FEROX, URSEIUS, a Roman jurist, who probably flourished between the time of Tiberius and Vespasian.

FERRĀTUS MONS (now Jebel-Jurjurah), one of the principal mountain-chains in the Lesser Atlas system, in North Africa, on the borders of Mauretania Cæsariensis and Mauretania Sitifensis.

FESCENNĪUM or FESCENNĪA (Fescenninus), a town of the Falisci in Etruria, and consequently, like Falerii, of Pelasgic origin. Vid. FALERII. From this town the Romans are said to have derived the Fescennine songs. The site of the town is uncertain; it may perhaps be placed at S. Silvestro. Many writers place it at Civita Castellana, but this was the site of Falerii.

FESTUS, SEXI. POMPEIUS, a Roman grammarian, probably lived in the fourth century of our era. His name is attached to a dictionary or glossary of Latin words and phrases, divided into twenty books, and commonly called Sexti Pompeii Festi de Verborum Significatione. It was abridged by Festus from a work with the same title by M. Verrius Flaccus, a celebrated grammarian in the reign of Augustus. Festus made

A few alterations and criticisms of his own, and inserted numerous extracts from other writings of Verrius, but altogether omitted those words which had fallen into disuse, intending to make these the subject of a separate volume. Toward the end of the eighth century, Paul, son of Warnefrid, better known as Paulus Diaconus, from having officiated as a deacon of the church at Aquileia, abridged the abridgment of Festus. The original work of Verrius Flaccus has perished with the exception of one or two inconsiderable fragments. Of the abstract by Festus, one imperfect MS. only has come down to us. The numerous blanks in this MS. have been ingeniously filled up by Scaliger and Ursinus, partly from conjecture and partly from the corresponding paragraphs of Paulus, whose performance appears in a complete form in many MSS. The best edition of Festus is by K. O. Müller, Lips., 1849, in which the text of Festus is placed face to face with the corresponding text of Paulus, so as to admit of easy comparison. The work is one of great value, containing a rich treasure of learning upon many points connected with antiquities, mythology, and grammar.

FESTUS, PORCIUS, succeeded Antonius Felix as procurator of Judæa in A.D. 62, and died not long after his appointment. It was he who bore testimony to the innocence of St. Paul, when he defended himself before him in the same year.

FIBRĒNSIS. VID. ARPINUM.

FIGULĒA (Ficuleas, -ātis, Ficolenis), an ancient town of the Sabines, east of Fidenæ, said to have been founded by the Aborigines, but early sunk into decay.

FIDĒNĒ, sometimes FIDENA (Fidenas, -ātis: (now Castel Giubileo), an ancient town in the land of the Sabines, forty stadia (five miles) northeast of Rome, situated on a steep hill, between the Tiber and the Anio. It is said to have been founded by Alba Longa, and also to have been conquered and colonized by Romulus; but the population appears to have been partly Etruscan, and it was probably colonized by the Etruscan Veii, with which city we find it in close alliance. It frequently revolted and was frequently taken by the Romans. Its last revolt was in B.C. 438, and in the following year it was destroyed by the Romans. Subsequently the town was rebuilt; but it is not mentioned again till the reign of Tiberius, when, in consequence of the fall of a temporary wooden theatre in the town, twenty thousand, or, according to some accounts, fifty thousand persons lost their lives.

FIDENTĪA (Fidentinus; now Borgo S. Domino), a town in Cisalpine Gaul, on the Via Æmilia, between Parma and Placentia, memorable for the victory which Sulla's generals gained over Carbo, B.C. 82.

FIDES, the personification of fidelity or faithfulness. Numa is said to have built a temple to Fides publica on the Capitol, and another was built there in the consulship of M. Æmilius Serranus, B.C. 115. She was represented as a matron wearing a wreath of olive or laurel leaves, and carrying in her hand corn ears, or a basket with fruit.

FIDĪUS, an ancient form of filius, occurs in the connection of Dius Fidius or Mediſus Fidius that is, me Dius (Διὸς) filius, or the son of Jupiter, that is, Hercules. Hence the expression mediſus fidius is equivalent to me Hercules, scil. juvet. Sometimes Fidius is used alone. Some of the ancients connected fidius with fides.

FIGŪLUS, C. MARCIUS. 1. Consul B.C. 162, and again consul 156, when he carried on war with the Dalmatæ in Illyricum.—2. Consul 64, supported Cicero in his consulship.

FIGŪLUS, P. NIGIDIUS, a Pythagorean philosopher of high reputation, who flourished about B.C. 60. Mathematical and physical investigations appear to have occupied a large share of his attention; and such was his fame as an astrologer, that it was generally believed, in later times at least, that he had predicted the future greatness of Octavianus on hearing the announcement of his birth. He, moreover, possessed considerable influence in political affairs; was one of the senators selected by Cicero to take down the depositions of the witnesses who gave evidence with regard to Catiline's conspiracy, B.C. 63; was prætor 59; took an active part in the civil war on the side of Pompey; was compelled by Cæsar to live abroad, and died in exile 44.

FIMBRIA, C. FLAVIUS. 1. A homo novus, who rose to the highest honors through his own merits and talents. Cicero praises him both as a jurist and an orator. He was consul B.C. 104, and was, subsequently accused of extortion in his province, but was acquitted.—2. Probably son of the preceding, was one of the most violent partisans of Marius and Cinna during the civil war with Sulla. In B.C. 86 he was sent into Asia as legate of Valerius Flaccus, and took advantage of the unpopularity of his commander with the soldiers to excite a mutiny against him. Flaccus was killed at Chalcedon, and was succeeded in the command by Fimbria, who carried on the war with success against the generals of Mithradates. In 84 Sulla crossed over from Greece into Asia, and, after concluding peace with Mithradates, marched against Fimbria. The latter was deserted by his troops, and put an end to his life.

FINES, the name of a great number of places, either on the borders of Roman provinces or of different tribes. These places are usually found only in the Itineraries, and are not of sufficient importance to be enumerated here.

FIRMĀNUS TABUTIUS, a mathematician and astrologer, contemporary with M. Varro and Cicero. At Varro's request Firmanus took the horoscope of Romulus, and from the circumstances of the life and death of the founder determined the era of Rome.

FIRMĪANUS SYMPOSIUS, CÆLIUS, of uncertain age and country, the author of one hundred insipid riddles, each comprised in three hexameter lines, collected, as we are told in the prologue, for the purpose of promoting the festivities of the Saturnalia. Printed in the Poet. Lat. Min. of Wensdorf, vol. vi.

FIRMICUS MATERNUS, JULIUS, or perhaps VILILIUS, the author of a work entitled Matheseos Libri VIII., which is a formal introduction to judicial astrology, according to the discipline of the Egyptians and Babylonians. The writer lived in the time of Constantine the Great, and had during a portion of his life practiced as a forensic pleader. There is also ascribed to this Firmicus Maternus a work in favor of Christianity, entitled De Errore Profanarum Religionum ad Constantium et Constantem. This work was, however, probably written by a different person of the same name, since the author of the work on astrology was a pagan.

FIRMUM (FIRMIANUS: now Fermo), a town in Picenum, three miles from the coast, and south of the River Tinaia, colonized by the Romans at the beginning of the first Punic war. On the coast was its strongly fortified harbor, CASTELLUM FIRMANUM or FIRMANORUM (now Porto di Fermo.)

FIRMUS, M., a native of Seleucia, the friend and ally of Zenobia, seized upon Alexandria, and proclaimed himself emperor, but was defeated and slain by Aurelian, A.D. 273.

FLACCUS, CALPURNIUS, a rhetorician in the reign of Hadrian, whose fifty-one declamations are frequently printed with those of Quintilian.

FLACCUS, PULVIUS. 1. M., consul with App. Claudius Caudex, B.C. 264, in which year the first Punic war broke out.—2. Q., son of No. 1, consul 237, fought against the Ligurians in Italy. In 224 he was consul a second time, and conquered the Gauls and Insubrians in the north of Italy. In 215 he was prætor, after having been twice consul; and in the following year (214) he was re-elected prætor. In 213 he was consul for the third time, and carried on the war in Campania against the Carthaginians. He and his colleague, Appius Claudius Puleher, took Hanno's camp by storm, and then laid siege to Capua, which they took in the following year (212). In 209 he was consul for the fourth time, and continued the war against the Carthaginians in the south of Italy.—3. CN., brother of No. 2, was prætor 212, and had Apulia for his province: he was defeated by Hannibal near Herdonea. In consequence of his cowardice in this battle he was accused before the people, and went into voluntary exile before the trial.—4. Q., son of No. 2, was prætor 182, and carried on war in Spain against the Celtiberians, whom he defeated in several battles. He was consul 179 with his brother L. Manlius Acidinus Fulvianus, who had been adopted by Manlius Acidinus. In his consulship he defeated the Ligurians. In 174 he was censor with A. Postumius Albinus. Shortly afterward he became deranged, and hung himself in his bed-chamber.—5. M., nephew of No. 4, and a friend of the Græchi, was consul 125, when he subdued the Transalpine Ligurians. He was one of the triumvirs for carrying into execution the agrarian law of Tiberius Græchus, and was slain together with C. Græchus in 121. He was a man of bold and determined character, and was more ready to have recourse to violence and open force than C. Græchus.—6. Q., prætor in Sardinia 187, and consul 180.—7. SER., consul 135, subdued the Vardæans in Illyricum.

FLACCUS, GRANICUS, a contemporary of Julius Cæsar, wrote a book, De Jure Papiriano, which was a collection of the laws of the ancient kings of Rome, made by Papirius. Vid. PAPIRIUS.

FLACCUS, HORATIUS. Vid. HORATIUS.

FLACCUS, HORDEONIVS, consular legate of Upper Germany at Nero's death, A.D. 68. He was secretly attached to the cause of Vespasian, for which reason he made no effectual attempt to put down the insurrection of Civilis. Vid. CIVILIS. His troops, who were in favor of Vitellius, compelled him to give up the command to VOCULA, and shortly afterward put him to death.

FLACCUS, C. NORBANUS, a general of Octavianus and Antony in the campaign against Brutus and Cassius, B.C. 42. He was consul in 38.

FLACCUS, PERSIVS. Vid. PERSIVS.

FLACCUS, SICEVLVS, an agrimensor by profession, probably lived about the reign of Nerva. He wrote a treatise entitled De Conditionibus Agrorum, of which the commencement is preserved in the collection of Agrimensores. Vid. FRONTINVS.

FLACCUS, VALERIVS. 1. L., curule ædile B.C. 201, prætor 200, and consul 195, with M. Porcius Cato. In his consulship, and in the following year, he carried on war, with great success, against the Gauls in the north of Italy. In 184 he was the colleague of M. Cato in the censorship, and in the same year was made princeps senatus. He died 180.—2. L., consul 131, with P. Licinius Crassus.—3. L., consul 100, with C. Marius, when he took an active part in putting down the insurrection of Saturninus. In 97 he was censor with M. Antonius, the orator. In 86 he was chosen consul in place of Marius, who had died in his seventh consulship, and was sent by Ciuna into Asia to oppose Sulla, and to bring the war against Mithradates to a close. The avarice and severity of Flaccus made him unpopular with the soldiers, who at length rose in mutiny at the instigation of Fimbria. Flaccus was then put to death by order of Fimbria. Vid. FIMBRIA.—4. L., the interrex, who proposed that Sulla should be made dictator, 82, and who was afterward made by Sulla his magister equitum.—5. C., prætor 98, consul 93, and afterward proconsul in Spain.—6. L., prætor 63, and afterward proprætor in Asia, where he was succeeded by Q. Cicero. In 59 he was accused by D. Lælius of extortion in Asia; but, though undoubtedly guilty, he was defended by Cicero (in the oration pro Flacco, which is still extant) and Q. Hortensius, and was acquitted.—7. C., a poet, was a native of Padua, and lived in the time of Vespasian. He is the author of the Argonautica, an unfinished heroic poem in eight books, on the Argonautic expedition, in which he follows the general plan and arrangement of Apollonius Rhodius. The eighth book terminates abruptly at the point where Medea is urging Jason to make her the companion of his homeward journey. Flaccus is only a second-rate poet. His diction is pure; his general style is free from affectation; his versification is polished and harmonious; his descriptions are lively and vigorous; but he displays no originality, nor any of the higher attributes of genius. Editions by Burmannus, Leid., 1724; by Harles, Altenb., 1781; and by Wagner, Gotting., 1805.

FLACCUS, VERRIUS, a freedman by birth, and a distinguished grammarian in the reign of Augustus, who intrusted him with the education of his grandsons Caius and Lucius Cæsar. He died at an advanced age, in the reign of Tiberius. At the lower end of the market-place at Præneste was a statue of Verrius Flaccus, fronting the Hemicyclium, on the inner curve of which were set up marble tablets, inscribed with the Fasti Verriani. These Fasti were a calendar of the days and vacations of public business—dies fasti, nefasti, and interdicti—of religious festivals, triumphs, &c., especially including such as were peculiar to the family of the Cæsars. In 1770 the foundations of the Hemicyclium of Præneste were discovered, and among the ruins were found fragments of the Fasti Verriani. They are given at the end of Wolf's edition of Suetonius, Lips, 1802. Flaccus wrote numerous works on philology, history, and archaeology. Of these the most celebrated was his work De Verborum Significatione, which was abridged by Festus. Vid. FESTUS.

FLAMININUS, QUINTIUS. I. T., a distinguished general, was consul B.C. 198, and had the conduct of the war against Philip of Macedonia, which he carried on with ability and success. He pretended to have come to Greece to liberate the country from the Macedonian yoke, and thus induced the Achaean league, and many of the other Greek states, to give him their support. The war was brought to a close in 197, by the defeat of Philip by Flamininus, at the battle of Cynoscephalæ in Thessaly; and peace was shortly afterward concluded with Philip. Flamininus continued in Greece for the next three years, in order to settle the affairs of the country. At the celebration of the Isthmian games at Corinth in 196, he caused a herald to proclaim, in the name of the Roman senate, the freedom and independence of Greece. In 195 he made war against Nabis, tyrant of Sparta, whom he soon compelled to submit to the Romans; and in 194 he returned to Rome, having won the affections of the Greeks by his prudent and conciliating conduct. In 192 he was again sent to Greece as ambassador, and remained there till 190, exercising a sort of protectorate over the country. In 183 he was sent as ambassador to Prusias of Bithyuiæ, in order to demand the surrender of Hannibal. He died about 174.—2. L., brother of the preceding, was curule ædile 200, prætor 199, and afterward served under his brother as legate in the war against Macedonia. He was consul in 192, and received Gaul as his province, where he behaved with the greatest barbarity. On one occasion he killed a chief of the Boii who had taken refuge in his camp, in order to afford amusement to a profligate favorite. For this and similar acts of cruelty he was expelled from the senate in 184 by M. Cato, who was then censor. He died in 170.—3. T., consul 150, with M. Aclius Balbus.—4. T., consul 123, with Q. Metellus Balearicus. Cicero says that he spoke Latin with elegance, but that he was an illiterate man.

FLAMININUS. I. C., was tribune of the plebs B.C. 232, in which year, notwithstanding the violent opposition of the senate, he carried an agrarian law, ordaining that the Ager Gallicus Picenus, which had recently been conquered, should be distributed among the plebeians. In 227, in which year four prætors were appointed for the first time, he was one of them, and received Sicily for his province, where he earned the good will of the provincials by his integrity and justice. In 223 he was consul, and marched against the Insubrian Gauls. As the senate were anxious to deprive Flaminius of his office, they declared that the consular election was not valid on account of some fault in the auspices, and sent a letter to the consuls, with orders to return to Rome. But as all preparations had been made for a battle against the Insubrians, the letter was left unopened until the battle was gained. In 220 he was censor, and executed two great works, which bore his name, viz, the Circus Flaminius and the Via Flaminia. In 217 he was consul a second time, and marched against Hannibal, but was defeated by the latter at the fatal battle of the Trasimene Lake, on the twenty-third of June, in which he perished with the greater part of his army.—2. Q., son of No. 1, was quæstor of Scipio Africanus in Spain, 210; curule ædile 196, when he distributed among the people a large quantity of grain at a low price, which was furnished him by the Sicilians as a mark of gratitude toward his father and himself; was prætor 193, and obtained Hispania Citerior as his province, where he carried on the war with success; and was consul 185, when he defeated the Ligurians.

FLANATICUS or FLANONICUS SINUS (now Gulf of Quarnero), a bay of the Adriatic Sea, on the coast of Liburnia, named after the people FLANATES and their town FLANONA (now Fianona).

FLAVIA, a surname given to several towns in the Roman empire in honor of the Flavian family.

FLAVIA GENS, celebrated as the house to which the Emperor Vespasian belonged. During the later period of the Roman empire, the name Flavius descended from one emperor to another, Constantius, the father of Constantine the Great, being the first in the series.

FLAVIA DOMITILLA, first wife of Vespasian.

FLAVIUS, CN., the son of a freedman, became secretary to Appius Claudius Cæcus, and, in consequence of this connection, attained distinguished honors in the commonwealth. He is celebrated in the annals of Roman law for having been the first to divulge certain technicalities of procedure, which previously had been kept secret as the exclusive patrimony of the pontiffs and the patricians. He was elected curule ædile B.C. 303, in spite of his ignominious birth.

FLAVIUS FIMBRIA. Vid. FIMBRIA.

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS. Vid. JOSEPHUS.

FLAVIUS VOPISCUS. Vid. VOPISCUS.

FLAVUS, L. CÆSETIUS, tribune of the plebs B.C. 44, was deposed from his office by C. Julius Cæsar, because, in concert with C. Epidius Marullus, one of his colleagues in the tribunate, he had removed the crowns from the statues of the dictator, and imprisoned a person who had saluted Cæsar as "king."

FLAVUS or FLAVIUS, SUBRIUS, tribune in the Prætorian guards, was the most active agent in the conspiracy against Nero, A.D. 66, which, from its most distinguished member, was called Piso's conspiracy.

FLEVO. Vid. RHENUS.

FLEVUM, a fortress in Germany at the mouth of the Amisia (now Emis).

FLEVUM, FLEVO. Vid. RHENUS.

FLORA, the Roman goddess of flowers and spring. The writers, whose object was to bring the Roman religion into contempt, relate that Flora was a courtesan, who had accumulated a large property, and bequeathed it to the Roman people, in return for which she was honored with the annual festival of the Floralia. But her worship was established at Rome in the very earliest times, for a temple is said to have been vowed to her by King Tatius, and Numa appointed a flamen to her. The resemblance between the names of Flora and Chloris led the later Romans to identify the two divinities. Her temple at Rome was situated near the Circus Maximus, and her festival was celebrated from the 28th of April till the 1st of May, with extravagant merriment and lasciviousness. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. FLORALIA.

FLORÉNTIA (Florentinus). 1. (Now Firenze, Florence), a town in Etruria, on the Arnus, was a Roman colony, and was probably founded by the Romans during their wars with the Ligurians. In the time of Sulla it was a flourishing municipium, but its greatness as a city dates from the Middle Ages.—2. (Now Fiorenzuola), a town in Cisalpine Gaul, on the Æmilia Via, between Placentia and Parma.

FLORÉNTINUS, a jurist, one of the council of the Emperor Severus Alexander, wrote Institutiones in twelve books, which are quoted in the Corpus Juris.

FLORIÁNUS, M. ANNÍUS, the brother, by a different father, of the Emperor Tacitus, upon whose decease he was proclaimed emperor at Rome, A.D. 276. He was murdered by his own troops at Tarsus, after a reign of about two months, while on his march against Probus, who had been proclaimed emperor by the legions in Syria.

FLORUS, ANNÆUS. 1. L., a Roman historian, lived under Trajan and Hadrian, and wrote a summary of Roman history, divided into four books, extending from the foundation of the city to the establishment of the empire under Augustus, entitled Rerum Romanarum Libri IV., or Epitome Gestis Romanorum. This compendium presents within a very moderate compass a striking view of the leading events comprehended by the above limits. It is written in a declamatory style, and the sentiments frequently assume the form of tumid conceits expressed in violent metaphors. The best editions are by Duker, Luigd. Bat., 1722, 1744, reprinted Lips., 1832; by Titz, Prag., 1819; and by Seebode, Lips., 1821.—2. A Roman poet in the time of Hadrian.

FLORUS, GESSÍUS, a native of Clazomenæ, succeeded Albinus as procurator of Judea, A.D. 64–65. His cruel and oppressive government was the main cause of the rebellion of the Jews. He is sometimes called Festus and Cestius Florus.

FLORUS, JULÍUS, addressed by Horace in two epistles (i., 3; ii., 2), was attached to the suite of Claudius Tiberius Nero when the latter was dispatched by Augustus to place Tigranes upon the throne of Armenia. He was both a poet and an orator.

FOCA or PHOCAS, a Latin grammarian, author of a dull, foolish life of Virgil in hexameter verse, of which one hundred and nineteen lines are preserved. Printed in the Anthol. Lat. of Burmann and Wernsdorf.

FŒNICULÁRIUS CAMPUS, i. e., the Fennel Fields, a plain covered with Fennel, near Tarraco, in Spain.

FONTÉIUS M., governed as proprætor Narbonnese Gaul, between B.C. 76–73, and was accused of extortion in his province by M. Platorius in 69. He was defended by Cicero in an oration (pro M. Fonteio), part of which is extant.

FONTÉIUS CÁPITO. Vid. CAPITO.

FONTUS, a Roman divinity, son of Janus, had an altar on the Janiculum, which derived its name from his father, and on which Numa was believed to be buried. The name of this divinity is connected with fons, a fountain; and he was the personification of the flowing waters. On the 13th of October the Romans celebrated the festival of the fountains called Fontinalia, at which the fountains were adorned with garlands.

FORENTUM or FERENTUM (Forentanus: now Forenza), a town in Apulia, surrounded by fertile fields and in a low situation, according to Horace (arvum pingue humilis Forenti, Carm. iii., 4, 16). Livy (ix., 20) describes it as a fortified place, which was taken by C. Junius Bubuleus, B.C. 317. The modern town lies on a hill.

FORMIÆ (Formianus: ruins near Mola di Gaeta), a town in Latium, on the Appia Via, in the innermost corner of the beautiful Sinus Caietanus (now Gulf of Gaeta). It was a very ancient town, founded by the Pelægic Tyrrhæni; and it appears to have been one of the head-quarters of the Tyrrhenian pirates, whence later poets supposed the city of Lamus, inhabited by the Læstrygones, of which Homer speaks (Od., x., 81), to be the same as Formiæ. Formiæ became a municipium and received the Roman franchise at an early period. The beauty of the surrounding country induced many of the Roman nobles to build villas at this spot: of these the best known is the Formianum of Cicero, in the neighborhood of which he was killed. The remains of Cicero's villa are still to be seen at the Villa Marsana, near Castiglione. The hills of Formiæ produced good wine (Hor., Carm., i., 20).

FORMÍO (now Formione, Rusano), a small river, forming the northern boundary of Istria.

FORNAX, a Roman goddess, said to have been worshipped that she might ripen the corn, and prevent its being burned in baking in the oven (fornaz). Her festival, the Fornacalia, was announced by the curio maximus.

FORTÚNA (Τύχη), the goddess of fortune, was worshipped both in Greece and Italy. Hesiod describes her as a daughter of Oceanus; Pindar in one place calls her a daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) the Liberator, and in another place one of the Mœræ or Fates. She was represented with different attributes. With a rudder, she was conceived as the divinity guiding and conducting the affairs of the world; with a ball, she represents the varying unsteadiness of fortune; with Plutos or the horn of Amalthea, she was the symbol of the plentiful gifts of fortune. She was worshipped in most cities in Greece. Her statue at Smyrna held with one hand a globe on her head, and in the other carried the horn of Amalthea. Fortuna was still more worshipped by the Romans than by the Greeks. Her worship is traced to the reigns of Aeneas Marcius and Servius Tullius, and the latter is said to have built two temples to her, the one in the forum boarium, and the other on the banks of the Tiber. The Romans mention her with a variety of surnames and epithets, as publica, privata, muliebris (said to have originated at the time when Coriolanus was prevented by the entreaties of the women from destroying Rome), regina, conseratrix, primigenia, virilis, &c. Fortuna Virginensis was worshipped by newly-married women, who dedicated their maiden garments and girdle in her temple. Fortuna Virilis was worshipped by women, who prayed to her that she might preserve their charms, and thus enable them to please their husbands. Her surnames, in general, express either particular kinds of good fortune, or the persons or classes of persons to whom she granted it. Her worship was of great importance also at Antium and Præneste, where her sortes or oracles were very celebrated.

FORTUNATÆ OR -ORUM INSULÆ (αἱ τῶν μακάρων νῆσοι, i. e., the Islands of the Blessed). The early Greeks, as we learn from Homer, placed the Elysian fields, into which favored heroes passed without dying, at the extremity of the earth, near the River Oceanus. Vid. ELYSIUM. In poems later than Homer, an island is clearly spoken of as their abode; and though its position was of course indefinite, both the poets, and the geographers who followed them, placed it beyond the Pillars of Hercules. Hence when, just after the time of the Marian civil wars, certain islands were discovered in the ocean, off the western coast of Africa, the name of Fortunatæ Insulæ was applied to them. As to the names of the individual islands, and the exact identification of them by their modern names, there are difficulties; but it may be safely said, generally, that the Fortunatæ Insulæ of Pliny, Ptolemy, and others are the Canary Islands, and probably the Madeira group; the latter being, perhaps, those called by Pliny (after Juba) Purpurariæ.

FORTUNATIANUS, ATILIUS, a Latin grammarian, author of a treatise (Ars) upon prosody, and the metres of Horace, printed in the collection of Putschius.

FORTUNATIANUS, CURIUS or CHIRIUS, a Roman lawyer, flourished about A.D. 450. He is the author of a compendium of technical rhetoric, in three books, under the title Curii Fortunatiani Consulti Artis Rhetoricæ Scholice Libri tres, which at one period was held in high esteem as a manual. Printed in the Rhetores Latini Antiqui of Pithou, Paris, 1599.

[FORCILI (now Rocca di Cerno), a village of the Sabines, at the point of passage over the Apennines.]

FORUM, an open space of ground, in which the people met for the transaction of any kind of business. At Rome the number of fora increased with the growth of the city. They were level pieces of ground of an oblong form, and were surrounded by buildings, both private and public. They were divided into two classes: fora civilia, in which justice was administered and public business transacted, and fora venalia, in which provisions and other things were sold, and which were distinguished as the forum boarium, olitorium, suarium, piscarium, &c. The principal fora at Rome were, 1. FORUM ROMANUM, also called simply the Forum, and at a later time distinguished by the epithets vetus or magnum. It is usually described as lying between the Capitoline and Palatine hills; but, to speak more correctly, it lay between the Capitoline and the Velian ridge, which was a hill opposite the Palatine. It ran lengthwise from the foot of the Capitol or the arch of Septimius Severus in the direction of the arch of Titus; but it did not extend so far as the latter, and came to an end at the commencement of the ascent to the Velian ridge, where was the temple of Antoninus and Faustina. Its shape was that of an irregular quadrangle, of which the two longer sides were not parallel, but were much wider near the Capitol than at the other end. Its length was six hundred and thirty French feet, and its breadth varied from one hundred and ninety to one hundred feet, an extent undoubtedly small for the greatness of Rome; but it must be recollected that the limits of the forum were fixed in the early days of Rome, and never underwent any alteration. The origin of the forum is ascribed to Romulus and Tatius, who are said to have filled up the swamp or marsh which occupied its site, and to have set it apart as a place for the administration of justice and for holding the assemblies of the people. The forum, in its widest sense, included the forum properly so called, and the Comitium. The Comitium occupied the narrow or upper end of the forum, and was the place where the patricians met in their comitia curiata: the forum, in its narrower sense, was originally only a market-place, and was not used for any political purpose. At a later time, the forum, in its narrower sense, was the place of meeting for the plebeians in their comitia tributa, and was separated from the comitium by the Rostra or platform, from which the orators addressed the people. The most important of the public buildings which surrounded the forum in early times was the Curia Hostilia, the place of meeting of the senate, which was said to have been erected by Tullus Hostilius. It stood on the northern side of the Comitium. In the time of Tarquin the forum was surrounded by a range of shops, probably of a mean character, but they gradually underwent a change, and were eventually occupied by bankers and money-changers. The shops on the northern side underwent this change first, whence they were called Novæ or Argentariæ Tabernæ; while the shops on the southern side, though they subsequently experienced the same change, were distinguished by the name of Veteres Tabernæ. As Rome grew in greatness, the forum was adorned with statues of celebrated men, with temples and basilicæ, and with other public buildings. The site of the ancient forum is occupied by the Campo Vaccino.—2. FORUM JULIUM or FORUM CÆSARIS, was built by Julius Cæsar because the old forum was found too small for the transaction of public business. It was close by the old forum, behind the church of St. Martina. Cæsar built here a magnificent temple of Venus Genetrix.—3. FORUM AUGUSTI, built by Augustus because the two existing fora were not found sufficient for the great increase of business which had taken place. It stood behind the Forum Julium, and its entrance at the other end was by an arch, now called Arco de Pantani. Augustus adorned it with a temple of Mars Ultor, and with the statues of the most distinguished men of the republic. This forum was used for causæ publicæ and sortitiones judicium.—4. FORUM NERVÆ or FORUM TRANSITORIUM, was a small forum lying between the Temple of Peace and the fora of Julius Cæsar and Augustus. The Temple of Peace was built by Vespasian; and as there were private buildings between it and the fora of Cæsar and Augustus, Domitian resolved to pull down those buildings, and thus form a fourth forum, which was not, however, intended, like the other three, for the transaction of public business, but simply to serve as a passage from the Temple of Peace to the fora of Cæsar and Augustus: hence its name Transitorium. The plan was carried into execution by Nerva, whence the forum is also called by the name of this emperor.—5. FORUM TRAJANI, built by the Emperor Trajan, who employed the architect Apollodorus for the purpose. It lay between the forum of Augustus and the Campus Martius. It was the most splendid of all the fora, and considerable remains of it are still extant. Here were the Basilica Ulpia and Bibliotheca Ulpia, the celebrated Columna Trajani, an equestrian statue and a triumphal arch of Trajan, and a temple of Trajan built by Hadrian.

FORUM, the name of several towns in various parts of the Roman empire, which were originally simply markets or places for the administration of justice. 1. ALIENI (now Ferrara?), in Cisalpine Gaul.—2. APPII (ruins near S. Donato), in Latium, on the Appia Via, in the midst of the Pomptine marshes, forty-three miles southeast of Rome, founded by the censor Appius Claudius when he made the Appia Via. Here the Christians from Rome met the Apostle Paul (Acts, xxviii, 15).—3. AMELII or AMELIUM (now Montalto), in Etruria, on the Aurelia Via.—4. CASSII, in Etruria on the Cassia Via, near Viterbo.—5. CLŒDII (now Oriolo), in Etruria.—6. CORNELII (now Imola), in Gallia Cispadana, on the Æmilia Via, between Bononia and Faventia, a colony founded by Cornelius Sulla.—7. FLAMINI, in Umbria, on the Flaminia Via.—8. FULVII, surnamed VALENTINUM (now Valenza), in Liguria, on the Po, on the road from Dertona to Asta.—9. GALLORUM (now Castel Franco), in Gallia Cisalpina, on the Æmilia Via, between Mutina and Bononia, memorable for the two battles fought between Antonius and the consuls Pansa and Hirtius.—10. HADRIANI (now Voorburg), in the island of the Batavi, in Gallia Belgica, where several Roman remains have been found.—11. JULII or JULIUM (Forojuliensis; now Fregjus), a Roman colony founded by Julius Cæsar, B.C. 44, in Gallia Narbonensis, on the River Argenteus and on the coast, six hundred stadia northeast of Massilia. It possessed a good harbor, and was the usual station of a part of the Roman fleet. It was the birth-place of Agricola. At Fregjus are the remains of a Roman aqueduct, circus, arch, &c.—12. JULII or JULIUM (now Friaul), a fortified town and a Roman colony in the country of the Carni, northeast of Aquileia; in the Middle Ages it became a place of importance.—13. JULIUM. Vid. ILLIURGIS.—14. LIVII (now Forli), in Cisalpine Gaul, in the territory of the Boii, on the Æmilia Via, southwest of Ravenna: here the Gothic king Athaulf married Galla Placidia.—15. POPULII (now Forlimpopoli), in Gallia Cisalpina, east of No. 14, and on the same road.—16. POPULII (now Polla), in Lucania, east of Præstum, on the Taunger and on the Popilia Via. On the wall of an inn at Polla was discovered an inscription respecting the prætor Popilius.—17. SEGUSIANORUM (now Feurs), in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the Liger, and west of Lugduuum, a town of the Segusiani, and a Roman colony with the surname Julia Felix.—18. SEMPRONIUM (Forosempronius; now Fossombrone), a municipium in Umbria, on the Flaminia Via.—19. VOCONTIUM (now Vidauban, east of Canet), a town of the Salyes in Gallia Narbonensis.

FOSI, a people of Germany, the neighbors and allies of the Cherusci, in whose fate they shared. Vid. CHERUSCI. It is supposed that their name is retained in the River Fuse in Brunswick.

FOSSA or FOSSÆ, a canal. 1. CLŒDIA, a canal between the mouth of the Po and Altinum, in the north of Italy; there was a town of the same name upon it.—2. CLULIA or CLULLÆ, a trench about five miles from Rome, said to have been the ditch with which the Alban king Cluilius protected his camp when he marched against Rome in the reign of Tullus Hostilius.—3. CORBULONIS, a canal in the island of the Batavi, connecting the Maas and the Rhine, dug by command of Corbulo in the reign of Claudius.—4. DRUSIANÆ or DRUSINÆ, a canal which Drusus caused his soldiers to dig in B.C. 11, uniting the Rhine with the Yssel. It probably commenced near Arnhem on the Rhine, and fell into the Yssel near Doesberg.—5. MARIANA or MARIANÆ, a canal dug by command of Marius during his war with the Cimbri, in order to connect the Rhone with the Mediterranean, and thus make an easier passage for vessels into the Rhone, because the mouths of the river were frequently choked up with sand. The canal commenced near Arelat, but, in consequence of the frequent changes in the course of the Rhone, it is impossible now to trace the course of the canal.—[6. PHILISTINA, also called Fossiones Philistinæ (now Po Grande), a very considerable canal, having seven arms or cuts, commonly known by the name of Septem Maria, undertaken by the Etrurians to drain the marshy lands about Hadria.]—7. XERXIS. Vid. ATHOS.

FRANCI, i. e., "the Free men," a confederacy of German tribes, formed on the Lower Rhine in the place of the ancient league of the Cherusci, and consisting of the Sigambri, the chief tribe, the Chamavi, Ampsivarii, Bructeri, Chatti, &c. They are first mentioned about A.D. 240. After carrying on frequent wars with the Romans, they at length settled permanently in Gaul, of which they became the rulers under their great king Clovis, A.D. 496.

FREGELLE (Fregellanus; now Ceprano), an ancient and important town of the Volsci, on the Liris in Latium, conquered by the Romans, and colonized B.C. 328. It took part with the allies in the Social war, and was destroyed by Opimius.

FREGENÆ, sometimes called FREGELLE (now

Torre Maccaresse), a town of Etruria, on the coast, between Alsiurn and the Tiber, on a low, swampy shore, colonized by the Romans B.C. 245.

FRENTANI, a Samnite people, inhabiting a fertile and well-watered territory on the coast of the Adriatic, from the River Sagrus on the north (and subsequently almost as far north as from the Aternus) to the River Frento on the south, from the latter of which rivers they derived their name. They were bounded by the Marrucini on the north, by the Peligni and by Samnium on the west, and by Apulia on the south. They submitted to the Romans in B.C. 304, and concluded a peace with the republic.

FRENTO (now Fortore), a river in Italy, forming the boundary between the Frentani and Apulia, rises in the Apennines and falls into the Adriatic Sea.

FRINIATES, a people in Liguria, probably the same as the Briniates, who, after being subdued by the Romans, were transplanted to Samnium.

FRISIABONES, probably a tribe of the Frisii, inhabiting the islands at the mouth of the Rhine.

FRISII, a people in the northwest of Germany, inhabited the coast from the eastern mouth of the Rhine to the Amisia (now Emis), and were bounded on the south by the Bructeri, consequently in the modern Friesland, Gröningen, &c. Tacitus divided them into Majores and Minores, the former probably in the east, and the latter in the west of the country. The Frisii were on friendly terms with the Romans from the time of the first campaign of Drusus till A.D. 28, when the oppressions of the Roman officers drove them to revolt. In the fifth century we find them joining the Saxons and Angli in their invasion of Britain.

FRONTINUS, SEX. JULIUS, was prætor A.D. 70, and in 75 succeeded Cerealis as governor of Britain, where he distinguished himself by the conquest of the Silures, and maintained the Roman power unbroken until superseded by Agricola in 78. In 97 Frontinus was nominated curator aquarum. He died about 106. Two works undoubtedly by this author are still extant: 1. Strategematon Libri IV., a sort of treatise on the art of war, developed in a collection of the sayings and doings of the most renowned leaders of antiquity. 2. De Aquæductibus Urbis Romæ Libri II., which forms a valuable contribution to the history of architecture. The best editions of the Strategemata are by Oudendorp, Lugd. Bat., 1779, and by Schwebel, Lips., 1772; of the De Aquæductibus by Polenus, Patav., 1722. In the collection of the Agri-mensores, or Rei Agrariæ Auctores (ed. Goesius, Amst., 1674; ed. Laehmann, Berlin, 1848), are preserved some treatises usually ascribed to Sex. Julius Frontinus. The collection consists of fragments connected with the art of measuring land and ascertaining boundaries. It was put together without skill, pages of different works being mixed up together, and the writings of one author being sometimes attributed to another.

FRONTO, M. CORNELIUS, was born at Cirta in Numidia, in the reign of Domitian, and came to Rome in the reign of Hadrian, where he attained great celebrity as a pleader and a teacher of rhetoric. He was intrusted with the education of the future emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus, and was rewarded with wealth and honors. He was raised to the consulship in 143. So great was his fame as a speaker that a sect of rhetoricians arose who were denominated Frontoniani. Following the example of their founder, they avoided the exaggeration of the Greek sophistical school, and bestowed especial care on the purity of their language and the simplicity of their style. Fronto lived till the reign of M. Aurelius. The latest of his epistles belongs to the year 166. Up to a recent period no work of Fronto was known to be in existence, with the exception of a corrupt and worthless tract entitled De Differentiis Vocabulorum, and a few fragments preserved by the grammarians. But about the year 1814 Angelo Mai discovered on a palimpsest in the Ambrosian library at Milan a considerable number of letters which had passed between Fronto, Antoninus Pius, M. Aurelius, L. Verus, and various friends, together with some short essays. These were published by Mai at Milan in 1815, and in an improved form by Niebuhr, Buttmann, and Heindorf, Berlin, 1816. Subsequently Mai discovered, on a palimpsest in the Vatican library at Rome, upward of one hundred new letters; and he published these at Rome in 1823, together with those which had been previously discovered.

FRONTO, PAPIRIUS, a jurist, who probably lived about the time of Antoninus Pius, or rather earlier.

FRUSINO (Frusinas, -atis: now Frosinone), a town of the Hernici in Latium, in the valley of the River Cosas, and subsequently a Roman colony. It was celebrated for its prodigies, which occurred here almost more frequently than at any other place.

FUCENTIS, FUCENTIL. Vid. ALBA, No. 4.

FUCINUS LACUS (now Lago di Celano or Capistrano), a large lake in the centre of Italy and in the country of the Marsi, about thirty miles in circumference, into which all the mountain streams of the Apennines flow. As the water of this lake had no visible outlet, and frequently inundated the surrounding country, the Emperor Claudius constructed an emissarium or artificial channel for carrying off the waters of the lake into the River Liris. This emissarium is still nearly perfect: it is almost three miles in length. It appears that the actual drainage was relinquished soon after the death of Claudius, for it was reopened by Hadrian.

FUFFIUS CALÆNUS. Vid. CALENUS.

FUFFIUS, a jurist, who probably lived between the time of Vespasian and Hadrian.

FULGENTIUS, FABIUS PLANCIDÆUS, a Latin grammarian of uncertain date, probably not earlier than the sixth century after Christ, appears to have been of African origin. He is the author of, 1. Mythologiarum Libri III. ad Catum Presbyterum, a collection of the most remarkable tales connected with the history and exploits of gods and heroes. 2. Expositio Sermorum Antiquorum cum Testimoniis ad Chalcidicum Grammaticum, a glossary of obsolete words and phrases: of very little value. 3. Liber de Expositione Virgiliæ Continentiæ ad Chalcidicum Grammaticum, a title which means an explanation of what is contained in Virgil, that is to say, of the esoteric truths allegorically conveyed in the Virgilian poems. The best edition of these works is in the Mythographi Latini of Muncker, Auct., 1681, and of Van Staveren, Lugd. Bat., 1742.

FULGINIA, FULGINIUM (Fulgias, -atis: now Foligno), a town in the interior of Umbria, on the Via Flaminia, was a municipium.

FULVIA. 1. The mistress of Q. Curius, one of Catiline's conspirators, divulged the plot to Cicero.—2. A daughter of M. Fulvius Bambalio of Tusculum, thrice married, first to the celebrated P. Clodius, by whom she had a daughter, Clodia, afterward the wife of Octavianus; secondly to C. Scribonius Curio, and thirdly to M. Antony, by whom she had two sons. She was a bold and ambitious woman. In the proscription of B.C. 43 she acted with the greatest arrogance and brutality: she gazed with delight upon the head of Cicero, the victim of her husband. Her turbulent and ambitious spirit excited a new war in Italy in 41. Jealous of the power of Octavianus, and anxious to withdraw Antony from the East, she induced L. Antonius, the brother of her husband, to take up arms against Octavianus. But Lucius was unable to resist Octavianus, and threw himself into Perugia, which he was obliged to surrender in the following year (40). Fulvia fled to Greece and died at Sicyon in the course of the same year.

FULVIA GENS, a plebeian, but one of the most illustrious Roman gentes. It originally came from Tusculum. The principal families in the gens are those of CENTUMALUS, FLACCUS, NOBILIOR, and PÆTINUS.

FUNDANUS. 1. C., father of Fundania, the wife of M. Terentius Varro, is one of the speakers in Varro's dialogue, De Re Rustica.—2. M., defended by Cicero, B.C. 65; but the scanty fragments of Cicero's speech do not enable us to understand the nature of the charge.—3. A writer of comedies praised by Horace (Sat., i., 10, 41, 42).

FUNDI (Fundanus: now Fondi), an ancient town in Latium, on the Appia Via, at the head of a narrow bay of the sea, running a considerable way into the land, called the LACUS FUNDANUS. Fundi was a municipium, and was subsequently colonized by the veterans of Augustus. The surrounding country produced good wine. There are still remains at Fondi of the walls of the ancient town.

FURCULE CAUDINÆ. Vid. CAUDIUM.

FURIA GENS, an ancient patrician gens, probably came from Tusculum. The most celebrated families of the gens bore the names of CAMILLUS MEDULLINUS, PACILLUS, and PHILUS. For others of less note, vid. BIBACULUS, CRASSIPES, PURPUREO.

FURIA. Vid. EUMENIDES.

FURINA, an ancient Roman divinity, who had a sacred grove at Rome. Her worship seems to have become extinct at an early time. An annual festival (Furinalia or Furinales feriae) had been celebrated in honor of her, and a flamen (flamen Furinalis) conducted her worship. She had also a temple in the neighborhood of Satrium.

FURNIUS, C., a friend and correspondent of Cicero, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 50; sided with Cæsar in the civil war; and after Cæsar's death was a staunch adherent of Antony. After the battle of Actium, 31, he was reconciled to Augustus through the mediation of his son, was appointed consul in 29, and was prefect of Hither Spain in 21.

FUSCUS. 1. ARELLIUS, a rhetorician at Rome in the latter years of Augustus, instructed in rhetoric the poet Ovid. He declaimed more frequently in Greek than in Latin, and his style of declamation is described by Seneca as more brilliant than solid, antithetical rather than eloquent. His rival in teaching and declaiming was Porcius Latro. Vid. LATRO.—2. ARISTIUS, a friend of the poet Horace, who addressed to him an ode (Carm., i., 22) and an epistle (Ep., i., 10), and who also introduces him elsewhere (Sat., i., 9, 61; 10, 83).—3. CORNELIUS, one of the most active adherents of Vespasian in his contest for the empire, A.D. 69. In the reign of Domitian he was sent against the Dacians, by whom he was defeated. Martial wrote an epitaph on Fuscus (Ep., vi., 76), in which he refers to the Dacian campaign.

G.

GABÆ (Γάβαι). 1. (Now Darabgherd?), a fortress and royal residence in the interior of Persia, southeast of Pasargada, near the borders of Carmania.—2. Or Gabaza, or Cazaba, a fortress in Sogdiana, on the confines of the Massageta.

GABĀLA (Γάβαλα), a sea-port town of Syria Selucis, south of Laodicea, whence good storrax was obtained.

GABĀLI, a people in Gallia Aquitania, whose country possessed silver mines and good pasture. Their chief town was Anderitum (now Anteriqueux).

GABIĀNA OR -ĒNĒ (Γαβιανή, Γαβινηή), a fertile district in the Persian province of Susiana, west of Mount Zagros.

GABIŪ (Gabinius: ruins near Castiglione), a town in Latium, on the Lacus Gabinius (now Lago di Gavi), between Rome and Praeneste, was in early times one of the most powerful Latin cities; a colony from Alba Longa; and the place, according to tradition, where Romulus was brought up. It was taken by Tarquinius Superbus by stratagem, and it was in ruins in the time of Augustus (Gabiis desertior vicus, Hor., Ep., i., 11, 7). The cinctus Gabinus, a peculiar mode of wearing the toga at Rome, appears to have been derived from this town. In the neighborhood of Gabii are the immense stone quarries from which a part of Rome was built.

GABINIUS, A., dissipated his fortune in youth by his profligate mode of life. He was tribune of the plebs B.C. 66, when he proposed and carried a law conferring upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates. He was prætor in 61, and consul 58 with L. Piso. Both consuls supported Clodius in his measures against Cicero, which resulted in the banishment of the orator. In 57 Gabinius went to Syria as proconsul. His first attention was directed to the affairs of Judea. He restored Hyrcanus to the high-priesthood, of which he had been dispossessed by Alexander, the son of Aristobulus. He next marched into Egypt, and restored Ptolemy Auletes to the throne. The restoration of Ptolemy had been forbidden by a decree of the senate, and by the Sibylline books; but Gabinius had been promised by the king a sum of ten thousand talents for this service, and accordingly set at naught both the senate and the Sibyl. His government of the province was marked in other respects by the most shameful venality and oppression. He returned to Rome in 54. He was accused of majestas or high treason, on account of his restoration of Ptolemy Auletes, in defiance of the Sibyl and the authority of the senate. He was acquitted on this charge; but he was forthwith accused of repetundæ, for the illegal receipt of ten thousand talents from Ptolemy. He was defended by Cicero, who had been persuaded by Pompey, much against his will, to undertake the defence. Gabinius, however, was condemned on this charge, and went into exile. He was recalled from exile by Cæsar in 49, and in the following year (48) was sent into Illyricum by Cæsar with some newly-levied troops, in order to re-enforce Q. Cornificus. He died in Illyricum about the end of 48, or the beginning of the following year.

ΓΑΔΑΡΑ (Tádapa: Γαδαρῆνός: now Um-Keis), a large fortified city of Palestine, one of the ten which formed the Decapolis in Peræa, stood a little south of the Hieromax (now Yarnuk), an eastern tributary of the Jordan. The surrounding district, southeast of the Lake of Tiberias, was called Gadâris, and was very fertile. Gadara was probably favored by the Greek kings of Syria, as it is sometimes called Antiochia and Seleucia; it was restored by Pompey; Augustus presented it to King Herod, after whose death it was assigned to the province of Syria. It was made the seat of a Christian bishopric. There were celebrated baths in its neighborhood, at Amatha.

ΓΑΔΕΣ (τὰ Γάδερα: Γαδερεῖς, Gaditânus: now Cádiz), a very ancient town in Hispania Bætica, west of the Pillars of Hercules, founded by the Phœnicians, and one of the chief seats of their commerce in the west of Europe, was situated on a small island of the same name (now Isle de Leon), separated from the main land by a narrow channel, which in its narrowest part was only the breadth of a stadium, and over which a bridge was built. Herodotus says (iv., 8) that the island of Erythia was close to Gadeira; whence most later writers supposed the island of Gades to be the same as the mythical island of Erythia, from which Hercules carried off the oxen of Geryon. A new town was built by Cornelius Balbus, a native of Gades, and the circumference of the old and new towns together was only twenty stadia. There were, however, many of the citizens dwelling on the main land opposite the island, as well as on a smaller island (S. Sebastian or Trocadero) in the immediate neighborhood of the larger one. After the first Punie war Gades came into the hands of the Carthaginians; and in the second Punie war it surrendered of its own accord to the Romans. Its inhabitants received the Roman franchise from Julius Cæsar. It became a municipium, and was called Augusta urbs Julia Gaditana. Gades was from the earliest to the latest times an important commercial town. Its inhabitants were wealthy, luxurious, and licentious; and their lascivious dances were celebrated at Rome. (Juv., xi., 162.) Gades possessed celebrated temples of Saturn (Cronus) and Hercules. Its drinking water was as bad in antiquity as it is in the present day. Gades gave its name to the FRETUM GADITANUM, the straits at the entrance of the Mediterranean, between Europe and Africa (now Straits of Gibraltar).

ΓÆΑ or ΓΕ (Γαῖα or Γῆ), the personification of the earth. Homer describes her as a divine being, to whom black sheep were sacrificed, and who was invoked by persons taking oaths; and he calls her the mother of Erechtheus and Tityus. In Hesiod she is the first being that sprang from Chaos, and gave birth to Uranus (Cœlus) and Pontus. By Uranus (Cœlus) she became the mother of Oceanus, Cœus, Crius, Hyperion, Iapetus, Thia, Rheia, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phœbe, Tethys, Saturn (Cronos), the Cyclopes, Brontes, Steropes, Arges, Cottus, Briareus, and Gyges. These children were hated by their father, and Ge (Terra) therefore concealed them in the bosom of the earth; but she made a large iron sickle, gave it to her sons, and requested them to take vengeance upon their father. Cronos (Saturn) undertook the task, and mutilated Uranus (Cœlus). The drops of blood which fell from him upon the earth (Ge) became the seeds of the Erinyes, the Gigantes, and the Melian nymphs. Subsequently Ge (Terra) became, by Pontus, the mother of Nereus, Thaumias, Phoreys, Ceto, and Eurybia. Ge (Terra) belonged to the deities of the nether world (θεοὶ χθόνιοι) and hence she is frequently mentioned where they are invoked. The surnames and epithets given to her have more or less reference to her character as the all-producing and all-nourishing mother (mater omniparens et alina). Her worship appears to have been universal among the Greeks, and she had temples or altars in almost all the cities of Greece. At Rome the earth was worshipped under the name of TELLUS (which is only a variation of Terra). She was regarded by the Romans also as one of the deities of the nether world (Inferi), and is mentioned in connection with Dis and the Manes. A temple was built to her by the consul P. Sempronius Sophus, in B. C. 304. Her festival was celebrated on the 15th of April, and was called Fordieidia or Iordieidia. The sacrifice, consisting of cows, was offered up in the Capitol in the presence of the Vestals.

ΓÆSON, ΓÆSUS, or GÆSSUS (Γαῖσον) a river of Ionia in Asia Minor, falling into the Gulf of Mæander near the promontory of Myale.

ΓÆΤΥΛΙΑ (Γαιτουλία), the interior of Northern Africa, south of Mauretania, Numidia, and the region bordering on the Syrtis, reaching to the Atlantic Ocean on the west, and of very indefinite extent toward the east and the south. The people included under the name Gætuli (Γαιτούλοι), in its widest sense, were the inhabitants of the region between the countries just mentioned and the Great Desert, and also in the Oases of the latter, and nearly as far south as the River Niger. They were a great nomad race, including several tribes, the chief of whom were the Autololes and Pharusii on the western coast, the Daræ, or Gætuli-Daræ, in the steppes of the Great Atlas, and the Melanogætuli, a black race resulting from the intermixture of the Gætuli with their southern neighbors, the Nigritæ. The pure Gætulians were not an Æthiopic (i. e., negro), but a Libyan race, and were most probably of Asiatic origin. They are supposed to have been the ancestors of the Berbers.

GAIVS or CAIVS, a celebrated Roman jurist, wrote, under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius. His works were very numerous, and great use was made of them in the compilation of the Digest. One of his most celebrated works was an elementary treatise on Roman law, entitled Institutiones, in four books. This work was for a long time the ordinary text book used by those who were commencing the study of the Roman law; but it went out of use after the compilation of the Institutiones of Justinian, and was finally lost. This long lost work was discovered by Niebuhr in 1816 in the library of the Chapter at Verona. The MS. containing Gaius was a palimpsest one. The original writing of Gaius had on some pages been washed out, and on others scratched out, and the whole was re-written with the Letters of St. Jerome. The task of deciphering the original MS. was a very difficult one and some parts were completely destroyed. It was first published by Göschen in 1821: a second edition appeared in 1824, and a third in 1842.

GAGÆ (Γάγα), a town on the coast of Lycia, east of Myra, whence was obtained the mineral called Gagates lapis, that is jet, or, as it is still called in German, gagat.

ΓΑΛΑΤΙΑ (Galatia: Γαλάτης: in the eastern part of modern Anadoli and the western part of Æmili), a country of Asia Minor, composed of parts of Phrygia and Cappadocia, and bounded on the west, south, and southeast by those countries, and on the northeast, north, and northwest by Pontus, Paphlagonia, and Bithynia. It derived its name from its inhabitants, who were Gauls that had invaded and settled in Asia Minor at various periods during the third century B.C. First, a portion of the army which Brennus led against Greece, separated from the main body, and marched into Thrace, and, having pressed forward as far as the shores of the Propontis, some of them crossed the Hellespont on their own account, while others, who had reached Byzantium, were invited to pass the Bosphorus by Nicomedes I, king of Bithynia, who required their aid against his brother Zippæus (B.C. 279). They speedily overran all Asia Minor within the Taurus, and exacted tribute from its various princes, and served as mercenaries not only in the armies of these princes, but also of the kings of Syria and Egypt; and, according to one account, a body of them found their way to Babylon. During their ascendancy, other bodies of Gauls followed them into Asia. Their progress was at length checked by the arms of the kings of Pergamus: Eumenes fought against them with various fortune; but Attalus I. gained a complete victory over them (B.C. 230), and compelled them to settle down within the limits of the country thenceforth called Galatia and also,
