tradition, by Philoctetes. (Virg., Æn., iii., 402.) It was situated north of Croton, to whose territory it originally belonged, but it was afterward conquered by the Lucanians. It remained faithful to the Romans, when the other cities of Brutium revolted to Hannibal, and it was not till after a long and desperate resistance that it was taken by one of Hannibal's generals. It was recaptured by Hannibal with Brutians; but the Romans subsequently collected the remains of the former population, and put them again in possession of the town.

[PETENES. Vid. PETINES.]

PĒTĒŌN (Πετρώων: Πετρώωνιος), a small town in Bœotia, of uncertain site, dependent upon Haliartus according to some, and upon Thebes according to others.

PĒTĒŌS (Πετρώος), son of Orneus, and father of Menestheus, was expelled from Athens by Ægeus, and went to Phocis, where he founded Stiris.

[PETINES (Πετινης) or PETENES, one of the Persian generals at the beginning of the war with Alexander: he was slain at the battle of the Granicus.]

PĒTOSĪRIS (Πετσοίρις), an Egyptian priest and astrologer, generally named along with Nechepsos, an Egyptian king. The two are said to be the founders of astrology. Some works on astrology were extant under his name. Like our own Lilly, Petosiris became the common name for an astrologer. (Juv., vi., 580.)

PĒTOVĪO or PĒTOVĪO (now Pettau), a town in Pannonia Superior, on the frontiers of Noricum, and on the Dravus (now Drave), was a Roman colony with the surname Ulpia, having been probably enlarged and made a colony by Trajan or Hadrian. It was one of the chief towns of Pannonia, had an imperial palace, and was the head-quarters of a Roman legion. The ancient town was probably on the right bank of the Drave, opposite the modern Pettau, as it is only on the former spot that inscriptions, coins, and other antiquities have been found.

PĒTRA (ἡ Πέτρα: Πετραῖος, Petræus, later Petrensis), the name of several cities built on rocks or in rocky places. 1. A small place in the Corinthian territory, probably on the coast, near the borders of Argolis.—2. A place in Elis, not far from the city of Elis, of which some suppose it to have been the acropolis. The sepulchral monument of the philosopher Pyrrho was shown here.—3. (Now Casa della Pietra), also called PETRÆA and PETRINE (the people Πετρίνοι and Petrini), an inland town of Sicily, on the road from Agrigentum to Panormus.—4. A town on the coast of Illyricum, with a bad harbor.—5. A city of Pieria in Macedonia.—6. A fortress of the Mædi in Thrace.—7. (Pl. neut.), a place in Dacia, on one of the three great roads which crossed the Danube.—8. In Pontus, a fortress built by Justinian, on a precipice on the sea-coast, between the rivers Bathys and Acinasis.—9. In Sogdiana, near the Oxus (Q. Curt., vii., 11).—10. By far the most celebrated of all the places of this name was PĒTRA or PETRÆ (now Wady-Musa), in Arabia Petræa, the capital first of the Idumæans, and afterward of the Nabathæans. It is probably the same place which is called Selah (which means, like πέτρα, a rock) and Joktheel in the Old Testament. It lies in the midst of the mountains of Seir, at the foot of Mount Hor, just half way between the Dead Sea and the head of the Ælanitic Gulf of the Red Sea, in a valley, or rather ravine, surrounded by almost inaccessible precipices, which is entered by a narrow gorge on the east, the rocky walls of which approach so closely as sometimes hardly to permit two horsemen to ride abreast. On the banks of the river which runs through this ravine stood the city itself, a mile in length and half a mile in breadth, between the sides of the valley, and some fine ruins of its public buildings still remain. But this is not all: the rocks which surround, not only the main valley, but all its lateral ravines, are completely honey-combed with excavations, some of which were tombs, some temples, and some private houses, at the entrances to which the surface of the rock is sculptured into magnificent architectural façades and other figures, whose details are often so well preserved as to appear but just chiselled, while the effect is wonderfully heightened by the brilliant variegated colors of the rock, where red, purple, yellow, sky-blue, black, and white are seen in distinct layers. These ruins are chiefly of the Roman period, when Petra had become an important city as a centre of the caravan traffic of the Nabathæans. At the time of Augustus, as Strabo learned from a friend who had resided there, it contained many Romans and other foreigners, and was governed by a native prince. It had maintained its independence against the Greek kings of Syria, and retained it under the Romans till the time of Trajan, by whom it was taken. It was the chief city of the whole country of Arabia Petræa, which probably derived its name from Petra; and under the later empire it was the capital of Palæstina Tertia.

PĒTREIUS, M., a man of great military experience, is first mentioned in B.C. 62, when he served as legatus to the proconsul C. Antonius, and commanded the army in the battle in which Catiline perished. He belonged to the aristocratic party; and in 55 he was sent into Spain along with L. Afranius as legatus of Pompey, to whom the provinces of the two Spains had been granted. Soon after the commencement of the civil war in 49, Cæsar defeated Afranius and Petreius in Spain, whereupon the latter joined Pompey in Greece. After the loss of the battle of Pharsalia (48), Petreius crossed over to Africa, and took an active part in the campaign in 46, which was brought to an end by the decisive defeat of the Pompeian army at the battle of Thapsus. Petreius then fled with Juba, and, despairing of safety, they fell by each other's hands.

PĒTRĪNUS (now Rocca di monti Ragoni), a mountain near Sinuessa, on the confines of Latium and Campania, on which good wine was grown.

PĒTRĒŌRĪI, a people in Gallia Aquitanica, in the modern Perigord. Their country contained iron mines, and their chief town was Vesunna (now Perigueux).

[PETRONIA, daughter of a man of consular rank, was first the wife of Vitellius, and subsequently of Dolabella. By Vitellius she had a son Petronianus, whom his father put to death.]

[PETRONIUS, C. 1. Succeeded Ælius Gallus in the government of Egypt, and carried on war in B.C. 22 against the Æthiopians, who had invaded Egypt under their queen Candace. Petronius not only drove back the Æthiopians, but took many of their towns. He was a friend of Herod, and sent corn to Judæa when the latter country was visited by a famine.—2. TURPILLIANUS, consul A.D. 61 with C. Cæsonius Pætus, succeeded Suetonius Paulinus as governor of Britain, but did nothing in that capacity, though he received the triumphal insignia in A.D. 65. He was put to death at the commencement of the reign of Galba.]

PETRONIUS, C. or T., an accomplished voluptuary at the court of Nero. He was one of the chosen companions of Nero, and was regarded as director-in-chief of the imperial pleasures, the judge whose decision upon the merits of any proposed scheme of enjoyment was held as final (elegantia arbitri). The influence thus acquired excited the jealous suspicions of Tigellinus: he was accused of treason; and believing that destruction was inevitable, he resolved to die as he had lived, and to excite admiration by the frivolous eccentricity of his end. Having caused his veins to be opened, he from time to time arrested the flow of blood by the application of bandages. During the intervals he conversed with his friends, and even showed himself in the public streets of Cumæ, where these events took place; so that at last, when he sunk from exhaustion, his death (A.D. 66), although compulsory, appeared to be the result of natural and gradual decay. He is said to have dispatched in his last moments a sealed document to the prince, taunting him with his brutal excesses. A work has come down to us bearing the title Petronii Arbitri Satyricon, which, as it now exists, is composed of a series of fragments, chiefly in prose, but interspersed with numerous pieces of poetry. It is a sort of comic romance, in which the adventures of a certain Encolpius and his companions in the south of Italy, chiefly in Naples or its environs, are made a vehicle for exposing the false taste and vices of the age. Unfortunately, the vices of the personages introduced are depicted with such fidelity that we are perpetually disgusted by the obscurity of the descriptions. The longest section is generally known as the Supper of Trimalchio, presenting us with a detailed account of a fantastic banquet, such as the gourmands of the empire were wont to exhibit on their tables. Next in interest is the well-known tale of the Ephesian Matron. A great number of conflicting opinions have been formed by scholars with regard to the author of the Satyricon. Many suppose that he is the same person as the C. or T. Petronius mentioned above; and though there are no proofs in favor of this hypothesis, yet there is good reason to believe that the work belongs to the first century, or, at all events, is not later than the reign of Hadrian. The best edition is by P. Burmannus, 4to, Traj. ad Rhen., 1709, and again Amst., 1743.

euleius Cotta were destroyed with their troops by Ambiorix, B.C. 54.]

PEUCE. (Πεύκη: now Picczina), an island in Mæsia Inferior, formed by the two southern mouths of the Danube, of which the most southerly was also called Peuce, but more commonly the Sacred Mouth. This island is of a triangular form, and is said by the ancients to be as large as Rhodes. It was inhabited by the Peucini, who were a tribe of the Bastarnæ, and took their name from the island.

PEUCELA, PEUCELADOTIS (Πευκῆλα, Πευκελαδωτίς: now Pekheli or Pakholi), a city and district in the northwest of India intra Gangem, between the rivers Indus and Suastus.

PEUCESTAS (Πευκῆστας), a Macedonian, and a distinguished officer of Alexander the Great. He had the chief share in saving the life of Alexander in the assault on the city of the Malli in India, and was afterward appointed by the king to the satrapy of Persia. In the division of the provinces after the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), he obtained the renewal of his government of Persia. He fought on the side of Eumenes against Antigonus (317–316), but displayed both arrogance and insubordination in these campaigns. Upon the surrender of Eumenes by the Argyraspids, Peucestas fell into the hands of Antigonus, who deprived him of his satrapy.

PHÆA (Φαία), the name of the sow of Crommyon in Megaris, which ravaged the neighborhood, and was slain by Theseus.

PHÆACES (Φαίακες, Φαίηκες), a fabulous people immortalized by the Odyssey, who inhabited the island SCHERIA (Σχέρια), situated at the extreme western part of the earth, and who were governed by King Alcinoüs. Vid. ALCINOÜS. They are described by Homer as a people fond of the feast, the lyre, and the dance, and hence their name passed into a proverb to indicate persons of luxurious and sensual habits. Thus a glutton is called Phæax by Horace (Ep., i., 15, 24). The ancients identified the Homeric Scheria with Corcyra, whence the latter is called by the poets Phæacia tellus; but there is no sound argument in favor of the identity of the two islands, and it is better to regard Scheria as altogether fabulous.

PHÆAX (Φαίαξ), an Athenian orator and statesman, and a contemporary of Nicias and Alcibiades. Some critics maintain that the extant speech against Aleibiades, commonly attributed to Andocides, was written by Phæax.

[PHÆDIMA (Φαιδίμη), a Persian lady, daughter of Otanes, was one of the wives of Cambyses and of Smerdis the magian. It was through her means that the false Smerdis was detected and exposed.]

[PHÆDIMUS (Φαιδίμοϋς). 1. A king of the Sionians, who hospitably received Menelaus on his return from Troy.—2. A native of Bisanthe in Macedonia, or of Amastir in Paphlagonia, an epigrammatic poet, four of whose epigrams are contained in the Greek Anthology.]

PHÆDON (Φαίδων), a Greek philosopher, was a native of Elis, and of high birth, but was taken prisoner, probably about B.C. 400, and was brought to Athens. It is said that he ran away from his master to Socrates, and was ransomed by one of the friends of the latter. Phædon was present at the death of Socrates, while he was still quite a youth. He appears to have lived in Athens some time after the death of Socrates, and then returned to Elis, where he became the founder of a school of philosophy. He was succeeded by Plistanus, after whom the Elean school was merged in the Eretrian. The dialogue of Plato, which contains an account of the death of Socrates, bears the name of Phædon.

PHÆDRA (Φαίδρα), daughter of Minos by Pasiphaë or Crete, and the wife of Theseus. She was the step-mother of Hippolytus, the son of Theseus, with whom she fell in love; but having been repulsed by Hippolytus, she accused him to Theseus of having attempted her dishonor. After the death of Hippolytus, his innocence became known to his father, and Phædra made away with herself. For details, vid. HIPPOLYTUS.

PHÆDRUS (Φαίδροϋς). 1. An Epicurean philosopher, and the president of the Epicurean school during Cicero's residence in Athens, B.C. 80. He died in 70, and was succeeded by Patron. He was the author of a work on the gods (Περὶ θεῶν), of which an interesting fragment was discovered at Herculaneum in 1806, and published by Petersen, Hamb., 1833. Cicero was largely indebted to this work for the materials of the first book of the De Natura Deorum.—2. The Latin fabulist, of whom we know nothing but what is collected or inferred from his fables. He was originally a slave, and was brought from Thrace or Macedonia to Rome, where he learned the Latin language. As the title of his work is Phædri Aug. Liberti Fabulæ Æsopiæ, we must conclude that he had belonged to Augustus, who manumitted him. Under Tiberius he appears to have undergone some persecution from Sejanus. The fables extant under the name of Phædrus are ninety-seven in number, written in iambic verse, and distributed into five books. Most of the fables are transfusions of the Æsopian fables, or those which pass as such, into Latin verse. The expression is generally clear and concise, and the language, with some few exceptions, as pure and correct as we should expect from a Roman writer of the Augustan age. But Phædrus has not escaped censure when he has deviated from his Greek model, and much of the censure is just. The best fables are those in which he has kept the closest to his original. Many of the fables, however, are not Æsopian, as the matter clearly shows, for they refer to historical events—of a much later period (v., 1, 8; iii., 10); and Phædrus himself, in the prologue to the fifth book, intimates that he had often used the name of Æsop only to recommend his verses. There is also another collection of thirty-two fables attributed to Æsop, and entitled Epitome Fabularum, which was first published at Naples in 1809, by Cassitti. Opinions are much divided as to the genuineness of this collection. The probability is, that the Epitome is founded on genuine Roman fables, which, in the process of transcription during many centuries, have undergone considerable changes. The last and only critical edition of Phædrus is by Orelli, Zürich, 1831.

PHÆSTUS (Φαιστός; Φαίστιος). 1. A town in the south of Crete, near Gortyna, twenty stadia from the sea, with a port-town, Matala or Matalia, said to have been built by the Heraclid Phæstus, who came from Sicily to Crete. The town is mentioned by Homer, but was destroyed at an early period by Gortyna. It was the birth-place of Epimenides, and its inhabitants were celebrated for their wit and sarcasm.—2. A town of Thessaly, in the district Thessaliotis.

PHÆËTHON (Φαέθων), that is, "the shining," occurs in Homer as an epithet or surname of Helios (the Sun), and is used by later writers as a proper name for Helios; but it is more commonly known as the name of a son of Helios by the Oceanid Clymene, the wife of Merops. The genealogy of Phaethon, however, is not the same in all writers, for some call him a son of Clymene, the son of Helios by Merope, or a son of Helios by Prote, or, lastly, a son of Helios by the nymph Rhode or Rhodos. He received the significant name of Phaethon from his father, and was afterward presumptuous and ambitious enough to request his father to allow him for one day to drive the chariot of the sun across the heavens. Helios was induced by the entreaties of his son and of Clymene to yield, but, the youth being too weak to check the horses, they rushed out of their usual track, and came so near the earth as almost to set it on fire. Thereupon Jupiter (Zeus) killed him with a flash of lightning, and hurled him down into the River Eridanus. His sisters, the Heliades or Phaethontides, who had yoked the horses to the chariot, were metamorphosed into poplars, and their tears into amber. VID. HELIADÆ.

[PHALACRA (Φαλάκρα and Φαλάκραι), a city of Cyrenaica, between Cænopolis and Marabina

according to Pliny, celebrated on account of its wine.]

PHALÆCUS (Φάλακος). 1. Son of Onomarchus, succeeded his uncle Phayllus as leader of the Phocians in the Sacred War, B.C. 351. In order to secure his own safety, he concluded a treaty with Philip, by which he was allowed to withdraw into the Peloponnesus with a body of eight thousand mercenaries, leaving the unhappy Phocians to their fate, 346. Phalæcus now assumed the part of a mere leader of mercenary troops, in which character we find him engaging in various enterprises. He was slain at the siege of Cydonia in Crete.—2. A lyric and epigrammatic poet, from whom the metre called Phalæcian took its name. Five of his epigrams are preserved in the Greek Anthology. His date is uncertain, but he was probably one of the principal Alexandrian poets.

PHALÆSIÆ (Φαλακισία), a town in Arcadia, south of Megalopolis, on the road to Sparta, twenty stadia from the Laconian frontier.

PHALANNA (Φάλαννα : Φαλανναίος : now Kardjoli), a town of the Perrhæbæ in the Thessalian district of Hestizæotis, on the left bank of the Peneus, not far from Tempe.

PHALANTHUS (Φάλανθος), son of Aracus, was one of the Lacedæmonian Partheniæ, or the offspring of some marriages of disparagement, which the necessity of the first Messenian war had induced the Spartans to permit. (Vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. PARTHENIÆ.) As the Partheniæ were looked down upon by their fellow-citizens, they formed a conspiracy under Phalanthus against the government. Their design having been detected, they went to Italy under the guidance of Phalanthus, and founded the city of Tarentum, about B.C. 708. Phalanthus was afterward driven out from Tarentum by a sedition, and ended his days at Brundisium.

PHALARA (τὰ Φάλαρα : Φαλαρεύς), a town in the Thessalian district of Phtiotis, on the Sinus Maliacus, served as the harbor of Lamia.

[PHALARIS, one of the Trojan warriors who accompanied Æneas to Italy : he was slain by Turnus.]

PHALÆRIS (Φάλαρις), ruler of Agrigentum in Sicily, has obtained a proverbial celebrity as a cruel and inhuman tyrant ; but we have scarcely any real knowledge of his life and history. His reign probably commenced about B.C. 570, and is said to have lasted sixteen years. He was a native of Agrigentum, and appears to have been raised by his fellow-citizens to some high office in the state, of which he afterward availed himself to assume a despotic authority. He was engaged in frequent wars with his neighbors, and extended his power and dominion on all sides, though more frequently by stratagem than open force. He perished by a sudden outbreak of the popular fury, in which it appears that Telemachus, the ancestor of Theron, must have borne a conspicuous part. No circumstance connected with Phalaris is more celebrated than the brazen bull in which he is said to have burned alive the victims of his cruelty, and of which we are told that he made the first experiment upon its inventor Perillus. This latter story has much the air of an invention of later times, but the fame of this celebrated engine of torture was inseparably associated with the name of Phalaris as early as the time of Pindar. (Pind., Pyth., i., 185.) That poet also speaks of Phalaris himself in terms which clearly prove that his reputation as a barbarous tyrant was then already fully established, and all subsequent writers, until a very late period, allude to him in terms of similar import. But in the later ages of Greek literature, there appears to have existed or arisen a totally different tradition concerning Phalaris, which represented him as a man of a naturally mild and humane disposition, and only forced into acts of severity or occasional cruelty by the pressure of circumstances and the machinations of his enemies. Still more strange is it that he appears at the same time as an admirer of literature and philosophy, and the patron of men of letters. Such is the aspect under which his character is presented to us in two declamations commonly ascribed to Lucian, and still more strikingly in the well-known epistles which bear the name of Phalaris himself. These epistles are now remembered chiefly on account of the literary controversy to which they gave rise, and the masterly dissertation in which Bentley exposed their spuriousness. They are evidently the composition of some sophist, though the period at which the forgery was composed can not now be determined. The first author who refers to them is Stobæus. The best edition is by Schæfer, Lips., 1823.

PHALARIUM (Φαλάριον), a fortress named after Phalaris, near the southern coast of Sicily, situated on a hill forty stadia east of the River Himera.

PHALASARNA (τὰ Φαλάσαρνα), a town on the northwestern coast of Crete.

[PHALCES (Φάλκης), a Trojan warrior, slain before Troy by Antilochus.]

PHALÆRUM (Φάληρον : Φαληρεύς), the most easterly of the harbors of Athens, and the one chiefly used by the Athenians before the time of the Persian wars. Phalerum is usually described as the most easterly of the three harbors in the peninsula of Piræus ; but this appears to be incorrect. The names of the three harbors in the peninsula were Piræus, Zea, and Munychia ; while Phalærum lay southeast of these three, nearer the city, at Hagios Georgios. After the establishment by Themistocles of the three harbors in the peninsula of Piræus, Phalærum was not much used ; but it was connected with the city by means of a wall called the Phalerian Wall (Φαληρικὸν τείχος). Phaleron or Phalerus was also an Attic demus, containing temples of Jupiter (Zeus), Ceres (Demeter), and other deities.

[PHALINUS (Φαλίνος), a Zacynthian, in the service of Tissaphernes ; after the battle of Cunaxa, B.C. 401, he accompanied the Persian heralds sent to the army of the ten thousand to require them to lay down their arms : he returned unsuccessful, having been unable to get any satisfactory answer from Clearchus.]

PHALŌRIA (Φαλωρία), a fortified town of Thessaly in Hestizæotis, north of Tricca, on the left bank of the Peneus.

PHANÆ (Φάναι, ἢ Φαναία ἄκρα : now Cape Maritico), the southern point of the island of Chios celebrated for its temple of Apollo and for its excellent wine.

PHANAGORIA (Φαναγόρεια, and other forms: ruins at Phanagor, near Taman, on the eastern side of the Straits of Kaffa), a Greek city, founded by a colony of Teians under Phanagoras, on the Asiatic coast of the Cimmerian Bosphorus. It became the great emporium for all the traffic between the coasts of the Palus Mæotis and the countries on the southern side of the Caucasus, and was chosen by the kings of Bosphorus as their capital in Asia. It had a temple of Venus (Aphrodite) Apatoros, and its neighborhood was rich in olive-yards. In the sixth century A.D. it was destroyed by the surrounding barbarians.

PHANARĒA (Φανάρια), a great plain of Pontus in Asia Minor, inclosed by the mountain chains of Paryadres on the east, and Lithrus and Ophlimus on the west, was the most fertile part of Pontus.

[PHANES (Φάνης), a Greek of Halicarnassus, in the service of Amasis, king of Egypt, whom he deserted, and went over to Cambyses, king of Persia.]

PHANĪAS or PHĒNĪAS (Φανίας, Φαινίας), of Ereos in Lesbos, a distinguished Peripatetic philosopher, the immediate disciple of Aristotle, and the contemporary, fellow-citizen, and friend of Theophrastus. He flourished about B.C. 336. Phantias does not seem to have founded a distinct school of his own, but he was a most diligent writer upon every department of philosophy, as it was studied by the Peripatetics, especially logic, physics, history, and literature. His works, all of which are lost, are frequently quoted by later writers. One of his works most frequently cited was a sort of chronicle of his native city, bearing the title of Προτάσεις Ἐρῆσίου.

PHANŌLES (Φανοκλής), one of the best of the later Greek elegiac poets, probably lived in the time of Philip and Alexander the Great. He seems only to have written one poem, which was entitled Ἐρωτες ἢ Καλοί. The work was upon pæderastia; but the subject was so treated as to exhibit the retribution which fell upon those who addicted themselves to the practice. We still possess a considerable fragment from the opening of the poem, which describes the love of Orpheus for Calais, and the vengeance taken upon him by the Thracian women. The fragments of Phanocles are edited by Bach, Philæta, Hermesianactis, atque Phanoclis Reliquiæ, Halle, 1829; and by Schneidewin, Delectus Poes. Græc., p. 158.

PHANŌDEMUS (Φανόδημος), the author of one of those works on the legends and antiquities of Attica, known under the name of Attides. His age and birth-place are uncertain, but we know that he lived before the time of Augustus, as he is cited by Dionysius of Halicarnassus. [The last edition of the fragments is in Müller's Hist. Græc. Fragm., p. 366-370.]

[PHANOSTHENES (Φανοσθένης), an Andrian, was intrusted by the Athenians in B.C. 407 with the command of four ships, and was sent to Andros to succeed Conon on that station. On his way he fell in with two Thurian galleys, under the command of Dorieus, and captured them with their crews.]

PHANOTE (now Gardhiki), a fortified town of Epirus in Chaonia, near the Illyrian frontier.

PHANTASĪA (Φαντασία), one of those numerous mythical personages to whom Homer is said to have been indebted for his poems. She is said to have been an Egyptian, the daughter of Niarchus, an inhabitant of Memphis, and to have written an account of the Trojan war and the wanderings of Ulysses.

PHĀON (Φάων). 1. A boatman at Mytilene, is said to have been originally an ugly old man; but, in consequence of his carrying Venus (Aphrodite) across the sea without accepting payment, the goddess gave him youth and beauty. After this Sappho is said to have fallen in love with him, and to have leaped from the Leucadian rock when he slighted her; but this well-known story vanishes at the first approach of criticism. Vid. SAPPHO.—[2. A freedman of the Emperor Nero, in whose villa in the neighborhood of the city Nero took refuge when the people rose against him, and where he met his death, A.D. 68.]

PHĀRÆ (Φαράϊ or Φήραι). 1. (Φαραιεύς or Φαρεύς), an ancient town in the western part of Achæa, and one of the twelve Achæan cities, was situated on the River Pierus, seventy stadia from the sea, and one hundred and fifty from Patræ. It was one of the states which took an active part in reviving the Achæan league in B.C. 281. Augustus included it in the territory of Patræ.—2. (Φαραίτης, Φαραιάτης, Φαράτης: now Kalamata), an ancient town in Messenia, mentioned by Homer, on the River Nedon, near the frontiers of Laconia, and about six miles from the sea. In B.C. 180 Pharæ joined the Achæan league together with the neighboring towns of Thuria and Abia. It was annexed by Augustus to Laconia.—3. Originally PHARIS (Φάρις: Φαρίτης, Φαριάτης), a town in Laconia, in the valley of the Eurotas, south of Sparta.—4. A town in Crete, founded by the Messenian Pharæ.

[PHARAN (Φαράν), a city of Arabia Petræa, in the neighborhood of a promontory of the same name (now Farauin), between the two arms of the Sinus Arabicus, and which is now recalled to mind by the Wady Faran or Firan.]

[PHARAX (Φάραξ). 1. One of the council of ten appointed by the Spartans in B.C. 418 to control Agis. At the battle of Mantineia in that year, he restrained the Lacedæmonians from pressing too much on the defeated enemy, and so running the risk of driving them to despair. In B.C. 396 he laid siege with one hundred and twenty ships to Caunus, where Conon was stationed, but was compelled to withdraw by the approach of a large force.—2. A Spartan, sent to negotiate an alliance with Athens against Thebes, B.C. 369.]

PHARBÆTHUS (Φάρβαθος: ruins at Horbeyl?), the capital of the Nomos Pharbæthites in Lower Egypt, lay south of Tanis, on the western side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile.

PHARCĀDŌN (Φαρκαδών), a town of Thessaly, in the eastern part of Hestieotis.

PHARIS. Vid. PHARÆ, No. 3.

PHARMACUSSÆ (Φαρμακουσσαί). 1. Two small islands off the coast of Attica, near Salamis, in the Bay of Eleusis, now called Kyradhes or Megali and Mikri Kyra: on one of them was shown the tomb of Circe.—2. PHARMACUSA (Φαρμακουσσα), an island off the coast of Asia Minor, one hundred and twenty stadia from Miletus, where King Attalus died, and near which Julius Cæsar was taken prisoner by pirates when a very young man. The whole adventure is related by Plutarch (Cæs., 1, 2).

PHARNABAZUS (Φαρνάβαζος), son of Pharnaces, succeeded his father as satrap of the Persian provinces near the Hellespont. In B.C. 411 and the following years, he rendered active assistance to the Lacedæmonians in their war against the Athenians. When Dercyllidas, and subsequently Agesilaus, passed over into Asia to protect the Asiatic Greeks against the Persian power, we find Pharnabazus connecting himself with Conon to resist the Lacedæmonians. In 374 Pharnabazus invaded Egypt in conjunction with Iphicrates, but the expedition failed, chiefly through the dilatory proceedings and the excessive caution of Pharnabazus. The character of Pharnabazus is eminently distinguished by generosity and openness. He has been charged, it is true, with the murder of Alcibiades; but the latter probably fell by the hands of others. VID. ALCIBIADES.

PHARNĀCES (Φαρνάκης). 1. King of Pontus, was the son of Mithradates IV., whom he succeeded on the throne about B.C. 190. He carried on war for some years with Eumenes, king of Pergamus, and Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, but was obliged to conclude with them a disadvantageous peace in 179. The year of his death is uncertain; it is placed by conjecture in 156.—2. King of Pontus, or more properly of the Bosphorus, was the son of Mithradates the Great, whom he compelled to put an end to his life in 63. VID. MITHRADATES, No. 6. After the death of his father, Pharnaces hastened to make his submission to Pompey, who granted him the kingdom of the Bosphorus with the titles of friend and ally of the Roman people. In the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey, Pharnaces seized the opportunity to reinstate himself in his father's dominions, and made himself master of the whole of Colchis and the lesser Armenia. He defeated Domitius Calvinus, the lieutenant of Cæsar in Asia, but was shortly afterward defeated by Cæsar himself in a decisive action near Zela (47). The battle was gained with such ease by Cæsar, that he informed the senate of his victory by the words Veni, vidi, vici. In the course of the same year Pharnaces was again defeated, and was slain by Asander, one of his generals, who hoped to obtain his master's kingdom. VID. ASANDER.—[3. Father of Artabazus, who commanded the Parthians and Chorasmians in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece.—4. Son of Pharnabazus, appears to have been satrap of the provinces of Asia, near the Hellespont, as early as B.C. 430.—5. A Persian of high rank, and brother-in-law of Darius Codomannus, was killed at the battle of the Granicus, B.C. 334.]

PHARNACĪA (Φαρνακία: now Khresoun or Kerasunda), a flourishing city of Asia Minor, on the coast of Pontus Polcomiacus, was built near (some think on) the site of Cerasus, probably by Pharnaces, the grandfather of Mithradates the Great, and peopled by the transference to it of the inhabitants of Cotyora. It had a large commerce and extensive fisheries, and in its neighborhood were the iron mines of the Chalybes. It was strongly fortified, and was used by Mithradates in the war with Rome for the place of refuge of his harm.

[PHARNASPES (Φαρνάσπης), a Persian of the family of the Achæmenidæ, was the father of Cassandane, a favorite wife of Cyrus the Great.]

[PHARNUCHUS (Φαρνοῦχος). 1. An officer of Cyrus the elder, and one of the chiliarchs of his cavalry in the war with Cræsus. After the conquest of Babylon he was made satrap of the Hellespontine Phrygia and Æolis.—2. One of the three commanders of the cavalry in the army of Xerxes. A fall from his horse occasioned his detention at Sardis while the Persians invaded Greece. By his order the horse's legs were cut off at the knees on the spot where he had thrown his master.—3. A Lycian appointed by Alexander the Great to command the forces sent into Sogdiana against Spitamenes in B.C. 329.]

PHARSĀLUS (Φάρσαλος, Ion. Φάρσηλος: Φαρσάλιος: now Pharsa or Fersala), a town in Thessaly, in the district Thessalotis, not far from the frontiers of Phthiotis, west of the River Enipeus, and on the northern slope of Mount Narthacius. It was divided into an old and new city, and contained a strongly-fortified acropolis. In its neighborhood, northeast of the town and on the other side of the Enipeus, was a celebrated temple of Thetis, called Thetidium. Near Pharsalus was fought the decisive battle between Cæsar and Pompey, B.C. 48, which made Cæsar master of the Roman world. It is frequently called the battle of Pharsalia, which was the name of the territory of the town.

PHĀRUS (Φάρος). 1. (Now Pharos or Raudhat-el-tin, i. e., Fig-garden), a small island off the Mediterranean coast of Egypt, mentioned by Homer, who describes it as a whole day's sail distant from Ægyptus, meaning probably, not Egypt itself, but the River Nile. When Alexander the Great planned the city of Alexandria, on the coast opposite to Pharos, he caused the island to be united to the coast by a mole seven stadia in length, thus forming the two harbors of the city. VID. ALEXANDREA. The island was chiefly famous for the lofty tower built upon it by Ptolemy II. Philadelphus for a light-house, whence the name of pharus was applied to all similar structures. It was in this island, too, that, according to the common story, the seventy translators of the Greek version of the Old Testament, hence called the Septuagint, were confined till their work was finished. The island was well peopled according to Julius Cæsar, but soon afterward Strabo tells us that it was inhabited only by a few fishermen.—2. (Now Lesina or Hvar), an island of the Adriatic, off the coast of Dalmatia, east of Issa, with a Greek city of the same name (ruins at Civita Vecchia), which was taken and destroyed by the Romans under Æmilius Paulus, but probably rebuilt, as it is mentioned by Ptolemy under the name of Pharia.

[PHARUS (Φάρος). 1. The helmsman of Menelaus, from whom the island of Pharus at the mouth of the Nile was believed to have derived its name.—2. A Rutulian, slain by Æneas in Italy in the war with Turnus.]

PHARŪSĪI (Φαρούσιοι), a people in the interior (probably near the western coast) of Northern Africa, who carried on a considerable traffic with Mauretania.

PHASÆLIS (Φασσηλῖς: now probably Ain-el-Fusail), a city of Palestine, in the valley of the Jordan, north of Jericho, built by Herod the Great.

PHASELIS (Φασηλῖς, Φασηλίτης: ruins at Tekroza), an important sea-port town of Lycia, near the borders of Pamphylia, stood on the Gulf of Pamphylia, at the foot of Mount Solyma, in a narrow pass between the mountains and the sea. It was founded by Dorian colonists, and from its position, and its command of three fine harbors, it soon gained an extensive commerce. It did not belong to the Lycian confederacy, but had an independent government of its own. It became afterward the head-quarters of the pirates who infested the southern coasts of Asia Minor, and was therefore destroyed by P. Servilius Isauricus; and though the city was restored, it never recovered its importance. Phaselis is said to have been the place at which the light, quick vessels called φάσηλοι were first built, and the figure of such a ship appears on its coins.

PHĀSIS (Φᾱσις). 1. (Now Faz or Rioni), a renowned river of the ancient world, rose in the Moschici Montes (or, according to others, in the Caucasus, where, in fact, its chief tributaries rise), and flowed westward through the plain of Colchis into the eastern end of the Pontus Euxinus (now Black Sea), after receiving several affluents, the chief of which were the Glaucus and the Rion: the name of the latter was sometimes transferred, as it now is, to the main river. It was navigable about thirty-eight miles above its mouth for large vessels, and for small ones further up, as far as Sarapana (now Sharapan), whence goods were conveyed in four days across the Moschici Montes to the River Cyrus, and so to the Caspian. It was spanned by one hundred and twenty bridges, and had many towns upon its banks. Its waters were celebrated for their purity and for various other supposed qualities, some of a very marvellous nature; but it was most famous in connection with the story of the Argonautic expedition. Vid. ARGONAUTÆ. Some of the early geographers made it the boundary between Europe and Asia; it was afterward the northeastern limit of the kingdom of Pontus, and, under the Romans, it was regarded as the northern frontier of their empire in Western Asia. Another notable circumstance connected with it is, that it has given name to the pheasant (phasianus, φασιανός, φασιανικός ὄρνις), which is said to have been first brought to Greece from its banks, where the bird is still found in great numbers. When the geography of these regions was comparatively unknown, it was natural that there should be a doubt as to the identification of certain celebrated names, and thus the name Phasis, like Araxes, is applied to different rivers. The most important of these variations is Xenophon's application of the name Phasis to the River Araxes in Armenia. (Anab., iv., 6.)—2. Near the mouth of the river, on its southern side, was a town of the same name, founded and fortified by the Milesians as an emporium for their commerce, and used under the kings of Pontus and under the Romans as a frontier fort, and now a Russian fortified station, under the name of Pati. Some identify it with Sebastopolis, but most likely incorrectly.—3. There was a river of the same name in the island of Taprobane (now Ceylon).

PHAVORINUS. Vid. FAVORINUS.

PHAYLLUS (Φάυλλος). 1. A celebrated athlete of Crotona, who had thrice gained the victory at the Pythian games. He fought at the battle of Salamis, B.C. 480, in a ship fitted out at his own expense.—2. A Phocian, brother of Onomarchus, whom he succeeded as general of the Phocians in the Sacred war, 352. He died in the following year, after a long and painful illness. Phayllus made use of the sacred treasures of Delphi with a far more lavish hand than either of his brothers, and he is accused of bestowing the consecrated ornaments upon his wife and mistresses.

PHAZANIA (now Fezzan), a district of Libya Interior. Vid. GARAMANTES.

PHAZEMON (Φαζημών: now probably Marsivan), a city of Pontus in Asia Minor, northwest of Amasia, and the capital of the western district of Pontus, called Phazemonitis (Φαζημωνίτης), which lay on the eastern side of the Halys, south of Gazelonitis, and was celebrated for its warm mineral springs. Pompey changed the name of the city to Neapolis, and the district was called Neapolitis; but these names seem to have been soon dropped.

PHĒA (Φεῖά, Φεᾶ, Φεᾶ: Φεαῖος), a town on the frontiers of Elis and Pisatis, with a harbor situated on a promontory of the same name, and on the River Iardanus. In front of the harbor was a small island called Phēas (Φεῖας).

PHĒCA or PHECADUM, a fortress in Thessaly, in the district Hestiatotis.

PHĒGEUS (Φηγεύς). 1. King of Psophis in Arcadia, father of Alpheisibœa or Arsinoc, of Prcnous and Agnor, or of Temenus and Axion. He purified Alcmaeon after he had killed his mother, and gave him his daughter Alpheisibœa in marriage. Alcmaeon presented Alpheisibœa with the celebrated necklace and peplus of Harmonia; but when Alcmaeon afterward wished to obtain them again for his new wife Callirrhœ, he was murdered by the sons of Phegeus, by their father's command. Phegeus was himself subsequently put to death by the sons of Alcmaeon. For details, vid. ALCMÆON.—[2. Son of Dares, priest of Vulcan (Hephestus) in Troy, slain in the Trojan war by Diomedes.—3. Name of two Trojan warriors, companions of Æneas, slain by Turnus in Italy.]

[PHELLIAS (Φελλίας), a little stream of Laconia, which empties into the Eurotas, south of Sparta.]

[PHELLŒE (Φελλῶνη, near the modern Zakhuli), a small town in the east of Achaia, forty stadia inland from Ægira, in a well-watered and well-wooded district.]

PHĒLLUS (Φέλλος or Φελλός: Φελλίτης: ruins near Saaret), an inland city of Lycia, on a mountain between Xanthus and Antiphellus; the latter having been at first the port of Phellus, but afterward eclipsing it.

PHĒLLŪSA, a small island near Lesbos.

PHĒMĪUS (Φῆμιος), a celebrated minstrel, son of Terpius, who entertained with his song the suitors in the palace of Ulysses in Ithaca.

PHĒMŌNŌĒ (Φημωνῶνη), a mythical Greek poetess of the ante-Homeric period, was said to have been the daughter of Apollo, and his first priestess at Delphi, and the inventor of the hexameter verse. There were poems which went according to the legend preserved in Herodotus, it was a punishment for his presumptuous impiety in throwing a spear into the waters of the Nile when it had overflowed the fields. By attending to the directions of an oracle he was cured; and he dedicated an obelisk at Heliopolis in gratitude for his recovery. Pliny tells us that this obelisk, together with another also made by him, but broken in its removal, was to be seen at Rome, in the Circus of Caligula and Nero, at the foot of the Vatican Hill. Pliny calls the Pheron of Herodotus Nuncoreus or Nencoreus, a name corrupted, perhaps, from Menophtheus. Diodorus gives him his father's name, Sesosis. Pheron is of course the same word as Pharaoh.

PHIDIAS (Φειδίας), the greatest sculptor and statuary of Greece. Of his personal history we possess but few details. He was a native of Athens, and the son of Charmides, and was born about the time of the battle of Marathon, B.C. 490. He began to work as a statuary about 464, and one of his first great works was the statue of Minerva (Athena) Promachus, which may be assigned to about 460. This work must have established his reputation; but it was surpassed by the splendid productions of his own hand, and of others working under his direction, during the administration of Pericles. That statesman not only chose Phidias to execute the principal statues which were to be set up, but gave him the oversight of all the works of art which were to be erected. Of these works the chief were the Propylæa of the Acropolis, and, above all, the temple of Minerva (Athena) on the Acropolis, called the Parthenon, on which, as the central point of the Athenian polity and religion, the highest efforts of the best of artists were employed. There can be no doubt that the sculptured ornaments of this temple, the remains of which form the glory of the British Museum, were executed under the immediate superintendence of Phidias; but the colossal statue of the divinity, made of ivory and gold, which was inclosed within that magnificent shrine, was the work of the artist's own hand. The statue was dedicated in 438. Having finished his great work at Athens, he went to Elis and Olympia, which he was now invited to adorn. He was there engaged for about four or five years, from 437 to 434 or 433, during which time he finished his statue of the Olympian Jupiter (Zeus), the greatest of all his works. On his return to Athens he fell a victim to the jealousy against his great patron, Pericles, which was then at its height. The party opposed to Pericles, thinking him too powerful to be overthrown by a direct attack, aimed at him in the persons of his most cherished friends, Phidias, Anaxagoras, and Aspasia. Vid. PERICLES. Phidias was first accused of peculation, but this charge was at once refuted, as, by the advice of Pericles, the gold had been affixed to the statue of Minerva (Athena) in such a manner that it could be removed and the weight of it examined. The accusers then charged Phidias with impiety, in having introduced into the battle of the Amazons, on the shield of the goddess, his own likeness and that of Pericles. On this latter charge Phidias was thrown into prison, where he died from disease in

432. Of the numerous works executed by Phidias for the Athenians, the most celebrated was the statue of Minerva (Athena) in the Parthenon, to which reference has already been made. This statue was of that kind of work which the Greeks called chryselephantine, that is, the statue was formed of plates of ivory laid upon a core of wood or stone, for the flesh parts, while the drapery and other ornaments were of solid gold. The statue stood in the foremost and larger chamber of the temple (prodomus). It represented the goddess standing, clothed with a tunic reaching to the ankles, with her spear in her left hand, and an image of Victory four cubits high in her right: she was girded with the agis, and had a helmet on her head, and her shield rested on the ground by her side. The height of the statue was twenty-six cubits, or nearly forty feet, including the base. The eyes were of a kind of marble, nearly resembling ivory, perhaps painted to imitate the iris and pupil; there is no sufficient authority for the statement which is frequently made that they were of precious stones. The weight of the gold upon the statue, which, as above stated, was removable at pleasure, is said by Thucydides to have been forty talents (ii., 13). Still more celebrated than his statue of Minerva (Athena) was the colossal ivory and gold statue of Jupiter (Zeus), which Phidias made for the great temple of this god, in the Allis or sacred grove at Olympia. This statue was regarded as the master-piece, not only of Phidias, but of the whole range of Grecian art; and was looked upon not so much as a statue, but rather as if it were the actual manifestation of the present deity. It was placed in the prodomus or front chamber of the temple, directly facing the entrance. It was only visible, however, on great festivals: at other times it was concealed by a magnificent curtain. The god was represented as seated on a throne of cedar wood, adorned with gold, ivory, ebony, stones, and colors, crowned with a wreath of olive, holding in his right hand an ivory and gold statue of Victory, and in his left hand supporting a sceptre, which was ornamented with all sorts of metals, and surmounted by an eagle. The throne was brilliant both with gold and stones, and with ebony and ivory, and was ornamented with figures both painted and sculptured. The statue almost reached to the roof, which was about sixty feet in height. The idea which Phidias essayed to embody in this, his greatest work, was that of the supreme deity of the Hellenic nation, no longer engaged in conflicts with the Titans and the Giants, but having laid aside his thunderbolt, and enthroned as a conqueror, in perfect majesty and repose, ruling with a nod the subject world. It is related that when Phidias was asked what model he meant to follow in making his statue, he replied that of Homer (Il., i., 528-530). The imitation of this passage by Milton gives no small aid to the comprehension of the idea (Paradise Lost, iii., 135-137):

"Thus while God spake, ambrosial fragrance fill'd
All heaven, and in the blessed spirits elect Sense of new joy ineffable diffus'd."

The statue was removed by the Emperor Theodosius I. to Constantinople, where it was destroyed by a fire in A.D. 475. The distinguish- ing character of the art of Phidias was ideal beauty, and that of the sublimest order, especially in the representation of divinities, and of subjects connected with their worship. While on the one hand he set himself free from the stiff and unnatural forms which, by a sort of religious precedent, had fettered his predecessors of the archaic or hieratic school, he never, on the other hand, descended to the exact imitation of any human model, however beautiful; he never represented that distorted action, or expressed that vehement passion, which lie beyond the limits of repose; nor did he ever approach to that almost meretricious grace, by which some of his greatest followers, if they did not corrupt the art themselves, gave the occasion for its corruption in the hands of their less gifted and spiritual imitators.

PHIDIPPIDES or PHILIPPIDES (Φειδιππίδης, Φιλίππίδης), a courier, was sent by the Athenians to Sparta in B.C. 490 to ask for aid against the Persians, and arrived there on the second day from his leaving Athens. On his return to Athens, he related that on his way to Sparta he had fallen in with Pan on Mount Parthenium, near Tegea, and that the god had bid him ask the Athenians why they paid him no worship, though he had been hitherto their friend, and ever would be so. In consequence of this revelation, they dedicated a temple to Pan after the battle of Marathon, and honored him thenceforth with annual sacrifices and a torch-race.

[PHIDIPPUS (Φειδιππος), a son of Thessalus, the Heraclid, and brother of Antiphon, led the warriors of the Sporades in thirty ships against Troy.]

PHIDON (Φείδων). 1. Son of Aristodamidas, and king of Argos, restored the supremacy of Argos over Cleonæ, Phlius, Sicyon, Epidaurus, Træzen, and Ægina, and aimed at extending his dominions over the greater part of the Peloponnesus. The Pisans invited him, in the eighth Olympiad (B.C. 748), to aid them in excluding the Eleans from their usurped presidency at the Olympic games, and to celebrate them jointly with themselves. The invitation quite fell in with the ambitious pretensions of Phidon, who succeeded in dispossessing the Eleans and celebrating the games along with the Pisans; but the Eleans not long after defeated him, with the aid of Sparta, and recovered their privilege. Thus apparently fell the power of Phidon; but as to the details of the struggle we have no information. The most memorable act of Phidon was his introduction of copper and silver coinage, and a new scale of weights and measures, which, through his influence, became prevalent in the Peloponnesus, and ultimately throughout the greater portion of Greece. The scale in question was known by the name of the Æginetan, and it is usually supposed that the coinage of Phidon was struck in Ægina; but there seems good reason for believing that what Phidon did was done in Argos, and nowhere else; that "Phidonian measures" probably did not come to bear the specific name of the Æginetan until there was another scale in vogue, the Euboic, from which to distinguish them; and that both the epithets were derived, not from the place where the scale first originated, but from the people whose commercial activity tended to make them most generally known, in the one case the Æginetans, in the other case the inhabitants of Chalcis and Eretria.—2. An ancient Corinthian legislator of uncertain date.

PHIGALIA (Φιγαλία, Φιγάλεια, Φιγαλέα: Φιγαλεύς: now Paolitz), at a later time called PHILALIA, a town in the southwestern corner of Arcadia, on the frontiers of Messenia and Elis, and upon the River Lymax. It was taken by the Spartans B.C. 559, but was afterward recovered by the Phigalians with the help of the Oresthasians. It is frequently mentioned in the later wars of the Achæan and Ætolian leagues. Phigalia, however, owes its celebrity in modern times to the remains of a splendid temple in its territory, situated about six miles northeast of the town at Bassæ on Mount Cotyllum. This temple was built by Ictinus, the contemporary of Pericles and Phidias, and the architect, along with Callicrates, of the Parthenon at Athens. It was dedicated to Apollo Epicurius, or the Deliverer, because the god had delivered the country from the pestilence during the Peloponnesian war. Pausanias describes this temple as the most beautiful one in all Peloponnesus after the temple of Minerva (Athena) at Tegea. Most of the columns are still standing. In 1812 the frieze round the interior of the inner cella was discovered, containing a series of sculptures in alto-relievo, representing the combat of the Centaurs and the Lapithæ, and of the Greeks and the Amazons. Their height is a little more than two feet, and their total length is one hundred feet. They were found on the ground under the spot which they originally occupied, and were much injured by their fall, and by the weight of the ruins lying upon them. They were purchased for the British Museum in 1814, where they are still preserved, and are usually known by the name of the Phigalian Marbles. They are some of the most interesting and beautiful remains of ancient art in this country.

PHILA (Φίλα), daughter of Antipater, the regent of Macedonia, is celebrated as one of the noblest and most virtuous women of the age in which she lived. She was married to Craterus in B.C. 322, and after the death of Craterus, who survived his marriage with her scarcely a year, she was again married to the young Demetrius, the son of Antigonus. She shared with her husband his various vicissitudes of fortune; but when he was expelled from Macedonia in 287, she put an end to her own life at Cassandrea, unable to bear this unexpected reverse. She left two children by Demetrius: Antigonus, surnamed Gonatas, who became king of Macedonia; and a daughter, Stratonice, married first to Seleucus, and afterward to his son Antiochus.

PHILA (Φίλα: Φιλαῖος, Φιλάρης). 1. A town of Macedonia, in the province Pieria, situated on a steep hill on the Peneus, between Dium and Tempe, and at the entrance into Thessaly, built by Demetrius II., and named after his mother Phila.—2. An island off the southern coast of Gaul, one of the Stœchades.

[PHILADELPHIA (Φιλαδέλφεια, now Allah-sheh, i. e., city of God). 1. A city of Lydia, on the Cogamus, at the foot of Mount Tmolus, was founded by Attalus Philadelphus, brother of Eumenes, king of Pergamus. The place suffered repeatedly from violent shocks of earthquakes, and, in consequence, had, by the time of Strabo, become almost deserted. Tacitus mentions it among the towns restored by Tiberius, after a more than ordinary calamity of this kind. Philadelphia was one of the Seven Churches of Asia mentioned in the Apocalypse. At a later period it made a gallant resistance to the Turks, but was finally subdued by Bajazet in A. D. 1390.—2. (In the Old Testament, Rabbath-Ammon or Rabbah), the capital of the Ammonites, situated on the further side of the Jordan, taken from them by David. It was called Philadelphia from Ptolemy Philadelphus, and is frequently mentioned by this name in Greek and Roman writers. Vid. RABBATAMANA.]

PHILADELPHUS (Φιλῶδελφος), a surname of Ptolemæus II., king of Egypt (vid. PROLEMÆUS), and of Attalus II. of Pergamus. Vid. ATTALUS.

[PHILÆ (Φιλαι), an island in the Nile, to the south of Elephantine, and the southernmost point of Egypt, inhabited in common by Egyptians and Æthiopians. The island was covered with temples and other splendid structures, for it was sacred to Isis, and in the little island ΑΒΑΤΟΣ (g. v.) close to it was the tomb of Osiris: from the magnificent ruins still existing in the island, it is now called Djesiret-el-Birbeh, i. e., "Temple-island."]

PHILÆNI (Φιλαινοι), two brothers, citizens of Carthage, of whom the following story is told: A dispute having arisen between the Carthaginians and Cyrenæans about their boundaries, it was agreed that deputies should start at a fixed time from each of the cities, and that the place of their meeting, wherever it might be, should thenceforth form the limit of the two territories. The Philæni were appointed for this service on the part of the Carthaginians, and advanced much further than the Cyrenæan party. The Cyrenæans accused them of having set forth before the time agreed upon, but at length consented to accept the spot which they had reached as a boundary line, if the Philæni would submit to be buried alive there in the sand. Should they decline the offer, they were willing, they said, on their side, if permitted to advance as far as they pleased, to purchase for Cyrene an extension of territory by a similar death. The Philæni accordingly then and there devoted themselves for their country in the way proposed. The Carthaginians paid high honors to their memory, and erected altars to them where they had died; and from these, even long after all traces of them had vanished, the place still continued to be called "The Altars of the Philæni." Our main authority for this story is Salust, who probably derived his information from African traditions during the time that he was proconsul of Numidia, and at least three hundred years after the event. We can not, therefore, accept it unreservedly. The Greek name by which the heroic brothers have become known to us—Φιλαινοι, or lovers of praise—seems clearly to have been framed to suit the tale.

[PHILÆUS (Φιλαιος), a son of the Telamonian Ajax and Tecmessa, from whom the Attic demus of Philaidæ derived its name.]

er, born in Epirus, lived after Galen and before Oribasius, and therefore probably in the third century after Christ. He wrote several works, of which, however, only a few fragments remain.

PHILAMMON (Φιλῆμμων), a mythical poet and musician of the ante-Homeric period, was said to have been the son of Apollo and the nymph Chione, or Philonis, or Leuconoë. By the nymph Agriope, who dwelt on Parnassus, he became the father of Thamyris and Eumolpus. He is closely associated with the worship of Apollo at Delphi, and with the music of the cithara. He is said to have established the choruses of girls, who, in the Delphian worship of Apollo, sang hymns in which they celebrated the births of Latona (Leto), Diana (Artemis), and Apollo. Pausanias relates that in the most ancient musical contests at Delphi, the first who conquered was Chrysothemis of Crete, the second was Philammon, and the next after him his son Thamyris.

PHILARGYRÛS JUNÛS, or PHILARGYRUS, or JUNILÛS FLAGRIUS, an early commentator upon Virgil, who wrote upon the Bucolics and Georgics. His observations are less elaborate than those of Servius, and have descended to us in a mutilated condition. The period when he flourished is altogether uncertain. They are printed in the edition of Virgil by Burmann; [and in the edition of the commentaries of Servius by H. A. Lion, Göttingen, 1825–26.]

PHILE or PHILES, MANUEL (Μανουήλ ὁ Φιλῆς), a Byzantine poet, and a native of Ephesus, was born about A. D. 1275, and died about 1340. His poem, De Animalium Proprietate, chiefly extracted from Ælian, is edited by De Paw, Traj. Rhen., 1739; [and with a revised text by Lehrs and Dübner in the Bucolici Græci, forming part of Didot's Bibliotheca Græca, Paris, 1846;] and his other poems on various subjects are edited by Wernsdorf, Lips., 1768.

PHILÆAS (Φιλῆας). 1. A Greek geographer of Athens, whose time can not be determined with certainty, but who probably belonged to the older period of Athenian literature. He was the author of a Periplus, which was divided into two parts, one on Asia, and the other on Europe.—[2. Of Tarentum, having been sent as ambassador to Rome, he persuaded his countrymen, who were there detained as hostages, to make their escape, which they effected by his aid; but, having been overtaken at Terracina, they were brought back to Rome, scourged, and thrown from the Tarpeian rock.] •

PHILEMON (Φιλήμων). 1. An aged Phrygian and husband of Baucis. Once upon a time, Jupiter (Zeus) and Mercury (Hermes), assuming the appearance of ordinary mortals, visited Phrygia; but no one was willing to receive the strangers, until the hospitable hut of Philemon and Baucis was opened to them, where the two gods were kindly treated. Jupiter (Zeus) rewarded the good old couple by taking them to an eminence, while all the neighboring district was visited with a sudden inundation. On that eminence Jupiter (Zeus) appointed them the guardians of his temple, and allowed them both to die at the same moment, and then metamorphosed them into trees.—2. An Athenian poet of the New Comedy, was the son of Damon, and a native of Soli in Cilicia, but at an early age went to Athens, and there received the citizenship. He flourished in the reign of Alexander, a little earlier than Menander, whom, however, he long survived. He began to exhibit about B. C. 330. He was the first poet of the New Comedy in order of time, and the second in celebrity; and he shares with Menander the honor of its invention, or, rather, of reducing it to a regular form. Philemon lived nearly one hundred years. The manner of his death is differently related: some ascribing it to excessive laughter at a ludicrous incident; others to joy at obtaining a victory in a dramatic contest; while another story represents him as quietly called away by the goddesses whom he served in the midst of the composition or representation of his last and best work. Although there can be no doubt that Philemon was inferior to Menander as a poet, yet he was a greater favorite with the Athenians, and often conquered his rival in the dramatic contests. Vid. MENANDER. The extant fragments of Philemon display much liveliness, wit, eloquence, and practical knowledge of life. His favorite subjects seem to have been love intrigues, and his characters were the standing ones of the New Comedy, with which Plautus and Terence have made us familiar. The number of his plays was ninety-seven; the number of extant titles, after the doubtful and spurious ones are rejected, amounts to about fifty-three; but it is very probable that some of these should be assigned to the younger Philemon. The fragments of Philemon are printed with those of Menander by Meineke, Berlin, 1823, 8vo, in his Fragmenta Comicorum Græcorum, Berol., 1841; [and by Fr. Dübner at the end of the Aristophanes in Didot's Bibliotheca Græca, Paris, 1836.]—3. The younger Philemon, also a poet of the New Comedy, was a son of the former, in whose fame nearly all that belongs to him has been absorbed, so that, although he was the author of fifty-four dramas, there are only two short fragments, and not one title, quoted expressly under his name.—4. The author of a Λεξικὸν τεχνολογικόν, the extant portion of which was first edited by Burney, Lond., 1812, and afterward by Osann, Berlin, 1821. The author informs us that his work was intended to take the place of a similar lexicon by the grammarian Hyperechius. The work of Hyperechius was arranged in eight books, according to the eight different parts of speech. Philemon's lexicon was a meagre epitome of this work, and the part of it which is extant consists of the first book and the beginning of the second. Hyperechius lived about the middle of the fifth century of our era, and Philemon may probably be placed in the seventh.

[PHILESIUS (Φιλέσιος), an Achæan, an officer in the army of Cyrus the younger, and, after the treacherous capture of Clearchus and the other generals by Tissaphernes, was chosen in the place of Menon. He was selected with Sophænetus, as being the two oldest generals, to conduct the older men, the women and children, and the sick from Trapezus by sea. He is mentioned also in the Anabasis on several subsequent occasions.]

in Paphlagonia, and a eunuch. He is first mentioned in the service of Docimus, the general of Antigonus, from which he passed into that of Lysimachus, who intrusted him with the charge of the treasures which he had deposited in the strong fortress of Pergamus. Toward the end of the reign of Lysimachus he declared in favor of Seleucus, and, after the death of the latter (B. C. 280), he took advantage of the disorders in Asia to establish himself in virtual independence. At his death he transmitted the government of Pergamus, as an independent state, to his nephew Eumenes. He lived to the age of eighty, and died apparently in 263.—2. An Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy. Some said he was the third son of Aristophanes, but others maintained that it was Nicostratus. He wrote twenty-one plays. [The fragments are collected by Meineke, Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. i., p. 640-5, edit. minor.]

PHILETAS (Φιλήτας), of Cos, the son of Telephus, a distinguished Alexandrian poet and grammarian, flourished during the reign of the first Ptolemy, who appointed him tutor of his son, Ptolemy II. Philadelphus. His death may be placed about B. C. 280. Philetas seems to have been naturally of a very weak constitution, which at last broke down under excessive study. He was so remarkably thin as to become an object for the ridicule of the comic poets, who represented him as wearing leaden soles to his shoes, to prevent his being blown away by a strong wind. His poetry was chiefly elegiac. Of all the writers in that department, he was esteemed the best after Callimachus, to whom a taste less pedantic than that of the Alexandrian critics would probably have preferred him; for, to judge by his fragments, he escaped the snare of cumbrous learned affectation. These two poets formed the chief models for the Roman elegy; nay, Propertius expressly states, in one passage, that he imitated Philetas in preference to Callimachus. The elegies of Philetas were chiefly amatory, and a large portion of them was devoted to the praises of his mistress Bittis, or, as the Latin poets give the name, Battis. Besides his poems, Philetas wrote in prose on grammar and criticism. His most important grammatical work was entitled Ἄρακτα. The fragments of Philetas have been collected by Bach, with those of Hermesianax and Phanocles, Halis Sax., 1829.

PHILEUS, an eminent Ionian architect, built the Mausoleum, in conjunction with SATYRUS, and the temple of Minerva (Athena) Polias at Priene. The date of the erection of the Mausoleum was soon after B. C. 353, the year in which Mausolus died; that of the temple at Priene must have been about twenty years later.

[PHILIADÈS (Φιλιάδης), a Messenian, father of Neon and Thrasylochus, the partisans of Philip of Macedon. It is probable that Philiadès himself was attached to the same party, as he is mentioned by Demosthenes in terms of contempt and aversion.]

against Rome, and wrote a history of the Punic wars, in which he exhibited much partiality toward Carthage.—2. An Attic orator, a contemporary of Demosthenes and Lyeurgus. He is mentioned by Demosthenes in his oration against Midias, who calls him the son of Nicostatus, and says that he was tricerarch with him. Three orations of Philinus are mentioned by the grammarians.—3. A Greek physician, born in the island of Cos, and the reputed founder of the sect of the Empirici, probably lived in the third century B.C. He wrote a work on part of the Hippocratic collection, and also one on botany.

PHILIPPI (Φίλιπποι: Φιλίππεύς, Φιλίππηος, Φιλίππηος: now Filibah or Felibejik), a celebrated city in Macedonia adjecta (vid. p. 464, a), was situated on a steep height of Mount Pangæus, and on the River Gangas or Gangites, between the rivers Nestus and Strymon. It was founded by Philip on the site of an ancient town CRENIDES (Κρηνίδες), a colony of the Thasians, who settled here on account of the valuable gold mines in the neighborhood. Philippi is celebrated in history in consequence of the victory gained here by Octavianus and Antony over Brutus and Cassius, B.C. 42, and as the place where the Apostle Paul first preached the Gospel in Europe, A.D. 53. The church at Philippi soon became one of the most important of the early Christian churches: one of Saint Paul's Epistles is addressed to it. It was made a Roman colony by Octavianus after the victory over Brutus and Cassius, under the name of Colonia Augusta Julia Philippensis; and it continued to be under the empire a flourishing and important city. Its sea-port was Datum or Datus on the Strymonic Gulf.

PHILIPPIDES (Φιλίππιδης). 1. Vid. PHIDIPPIDES.—2. Of Athens, the son of Philocles, is mentioned as one of the six principal comic poets of the New Comedy by the grammarians. He flourished about B.C. 323. Philippides seems to have deserved the rank assigned to him, as one of the best poets of the New Comedy. He attacked the luxury and corruptions of his age, defended the privileges of his art, and made use of personal satire with a spirit approaching to that of the Old Comedy. His death is said to have been caused by excessive joy at an unexpected victory: similar tales are told of the deaths of other poets, as, for example, Sophocles, Alexis, and Philemon. The number of his dramas is stated at forty-five. There are fifteen titles extant. [The fragments of his plays are collected by Meineke, vol. ii., p. 1116–24, edit. minor.]

PHILIPPÖPOLIS (Φιλίπποπολις: now Philippopolis), an important town in Thrace, founded by Philip of Macedon on the site of a place previously called Eumolpias or Poneropolis. It was situated in a large plain southeast of the Hebrus, on a hill with three summits, whence it was sometimes called Trimontium. Under the Roman empire it was the capital of the province of Thracia in its narrower sense, and one of the most important towns in the country.

PHILIPPUS (Φίλιππος). I. Minor historical persons. 1. Son of Alexander I. of Macedonia, and brother of Perdiccas II., against whom he rebelled in conjunction with Derdas. The rebels were aided by the Athenians, B.C. 432.—2. Son of Herod the Great, king of Judea, by his wife Cleopatra, was appointed by his father's will tetrarch of Ituræa and Trachonitis, the sovereignty of which was confirmed to him by the decision of Augustus. He continued to reign over the dominions thus intrusted to his charge for thirty-seven years (B.C. 4–A.D. 34). He founded the city of Cæsarea, surnamed Paneas, but more commonly known as Cæsarea Philippi, near the sources of the Jordan, which he named in honor of Augustus. Vid. CÆSAREA, No. 2.—3. Son of Herod the Great by Mariamne, whose proper name was Herodes Philippus. He must not be confounded with the preceding Philip. He was the first husband of Herodias, who afterward divorced him, contrary to the Jewish law, and married his half-brother, Herod Antipas. It is Herod Philip, and not the preceding, who is meant by the Evangelists (Matt., xiv., 3; Mark, vi., 17; Luke, iii., 19) when they speak of Philip, the brother of Herod.

II. Kings of Macedonia.

I. Son of Argæus, was the third king, according to Herodotus and Thucydides, who, not reckoning CARANUS and his two immediate successors (Cœnus and Thurimas or Turimmas), look upon Perdiccas I. as the founder of the monarchy. Philip left a son, named Aëropus, who succeeded him.—II. Youngest son of Amyntas II. and Eurydice, reigned B.C. 359–336. He was born in 382, and was brought up at Thebes, whither he had been carried as a hostage by Pelopidas, and where he received a most careful education. Upon the death of his brother Perdiccas III., who was slain in battle against the Illyrians, Philip obtained the government of Macedonia, at first merely as regent and guardian to his infant nephew Amyntas; but at the end of a few months he was enabled to set aside the claims of the young prince, and to assume for himself the title of king. Macedonia was beset by dangers on every side. Its territory was ravaged by the Illyrians on the west, and the Pæonians on the north, while Pausanias and Argæus took advantage of the crisis to put forward their pretensions to the throne. Philip was fully equal to the emergency. By his tact and eloquence he sustained the falling spirits of the Macedonians, while at the same time he introduced among them a stricter military discipline, and organized their army on the plan of the phalanx. He first turned his arms against Argæus, the most formidable of the pretenders, since he was supported by the Athenians. He defeated Argæus in battle, and then concluded a peace with the Athenians. He next attacked the Pæonians, whom he reduced to subjection, and immediately afterward defeated the Illyrians in a decisive battle, and compelled them to accept a peace, by which they lost a portion of their territory. Thus in the short period of one year, and at the age of twenty-four, had Philip delivered himself from his dangerous position, and provided for the security of his kingdom. But energy and talents such as his were not satisfied with mere security, and henceforth his views were directed, not to defence, but to aggrandizement. His first efforts were directed to obtain possession of the various Greek cities upon the Macedonian coast. Soon after his accession he had withdrawn his garrison from Amphipolis, and had declared it a free city, because the Athenians had supported Argæus with the hope of recovering Amphipolis, and his continuing to hold the place would have interposed difficulties in the way of a peace with Athens, which was at that time an object of great importance to him. But he had never meant seriously to abandon this important town; and accordingly, having obtained pretexts for war with the Amphipolitans, he laid siege to the town, and gained possession of it in 358. The Athenians had sent no assistance to Amphipolis, because Philip, in a secret negotiation with the Athenians, led them to believe that he was willing to restore the city to them when he had taken it, and would do so on condition of their making him master of Pydna. After the capture of Amphipolis, he proceeded at once to Pydna, which seems to have yielded to him without a struggle, and the acquisition of which, by his own arms, and not through the Athenians, gave him a pretext for declining to stand by his secret engagement with them. The hostile feeling which such conduct necessarily excited against him at Athens made it most important for him to secure the good will of the powerful town of Olynthus, and to detach the Olynthians from the Athenians. Accordingly, he gave to the Olynthians the town of Potidæa, which he took from the Athenians in 356. Soon after this he attacked and took a settlement of the Thasians, called Crenides, and, having introduced into the place a number of new colonists, he named it Philippi after himself. One great advantage of this acquisition was, that it put him in possession of the gold mines of the district. From this point there is for some time a pause in the active operations of Philip. In 352 he took Methone after a lengthened siege, in the course of which he himself lost an eye. The capture of this place was a necessary preliminary in any movement toward the south, lying as it did between him and the Thessalian border. He now marched into Thessaly to aid the Aleuadæ against Lycophron, the tyrant of Pheræ. The Phocians sent a force to support Lycophron, but they were defeated by Philip, and their general Onomarehus slain. This victory gave Philip the ascendancy in Thessaly. He established at Pheræ what he wished the Greeks to consider a free government, and then advanced southward to Thermopylæ. The pass, however, he found guarded by a strong Athenian force, and he was compelled, or at least thought it expedient, to retire. He now turned his arms against Thrace, and succeeded in establishing his ascendancy in that country also. Meanwhile Philip's movements in Thessaly had opened the eyes of Demosthenes to the real danger of Athens and Greece, and his first Philippic (delivered in 352) was his earliest attempt to rouse his countrymen to energetic efforts against their enemy; but he did not produce much effect upon the Athenians. In 349 Philip commenced his attacks on the Chalcidian cities. Olynthus, in alarm, applied to Athens for aid, and Demosthenes, in his three Olynthiac orations, roused the people to efforts against the common enemy, not very vigorous at first, and fruitless in the end. In the course of three years Philip gained possession of all the Chalcidian cities, and the war was brought to a conclusion by the capture of Olynthus itself in 347. In the following year (346) he concluded peace with the Athenians, and straightway marched into Phocis, and brought the Phocian war to an end. The Phocian cities were destroyed, and their place in the Amphictyonic council was made over to the king of Macedonia, who was appointed also, jointly with the Thebans and Thessalians, to the presidency of the Pythian games. Ruling as he did over a barbaric nation, such a recognition of his Hellenic character was of the greatest value to him, especially as he looked forward to an invasion of the Persian empire in the name of Greece, united under him in a great national confederacy. During the next few years Philip steadily pursued his ambitious projects. From 342 to 340 he was engaged in an expedition in Thrace, and attempted to bring under his power all the Greek cities in that country. In the last of these years he laid siege to Perinthus and Byzantium; but the Athenians, who had long viewed Philip's aggrandizement with fear and alarm, now resolved to send assistance to these cities. Phocion was appointed to the command of the armament destined for this service, and succeeded in compelling Philip to raise the siege of both the cities (339). Philip now proceeded to carry on war against his northern neighbors, and seemed to give himself no further concern about the affairs of Greece. But meanwhile his hirings were treacherously promoting his designs against the liberties of Greece. In 339 the Amphictyons declared war against the Locerians of Amphissa for having taken possession of a district of the sacred land; but as the general they had appointed to the command of the Amphictyonic army was unable to effect any thing against the enemy, the Amphictyons, at their next meeting in 337, conferred upon Philip the command of their army. Philip straightway marched through Thermopylæ and seized Elatea. The Athenians heard of his approach with alarm; they succeeded, mainly through the influence of Demosthenes, in forming an alliance with the Thebans; but their united army was defeated by Philip in the month of August, 338, in the decisive battle of Chæronea, which put an end to the independence of Greece. Thebes paid dear for her resistance, but Athens was treated with more favor than she could have expected. Philip now seemed to have within his reach the accomplishment of the great object of his ambition, the invasion and conquest of the Persian empire. In a congress held at Corinth, which was attended by deputies from every Grecian state with the exception of Sparta, war with Persia was determined on, and the king of Macedonia was appointed to command the forces of the national confederacy. In 337, Philip's marriage with Cleopatra, the daughter of Attalus, one of his generals, led to the most serious disturbances in his family. Olympias and Alexander withdrew in great indignation from Macedonia; and though they returned home soon afterward, they continued to be on hostile terms with Philip. Meanwhile, his preparations for his Asiatic expedition were not neglected, and early in 336 he sent forces into Asia, under Parmenion, to draw over the Greek cities to his cause. But in the summer of this year he was murdered at a grand festival which he held at Ægæ, to solemnize the nuptials of his daughter with Alexander of Epirus. His murderer was a youth of noble blood, named Pausanias, who stabbed him as he was walking in the procession. The assassin was immediately pursued and slain by some of the royal guards. His motive for the deed is stated by Aristotle to have been private resentment against Philip, to whom he had complained in vain of a gross outrage offered to him by Attalus. Olympias and Alexander, however, were suspected of being implicated in the plot. Vid. OLYMPIAS. Philip died in the forty-seventh year of his age and the twenty-fourth of his reign, and was succeeded by Alexander the Great. Philip had a great number of wives and concubines. Besides Olympias and Cleopatra, we may mention, 1. his first wife Audata, an Illyrian princess, and the mother of Cynane; 2. Phila, sister of Derdas and Machatas, a princess of Elymitis; 3. Nicisipolis of Phæræ, the mother of Thessalonica; 4. Philinna of Larissa, the mother of Arrhidæus; 5. Meda, daughter of Cithclas, king of Thrace; 6. Arsinoë, the mother of Ptolemy I., king of Egypt, with whom she was pregnant when she married Lagus. To these numerous connections temperment as well as policy seems to have inclined him. He was strongly addicted, indeed, to sensual enjoyment of every kind; but his passions, however strong, were always kept in subjection to his interests and ambitious views. He was fond of science and literature, in the patronage of which he appears to have been liberal; and his appreciation of great minds is shown by his connection with Aristotle. In the pursuit of his political objects he was, as we have seen, unscrupulous, and ever ready to resort to duplicity and corruption; but when we consider his humanity and generous clemency, we may admit that he does not appear to disadvantage, even morally speaking, by the side of his fellow-conquerors of mankind.—III. The name of Philip was bestowed by the Macedonian army upon Arrhidæus, the bastard son of Philip II., when he was raised to the throne after the death of Alexander the Great. He accordingly appears in the list of Macedonian kings as Philip III. For his life and reign, vid. ARRHIDÆUS.—IV. Eldest son of Cassander, whom he succeeded on the throne B.C. 296. He reigned only a few months, and was carried off by a consumptive disorder.—V. Son of Demetrius II., reigned B.C. 220–178. He was only eight years old at the death of his father Demetrius (229), and the sovereign power was consequently assumed by his uncle Antigonos Doston, who, though he certainly ruled as king rather than merely as guardian of his nephew, was faithful to the interests of Philip, to whom he transferred the sovereignty at his death in 220, to the exclusion of his own children. Philip was only seventeen years old at the time of his accession, but he soon showed that he possessed ability and wisdom superior to his years. In consequence of the defeat of the Achæans and Aratus by the Ætoliens, the former applied for aid to Philip. This was granted; and for the next three years Philip conducted with distinguished success the war against the Ætoliens. This war, usually called the Social war, was brought to a conclusion in 217, and at once gained for Philip a distinguished reputation throughout Greece, while his clemency and moderation secured him an equal measure of popularity. But a change came over his character soon after the close of the Social war. He became suspicious and cruel; and having become jealous of his former friend and counsellor Aratus, he caused him to be removed by a slow and secret poison in 213. Meantime he had become engaged in war with the Romans. In 215 he concluded an alliance with Hannibal; but he did not prosecute the war with any activity against the Romans, who on their part were too much engaged with their formidable adversary in Italy to send any powerful armament against the Macedonian king. In 211 the war assumed a new character in consequence of the alliance entered into by the Romans with the Ætoliens. It was now carried on with greater vigor and alternate success; but as Philip gained several advantages over the Ætoliens, the latter people made peace with Philip in 205. In the course of the same year the Romans likewise concluded a peace with Philip, as they were desirous to give their undivided attention to the war in Africa. It is probable that both parties looked upon this peace as little more than a suspension of hostilities. Such was clearly the view with which the Romans had accepted it; and Philip not only proceeded to carry out his views for his own aggrandizement in Greece, without any regard to the Roman alliances in that country, but he even sent a body of auxiliaries to the Carthaginians in Africa, who fought at Zama under Hannibal. As soon as the Romans had brought the second Punic war to an end, they again declared war against Philip, 200. This war lasted between three and four years, and was brought to an end by the defeat of Philip by the consul Flamininus at the battle of Cynoscephalæ in the autumn of 197. Vid. FLAMININUS. By the peace finally granted to Philip (196), the king was compelled to abandon all his conquests, both in Europe and Asia, surrender his whole fleet to the Romans, and limit his standing army to five thousand men, besides paying a sum of one thousand talents. Philip was now effectually humbled, and endeavored to cultivate the friendship of the all-powerful republic. But toward the end of his reign he determined to try once more the fortune of war, and began to make active preparations for this purpose. His declining years were embittered by the disputes between his sons Perseus and Demetrius; and the former, by forged letters, at length persuaded the king that Demetrius was plotting against his life, and induced him to consent to the execution of the unhappy prince. Philip was struck with the deepest grief and remorse when he afterward discovered the deceit that had been practiced upon him. He believed himself to be haunted by the avenging spirit of Demetrius, and died shortly after, imprecating curses upon Perseus. His death took place in 179, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, after a reign of nearly forty-two years.

III. Family of the Marcii Philippi.

1. Q. MARCIUS PHILIPPUS, prætor 188, with Sicily as his province, and consul 186, when he carried on war in Liguria with his colleague Sp. Postumius Albinus. He was defeated by the enemy in the country of the Apuani, and the recollection of his defeat was preserved by the name of the saltus Marcius. In 169 Philippus was consul a second time, and carried on the war in Macedonia against Perseus, but accomplished nothing of importance. Vid. PERSEUS. In 164 Philippus was censor with L. Æmilius Paulus, and in his censorship he set up in the city a new sun-dial.—2. L. MARCIUS PHILIPPUS, was a tribune of the plebs 104, when he brought forward an agrarian law, and was consul in 91 with Sex. Julius Cæsar. In this year Philippus, who belonged to the popular party, opposed with the greatest vigor the measures of the tribune Drusus, who at first enjoyed the full confidence of the senate. But his opposition was all in vain; the laws of the tribune were carried. Soon afterward Drusus began to be regarded with mistrust and suspicion; Philippus became reconciled to the senate, and on his proposition a senatus consultum was passed, declaring all the laws of Drusus to be null and void, as having been carried against the auspices. Vid. DRUSUS. In the civil wars between Marius and Sulla, Philippus took no part. He survived the death of Sulla; and he is mentioned afterward as one of those who advocated sending Pompey to conduct the war in Spain against Sertorius. Philippus was one of the most distinguished orators of his time. (Hor., Epist., i., 7, 46.) As an orator he was reckoned only inferior to Crassus and Antonius. He was a man of luxurious habits, which his wealth enabled him to gratify: his fish-ponds were particularly celebrated for their magnificence and extent, and are mentioned by the ancients along with those of Lucullus and Hortensius. Besides his son, L. Philippus, who is spoken of below, he had a step-son, Gellius Publicola. Vid. PUBLICOLA.—3. L. MARCIUS PHILIPPUS, son of the preceding, was consul in 56. Upon the death of C. Octavius, the father of Augustus, Philippus married his widow Atia, and thus became the step-father of Augustus. Philippus was a timid man. Notwithstanding his close connection with Cæsar's family, he remained neutral in the civil wars; and after the assassination of Cæsar, he endeavored to dissuade his step-son, the young Octavianus, from accepting the inheritance which the dictator had left him. He lived till his step-son had acquired the supremacy of the Roman world. He restored the temple of Hercules and the Muses, and surrounded it with a colonnade, which is frequently mentioned under the name of Porticus Philippi. (Clari monumenta Philippi, Ov., Fast., vi., 801.)

IV. Emperors of Rome.

1. M. JULIUS PHILIPPUS I., Roman emperor A.D. 244–249, was an Arabian by birth, and entered the Roman army, in which he rose to high rank. He accompanied Gordianus III. in his expedition against the Persians; and upon the death of the excellent Misitheus (vid. MISITHEUS), he was promoted to the vacant office of prætorian præfect. He availed himself of the influence of his high office to excite discontent among the soldiers, who at length assassinated Gordian, and proclaimed Philippus emperor, 244. Philippus proclaimed his son Cæsar, concluded a disgraceful peace with Sapor, founded the city of Philippopolis, and then returned to Rome. In 245 he was engaged in prosecuting a successful war against the Carpi on the Danube. In 248, rebellions, headed by Iotapinus and Marinus, broke out simultaneously in the East and in Mæsia. Both pretenders speedily perished, but Decius, having been dispatched to recall the legions on the Danube to their duty, was himself forcibly invested with the purple by the troops, and compelled by them to march upon Italy. Philippus, having gone forth to encounter his rival, was slain near Verona either in battle or by his own soldiers. The great domestic event of the reign of Philippus was the exhibition of the secular games, which were celebrated with even more than the ordinary degree of splendor, since Rome had now, according to the received tradition, attained the thousandth year of her existence (A.D. 248).—2. M. JULIUS PHILIPPUS II., son of the foregoing, was a boy of seven at the accession (244) of his father, by whom he was proclaimed Cæsar, and three years afterward (247) received the title of Augustus. In 249 he was slain, according to Zosimus, at the battle of Verona, or murdered, according to Victor, at Rome by the prætorians, when intelligence arrived of the defeat and death of the emperor.

V. Literary.

1. Of Medma, in the south of Italy, a Greek astronomer, and a disciple of Plato. His observations, which were made in the Peloponnesus and in Locris, were used by the astronomers Hipparchus, Geminus the Rhodian, and Ptolemy.—2. Of Thessalonica, an epigrammatic poet, who, besides composing a large number of epigrams himself, compiled one of the ancient Greek Anthologies. The whole number of epigrams ascribed to him in the Greek Anthology is nearly ninety; but of these, six (Nos. 36–41) ought to be ascribed to Lucilius, and a few others are manifestly borrowed from earlier poets, while others are mere imitations. The Anthology (Ἀνθολογία) of Philip, in imitation of that of Meleager, and as a sort of supplement to it, contains chiefly the epigrams of poets who lived in, or shortly before, the time of Philip. The earliest of these poets seems to be Philodemus, the contemporary of Cicero, and the latest Antomcedon, who probably flourished under Nerva. Hence it is inferred that Philip flourished under Trajan.

PHILISCUS (Φιλίσκος). 1. An Athenian poet of the Middle Comedy, of whom little is known. He must have flourished about B.C. 400, or a little later, as his portrait was painted by Parrhasius.—2. Of Miletus, an orator or rhetorician, and the disciple of Isocrates, wrote a life of the orator Lycurgus, and an epitaph on Lysias.—3. Of Ægina, a cynic philosopher, was the disciple of Diogenes the Cynic, and the teacher of Xander in grammar.—4. Of Corcyra, a distinguished tragic poet, and one of the seven who formed the Tragic Pleiad at Alexandria, was also a priest of Bacchus (Dionysus), and in that character he was present at the coronation procession of Ptolemy Philadelphus in B.C. 284. He wrote forty-two dramas.—5. Of Rhodes, a sculptor, several of whose works were placed in the temple of Apollo, adjoining the portico of Octavia at Rome. One of these statues was that of the god himself: the others were Latona and Diana, the nine Muses, and another statue of Apollo, without drapery. He probably lived about B.C. 146. The group of Muses, found in the villa of Cassius at Tivoli, is supposed by some to be a copy of that of Philiscus. Others take the beautiful statue at Florence, known as the Apollino, for the naked Apollo of Philiscus.

[PHILISCUS (Φιλίσκος), a native of Abydus, seht in B.C. 368 into Greece by Ariobarzanes to effect a reconciliation between the Thebans and Lacedæmonians, but he did not fully succeed in bringing about the object of his mission. On his return to Asia he made himself master of a number of Greek states, over which he exercised a tyrannical sway, till he was at length assassinated at Lampsacus by Thersagoras and Execestus.]

PHILISTINÆ FOSSÆ. Vid. PADUS.

PHILISTION (Φιλιστιών). 1. Of Nicæa or Magnesia, a mimographer, who flourished in the time of Augustus, about A.D. 7. He was an actor as well as a writer of mimes, and is said to have died of excessive laughter.—2. A physician, born either at one of the Greek towns in Sicily, or at Locri Epizephyrii in Italy, was tutor to the physician Chrysiptus of Cnidos, and the astronomer and physician Eudoxus, and therefore must have lived in the fourth century B.C.

PHILISTUS (Φιλίστος), a Syracusan, son of Archonides or Archomenides, was born probably about B.C. 435. He assisted Dionysius in obtaining the supreme power, and stood so high in the favor of the tyrant that the latter intrusted him with the charge of the citadel of Syracuse; but at a later period he excited the jealousy of the tyrant by marrying, without his consent, one of the daughters of his brother Leptines, and was in consequence banished from Sicily. He at first retired to Thurii, but afterward established himself at Adria, where he composed the historical work which has given celebrity to his name. He was recalled from exile by the younger Dionysius soon after his accession, and quickly succeeded in establishing his influence over the mind of the latter. He exerted all his efforts to alienate Dionysius from his former friends, and not only caused Plato to be sent back to Athens, but ultimately succeeded in effecting the banishment of Dion also. Philistus was unfortunately absent from Sicily when Dion first landed in the island, and made himself master of Syracuse, B.C. 356. He afterward raised a powerful fleet, with which he gave battle to the Syracusans, but having been defeated, and finding himself cut off from all hopes of escape, he put an end to his own life to avoid falling into the hands of his enraged countrymen. Philistus wrote a history of Sicily, which was one of the most celebrated historical works of antiquity, though, unfortunately, only a few fragments of it have come down to us. It consisted of two portions, which might be regarded either as two separate works, or as parts of one great whole, a circumstance which explains the discrepancies in the statements of the number of books of which it was composed. The first seven books comprised the general history of Sicily, commencing from the earliest times, and ending with the capture of Agrigentum by the Carthaginians, B.C. 406. The second part, which formed a sequel to the first, contained the history of the elder Dionysius in four books, and that of the younger in two: the latter was necessarily imperfect. In point of style, Philistus is represented by the concurrent testimony of antiquity as imitating and even closely resembling Thucydides, though still falling far short of his great model. The fragments of Philistus have been collected by Goeller in an appendix to his work, De Situ et Origine Syracusarum, Lips., 1818, and by C. Müller, in the Fragmenta Historicorum Græcorum, Paris, 1841.

PHILO (Φίλων). 1. An ACADEMIC philosopher, was a native of Larissa and a disciple of Clitomachus. After the conquest of Athens by Mithradates he removed to Rome, where he settled as a teacher of philosophy and rhetoric, and had Cicero as one of his hearers.—2. BYBLIUS, also called HERENNIUS BYBLIUS, a Roman grammarian, and a native of Byblus in Phœnicia, as his patronymic indicates, was born about the time of Nero, and lived to a good old age, having written of the reign of Hadrian. He wrote many works, which are cited by Suidas and others, but his name is chiefly memorable by his translation of the writings of the Phœnician Sanchuniathon, of which considerable fragments have been preserved by Eusebius. Vid. SANCHUNIATHON.—3. Of BYZANTIUM, a celebrated mechanician, and a contemporary of Ctesibius, flourished about B.C. 146. He wrote a work on military engineering, of which the fourth and fifth books have come down to us, and are printed in the Veterum Mathematicorum Opera of Thevenot, Paris, 1693. There is also attributed to this Philo a work On the Seven Wonders of the World, but this work must have been written at a later time. The seven wonders are the Hanging Gardens, the Pyramids, the Statue of Jupiter Olympius, the Walls of Babylon, the Colossus of Rhodes, the Temple of Diana (Artemis) at Ephesus, and, we may presume from the proemium; the Mausoleum; but the last is entirely wanting, and we have only a fragment of the Ephesian temple. Edited by Orelli, Lips., 1816.—4. JUDEUS, the Jew, was born at Alexandria, and was descended from a priestly family of distinction. He had already reached an advanced age, when he went to Rome (A.D. 40) on an embassy to the Emperor Caligula, in order to procure the revocation of the decree which exacted from the Jews divine homage to the statue of the emperor. We have no other particulars of the life of Philo worthy of record. His most important works treat of the books of Moses, and are generally cited under different titles. His great object was to reconcile the sacred Scriptures with the doctrines of the Greek philosophy, and to point out the conformity between the two. He maintained that the fundamental truths of Greek philosophy were derived from the Mosaic revelation, and in order to make the latter agree more perfectly with the former, he had recourse to an allegorical interpretation of the books of Moses. Philo may therefore be regarded as a precursor of the Neo-Platonic philosophy. The best edition of his works is by Mangey, Lond., 1742, 2 vols. fol.—5. A MEGARIAN philosopher, was a disciple of Diodorus Cronus, and a friend of Zeno.—6. Of TARSUS in Cilicia, a celebrated physician, frequently quoted by Galen and others.—7. ARTISTS. (1.) Son of Antipater, a statuary who lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and made the statue of Hephæstion, and also the statue of Jupiter (Zeus) Ourios, which stood on the shore of the Black Sea, at the entrance of the Bosphorus, near Chalcedon, and formed an important landmark for sailors. It was still perfect in the time of Cicero (in Verr., iv., 58), and the base has been preserved to modern times, bearing an inscription of eight elegiac verses.—(2.) A very eminent architect at Athens in the time of the immediate successors of Alexander. He built for Demetrius Phalereus, about B.C. 318, the portico of twelve Doric columns to the great temple at Eleusis. He also constructed for the Athenians, under the administration of Lyeurgus, a basin (armamentarium) in the Piræus, in which one thousand ships could lie. This work, which excited the greatest admiration, was destroyed in the taking of Athens by Sulla.

PHILO, Q. PUBLILIUS, a distinguished general in the Samnite wars, and the author of one of the great reforms in the Roman constitution. He was consul B.C. 339, with Ti. Æmilius Mamercinus, and defeated the Latins, over whom he triumphed. In the same year he was appointed dictator by his colleague Æmilius Mamercinus, and, as such, proposed the celebrated Publilia Leges, which abolished the power of the patrician assembly of the curiæ, and elevated the plebeians to an equality with the patricians for all practical purposes. (Vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. PUBLILIA LEGES.) In 337 Philo was the first plebeian prætor, and in 332 he was censor with Sp. Postumius Albinus. In 327 he was consul a second time, and carried on war in the south of Italy. He was continued in the command for the following year with the title of proconsul, the first instance in Roman history in which a person was invested with proconsular power. He took Palæopolis in 326. In 320 he was consul a third time, with L. Papirius Cursor, and carried on the war with success against the Samnites.

PHILO, VETURIUS. 1. L., consul B.C. 220 with C. Lutatius Catulus; dictator 217, for the purpose of holding the comitia; and censor 210 with P. Licinius Crassus Dives, and died while holding this office.—2. L., prætor 209, with Cisalpine Gaul as his province. In 207 he served under Claudius Nero and Livius Salinator in the campaign against Hasdrubal. In 206 he was consul with Q. Cæcilius Metellus, and, in conjunction with his colleague, carried on the war against Hannibal in Bruttium. He accompanied Scipio to Africa, and after the battle of Zama, 202, was sent to Rome to announce the news of Hannibal's defeat.

PHILOCHÆRES (Φιλοχάρης), a distinguished painter, mentioned by Pliny, is supposed by the modern writers on art to be the same person as the brother of Æschines, of whose artistic performances Demosthenes speaks contemptuously, but whom Ulpian ranks with the most distinguished painters.

[PHILOCHARIDAS (Φιλοχάριδας), a Lacedæmonian of distinction, son of Eryxidaidas, employed on several embassies during the Peloponnesian war.]

PHILOCHŌRUS (Φιλόχορος), a celebrated Athenian writer, chiefly known by his Atthis, or work on the legends, antiquities, and history of Attica. He was a person of considerable importance in his native city, and was put to death by Antigonus Gonatas when the latter obtained possession of Athens, about B.C. 260. His Atthis consisted of seventeen books, and related the history of Attica from the earliest times to the reign of Antiochus Theos, B.C. 261. The work is frequently quoted by the scholiasts, lexicographers, as well as other later authors. He also wrote many other works, the titles of which are preserved by Suidas and the grammarians. The fragments of Philochorus have been published by Siebelis, Lips., 1811, and by Müller, Paris 1841.

PHILOCLĒS (Φιλοκλῆς). 1. An Athenian tragic poet, the sister's son of Æschylus; his father's name was Philopithes. He is said to have composed one hundred tragedies. In the general character of his plays he was an imitator of Æschylus; and that he was not unworthy of his great master, may be inferred from the fact that he gained a victory over Sophocles, when the latter exhibited his Œdipus Tyrannus, B.C. 429. Philocles was frequently ridiculed by the comic poets.—[2. An Athenian officer, joined with Conon in command of the Athenian fleet after the battle of the Arginusæ. He was of a cruel disposition, and was the author of the proposal for the mutilation of the prisoners taken in an intended naval battle. Having fallen into the hands of Lysander at the battle of Ægospotami in B.C. 405, he was put to death by him.—3. An officer and friend of Philip V. of Macedonia, by whom he was employed in several embassies, and who intrusted to him the task of securing Eretria against the Romans and others. He subsequently allowed himself to be bribed to make a false report against Demetrius, the son of Philip (vid. PHILIPPUS V.), and so caused his death: for this he was tortured and put to death by Philip.]

PHILOCRATES (Φιλοκράτης), an Athenian orator, was one of the venal supporters of Philip in opposition to Demosthenes.

PHILOCTĒTES (Φιλοκλήτης), a son of Pœas (whence he is called Pœantides, Ov., Met., xiii., 313) and Demonassa, the most celebrated archer in the Trojan war. He led the warriors from Methone, Thaumacia, Melibœa, and Olizon, against Troy, in seven ships. But on his voyage thither he was left behind by his men in the island of Lemnos, because he was ill of a wound which he had received from the bite of a snake; and Medon, the son of Oileus and Rhene, undertook the command of his troops. This is all that the Homeric poems relate of Philoctetes, with the addition that he returned home in safety; but the cyclic and tragic poets have added numerous details to the story. Thus they relate that he was the friend and armor-bearer of Hercules, who instructed him in the use of the bow, and who bequeathed to him his bow, with the poisoned arrows. These presents were a reward for his having erected and set fire to the pile on Mount Ceta, where Hercules burned himself. Philoctetes was also one of the suitors of Helen, and thus took part in the Trojan war. On his voyage to Troy, while staying in the island of Chryse, he was bitten by a snake. This misfortune happened to him when he was showing to the Greeks the altar of Minerva (Athena) Chryse, or while he was looking at the tomb of Troilus in the temple of Apollo Thymbraeus, or as he was pointing out to his companions the altar of Hercules. According to some accounts, the wound in his foot was not inflicted by a serpent, but by his own poisoned arrows. The wound is said to have become ulcerated, and to have produced such an intolerable stench, that the Greeks, on the advice of Ulysses, abandoned Philoctetes, and left him alone on the solitary coast of Lemnos. He remained in this island till the tenth year of the Trojan war, when Ulysses and Diomedes [according to Sophocles, Ulysses and Neoptolemus] came to fetch him to Troy, as an oracle had declared that the city could not be taken without the arrows of Hercules. He accompanied these heroes to Troy, and on his arrival Apollo sent him into a deep sleep, during which Machaon (or Podalirius, or both, or Æsculapius himself) cut out the wound, washed it with wine, and applied healing herbs to it. Philoctetes was thus cured, and soon after slew Paris, whereupon Troy fell into the hands of the Greeks. On his return from Troy he is said to have been cast upon the coast of Italy, where he settled, and built Petelia and Crimissa. In the latter place he founded a sanctuary of Apollo Alæus, to whom he dedicated his bow.

[PHILOCYPRUS (Φιλόκυπρος), father of Aristocyprus, king of Soli in Cyprus, contemporary and friend of Solon, who celebrated his praises in an elegiac poem.]

PHILODEMUS (Φιλόδημος), of Gadara in Palestine, an Epicurean philosopher and epigrammatic poet, contemporary with Cicero. The Greek Anthology contains thirty-four of his epigrams, which are chiefly of a light and amatory character, and which quite bear out Cicero's statements concerning the licentiousness of his matter and the elegance of his manner. (Cic. in Pis., 28, 29.) Philodemus is also mentioned by Horace (Sat., i., 2, 121.)

[PHILODEMUS (Φιλόδημος). 1. Of the borough of Præania, father-in-law of the orator Æschines. —2. An Argive, sent by Hieronymus, king of Syracuse, to Hannibal in B.C. 215 to propose an alliance. In B.C. 212, when Marcellus was besieging Syracuse, Philodemus was governor of the fort Euryalus on Epipolæ, and this he surrendered to the Romans on condition that he and his garrison should be allowed to depart uninjured to join Epicydes in Achradina.]

[PHILETIUS (Φιλοτίτιος), the celebrated cowherd of Ulysses, frequently mentioned in the Odyssey: he recognized Ulysses on his return to Ithaca, and, along with Eumæus, aided him in overcoming the suitors.]

PHILOLŪS (Φιλόλαος), a distinguished Pythagorean philosopher, was a native of Croton or Tarentum. He was a contemporary of Socrates, and the instructor of Simmias and Cebes at Thebes, where he appears to have lived many years. Pythagoras and his earliest successors did not commit any of their doctrines to writing; and the first publication of the Pythagorean doctrines is pretty uniformly attributed to Philolaus. He composed a work on the Pythagorean philosophy in three books, which Plato is said to have procured at the cost of one hundred minæ through Dion of Syracuse, who purchased it from Philolaus, who was at the time in deep poverty. Other versions of the story represent Plato as purchasing it himself from Philolaus or his relatives when in Sicily. Plato is said to have derived from this work the greater part of his Timæus. [Several fragments of this work, in the Doric dialect, have been preserved, and these have been collected and edited by Boeckh, Berlin, 1819.]

[PHILOMĒUSA (Φιλομέδουσα), wife of Areithous and mother of Menesthius.]

PHILOMĒLA (Φιλομήλα), daughter of King Pandion in Attica, who, being dishonored by her brother-in-law Tereus, was metamorphosed into a nightingale. The story is given under TEREUS.

[PHILOMELIDES (Φιλομηλείδης, properly son of Philomela), a king in Lesbos, who compelled his guests to wrestle with him, was vanquished by Ulysses.]

PHILOMĒLŪM OR PHILOMĒLUM (Φιλομήλιον, or, in the Pisidian dialect, Φιλομηλή: Φιλομηλεύς, Philomelensis or Philomeliensis; probably Al-Shehr, ruins), a city of Phrygia Paroreios, on the borders of Lycaonia and Pisidia, said to have been named from the numbers of nightingales in its neighborhood. It is mentioned several times by Cicero. According to the division of the provinces under Constantine, it belonged to Pisidia. It is still found mentioned at the time of the Crusades by the name of Philomene.

PHILOMĒLUS (Φιλόμηλος), a general of the Phocians in the Phocian or Sacred war, was the person who persuaded his countrymen to seize the temple of Delphi, and to apply the riches of the temple to the purpose of defending themselves against the Amphictyonic forces, B.C. 357. He commanded the Phocians during the early years of the war, but was slain in battle in 353. He was succeeded in the command by his brother Onomarchus.

PHILŌNĪDES (Φιλωνίδης), an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, who is, however, better known on account of his connection with the literary history of Aristophanes. It is generally stated that Philonides was an actor of Aristophanes, who is said to have committed to him and to Callistratus his chief characters; but the best modern critics have shown that this is an erroneous statement, and that the true state of the case is, that several of the plays of Aristophanes were brought out in the names of Callistratus and Philonides. We learn from Aristophanes himself, not only the fact that he brought out his early plays in the names of other poets, but also his reasons for so doing. In the Parabasis of the Knights (v., 514), he states that he had pursued this course, not from want of thought, but from a sense of the difficulty of his profession, and from a fear that he might suffer from that fickleness of taste which the Athenians had shown toward other poets, as Magnes, Crates, and Cratinus. It appears that Aristophanes used the name of Philonides, probably, for the Clouds, and certainly for the Wasps, the Proagon, the Amphiaraus, and the Frogs. The Datalais, the Babylonians, the Acharnians, the Birds, and the Lysistrata were brought out in the name of Callistratus. Of the extant plays of Aristophanes, the only ones which he is known to have brought out in his own name are the Knights, the Peace, and the Plutus.

PHILŌNŌME. Vid. TENES.

PHILOPŌMEN (Φιλοπομπή), of Megalopolis in Arcadia, one of the few great men that Greece produced in the decline of her political independence. The great object of his life was to infuse among the Achæans a military spirit, and thereby to establish their independence on a firm and lasting basis. He was the son of Craugis, a distinguished man at Megalopolis, and was born about B.C. 252. He lost his father at an early age, and was brought up by Cleander, an illustrious citizen of Mantinea, who had been obliged to leave his native city, and had taken refuge at Megalopolis. He received instruction from Ecdemus and Demophanes, both of whom had studied the Academic philosophy under Arcesilaus. At an early age he became distinguished by his love of arms and his bravery in war. His name, however, first occurs in history in B.C. 222, when Megalopolis was taken by Cleomenes, and in the following year (221) he fought with conspicuous valor at the battle of Sellasia, in which Cleomenes was completely defeated. In order to gain additional military experience, he soon afterward sailed to Crete, and served for some years in the wars between the cities of that island. On his return to his native country, in 210, he was appointed commander of the Achæan cavalry; and in 208 he was elected strategus, or general of the Achæan league. In this year he defeated Machanidas, tyrant of Lacedæmon, and slew him in battle with his own hand. In 201 he was again elected general of the league, when he defeated Nabis, who had succeeded Machanidas as tyrant of Lacedæmon. Soon afterward Philopœmen took another voyage to Crete, and assumed the command of the forces of Gortyna. He did not return to Peloponnesus till 194. He was made general of the league in 192, when he again defeated Nabis, who was slain in the course of the year by some Ætolian mercenaries. Philopœmen was re-elected general of the league several times afterward; but the state of Greece did not afford him much further opportunity for the display of his military abilities. The Romans were now, in fact, the masters of Greece, and Philopœmen clearly saw that it would be an act of madness to offer open resistance to their authority. At the same time, as the Romans still recognized in words the independence of the league, Philopœmen offered a resolute resistance to all their encroachments upon the liberties of his country, whenever he could do so without affording them any pretext for war. In 188, when he was general of the league, he took Sparta, and treated it with the greatest severity. He razed the walls and fortifications of the city, abolished the institutions of Lycurgus, and compelled the citizens to adopt the Achæan laws in their stead. In 183 the Messenians revolted from the Achæan league. Philopœmen, who was general of the league for the eighth time, hastily collected a body of cavalry, and pressed forward to Messene. He fell in with a large body of Messenian troops, by whom he was taken prisoner and carried to Messene. Here he was thrown into a dungeon, and was compelled by Dinocrates to drink poison. The news of his death filled the whole of Peloponnesus with grief and rage. An assembly was immediately held at Megalopolis; Lycortas was chosen general; and in the following year he invaded Messenia, which was laid waste far and wide; Dinocrates and the chiefs of his party were obliged to put an end to their lives. The remains of Philopœmen were conveyed to Megalopolis in solemn procession; and the urn which contained the ashes was carried by the historian Polybius. His remains were then interred at Megalopolis with heroic honors, and soon afterward statues of him were erected in most of the towns belonging to the Achæan league.

PHILOSTĒPHĀNUS (Φιλοστέφανος), of Cyrene, an Alexandrian writer of history and geography, the friend or disciple of Callimachus, flourished under Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, about B. C. 249.

PHILOSTORŌIUS (Φιλοστόργιος), a native of Boreissus in Cappadocia, was born about A.D. 358. He wrote an ecclesiastical history, from the heresy of Arius in 300 down to 425. Philostorgius was an Arian, which is probably the reason why his work has not come down to us. It was originally in twelve books; and we still possess an abstract of it, made by Photus.

PHILOSTRĀTUS (Φιλόστρατος), the name of a distinguished family of Lemnos, of which there are mentioned three persons in the history of Greek literature. 1. Son of Verus, taught at Athens; but we know nothing about him, with the exception of the titles of his works, given by Suidas. He could not, however, have lived in the reign of Nero, according to the statement of Suidas, since his son was not born till the latter part of the second century.—2. FLAVIUS PHILOSTRATUS, son of the preceding, and the most eminent of the three, was born about A. D. 182. He studied and taught at Athens, and is usually called the Athenian, to distinguish him from the younger Philostratus (No. 3), who more usually bears the surname of the Lemnian. Flavius afterward removed to Rome, where we find him a member of the circle of literary men whom the philosophic Julia Domna, the wife of Severus, had drawn around her. It was at her desire that he wrote the life of Apollonius. He was alive in the reign of the Emperor Philippus (244–249). The following works of Philostratus have come down to us: 1. The Life of Apollonius of Tyana (τὰ ἐς τὸν Τυανέα Ἀπολλώνιον), in eight books. Vid. APOLLONIUS, No. 7. 2. Lives of the Sophists (Βίαι Σοφιστῶν), in two books, contains the history of philosophers who had the character of being sophists, and of those who were in reality sophists. It begins with the life of Gorgias, and comes down to the contemporaries of Philostratus.

tus in the reign of Philippus. 3. Heroica or Heroicus (Ἡρωικά, Ἡρωικός), is in the form of a dialogue, and gives an account of the heroes engaged in the Trojan war. 4. Imagines (Εἰκόνες), in two books, contains an account of various paintings. This is the author's most pleasing work, exhibiting great richness of fancy, power, and variety of delineation, and a rich exuberance of style. 5. Epistolæ (Ἐπιστολαί), seventy-three in number, chiefly amatory. The best editions of the collected works of Philostratus are by Olearius, Lips., 1709, and by Kayser, Turic., 1844. — 3. PHILOSTRATUS the younger, usually called the Lemnian, as mentioned above, was a son of Nervianus and of a daughter of Flavius Philostratus, but is erroneously called by Suidas a son-in-law of the latter. He enjoyed the instructions of his grandfather and of the sophist Hippodromus, and had obtained sufficient distinction at the early age of twenty-four to receive exemption from taxes. He visited Rome, but he taught at Athens, and died in Lemnos. He wrote several works, and, among others, one entitled Imagines, in imitation of his grandfather's work with the same title, of which a portion is still extant.

PHILOTAS (Φιλώτας). [1. A Macedonian, father of Parmenion, the general of Alexander the Great.]—2. Son of Parmenion, enjoyed a high place in the friendship of Alexander, and in the invasion of Asia obtained the chief command of the ἐταῖροι, or native Macedonian cavalry. He served with distinction in the battles of the Granicus and Arbela, and also on other occasions; but in B.C. 330, while the army was in Drangiana, he was accused of being privy to a plot which had been formed by a Macedonian, named Dimnus, against the king's life. There was no proof of his guilt; but a confession was wrung from him by the torture, and he was stoned to death by the troops, after the Macedonian custom. Vid. PARMENION.—[3. A Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great, received the government of Cilicia in the distribution of provinces after the death of Alexander. In B.C. 321 he was deprived of his government by Perdiccas, but was employed elsewhere by that general, as he still continued attached to the party of Perdiccas, and after the death of the regent united with Alcetas, Attalus, and their partisans in the contest against Antigonus, into whose power he finally fell.]

PHILOTIMUS (Φιλότιμος). 1. An eminent Greek physician, pupil of Praxagoras, and fellow-pupil of Herophilus, lived in the fourth and third centuries B.C.—[2. A freedman of Cicero, or rather of Terentia, had the chief management of Cicero's property.]

PHILOXENUS (Φιλόξενος). 1. A Macedonian officer of Alexander the Great, received the government of Cilicia from Perdiccas in 321.—2. Of Cythera, one of the most distinguished dithyrambic poets of Greece, was born B.C. 435, and died 380, at the age of fifty-five. He was reduced to slavery in his youth, and was bought by the lyric poet Melanippides, by whom he was educated in dithyrambic poetry. After residing some years at Athens, he went to Syracuse, where he speedily obtained the favor of Dionysius, and took up his abode at his court. But soon afterward he offended Dionysius, and was cas into prison; an act of oppression which most writers ascribe to the wounded vanity of the tyrant, whose poems Philoxenus not only refused to praise, but, on being asked to revise one of them, said that the best way of correcting it would be to draw a black line through the whole paper. Another account ascribes his disgrace to too close an intimacy with the tyrant's mistress Galatea; but this looks like a fiction, arising out of a misunderstanding of the object of his poem entitled Cyclops or Galatea. After some time he was released from prison, and restored outwardly to the favor of Dionysius; but he finally left his court, and is said to have spent the latter part of his life in Ephesus. Of the dithyrambs of Philoxenus, by far the most important was his Cyclops or Galatea, the loss of which is greatly to be lamented. Philoxenus also wrote another poem, entitled Deipnon (Δείπνον), or the Banquet, which appears to have been the most popular of his works, and of which we have more fragments than of any other. This poem was a most minute and satirical description of a banquet, and the subject of it was furnished by the luxury of the court of Dionysius. Philoxenus was included in the attacks which the comic poets made on all the musicians of the day, for their corruptions of the simplicity of the ancient music; but we have abundant testimony to the high esteem in which he was held both during his life and after his death. [His fragments are collected by Bippart in Philoxeni, Timothei, Telestis Dithyr. Reliquia, Lips., 1843.]—3. The Leucadian, lived at Athens about the same time as Philoxenus of Cythera, with whom he is frequently confounded by the grammarians. Like his more celebrated namesake, the Leucadian was ridiculed by the poets of the Old Comedy, and seems to have spent a part of his life in Sicily. The Leucadian was a most notorious parasite, glutton, and effeminate debauchee; but he seems also to have had great wit and good humor, which made him a favorite at the tables which he frequented.—4. A celebrated Alexandrian grammarian, who taught at Rome, and wrote on Homer, on the Ionic and Laconian dialect, and several other grammatical works, among which was a Glossary, which was edited by H. Stephanus, Paris, 1573.—5. An Egyptian surgeon, who wrote several valuable volumes on surgery. He must have lived in or before the first century after Christ.—6. A painter of Eretria, the disciple of Nicomachus, who painted for Cassander a battle of Alexander with Darius.

PHILUS, FURIUS. 1. P., was consul B.C. 223 with C. Flaminius, and accompanied his colleague in his campaign against the Gauls in the north of Italy. He was prætor 216, when he commanded the fleet, with which he proceeded to Africa. In 214 he was censor with M. Atilius Regulus, but died at the beginning of the following year.—2. L., consul 136, received Spain as his province, and was commissioned by the senate to deliver up to the Numantines C. Hostilius Mancinus, the consul of the preceding year. Philus, like his contemporaries Scipio Africanus the younger and Lælius, was fond of Greek literature and refinement. He is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers in his dialogue De Republica PHILYLLIUS (Φιλύλλιος), an Athenian comic poet, belongs to the latter part of the Old Comedy and the beginning of the Middle.

[PHILYRA (Φιλύρα), a daughter of Oceanus, and the mother of Chiron by Saturn (Cronus).]

PHILYRĒIS (Φιλυρής: probably the little island off Cape Zefreh, east of Kerasunt-Ada), an island off the northern coast of Asia Minor (Pontus), east of the country of the Mosynæci, and near the promontory of Zephyrium (now Zefreh), where CHIRON was nurtured by his mother Philyra.

PHILYRES (Φίλυρες), a people on the coast of Pontus, in the neighborhood of the island PHILYRES.

PHINEUS (Φινεύς). 1. Son of Belus and Anchinoë, and brother of Cepheus. He was slain by Perseus. For details, vid. ANDROMEDA and PERSEUS.—2. Son of Agenor, and king of Salmidessus in Thrace. He was first married to Cleopatra, the daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, by whom he had two children, Oryithus (Oarthus) and Crambis; but their names are different in the different legends: Ovid calls them Polydectus and Polydorus. Afterward he was married to Idæa (some call her Dia, Eurytia, or Idothea), by whom he again had two sons, Thyus and Mariandynus. Phineus was a blind soothsayer, who had received his prophetic powers from Apollo; but the cause of his blindness is not the same in all accounts. He is most celebrated on account of his being tormented by the Harpies, who were sent by the gods to punish him on account of his cruelty toward his sons by the first marriage. His second wife falsely accused them of having made an attempt upon her virtue, whereupon Phineus put out their eyes, or, according to others, exposed them to be devoured by wild beasts, or ordered them to be half buried in the earth, and then to be scourged. Whenever a meal was placed before Phineus, the Harpies darted down from the air and carried it off; later writers add that they either devoured the food themselves, or rendered it unfit to be eaten. When the Argonauts visited Thrace, Phineus promised to instruct them respecting their voyage if they would deliver him from the monsters. This was done by Zetes and Calais, the sons of Boreas, and brothers of Cleopatra. Vid. p. 91, a. Phineus now explained to the Argonauts the further course they had to take, and especially cautioned them against the Symplegades. According to another story, the Argonauts, on their arrival at Thrace, found the sons of Phineus half buried, and demanded their liberation, which Phineus refused. A battle thereupon ensued, in which Phineus was slain by Hercules. The latter also delivered Cleopatra from her confinement, and restored the kingdom to the sons of Phineus; and on their advice he also sent the second wife of Phineus back to her father, who ordered her to be put to death. Some traditions, lastly, state that Phineus was killed by Boreas, or that he was carried off by the Harpies into the country of the Bistones or Milchessians. Those accounts in which Phineus is stated to have put out the eyes of his sons, add that they had their sight restored to them by the sons of Boreas or by Æsculapius.

PHINŌRŌLIS (Φινόπολις), a town in Thrace, on the Pontus Euxinus, near the entrance to the Bosphorus.

PHINTĪAS (Φιντίας). 1. A Pythagorean, the friend of Damon, who was condemned to die by Dionysius the elder. For details, vid. DAMON.—2. Tyrant of Agrigentum, who established his power over that city during the period of confusion which followed the death of Agathocles (B.C. 289). He founded a new city on the southern coast of Sicily, to which he gave his own name, and whither he removed all the inhabitants from Gela, which he razed to the ground.

PHINTŌNIS INŚĪLA (now Isola di Figo), an island between Sardinia and Corsica.

PHĪLĒGĒTHON (Φλεγέθων), i. e., the flaming, a river in the lower world, in whose channel flowed flames instead of water.

PHLEGON (Φλέγων), a native of Tralles in Lydia, was a freedman of the Emperor Hadrian, whom he survived. The only two works of Phlegon which have come down to us are a small treatise on wonderful events (Περὶ θαυμασίων), and another short treatise on long-lived persons (Περὶ μακροβίων), which gives a list of persons in Italy who had attained the age of a hundred years and upward. Besides these two works Phlegon wrote many others, of which the most important was an account of the Olympiads in seventeen books, from Ol. 1 to Ol. 229 (A.D. 137). The best edition of Phlegon is by Westermann in his Paradoxographi, Brunsvig, 1839.

PHLEGRA. Vid. PALLENE.

PHLEGRAÏ CAMPI (τὰ Φλεγραία πεδία, or ἡ Φλέγρα: now Solfatarata), the name of the volcanic plain extending along the coast of Campania from Cumæ to Capua, so called because it was believed to have been once on fire. It was also named Laboriæ or Laborinus Campus, either on account of its great fertility, which occasioned its constant cultivation, or on account of the frequent earthquakes and internal convulsions to which it was exposed.

PHĪLĒGŶAS (Φελεγίας), son of Mars (Ares) and Chryse the daughter of Halmus, succeeded Eteocles in the government of Orchomenos in Bœotia, which he called after himself Phlegyantia. He was the father of Ixion and Coronis, the latter of whom became by Apollo the mother of Æsculapius. Enraged at this, Phlegyas set fire to the temple of the god, who killed him with his arrows, and condemned him to severe punishment in the lower world. Phlegyas is represented as the mythical ancestor of the race of the Phlegyæ, a branch of the Minyæ, who emigrated from Orchomenos in Bœotia and settled in Phocis.

PHĪLASĪA. Vid. PHLIUS.

PHĪLIUS (Φηλιός, -όντος: Φηλιάσιος), the chief town of a small province in the northeast of Peloponnesus, whose territory PHĪLASĪA (Φηλιάσια) was bounded on the north by Sicyonia, on the west by Arcadia, on the east by the territory of Cleonæ, and on the south by that of Argos. The greater part of this country was occupied by mountains, called Cœlossa, Carneates, Arantinus, and Tricaranon. According to Strabo, the most ancient town in the country was Aræthyra, which the inhabitants deserted, and afterward founded Phlius; while Pausanias says nothing about a migration, but relates that the town was first called Arantia from its founder Aras, an autochthon, afterward Arathyrea from the daughter of Aras, and finally Phlius, from Phlius, a grandson of Temenus. Phlius was originally inhabited by Argives. It afterward passed into the hands of the Dorians, with whom part of the Argive population intermingled, while part migrated to Samos and Clazomenæ. During the greater part of its history it remained faithful to Sparta.

[PHLYA (Φλύη: Φλύεις), an Attic demus belonging to the tribe Cæcropis, but at a later time to the tribe Ptolemais.]

PHLYGŌNIUM (Φλυγόνιον), a small town in Phocis, destroyed in the Phocian war.

PHŌCÆA (Φώκαια: Φωκαεύς, Phocæënsis; the ruins called Karaja-Fokia, i. e., Old Fokia, southwest of Fouges or New Fokia), the northernmost of the Ionian cities on the western coast of Asia Minor, stood at the western extremity of the tongue of land which divides the Sinus Elaiticus (now Gulf of Fouges) on the north from the Sinus Hermæus (now Gulf of Smyrna) on the south. It was said to have been founded by Phocian colonists under Philogenes and Damon. It was originally within the limits of Æolis, in the territory of Cyme; but the Cymæans voluntarily gave up the site for the new city, which was soon admitted into the Ionian confederacy on the condition of adopting oecists of the race of Codrus. Admirably situated, and possessing two excellent harbors, Naustathmus and Lampter, Phocæa became celebrated as a great maritime state, and especially as the founder of the most distant Greek colonies toward the west, namely, MASSILIA in Gaul, and the still more distant, though far less celebrated, city of Mænaca in Hispania Bætica. After the Persian conquest of Ionia, Phocæa had so declined that she could only furnish three ships to support the great Ionian revolt; but the spirit of her people had not been extinguished; when the common cause was hopeless, and their city was besieged by Harpalus, they embarked, to seek new abodes in the distant west, and bent their course to their colony of Alalia in Corsica. During the voyage, however, a portion of the emigrants resolved to return to their native city, which they restored, and which recovered much of its prosperity, as is proved by the rich booty gained by the Romans when they plundered it under the prætor Æmilius, after which it does not appear as a place of any consequence in history. Care must be taken not to confound Phocæa with Phocis, or the ethnic adjectives of the former Φωκαεύς and Phocæënsis with those of the latter, Φωκίεύς and Phocensis: some of the ancient writers themselves have fallen into such mistakes. It should be observed, also, that the name of Phocæan is often used with reference to Massilia; and, by an amusing affectation, the people of Marscilles still call themselves Phocæans.

[PHOCARUM INSULA (Φωκῶν νήσος, now Tiran, near the Promontorium Dsjerm), i. e., island of seals, an island of the Arabicus Sinus off the coast of Arabia.]

padocia, of base extraction. For some time he was groom to Priscus, and at the time of his accession he held the humble office of centurion. His brutal courage raised him to the throne, which he disgraced by his infamous and tyrannical conduct. His reign was one of defeat, disaster, internal dissension, and sanguinary executions. He was finally dethroned and murdered by Heraclius, who succeeded him on the throne.]

PHŌCIŌN (Φωκίων), the Athenian general and statesman, son of Phocus, was a man of humble origin, and appears to have been born in B. C. 402. He studied under Plato and Xenocrates. He distinguished himself for the first time under his friend Chabrias, in 376, at the battle of Naxos; but he was not employed prominently in any capacity for many years afterward. In 354 (according to others in 350) he was sent into Eubœa in the command of a small force, in consequence of an application from Plutarchus, tyrant of Eretria; and he was subsequently employed on several occasions in the war between the Athenians and Philip of Macedon. He frequently opposed the measures of Demosthenes, and recommended peace with Philip; but he must not be regarded as one of the mercenary supporters of the Macedonian monarch. His virtue is above suspicion, and his public conduct was always influenced by upright motives. When Alexander was marching upon Thebes in 335, Phocion rebuked Demosthenes for his invectives against the king; and after the destruction of Thebes, he advised the Athenians to comply with Alexander's demand for the surrender of Demosthenes and other chief orators of the anti-Macedonian party. This proposal was indignantly rejected by the people, and an embassy was sent to Alexander, which succeeded in deprecating his resentment. According to Plutarch, there were two embassies, the first of which Alexander refused to receive, but to the second he gave a gracious audience and granted its prayer, chiefly from regard to Phocion, who was at the head of it. Alexander ever continued to treat Phocion with the utmost consideration, and to cultivate his friendship. He also pressed upon him valuable presents; but Phocion persisted in refusing his presents, begging the king to leave him no less honest than he found him, and only so far availed himself of the royal favor as to request the liberty of certain prisoners at Sardis, which was immediately granted to him. After Alexander's death, Phocion opposed vehemently, and with all the caustic bitterness which characterized him, the proposal for war with Antipater. Thus, to Hyperides, who asked him tauntingly when he would advise the Athenians to go to war, he answered, "When I see the young willing to keep their ranks, the rich to contribute of their wealth, and the orators to abstain from pilfering the public money." When the Piræus was seized by Alexander, the son of Polysperchon, in 318, Phocion was suspected of having advised Alexander to take this step; whereupon, being accused of treason by Agnonides, he fled, with several of his friends, to Alexander, who sent them with letters of recommendation to his father Polysperchon. The latter, willing to sacrifice them as a peace-offering to the Athenians, sent them back to Athens for the people to deal with them as they would. Here Phocion was sentenced to death. To the last, he maintained his calm, and dignified, and somewhat contemptuous bearing. When some wretched man spat upon him as he passed to the prison, "Will no one," said he, "check this fellow's indecency?" To one who asked him whether he had any message to leave for his son Phocus, he answered, "Only that he bear no grudge against the Athenians." And when the hemlock which had been prepared was found insufficient for all the condemned, and the jailer would not furnish more until he was paid for it, "Give the man his money," said Phocion to one of his friends, "since at Athens one can not even die for nothing." He perished in 317, at the age of eighty-five. The Athenians are said to have repented of their conduct. A brazen statue was raised to the memory of Phocion, and Agnonides was condemned to death. Phocion was twice married, and his second wife appears to have been as simple and frugal in her habits as himself; but he was less fortunate in his son Phocus, who, in spite of his father's lessons and example, was a thorough profligate. As for Phocion himself, our commendation of him must be almost wholly confined to his private qualities. His fellow-citizens may have been degenerate, but he made no effort to elevate them.

PHOCIS (ἡ Φωκίς: Φωκίης Hom., Φωκέες Herod., Φωκεῖς Attic, Phocenses by the Romans), a country in Northern Greece, was bounded on the north by the Locri Epinepidii and Opuntii, on the east by Bœotia, on the west by the Locri Ozolæ and Doris, and on the south by the Corinthian Gulf. At one time it possessed a narrow strip of country on the Eubœan Sea, with the sea-port Daphnus, between the territory of the Locri Epinepidii and Locri Opuntii. It was a mountainous and unproductive country, and owes its chief importance in history to the fact of its possessing the Delphic oracle. Its chief mountain was PARNASSUS, situated in the interior of the country, to which, however, CNE-MIS on its northern frontier, CIRPHIS south of Delphi, and HELICON on the southeastern frontier, all belonged. The principal river in Phocis was the CERPHISUS, the valley of which contained almost the only fertile land in the country, with the exception of the celebrated Crissæan plain in the southwest, on the borders of the Locri Ozolæ. Among the earliest inhabitants of Phocis we find mentioned Leleges, Thracians, Abantes, and Hyantes. Subsequently, but still in the ante-historical period, the Phlegyæ, an Achæan race, a branch of the Minyæ at Orchomenos, took possession of the country; and from this time the main bulk of the population continued to be Achæan, although there were Dorian settlements at Delphi and Bulis. The Phocians are said to have derived their name from an eponymous ancestor Phocus (vid. PHOCUS), and they are mentioned under this name in the Iliad. The Phocians played no conspicuous part in Greek history till the time of Philip of Macedon; but at this period they became involved in a war, called the Phocian or Sacred war, in which the principal states of Greece took part. The Thebans had long been inveterate enemies of the Phocians, and as the latter people had cultivated a portion of the Crissæan plain, which the Amphictyons had declared in B.C. 585 should lie waste forever, the Thebans availed themselves of this pretext to persuade the Amphictyons to impose a fine upon the Phocians, and upon their refusal to pay it, the Thebans further induced the council to declare the Phocian land forfeited to the god at Delphi. Thus threatened by the Amphictyonic council, backed by the whole power of Thebes, the Phocians were persuaded by Philomelus, one of their citizens, to seize Delphi, and to make use of the treasures of the temple for the purpose of carrying on the war. They obtained possession of the temple in B.C. 357. The war which ensued lasted ten years, and was carried on with various success on each side. The Phocians were commanded first by PHILOMELUS, B.C. 357-353, afterward by his brother ONOMARCHUS, 353-352, then by PHAYLLUS, the brother of the two preceding, 352-351, and finally by PHALÆCUS, the son of Onomarchus, 351-346. The Phocians received some support from Athens, but their chief dependence was upon their mercenary troops, which the treasures of the Delphic temple enabled them to hire. The Amphictyons and the Thebans, finding at length that they were unable with their own resources to subdue the Phocians, called in the assistance of Philip of Macedon, who brought the war to a close in 346. The conquerors inflicted the most signal punishment upon the Phocians, who were regarded as guilty of sacrilege. All their towns were razed to the ground with the exception of Abæ, and the inhabitants distributed in villages, containing no more than fifty inhabitants. The two votes which they had in the Amphictyonic council were taken away and given to Philip.

PHOCRA (Φόκρα), a mountain of Northern Africa, in Mauretania Tingitana, apparently on the western bank of the Mulucha, between the chains of the Great and Little Atlas.

PHŌCUS (Φῶκος). 1. Son of Ornytion of Corinth, or, according to others, of Neptune (Poseidon), is said to have been the leader of a colony from Corinth into the territory of Tithorea and Mount Parnassus, which derived from him the name of Phocis.—2. Son of Æacus and the Nereid Psamathe, husband of Asteria or Astero-dia, and father of Panopeus and Crissus. He was murdered by his half-brothers Telamon and Peleus. vid. PELEUS. According to some accounts, the country of Phocis derived its name from him.—3. Son of Phocion. vid. PHOCION.

PHOCYLIDES (Φωκυλίδης), of Miletus, an Ionian poet, contemporary with Theognis, was born B.C. 560. His poetry was chiefly gnomic, and the few fragments of it which we possess display that contempt for birth and station, and that love for substantial enjoyment, which always marked the Ionian character. These fragments, which are eighteen in number, are included in all the chief collections of the lyric and gnomic poets. Some of these collections contain a didactic poem, in two hundred and seventeen hexameters, entitled ποίημα νοῦθευτικόν, to which the name of Phocylides is attached, but which is indoubtedly a forgery, made since the Christian era.

PHŒBE (Φοίβη). 1. Daughter of Uranus (Cælus) and Ge (Terra), became by Cæus the mother of Asteria and Leto (Latona).—2. A surname of Artemis (Diana) in her capacity as the goddess of the moon (Luna), the moon being regarded as the female Phœbus or sun.—3. Daughter of Tyndareos and Leda, and a sister of Clytæmnestra.—4. Daughter of Leucippus, and sister of Hilaira, a priestess of Athena (Minerva), was carried off with her sister by the Dioscuri, and became by Pollux (Polydeuces) the mother of Phœbeleos.

PHŒBIDAS (Φοιβίδας), a Lacedæmonian, who, in B.C. 382, was appointed to the command of the troops destined to re-enforce his brother Eudamidas, who had been sent against Olynthus. On his way Phœbidas halted at Thebes, and treacherously made himself master of the Cadmea. The Lacedæmonians fined Phœbeidas one hundred thousand drachmas, but nevertheless kept possession of the Cadmea. In 378 he was left by Agesilaus as harmost at Thespieæ, and was slain in battle by the Thebans.

PHŒBUS (Φοῖβος), the Bright or Pure, occurs in Homer as an epithet of Apollo, and is used to signify the brightness and purity of youth. At a later time, when Apollo became connected with the Sun, the epithet Phœbus was also applied to him as the Sun-god.

PHŒNICĒ (Φοινίκη : Phœnicia is only found in a doubtful passage of Cicero : Φοίνιξ, pl. Φοίνικες, fem. Φοίνισσα, Phœnix, Phœnices : also, the adj. Πυνικός, though used specifically in connection with Carthago, is etymologically equivalent to Φοίνιξ, by the well-known interchange of oi and o : now forming parts of the pashalics of Acre and Aleppo), a country of Asia, on the coast of Syria, extending from the River Eleutherus (now Nahr-el-Kebir) on the north to below Mount Carmel on the south, and bounded on the east by Cœlesyria and Palestine. (Sometimes, though rarely, the name is extended to the whole western coast of Syria and Palestine). It was a mountainous strip of coast-land, not more than ten or twelve miles broad, hemmed in between the Mediterranean and the chain of Lebanon, whose lateral branches, running out into the sea in bold promontories, divided the country into valleys, which are well watered by rivers flowing down from Lebanon, and are extremely fertile. Of these rivers, the most important are, to one going from north to south, the Eleutherus (now Nahr-el-Kebir) ; the Sabatius (now Arka) ; the river of Tripolis (now Kadisha) ; the Adonis (now Nahr-Ibrahim), south of Byblus ; the Lycus (now Nahr-el-Kelb), north of Berytus ; the Magoras (now Nahr-Beirut), by Berytus ; the Tamyras (now Nahr-el-Damur), between Berytus and Sidon ; the Leo, or Bostrenus (now Nahr-el-Auly), north of Sidon ; the great river (now Litany and Kasimiyeh) which flows from Heliopolis south-southwest through Cœlesyria, and then, turning westward, falls into the sea north of Tyre, and which some call, but without sufficient authority, the Leontes ; the Belus or Pagida (now Numan or Rahwin) by Ptolemaïs, and the Kishon (now Kishon) north of Mount Carmel. Of the promontories referred to, omitting a number of less important ones, the chief were, Theu-prosōpon (now Rasesh-Shukah), between Tripolis and Byblus, Promontorium Album (now Ras-el-Abiad, i. e., White Cape), south of Tyre, and Mount Carmel, besides those occupied by the cities of Tripolis, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyrus, and Ptolemaïs. This conformation of the coast and the position of the country rendered it admirably suited for the home of great maritime states ; and accordingly we find the cities of Phœnicia at the head, both in time and importance, of all the naval enterprise of the ancient world. For the history of those great cities, vid. SION, TYRUS, and the other articles upon them. As to the country in general, there is some difficulty about the origin of the inhabitants and of their name. In the Old Testament the name does not occur ; the people seem to be included under the general designation of Canaanites, and they are also named specifically after their several cities, as the Sidonians, Giblites (from Gebal, i. e., Byblus), Sinites, Arkites, Arvadites, &c. The name Φοινίκη is first found in Greek writers as early as Homer, and is derived by some from the abundance of palm-trees in the country (φοίνιξ, the date-palm), and by others from the purple-red (ποίνιξ), which was obtained from a fish on the coasts, and was a celebrated article of Phœnician commerce ; besides the mythical derivation from Phœnix, the brother of Cadmus. The people were of the Semitic (Syro-Arabian) race, and closely allied to the Hebrews, and they are said to have dwelt originally on the shores of the Erythræan Sea. Their language was a dialect of the Aramaic, closely related to the Hebrew and Syriac. Their written characters were the same as the Samaritan or Old Hebrew ; and from them the Greek alphabet, and through it most of the alphabets of Europe, were undoubtedly derived ; hence they were regarded by the Greeks as the inventors of letters. Other inventions in the sciences and arts are ascribed to them, such as arithmetic, astronomy, navigation, the manufacture of glass, and the coining of money. That, at a very early time, they excelled in the fine arts, is clear from the aid which Solomon received from Hiram, king of Tyre, in the building and the sculptured decorations of the temple at Jerusalem, and from the references in Homer to Sidonian artists. Respecting Phœnician literature, we know of little beyond the celebrated work of SANCHUNIATHON. In the sacred history of the Israelitish conquest of Canaan, in that of the Hebrew monarchy, and in the earliest Greek poetry, we find the Phœnicians already a great maritime people. Early formed into settled states, supplied with abundance of timber from Lebanon, and placed where the caravans from Arabia and the East came upon the Mediterranean, they carried over to the coasts of this sea the products of those countries, as well as of their own, which was rich in metals, and the shores of which furnished the materials of glass and the purple-fish already mentioned. Their voyages and their settlements extended beyond the Pillars of Hercules, to the western coasts of Africa and Spain, and even as far as our own islands. Vid. BRITANNIA, p. 149, a. Within the Mediterranean they planted numerous colonies, on its islands, on the coast of Spain, and especially on the northern coast of Africa, the chief of which was CARTHAGO; they had also settlements on the Euxine and in Asia Minor. In the eastern seas we have records of their voyages to OPHIR, in connection with the navy of Solomon, and to the coasts of Africa under the kings of Egypt. Vid. AFRICA, p. 27, b. They were successively subdued by the Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Macedonians, and Romans; but neither these conquests, nor the rivalry of Carthage, entirely ruined their commerce, which was still considerable at the Christian era; on the contrary, their ships formed the fleet of Persia and the Syrian kings, and partly of the Romans. Vid. SIDON, TYRUS, &c. Under the Romans, Phœnice formed a part of the province of Syria; and under the Eastern empire, it was erected, with the addition of Cœlesyria, into the province of Phœnice Libanensis or Libanensis.

PHŒNICE (Φοινίκη). 1. (Now Finiki), an important commercial town on the coast of the Epirus, in the district Chaonia, fifty-six miles northwest of Buthrotum, in the midst of a marshy country. It was strongly fortified by Justinian.—2. A small island off Gallia Narbonensis, belonging to the Stœchades.

PHŒNICIUM MARE (τὸ Φοινικίον πέλαγος: Σιδωνία θάλασσα), the part of the Mediterranean which washes the coast of Phœnice.

PHŒNICŪS (Φοινικῶς: Φοινικούντιος, Φοινικῶσις). 1. Also PHŒNIX (Φοίνιξ), a harbor on the south of Crete, visited by St. Paul during his voyage to Rome. (Acts, xxvii, 12.)—[2. A harbor on the south coast of Messenia, opposite the CENUSSÆ Insulæ.]—3. A sea-port of the island of Cythera.—4. (Now Chesmech or Egri Liman?), a harbor of Ionia, in Asia Minor, at the foot of Mount Mimas.—5. (Ruins at Deliktash), a flourishing city in the south of Lycia, on Mount Olympus, with a harbor below it. It is often called OLYMPUS. Having become, under the Romans, one of the head-quarters of the pirates, who celebrated here the festival and mysteries of Mithras, it was destroyed by Ser- vilius Isauricus.

PHŒNICŪSA. Vid. ÆOLIÆ INSULÆ.

PHŒNIX (Φοίνιξ). 1. Son of Agenor by Agri- ope or Telephassa, and brother of Europa, but Homer makes him the father of Europa. Being sent by his father in search of his sister, who was carried off by Jupiter (Zeus), he settled in the country, which was called after him Phœ- nicia.—2. Son of Amyntor by Cleobule or Hip- podamia, and king of the Dolopes, took part in the Calydonian hunt. His father Amyntor neglected his legitimate wife, and attached himself to a mistress, whereupon Cleobule persuaded her son to seduce her rival. When Amyntor discovered the crime, he cursed Phœnix, who shortly afterward fled to Peleus. Peleus received him kindly, made him the ruler of the country of the Dolopes, on the frontiers of Phthia, and intrusted to him his son Achilles, whom he was to educate. He afterward accom- panied Achilles on his expedition against Troy. According to another tradition, Phœnix did not dishonor his father's mistress, but she merely accused him of having made improper overtures to her, in consequence of which his father put out his eyes. But Peleus took him to Chiron, who restored to him his sight. Phœ- nix, moreover, is said to have called the son of Achilles Neoptolemus, after Lycomedes had called him Pyrrhus. Neoptolemus was believed to have buried Phœnix at Eion in Macedonia or at Trachis in Thessaly.—3. A fabulous bird Phœ- nix, which, according to a tale related to Herod- otus (ii., 73) at Heliopolis in Egypt, visited that place once in every five hundred years, on his father's death, and buried him in the sanctuary of Helios. For this purpose the Phœnix was believed to come from Arabia, and to make an egg of myrrh as large as possible; this egg he then hollowed out and put into it his father, closing it up carefully, and the egg was believed then to be of exactly the same weight as before. This bird was represented as resembling an eagle, with feathers partly red and partly golden. It is further related, that when his life drew to a close, he built a nest for himself in Arabia, to which he imparted the power of generation, so that after his death a new phœnix rose out of it. As soon as the latter was grown up, he, like his predecessor, proceeded to Heliopolis in Egypt, and burned and buried his father in the temple of Helios. According to a story which has gained more currency in modern times, the Phœnix, when he arrived at a very old age (some say five hundred, and others one thousand four hundred and sixty-one years), committed himself to the flames. Others, again, state that only one Phœnix lived at a time, and that when he died a worm crept forth from his body, and was developed into a new Phœnix by the heat of the sun. His death, further, took place in Egypt after a life of seven thousand and six years. Another modification of the same story relates, that when the Phœnix arrived at the age of five hundred years, he built for himself a funeral pile, consisting of spices, settled upon it, and died. Out of the decomposing body he then rose again, and, having grown up, he wrapped the remains of his old body up in myrrh, carried them to Heliopolis, and burned them there. Similar stories of marvellous birds occur in many parts of the East, as in Persia the legend of the bird Simorg, and in India that of the bird Semendar.

PHŒNIX (Φοίνιξ), a small river in the south- east of Thessaly, flowing into the Asopus near Thermopylæ.

PHŒNIX. Vid. PHŒNICUS, No. 1.

PHŒTIÆ or PHYTIA (Φοιτιῆαι, Φοιτία, Φυτία, Thuc.), a town in Acarnania, on a hill west of Stratus.

PHOLEGANDROS (Φολέγανδρος: now Polykan- dro), an island in the Ægean Sea, one of the smaller Cyclades, between Melos and Scios.

PHŒLŒ (Φολῶν: now Oloso), a mountain forming the boundary between Arcadia and Elis, being a southern continuation of Mount Ery- manthus, in which the rivers Scelléis and Ladon took their origin. It is mentioned as one of the seats of the Centaurs. Vid. PHOLUS.

PHŒLUS (Φόλος). 1. A Centaur, a son of Si- lenus and the nymph Melia. He was accident ally slain by one of the poisoned arrows of Hercules. The mountain, between Arcadia and Elis, where he was buried, was called Pholoe after him. The details of his story are given on p. 357, a.—[2. A follower of Æneas, slain by Turnus in Italy.]

PHORBANTIA. Vid. ÆGATES.

PHORBAS (Φόρβας). 1. Son of Lapithes and Orsinome, and brother of Periplas. The Throians, in pursuance of an oracle, are said to have invited him into their island to deliver it from snakes, and afterward to have honored him with heroic worship. From this circumstance he was called Ophiuchus, and is said by some to have been placed among the stars. According to another tradition, Phorbias went from Thessaly to Olenos, where Alector, king of Elis, made use of his assistance against Pelops, and shared his kingdom with him. Phorbias then gave his daughter Diogenia in marriage to Alector, and he himself married Hyrmine, a sister of Alector, by whom he became the father of Augeas and Actor. He is also described as a bold boxer, and is said to have plundered the temple of Delphi along with the Phlegyæ, but to have been defeated by Apollo. — [2. A Lesbian, father of Diomede, whom Achilles carried off.—3. A Trojan, father of Ilioneus.—4. Of Syene, son of Methion, confederate of Phineus.—5. One of the followers of Æneas, whose form was assumed by the god of Sleep to deceive Palinurus.]

PHORCIDES, PHORCYDES, or PHORCYNIDES, that is, the daughters of Phorcus and Ceto, or the Gorgons and Grææ. Vid. GORGONES and GRÆÆ.

PHORCUS, PHORCYS, or PHORCYN (Φόρκος, Φόρκυς, Φόρκυν). 1. A sea-deity, is described by Homer as "the old man of the sea," to whom a harbor in Ithaca was dedicated, and is called the father of the nymph Thoosa. Later writers call him a son of Pontus and Ge (Terra), and a brother of Thaumias, Nereus, Eurybia, and Ceto. By his sister Ceto he became the father of the Grææ and Gorgones, the Hesperian dragon, and the Hesperides; and by Hecate or Cratais, he was the father of Scylla.—2. Son of Phænops, commander of the Phrygians of Ascania, assisted Priam in the Trojan war, but was slain by Ajax.— [3. A Rutulian, father of seven sons, who fought on the side of Turnus against Æneas on his arrival in Italy.]

PHORMIÖN (Φορμιών). 1. A celebrated Athenian general, the son of Asopius. He distinguished himself particularly in the command of an Athenian fleet in the Corinthian Gulf, where with far inferior forces he gained some brilliant victories over the Peloponnesian fleet in B.C. 429. In the ensuing winter he landed on the coast of Acarnania, and advanced into the interior, where he also gained some successes. He was a man of remarkably temperate habits, and a strict disciplinarian.—2. A peripatetic philosopher of Ephesus, of whom is told the story that he discoursed for several hours before Hannibal on the military art and the duties of a general. When his admiring auditory asked Hannibal what he thought of him, the latter replied, that of all the old blockheads whom he had seen, none could match Phormion.

PHORMOS or PHORMUS (Φόρμος, Φόρμος), a native of Menalus in Arcadia, removed to Sicily, where he became intimate with Gelon, whose children he educated. He distinguished himself as a soldier, both under Gelon and Hieron his brother. In gratitude for his martial successes, he dedicated gifts to Jupiter (Zeus) at Olympia, and to Apollo at Delphi. He is associated by Aristotle with Epicharmus as one of the originators of comedy, or of a particular form of it.

PHORÖNEUS (Φορωνεύς), son of Inachus and the Oceanid Melia or Archia, was a brother of Ægialeus and the ruler of Argos. He was married to the nymph Laodice, by whom he became the father of Niobe, Apis, and Car. According to other writers, his sons were Pelasgus, Iasus, and Agenor, who, after their father's death, divided the kingdom of Argos among themselves. Phoroneus is said to have been the first who offered sacrifices to Juno (Hera) at Argos, and to have united the people, who until then had lived in scattered habitations, into a city, which was called after him, ἄστυ Φορωνικόν. The patronymic Phoronides is sometimes used for Argives in general, and especially to designate Amphiaras and Adrastus.

PHORÖNIS (Φορωνίς), a surname of Io, being according to some a descendant, and according to others a sister of Phoroneus.

PHÖTIUS (Φώτιος), patriarch of Constantinople in the ninth century, played a distinguished part in the political and religious history of his age. After holding various high offices in the Byzantine court, he was, although previously a layman, elected patriarch of Constantinople in A. D. 858, in place of Ignatius, who had been deposed by Bardas, who was all-powerful at the court of his nephew Michael III., then a minor. The patriarchate of Photius was a stormy one, and full of vicissitudes. The cause of Ignatius was espoused by the Romish Church, and Photius thus became one of the great promoters of the schism between the Eastern and Western Churches. In 867, Photius was himself deposed by the Emperor Basil I., and Ignatius was restored; but on the death of Ignatius in 877, Photius, who had meantime gained the favor of Basil, was again elevated to the patriarchate. On the death of Basil in 886, Photius was accused of a conspiracy against the life of the new emperor Leo VI., and was banished to a monastery in Armenia, where he seems to have remained till his death. Photius was one of the most learned men of his time, and in the midst of a busy life found time for the composition of numerous works, several of which have come down to us. Of these the most important is entitled Myriobiblon seu Bibliotheca (Μυριοβιβλιον ἢ Βιβλιοθήκη). It may be described as an extensive review of ancient Greek literature by a scholar of immense erudition and sound judgment. It is an extraordinary monument of literary energy, for it was written while the author was engaged in an embassy to Assyria, at the request of Photius's brother Tarasius, who desired an account of the books which Photius had read in his absence. It contains the analyses of, or extracts from, two hundred and eighty volumes; and many valuable works are only known to us from the account which Photius has given of them. The best edition of this work is by Bekker, Berlin, 1824-1825. Photius was also the author of a Nomocanon, and of a Lexicon or Glossary, which has reached us in a very imperfect state. It was first published by Hermann, Lips., 1808, and subsequently at London, 1822, from the papers of Porson. Photius likewise wrote many theological works, some of which have been published, and others still remain in MS.

PHRAATA (τὰ Φράατα, and other forms), a great city of Media Atropatene, the winter residence of the Parthian kings, especially as a refuge in time of war, lay southeast of Gaza, near the River Amardus. The mountain fortress of VERA (Ὀύερα), which was besieged by Antony, was probably the same place.

[PHRAGANDĒ, a people of Thrace, on the borders of Macedonia.]

PHRANZA or PHRANZES (Φραντζή or Φραντζής), the last and one of the most important Byzantine historians, was frequently employed on important public business by Constantine XIII., the last emperor of Constantinople. On the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453, Phranza was reduced to slavery, but succeeded in making his escape. He subsequently retired to a monastery, where he wrote his Chronicon. This work extends from 1259 to 1477, and is the most valuable authority for the history of the author's time, especially for the capture of Constantinople. It is edited by Alter, Vienna, 1796, and by Bekker, Bonn, 1838.

PHRAORTES (Φραόρτης), second king of Media, and son of Deioces, whom he succeeded, reigned from B.C. 656 to 634. He first conquered the Persians, and then subdued the greater part of Asia, but was at length defeated and killed while laying siege to Ninus (Nineveh), the capital of the Assyrian empire. He was succeeded by his son Cyaxares.

[PHRATAPHERNES (Φραταφέρης), leader of the Parthians, Hyrcanians, and Tapurians in the army of Darius at Gaugamela. He came after the death of Darius to Alexander, when the latter entered Hyrcania, and made his submission to him. He proved himself on several occasions worthy of confidence, so that Alexander gave back to him his satrapies Parthia and Hyrcania. In the division of the provinces B.C. 323, he still retained Hyrcania.]

PHRICIUM (Φρίκιον), a mountain in the east of Locris, near Thermopylæ.

PHRICONIS. Vid. CYME, LARISSA, II., 2.

PHRIXA (Φρίξα, Φρίξαι, Θρίξαι: now Paleofanaro), a town of Elis in Triphylia, on the borders of Pisatis, was situated upon a steep hill on the River Alpheus, and was thirty stadia from Olympia. It was founded by the Min-yaë, and is said to have derived its name from Phrixus.

PHRIXUS (Φρίξος), son of Athamas and Nephele, and brother of Helle. In consequence of the intrigues of his step-mother Ino, he was to be sacrificed to Jupiter (Zeus); but Nephele rescued her two children, who rode away through the air upon the ram with the golden fleece, the gift of Mercury (Hermes). Between Sigeum and the Chersonesus, Helle fell into the sea, which was called after her, the Hellespont; but Phrixus arrived in safety in Colchis, the kingdom of Æetes, who gave him his daughter Chalciope in marriage. Phrixus sacrificed the ram which had carried him to Jupiter (Zeus) Phyxius or Laphystius, and gave its fleece to Æetes, who fastened it to an oak-tree in the grove of Mars (Ares). This fleece was afterward carried away by Jason and the Argonauts. Vid. JASON. By Chalciope Phrixus became the father of Argus, Melas, Phrontis, Cytisorus, and Presbon. Phrixus either died of old age in the kingdom of Æetes, or was killed by Æetes in consequence of an oracle, or returned to Orchomenus, in the country of the Minyans.

PHRIXUS (Φρίξος), a river in Argolis, which flows into the Argolic Gulf between Temenium and Lerna.

[PHRONIMA (Φρονίμη), daughter of Etearchus, king of Axus in Crete, was, at the instigation of her step-mother, cast into the sea, but was saved, and afterward married to Polymnestus, to whom she bore Battus.]

[PHRONTIS (Φρόντις). 1. Son of Onetor, pilot of the ship of Menelaus.—2. Wife of Panthous.]

PHRYGĒA MATER, a name frequently given to Cybele, because she was especially worshipped in Phrygia.

PHRYGĒA (Φρυγία: Φρύξ, pl. Φρύγες, Phryx, Phryges), a country of Asia Minor, which was of very different extent at different periods. According to the division of the provinces under the Roman empire, Phrygia formed the eastern part of the province of Asia, and was bounded on the west by Mysia, Lydia, and Caria, on the south by Lycia and Pisidia, on the east by Lycaonia (which is often reckoned as a part of Phrygia) and Galatia (which formerly belonged to Phrygia), and on the north by Bithynia. With reference to its physical geography, it formed the western part (as Cappadocia did the eastern) of the great central table-land of Asia Minor, supported by the chains of Olympus on the north and Taurus on the south, and breaking on the west into the ridges which separate the great valleys of the HERMUS, the MÆANDER, &c., and which forms the headlands of the western coast. This table-land itself was intersected by mountain chains, and watered by the upper courses and tributaries of the rivers just mentioned in its western part, and in its northern part by those of the RHYNDACUS and SANGARIUS. These parts of the country were very fertile, especially in the valley of the Sangarius, but in the south and east the streams which descend from Taurus lose themselves in extensive salt marshes and salt lakes, some of which are still famous, as in ancient times, for their manufactures of salt. The Phrygians were a distinct and remarkable people, whose origin is one of the most difficult problems of antiquity.

They claimed a very high antiquity; and according to the amusing account given by Herodotus of the absurd experiment of Psammetichus, king of Egypt, on the first spontaneous speech of children, they were thought to have been proved the most ancient of people. Elsewhere Herodotus mentions a Macedonian tradition that the Phryges formerly dwelt in Macedonia, under the name of Briges; and later writers add that they passed over into Asia Minor one hundred years after the Trojan war. They are, however, mentioned by Homer as already settled on the banks of the Sangarius, where later writers tell us of the powerful Phrygian kingdom of GORDIUS and MIDAS. Although any near approach to certainty is hopeless, it would seem that they were a branch of the great Thracian family, settled, in times of unknown antiquity, in the northwest of Asia Minor, as far as the shores of the Hellespont and Propontis, and perhaps of the Euxine, and that the successive migrations of other Thracian tribes, as the Thyni, Bithyni, Mysians, and Teucrians, drove them further inland, till, from this cause, and perhaps, too, by the conquests of the Phrygian kings in the opposite direction, they reached the Halys on the east and the Taurus on the south. They were not, however, entirely displaced by the Mysians and Teucrians from the country between the shores of the Hellespont and Propontis and Mounts Ida and Olympus, where they continued side by side with the Greek colonies, and where their name was preserved in that of the district under all subsequent changes, namely, PHRYGIA MINOR or PHRYGIA HELLESPOINTUS. The kingdom of Phrygia was conquered by CRÆSUS, and formed part of the Persian, Macedonian, and Syro-Grecian empires; but, under the last, the northeastern part, adjacent to Paphlagonia and the Halys, was conquered by the Gauls, and formed the western part of GALATIA; and a part west of this, containing the richest portion of the country, about the Sangarius, was subjected by the kings of Bithynia: this last portion was the object of a contest between the kings of Bithynia and Pergamus, but at last, by the decision of the Romans, it was added, under the name of Phrygia Epictetus (φ. ἐπικτήτος, i. e., the acquired Phrygia), to the kingdom of Pergamus, to which the whole of Phrygia was assigned by the Romans, after the overthrow of Antiochus the Great in B.C. 190. With the rest of the kingdom of Pergamus, Phrygia passed to the Romans by the testament of Attalus III., and thus became a part of the province of Asia, B.C. 130. As to the distinctive names: the inland district usually understood by the name of Phrygia, when it occurs alone, was also called Great Phrygia, or Phrygia Proper, in contradistinction to the Lesser Phrygia, or Phrygia on the Hellespont; and of this Great or Proper Phrygia, the northern part was called, as just stated, Phrygia Epictetus, and the southern part, adjacent to the Taurus, was called, from its position, Phrygia Parorios (φ. παρόρειος). At the division of the provinces in the fourth century, the last-mentioned part, also called Phrygia Pisidica, was assigned to Pisidia, and the southwestern portion, about the Mæander, to Caria; and the remainder was divided into Phrygia Salutaris on the east, with Synnada for its capital, and Phrygia Pacatiana on the west, extending north and south from Bithynia to Pamphylia. Phrygia was rich in products of every kind. Its mountains furnished gold and marble; its valleys oil and wine; the less fertile hills in the west afforded pasture for sheep, whose wool was highly celebrated; and even the marshes of the southeast furnished abundance of salt. In connection with the early intellectual culture of Greece, Phrygia is highly important. The earliest Greek music, especially that of the flute, was borrowed in part, through the Asiatic colonies, from Phrygia, and one of the three musical modes was called the Phrygian. With this country also were closely associated the orgies of Bacchus (Dionysus), and of Cybele, the mother of the gods, the Phrygia Mater of the Roman poets. After the Persian conquest, however, the Phrygians seem to have lost all intellectual activity, and they became proverbial among the Greeks and Romans for submissiveness and stupidity. It should be observed that the Roman poets constantly use the epithet Phrygian as equivalent to Trojan.

PHRYNE (φρύνη), one of the most celebrated Athenian hetæra, was a native of Thespiæ in Bœotia. Her beauty procured for her so much wealth that she is said to have offered to rebuild the walls of Thebes, after they had been destroyed by Alexander, if she might be allowed to put up this inscription on the walls: "Alexander destroyed them, but Phryne, the hetæra, rebuilt them." She had among her admirers many of the most celebrated men of the age of Philip and Alexander, and the beauty of her form gave rise to some of the greatest works of art. The most celebrated picture of Apelles, his "Venus Anadyomene" (vid. APELLES), is said to have been a representation of Phryne, who, at a public festival at Eleusis, entered the sea with dishevelled hair. The celebrated Cnidian Venus of Praxiteles, who was one of her lovers, was taken from her.

PHRYNICHUS (φρύνιχος). 1. An Athenian, and one of the early tragic poets, is said to have been the disciple of Thespiis. He gained his first tragic victory in B.C. 511, twenty-four years after Thespiis (535), twelve years after Chœrilus (523), and twelve years before Æschylus (499); and his last in 476, on which occasion Themistocles was his choragus, and recorded the event by an inscription. Phrynichus probably went, like other poets of the age, to the court of Hiero, and there died. In all the accounts of the rise and development of tragedy, the chief place after Thespiis is assigned to Phrynichus, and the improvements which he introduced in the internal poetical character of the drama entitle him to be considered as the real inventor of tragedy. For the light, ludicrous, Bacchanalian stories of Thespiis, he substituted regular and serious subjects, taken either from the heroic age, or the heroic deeds which illustrated the history of his own time. In these he aimed, not so much to amuse the audience as to move their passions; and so powerful was the effect of his tragedy on the capture of Miletus, that the audience burst into tears, and fined the poet one thousand drachmæ, because he had exhibited the sufferings of a kindred people, and even passed a law that no one should ever again make use of that drama. To the light mimetic chorus of Thespis he added the sublime music of dithyrambic choruses. Aristophanes more than once contrasts these ancient and beautiful melodies with the involved refinements of later poets. Phrynichus was the first poet who introduced masks, representing female persons in the drama. He also paid particular attention to the dances of the chorus. In the drama of Phrynichus, however, the chorus still retained the principal place, and it was reserved for Æschylus and Sophocles to bring the dialogue and action into their due position. [The few fragments of Phrynichus are given by Wagner in Trag. Græc. Fragm. (in Didot's Bibl. Græca), p. 10-16.]—2. A distinguished comic poet of the Old Comedy, was a contemporary of Eupolis, and flourished B.C. 429. [The fragments are given by Meineke, Com. Græc. Frag., i., 228-40, ed. minor.]—3. A Greek sophist and grammarian, described by some as an Arabian, and by others as a Bithynian, lived under M. Aurelius and Commodus. His great work was entitled Σοφιστικὴ Παρασκευή, in thirty-seven books, of which we still possess a fragment, published by Bekker, in his Anecdota Græca, Berol., 1814, vol. i. He also wrote a Lexicon of Attic words (Ἐκλογὴ ῥημάτων καὶ ὀνομάτων Ἀττικῶν), which is extant: the best edition is by Lobeck, Lips., 1830.

PHRYNON (Φρύωνος) or PHRYNIS (Φρύνης), a celebrated dithyrambic poet, of the time of the Peloponnesian war, was a native of Mytilene, but flourished at Athens. His innovations, effeminacies, and frigidness are repeatedly attacked by the comic poets. Among the innovations which he is said to have made was the addition of two strings to the heptachord. He was the first who gained the victory in the musical contests established by Pericles, in connection with the Panathenaic festival, probably in B.C. 445.

[PHRYNON (Φρύων), an Athenian, who had been an Olympian victor, and was celebrated for his strength and courage, commanded the Athenian forces in their contest with the Mytileneans for the possession of Sigeum. He engaged in single combat with Pittacus (vid. PITTACUS), who entangled him in a net, and then dispatched him with a trident and a dagger, just as the retarii afterward fought at Rome.]

ΡΗΘΙΑ. Vid. RHITHIOTIS.

ΡΗΘΙΟΤΙΣ (Φθιώτις: Φθιώτης), a district in the southeast of Thessaly, bounded on the south by the Maliac Gulf, and on the east by the Pagasæan Gulf, and inhabited by Achæans. Vid. THES-SALIA. Homer calls it ΡΗΘΙΑ (Φθίη), and mentions a city of the same name, which was celebrated as the residence of Achilles. Hence the poets call Achilles Phthius heros, and his father Peleus Phthius rex.

ΡΗΘΙΡΑ (τὰ Φθίρα, Φθειρῶν ὄρος), a mountain of Caria, forming a part or a branch of Latmus, inhabited by a people called Φθίρες.

ΡΗΘΙΡΗΛΙ (Φθειροφόγοι, i. e., caters of lice, [or, according to another derivation, caters of pine-cones (from φθειρ, the fruit of the πίτυς φθειροφόρος) as the Budini (Hdt., iv., 109). Vid. Ritter, Vorhalle, p. 459]), a Scythian people near the Caucasus, or, according to some, beyond the River Rha, in Sarmatia Asiatica.

PHYA. Vid. PISISTRATUS.

PHYCŪS (Φυκοῦς: now Ras-Sem or Ras-el-Kazal), a promontory on the coast of Cyrenaica, a little west of Apollonia and northwest of Cyrene. It is the northernmost headland of Libya east of the Lesser Syrtis, and the nearest point of this coast to that of Europe, the distance from Phycus to Tenarum, the southern promontory of Peloponnesus, being two hundred and eight miles. There was a small town of the same name on the headland.

PHYLĀCE (Φυλάκη). 1. A small town of Thessaly in Phthiotis, southeast of Eretria, and east of Enipeus, on the northern slope of Mount Othrys. It was the birth-place of Protesilaus.—2. A town of Epirus in Molossia.—3. A town in Arcadia, near the sources of the Alpheus, on the frontiers of Tegea and Laconia.

PHYLĀCUS (Φύλακος). 1. Son of Deion and Diomedes, and husband of Periclymene or Clymene, the daughter of Minyas, by whom he became the father of Iphiclus and Alcimedede. He was believed to be the founder of the town of Phylace, in Thessaly. Either from his name or that of the town, his descendants, Phylacus, Iphiclus, and Protesilaus, are called Phylacidae.—[2. A Trojan warrior, slain by Leitus.—3. A Delphian hero, to whom a sanctuary was dedicated at Delphi.—4. Son of Histæus of Samos.]

PHYLARCHUS (Φύλαρχος), a Greek historical writer, and a contemporary of Aratus, was probably a native of Naucratis in Egypt, but spent the greater part of his life at Athens. His great work was a history in twenty-eight books, which embraced a period of fifty-two years, from the expedition of Pyrrhus into Peloponnesus, B.C. 272, to the death of Cleomenes, 220. Phylarchus is vehemently attacked by Polybius, who charges him with falsifying history through his partiality to Cleomenes, and his hatred against Aratus and the Achæans. The accusation is probably not unfounded, but it might be retorted with equal justice upon Polybius, who has fallen into the opposite error of exaggerating the merits of Aratus and his party, and depreciating Cleomenes. The style of Phylarchus appears to have been too oratorical and declamatory; but it was, at the same time, lively and attractive. The fragments of Phylarchus have been collected by Lucht, Lips., 1836; by Brückner, Vratisl., 1838; and by Müller, Fragm. Histor. Græc., Paris, 1840.

PHYLAS (Φύλας). 1. King of the Dryopes, was attacked and slain by Hercules because he had violated the sanctuary of Delphi. By his daughter Midea, Hercules became the father of Antiochus.—2. Son of Antiochus, and grandson of Hercules and Midea, was married to Deiphile, by whom he had two sons, Hippotas and Thero.—3. King of Ephyra in Thesprotia, and the father of Polymele and Astyoche, by the latter of whom Hercules was the father of Tlepolemus.

PHŪLE (Φυλή: Φυλάσιος: now Fili), a demus in Attica, and a strongly fortified place, belonging to the tribe Ceneis, was situated on the confines of Bœotia, and on the southwestern slope of Mount Parnes. It is memorable as the place which Thrasylbulus and the Athenian patriots seized soon after the end of the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 404, and whence they directed their operations against the thirty tyrants at Athens.

PHYLEUS (Φυλεύς), son of Augeas, was expelled by his father from Ephyra because he gave evidence in favor of Hercules. (Vid. p. 357, b.) He then emigrated to Dulichium. By Cimene or Timandra he became the father of Meges, who is hence called Phylides.

[PHYLLIDAS (Φυλλίδας), a Theban, secretary to the polemarchs who held office under Spartan protection, after the seizure of the Cadmea by Phœbidas. He was a secret enemy of the new government, and contributed greatly to the success of the plot formed by Pelopidas for the liberation of his country from Spartan tyranny.]

PHYLLIS. Vid. DEMOPHON, No. 2.

PHYLLIS (Φύλλις), a district in Thrace south of the Strymon, near Mount Pangæus.

[PHYLLIS, the nurse of Domitian, whom she buried after his assassination.]

PHYLLUS (Φύλλος; now Petrino), a town of Thessaly, in the district Thessalotis, north of Metropolis.

[PHÿLO (Φυλώ), one of the female attendants of Helen.]

PHYSCA (Φύσκα), a town of Macedonia, in the district Eordæa.

PHYSCON. Vid. PTOLEMÆUS.

PHYSCUS (Φύσκος). 1. A city of the Ozolian Locrians in Northern Greece.—2. (Now Paitch-shin), a town on the southern coast of Caria, in the Rhodian territory, with an excellent harbor, which was used as the port of Mylasa, and was the landing-place for travellers coming from Rhodes.—3. (Now Odornch), an eastern tributary of the Tigris in Lower Assyria. The town of Opis stood at its junction with the Tigris.

PHYTEUM (Φύταιον : Φυταίος), a town in Ætolia, southeast of Thermum, on the Lake Trichonis.

PICENI. Vid. PICENUM.

PICENTES. Vid. PICENUM.

PICENTIA (Picentinus : now Vicenza), a town in the south of Campania, at the head of the Sinus Pæstanus, and between Salerno and the frontiers of Lucania, the inhabitants of which were compelled by the Romans, in consequence of their revolt to Hannibal, to abandon their town and live in the neighboring villages. Between the town and the frontiers of Lucania, there was an ancient temple of the Argive Juno, said to have been founded by Jason, the Argonaut. The name of Picentini was not confined to the inhabitants of Picentia, but was given to the inhabitants of the whole coast of the Sinus Pæstanus, from the promontory of Minerva to the River Silarus. They were a portion of the Sabine Picentes, who were transplanted by the Romans to this part of Campania after the conquest of Picenum, B.C. 268, at which time they founded the town of Picentia.

PICENTINI. Vid. PICENTIA and PICENUM.

PICENUM (Picentes, sing. Picens, more rarely Picentini and Piceni), a country in Central Italy, was a narrow strip of land along the western coast of the Adriatic, and was bounded on the north by Umbria, from which it was separated by the River Æsis, on the west by Umbria and the territory of the Sabines, and on the south by the territory of the Marsi and Vestini, from which it was separated by a range of hills and by the River Matrinus. It is said to have derived its name from the bird picus, which directed the Sabine immigrants into the land, or from a mythical leader Picus: some modern writers connect the name with the Greek πεύκη, a pine-tree, on account of the pine-trees growing in the country on the slopes of the Apennines; but none of these etymologies can be received. Picenum formed the fifth region in the division of Italy made by Augustus. The country was traversed by a number of hills of moderate height, eastern offshoots of the Apennines, and was drained by several small rivers flowing into the Adriatic through the valleys between these hills. The country was upon the whole fertile, and was especially celebrated for its apples; but the chief employment of the inhabitants was the feeding of cattle and swine. The Picentes, as already remarked, were Sabine immigrants; but the population of the country appears to have been of a mixed nature. The Umbrians were in possession of the land when it was conquered by the Sabine Picentes, and some of the Umbrian population became intermingled with their Sabine conquerors. In addition to this, the southern part of the country was for a time in possession of the Liburnians, and Ancona was occupied by Greeks from Syracuse. In B.C. 299 the Picentes made a treaty with the Romans; but having revolted in 269, they were defeated by the consul Sempronius Sophus in the following year, and were obliged to submit to the Roman supremacy. A portion of the people was transplanted to the coast of the Sinus Pæstanus, where they founded the town Picentia. Vid. PICENTIA. Two or three years afterward the Romans sent colonies to Firmum and Castrum Novum in Picenum, in order to secure their newly-conquered possession. The Picentes fought with the other Soci against Rome in the Social or Marsic war (90–89), and received the Roman franchise at the close of it.

PICTAVI. Vid. PICTONES.

PICTI, a people inhabiting the northern part of Britain, appear to have been either a tribe of the Caledonians, or the same people as the Caledonians, though under another name. They were called Picti by the Romans, from their practice of painting their bodies. They are first mentioned by the rhetorician Enmenius in an oration addressed to Constantius Chlorus, A.D. 296; and after this time their name frequently occurs in the Roman writers, and often in connection with that of the Scoti. In the next century we find them divided into two tribes, the Dicaledonæ or Dicaledones, and the Vecturiones or Vecturones. At a still later period their principal seat was in the northeast of Scotland.

PICTONES, subsequently PICTAVI, a powerful people on the coast of Gallia Aquitania, whose territory extended north as far as the Liger (now Loire), and east probably as far the River Creuse. Their chief town was Limonum, subsequently Pictavi (now Poitiers).

PICTOR, FABIUS. 1. C., painted the temple of Salus, which the dictator C. Junius Brutus Bubulcus contracted for in his censorship, B.C. 307, and dedicated in his dictatorship, 302. This painting, which must have been on the walls of the temple, was probably a representation of the battle which Bubulcus had gained against the Samnites. This is the earliest Roman painting of which we have any record. It was preserved till the reign of Claudius, when the temple was destroyed by fire. In consequence of this painting, C. Fabius received the surname of Pictor, which was borne by his descendants.—2. C., son of No. 1, consul 269.—3. N. (i. e., Numerius), also son of No. 1, consul 266.—4. Q., son of No. 2, was the most ancient writer of Roman history in prose. He served in the Gallic war 225, and also in the second Punic war. His history, which was written in Greek, began with the arrival of Æneas in Italy, and came down to his own time. Hence Polybius speaks of him as one of the historians of the second Punic war. [A few fragments of the history of Pictor are collected by Krause in Fragmenta Historicorum Lat., p. 52–63.]—5. Q., prætor 189, and flamen Quirinalis.—6. Ser., is said by Cicero to have been well skilled in law, literature, and antiquity. He lived about B.C. 150. He appears to be the same as the Fabius Pictor who wrote a work De Jure Pontificio, in several books. He probably wrote Annals likewise in the Latin language; since Cicero (de Orat., ii., 12) speaks of a Latin annalist Pictor, whom he places after Cato, but before Piso; which corresponds with the time at which Ser. Pictor lived, but could not apply to Q. Pictor, who lived in the time of the second Punic war.

PICUMNUS and PILUMNUS, two Roman divinities, were regarded as two brothers, and as the beneficent gods of matrimony in the rustic region of the ancient Romans. A couch was prepared for them in the house in which there was a newly-born child. Pilumnus was believed to ward off all sufferings from the infant with his pilum, with which he taught to pound the grain; and Picumnus, who, under the name of Sterquilinius, was believed to have discovered the use of manure for the fields, conferred upon the infant strength and prosperity. Hence ooth were also looked upon as the gods of good deeds, and were identified with Castor and Pollux. When Danaë landed in Italy, Picumnus is said to have built with her the town of Ardea, and to have become by her the father of Daunus.

PICUS (Πίκος), a Latin prophetic divinity, is described as a son of Saturnus or Sterculus, as the husband of Canens, and the father of Faunus. In some traditions he was called the first king of Italy. He was a famous soothsayer and augur, and as he made use in his prophetic art of a picus (a woodpecker), he himself was also called Picus. He was represented in a rude and primitive manner as a wooden pillar with a woodpecker on the top of it, but afterward as a young man with a woodpecker on his head. The whole legend of Picus is founded on the notion that the woodpecker is a prophetic bird, sacred to Mars. Pomona, it is said, was beloved by him, and when Ciree's love for him was not requited, she changed him into a woodpecker, who, however, retained the prophetic powers which he had formerly possessed as a man.

PIËRIA (Πιερία : Πιέρες). 1. A narrow slip of country on the southeastern coast of Macedonia, extending from the mouth of the Peneus in Thessaly to the Haliacmon, and bounded on the west by Mount Olympus and its offshoots. A portion of these mountains was called by the ancient writers Πιέρους, or the Pierian Mountain. The inhabitants of this country, the Pierres, were a Thracian people, and are celebrated in the early history of Greek poetry and music, since their country was one of the earliest seats of the worship of the Muses, and Orpheus is said to have been buried there. After the establishment of the Macedonian kingdom in Emathia in the seventh century B.C., Pieria was conquered by the Macedonians, and the inhabitants were driven out of the country.—2. A district in Macedonia, east of the Strymon near Mount Pangæum, where the Pierians settled, who had been driven out of their original abodes by the Macedonians, as already related. They possessed in this district the fortified towns of Phagres and Pergamus.—3. A district on the northern coast of Syria, so called from the Mountain Pieria, a branch of the Amanus, a name given to it by the Macedonians after their conquest of the East. In this district was the city of Seleucia, which is distinguished from other cities of the same name as Seleucia in Pieria.

PIËRIDES (Πιερίδες). 1. A surname of the Muses, which they derived from Pieria, near Mount Olympus, where they were first worshipped among the Thracians. Some derived the name from an ancient king Pierus, who is said to have emigrated from Thrace into Bœotia, and to have established their worship at Thespiæ. Pieris also occurs in the singular.—2. The nine daughters of Pierus, king of Emathia (Macedonia), whom he begot by Eupippe or Antiope, and to whom he gave the names of the nine Muses. They afterward entered into a contest with the Muses, and, being conquered, they were metamorphosed into birds called Colymbas, Iyngx, Cenchris, Cissa, Chloris, Acalanthis, Nessa, Pipo, and Dracontis.

PIERUS (Πιέρος). 1. Mythological. Vid. PIËRIDES.—2. A mountain. Vid. PIERIA, No. 1.

PIËTAS, a personification of faithful attachment, love, and veneration among the Romans. At first she had only a small sanctuary at Rome, but in B.C. 191 a larger one was built. She is represented on Roman coins as a matron throwing incense upon an altar, and her attributes are a stork and children. She is sometimes represented as a female figure offering her breast to an aged parent.

PINĀRA (τὰ Πίναρα : Πίναρες : ruins at Pinara or Minara), an inland city of Lycia, some distance west of the River Xanthus, at the foot of Mount Cragus. Here Pandarus was worshipped as a hero.

PINĀRIĀ GENS, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, traced its origin to a time long previous to the foundation of the city. The legend related that when Hercules came into Italy, he was hospitably received on the spot where Rome was afterward built by the Potitii and the Pinarii, two of the most distinguished families in the country. The hero, in return, taught them the way in which he was to be worshipped; but as the Pinarii were not at hand when the sacrificial banquet was ready, and did not come till the entrails of the victim were eaten, Hercules, in anger, determined that the Pinarii should in all future time be excluded from partaking of the entrails of the victims, and that in all matters relating to his worship they should be inferior to the Potitii. These two families continued to be the hereditary priests of Hercules till the censorship of App. Claudius (B.C. 312), who purchased from the Potitii the knowledge of the sacred rites, and intrusted them to public slaves; whereat the god was so angry that the whole Potitia gens, containing twelve families and thirty grown-up men, perished within a year, or, according to other accounts, within thirty days, and Appius himself became blind. The Pinarii did not share in the guilt of communicating the sacred knowledge, and therefore did not receive the same punishment as the Potitii, but continued in existence to the latest times. It appears that the worship of Hercules by the Potitii and Pinarii was a sacrum gentilitium belonging to these gentes, and that in the time of Appius Claudius these sacra privata were made sacra publica. The Pinarii were divided into the families of Mamerminus, Natta, Posca, Rusca, and Scarpus, but none of them obtained sufficient importance to require a separate notice.

PINĀRIUS, L. [1. The commander of the Roman garrison at Enna in the second Punic war, B.C. 214, suppressed with vigor an attempt at insurrection which the inhabitants made.]—2. The great-nephew of the dictator C. Julius Cæsar, being the grandson of Julia, Cæsar's eldest sister. In the will of the dictator, Pinarius was named one of his heirs along with his two other great-nephews, C. Octavius and Q. Pedius, Octavius obtaining three fourths of the property, and the remaining fourth being divided between Pinarius and Pedius. [Pinarius afterward served in the army of the triumvirs in the war against Brutus and Cassius.]

near Issus, between the mouth of the I'yramus and the Syrian frontier.

PINDĀRUS (Πίνδαρος). 1 The greatest lyric poet of Greece, was born either at Thebes or at Cynoscephalæ, a village in the territory of Thebes, about B.C. 522. His family was one of the noblest in Thebes, and seems also to have been celebrated for its skill in music. The father or uncle of Pindar was a flute-player, and Pindar at an early age received instruction in the art from the flute-player Scopelinus. But the youth soon gave indications of a genius for poetry, which induced his father to send him to Athens to receive more perfect instruction in the art. Later writers tell us that his future glory as a poet was miraculously foreshadowed by a swarm of bees which rested upon his lips while he was asleep, and that this miracle first led him to compose poetry. At Athens Pindar became the pupil of Lasus of Hermione, the founder of the Athenian school of dithyrambic poetry. He returned to Thebes before he completed his twentieth year, and is said to have received instruction there from Myrtis and Corinna of Tanagra, two poetesses who then enjoyed great celebrity in Bœotia. With both these poetesses Pindar contended for the prize in the musical contests at Thebes; and he is said to have been defeated five times by Corinna. Pindar commenced his professional career as a poet at an early age, and was soon employed by different states and princes in all parts of the Hellenic world to compose for them choral songs for special occasions. He received money and presents for his works; but he never degenerated into a common mercenary poet, and he continued to preserve to his latest days the respect of all parts of Greece. He composed poems for Hieron, tyrant of Syracuse, Alexander, son of Amyntas, king of Macedonia, Theron, tyrant of Agrigentum, Arcesilaus, king of Cyrene, as well as for many free states and private persons. He was courted especially by Alexander, king of Macedonia, and Hieron, tyrant of Syracuse; and the praises which he bestowed upon the former are said to have been the chief reason which led his descendant, Alexander, the son of Philip, to spare the house of the poet when he destroyed the rest of Thebes. Pindar's stated residence was at Thebes, though he frequently left home in order to witness the great public games, and to visit the states and distinguished men who courted his friendship and employed his services. Thus about B.C. 473 he visited the court of Hieron at Syracuse, where he remained four years. He probably died in his eightieth year in 442. The only poems of Pindar which have come down to us entire are his Epinicia, or triumphal odes. But these were but a small portion of his works. Besides his triumphal odes, he wrote hymns to the gods, pœans, dithyrambs, odes for processions (προσόδια), songs of maidens (παρθένεια), mimic dancing songs (ὑπορχήματα), drinking-songs (σκόλια), dirges (θρήνοι), and encomia (ἐγκώμια), or panegyrics on princes. Of these we have numerous fragments. Most of them are mentioned in the well-known lines of Horace (Carm., iv., 2) :

“*Seu per eudaces numeros dithyrambos
Verba devolvit, numisque fertur
Leges solutus:*”

Seu de .s. (hymns and pæans) regesve
 (encomia) canit, deorum
 Sanguinem: . . .
 Sive quos Elea domum reducit
 Palma cœlestes (the Epinicia): . . .
 Flebili sponsæ juvenemve raptum
 Florat" (the dirges).

In all of these varieties Pindar equally excelled, as we see from the numerous quotations made from them by the ancient writers, though they are generally of too fragmentary a kind to allow us to form a judgment respecting them. Our estimate of Pindar as a poet must be formed almost exclusively from his Epinicia, which were composed in commemoration of some victory in the public games. The Epinicia are divided into four books, celebrating respectively the victories gained in the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games. In order to understand them properly, we must bear in mind the nature of the occasion for which they were composed, and the object which the poet had in view. A victory gained in one of the four great national festivals conferred honor not only upon the conqueror and his family, but also upon the city to which he belonged. It was accordingly celebrated with great pomp and ceremony. Such a celebration began with a procession to a temple, where a sacrifice was offered, and it ended with a banquet and the joyous revelry, called by the Greeks comus (κῶμος). For this celebration a poem was expressly composed, which was sung by a chorus. The poems were sung either during the procession to the temple, or at the comus at the close of the banquet. Those of Pindar's Epinician odes which consist of strophes without epodes were sung during the procession, but the majority of them appear to have been sung at the comus. In these odes Pindar rarely describes the victory itself, as the scene was familiar to all the spectators, but he dwells upon the glory of the victor, and celebrates chiefly either his wealth (ὄλθος) or his skill (ἀρετή): his wealth, if he had gained the victory in the chariot-race, since it was only the wealthy that could contend for the prize in this contest; his skill, if he had been exposed to peril in the contest. The metres of Pindar are too extensive and difficult a subject to admit of explanation in the present work. No two odes possess the same metrical structure. The Doric rhythm chiefly prevails, but he also makes frequent use of the Æolian and Lydian as well. The best editions of Pindar are by Böckh, Lips., 1811-1821, 2 vols. 4to, and by Dissen, Gotha, 1830, 2 vols. 8vo, of which there is a second edition by Schneidewin, Gotha, 1843, seq.—[2. Under the name of Pindarus there exists a Latin poem in hexameter verse, commonly called Epitome Iliados Homeri. Wernsdorf tried to prove that the name of the author was Pentadius, from which Pindarus was a corruption, but this idea he afterward abandoned; Bähr thinks the poem must have been composed in the third or fourth century A. D.; it is published by Wernsdorf in Poeta Latini Minores, vol. iv., pt. ii., and separately, with the notes of Theod. Van Kooten, by H. Weytingh, Lugd. Bat., 1809.—3. The freedman of C. PINDUS (Πίνδος). 1. A lofty range of mountains in Northern Greece, a portion of the great back-bone which runs through the centre of Greece from north to south. The name of Pindus was confined to that part of the chain which separates Thessaly and Epirus, and its most northerly and also highest part was called LACMON.—2. One of the four towns of Doris, near the sources of a small river of the same name, which flowed through Locris into the Cephissus.

PINNES, PINNEUS, or PINEUS, was the son of Agron, king of Illyria, by his first wife Tritæuta. At the death of Agron (B. C. 231), Pinnes, who was then a child, was left in the guardianship of his step-mother Teuta, whom Agron had married after divorcing Tritæuta. When Teuta was defeated by the Romans, the care of Pinnes devolved upon Demetrius of Pharos; but when Demetrius, in his turn, made war against the Romans and was defeated, Pinnes was placed upon the throne by the Romans, but was compelled to pay tribute.

PIRÆEUS or PIRÆUS (Πειραιεύς: now Porto Leone or Porto Dracone). 1. The most important of the harbors of Athens, was situated in the peninsula about five miles southwest of Athens. This peninsula, which is sometimes called by the general name of Piræeus, contained three harbors, Piræus proper on the western side, by far the largest of the three, Zea on the eastern side, separated from Piræus by a narrow isthmus, and Munychia (now Pharnari) still further to the east. The position of Piræus and of the Athenian harbors has been usually misunderstood. In consequence of a statement in an ancient scholiast, it was generally supposed that the great harbor of Piræus was divided into three smaller harbors, Zea for corn vessels, Aphrodisium for merchant ships in general, and Cantharus for ships of war; but this division of the Piræus is now rejected by the best topographers. Zea was a harbor totally distinct from the Piræus, as is stated above; the northern portion of the Piræus seems to have been used by the merchant vessels, and the Cantharus, where the ships of war were stationed, was on the southern side of the harbor, near the en trance. It was through the suggestion of Themistocles that the Athenians were induced to make use of the harbor of Piræus. Before the Persian wars their principal harbor was Phalerum, which was not situated in the Piræan peninsula at all, but lay to the east of Munychia.

Vid. PHALERUM. At the entrance of the harbor of Piræus there were two promontories, the one on the right hand called Alcimus (Ἀλκίμος), on which was the tomb of Themistocles, and the other on the left called Estionēa (Ἑτιώνεια), in which the Four Hundred erected a fortress. The entrance of the harbor, which was narrow by nature, was rendered still narrower by two mole-heads, to which a chain was attached to prevent the ingress of hostile ships. The town or demus of Piræus was surrounded with strong fortifications by Themistocles, and was connected with Athens by means of the celebrated Long Walls under the administration of Pericles. (Vid. p. 122, a.) The town possessed a considerable population, and many public and private buildings. The most important of its public buildings were the Agora Hippodamia, a temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Soter, a large stoa, a theatre, the Phreattys or tribunal for the admirals, the arsenal, the docks, &c.—[2. PIRÆUS, an open roadstead on the eastern coast of Corinthia, near the Promontory Spiraëum, close to the borders of the territory of Epidaurus, where, in the twentieth year of the Peloponnesian war, the Athenians blockaded a part of the Peloponnesian fleet.]

[PIRÆUS (Πειραιός), son of Clytius in Ithaca, a friend of Telemachus.]

PIRĒNĒ (Πειρήνη), a celebrated fountain at Corinth, which, according to tradition, took its origin from Pirene, a daughter of Cēbalus, who here melted away into tears through grief for the loss of her son Cenchrias. At this fountain Bellerophon is said to have caught the horse Pegasus. It gushed forth from the rock in the Acrocorinthus, was conveyed down the hill by subterraneous conduits, and fell into a marble basin, from which the greater part of the town was supplied with water. The fountain was celebrated for the purity and salubrity of its water, and was so highly valued that the poets frequently employed its name as equivalent to that of Corinth itself.

PIRĒSĪÆ (Πειρειαί), probably the same as the IRESLÆ of Livy, a town of Thessaly, in the district Thessalotis, on the left bank of the Peneus.

PIRITHŌUS (Πειρίθοος), son of Ixion or Jupiter (Zeus) by Dia, was king of the Lapithæ in Thessaly, and married to Hippodamia, by whom he became the father of Polypætēs. When Pirithoüs was celebrating his marriage with Hippodamia, the intoxicated centaur Eurytion or Eurytus carried her off, and this act occasioned the celebrated fight between the Centaurs and Lapithæ, in which the Centaurs were defeated. Pirithoüs once invaded Attica, but when Theseus came forth to oppose him, he conceived a warm admiration for the Athenian king, and from this time a most intimate friendship sprung up between the two heroes. Theseus was present at the wedding of Pirithoüs, and assisted him in his battle against the Centaurs. Hippodamia afterward died, and each of the two friends resolved to wed a daughter of Jupiter (Zeus)

With the assistance of Pirithoüs, Theseus carried off Helen from Sparta, and placed her at Aphidnæ, under the care of Æthra. Pirithoüs was still more ambitious, and resolved to carry off Persephone (Proserpina), the wife of the king of the lower world. Theseus would not desert his friend in the enterprise, though he knew the risk which they ran. The two friends accordingly descended to the lower world, but they were seized by Pluto (Hades) and fastened to a rock, where they both remained till Hercules visited the lower world. Hercules delivered Theseus, who had made the daring attempt only to please his friend, but Pirithoüs remained forever in torment (amatorem trecenta Pirithoum cohibent catenæ, Hor., Carm. iii., 4, 80). Pirithoüs was worshipped at Athens, along with Theseus, as a hero.

PIRUS (Πείρος), PIERUS (Πιέρος), of ACHELOUS, the chief river of Achaia, which falls into the Gulf of Patræ near Olenus.

PIRUSTÆ, a people in Illyria, exempted from taxes by the Romans because they deserted Gentius and passed over to the Romans.

PISA (Πισα : Πισάτης), the capital of PISATIS (Πισάτις), the middle portion of the province of Elis in Peloponnesus. Vid. ELIS. In the most ancient times Pisatis formed a union of eight states, of which, in addition to Pisa, we find mention of Salmone, Heraclea, Harpinna, Cycesium, and Dyspontium. Pisa itself was situated north of the Alpheus, at a very short distance east of Olympia, and, in consequence of its proximity to the latter place, was frequently identified by the poets with it. The history of the Pisatæ consists of their struggle with the Eleans, with whom they contended for the presidency of the Olympic games. The Pisatæ obtained this honor in the eighth Olympiad (B.C. 748) with the assistance of Phidon, tyrant of Argos, and also a second time in the thirty-fourth Olympiad (644) by means of their own king Pantaleon. In the fifty-second Olympiad (572) the struggle between the two tribes was brought to a close by the conquest and destruction of Pisa by the Eleans. So complete was the destruction of the city, that not a trace of it was left in later times; and some persons, as we learn from Strabo, even questioned whether it had ever existed, supposing that by the name of Pisa the kingdom of the Pisatæ was alone intended. The existence, however, of the city does not admit of dispute. Even after the destruction of the city, the Pisatæ did not relinquish their claims; and in the one hundred and fourth Olympiad (364), they had the presidency of the Olympic games along with the Arcadians, when the latter people were making war with the Eleans.

PISÆ, more rarely PISA (Pisanus : now Pisa), one of the most ancient and important of the cities of Etruria, was situated at the confluence of the Arnus and Ausar (now Serchio), about six miles from the sea; but the latter river altered its course in the twelfth century, and now flows into the sea by a separate channel. According to some traditions, Pisæ was founded by the companions of Nestor, the inhabitants of Pisa in Elis, who were driven upon the coast of Italy on their return from Troy, whence the Roman poets give the Etruscan town the surname of Alpea. This legend, however, like many others, probably arose from the accidental similarity of the names of the two cities. It would seem that Pisa was originally a Pelasgic town, that it afterward passed into the hands of the Ligyæ, and from them into those of the Etruscans. It then became one of the twelve cities of Etruria, and was, down to the time of Augustus, the most northerly city in the country. Pisa is frequently mentioned in the Ligurian wars as the head-quarters of the Roman legions. In B.C. 180 it was made a Latin colony, and appears to have been colonized again in the time of Augustus, since we find it called in inscriptions Colonia Julia Pisana. Its harbor, called Portus Pisanus, at the mouth of the Arnus, was much used by the Romans; and in the time of Strabo the town of Pisa was still a place of considerable importance on account of the marble-quarries in its neighborhood, and the quantity of timber which it yielded for ship-building. About three miles north of the town were mineral springs, called Agæ Pisana, which were less celebrated in antiquity than they are at the present day. There is scarcely a vestige of the ancient city in the modern Pisa.

PISANDER (Ἡλείωνος). [1. Son of Mæmalus, a leader of the Myrmidons before Troy.—2. Son of Antimachus, brother of Hippolochus, a Trojan warrior, slain by Agamemnon.—3. Another Trojan warrior, slain by Menelaus.—4. Son of Polyctor, and one of the suitors of Penelope.—5. An Athenian, of the demus of Acharnæ, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war, and was attacked by the comic poets for his rapacity and cowardice. In 412 he comes before us as the chief ostensible agent in effecting the revolution of the Four Hundred. In all the measures of the new government, of which he was a member, he took an active part; and when Tharmenes and others withdrew from it, he sided with the more violent aristocrats, and was one of those who, on the counter-revolution, took refuge with Agis at Decælea. His property was confiscated, and it does not appear that he ever returned to Athens.—6. A Spartan, brother-in-law of Agesilaus II., who made him admiral of the fleet in 395. In the following year he was defeated and slain in the sea-fight off Cnidus, against Conon and Pharnabazus.—7. A poet of Camirus in Rhodes, flourished about B.C. 648-645. He was the author of a poem in two books on the exploits of Hercules, called Heraclæa (Ἡράκλεια). The Alexandrian grammarians thought so highly of the poem that they received Pisander, as well as Antimachus and Panyasis, into the epic canon together with Homer and Hesiod. Only a few lines of it have been preserved. In the Greek Anthology we find an epigram attributed to Pisander of Rhodes, perhaps the poet of Camirus. [The few remaining fragments are published by Dübner among the Poeta Epici Minores, Paris, 1840.]—8. A poet of Laranda, in Lycia or Lycaonia, was the son of Nestor, and flourished in the reign of Alexander Severus (A.D. 222-235). He wrote a poem, called Ἡρωικὰ θεογαμίαι, which probably treated of the marriages of gods and god-esses with mortals, and of the heroic progeny thus produced.

PISAURUM (Pisaurensis: now Pesaro), an ancient town of Umbria, near the mouth of the River PISAURUS (now Foglia), on the road to Ariminum. It was colonized by the Romans in B.C. 186, and probably colonized a second time by Augustus, since it is called in inscriptions Colonia Julia Felix.

PISIDIA (ἡ Πισιδικὴ: Πισίδης, pl. Πισίδαί, also Πεισιδαί, Πισειδαί, and Πισιδικοί, PISIDA, pl. PISIDÆ, anc. PEISIDÆ), an inland district of Asia Minor, bounded by Lycia and Pamphylia on the south, Cilicia on the southeast, Lycaonia and Isauria (the latter often reckoned a part of Pisidia) on the east and northeast, Phrygia Paroreios on the north, where the boundary varied at different times, and was never very definite, and Caria on the west. It was a mountainous region, formed by that part of the main chain of Mount Taurus which sweeps round in a semi-circle parallel to the shore of the Pamphylian Gulf, the strip of shore itself, at the foot of the mountains, constituting the district of PAMPHYLIA. The inhabitants of the mountains were a warlike aboriginal people, related apparently to the Isaurians and Cilicians. They maintained their independence, under petty chieftains, against all the successive rulers of Asia Minor. The Romans never subdued the Pisidians in their mountain fortresses, though they took some of the towns on the outskirts of their country; for example, Antiochia, which was made a colony with the Jus Italicum. In fact, the northern part, in which Antiochia stood, had originally belonged to Phrygia, and was more accessible and more civilized than the mountains which formed the proper country of the Pisidians. Nominally, the country was considered a part of Pamphylia till the new subdivision of the empire under Constantine, when Pisidia was made a separate province. The country is still inhabited by wild tribes, among whom travelling is dangerous, and it is therefore little known. Ancient writers say that it contained, amid its rugged mountains, some fertile valleys, where the olive flourished; and it also produced the gum storax, some medicinal plants, and salt. On the southern slope of the Taurus, several rivers flowed through Pisidia and Pamphylia into the Pamphylian Gulf, the chief of which were the Cestrus and the Catarrhactes; and on the north the mountain streams form some large salt lakes, namely, Ascania (now Hoiran and Egerdir) south of Antiochia, Carafus or Pugsua (now Bei Shehr or Kereli) southeast of the former, and Trogitis (now Soghla) further to the southeast in Isauria. Special names were given to certain districts, which are sometimes spoken of as parts of Pisidia, sometimes as distinct countries, namely, Cibyratis, in the southwest along the north of Lycia, and Cabalia, the southwestern corner of Cibyratis itself; Milyas, the district east of Cibyratis, northeast of Lycia, and northwest of Pamphylia, and Isauria, in the east of Pisidia, on the borders of Lycaonia.

PISISTRATIDÆ (Πειιστρατιδαί), the legitimate sons of Pisistratus. The name is used sometimes to indicate only Hippias and Hipparchus, and sometimes in a wider application, embracing the grandchildren and near connections of Pisistratus (as by Herod., viii., 52, referring to a time when both Hippias and Hipparchus were dead).

PISISTRÁTUS (Πεισίστρατος), the youngest son of Nestor and Anaxibia, was a friend of Telemachus, and accompanied him on his journey from Pylos to Menelaus at Sparta.

PISISTRÁTUS (Πεισίστρατος), an Athenian, son of Hippocrates, was so named after Pisistratus, the youngest son of Nestor, since the family of Hippocrates was of Pylia origin, and traced their descent to Neleus, the father of Nestor. The mother of Pisistratus (whose name we do not know) was cousin-german to the mother of Solon. Pisistratus grew up equally distinguished for personal beauty and for mental endowments. The relationship between him and Solon naturally drew them together, and a close friendship sprang up between them. He assisted Solon by his eloquence in persuading the Athenians to renew their struggle with the Megarians for the possession of Salamis, and he afterward fought with bravery in the expedition which Solon led against the island. When Solon, after the establishment of his constitution, retired for a time from Athens, the old rivalry between the parties of the Plain, the Highlands, and the Coast broke out into open feud. The party of the Plain, comprising chiefly the landed proprietors, was headed by Lycurgus; that of the Coast, consisting of the wealthier classes not belonging to the nobles, by Megacles, the son of Alcmaeon; the party of the Highlands, which aimed at more of political freedom and equality than either of the two others, was the one at the head of which Pisistratus placed himself, because they seemed the most likely to be useful in the furtherance of his ambitious designs. His liberality, as well as his military and oratorical abilities, gained him the support of a large body of citizens. Solon, on his return, quickly saw through the designs of Pisistratus, who listened with respect to his advice, though he prosecuted his schemes none the less diligently. When Pisistratus found his plans sufficiently ripe for execution, he one day made his appearance in the agora with his mules and his own person exhibiting recent wounds, pretending that he had been nearly assassinated by his enemies as he was riding into the country. An assembly of the people was forthwith called, in which one of his partisans proposed that a body-guard of fifty citizens, armed with clubs, should be granted to him. It was in vain that Solon opposed this; the guard was given him. Through the neglect or connivance of the people, Pisistratus took this opportunity of raising a much larger force, with which he seized the citadel, B.C. 560, thus becoming what the Greeks called Tyrant of Athens. Having secured to himself the substance of power, he made no further change in the constitution or in the laws, which he administered ably and well. His first usurpation lasted but a short time. Before his power was firmly rooted, the factions headed by Megacles and Lycurgus combined, and Pisistratus was compelled to evacuate Athens. He remained in banishment six years. Meantime the factions of Megacles and Lycurgus revived their old feuds, and Megacles made overtures to Pisistratus, offering to reinstate him in the tyranny if he would connect himself with him by receiving his daughter in marriage. The proposal was accepted by Pisistratus, and the following stratagem was devised for accomplishing his restoration, according to the account of Herodotus. A damsel named Phya, of remarkable stature and beauty, was dressed up as Minerva (Athena) in a full suit of armor, and placed in a chariot, with Pisistratus by her side. The chariot was then driven toward the city, heralds being sent on before to announce that Minerva (Athena) in person was bringing back Pisistratus to her Acropolis. The report spread rapidly, and those in the city believing that the woman was really their tutelary goddess, worshipped her, and admitted Pisistratus. Pisistratus nominally performed his part of the contract with Megacles; but, in consequence of the insulting manner in which he treated his wife, Megacles again made common cause with Lycurgus, and Pisistratus was a second time compelled to evacuate Athens. He retired to Eretria in Eubœa, and employed the next ten years in making preparations to regain his power. At the end of that time he invaded Attica with the forces he had raised, and also supported by Lygdamis of Naxos with a considerable body of troops. He defeated his opponents near the temple of Minerva (Athena) at Pallene, and then entered Athens without opposition. Lygdamis was rewarded by being established as tyrant of Naxos, which island Pisistratus conquered. Vid. LYGDAMIS. Having now become tyrant of Athens for the third time, Pisistratus adopted measures to secure the undisturbed possession of his supremacy. He took a body of foreign mercenaries into his pay, and seized as hostages the children of several of the principal citizens, placing them in the custody of Lygdamis in Naxos. He maintained at the same time the form of Solon's institutions, only taking care, as his sons did after him, that the highest offices should always be held by some member of the family. He not only exacted obedience to the laws from his subjects and friends, but himself set the example of submitting to them. On one occasion he even appeared before the Areopagus to answer a charge of murder, which, however, was not prosecuted. Athens was indebted to him for many stately and useful buildings. Among these may be mentioned a temple to the Pythian Apollo, and a magnificent temple to the Olympian Jupiter (Zeus), which remained unfinished for several centuries, and was at length completed by the Emperor Hadrian. Besides these, the Lyceum, a garden with stately buildings a short distance from the city, was the work of Pisistratus, as also the fountain of the Nine Springs. Pisistratus also encouraged literature in various ways. It was apparently under his auspices that Thespis introduced at Athens his rude form of tragedy (B.C. 535), and that dramatic contests were made a regular part of the Attic Dionysia. It is to Pisistratus that we owe the first written text of the whole of the poems of Homer, which, without his care would most likely now exist only in a few disjointed fragments. Vid. HOMERUS. Pisistratus is also said to have been the first person in Greece who collected a library, to which he generously allowed the public access. By his first wife Pisistratus had two sons, Hippias and Hipparchus. By his second wife, Timonassa, he had also two sons, Iophon and Thessalus, who are rarely mentioned. He had also a bastard son, Hagesistratus, whom he made tyrant of Sigeum, after taking that town from the Mytilenæans. Pisistratus died at an advanced age in 527, and was succeeded in the tyranny by his eldest son Hippias; but Hippias and his brother Hipparchus appear to have administered the affairs of the state with so little outward distinction, that they are frequently spoken of as though they had been joint tyrants. They continued the government on the same principles as their father. Thucydides (vi., 54) speaks in terms of high commendation of the virtue and intelligence with which their rule was exercised till the death of Hipparchus. Hipparchus inherited his father's literary tastes. Several distinguished poets lived at Athens under the patronage of Hipparchus, as, for example, Simonides of Ceos, Anacreon of Teos, Lasus of Hermione, and Onomacritus. After the murder of Hipparchus in 514, an account of which is given under ΗΑΡΜΟΔΙΟΣ, a great change ensued in the character of the government. Under the influence of revengeful feelings and fears for his own safety, Hippias now became a morose and suspicious tyrant. He put to death great numbers of the citizens, and raised money by extraordinary imposts. His old enemies the Alcmaeonidæ, to whom Megacles belonged, availed themselves of the growing discontent of the citizens; and after one or two unsuccessful attempts, they at length succeeded, supported by a large force under Cleomenes, in expelling the Pisistratidæ from Attica. Hippias and his connections retired to Sigeum in 510. The family of the tyrants was condemned to perpetual banishment, a sentence which was maintained even in after times, when decrees of amnesty were passed. Hippias afterward repaired to the court of Darius, and looked forward to a restoration of his country by the aid of the Persians. He accompanied the expedition sent under Datis and Artaphernes, and pointed out to the Persians the plain of Marathon as the most suitable place for their landing. He was now (490) of great age. According to some accounts, he fell in the battle of Marathon; according to others, he died at Lemnos on his return. Hippias was the only one of the legitimate sons of Pisistratus who had children; but none of them attained distinction.

PISO, CALPURNIUS, the name of a distinguished plebeian family. The name of Piso, like many other Roman cognomens, is connected with agriculture, the noblest and most honorable pursuit of the ancient Romans: it comes from the verb pisere or pinsere, and refers to the pounding or grinding of corn. 1. Was taken prisoner at the battle of Cannæ, B.C. 216; was prætor urbanus 211, and afterward commanded as proprætor in Etruria 210. Piso in his prætorship proposed to the senate that the Ludi Apollinæ, which had been exhibited for the first time in the preceding year (212), should be repeated, and should be celebrated in future annually. The senate passed a decree to this effect. The establishment of these games by their ancestor was commemorated on coins by the Pisones in later times.—2. C., son of No. 1, was prætor 186, and received Further Spain as his province. He returned to Rome in 184, and obtained a triumph for a victory he had gained over the Lusitani and Celtiberi. He was consul in 180, and died during his consulship.

Pisones with the agnomen Cæsoninus.

3. L., received the agnomen Cæsoninus because he originally belonged to the Cæsonia gens. He was prætor in 154, and obtained the province of Further Spain, but was defeated by the Lusitani. He was consul in 148, and was sent to conduct the war against Carthage; he was succeeded in the command in the following year by Scipio.—4. L., son of No. 3, consul 112 with M. Livius Drusus. In 107 he served as legatus to the consul, L. Cassius Longinus, who was sent into Gaul to oppose the Cimbric and their allies, and he fell together with the consul in the battle, in which the Roman army was utterly defeated by the Tigurini in the territory of the Allobroges. This Piso was the grandfather of Cæsar's father-in-law, a circumstance to which Cæsar himself alludes in recording his own victory over the Tigurini at a later time. (Cæs., B. G., i., 7, 12.)—5. L., son of No. 4, never rose to any of the offices of state, and is only known from the account given of him by Cicero in his violent invective against his son. He married the daughter of Calventius, a native of Cisalpine Gaul, who came from Placentia and settled at Rome; and hence Cicero calls his son, in contempt, a semi-Placentian.—6. L., son of No. 5, was an unprincipled debauchee and a cruel and corrupt magistrate. He is first mentioned in 59, when he was brought to trial by P. Clodius for plundering a province, of which he had the administration after his prætorship, and he was only acquitted by throwing himself at the feet of the judges. In the same year Cæsar married his daughter Calpurnia; and through his influence Piso obtained the consulship for 58, having for his colleague A. Gabinius, who was indebted for the honor to Pompey. Both consuls supported Clodius in his measures against Cicero, which resulted in the banishment of the orator. The conduct of Piso in support of Clodius produced that extreme resentment in the mind of Cicero which he displayed against Piso on many subsequent occasions. At the expiration of his consulship Piso went to his province of Macedonia, where he remained during two years (57 and 56), plundering the province in the most shameless manner. In the latter of these years the senate resolved that a successor should be appointed; and in the debate in the senate which led to his recall, Cicero attacked him in the most unmeasured terms in an oration which has come down to us (De Provinciis Consularibus). Piso, on his return (55), complained in the senate of the attack of Cicero, and justified the administration of his province, whereupon Cicero reiterated his charges in a speech which is likewise extant (In Pisonem). Cicero, however:

did not venture to bring to trial the father-in-law of Cæsar. In 50 Piso was censor with Ap. Claudius Pulcher. On the breaking out of the civil war (49) Piso accompanied Pompey in his flight from the city; and although he did not go with him across the sea, he still kept aloof from Cæsar. He subsequently returned to Rome, and remained neutral during the civil war. After Cæsar's death (44) Piso at first opposed Antony, but is afterward mentioned as one of his partisans.—7. L., son of No. 6, was consul in 15, and afterward obtained his province of Pamphylia; from thence he was recalled by Augustus in 11, in order to make war upon the Thracians, who had attacked the province of Macedonia. He was appointed by Tiberius præfectus urbi. While retaining the favor of the emperor, without condescending to servility, he at the same time earned the good-will of his fellow-citizens by the integrity and justice with which he governed the city. He died in A.D. 32, at the age of eighty, and was honored by a decree of the senate with a public funeral. It was to this Piso and his two sons that Horace addressed his epistle on the Art of Poetry.

Pisones with the agnomen Frugi.

8. L., received from his integrity and conscientiousness the surname of Frugi, which is perhaps nearly equivalent to our "man of honor." He was tribune of the plebs 149, in which year he proposed the first law for the punishment of extortion in the provinces. He was consul in 133, and carried on war against the slaves in Sicily. He was a staunch supporter of the aristocratical party, and offered a strong opposition to the measures of C. Gracchus. Piso was censor, but it is uncertain in what year. He wrote Annals, which contained the history of Rome from the earliest period to the age in which Piso himself lived.—9. L., son of No. 8, served with distinction under his father in Sicily in 133, and died in Spain about 111, whither he had gone as proprætor.—10. L., son of No. 9, was a colleague of Verres in the prætorship 74, when he thwarted many of the unrighteous schemes of the latter.—11. C., son of No. 10, married Tullia, the daughter of Cicero, in 63, but was betrothed to her as early as 67. He was quæstor in 58, when he used every exertion to obtain the recall of his father-in-law from banishment; but he died in 57, before Cicero's return to Rome. He is frequently mentioned by Cicero in terms of gratitude on account of the zeal which he had manifested in his behalf during his banishment.

Pisones without an agnomen.

12. C., consul 67, belonged to the high aristocratical party, and in his consulship opposed with the utmost vehemence the law of the tribune Gabinius for giving Pompey the command of the war against the pirates. In 66 and 65 Piso administered the province of Narbonese Gaul as proconsul, and while there suppressed an insurrection of the Allobroges. In 63 he was accused of plundering the province, and was defended by Cicero. The latter charge was brought against Piso at the instigation of Cæsar; and Piso, in revenge, implored Cicero, out without success, to accuse Cæsar as one of the conspirators of Catiline.—13. M., usually called M. Purius Piso, because he was adopted by M. Pupius when the latter was an old man. He retained, however, his family name Piso just as Scipio, after his adoption by Metellus was called Metellus Scipio. Vid. METELLUS, No. 15. On the death of L. Cinna in 84, Piso married his wife Annia. In 83 he was appointed quæstor to the consul L. Scipio; but he quickly deserted this party, and went over to Sulla, who compelled him to divorce his wife on account of her previous connection with Cinna. After his prætorship, the year of which is uncertain, he received the province of Spain with the title of proconsul, and on his return to Rome in 69, enjoyed the honor of a triumph. He served in the Mithradatic war as a legatus of Pompey. He was elected consul for 61 through the influence of Pompey. In his consulship Piso gave great offence to Cicero by not asking the orator first in the senate for his opinion, and by taking P. Clodius under his protection after his violation of the mysteries of the Bona Dea. Cicero revenged himself on Piso by preventing him from obtaining the province of Syria, which had been promised him. Piso, in his younger days, had so high a reputation as an orator, that Cicero was taken to him by his father in order to receive instruction from him. He belonged to the Peripatetic school in philosophy, in which he received instructions from Staseas.—14. Cn., a young noble who had dissipated his fortune by his extravagance and profligacy, and therefore joined Catiline in what is usually called his first conspiracy (66). (For details, vid. p. 183, a.) The senate, anxious to get rid of Piso, sent him into Nearer Spain as quæstor, but with the rank and title of proprætor. His exactions in the province soon made him so hateful to the inhabitants that he was murdered by them. It was, however, supposed by some that he was murdered at the instigation of Pompey or of Crassus.—15. Cn., fought against Cæsar in Africa (46), and after the death of the dictator joined Brutus and Cassius. He was subsequently pardoned, and returned to Rome; but he disdained to ask Augustus for any of the honors of the state, and was, without solicitation, raised to the consulship in 23.—16. Cn., son of No. 15, inherited all the pride and haughtiness of his father. He was consul B.C. 7, and was sent by Augustus as legate into Spain, where he made himself hated by his cruelty and avarice. Tiberius, after his accession, was chiefly jealous of Germanicus, his brother's son; and accordingly, when the eastern provinces were assigned to Germanicus in A.D. 18, Tiberius conferred upon Piso the command of Syria, in order that the latter might do every thing in his power to thwart and oppose Germanicus. Plancina, the wife of Piso, was also urged on by Livia, the mother of the emperor, to vie with and annoy Agrippina. Germanicus and Agrippina were thus exposed to every species of insult and opposition from Piso and Plancina; and when Germanicus fell ill in the autumn of 19, he believed that he had been poisoned by them. Piso, on his return to Rome (20), was accused of murdering Germanicus; the matter was investigated by the senate; but before the investigation came to an end, Piso was found one morning in his room with his throat cut, and his sword lying by his side. It was generally supposed that, despairing of the emperor's protection, he put an end to his own life; but others believed that Tiberius dreaded his revealing his secrets, and accordingly caused him to be put to death. The powerful influence of Livia secured the acquittal of Plancina.—17. C., the leader of the well-known conspiracy against Nero in A.D. 65. Piso himself did not form the plot; but as soon as he had joined it, his great popularity gained him many partisans. He possessed most of the qualities which the Romans prized, high birth, an eloquent address, liberality, and affability; and he also displayed a sufficient love of magnificence and luxury to suit the taste of the day, which would not have tolerated austerity of manner or character. The conspiracy was discovered by Milichus, a freedman of Flavius Scevinus, one of the conspirators. Piso thereupon opened his veins, and thus died. There is extant a poem in two hundred lines, containing a panegyric on a certain Calpurnius Piso, who is probably the same person as the leader of the conspiracy against Nero.—18. L., surnamed LICINIUS, was the son of M. Licinius Crassus Frugi, and was adopted by one of the Pisones. On the accession of Galba to the throne, he adopted as his son and successor Piso Licinianus; but the latter only enjoyed the distinction four days, for Otho, who had hoped to receive this honor, induced the prætorians to rise against the emperor. Piso fled for refuge into the temple of Vesta, but was dragged out by the soldiers, and dispatched at the threshold of the temple, A. D. 69.

[PISON (Πείσιων), one of the thirty tyrants at Athens, to gratify his cupidity was the author of cruel and oppressive enactments against the metecæ.]

PISTOR, that is, the baker, a surname of Jupiter at Rome, which is said to have arisen in the following manner. When the Gauls were besieging Rome, the god suggested to the besieged the idea of throwing loaves of bread among the enemies, to make them believe that the Romans had plenty of provisions, and thus caused them to give up the siege.

PISTŌRIA or PISTŌRIUM (Pistoriensis: now Pistonia), a small place in Etruria, on the road from Luca to Florentia, rendered memorable by the defeat of Catiline in its neighborhood.

[PISTYRUS (Πίστυρος), a place of trade in the interior of Thrace, near a salt-lake of considerable circuit.]

ΠΙΤΑΝΑ. Vid. SPARTA.

ΠΙΤΑΝΗ (Πιτάνη: now Sanderli), a sea-port town of Mysia, on the coast of the Elaitic Gulf, at the mouth of the Evenus, or, according to some, of the Caius; almost destroyed by an earthquake under Titus. It was the birth-place of the Academic philosopher Arcesilaus.

ΠΙΘΗΚŪΣΑ. Vid. ÆNARIA.

PIΘŌ (Πειθῶ), called SUADA or SUADĒLA by the Romans, the personification of Persuasion. She was worshipped as a divinity at Sicyon, where she was honored with a temple in the agora. Piθo also occurs as a surname of Venus (Aphrodite), whose worship was said to have been introduced at Athens by Theseus, when he united the country communities into towns. At Athens the statues of Piθo and Venus (Aphrodite) Pandemos stood close together, and at Megara the statue of Piθo stood in the temple of Venus (Aphrodite), so that the two divinities must be conceived as closely connected, or the one, perhaps, merely as an attribute of the other.

[ΠΙΘΟΛΑΟΣ (Πειθόλαος), one of the three brothers-in-law and murderers of Alexander of Pheræ. In B.C. 352 Piθolaus and his brother Lycopliron were expelled from Pheræ by Philip of Macedon; but Piθolaus re-established himself in the tyranny, and was again driven out by Philip, B.C. 349.]

ΠΙΘΩΝ (Πίθων, also Πειθων and Πύθων). 1. Son of Agenor, a Macedonian officer of Alexander the Great. He received from Alexander the government of part of the Indian provinces, in which he was confirmed after the king's death. In B.C. 316 he received from Antigonus the satrapy of Babylon. He afterward fought with Demetrius against Ptolemy, and was slain at the battle of Gaza, 312.—2. Son of Crateus or Crateas, a Macedonian officer of Alexander, who is frequently confounded with the preceding. After Alexander's death he received from Perdicas the satrapy of Media. He accompanied Perdicas on his expedition to Egypt (321), but he took part in the mutiny against Perdicas, which terminated in the death of the latter. Piθon rendered important service to Antigonus in his war against Eumenes; but after the death of Eumenes, he began to form schemes for his own aggrandizement, and was accordingly put to death by Antigonus, 316.

ΠΙΤΙΝΟΝ (Pitinas, -ātis). 1. (Now Pitino), a municipium in the interior of Umbria, on the River Pisaurus, whence its inhabitants are called in inscriptions Pitinales Pisaurenses. The town also bore the surname Mergens.—2. A town in Picenum, on the road from Castrum Novum to Prifernum.

ΠΙΤΤΑΚΟΣ (Πιττακός), one of those early cultivators of letters who were designated as "the Seven Wise Men of Greece," was a native of Mytilene in Lesbos, and was born about B.C. 652. He was highly celebrated as a warrior, a statesman, a philosopher, and a poet. He is first mentioned in public life as an opponent of the tyrants of Mytilene. In conjunction with the brothers of Alcæus, he overthrew and killed the tyrant Melanchrus, B.C. 612. In 606 he commanded the Mytilenæans in their war with the Athenians for the possession of Sigeum, on the coast of the Troad, and signalized himself by killing in single combat Phrynon, the commander of the Athenians. This feat Pittacus performed by entangling his adversary in a net, and then dispatching him with a trident and a dagger, exactly after the fashion in which the gladiators called retiarii long afterward fought at Rome. This war was terminated by the mediation of Periander, who assigned the disputed territory to the Athenians; but the internal troubles of Mytilene still continued. The supreme power was fiercely disputed between a succession of tyrants, and the aristocratic party, headed by Alcæus and his brother Anti-menidas; and the latter were driven into exile. As the exiles tried to effect their return by force of arms, the popular party chose Pittacus as their ruler, with absolute power, under the title of Ἄστυνκτες (ἀστυνήτης). He held this office for ten years (589–579), and then voluntarily resigned it, having by his administration restored order to the state, and prepared it for the safe enjoyment of a republican form of government. He lived in great honor at Mytilene for ten years after the resignation of his government, and died in 569, at an advanced age. Of the proverbial maxims of practical wisdom which were current under the names of the seven wise men of Greece, two were ascribed to Pittacus, namely, Χαλεπὸν ἐσθλὸν ἐμμεναι, and Καίρῳ γινώθι.

PITTHEUS (Πιτθεύς), king of Træzene, was son of Pelops and Dia, father of Æthra, and grandfather and instructor of Theseus. When Theseus married Phædra, Pittheus took Hippolytus into his house. His tomb and the chair on which he had sat in judgment were shown at Træzene down to a late time. He is said to have taught the art of speaking, and even to have written a book upon it. Æthra, as his daughter, is called Pitthëis.

PITÛIA (Πιτῦία: now probably Shamelik), a town mentioned by Homer, in the north of Mysia, between Parium and Priapus, evidently named from the pine forests in its neighborhood.

PITVONÆUS (Πιτῠόνησος: now Anghistri), an island off the coast of Argolis.

PITÛS (Πιτῠός: now probably Pitzunda), a Greek city in Sarmatia Asiatica, on the north-eastern coast of the Euxine, three hundred and sixty stadia northwest of Dioscurias. In the time of Strabo it was a considerable city and port. It was afterward destroyed by the neighboring tribe of the Heniochi, but it was restored, and long served as an important frontier fortress of the Roman empire.

PITÛSA, PITÛSSA (Πιτῠούσα, Πιτῠούσσα, contracted from πιτῠόσσα, fem. of πιτῠόεις), i. e., abounding in pine-trees. 1. The ancient name of Lampsacus, Salamis, and Chios.—2. A small island in the Argolic Gulf.—3. The name of two islands off the southern coast of Spain, west of the Balears. The larger of them was called Ebusus (now Iviza), the smaller Ophiussa (now Formentera): the latter was uninhabited.

PIXODÆRUS (Πιξόδαρος), prince or king of Caria, was the youngest of the three sons of Hecatomnus, all of whom successively held the sovereignty of Caria. Pixodarus obtained possession of the throne by the expulsion of his sister ADA, the widow and successor of her brother IRIEUS, and held it without opposition for five years, B.C. 340–335. He was succeeded by his son-in-law Orontobates.

PLACENTIA (Placentinus: now Piacenza), a Roman colony in Cisalpine Gaul, founded at the same time as Cremona, B.C. 219. It was situated in the territory of the Anamares, on the right bank of the Po, not far from the mouth of the Trebia, and on the road from Mediolanum to Parma. It was taken and destroyed by the Gauls in 200, but was soon rebuilt by the Romans, and became an important place. It continued to be a flourishing town down to the time of the Goths.

PLACIA (Πλακία, Ion.: Πλακισιός), an ancient Pelagian settlement in Mysia, east of Cyzicus, at the foot of Mount Olympus, seems to have been early destroyed.

PLACIDIÆ, GALLA. Vid. GALLA.

[PLACIDUS, JULIUS, the tribune of a cohort of Vespasian's army, who dragged Vitellius out of the lurking-place in which he had concealed himself.]

PLACITUS, SEX., the author of a short Latin work entitled De Medicina (or Medicamentis) ex Animalibus, consisting of thirty-four chapters, each of which treats of some animal whose body was supposed to possess certain medical properties. As might be expected, it contains numerous absurdities, and is of little or no value or interest. The date of the author is uncertain, but he is supposed to have lived in the fourth century after Christ. The work is printed by Stephanus in the Medicæ Artis Principes, Paris, fol., 1567, and elsewhere.

PLÆCUS (Πλάκος), a mountain of Mysia, above the city of Thebe: not in the neighborhood of PLACIA, as the resemblance of the names had led some to suppose.

PLANÆRIA (now probably Canaria, Canary), one of the islands in the Atlantic called Fortunate.

PLANASIA. 1. (Now Pianosa), an island between Corsica and the coast of Etruria, to which Augustus banished his grandson Agrippa Postumus.—2. An island off the southern coast of Gaul, east of the Stœchades.

PLANCIADES, FULGENTIUS. Vid. FULGENTIUS.

PLANCINA, MUNATIA, the wife of Cneius Piso, who was appointed governor of Syria in A.D. 18. While her husband used every effort to thwart Germanicus, she exerted herself equally to annoy and insult Agrippina. She was encouraged in this conduct by Livia, the mother of the emperor, who saved her from condemnation by the senate when she was accused along with her husband in 20. (Vid. PISO, No. 16.) She was brought to trial again in 33, a few years after the death of Livia; and, having no longer any hope of escape, she put an end to her life.

PLANCIVS, CN., first served in Africa under the prætor A. Torquatus, subsequently in B.C. 68 under the proconsul Q. Metellus in Crete, and next in 62 as military tribune in the army of C. Antonius in Macedonia. In 58 he was quæstor in Macedonia under the prætor L. Appuleius, and here he showed great kindness to Cicero when the latter came to this province during his banishment. He was tribune of the plebs in 56, and was elected curule ædile with A. Plotius in 54. But before Plancius and Plotius entered upon their office, they were accused by Juventius Laterensis and L. Cassius Longinus of the crime of sodalitium, or the bribery of the tribes by means of illegal associations, in accordance with the Lex Licinia, which had been proposed by the consul Licinius Crassus in the preceding year. Cicero defended Plancius in an oration still extant, and obtained his acquittal. Plancius espoused the Pompeian party in the civil wars, and after Cæsar had gained the supremacy, lived in exile in Corycra.

PLANCUS, MUNATIUS, the name of a distinguished plebeian family. The surname Plancus signified a person having flat splay feet without any bend in them. 1. L., was a friend of Julius Cæsar, and served under him both in the Gallic and the civil wars. Cæsar, shortly before his death, nominated him to the government of Transalpine Gaul for B.C. 44, with the exception of the Narbonese and Belgic portions of the province, and also to the consulship for 42, with D. Brutus as his colleague. After Cæsar's death Plancus hastened into Gaul, and took possession of his province. Here he prepared at first to support the senate against Antony; but when Lepidus joined Antony, and their united forces threatened to overwhelm Plancus, the latter was persuaded by Asinius Pollio to follow his example, and to unite with Antony and Lepidus. Plancus, during his government of Gaul, founded the colonies of Lugdunum and Maurica. He was consul in 42, according to the arrangement made by Cæsar, and he subsequently followed Antony to Asia, where he remained for some years, and governed in succession the provinces of Asia and Syria. He deserted Antony in 32, shortly before the breaking out of the civil war between the latter and Octavianus. He was favorably received by Octavianus, and continued to reside at Rome during the remainder of his life. It was on his proposal that Octavianus received the title of Augustus in 27; and the emperor conferred upon him the censorship in 22, with Paulus Æmilius Lepidus. Both the public and private life of Plancus was stained by numerous vices. One of Horace's odes (Carm., i., 7) is addressed to him.—2. T., surnamed BURSA, brother of the former, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 52, when he supported the views of Pompey, who was anxious to obtain the dictatorship. With this object he did every thing in his power to increase the confusion which followed upon the death of Clodius. At the close of the year, as soon as his tribunate had expired, Plancus was accused by Cicero of Vis, and was condemned. After his condemnation Plancus went to Ravenna in Cisalpine Gaul, where he was kindly received by Cæsar. Soon after the beginning of the civil war he was restored to his civic rights by Cæsar, but he appears to have taken no part in the civil war. After Cæsar's death Plancus fought on Antony's side in the campaign of Mutina. He was driven out of Pollentia by Pontius Aquila, the legate of D. Brutus, and in his flight broke his leg.—3. C.N., brother of the two preceding, prætor elect 44, was charged by Cæsar in that year with the assignment to his soldiers of lands at Buthrotum in Epirus. As Atticus possessed property in the neighborhood, Cicero commended to Plancus with much earnestness the interests of his friend. He was prætor in 43, and was allowed by the senate to join his brother Lucius (No. 1) in Transalpine Gaul.—4. L. PLAUTIUS PLANCUS, brother of the three preceding, was adopted by a L. Plautius, and therefore took his prænomen as well as nomen, but retained his original cognomen, as was the case with Metellus Scipio (vid. METELLUS, No. 15) and Pupius Piso. Vid. PISO, No. 13. Before his adoption his prænomen was Caius. He was included in the proscription of the triumvirs, 43, with the consent of his brother Lucius, and was put to death.

PLANŪDES MAXĪMUS, was one of the most learned of the Constantinopolitan monks of the last age of the Greek empire, and was greatly distinguished as a theologian, grammarian, and rhetorician; but his name is now chiefly interesting as that of the compiler of the latest of those collections of minor Greek poems, which were known by the names of Garlands or Anthologies (Στέφανοι, Ἀνθολογίαι). Planudes flourished at Constantinople in the first half of the fourth century, under the emperors Andronicus II. and III. Palæologi. In A.D. 1327 he was sent by Andronicus II. as ambassador to Venice. As the Anthology of Planudes was not only the latest compiled, but was also that which was recognized as The Greek Anthology, until the discovery of the Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas, this is chosen as the fittest place for an account of the Literary History of the Greek Anthology. 1. Materials. The various collections, to which their compilers gave the name of Garlands and Anthologies, were made up of short poems, chiefly of an epigrammatic character, and in the elegiac metre. The earliest examples of such poetry were furnished by the inscriptions on monuments, such as those erected to commemorate heroic deeds, the statues of distinguished men, especially victors in the public games, sepulchral monuments, and dedicatory offerings in temples (ἀνάθημα); to which may be added oracles and proverbial sayings. At an early period in the history of Greek literature, poets of the highest fame cultivated this species of composition, which received its most perfect development from the hand of Simonides. Thenceforth, as a set form of poetry, it became a fit vehicle for the brief expression of thoughts and sentiments on any subject; until at last the form came to be cultivated for its own sake, and the literati of Alexandria and Byzantium deemed the ability to make epigrams an essential part of the character of a scholar. Hence the mere trifling, the stupid jokes, and the wretched personalities which form so large a part of the epigrammatic poetry contained in the Greek Anthology.—2. The Garland of Meleager. At a comparatively early period in the history of Greek literature, various persons collected epigrams of particular classes, and with reference to their use as historical authorities; but the first person who made such a collection solely for its own sake, and to preserve epigrams of all kinds, was MELEAGER, a cynic philosopher of Gadara, in Palestine, about B.C. 60. His collection contained epigrams by forty-six poets, of all ages of Greek poetry, up to the most ancient lyric period. He entitled it The Garland (Στέφανος), with reference to the common comparison of small beautiful poems to flowers. The same idea is kept up in the word Anthology (ἀνθολογία), which was adopted by the next compiler as the title of his work. The Garland of Meleager was arranged in alphabetical order, according to the initial letters of the first line of each epigram.—3. The Anthology of Philip of Thessalonica was compiled in the time of Trajan, avowedly in imitation of the Garland of Meleager, and chiefly with the view of adding to that collection the epigrams of more recent writers.—4. Diogenianus, Straton, and Diogenes Laertius. Shortly after Philip, in the reign of Hadrian, the learned grammarian, Diogenianus of Heraclea, compiled an Anthology, which is entirely lost. It might have been well if the same fate had befallen the very polluted collection of his contemporary, Straton of Sardis. About the same time Diogenes Laërtius collected the epigrams which are interspersed in his lives of the philosophers, into a separate book.—5. Agathias Scholasticus, who lived in the time of Justinian, made a collection entitled Κύκλος ἐπιγραμμάτων. It was divided into seven books, according to subjects. The poems included in it were those of recent writers, and chiefly those of Agathias himself and of his contemporaries, such as Paulus Silentarius and Macedonius.—6. The Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas, or the Palatine Anthology. Constantinus Cephalas appears to have lived about four centuries after Agathias, and to have flourished in the tenth century, under the Emperor Constantinus Porphyrogenitus. The labors of preceding compilers may be viewed as merely supplementary to the Garland of Meleager; but the Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas was an entirely new collection from the preceding Anthologies and from original sources. Nothing is known of Constantine himself. The MS. of the Anthology was discovered by Salmasius in 1606, in the library of the Electors Palatine at Heidelberg. It was afterward removed to the Vatican, with the rest of the Palatine library (1623), and has become celebrated under the names of the Palatine Anthology and the Vatican Codex of the Greek Anthology. This MS. was restored to its old home at Heidelberg after the peace of 1815.—7. The Anthology of Planudes is arranged in seven books, each of which, except the fifth and seventh, is divided into chapters according to subjects, and these chapters are arranged in alphabetical order. The contents of the books are as follows: 1. Chiefly ἐπιδεικτικά, that is, displays of skill in this species of poetry, in ninety-one chapters. 2. Jocular or satiric (σκοπτικά), chaps. 53. 3. Sepulchral (ἐπιτύμβια), chaps. 32. 4. Inscriptions on statues of athletes and other works of art, descriptions of places, &c., chaps. 33. 5. The Ecphrasis of Christodorus, and epigrams on statues of charioteers in the Hippodrome at Constantinople. 6. Dedicatory (ἀναθηματικά), chaps. 27. 7. Amatory (ἔρωτικά). Planudes did little more than abridge and rearrange the Anthology of Constantinus Cephalas. Only a few epigrams are found in the Planudean Anthology which are not in the Palatine. The best editions of the Greek Anthology are by Brunck and Jacobs. Brunck's edition, which appeared under the title of Analecta Veterum Poetarum Græcorum, Argentorati, 1772-1776, 3 vols. 8vo, contains the whole of the Greek Anthology, besides some poems which are not properly included under that title. Brunck adopted a new arrangement; he discarded the books and chapters of the early Anthology, placed together all the epigrams of each poet, and arranged the poets themselves in chronological order, placing those epigrams, the authors of which were unknown, under the separate head of ἀδέσποτα. Jacobs's edition is founded upon Brunck's, but is much superior, and ranks as the standard edition of the Greek Anthology. It is in 13 vols. 8vo, Paris, 1824.

volumes of the Text, one of Indices, and three of Commentaries, divided into eight parts, Lips., 1795-1814. After the restoration of the MS. of the Palatine Anthology to the University of Heidelberg, Jacobs published a separate edition of the Palatine Anthology, Lips., 1813-1817, 3 vols.

ΠΛΑΤÆΑ, more commonly ΠΛΑΤÆÆ (Πλάταια, Πλαταιαί: Πλαταιεύς), an ancient city of Bœotia, on the northern slope of Mount Cithæron, not far from the sources of the Asopus, and on the frontiers of Attica. It was said to have been founded by Thebes, and its name was commonly derived from Plataea, a daughter of Asopus. The town, though not large, played an important part in Greek history, and experienced many striking vicissitudes of fortune. At an early period the Plataeans deserted the Bœotian confederacy, and placed themselves under the protection of Athens; and when the Persians invaded Attica in B.C. 490, they sent one thousand men to the assistance of the Athenians, and had the honor of fighting on their side at the battle of Marathon. Ten years afterward (480) their city was destroyed by the Persian army under Xerxes at the instigation of the Thebans, and the place was still in ruins in the following year (479), when the memorable battle was fought in their territory in which Mardonius was defeated and the independence of Greece secured. In consequence of this victory, the territory of Plataea was declared inviolable, and Pausanias and the other Greeks swore to guarantee its independence. The sanctity of the city was still further secured by its being selected as the place in which the great festival of the Eleutheria was to be celebrated in honor of those Greeks who had fallen in the war. (Vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. ELEUTHERIA.) The Plataeans further received from the Greeks the large sum of eighty talents. Plataea now enjoyed a prosperity of fifty years; but in the third year of the Peloponnesian war (429) the Thebans persuaded the Spartans to attack the town, and after a siege of two years at length succeeded in obtaining possession of the place (427). Plataea was now razed to the ground, but was again rebuilt after the peace of Antalcidas (387). It was destroyed the third time by its inveterate enemies, the Thebans, in 374. It was once more restored under the Macedonian supremacy, and continued in existence till a very late period. Its walls were rebuilt by Justinian.

ΠΛΑΤΑΜΟΔΕΣ (Πλαταμώδης: now Aja Kyriaki), a promontory in the west of Messenia.

ΠΛΑΤΑΝΑ, -UM, -US (Πλάτανη, Πλάτανον, Πλάτανος), a fortress in Phœnicia, in a narrow pass between Lebanon and the sea, near the River Damurus or Tamyras (now Damur).

ΠΛΑΤÆΑ (Πλατæα, also -εια, -εαί, -αία), an island on the coast of Cyrenaica, in Northern Africa, the first place taken possession of by the Greek colonists under Battus. Vid. CYRENAICA.

ΠΛΑΤΟ (Πλάτων). 1. The comic poet, was a native of Athens, contemporary with Aristophanes, Phrynichus, Eupolis, and Pherecrates, and flourished from B.C. 428 to 359. He ranked among the very best poets of the Old Comedy. From the expressions of the grammarians, and from the large number of fragments which are preserved, it is evident that his plays were only second in popularity to those of Aristophanes. Purity of language, refined sharpness of wit, and a combination of the vigor of the Old Comedy with the greater elegance of the Middle and the New, were his chief characteristics. Suidas gives the titles of thirty of his dramas. [The fragments of his comedies are contained in Meineke's Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. i., p. 357-401, edit. minor.]—2. The philosopher, was the son of Ariston and Perictione or Potone, and was born at Athens either in B.C. 429 or 428. According to others, he was born in the neighboring island of Ægina. His paternal family boasted of being descended from Codrus; his maternal ancestors of a relationship with Solon. Plato himself mentions the relationship of Critias, his maternal uncle, with Solon. Originally, we are told, he was named after his grandfather Aristocles, but in consequence of the fluency of his speech, or, as others have it, the breadth of his chest, he acquired that name under which alone we know him. One story made him the son of Apollo; another related that bees settled upon the lips of the sleeping child. He is also said to have contended, when a youth, in the Isthmian and other games, as well as to have made attempts in epic, lyric, and dithyrambic poetry, and not to have devoted himself to philosophy till a later time, probably after Socrates had drawn him within the magic circle of his influence. Plato was instructed in grammar, music, and gymnastics by the most distinguished teachers of that time. At an early age he had become acquainted, through Cratylus, with the doctrines of Heraclitus, and through other instructors with the philosophical dogmas of the Eleatics and of Anaxagoras. In his twentieth year he is said to have betaken himself to Socrates, and became one of his most ardent admirers. After the death of Socrates (399) he withdrew to Megara, where he probably composed several of his dialogues, especially those of a dialectical character. He next went to Cyrene, through friendship for the mathematician Theodorus, and is said to have visited afterward Egypt, Sicily, and the Greek cities in Lower Italy, through his eagerness for knowledge. The more distant journeys of Plato into the interior of Asia, to the Hebrews, Babylonians, and Assyrians, to the Magi and Persians, are mentioned only by writers on whom no reliance can be placed. That Plato, during his residence in Sicily, became acquainted, through Dion, with the elder Dionysius, but very soon fell out with the tyrant, is asserted by credible witnesses. But more doubt attaches to the story, which relates that he was given up by the tyrant to the Spartan ambassador Pollis, by him sold into Ægina, and set at liberty by the Cyrenian Anniceris. Plato is said to have visited Sicily when forty years old, consequently in 389. After his return he began to teach, partly in the gymnasium of the Academy and its shady avenues, near the city, between the exterior Caramicus and the hill Colonus Hippius, and partly in his garden, which was situated at Colonus. He taught gratuitously, and without doubt mainly in the form of lively dialogue; yet on the more difficult parts of his doctrinal system he probably delivered also connected lectures. The more narrow circle of his disciples assembled themselves in his garden at common simple meals, and it was probably to them alone that the inscription, said to have been set up over the vestibule of the house, "Let no one enter who is unacquainted with geometry," had reference. From this house came forth his nephew Speusippus, Xenocrates of Chalcædon, Aristotle, Heraclides Ponticus, Hestæus of Perinthus, Philipus the Opuntian, and others, men from the most distant parts of Greece. To the wider circle of those who, without attaching themselves to the more narrow community of the school, sought instruction and incitement from him, such distinguished men as Chabrias, Iphicrates, Timotheus, Phocion, Hyperides, Lycurgus, and Isocrates are said to have belonged. Whether Demosthenes was of the number is doubtful. Even women are said to have attached themselves to him as his disciples. Plato's occupation as an instructor was twice interrupted by his voyages to Sicily: first when Dion, probably soon after the death of the elder Dionysius, persuaded him to make the attempt to win the younger Dionysius to philosophy; the second time, a few years later (about 360), when the wish of his Pythagorean friends, and the invitation of Dionysius to reconcile the disputes which had broken out between him and his step-uncle Dion, brought him back to Syracuse. His efforts were both times unsuccessful, and he owed his own safety to nothing but the earnest intercession of Archytas. That Plato cherished the hope of realizing, through the conversion of Dionysius, his idea of a state in the rising city of Syracuse, was a belief pretty generally spread in antiquity, and which finds some confirmation in the expressions of the philosopher himself, and of the seventh Platonic letter, which, though spurious, is written with the most evident acquaintance with the matters treated of. With the exception of these two visits to Sicily, Plato was occupied from the time when he opened the school in the Academy in giving instruction and in the composition of his works. He died in the eighty-second year of his age, B.C. 347. According to some, he died while writing; according to others, at a marriage feast. According to his last will, his garden remained the property of the school, and passed, considerably increased by subsequent additions, into the hands of the Neo-Platonists, who kept as a festival his birthday as well as that of Socrates. Athenians and strangers honored his memory by monuments. Still he had no lack of enemies and enviers. He was attacked by contemporary comic poets, as Theopompus, Alexis, Cratinus the younger, and others, by one-sided Socratic, as Antisthenes, Diogenes, and the later Megarics, and also by the Epicureans, Stoics, certain Peripatetics, and later writers eager for detraction. Thus even Antisthenes and Aristoxenus charged him with sensuality, avarice, and sycophancy; and others with vanity, ambition, and envy toward other Socrates, Protagoras, Epicarmus, and Philolaus.—THE WRITINGS OF PLATO. These writings have come down to us complete, and have always been admired as a model of the union of artistic perfection with philosophical acuteness and depth. They are in the form of dialogue; but Plato was not the first writer who employed this style of composition for philosophical instruction. Zeno the Eleatic had already written in the form of question and answer. Alexamenus the Teian and Sophron in the imines had treated ethical subjects in the form of dialogue. Xenophon, Æschines, Antisthenes, Euclides, and other Socratics also had made use of the dialogistic form; but Plato has handled this form not only with greater mastery than any one who preceded him, but, in all probability, with the distinct intention of keeping by this very means true to the admonition of Socrates, not to communicate instruction, but to lead to the spontaneous discovery of it. The dialogues of Plato are closely connected with one another, and various arrangements of them have been proposed. Schleiermacher divides them into three series or classes. In the first he considers that the germs of dialectic and of the doctrine of ideas begin to unfold themselves in all the freshness of youthful inspiration; in the second, those germs develop themselves further by means of dialectic investigations respecting the difference between common and philosophical acquaintance with things, respecting notion and knowledge (δόξα and ἐπιστήμη); in the third they receive their completion by means of an objectively scientific working out, with the separation of ethics and physics. The first series embraces, according to Schleiermacher, the Phædrus, Lysis, Protagoras, Laches, Charmides, Euthyphron, and Parmenides; to which may be added as an appendix, the Apologia, Crito, Ion, Hippias Minor, Hipparchus, Minos, and Alcibiades II. The second series contains the Gorgias, Theætetus, Meno, Euthydemus, Cratylus, Sophistes, Politicus, Symposium, Phædo, and Philebus; to which may be added as an appendix, the Theages, Erastæ, Alcibiades I., Menexenus, Hippias Major, and Clitophon. The third series comprises the Republic, Timæus, Critias, and the Laws. This arrangement is perhaps the best that has hitherto been made of the dialogues, though open to exception in several particulars. The genuineness of several of the dialogues has been questioned, but for the most part on insufficient grounds. The Epinomis, however, is probably to be assigned to a disciple of Plato, the Minos and Hipparchus to a Socratic. The second Alcibiades was attributed by ancient critics to Xenophon. The Anterastæ and Clitophon are probably of much later origin. The Platonic letters were composed at different periods: the oldest of them, the seventh and eighth, probably by disciples of Plato. The dialogues Demodocus, Sisyphus, Eryxias, Axiochus, and those on justice and virtue, were with good reason regarded by ancient critics as spurious, and with them may be associated the Hipparchus, Theages, and the Definitions. The genuineness of the first Alcibiades seems doubtful. The smaller Hippias, the Ion, and the Menexenus, on the other hand, which are assailed by many modern critics, may very well maintain their ground as occasional compositions of Plato.—THE PHILOSOPHY OF PLATO. The nature of this work will allow only a few brief remarks upon this subject. The attempt to combine poetry and philosophy (the two fundamental tendencies of the Greek mind) gives to the Platonic dialogues a charm which irresistibly attracts us, though we may have but a deficient comprehension of their subject matter. Plato, like Socrates, was penetrated with the idea that wisdom is the attribute of the God-head; that philosophy, springing from the impulse to know, is the necessity of the intellectual man, and the greatest of the blessings in which he participates. When once we strive after Wisdom with the intensity of a lover, she becomes the true consecration and purification of the soul, adapted to lead us from the night-like to the true day. An approach to wisdom, however, presupposes an original communion with Being, truly so called; and this communion again presupposes the divine nature or immortality of the soul, and the impulse to become like the Eternal. This impulse is the love which generates in Truth, and the development of it is termed Dialectics. Out of the philosophical impulse which is developed by Dialectics, not only correct knowledge, but also correct action, springs forth. Socrates's doctrine respecting the unity of virtue, and that it consists in true, vigorous, and practical knowledge, is intended to be set forth in a preliminary manner in the Protagoras and the smaller dialogues attached to it. They are designed, therefore, to introduce a foundation for ethics, by the refutation of the common views that were entertained of morals and of virtue; for although not even the words ethics and physics occur in Plato, and even dialectics are not treated of as a distinct and separate province, yet he must rightly be regarded as the originator of the three-fold division of philosophy, inasmuch as he had before him the decided object to develop the Socratic method into a scientific system of dialectics, that should supply the grounds of our knowledge as well as of our moral action (physics and ethics), and therefore he separates the general investigations on knowledge and understanding, at least relatively, from those which refer to physics and ethics. Accordingly, the Theætetus, Sophistes, Parmenides, and Cratylus, are principally dialectical; the Protagoras, Gorgias, Politicus, Philebus, and the Politics, principally ethical; while the Timæus is exclusively physical. Plato's dialectics and ethics, however, have been more successful than his physics. Plato's doctrine of ideas was one of the most prominent parts of his system. He maintained that the existence of things, cognizable only by means of conception, is their true essence, their idea. Hence he asserts that to deny the reality of ideas is to destroy all scientific research. He departed from the original meaning of the word idea (namely, that of form or figure), inasmuch as he understood by it the unities (ἐνότητες, μονάδες) which lie at the basis of the visible, the changeable, and which can only be reached by pure thinking. He included under the expression idea every thing stable amid the changes of mere phenomena, all really existing and unchangeable definitudes, by which the changes of things and our knowledge of them are conditioned, such as the ideas of genus and species, the laws and ends of nature, as also the principles of cognition and of moral action, and the essences of individual, concrete, thinking souls. His system of ethics was founded upon his dialectics, as is remarked above. Hence he asserted that, not being in a condition to grasp the 'idea of the good with full distinctness, we are able to approximate to it only so far as we elevate the power of thinking to its original purity. The best editions of the collected works of Plato are by Bekker, Berol., 1816-1818; by Stallbaum, Gotha, 1827, seq., [not yet completed]; and by Orelli and others, Turic., 1839, 4to.

[PLATOR. 1. The commander of Orem for Philip, betrayed the town to the Romans, B.C. 207.—2. The brother of Gentius, the Illyrian king, called Plator by Livy, but Pleuratus by Polybius. Vid. PLEURATUS.—3. Of Dyrrhachium, was slain by Piso, proconsul in Macedonia B.C. 57, although he had been hospitably received in the house of Plator.]

PLAUTIA GENS, a plebeian gens at Rome. The name is also written Plotius, just as we have both Clodius and Claudius. The gens was divided into the families of Hypsæus, Proculus, Silvanus, Venno, Venox; and although several members of these families obtained the consulship, none of them are of sufficient importance to require a separate notice.

PLAUTIANUS. FULVIUS, an African by birth, the fellow-townsmen of Septimius Severus. He served as prefect of the prætorium under this emperor, who loaded him with honors and wealth, and virtually made over much of the imperial authority into his hands. Intoxicated by these distinctions, Plautianus indulged in the most despotic tyranny, and perpetrated acts of cruelty almost beyond belief. In A.D. 202 his daughter Plautilla was married to Caracalla; but having discovered the dislike cherished by Caracalla toward both his daughter and himself, and looking forward with apprehension to the downfall which awaited him upon the death of the sovereign, he formed a plot against the life both of Septimius and Caracalla. His treachery was discovered, and he was immediately put to death, 203. His daughter Plautilla was banished first to Sicily, and subsequently to Lipara, where she was treated with the greatest harshness. After the murder of Geta in 212, Plautilla was put to death by order of her husband.

PLAUTILLA. Vid. PLAUTIANUS.

PLAUTIUS. 1. A., a man of consular rank, who was sent by the Emperor Claudius in A.D. 43 to subdue Britain. He remained in Britain four years, and subdued the southern part of the island. He obtained an ovation on his return to Rome in 47.—2. A Roman jurist, who lived about the time of Vespasian, and is cited by subsequent jurists.

PLAUTUS, the most celebrated comic poet of Rome, was a native of Sarsina, a small village in Umbria. He is usually called M. Accius Plautus, but his real name, as an eminent modern scholar has shown, was T. MACCIUS PLAUTUS. The date of his birth is uncertain, but it may be placed about B.C. 254. He probably came to Rome at an early age, since he displays such a perfect mastery of the Latin language, and an acquaintance with Greek literature, which he could hardly have acquired in a provincial town. Whether he ever obtained the Roman franchise is doubtful. When he arrived at Rome he was in needy circumstances, and was first employed in the service of the actors. With the money he had saved in this inferior station he left Rome and set up in business, but his speculations failed; he returned to Rome, and his necessities obliged him to enter the service of a baker, who employed him in turning a handmill. While in this degrading occupation he wrote three plays, the sale of which to the managers of the public games enabled him to quit his drudgery and begin his literary career. He was then probably about thirty years of age (224), and accordingly commenced writing comedies a few years before the breaking out of the second Punic war. He continued his literary occupation for about forty years, and died in 184, when he was seventy years of age. His contemporaries at first were Livius Andronicus and Nævius, afterward Ennius and Cæcilius: Terence did not rise into notice till almost twenty years after his death. During the long time that he held possession of the stage, he was always a great favorite of the people; and he expressed a bold consciousness of his own powers in the epitaph which he wrote for his tomb, and which has come down to us:

"Postquam est mortem aptus Plautus, comœdia luget
Scena deserta, dein risus, ludus jocusque
Et numeri innumeri simul omnes collacramarunt."

Plautus wrote a great number of comedies, and in the last century of the republic there were one hundred and thirty plays which bore his name. Most of these, however, were not considered genuine by the best Roman critics. There were several works written upon the subject; and of these the most celebrated was the treatise of Varro, entitled Quæstiones Plautinae. Varro limited the undoubted comedies of the poet to twenty-one, which were hence called the Fabulæ Varronianæ. These Varronian comedies are the same as those which have come down to our own time, with the loss of one. At present we possess only twenty comedies of Plautus; but there were originally twenty-one in the manuscripts, and the Vidularia, which was the twenty-first, and which came last in the collection, was torn off from the manuscript in the Middle Ages. The titles of the twenty-one Varronian plays are, 1. Amphitruo. 2. Asinaria. 3. Aulularia. 4. Captivi. 5. Curculio. 6. Casina. 7. Cistellaria. 8. Epidicus. 9. Bacchides. 10. Mostellaria. 11. Menæchmi. 12. Miles. 13. Mercator. 14. Pseudolus. 15. Pænulus. 16. Persa. 17. Rudens. 18. Stichus. 19. Trinummus. 20. Truculentus. 21. Vidularia. This is the order in which they occur in the manuscripts, though probably not the one in which they were originally arranged by Varro. The present order is evidently alphabetical; the initial letter of the title of each play is alone regarded, and no attention is paid to those which follow: hence we find Captivi, Curculio, Casina, Cistellaria: Mostellaria, Menæchmi, Miles, Mercator: Pseudolus, Pænulus, Persa. The play of the Bacchides forms the only exception to the alphabetical order. It was probably placed after the Epidicus by some copyist, because he had observed that Plautus, in the Bacchides (ii., 2, 36), referred to the Epidicus as an earlier work. The names of the comedies are either taken from some leading character in the play, or from some circumstance which occurs in it: those titles ending in aria are adjectives, giving a general description of the play: thus Asinaria is the "Ass-Comedy." The comedies of Plautus enjoyed unrivalled popularity among the Romans, and continued to be represented down to the time of Diocletian. The continued popularity of Plautus through so many centuries was owing, in a great measure, to his being a national poet. Though he finds his plays upon Greek models, the characters in them act, speak, and joke like genuine Romans, and he thereby secured the sympathy of his audience more completely than Terence could ever have done. Whether Plautus borrowed the plan of all his plays from Greek models, it is impossible to say. The Cistellaria, Bacchides, Panulus, and Stichus were taken from Menander, the Casina and Rudens from Diphilus, and the Mercator and the Trinummus from Philemon, and many others were undoubtedly founded upon Greek originals. But in all cases Plautus allowed himself much greater liberty than Terence; and in some instances he appears to have simply taken the leading idea of the play from the Greek, and to have filled it up in his own fashion. It has been inferred from a well-known line of Horace (Epist., ii., 3, 58), "Plautus ad exemplar Siculi prope rare Epicharmi," that Plautus took great pains to imitate Epicharmus. But there is no correspondence between any of the existing plays of Plautus and the known titles of the comedies of Epicharmus; and the verb prope rare probably has reference only to the liveliness and energy of Plautus's style, in which he bore a resemblance to the Sicilian poet. It was, however, not only with the common people that Plautus was a favorite; educated Romans read and admired his works down to the latest times. Cicero (De Off., i., 29) places his wit on a par with that of the old Attic comedy, and St. Jerome used to console himself with the perusal of the poet after spending many nights in tears on account of his past sins. The favorable opinion which the ancients entertained of the merits of Plautus has been confirmed by the judgment of the best modern critics, and by the fact that several of his plays have been imitated by many of the best modern poets. Thus the Amphitruo has been imitated by Molière and Dryden, the Aulularia by Molière in his Avare, the Mostellaria by Regnard, Addison, and others, the Menachmi by Shakspeare in his Comedy of Errors, the Trinummus by Lessing in his Schatz, and so with others. Horace (De Arte Poët., 270), indeed, expresses a less favorable opinion of Plautus; but it must be recollected that the taste of Horace had been formed by a different school of literature, and that he disliked the ancient poets of his country. Moreover, it is probable that the censure of Horace does not refer to the general character of Plautus's poetry, but merely to his inharmonious verses and to some of his jests. The text of Plautus has come down to us in a very corrupt state. It contains many lacunæ and interpolations. Thus the Aulularia has lost its conclusion, the Bacchides its commencement, &c. Of the present complete editions, the best are by Bothe, Lips., 1834, 2 vols. 8vo, and by Weise, Quedlinb., 1837-1838, 2 vols. 8vo, [2d edition, 1847-48, 2 vols. 8vo]; but Ritschl's edition, of which the first volume only has yet appeared (Bonn., 1849), will far surpass all others.

PLAVIS (now Piave), a river in Venetia, in the north of Italy, which fell into the Sinus Terrestinus.

PLEIADES (Πλειάδες or Πελειάδες), the Pleiads, are usually called the daughters of Atlas and Plëione, whence they bear the name of the Atlantides. They were called Vergilia by the Romans. They were the sisters of the Hyades, and seven in number, six of whom are described as visible, and the seventh as invisible. Some call the seventh Sterope, and relate that she became invisible from shame, because she alone among her sisters had had intercourse with a mortal man; others call her Electra, and make her disappear from the choir of her sisters on account of her grief at the destruction of the house of Dardanus. The Pleiades are said to have made away with themselves from grief at the death of their sisters, the Hyades, or at the fate of their father Atlas, and were afterward placed as stars at the back of Taurus, where they formed a cluster resembling a bunch of grapes, whence they were sometimes called βότρυς. According to another story, the Pleiades were virgin companions of Diana (Artemis), and, together with their mother Pleione, were pursued by the hunter Orion in Bœotia; their prayer to be rescued from him was heard by the gods, and they were metamorphosed into doves (πελειάδες), and placed among the stars. The rising of the Pleiades in Italy was about the beginning of May, and their setting about the beginning of November. Their names are Electra, Maia, Taygete, Alcyone, Celæno, Sterope, and Merope.

PLËÏONE (Πληϊόνη), a daughter of Oceanus and mother of the Pleiades by Atlas. Vid ATLAS and PLEIADES.

[PLEMINIUS, Q., prætor and legatus of Scipio Africanus, was sent in B.C. 205 against the town of Locri, in Southern Italy, which still continued in the possession of the Carthaginians. He took the town, of which he was left governor by Scipio; but his treatment of the inhabitants was so cruel that they sent to Rome to make complaint, and the senate ordered his return; he was thrown into prison B.C. 204, but died before his trial came on.]

PLEMMYRIUM (Πλεμμύριον: now Punta di Gigante), a promontory on the southern coast of Sicily, immediately south of Syracuse.

PLEUMOXI, a small tribe in Gallia Belgica, subject to the Nervii.

PLEURATUS (Πλευράτος). 1. King of Illyria, was the son of Scerdilaïdas. His name occurs as an ally of the Romans in the second Punic war, and in their subsequent wars in Greece.—[2. A brother of Gentius, and son of the preceding. Vid PLATOR. He was put to death by Gentius in order that the king might himself marry a daughter of Monunius, who had been betrothed to Pleuratus.—3. A son of Gentius, king of Illyria, who was taken prisoner, together with his father, and carried captive to Rome.—4. An Illyrian exile, of whose services Perseus, king of Macedonia, availed himself on his embassies to Gentius, king of Illyria, in B.C. 169.]

PLEURON (Πλευρών: Πλευρώνιος), an ancient city in Ætolia, and along with Calydon the most important in the country, was situated at a lit-the distance from the coast, northwest from the mouth of the Evenus, and on the southern slope of Mount Aracynthus or Curius. It was originally inhabited by the Curetes. This ancient city was abandoned by its inhabitants, when Demetrius Poliorcetes laid waste the surrounding country, and a new city was built under the same name to the west of the ancient one.⁶ The two cities are distinguished by geographers under the names of Old Plenron and New Pleuron respectively.

PLINIUS. I. C. PLINIUS SECUNDUS, the celebrated author of the Historia Naturalis, and frequently called Pliny the elder, was born A.D. 23, either at Verona or Novum Comum (now Como), in the north of Italy. But whichever was the place of his birth, it is certain that his family belonged to Novum Comum, since the estates of the elder Pliny were situated there, the younger Pliny was born there, and several inscriptions found in the neighborhood relate to various members of the family. He came to Rome while still young, and being descended from a family of wealth and distinction, he had the means at his disposal for availing himself of the instruction of the best teachers to be found in the imperial city. At the age of about twenty-three he went to Germany, where he served under L. Pomponius Secundus, of whom he afterward wrote a memoir, and was appointed to the command of a troop of cavalry (præfectus alæ). It appears from notices of his own that he travelled over most of the frontier of Germany, having visited the Cauci, the sources of the Danube, &c. It was in the intervals snatched from his military duties that he composed his treatise de Jactatione equestri. At the same time he commenced a history of the Germanic wars, which he afterward completed in twenty books. He returned to Rome with Pomponius (52), and applied himself to the study of jurisprudence. He practiced for some time as a pleader, but does not seem to have distinguished himself very greatly in that capacity. The greater part of the reign of Nero he spent in retirement, chiefly, no doubt, at his native place. It may have been with a view to the education of his nephew that he composed the work entitled Studiosus, an extensive treatise in three books, occupying six volumes, in which he marked out the course that should be pursued in the training of a young orator, from the cradle to the completion of his education and his entrance into public life. During the reign of Nero he wrote a grammatical work in eight books, entitled Dubius Sermo; and toward the close of the reign of this emperor he was appointed procurator in Spain. He was here in 71, when his brother-in-law died, leaving his son, the younger Pliny, to the guardianship of his uncle, who, on account of his absence, was obliged to intrust the care of him to Virginus Rufus. Pliny returned to Rome in the reign of Vespasian, shortly before 73, when he adopted his nephew. He had known Vespasian in the Germanic wars, and the emperor received him into the number of his most intimate friends. It was at this period of his life that he wrote a continuation of the history of Aufidius Bassus, in thirty-one books, carrying the narrative down to his own times. Of his manner of life at this period an interesting account has been preserved by his nephew (Epist., iii., 5). It was his practice to begin to spend a portion of the night in studying by candle-light, at the festival of the Vulcanalia (toward the end of August), at first at a late hour of the night, in winter at one or two o'clock in the morning. Before it was light he betook himself to the Emperor Vespasian, and after executing such commissions as he might be charged with, returned home and devoted the time which he still had remaining to study. After a slender meal, he would, in the summer-time, lie in the sunshine while some one read to him, he himself making notes and extracts. He never read any thing without making extracts in this way, for he used to say that there was no book so bad but that some good might be got out of it. He would then take a cold bath, and after a slight repast sleep a very little, and then pursue his studies till the time of the cœna. During this meal some book was read to, and commented on by him. At table, as might be supposed, he spent but a short time. Such was his mode of life when in the midst of the bustle and confusion of the city. When in retirement in the country, the time spent in the bath was nearly the only interval not allotted to study, and that he reduced to the narrowest limits; for during all the process of scraping and rubbing he had some book read to him, or himself dictated. When on a journey he had a secretary by his side with a book and tablets. By this incessant application, persevered in throughout life, he amassed an enormous amount of materials, and at his death left to his nephew one hundred and sixty volumina of notes (lectorum commentarii), written extremely small on both sides. With some reason might his nephew say that, when compared with Pliny, those who had spent their whole lives in literary pursuits seemed as if they had spent them in nothing else than sleep and idleness. From the materials which he had in this way collected he compiled his celebrated Historia Naturalis, which he published about 77. The details of Pliny's death are given in a letter of the younger Pliny to Tacitus (Ep., vi., 16). He perished in the celebrated eruption of Vesuvius, which overwhelmed Herculaneum and Pompeii, in 79, being fifty-six years of age. He was at the time stationed at Misenum in the command of the Roman fleet; and it was his anxiety to examine more closely the extraordinary phenomenon, which led him to sail to Stabia, where he landed and perished. The only work of Pliny which has come down to us is his Historia Naturalis. By Natural History the ancients understood more than modern writers would usually include in the subject. It embraced astronomy, meteorology, geography, mineralogy, zoology, botany—in short, every thing that does not relate to the results of human skill or the products of human faculties. Pliny, however, has not kept within even these extensive limits. He has broken in upon the plan implied by the title of the work, by considerable digressions on human inventions and institutions (book vii.), and on the history of the fine arts (xxxv.—xxxvii.). Minor digressions on similar topics are also interspersed in various parts of the work, the arrangement of which in other respects exhibits but little scientific discrimination. It comprises, as Pliny says in the preface, twenty thousand matters of importance, drawn from about two thousand volumes. It is divided into thirty-seven books, the first of which consists of a dedicatory epistle to Titus, followed by a table of contents of the other books. When it is remembered that this work was not the result of the undistracted labor of a life, but written in the hours of leisure secured from active pursuits, and that, too, by the author of other extensive works, it is, to say the least, a wonderful monument of human industry. It may easily be supposed that Pliny, with his inordinate appetite for accumulating knowledge out of books, was not the man to produce a scientific work of any value. He was not even an original observer. The materials which he worked up into his huge encyclopædic compilation were almost all derived at second-hand, though doubtless he has incorporated the results of his own observation in a larger number of instances than those in which he indicates such to be the case. Nor did he, as a compiler, show either judgment or discrimination in the selection of his materials, so that in his accounts the true and the false are found intermixed. His love of the marvellous, and his contempt for human nature, lead him constantly to introduce what is strange or wonderful, or adapted to illustrate the wickedness of man, and the unsatisfactory arrangements of Providence. His work is of course valuable to us from the vast number of subjects treated of, with regard to many of which we have no other sources of information. But what he tells us is often unintelligible, from his retailing accounts of things with which he was himself personally unacquainted, and of which he in consequence gives no satisfactory idea to the reader. Though a writer on zoology, botany, and mineralogy, he has no pretensions to be called a naturalist. His compilations exhibit scarcely a trace of scientific arrangement; and frequently it can be shown that he does not give the true sense of the authors whom he quotes and translates, giving not uncommonly wrong Latin names to the objects spoken of by his Greek authorities. The best editions of Pliny's Natural History, with a commentary, are by Hardouin (Paris, 1685, 5 vols. 4to; second edition 1723, 3 vols. fol.), and by Panckoucke (Paris, 1829-1833, 20 vols.), with a French translation and notes by Cuvier and other eminent scientific and literary men of France. The most valuable critical edition of the text of Pliny is by Sillig (Lips., 1831-1836, 5 vols. 12mo).—2. C. PLINIUS CÆCILIUS SECUNDUS, frequently called Pliny the younger, was the son of C. Cæcilius, and of Plinia, the sister of the elder Pliny. He was born at Comum in A.D. 61; and having lost his father at an early age, he was adopted by his uncle, as has been mentioned above. His education was conducted under the care of his uncle, his mother, and his tutor, Virginius Rufus. From his youth he was devoted to letters. In his fourteenth year he wrote a Greek tragedy. He studied eloquence under Quintilian. His acquirements finally gained him the reputation of being one of the most learned men of the age, and his friend Tacitus, the historian, had the same honorable distinction. He was also an orator. In his nineteenth year he began to speak in the forum, and he was frequently employed as an advocate before the court of the Centumviri and before the Roman senate. He filled numerous offices in succession. While a young man he served in Syria as tribus militum, and was there a hearer of the stoic Euphrates and of Artemidorus. He was subsequently quæstor Cæsaris, prætor in or about 93, and consul 100, in which year he wrote his Panegyricus, which is addressed to Trajan. In 103 he was appointed prætor of the province Pontica, where he did not stay quite two years. Among his other functions he also discharged that of curator of the channel and the banks of the Tiber. He was twice married. His second wife was Calpurnia, the grand-daughter of Calpurnius Fabatus, and an accomplished woman; she was considerably younger than her husband, who has recorded her kind attentions to him. He had no children by either wife born alive. The life of Pliny is chiefly known from his letters. So far as this evidence shows, he was a kind and benevolent man, fond of literary pursuits, and of building on and improving his estates. He was rich, and he spent liberally. He was a kind master to his slaves. His body was feeble, and his health not good. Nothing is known as to the time of his death. The extant works of Pliny are his Panegyricus and the ten books of his Epistolæ. The Panegyricus is a fulsome eulogium on Trajan; it is of small value for the information which it contains about the author himself and his times. Pliny collected his own letters, as appears from the first letter of the first book, which looks something like a preface to the whole collection. It is not an improbable conjecture that he may have written many of his letters with a view to publication, or that when he was writing some of them the idea of future publication was in his mind. However, they form a very agreeable collection, and make us acquainted with many interesting facts in the life of Pliny and that of his contemporaries. The letters from Pliny to Trajan and the emperor's replies are the most valuable part of the collection: they form the whole of the tenth book. The letter on the punishment of the Christians (x., 97), and the emperor's answer (x., 98), have furnished matter for much remark. The fact of a person admitting himself to be a Christian was sufficient for his condemnation; and the punishment appears to have been death. The Christians, on their examination, admitted nothing further than their practice of meeting on a fixed day before it was light, and singing a hymn to Christ, as God (quasi Deo); their oath (whatever Pliny may mean by sacramentum) was not to bind them to any crime, but to avoid theft, robbery, adultery, breach of faith, and denial of a deposit. Two female slaves, who were said to be deaconesses (ministrae), were put to the torture by Pliny, but nothing unfavorable to the Christians could be got out of them: the governor could detect nothing except a perverse and extravagant superstition (superstitionem pravam et immodicam). Hereupon he asked the emperor's advice, for the contagion of the superstition was spreading; yet he thought tha

it might be stopped. The emperor, in his reply, approves of the governor's conduct, as explained in his letter, and observes that no general rule can be laid down. Persons supposed to be Christians are not to be sought for: if they are accused and the charge is proved, they are to be punished; but if a man denied the charge, and could prove its falsity by offering his prayers to the heathen gods (dii nostris), however suspected he may have been, he shall be excused in respect of his repentance. Charges of accusation (libelli), without the name of the informant or accuser, were not to be received, as they had been: it was a thing of the worst example, and unsuited to the age. One of the best editions of the Epistolæ and Panegyricus is by Schæfer, Lips., 1805. The best editions of the Epistolæ are by Curtius and Longolius, Amsterdam, 1734, and by Gierig, Lips., 1800.

PLINTHINE (Πλωθίνη), a city of Lower Egypt, on the bay called from it SINUS PLINTHINÆTES (Πλωθινῆτης κόλπος), was the westernmost city of Egypt (according to its narrower limits) on the frontier of Marmarica. It stood a little north of Taposiris (now Abousir).

PLISTARCHUS (Πλειστάρχος). 1. King of Sparta, was the son and successor of Leonidas, who was killed at Thermopylæ B.C. 480. He reigned from 480 to 458, but, being a mere child at the time of his father's death, the regency was assumed by his cousin Pausanias. It appears that the latter continued to administer affairs in the name of the young king till his own death, about 467. — [2. Son of Antipater, brother of Cassander, the Macedonian king.]

PLISTHÈNES (Πλεισθένης), son of Atreus, and husband of Aërope or Eriphyle, by whom he became the father of Agamemnon, Menelaus, and Anaxibia; but Homer makes the latter the children of Atreus. Vid. AGAMEMNON, ATRÆUS.

PLISTIA (now Prestia), a village in Samnium, in the valley between Mount Tifata and Taburnus.

PLISTONAX or PLISTONAX (Πλειστονάξ, Πλειστονάξ), king of Sparta, was the eldest son of the Pausanias who conquered at Plataeæ, B.C. 479. On the death of Plistarchus in 458, without issue, Plistonax succeeded to the throne, being yet a minor. He reigned from 458 to 408. In 445 he invaded Attica, but the premature withdrawal of his army from the enemy's territory exposed him to the suspicion of having been bribed by Pericles. He was punished by a heavy fine, which he was unable to pay, and was therefore obliged to leave his country. He remained nineteen years in exile, taking up his abode near the temple of Jupiter (Zeus), on Mount Lycæus in Arcadia, and having half his house within the sacred precincts, that he might enjoy the benefit of the sanctuary. During this period his son Pausanias, a minor, reigned in his stead. The Spartans at length recalled him in 426, in obedience to the injunctions of the Delphic oracle. But he was accused of having tampered with the Pythian priestess to induce her to interpose for him, and his alleged impiety in this matter was continually assigned by his enemies as the cause of all Sparta's misfortunes in the war, and therefore it was that he used all his influence to bring about peace with Athens in 421. He was succeeded by his son Pausanias.

PLISTUS (Πλειστός: now Xeropotamo), a small river in Phocis, which rises in Mount Parnassus, flows past Delphi, where it receives the small stream Castalia, and falls into the Crissæan Gulf near Cirrha.

PLOTINA, ΠΟΜΠΕΙΑ, the wife of the Emperor Trajan, and a woman of extraordinary merit and virtue. As she had no children, she persuaded her husband to adopt Hadrian. She died in the reign of Hadrian, who honored her memory by mourning for her nine days, by building a temple in her honor, and by composing hymns in her praise.

PLOTINŒPOLIS (Πλωτινόπολις), a town in Thrace, on the road from Trajanopolis to Hadrianopolis, founded by Trajan, and named in honor of his wife Plotina.

PLOTINUS (Πλωτίνος), the originator of the Neo-Platonic system, was born at Lycopolis, in Egypt, about A.D. 203. The details of his life have been preserved by his disciple Porphyry in a biography which has come down to us. From him we learn that Plotinus began to study philosophy in his twenty-eighth year, and remained eleven years under the instruction of Ammonius Saccas. In his thirty-ninth year he joined the expedition of the Emperor Gordian (242) against the Persians, in order to become acquainted with the philosophy of the Persians and Indians. After the death of Gordian he fled to Antioch, and from thence to Rome (244). For the first ten years of his residence at Rome he gave only oral instructions to a few friends; but he was at length induced in 254 to commit his instructions to writing. In this manner, when, ten years later (264), Porphyry came to Rome and joined himself to Plotinus, twenty-one books of very various contents had been already composed by him. During the six years that Porphyry lived with Plotinus at Rome, the latter, at the instigation of Amelius and Porphyry, wrote twenty-three books on the subjects which had been discussed in their meetings, to which nine books were afterward added. Of the fifty-four books of Plotinus, Porphyry remarks that the first twenty-one books were of a lighter character, that only the twenty-three following were the production of the matured powers of the author, and that the other nine, especially the four last, were evidently written with diminished vigor. The correction of these fifty-four books was committed by Plotinus himself to the care of Porphyry. On account of the weakness of his sight, Plotinus never read them through a second time, to say nothing of making corrections; intent simply upon the matter, he was alike careless of orthography, of the division of the syllables, and the clearness of his hand-writing. The fifty-four books were divided by Porphyry into six Enneads, or sets of nine books. Plotinus was eloquent in his oral communications, and was said to be very clever in finding the appropriate word, even if he failed in accuracy on the whole. Besides this, the beauty of his person was increased when discoursing; his countenance was lighted up with genius, and covered with small drops of perspiration. He lived on the scantiest fare, and his hours of sleep were restricted to the briefest time possible. He was regarded with admiration and respect not only by men of science like the philosophers Amelius, Porphyry, the physicians Paulinus, Eustochius, and Zethus the Arab, but even by senators and other statesmen. He enjoyed the favor of the Emperor Gallienus, and the Empress Salonina, and almost obtained from them the rebuilding of two destroyed towns in Campania, with the view of their being governed according to the laws of Plato. He died at Puteoli in 262. The philosophical system of Plotinus is founded upon Plato's writings, with the addition of various tenets drawn from the Oriental philosophy and religion. He appears, however, to avoid studiously all reference to the Oriental origin of his tenets; he endeavors to find them all under the veil of the Greek mythology, and points out here the germ of his own philosophical and religious convictions. Plotinus is not guilty of that commixture and falsification of the Oriental mythology and mysticism which is found in Iamblichus, Proclus, and others of the Neo-Platonic school. The best edition of the Enneads of Plotinus is by Creuzer, Oxonii, 1835, 3 vols. 4to.

PLŌTIUS, whose full name was MARIUS PLOTIUS SACERDOS, a Latin grammarian, the author of De Metris Liber, probably lived in the fifth or sixth century of the Christian era. His work is published by Putschius in the Grammaticæ Latinæ Auctores, Hannov., 1605, and by Gaisford in the Scriptores Latini Rei Metricæ, Oxon., 1837.

PLUTARCHUS (Πλούταρχος). 1. Tyrant of Eretria in Eubœa, whom the Athenians assisted in B.C. 354 against his rival, Callias of Chalcis. The Athenian army was commanded by Phocion, who defeated Callias at Tamynæ; but Phocion, having suspected Plutarchus of treachery, expelled him from Eretria.—2. The biographer and philosopher, was born at Chæronea in Bœotia. The year of his birth is not known; but we learn from Plutarch himself that he was studying philosophy under Ammonius at the time when Nero was making his progress through Greece, in A.D. 66; from which we may assume that he was a youth or a young man at that time. He spent some time at Rome, and in other parts of Italy; but he tells us that he did not learn the Latin language in Italy, because he was occupied with public commissions, and in giving lectures on philosophy; and it was late in life before he busied himself with Roman literature. He was lecturing at Rome during the reign of Domitian, but the statement of Suidas that Plutarch was the preceptor of Trajan ought to be rejected. Plutarch spent the later years of his life at Chæronea, where he discharged various magisterial offices, and held a priesthood. The time of his death is unknown. The work which has immortalized Plutarch's name is his Parallel Lives (Βίῳ Παράλληλοι) of forty-six Greeks and Romans. The forty-six Lives are arranged in pairs; each pair contains the life of a Greek and a Roman, and is followed by a comparison of the two men: in a few pairs the comparison is omitted or lost.

He seems to have considered each pair of Lives and the Parallel as making one book (Βιβλίον). The forty-six Lives are the following: 1. Theseus and Romulus; 2. Lycurgus and Numa; 3. Solon and Valerius Publicola; 4. Themistocles and Camillus; 5. Pericles and Cato the Elder; 6. Alcibiades and Coriolanus; 7. Timoleon and Æmilius Paulus; 8. Pelopidas and Marcellus; 9. Aristides and Cato the Elder; 10. Philopœmen and Flamininus; 11. Pyrrhus and Marius; 12. Lysander and Sulla; 13. Cimon and Lucullus; 14. Nicias and Crassus; 15. Eumenes and Sertorius; 16. Agesilaus and Pompeius; 17. Alexander and Cæsar; 18. Phocion and Cato the younger; 19. Agis and Cleomenes, and Tiberius and Caius Gracchi; 20. Demosthenes and Cicero; 21. Demetrius Poliorcetes and M. Antonius; 22. Dion and M. Junius Brutus. There are also the Lives of Artaxerxes Mnemon, Aratus, Galba, and Otho, which are placed in the editions after the forty-six lives. Perhaps no work of antiquity has been so extensively read in modern times as Plutarch's Lives. The reason of their popularity is, that Plutarch has rightly conceived the business of a biographer: his biography is true portraiture. Other biography is often a dull, tedious enumeration of facts in the order of time, with perhaps a summing up of character at the end. The reflections of Plutarch are neither impertinent nor trifling; his sound good sense is always there; his honest purpose is transparent; his love of humanity warms the whole. His work is and will remain, in spite of all the fault that can be found with it by plodding collectors of facts and small critics, the book of those who can nobly think, and dare, and do. The best edition of the Lives is by Sintenis, Lips., 1839-1846, 4 vols. 8vo. Plutarch's other writings, above sixty in number, are placed under the general title of Moralia, or Ethical works, though some of them are of a historical and anecdotal character, such as the essay on the malignity (κακοήθεια) of Herodotus, which neither requires nor merits refutation; and his Apopthegmata, many of which are of little value. Eleven of these essays are generally classed among Plutarch's historical works: among them also are his Roman Questions or Inquiries, his Greek Questions, and the Lives of the Ten Orators. But it is likely enough that several of the essays which are included in the Moralia of Plutarch are not by him. At any rate, some of them are not worth reading. The best of the essays included among the Moralia are of a different stamp. There is no philosophical system in these essays: pure speculation was not Plutarch's province. His best writings are practical, and their merits consist in the soundness of his views on the ordinary events of human life, and in the benevolence of his temper. His "Marriage Precepts" are a sample of his good sense and of his happiest expression. He rightly appreciated the importance of a good education, and he gives much sound advice on the bringing up of children. The best edition of the Moralia is by Wyttenbach: it consists of six volumes of text (Oxon., 1795-1800) and two volumes of notes (Oxon., 1810-1821), [4to, or 14 vols., text and notes, 8vo, with a copious index Græcitatibus, 2 vols. 8vo, Oxon., 1830.] The best editions of all the works of Plutarch are by Reiske, Lips., 1774-1782, 12 vols. 8vo, and by Hutten, 1791-1805, 14 vols. 8vo.—3. The younger, was a son of the last, and is supposed by some to have been the author of several of the works which pass usually for his father's, as, e. g., the Apophthegmata.—4. An Athenian, son of Nestorius, presided with distinction over the Neo-Platonic school at Athens in the early part of the fifth century, and was surnamed the Great. He numbered among his disciples Syrianus of Alexandria, who succeeded him as head of the school, and Proclus of Lycia. He wrote commentaries, which are lost, on the "Timæus" of Plato, and on Aristotle's treatise "On the Soul." He died at an advanced age, about A.D. 430.

ΠΛΥΤΟ or ΠΛΥΤΟΝ (Πλούτων), the giver of wealth, at first a surname of Hades, the god of the lower world, and afterward used as the real name of the god. In the latter sense it first occurs in Euripides. An account of the god is given under HADES.

ΠΛΥΤΟΣ (Πλούτος), sometimes called Pluton, the personification of wealth, is described as a son of Iasion and Demeter (Ceres). Vid. IASION. Zeus (Jupiter) is said to have deprived him of sight, that he might not bestow his favors on righteous men exclusively, but that he might distribute his gifts blindly, and without any regard to merit. At Thebes there was a statue of Tyche or Fortune, at Athens one of Irene or Peace, and at Thespiæ one of Athena (Minerva) Ergane, and in each of these cases Plutus was represented as the child of those divinities, symbolically expressing the sources of wealth. He seems to have been commonly represented as a boy with a Cornucopia.

ΠΛΥΝΙΟΣ, i. e., the sender of rain, a surname of Jupiter among the Romans, to whom sacrifices were offered during long-protracted droughts.

ΠΥΝΤΑΓΩΡΑΣ (Πυνταγόρας). 1. Eldest son of Evagoras, king of Salamis in Cyprus, was assassinated along with his father, B.C. 374.—2. King of Salamis in Cyprus, probably succeeded Nicoles, though we have no account of his accession, or his relation to the previous monarchs. He submitted to Alexander in 332, and served with a fleet under that monarch at the siege of Tyre.

ΠΟΔΑΛΪΡΙΟΣ (Ποδαλείριος). 1. Son of Æsculapius and Epione or Arsinoë, and brother of Machaon, along with whom he led the Thessalians of Tricea against Troy. He was, like his brother, skilled in the medical art. On his return from Troy he was cast by a storm on the coast of Syros in Caria, where he is said to have settled. He was worshipped as a hero on Mount Dria.—[2. A companion of Æneas, slain by Alsus in Italy.]

ΠΟΔΑΡΚΗΣ (Ποδάρκης). 1. The original name of Priam. Vid. PRIAMUS.—2. Son of Iphiclus and grandson of Phylacus, was a younger brother of Protesilaus, and led the Thessalians of Phylace against Troy.

ΠΟΔΑΡΓΕ. Vid. HARPYLÆ.

ΠΟΔΕΣ (Ποδῆς), son of Ection, a Trojan warrior and friend of Hector, was slain by a javelin-blow from Menelaus in the fight over the corpse of Patroclus.]

ΠΡÆΑΣ (Προίας), son of Phylacus or Thaumacus, husband of Methone, and the father of Philoctetes, who is hence called Pæantiades, Pæantius heros, Pæantia proles, and Pæante satus. Præas is mentioned among the Argonauts, and is said to have killed with an arrow Talauis in Crete. Præas set fire to the pile on which Hercules burned himself, and was rewarded by the hero with his arrows. Vid. HERCULES, PHILOCTETES.

ΠΡÆÆΣΣΑ (Προίησσα). 1. A city in Eastern Messenia, on the Nedon, with a temple of Minerva (Athena) Nedusia.—2. (Ruins still called ai Προίησσα), one of the four cities in Ceos (the inhabitants of which were removed to Carthæa), containing a sanctuary of Apollo Smintheus, and in the vicinity another of Minerva (Athena) Nedusia, which Nestor was believed to have built on his return from Troy.]

ΠΡÆΜΑΝΔΡΟΣ (Προίμανδρος), son of Chæresilus and Stratonice, was the husband of Tanagra, a daughter of Æolus or Æsopus, by whom he became the father of Ephippus and Leucippus. He was the reputed founder of the town of Tanagra in Bœotia, which was hence called Pæmandria. When Pæmander had inadvertently killed his own son, he was purified by Elephenor.

ΠΡÆΜΑΝἼΣ (Προμανηός; ethnic, the same: now probably Maniyas), a fortified place in Mysia, south of Cyzicus, with a celebrated temple of Æsculapius.

ΠΡÆΝΑ (Προνή), a personification of retaliation, sometimes mentioned as one being, and sometimes in the plural. The Prænæ belonged to the train of Dice, and are akin to the Erinnyes.

ΠΡÆΝΙ. 1. Vid. PHENICIA, CARTHAGO.—2. PRÆNI, BASTULLI, a people of Hispania Bætica, consisting of Phœnician settlers blended with the old inhabitants of the land.]

ΠΡÆΤΟΝΙΟ. Vid. PETONIO.

ΡᾶδῶΝ (Ρᾶγων), the harbor of Træzen in Argolis.

ΠΟΛΑ (now Pola), an ancient town in Istria, situated on the western coast, and near the Promontory POLATICUM (now Punta di Promontoria), which was the most southerly point in the country. According to tradition, Pola was founded by the Colchians, who had been sent in pursuit of Medea. It was subsequently a Roman colony, with the surname Pietas Julia, and became an important commercial town, being united by good roads with Aquileia and the principal towns of Illyria. Its importance in antiquity is attested by its magnificent ruins, of which the principal are those of an amphitheatre, of a triumphal arch (Porta aurea), erected to L. Sergius by his wife Salvia Postuma, and of several temples.

ΡᾶΛἘΜᾶΝ (Πολέμων). 1. I. King of Pontus and the Bosphorus, was the son of Zenon, the orator of Laodicea. As a reward for the services rendered by his father as well as himself, he was appointed by Antony in B.C. 39 to the government of Cilicia, and he subsequently obtained in exchange the kingdom of Pontus. He accompanied Antony in his expedition against the Parthians in 36. After the battle of Actium he was able to make his peace with Octavianus, who confirmed him in his kingdom. About the year 16 he was intrusted by Agrippa with the charge of reducing the kingdom of Bosphorus, of which he was made king after conquering the country. His reign after this was long and prosperous; he extended his dominions as far as the River Tanaïs; but having engaged in an expedition against the barbarian tribe of the Asurgians, he was not only defeated by them, but taken prisoner, and put to death. By his second wife Pythodorus, who succeeded him on the throne, he left two sons, Polemon II., and Zenon, king of Armenia, and one daughter, who was married to Cotys, king of Thrace.—2. II. Son of the preceding and of Pythodorus, was raised to the sovereignty of Pontus and Bosphorus by Caligula in A.D. 39. Bosphorus was afterward taken from him by Claudius, who assigned it to Mithradates, while he gave Polemon a portion of Cilicia in its stead, 41. In 62, Polemon was induced by Nero to abdicate the throne, and Pontus was reduced to the condition of a Roman province.—3. Of Athens, an eminent Platonic philosopher, was the son of Philostratus, a man of wealth and political distinction. In his youth Polemon was extremely profligate; but one day, when he was about thirty, on his bursting into the school of Xenocrates, at the head of a band of revellers, his attention was so arrested by the discourse, which chanced to be upon temperance, that he tore off his garland and remained an attentive listener, and from that day he adopted an abstemious course of life, and continued to frequent the school, of which, on the death of Xenocrates, he became the head, B.C. 315. He died in 273, at a great age. He esteemed the object of philosophy to be, to exercise men in things and deeds, not in dialectic speculation. He placed the summum bonum in living according to the laws of nature.—4. Of Athens by citizenship, but by birth either of Ilium, or Samos, or Sicyon, a Stoic philosopher and an eminent geographer, surnamed Periegetes (ὁ περιηγητής), lived in the time of Ptolemy Epiphanes, at the beginning of the second century B.C. In philosophy he was a disciple of Panætius. He made extensive journeys through Greece to collect materials for his geographical works, in the course of which he paid particular attention to the inscriptions on votive offerings and on columns. As the collector of these inscriptions, he was one of the earlier contributors to the Greek Anthology. Athenæus and other writers make very numerous quotations from his works. They were chiefly descriptions of different parts of Greece: some were on the paintings preserved in various places, and several are controversial, among which is one against Eratosthenes. [The fragments of Polemon have been published by Preller in the work entitled Polemonis Periegetæ Fragmenta, collegit, digessit, notis auxit L. Preller, Lips., 1838.]—5. ANTONIUS, a celebrated sophist and rhetorician, flourished under Trajan, Hadrian, and the first Antoninus, and was in high favor with the two former emperors. He was born of a consular family at Laodicea, but spent the greater part of his life at Smyrna. His most celebrated disciple was Aristides. Among his imitators in subsequent times was Gregory Nazianzen. His style of oratory was imposing rather than pleasing, and his character was haughty and reserved. During the latter part of his life he was so tortured by the gout that he resolved to put an end to his existence; he had himself shut up in the tomb of his ancestors at Laodicea, where he died of hunger at the age of sixty-five. The only extant work of Polemon is the funeral orations for Cynægirus and Callimachus, the generals who fell at Marathon, which are supposed to be pronounced by their fathers. These orations are edited by Orelli, Lips., 1819.—6. The author of a short Greek work on Physiognomy, which is still extant. He must have lived in or before the third century after Christ, as he is mentioned by Origen, and from his style he can not be supposed to have lived much earlier than this time. His work consists of two books; in the first, which contains twenty-three chapters, after proving the utility of physiognomy, he lays down the general principles of the science; in the second book, which consists of twenty-seven chapters, he goes on to apply the principles he had before laid down, and describes in a few words the characters of the courageous man, the timid, the impudent, the passionate, the talkative, &c. The best edition of it is by Franz in his "Scriptores Physiognomonie Veteres," Altenburg, 1780.

ΠΟΛΕΜΟΝΙΥΜ (Πολεμώνιον: Πολεμώνιος, and Πολεμωνιεύς: now Poleman), a city on the coast of Pontus, in Asia Minor, built by King Polemon (probably the second) on the site of the older city of Side, at the mouth of the River Sidenus (now Poleman Chai), and at the bottom of a deep gulf, with a good harbor. It was the capital of the kingdom of Polemon, comprising the central part of Pontus, east of the Iris, which was hence called Pontus Polemoniacus.

ΠΟΛΙΪΑΣ (Πολιάς), i. e., "the goddess protecting the city," a surname of Minerva (Athena) at Athens, where she was worshipped as the protecting divinity of the Acropolis.

ΠΟΛΙΧΝΑ (Πολίχνη, Dor. Πολίχνα: Πολιχνίτης), a town. 1. In the northwest of Messenia, west of Andania.—2. In the northeast of Laconia.—3. In Chios.—4. In Crete, whose territory bordered on that of Cydonia.—5. In Mysia, in the district Troas, on the left bank of the Æsepus, near its source.

ΠΟΛΙΥΕΥΣ (Πολιεύς), "the protector of the city," a surname of Jupiter (Zeus), under which he had an altar on the acropolis at Athens.

ΠΟΛΙΟΡΕΤΕΣ, ΔΕΜΕΤΡΙΥΣ. Vid. ΔΕΜΕΤΡΙΥΣ.

ΠΟΛΙΣ (Πόλις), a village of the Locri Opuntii, subject to Hyle.

[ΠΟΛΙΣΜΑ (Πόλισμα), a small town of the Mysian district Troas, on the Simoïs, already in Strabo's time in ruins.]

ΠΟΛΙΤΕΣ (Πολίτης). 1. Son of Priam and Hecuba, and father of Priam the younger, was a valiant warrior, but was slain by Pyrrhus.—[2. One of the companions of Ulysses, changed by Circe into swine; later legends made him to have been stoned to death by the inhabitants of the coast of Bruttium, near Tamesa, for having violated a maiden in a fit of intoxication: in revenge, his spirit is said to have pursued them until they erected a temple to his honor, where a maiden was yearly sacrificed to him, until Euthymon freed them by having vanquished the evil spirit.]

POLITORIUM, a town in the interior of Latium, destroyed by Ancus Marcius.

POLŪCHUS (Πολιούχος), i. e., "protecting the city," occurs as a surname of several divinities, such as Minerva (Athena) Chalciæcus at Sparta, and of Minerva (Athena) at Athens.

POLLA, ARGENTĀRIA, the wife of the poet Lucan.

POLLENTĪA (Pollentinus). 1. (Now Polenza), a town of the Statielli in Liguria, at the confluence of the Sturia and the Tanarus, and subsequently a Roman municipium. It was celebrated for its wool. In its neighborhood Stilicho gained a victory over the Goths under Alaric.—2. A town in Picenum, probably identical with Urbs Salvia.—3. (Now Pollenza), a Roman colony on the northeastern point of the Balearis Major.

POLLŌ, ANNĪUS, was accused of treason (maiestas) toward the end of the reign of Tiberius, but was not brought to trial. He was subsequently one of Nero's intimate friends, but was accused of taking part in Piso's conspiracy against that emperor in A.D. 63, and was in consequence banished.

POLLŌ, C. ASĪNIUS, a distinguished orator, poet, and historian of the Augustan age. He was born at Rome in B.C. 76, and became distinguished as an orator at an early age. On the breaking out of the civil war he joined Cæsar, and in 49 he accompanied Curio to Africa. After the defeat and death of Curio he crossed over to Greece, and fought at Cæsar's side at the battle of Pharsalia (48). He also accompanied Cæsar in his campaigns against the Pompeian party in Africa (46) and Spain (45). He returned with Cæsar to Rome, but was shortly afterward sent back to Spain, with the command of the Further Province, in order to prosecute the war against Sextus Pompey. He was in his province at the time of Cæsar's death (44). He took no part in the war between Antony and the senate; but when Antony was joined by Lepidus and Octavianus in 43, Pollio espoused their cause, and persuaded L. Plancus in Gaul to follow his example. In the division of the provinces among the triumvirs, Antony received the Gauls. The administration of the Transpadane Gaul was committed to Pollio by Antony, and he had accordingly the difficult task of settling the veterans in the lands which had been assigned to them in this province. It was upon this occasion that he saved the property of the poet Virgil at Mantua from confiscation, whom he took under his protection from his love of literature. In 40 Pollio took an active part in effecting the reconciliation between Octavianus and Antony at Brundisium. In the same year he was consul; and it was during his consulship that Virgil addressed to him his fourth Eclogue. In 39 Antony went to Greece, and sent Pollio with a part of his army against the Parthini, an Illyrian people. Pollio defeated the Parthini and took the Dalmatian town of Salona, and, in consequence of his success, obtained the honor of a triumph on the 25th of October in this year. He gave his son Asinius Gallus the agnomen of Saloninus after the town which he had taken. It was during his Illyrian campaign that Virgil addressed to him the eighth Eclogue. From this time Pollio withdrew altogether from political life, and devoted himself to the study of literature. He still continued, however, to exercise his oratorical powers, and maintained his reputation for eloquence by his speeches both in the senate and the courts of justice. He died at his Tusculan villa, A.D. 4, in the eightieth year of his age, preserving to the last the full enjoyment of his health and of all his faculties. Pollio deserves a distinguished place in the history of Roman literature, not so much on account of his works as of the encouragement which he gave to literature. He was not only a patron of Virgil, Horace (vid. Carm., ii., 1), and other great poets and writers, but he has the honor of having been the first person to establish a public library at Rome, upon which he expended the money he had obtained in his Illyrian campaign. None of Pollio's own works have come down to us, but they possessed sufficient merit to lead his contemporaries and successors to class his name with those of Cicero, Virgil, and Sallust as an orator, a poet, and a historian. It was, however, as an orator that he possessed the greatest reputation. Catullus describes him in his youth (Carm., xii., 9) as "leporum disertus puer et factitarius," and Horace speaks of him in the full maturity of his powers (Carm., ii., 1, 13) as "Insigne mæstis præsidium reis et consulenti, Pollio, euræ;" and we have also the more impartial testimony of Quintilian, the two Senecas, and the author of the Dialogue on Orators to the greatness of his oratorical powers. Pollio wrote the history of the civil wars in seventeen books. It commenced with the consulship of Metellus and Afranius, B.C. 60, in which year the first triumvirate was formed, and appears to have come down to the time when Augustus obtained the undisputed supremacy of the Roman world. As a poet Pollio was best known for his tragedies, which are spoken of in high terms by Virgil and Horace, but which probably did not possess any great merit, as they are hardly mentioned by subsequent writers. The words of Virgil (Ecl., iii., 86), "Pollio et ipse facit nova earmina," probably refer to tragedies of a new kind, namely, such as were not borrowed from the Greek, but contained subjects entirely new, taken from Roman story. Pollio also enjoyed great reputation as a critic, but he is chiefly known in this capacity for the severe judgment which he passed upon his great contemporaries. Thus he pointed out many mistakes in the speeches of Cicero, censured the Commentaries of Cæsar for their want of historical fidelity, and found fault with Sallust for affectation in the use of antiquated words and expressions. He also complained of a certain Patavinity in Livy, respecting which some remarks are made in the life of Livy (p. 444, b). Pollio had a son, C. Asinius Gallus Saloninus. Vid. p. 320. Asinius Gallus married Vipsania, the former wife of Tiberius, by whom he had several children, namely: 1. Asinius Saloninus. 2. Asinius Gallus. 3. Asinius Pollio, consul A.D. 23. 4. Asinius Agrippa, consul A.D. 25. 5. Asinius Celer.

[POLLIO, TREBELLIVS. Vid. TREBELLIVS.]

of Augustus, was by birth a freedman, and has obtained a place in history on account of his riches and his cruelty. He was accustomed to feed his lampreys with human flesh, and whenever a slave displeased him, the unfortunate wretch was forthwith thrown into the pond as food for the fish. On one occasion Augustus was supping with him, when a slave had the misfortune to break a crystal goblet, and his master immediately ordered him to be thrown to the fishes. The slave fell at the feet of Augustus, praying for mercy; and when the emperor could not prevail upon Pollio to pardon him, he dismissed the slave of his own accord, and commanded all Pollio's crystal goblets to be broken and the fish-pond to be filled up. Pollio died B.C. 15, leaving a large part of his property to Augustus. It was this Pollio who built the celebrated villa of Pausilypum near Naples.

[POLLUSCA, a city of the Volsci in Latium, belonging to the territory of Antium; according to Nibby, the modern Casal della Mandria, with ruins of old fortifications.]

POLLUX or POLYDEUCES. Vid. DIOSCURI.

POLLUX, Πούλιος (Πούλιος Πολυδέυκης). 1. Of Naucratis in Egypt, was a Greek sophist and grammarian. He studied rhetoric at Athens under the sophist Adrian, and afterward opened a private school in the city, where he gave instruction in grammar and rhetoric. At a later time he was appointed by the Emperor Commodus to the chair of rhetoric at Athens. He died during the reign of Commodus at the age of fifty-eight. We may therefore assign A.D. 183 as the year in which he flourished. He seems to have been attacked by many of his contemporaries on account of the inferior character of his oratory, and especially by Lucian in his Ἐπιτόμιον διδασκαλίας. Pollux was the author of several works, all of which have perished, with the exception of the Onomasticon. This work is divided into ten books, each of which contains a short dedication to the Cæsar Commodus: it was therefore published before A.D. 177, since Commodus became Augustus in that year. Each book forms a separate treatise by itself, containing the most important words relating to certain subjects, with short explanations of the meanings of the words. The alphabetical arrangement is not adopted, but the words are given according to the subjects treated of in each book. The best editions are by Lederlin and Hemsterhuis, Amsterdam, 1706; by Dindorf, Lips., 1824; and by Imm. Bekker, Berol., 1846.—2. A Byzantine writer, the author of a Chronicon, which treats at some length of the creation of the world, and is therefore entitled Ἱστορία φυσική. Like most other Byzantine histories, it is a universal history, beginning with the creation of the world, and coming down to the time of the writer. The two manuscripts from which this work is published end with the reign of Valens, but the Paris manuscript is said to come down as low as the death of Romanus, A.D. 963. The best edition is by Hardt, Munich, 1792.

Πόλυς (Πόλιος). 1. A sophist and rhetorician, a native of Agrigentum. He was a disciple of Gorgias, and wrote a treatise on rhetoric, as well as other works mentioned by Suidas. He is introduced by Plato as an interlocutor in the Gorgias.—2. A celebrated tragic actor, the son of Charicles of Sunium, and a disciple of Archias of Thurii. It is related of him, that at the age of seventy, shortly before his death, he acted in eight tragedies on four successive days.

POLYÆGOS (Πολύαιγος: now Polybos or Antimelos), an uninhabited island in the Ægean Sea, near Melos.

POLYÆNUS (Πολύαινος). 1. Of Lampsacus, a mathematician and a friend of Epicurus, adopted the philosophical system of his friend, and, although he had previously acquired great reputation as a mathematician, he now maintained with Epicurus the worthlessness of geometry.—2. Of Sardis, a sophist, lived in the time of Julius Cæsar. He is the author of four epigrams in the Greek Anthology. His full name was Julius Polyænus.—3. The Macedonian, the author of the work on Stratagems in war (Στρατηγήματα), which is still extant, lived about the middle of the second century of the Christian era. Suidas calls him a rhetorician, and we learn from Polyænus himself that he was accustomed to plead causes before the emperor. He dedicated his work to M. Aurelius and Verus, while they were engaged in the Parthian war, about A.D. 163, at which time, he says, he was too old to accompany them in their campaigns. This work is divided into eight books, of which the first six contain an account of the stratagems of the most celebrated Greek generals, the seventh of those of barbarous or foreign people, and the eighth of the Romans and illustrious women. Parts, however, of the sixth and seventh books are lost, so that of the nine hundred stratagems which Polyænus described, only eight hundred and thirty-three have come down to us. The work is written in a clear and pleasing style, though somewhat tinged with the artificial rhetoric of the age. It contains a vast number of anecdotes respecting many of the most celebrated men in antiquity; but its value as a historical authority is very much diminished by the little judgment which the author evidently possessed, and by our ignorance of the sources from which he took his statements. The best editions are by Maassivicius, Leyden, 1690; by Mursinna, Berlin, 1756; and by Coray, Paris, 1809.

POLYBIUS (Πολύβιος). 1. The historian, the son of Lycortas, and a native of Megalopolis, in Arcadia, was born about B.C. 204. His father Lycortas was one of the most distinguished men of the Achæan league; and Polybius received the advantages of his father's instruction in political knowledge and the military art. He must also have reaped great benefit from his intercourse with Philopœmen, who was a friend of his father's, and on whose death in 182 Polybius carried the urn in which his ashes were deposited. In the following year Polybius was appointed one of the ambassadors to Egypt, but he did not leave Greece, as the intention of sending an embassy was abandoned. From this time he probably began to take part in public affairs, and he appears to have soon obtained great influence among his countrymen. After the conquest of Macedonia in 168, the Roman commissioners, who were sent into the south of Greece, commanded, at the instigation of Callicrates, that one thousand Achæans should be carried to Rome, to answer the charge of not having assisted the Romans against Perseus. This number included all the best and noblest part of the nation, and among them was Polybius. They arrived in Italy in B.C. 167, but, instead of being put upon their trial, they were distributed among the Etruscan towns. Polybius was more fortunate than the rest of his countrymen. He had probably become acquainted in Greece with Æmilius Paulus, or his sons Fabius and Scipio, and the two young men now obtained permission from the prætor for Polybius to reside at Rome in the house of their father Paulus. Scipio was then eighteen years of age, and soon became warmly attached to Polybius. Scipio was accompanied by his friend in all his military expeditions, and received much advantage from his experience and knowledge. Polybius, on the other hand, besides finding a liberal patron and protector in Scipio, was able by his means to obtain access to public documents, and to accumulate materials for his great historical work. After remaining in Italy seventeen years, Polybius returned to Peloponnesus in 151, with the surviving Achaean exiles, who were at length allowed by the senate to revisit their native land. He did not, however, remain long in Greece. He joined Scipio in his campaign against Carthage, and was present at the destruction of that city in 146. Immediately afterward he hurried to Greece, where the Achæans were waging a mad and hopeless war against the Romans. He appears to have arrived in Greece soon after the capture of Corinth; and he exerted all his influence to alleviate the misfortunes of his countrymen, and to procure favorable terms for them. His grateful fellow-countrymen acknowledged the great services he had rendered them, and statues were erected to his honor at Megalopolis, Mantinea, Pallantium, Tegea, and other places. Polybius seems now to have devoted himself to the composition of the great historical work for which he had long been collecting materials. At what period of his life he made the journeys into foreign countries for the purpose of visiting the places which he had to describe in his history, it is impossible to determine. He tells us (iii., 59) that he undertook long and dangerous journeys into Africa, Spain, Gaul, and even as far as the Atlantic, on account of the ignorance which prevailed respecting those parts. Some of these countries he visited while serving under Scipio, who afforded him every facility for the prosecution of his design. At a later period of his life he visited Egypt likewise. He probably accompanied Scipio to Spain in 134, and was present at the fall of Numantia, since Cicero states (ad Fam., v., 12) that Polybius wrote a history of the Numantine war. He died at the age of eighty-two, in consequence of a fall from his horse, about 122. The history of Polybius consisted of forty books. It began B.C. 220, where the history of Aratus left off, and ended at 146, in which year Corinth was destroyed, and the independence of Greece perished. It consisted of two distinct parts, which were probably published at different times, and afterward united into one work. The first part comprised a period of thirty-five years, beginning with the second Punic war, and the Social war in Greece, and ending with the conquest of Perseus and the downfall of the Macedonian kingdom in 168. This was, in fact, the main portion of his work, and its great object was to show how the Romans had in this brief period of fifty-three years conquered the greater part of the world; but since the Greeks were ignorant for the most part of the early history of Rome, he gives a survey of Roman history from the taking of the city by the Gauls to the commencement of the second Punic war, in the first two books, which thus form an introduction to the body of the work. With the fall of the Macedonian kingdom the supremacy of the Roman dominion was decided, and nothing more remained for the other nations of the world than to yield submission to the Romans. The second part of the work, which formed a kind of supplement to the former part, comprised the period from the conquest of Perseus in 168 to the fall of Corinth in 146. The history of the conquest of Greece seems to have been completed in the thirty-ninth book; and the fortieth book probably contained a chronological summary of the whole work. The history of Polybius is one of the most valuable works that has come down to us from antiquity. He had a clear apprehension of the knowledge which a historian must possess; and his preparatory studies were carried on with the greatest energy and perseverance. Thus he not only collected with accuracy and care an account of the events that he intended to narrate, but he also studied the history of the Roman constitution, and made distant journeys to become acquainted with the geography of the countries that he had to describe in his work. In addition to this, he had a strong judgment and a striking love of truth, and, from having himself taken an active part in political life, he was able to judge of the motives and actions of the great actors in history in a way that no mere scholar or rhetorician could possibly do. But the characteristic feature of his work, and the one which distinguishes it from all other histories which have come down to us from antiquity, is its didactic nature. He did not, like other historians, write to afford amusement to his readers; his object was to teach by the past a knowledge of the future, and to deduce from previous events lessons of practical wisdom. Hence he calls his work a Pragmatia (πραγματεία), and not a History (ιστορία). The value of history consisted, in his opinion, in the instruction that might be obtained from it. Thus the narrative of events became in his view of secondary importance; they formed only the text of the political and moral discourses which it was the province of the historian to deliver. Excellent, however, as these discourses are, they materially detract from the merits of the history as a work of art; their frequent occurrence interrupts the continuity of the narrative, and destroys, to a great extent, the interest of the reader in the scenes which are described. Moreover, he frequently inserts long episodes, which have little connection with the main subject of his work, because they have a didactic tendency. Thus we find that one whole book (the sixth) was devoted to a history of the Roman constitution and the thirty-fourth book seems to have been exclusively a treatise on geography. The style of Polybius bears the impress of his mind; and as instruction, and not amusement, was the great object for which he wrote, he did not seek to please his readers by the choice of his phrases or the composition of his sentences. Hence the later Greek critics were severe in their condemnation of his style. The greater part of the history of Polybius has perished. We possess the first five books entire, but of the rest we have only fragments and extracts, some of which, however, are of considerable length, such as the account of the Roman army, which belonged to the sixth book. There have been discovered at different times four distinct collections of extracts from the lost books. The first collection, discovered soon after the revival of learning in a MS. brought from Corfu, contained the greater part of the sixth book, and portions of the following eleven. In 1582 Ursinus published at Antwerp a second collection of Extracts, entitled Excerpta de Legationibus, which were made in the tenth century of the Christian era by order of Constantinus Porphyrogenitus. In 1634, Valesius published a third collection of extracts from Polybius, also taken from the Excerpta of Constantinus, entitled Excerpta de Virtutibus et Vitiis. The fourth collection of extracts was published at Rome in 1827 by Angelo Mai, who discovered in the Vatican library at Rome the section of the Excerpta of Constantinus Porphyrogenitus, entitled Excerpta de Sententiis. The best edition of Polybius with a commentary is by Schweighæuser, Lips., 1789-1795, 8 vols. 8vo. The best edition of the text alone is by Bekker (Berol., 1844, 2 vols. 8vo), who has added the Vatican fragments. Livy did not use Polybius till he came to the second Punic war, but from that time he followed him very closely. Cicero likewise chiefly followed Polybius in the account which he gives of the Roman constitution in his De Republica. The history of Polybius was continued by Posidonius and Strabo. Vid. POSIDONIUS, STRABO. Besides the great historical work of which we have been speaking, Polybius wrote, 2. The Life of Philipæmen, in three books. 3. A treatise on Tactics. 4. A History of the Numantine War.—2. A freedman of the Emperor Augustus, read in the senate the will of the emperor after his decease.—3. A favorite freedman of the Emperor Claudius. He was the companion of the studies of Claudius; and on the death of his brother, Seneca addressed to him a Consolatio, in which he bestows the highest praises upon his literary attainments. Polybius was put to death through the intrigues of Messalina, although he had been one of her paramours.

Πολύβοτες (Πολυβώτης), one of the giants who fought against the gods, was pursued by Neptune (Poseidon) across the sea as far as the island of Cos. There Neptune (Poseidon) tore away a part of the island, which was afterward called Nisyron, and, throwing it upon the giant, buried him under it.

Πολύβοτος (Πολύβοτος): ruins at Bulawadin, a city of Great Phrygia, east of Synnada.

Πολύβος (Πόλυβος). 1. King of Corinth, by whom Œdipus was brought up. Vid. ŒDIPUS.

He was the husband of Peribœa or Merope. Pausanias makes him king of Sicyon, and describes him as a son of Mercury (Hermes) and Clithonophyie, and as the father of Lysianassa, whom he gave in marriage to Talaua, king of the Argives.—[2. A Trojan warrior, son of Antenor.—3. Husband of Alcandra, king of Egyptian Thebes, guest-friend of Menelaus.—4. An Ithacan, father of the suitor Eurymachus.—5. One of the suitors of Penelope, slain by Eumæus.—6. A Phœacian mentioned in the Odyssey.]—7. A Greek physician, one of the pupils of Hippocrates, was also his son-in-law, and lived in the island of Cos, in the fourth century B.C. Polybus, with his brothers-in-law, Thesalus and Dracon, were the founders of the ancient medical sect of the Dogmatici. He was sent abroad by Hippocrates, with his fellow-pupils, during the time of the plague, to assist different cities with his medical skill, and he afterward remained in his native country. He has been supposed, both by ancient and modern critics, to be the author of several treatises in the Hippocratic collection.

POLYCARPUS (Πολύκαρπος), one of the apostolical fathers, was a native of Smyrna. The date of his birth and of his martyrdom are uncertain. He is said to have been a disciple of the apostle John, and to have been consecrated by this apostle bishop of the church at Smyrna. It has been conjectured that he was the angel of the church of Smyrna to whom CHRIST directed the letter in the Apocalypse (ii, 8-11); and it is certain that he was bishop of Smyrna at the time when Ignatius of Antioch passed through that city on his way to suffer death at Rome, some time between 107 and 116. Ignatius seems to have enjoyed much this intercourse with Polycarp, whom he had known in former days, when they were both hearers of the apostle John. The martyrdom of Polycarp occurred in the persecution under the emperors Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus. As he was led to death, the proconsul offered him his life if he would revile CHRIST. "Eighty and six years have I served him," was the reply, "and he never did me wrong: how, then, can I revile my King and my Saviour?" We have remaining only one short piece of Polycarp, his Letter to the Philippians, which is published along with Ignatius and the other apostolical writers. Vid. IGNATIUS.

[POLYCASTE (Πολυκάστη). 1. Daughter of Lygæus, wife of Icarus, mother of Penelope.—2. Daughter of Nestor and Anaxibia, wife of Telemachus, to whom she bore Persepolis.]

POLYCLES (Πολυκλής). 1. The name of two artists. The elder Polycles was probably an Athenian, and flourished about B.C. 370. He appears to have been one of the artists of the later Athenian school, who obtained great celebrity by the sensual charms exhibited in their works. One of his chief works was a celebrated statue of an Hermaphrodite. The younger Polycles is placed by Pliny in 155, and is said to have made a statue of Juno, which was placed in the portico of Octavia at Rome, when that portico was erected by Metellus Macedonicus. But since most of the works of art with which Metellus decorated his portico were not the original productions of living artists, but th-works of former masters, it has been conjectured that this Polycles may be no other than the Athenian artist already mentioned.—[2. A famous athlete, often crowned at the four great games of Greece: his statue was placed in the sacred grove at Olympia.]

ΠΟΛΥΚΛΕΥΣ (Πολύκλειτος). 1. The Elder, of Argos, probably by citizenship, and of Sicyon, probably by birth, was one of the most celebrated statuary of the ancient world; he was also a sculptor, an architect, and an artist in toreutic. He was the pupil of the great Argive statuary Ageladas, under whom he had Phidias and Myron for his fellow-disciples. He was somewhat younger than Phidias, and about the same age as Myron. He flourished about B.C. 452–412. Of his personal history we know nothing further. As an artist, he stood at the head of the schools of Argos and Sicyon, and approached more nearly than any other to an equality with Phidias, the great head of the Athenian school. The essential difference between these artists was that Phidias was unsurpassed in making the images of the gods, Polycletus in those of men. One of the most celebrated works of Polycletus was his Doryphorus or Spear-bearer, a youthful figure, but with the full proportions of a man. This was the statue which became known by the name of Canon, because in it the artist had embodied a perfect representation of the ideal of the human figure. Another of his great works was his ivory and gold statue of Juno (Hera) in her temple between Argos and Mycenæ. This work was executed by the artist in his old age, and was doubtless intended by him to rival Phidias's chryselephantine statues of Minerva (Athena) and of Jupiter (Zeus), though it was surpassed by them in costliness and size. The goddess was seated on a throne, her head crowned with a garland, on which were worked the Graces and the Hours, the one hand holding the symbolical pomegranate, and the other a sceptre, surmounted by a cuckoo, a bird sacred to Juno (Hera) on account of her having been once seduced by Jupiter (Zeus) under that form. This statue remained always the ideal model of Juno (Hera). In the department of toreutic, the fame of Polycletus no doubt rested chiefly on the golden ornaments of his statue of Juno (Hera); but he also made small bronzes (sigilla) and drinking-vessels (phiale). As an architect, Polycletus obtained great celebrity by the theatre, and the circular building (tholus) which he built in the sacred inclosure of Æsculapius at Epidaurus.—2. The Younger, also a statuary of Argos, of whom very little is known, because his fame was eclipsed by that of his more celebrated namesake, and, in part, contemporary. The younger Polycletus may be placed about 400.—3. Of Larissa, a Greek historian, and one of the numerous writers of the history of Alexander the Great. [Most of the extracts from his histories refer to the geography of the countries which Alexander invaded. They are collected, with a notice of the author, by C. Müller, in his Scriptores Rerum Alexandri Magni, p. 129–33, in Didot's Bibliotheca Græca, Paris, 1846.]—4. A favorite freedman of Nero, who sent him into Britain to inspect the state of the island.

ΠΟΛΥΚΡΑΤΗΣ (Πολυκράτης). 1. Of Samos, one of the most fortunate, ambitious, and treacherous of the Greek tyrants. With the assistance of his brothers Pantagnotus and Syloson, he made himself master of the island toward the latter end of the reign of Cyrus. At first he shared the supreme power with his brothers; but he shortly afterward put Pantagnotus to death, and banished Syloson. Having thus become sole despot, he raised a powerful fleet, and extended his sway over several of the neighboring islands, and even conquered some towns on the main land. He had formed an alliance with Amasis, king of Egypt, who, however, finally renounced it through alarm at the amazing good fortune of Polycrates, which never met with any check or disaster, and which therefore was sure, sooner or later, to incur the envy of the gods. Such, at least, is the account of Herodotus, who has narrated the story of the rupture between Amasis and Polycrates in his most dramatic manner. In a letter which Amasis wrote to Polycrates, the Egyptian monarch advised him to throw away one of his most valuable possessions, in order that he might thus inflict some injury upon himself. In accordance with this advice, Polycrates threw into the sea a seal-ring of extraordinary beauty; but in a few days it was found in the belly of a fish, which had been presented to him by a fisherman. In the reign of Cambyses, the Spartans and Corinthians sent a powerful force to Samos in order to depose the tyrant; but their expedition failed, and after besieging the city forty days, they left the island. The power of Polycrates now became greater than ever. The great works which Herodotus saw at Samos were probably executed by him. He lived in great pomp and luxury, and, like others of the Greek tyrants, was a patron of literature and the arts. The most eminent artists and poets found a ready welcome at his court, and his friendship for Anacreon is particularly celebrated. But in the midst of all his prosperity he fell by the most ignominious fate. Orætes, the satrap of Sardis, had formed a deadly hatred against Polycrates. By false pretences, the satrap contrived to allure him to the main land, where he was arrested soon after his arrival, and crucified, 522.—2. An Athenian rhetorician and sophist of some repute, a contemporary of Socrates and Isocrates, taught first at Athens and afterward at Cyprus. He was the teacher of Zoilus. He wrote, 1. An accusation of Socrates, which was a declamation on the subject, composed some years after the death of the philosopher. 2. A defence of Busiris. The oration of Isocrates, entitled Busiris, is addressed to Polycrates, and points out the faults which the latter had committed in his oration on this subject. 3. An obscene poem, which he published under the name of the poetess Philænus, for the purpose of injuring her reputation.—[3. An Athenian, a lochagus in the army of the Greek auxiliaries of the younger Cyrus, a friend of Xenophon, whom he defended on one occasion.—4. Descended from an illustrious family at Argos, went to the court of Ptolemy Philopator, and proved of great service in drilling the Egyptian troops. He commanded the cavalry on the left wing at the battle of Raphia in B.C. 217 against Antiochus III., in which Antiochus was defeated, and which secured to Ptolemy the provinces of Cœlesyria, Phœnicia, and Palestine. Although young, Polyerates was appointed governor of Cyprus, which office he filled with ability and integrity. In his later years he appears to have changed for the worse, and to have indulged in every vice.]

[POLYCTOR (Πολύκτωρ), son of Pterelaus, a prince of Ithaca. A place in Ithaca, Polyctorium, was believed to have derived its name from him.]

POLYDAMAS (Πολυδάμας). 1. Son of Panthous and Phrontis, was a Trojan hero, a friend of Hector, and brother of Euphorbus.—2. Of Scotussa in Thessaly, son of Nieias, conquered in the Paneratum at the Olympic games in Ol. 93, B.C. 408. His size was immense, and the most marvellous stories are related of his strength, how he killed without arms a huge and fierce lion on Mount Olympus, how he stopped a chariot at full gallop, &c. His reputation led the Persian king, Darius Oehus, to invite him to his court, where he performed similar feats.—3. Of Pharsalus in Thessaly, was intrusted by his fellow-citizens, about B.C. 375, with the supreme government of their native town. He afterward entered into a treaty with Jason of Phœræ. On the murder of Jason in 370, his brother Polyphron put to death Polydamas.

POLYDECTES (Πολυδέκτης). 1. King of the island of Seriphos, was son of Magnes, and brother of Dictys. He received kindly Danaë and Perseus, when the chest in which they had been exposed by Acrisius floated to the island of Seriphos. His story is related under PERSEUS.—2. King of Sparta, was the eldest son of Eunomus, the brother of Lyurgus the lawgiver, and the father of Charilaüs, who succeeded him. Herodotus, contrary to the other authorities, makes Polydectes the father of Eunomus.

POLYDEUCES (Πολυδέυκης), one of the Dioscuri, and the twin-brother of Castor, called by the Romans Pollux. Vid. DIOSCURI.

[POLYDORA (Πολυδώρα). 1. A daughter of Oceanus and Tethys.—2. Daughter of Meleager and Cleopatra, was married to Protesilaus, after whose death she made away with herself.—3. Daughter of Peleus and Antigone was a sister of Achilles, and married to Spercheus or Borus, by whom she became the mother of Menesthius.]

POLYDORUS (Πολύδορος). 1. King of Thebes, son of Cadmus and Harmonia, husband of Nycteis, and father of Labdacus.—2. The youngest among the sons of Priam and Laïthoë, was slain by Achilles. This is the Homeric account; but later traditions make him a son of Priam and Hecuba, and give a different account of his death. One tradition relates that, when Ilium was on the point of falling into the hands of the Greeks, Priam intrusted Polydorus and a large sum of money to Polymestor or Polymnestor, king of the Thracian Chersonesus. After the destruction of Troy, Polymestor killed Polydorus for the purpose of getting possession of his treasures, and cast his body into the sea. His body was afterward washed upon the coast, where it was found and recognized by his mother Heenba, who, together with other Trojan captives, took vengeance upon Polymestor by killing his two children, and putting out his eyes.

Another tradition stated that Polydorus was intrusted to his sister Iliona, who was married to Polymestor. She brought him up as her own son, while she made every one else believe that her own son Deiphilus or Deipyilus was Polydorus. The Greeks, anxious to destroy the race of Priam, promised to Polymestor Electra for his wife, and a large amount of gold, if he would kill Polydorus. Polymestor was prevailed upon, and he accordingly slew his own son. Polydorus thereupon persuaded his sister Iliona to kill Polymestor.—3. King of Sparta, was the son of Alcamenes and the father of Eurycrates, who succeeded him. He assisted in bringing the first Messenian war to a conclusion, B.C. 724. He was murdered by Polmarchus, a Spartan of high family; but his name was precious among his people on account of his justice and kindness. Crotona and the Epi-zephyrian Loeri were founded in his reign.—4. Brother of Jason of Phœræ, obtained the supreme power, along with his brother Polyphron, on the death of Jason in B.C. 370, but was shortly afterward assassinated by Polyphron.—5. A sculptor of Rhodes, one of the associates of Agesander, in the execution of the celebrated group of the Laocoon. Vid. AGESANDER.

POLYECTUS (Πολύευκτος), an Athenian orator of the demus Sphectus, was a political friend of Demosthenes, with whom he worked in resisting the Macedonian party.

POLYGNÖTUS (Πολύγνωτος), one of the most celebrated Greek painters, was a native of the island of Thasos, and was honored with the citizenship of Athens, on which account he is sometimes called an Athenian. His father, Aglaophon, was his instructor in his art; and he had a brother, named Aristophon, who was also a painter. Polygnotus lived on intimate terms with Cimon and his sister Elpinice; and he probably came to Athens in B.C. 463, after the subjugation of Thasos by Cimon. He appears to have been at that time an artist of some reputation, and he continued to exercise his art almost down to the beginning of the Peloponnesian war (431). The period of his greatest artistic activity at Athens seems to have been that which elapsed from his removal to Athens (463) to the death of Cimon (449), who employed him in the pictorial decoration of the public buildings with which he began to adorn the city, such as the temple of Theseus, the Anæeum, and the Pœcile. He afterward went to Delphi, when he was employed with other artists in decorating the buildings connected with the temple. He appears to have returned to Athens about 435, where he executed a series of paintings in the Propylæa of the Acropolis. The Propylæa were commenced in 437, and completed in 432. The subjects of the pictures of Polygnotus were almost invariably taken from Homer and the other poets of the epic cycle. They appear to have been mostly painted on panels, which were afterward let into the walls where they were to remain.

POLYHYMNIA. Vid. POLYMNIA.

POLYIDUS (Πολύιδος). 1. Son of Cœranus, grandson of Abas, and great-grandson of Melampus. He was, like his ancestor Melampus, a celebrated soothsayer at Corinth, and is described as the father of Euchenor, Astyercatia and Manto. When Alcathous had murdered his own son Callipolis at Megara, he was purified by Polyidus, who erected at Megara a sanctuary to Bacchus (Dionysus), and a statue of the god.—2. A dithyrambic poet of the most flourishing period of the later Athenian dithyramb, and also skillful as a painter, was contemporary with Philoxenus, Timotheus, and Telestes, about B.C. 400.

[POLYMELOS (Πολύμηλος), a Trojan warrior, slain by Patroclus before Troy.]

POLYMESTOR OR POLYMNESTOR. Vid. POLYDORUS.

POLYMNESTUS OR POLYMNASTUS (Πολύμνηστος), the son of Meles of Colophon, was an epic, elegiac, and lyric poet, and a musician. He flourished B.C. 675-644. He belongs to the school of Dorian music, which flourished at this time at Sparta, where he carried on the improvements of Thaletas. The Attic comedians attacked his poems for their erotic character. As an elegiac poet, he may be regarded as the predecessor of his fellow-countryman, Mimnermus.

[POLYMNESTUS (Πολύμνηστος). Vid. PHRONIDA.]

POLYMNIA OR POLYHYMNIA (Πολύμνια), daughter of Jupiter (Zeus), and one of the nine Muses. She presided over lyric poetry, and was believed to have invented the lyre. In works of art she was usually represented in a pensive attitude. Vid. MUSÆ.

POLYNICES (Πολυνεικης), son of Œdipus and Jocasta, and brother of Eteocles and Antigone. His story is given under ETEOCLES and ADRASTUS.

[POLYPAIDES. Vid. THEOGNIS.]

POLYPHEMUS (Πολύφημος). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and the nymph Thoosa, was one of the Cyclopes in Sicily. Vid. CYCLOPES. He is represented as a gigantic monster, having only one eye in the centre of his forehead, earing nought for the gods, and devouring human flesh. He dwelt in a cave near Mount Ætna, and fed his flocks upon the mountain. He fell in love with the nymph Galatea, but as she rejected him for Acis, he destroyed the latter by crushing him under a huge rock. When Ulysses was driven upon Sicily, Polyphemus devoured some of his companions; and Ulysses would have shared the same fate, had he not put out the eye of the monster while he was asleep. Vid. ULYSSES.—2. Son of Elatus or Neptune (Poseidon) and Hippea, was one of the Lapithæ at Larissa in Thessaly. He was married to Laonome, a sister of Hercules. He was also one of the Argonauts, but being left behind by them in Mysia, he founded Cios, and fell fighting against the Chalybes.

POLYPHRON (Πολύφρων), brother of Jason of Phææ, succeeded to the supreme power with his brother Polydorus on the death of Jason in B.C. 370. Shortly afterward he murdered Polydorus. He exercised his power with great cruelty, and was murdered in his turn, 369, by his nephew Alexander, who proved a still greater tyrant.

POLYRÆTES (Πολυραΐτης), son of Pirithous and Hippodamia, was one of the Lapithæ, and joined the Greeks in the Trojan war.

POLYRRHËNIA OR -IUM (Πολυρρήνια: Πολυρρήνιος), a town in Crete, whose territory embraced the whole western corner of the island. It possessed a sanctuary of Dictynna, and is said to have been colonized by Achæans and Lacedæmonians.

POLYSPERCHON (Πολυσπέρχων), a Macedonian, and a distinguished officer of Alexander the Great. In B.C. 323 he was appointed by Alexander second in command of the army of invalids and veterans, which Craterus had to conduct home to Macedonia. He afterward served under Antipater in Europe, and so great was the confidence which the latter reposed in him, that Antipater on his death-bed (319) appointed Polysperchon to succeed him as regent and guardian of the king, while he assigned to his own son Cassander the subordinate station of chiliarch. Polysperchon soon became involved in war with Cassander, who was dissatisfied with this arrangement. It was in the course of this war that Polysperchon basely surrendered Phocion to the Athenians, in the hope of securing the adherence of Athens. Although Polysperchon was supported by Olympias, and possessed great influence with the Macedonian soldiers, he proved no match for Cassander, and was obliged to yield to him possession of Macedonia about 316. For the next few years Polysperchon is rarely mentioned, but in 310 he again assumed an important part by reviving the long-forgotten pretensions of Hercules, the son of Alexander and Barsine, to the throne of Macedonia. Cassander marched against him, but, distrusting the fidelity of his own troops, he entered into secret negotiations with Polysperchon, and persuaded the latter, by promises and flatteries, to murder Hercules. From this time he appears to have served under Cassander; but the period of his death is not mentioned.

[POLYSTRATUS (Πολύστρατος). 1. An eminent Epicurean philosopher, succeeded Hermarchus as the head of the sect, and was himself succeeded by Dionysius.—2. An epigrammatic poet, who lived probably soon after the taking of Corinth, B.C. 146: two of his epigrams are given in the Anthology, one of which is on the destruction of Corinth.]

POLYTIMËTUS (Πολυτίμητος; now Sogd or Kohik in Bokhara), a considerable river of Sogdiana, which, according to Strabo, vanished under ground near Maracanda (now Samarkand), or, as Arrian says, was lost in the sands of the steppes.

[POLYTRÖPUS (Πολύτροπος), leader of a troop of mercenaries in the Spartan service, seized Orchomenus B.C. 370; he fell in an attack made by the Mantineans under Lycomedes on Orchomenus.]

POLYXËNA (Πολυξένη), daughter of Priam and Hecuba, was beloved by Achilles. When the Greeks, on their voyage home, were still lingering on the coast of Thrace, the shade of Achilles appeared to them, demanding that Polyxena should be sacrificed to him. Neoptolemus accordingly sacrificed her on the tomb of his father. It was related that Achilles had promised Priam to bring about a peace with the Greeks, if the king would give him his daughter Polyxena in marriage; and that when Achilles had gone to the temple of the Thymbraean Apollo, for the purpose of negotiating the marriage, he was treacherously killed by Paris. Another tradition stated that Achilles and Polyxena fell in love with each other when Hector's body was delivered up to Priam; and that Polyxena fled to the Greeks after the death of Achilles, and killed herself on the tomb of her beloved with a sword.

[POLYXÆNUS (Πολύξενος), son of Agasthenes, grandson of Augeas, father of Amphimachus, was the leader of the Epeans before Troy.]

POLYXO (Πολυξώ). 1. The nurse of Queen Hypsipyle in Lemnos, was celebrated as a prophetess.—2. An Argive woman, married to Tlepolemus, son of Hercules, followed her husband to Rhodes, where, according to some traditions, she is said to have put to death the celebrated Helen. Vid. HELENA.

POLYZÆLUS (Πολύζηλος). 1. Brother of Hieron, the tyrant of Syracuse. Vid. HIERON.—2. Of Rhodes, an historian, of uncertain date, wrote a history of his native country.—3. An Athenian comic poet, belonging to the last period of the Old Comedy and the beginning of the Middle. [His fragments are edited by Meineke, in Comic Græc. Fragm., vol. i., p. 477-79, edit. minor.]

[POMETIA. Vid. STESSA POMETIA.]

POMONA, the Roman divinity of the fruit of trees, hence called Pomorum Patrona. Her name is evidently derived from Pomum. She is represented by the poets as beloved by several of the rustic divinities, such as Silvanus, Picus, Vertumnus, and others. Her worship must originally have been of considerable importance, since a special priest, under the name of flamen Pomonalis, was appointed to attend to her service.

POMPÆIA. 1. Daughter of Q. Pompeius Rufus, son of the consul of B.C. 88, and of Cornelia, the daughter of the dictator Sulla. She married C. Cæsar, subsequently the dictator, in 67, but was divorced by him in 61, because she was suspected of intriguing with Clodius, who stealthily introduced himself into her husband's house while she was celebrating the mysteries of the Bona Dea.—2. Sister of Cn. Pompey, the triumvir, married C. Memmius, who was killed in the war against Sertorius in 75.—3. Daughter of the triumvir by his third wife Mucia. She married Faustus Sulla, the son of the dictator, who perished in the African war, 46. She afterward married L. Cornelius Cinna, and her son by this marriage, Cn. Cinna Maghus, entered into a conspiracy against Augustus. As her brother Sextus survived her, she must have died before 35.—4. Daughter of Sextus Pompey, the son of the triumvir, and of Scribonia. At the peace of Misenum in 39 she was betrothed to M. Marcellus, the son of Octavia, the sister of Octavianus, but was never married to him. She accompanied her father in his flight to Asia, 36.—5. PAULINA. Vid. PAULINA.

POMPEIÆNUS, TRIB. CLAUDIUS, son of a Roman knight originally from Antioch, rose to the highest dignities under M. Aurelius. This emperor gave him his daughter Lucilla in marriage. He lived to the reign of Severus.

ΠΟΜΠΕΙ (Πομπήϊοι, Πομπαια, Πομπηϊα: Pompeians), a city of Campania, was situated on the coast, at the mouth of the River Sarnus, and at the foot of Mount Vesuvius; but, in consequence of the physical changes which the surrounding country has undergone, the ruins of Pompeii are found at present about two miles from the sea. Pompeii was first in the hands of the Oscans, afterward of the Tyrrhenians, and finally became a Roman municipium. It was partly destroyed by an earthquake in A.D. 63, but was overwhelmed in 79, along with Herculaneum and Stabæ, by the great eruption of Mount Vesuvius. The lava did not reach Pompeii, but the town was covered with successive layers of ashes and other volcanic matter, on which a soil was gradually formed. Thus a great part of the city has been preserved, with its market-places, theatres, baths, temples, and private houses; and the excavation of it in modern times has thrown great light upon many points of antiquity, such as the construction of Roman houses, and, in general, all subjects connected with the private life of the ancients. The first traces of the ancient city were discovered in 1689, rising above the ground; but it was not till 1721 that the excavations were commenced. These have been continued with various interruptions down to the present day and now about half the city is exposed to view. It was surrounded by walls, which were about two miles in circumference, surmounted at intervals by towers, and containing six gates.

ΠΟΜΠΕΙΟΥΠΟΛΙΣ (Πομπηϊούπολις), the name of several cities founded or enlarged by Pompey. 1. (Now Tash Köpri), an inland city of Cappadocia, southwest of Sinope, on the River Amnias (now Gök İrmak), a western tributary of the Halys.—2. Vid. POMPELON.—3. Vid. SOLOË.

POMPÆIUS. 1. Q. POMPEIUS, said to have been the son of a flute-player, was the first of the family who rose to dignity in the state. He was consul in 141, when he carried on war against the Numantines in Spain. Having been defeated by the enemy in several engagements, he concluded a peace with them; but on the arrival of his successor in the command, he disowned the treaty, which was declared invalid by the senate. He was censor in 131 with Q. Metellus Macedonicus.—2. Q. POMPEIUS RUFUS, either son or grandson of the preceding, was a zealous supporter of the aristocratical party. He was tribune of the plebs 100, prætor 91, and consul 88, with L. Sulla. When Sulla set out for the East to conduct the war against Mithradates, he left Italy in charge of Pompeius Rufus, and assigned to him the army of Cn. Pompeius Strabo, who was still engaged in carrying on war against the Marsi. Strabo, however, who was unwilling to be deprived of the command, caused Pompeius Rufus to be murdered by the soldiers. Cicero mentions Pompeius Rufus among the orators whom he had heard in his youth.—3. Q. POMPEIUS RUFUS, son of No. 2, married Sulla's daughter, and was murdered by the party of Sulpicius and Marius in the forum during the consulship of his father, 88.—4. Q.

POMPEIUS RUFUS, son of No. 3, and grandson of the dictator Sulla, was tribune of the plebs 52, when he distinguished himself as the great partisan of the triumvir Pompey, and assisted the latter in obtaining the sole consulship. Rufus, however, on the expiration of his office, was accused of Vis, was condemned, and went into exile at Bauli in Campania.—5. Q. POMPEIUS RUFUS, prætor 63, was sent to Capua to watch over Campania and Apulia during Catiline's conspiracy. In 61 he obtained the province of Africa, with the title of proconsul.—6. SEX. POMPEIUS, married Lucilia, a sister of the poet C. Lucilius.—7. SEX. POMPEIUS, elder son of No. 6, never obtained any of the higher offices of the state, but acquired great reputation as a man of learning, and is praised by Cicero for his accurate knowledge of jurisprudence, geometry, and the Stoic philosophy.—8. SEX. POMPEIUS, a descendant of No. 7, consul A.D. 14, with Sex. Appuleius, in which year the Emperor Augustus died. He seems to have been a patron of literature. Ovid addressed him several letters during his exile; and it was probably this same Sex. Pompeius whom the writer Valerius Maximus accompanied to Asia, and of whom he speaks as his Alexander.—9. CN. POMPEIUS STRABO, younger son of No. 6, and father of the triumvir. He was quæstor in Sardinia 103, prætor 94, and proprætor in Sicily in the following year. He was consul 89, when he carried on war with success against the allies, subduing the greater number of the Italian people who were still in arms. Toward the end of the year he brought forward the law (lex Pompeia) which gave to all the towns of the Transpadani the Jus Latii or Latinitas. He continued in the south of Italy as proconsul in the following year (88), and when Pompeius Rufus (No. 2) was appointed to succeed him in the command of the army, Strabo caused him to be assassinated by the troops. Next year (87) the Marian party obtained the upper hand. Strabo was summoned by the aristocratical party to their assistance; and, though not active in their cause, he marched to the relief of the city, and fought a battle near the Colline Gate with Cinna and Sertorius. Shortly afterward he was killed by lightning. His avarice and cruelty had made him hated by the soldiers to such a degree that they tore his corpse from the bier and dragged it through the streets. Cicero describes him (Brut., 47) "as worthy of hatred on account of his cruelty, avarice, and perfidy." He possessed some reputation as an orator, and still more as a general. He left behind him a considerable property, especially in Picenum.—10. CN. POMPEIUS MAGNUS, the TRIUMVIR, son of No. 9, was born on the 30th of September, B.C. 106, in the consulship of Atilius Serranus and Servilius Cæpio, and was, consequently, a few months younger than Cicero, who was born on the 3d of January in this year, and six years older than Cæsar. He fought under his father in 89 against the Italians, when he was only seventeen years of age, and continued with him till his death two years afterward. For the next few years the Marian party had possession of Italy; and accordingly Pompey, who adhered to the aristocratical party, was obliged to keep in the back ground. But when it became known in 84 that Sulla was on the point of returning from Greece to Italy, Pompey hastened into Picenum, where he raised an army of three legions. Although only twenty-three years of age, Pompey displayed great military abilities in opposing the Marian generals by whom he was surrounded; and when he succeeded in joining Sulla in the course of the year (83), he was saluted by the latter with the title of Imperator. During the remainder of the war in Italy Pompey distinguished himself as one of the most successful of Sulla's generals; and when the war in Italy was brought to a close, Sulla sent Pompey against the Marian party in Sicily and Africa. Pompey first proceeded to Sicily, of which he easily made himself master (82): here he put Carbo to death. In 81 Pompey crossed over to Africa, where he defeated Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus and the Numidian king Hiarbas, after a hard-fought battle. On his return to Rome in the same year, he was received with enthusiasm by the people, and was greeted by Sulla with the surname of MAGNUS, a name which he bore ever afterward, and handed down to his children. Pompey, however, not satisfied with this distinction, sued for a triumph, which Sulla at first refused; but at length, overcome by Pompey's impotunity, he allowed him to have his own way. Accordingly, Pompey, who had not yet held any public office, and was still a simple eques, entered Rome in triumph in September, 81, and before he had completed his twenty-fifth year. Pompey continued faithful to the aristocracy after Sulla's death (78), and supported the consul Catulus in resisting the attempts of his colleague Lepidus to repeal the laws of Sulla; and when Lepidus had recourse to arms in the following year (77), Pompey took an active part in the war against him, and succeeded in driving him out of Italy. The aristocracy, however, now began to fear the young and successful general; but since Sertorius in Spain had for the last three years successfully opposed Metellus Pius, one of the ablest of Sulla's generals, and it had become necessary to send the latter some effectual assistance, the senate, with considerable reluctance, determined to send Pompey to Spain, with the title of proconsul, and with equal powers to Metellus. Pompey remained in Spain between five and six years (76-71); but neither he nor Metellus was able to gain any decisive advantage over Sertorius. But when Sertorius was treacherously murdered by his own officer Perperna in 82, the war was speedily brought to a close. Perperna was easily defeated by Pompey in the first battle, and the whole of Spain was subdued by the early part of the following year (71). Pompey then returned to Italy at the head of his army. In his march toward Rome he fell in with the remains of the army of Spartacus, which M. Crassus had previously defeated. Pompey cut to pieces these fugitives, and therefore elained for himself, in addition to all his other exploits, the glory of finishing the Servile war. Pompey was now a candidate for the consulship; and although he was ineligible by law, inasmuch as he was absent from Rome, had not yet reached the legal age, and had not held any of the lower offices of the state, still his election was certain. His military glory had charmed the peo ple; and as it was known that the aristocracy looked upon Pompey with jealousy, they ceased to regard him as belonging to this party, and hoped to obtain, through him, a restoration of the rights and privileges of which they had been deprived by Sulla. Pompey was accordingly elected consul, along with M. Crassus; and on the 31st of December, 71, he entered the city a second time in his triumphal car, a simple eques. In his consulship (70), Pompey openly broke with the aristocracy, and became the great popular hero. He proposed and carried a law, restoring to the tribunes the power of which they had been deprived by Sulla. He also afforded his all-powerful aid to the Lex Aurelia, proposed by the prætor L. Aurelius Cotta, by which the judges were to be taken in future from the senatus, equites, and tribuni ærarii, instead of from the senators exclusively, as Sulla had ordained. In carrying both these measures Pompey was strongly supported by Cæsar, with whom he was thus brought into close connection. For the next two years (69 and 68) Pompey remained in Rome. In 67 the tribune A. Gabinus brought forward a bill, proposing to confer upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates with extraordinary powers. This bill was opposed by the aristocracy with the utmost vehemence, but was notwithstanding carried. The pirates were at this time masters of the Mediterranean, and had not only plundered many cities on the coasts of Greece and Asia, but had even made descents upon Italy itself. As soon as Pompey received the command, he began to make his preparations for the war, and completed them by the end of the winter. His plans were formed with great skill and judgment, and were crowned with complete success. In forty days he cleared the Western Sea of pirates, and restored communication between Spain, Africa, and Italy. He then followed the main body of the pirates to their strong-holds on the coast of Cilicia; and after defeating their fleet, he induced a great part of them, by promises of pardon, to surrender to him. Many of these he settled at Soli, which was henceforward called Pompeiopolis. The second part of the campaign occupied only forty-nine days, and the whole war was brought to a conclusion in the course of three months; so that, to adopt the panegyric of Cicero (pro Leg. Man., 12), "Pompey made his preparations for the war at the end of the winter, entered upon it at the commencement of spring, and finished it in the middle of the summer." Pompey was employed during the remainder of this year and the beginning of the following in visiting the cities of Cilicia and Pamphylia, and providing for the government of the newly-conquered districts. During his absence from Rome, Pompey was appointed to succeed Lucullus in the command of the war against Mithradates (66). The bill conferring upon him this command was proposed by the tribune C. Manilius, and was supported by Cicero in an oration which has come down to us (pro Legge Manilia). Like the Gabinian law, it was opposed by the whole weight of the aristocracy, but was carried triumphantly. The power of Mithradates had been broken by the previous victories of Lucullus, and it was only left to Pompey to bring the war to a conclusion. On the approach of Pompey, Mithradates retreated toward Armenia, but he was defeated by the Roman general; and as Tigranes now refused to receive him into his dominions, Mithradates resolved to plunge into the heart of Colchis, and from thence make his way to his own dominions in the Cimberian Bosphorus. Pompey now turned his arms against Tigranes; but the Armenian king submitted to him without a contest, and was allowed to conclude a peace with the republic. In 65 Pompey set out in pursuit of Mithradates, but he met with much opposition from the Iberians and Albanians; and after advancing as far as the River Phasis (now Faz), he resolved to leave these savage districts. He accordingly retraced his steps, and spent the winter at Pontus, which he reduced to the form of a Roman province. In 64 he marched into Syria, deposed the king Antiochus Asiaticus, and made that country also a Roman province. In 63 he advanced further south, in order to establish the Roman supremacy in Phœnicia, Coele Syria, and Palestine. The Jews refused to submit to him, and shut the gates of Jerusalem against him, and it was not till after a siege of three months that the city was taken. Pompey entered the Holy of Holies, the first time that any human being, except the high priest, had dared to penetrate into this sacred spot. It was during the war in Palestine that Pompey received intelligence of the death of Mithradates. Vid. MITHRADATES, No. 6. Pompey spent the next winter in Pontus; and after settling the affairs of Asia, he returned to Italy in 62. He disbanded his army almost immediately after landing at Brundisium, and thus calmed the apprehensions of many, who feared that, at the head of his victorious troops, he would seize upon the supreme power. He did not, however, return to Rome till the following year (51), and he entered the city in triumph on the 30th of September. He had just completed his forty-fifth year, and this was the third time that he had enjoyed the honor of a triumph. With this triumph the first and most glorious part of Pompey's life may be said to have ended. Hitherto his life had been an almost uninterrupted succession of military glory. But now he was called upon to play a prominent part in the civil commotions of the commonwealth, a part for which neither his natural talents nor his previous habits had in the least fitted him. It would seem that, on his return to Rome, Pompey hardly knew what part to take in the politics of the city. He had been appointed to the command against the pirates and Mithradates in opposition to the aristocracy, and they still regarded him with jealousy and distrust. At the same time, he was not disposed to unite himself to the popular party, which had risen into importance during his absence in the East, and over which Cæsar possessed unbounded influence. The object, however, which engaged the immediate attention of Pompey was to obtain from the senate a ratification for all his acts in Asia, and an assignment of lands which he had promised to his veterans. The senate, however, glad of an opportunity to put an affront upon a man whom they both feared and hated, resolutely refused to sanction his measures in Asia. This was the unwise thing the senate could have done. If they had known their real interests, they would have sought to win Pompey over to their side, as a counterpoise to the growing and more dangerous influence of Cæsar. But their short-sighted policy threw Pompey into Cæsar's arms, and thus sealed the downfall of their party. Cæsar promised to obtain for Pompey the ratification of his acts, and Pompey, on his part, agreed to support Cæsar in all his measures. That they might be more sure of carrying their plans into execution, Cæsar prevailed upon Pompey to become reconciled to Crassus, with whom he was at variance, but who, by his immense wealth, had great influence at Rome. The three agreed to assist one another against their mutual enemies, and thus was first formed the first triumvirate. This union of the three most powerful men at Rome crushed the aristocracy for the time. Supported by Pompey and Crassus, Cæsar was able in his consulship (59) to carry all his measures. Pompey's acts in Asia were ratified, and Cæsar's agrarian law, which divided the rich Campanian land among the poorer citizens, enabled Pompey to fulfill the promises he had made to his veterans. In order to cement their union more closely, Cæsar gave to Pompey his daughter Julia in marriage. Next year (58) Cæsar went to his province in Gaul, but Pompey remained in Rome. While Cæsar was gaining glory and influence in Gaul, Pompey was gradually losing the confidence of all parties at Rome. The senate hated and feared him; the people had deserted him for their favorite Clodius, and he had no other resource left but to strengthen his connection with Cæsar. Thus he came to be regarded as the second man in the state, and was obliged to abandon the proud position which he had occupied for so many years. According to an arrangement made with Cæsar, Pompey and Crassus were consuls for a second time in 55. Pompey received as his provinces the two Spains, Crassus obtained Syria, while Cæsar's government was prolonged for five years more, namely, from the 1st of January, 53, to the end of the year 49. At the end of his consulship Pompey did not go in person to his provinces, but sent his legates, L. Afranius and M. Petreius, to govern the Spains, while he himself remained in the neighborhood of the city. His object now was to obtain the dictatorship, and to make himself the undisputed master of the Roman world. Cæsar's increasing power and influence had at length made it clear to Pompey that a struggle must take place between them, sooner or later. The death of his wife Julia in 54, to whom he was tenderly attached, broke one link which still connected him with Cæsar, and the fall of Crassus in the following year (53), in the Parthian expedition, removed the only person who had the least chance of contesting the supremacy with them. In order to obtain the dictatorship, Pompey secretly encouraged the civil discord with which the state was torn asunder; and such frightful scenes of anarchy followed the death of Clodius at the beginning of 52, that the senate had now no alternative but calling in the assistance of Pompey, who was accordingly made sole consul in 52, and succeeded in restoring order to the state. Soon afterward Pompey became reconeiled to the aristocracy, and was now regarded as their acknowledged head. The history of the civil war which followed is related in the life of CÆSAR. It is only necessary to mention here, that after the battle of Pharsalia (48) Pompey sailed to Egypt, where he hoped to meet with a favorable reception, since he had been the means of restoring to his kingdom the father of the young Egyptian monarch. The ministers of the latter, however, dreading Cæsar's anger if they received Pompey, and likewise Pompey's resentment if they forbade him to land, resolved to release themselves from their difficulties by putting him to death. They accordingly sent out a small boat, took Pompey on board, and rowed for the shore. His wife and friends watched him from the ship, anxious to see in what manner he would be received by the king, who was standing on the edge of the sea with his troops; but just as the boat reached the shore, and Pompey was in the act of rising from his seat in order to step on land, he was stabbed in the back by Septimius, who had formerly been one of his centurions, and was now in the service of the Egyptian monarch. Pompey was killed on the 29th of September, B.C. 48, and had just completed his fifty-eighth year. His head was cut off, and his body, which was thrown out naked on the shore, was buried by his freedman Philippus, who had accompanied him from the ship. The head was brought to Cæsar when he arrived in Egypt soon afterward, but he turned away from the sight, shed tears at the melancholy death of his rival, and put his murderers to death. Pompey's untimely death excites pity; but no one who has well studied the state of parties at the close of the Roman commonwealth can regret his fall. There is abundant evidence to prove that, had Pompey's party gained the mastery, a proscription far more terrible than Sulla's would have taken place, and Italy and the provinces have been divided as booty among a few profligate and unprincipled nobles. From such horrors the victory of Cæsar saved the Roman world. Pompey was married five times. The names of his wives were, 1. Antistia. 2. Æmilia. 3. Mucia. 4. Julia. 5. Cornelia.—11. Cn. POMPEIUS MAGNUS, elder son of the triumvir by his third wife, Mucia. In the civil war in 48 he commanded a squadron of the fleet in the Adriatic Sea. After his father's defeat at Pharsalia, he crossed over to Africa, and, after remaining there a short time, sailed to Spain in 47. In Spain he was joined by his brother Sextus and others of his party, who had fled from Africa after their defeat at Thapsus. Here the two brothers collected a powerful army, but were defeated by Cæsar himself at the battle of Munda, fought on the 17th of March, 45. Cneius escaped from the field of battle, but was shortly afterward taken prisoner and put to death.—12. SEXTUS POMPEIUS MAGNUS, youngest son of the triumvir by his third wife, Mucia, was born 75. After the battle of Pharsalia he accompanied his father to Egypt, and saw him murdered before his eyes. After the battle of Munda and the death of his brother, Sextus lived for a time in concealment in the country of the Iacetani, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees; but when Cæsar quitted Spain, he collected a body of troops, and emerged from his lurking-place. In the civil wars which followed Cæsar's death, the power of Sextus increased. He obtained a large fleet, became master of the sea, and eventually took possession of Sicily. His fleet enabled him to stop all the supplies of corn which were brought to Rome from Egypt and the eastern provinces; and such scarcity began to prevail in the city, that the triumvirs were compelled by the popular discontent to make peace with Pompey. This peace was concluded at Misenum in 39, but the war was renewed in the following year. Octavianus made great efforts to collect a large and powerful fleet, which he placed under the command of Agrippa. In 36, Pompey's fleet was defeated off Naulochus with great loss. Pompey himself fled from Sicily to Lesbos, and from Lesbos to Asia. Here he was taken prisoner by a body of Antony's troops, and carried to Miletus, where he was put to death (35), probably by command of Antony, though the latter sought to throw the responsibility of the deed upon his officers.

POMPĪLŌN (now Pamplona), which name is equivalent to Pompeiopolis, so called by the sons of Pompey, was the chief town of the Vascones in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Asturica to Burdigala.

[POMPILIUS ANDRONICUS, a Syrian by birth, taught rhetoric at Rome in the former half of the century before Christ: being eclipsed by other graminarians, he retired to Cumæ, where he composed many works, the chief one of which was entitled Annalium Ennii Elenchi.]

POMPŌNĪA. 1. Sister of T. Pomponius Atticus, was married to Q. Cicero, the brother of the orator, B.C. 68. The marriage proved an extremely unhappy one. Q. Cicero, after leading a miserable life with his wife for almost twenty-four years, at length divorced her at the end of 45, or in the beginning of the following year.—2. Daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus. She is also called Cæcilia, because her father was adopted by Q. Cæcilius, and likewise Attica. She was born in 51, and she was still quite young when she was married to M. Vipsanius Agrippa. Her daughter Vipsania Agrippina married Tiberius, the successor of Augustus.

POMPŪNÆ PALUDES (Πομπυνίαί λίμναι: now Palude Pontine; in English, the Pontine Marshes), the name of a low, marshy plain on the coast of Latium, between Circæii and Terracina, said to have been so called after an ancient town Pontia, which disappeared at an early period. The plain is about twenty-four miles long, and from eight to ten miles in breadth. The marshes are formed chiefly by the rivers Nymphæus, Ufens, and Amasenus, and some other small streams, which, instead of finding their way into the sea, spread over this plain. Hence the plain is turned into a vast number of marshes, the miasmas arising from which are exceedingly unhealthy in the summer. At an early period, however, they appear not to have existed at all, or, at any rate, to have been confined to a narrow district. We are told that originally there were twenty-three towns situated in this plain; and in B.C. 432, the Pompitinus Ager is mentioned as yielding a large quantity of corn. Even as late as 312, the greater part of the plain must still have been free from the marshes, since the censor Appius Claudius conducted the celebrated Via Appia in that year through the plain, which must then have been sufficiently strong to bear the weight of this road. In the course of a century and a half after this, the marshes had spread to a great extent; and, accordingly, attempts were made to drain them by the consul Cethegus in 160, by Julius Cæsar, and by Augustus. It is usually said that Augustus caused a navigable canal to be dug alongside of the Via Appia from Forum Appii to the grove of Feronia, in order to carry off a portion of the waters of the marshes; but this canal must have been dug before the time of Augustus, since Horace embarked upon it on his celebrated journey from Rome to Brundisium in 37, at which time Octavianus, as he was then called, could not have undertaken any of his public works. Subsequently the marshes again spread over the whole plain, and the Via Appia entirely disappeared; and it was not until the pontificate of Pius VI. that any serious attempt was made to drain them. The works were commenced in 1778, and the greater part of the marshes was drained; but the plain is still unhealthy in the great heats of the summer.

POMPTĪNUS, C., was prætor B.C. 63, when he was employed by Cicero in apprehending the ambassadors of the Allobroges. He afterward obtained the province of Gallia Narbonensis, and in 61 defeated the Allobroges, who had invaded the province. He triumphed in 54, after suing in vain for this honor for some years.

PONS, a common name for stations on the Roman roads at the passage of rivers, some of which stations on the more important roads grew into villages or towns. 1. P. ÆNI (now Pfünzen), in Vindelicia, at the passage of the Inn, was a fortress with a Roman garrison.—2. P. AURĒOLI (now Pontirolo), in Gallia Transpadana, on the road from Bergamum to Mediolanum, derived its name from one of the thirty tyrants, who was defeated and slain by Claudius in this place.—3. P. CAMPANUS, in Campania, between Sinuessa and Urbana, on the Savo. Respecting the bridges of Rome, vid. ROMA.

PONTĪA (now Ponza), a rocky island off the coast of Latium, opposite Formiæ, which was taken by the Romans from the Volscians, and colonized, B.C. 313. Under the Romans, it was used as a place of banishment for state criminals. There is a group of smaller islands round Pontia, which are sometimes called Insulæ Pontiæ.

PONTINUS (Ποντινός), a river and mountain in Argolis, near Lerna, with a sanctuary of Minerva (Athena) Saitis.

PONTIUS, C., son of HERENNIUS PONTIUS, the general of the Samnites in B.C. 321, defeated the Roman army under the two consuls T. Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Postumius Albinus in one of the mountain passes in the neighborhood of Caudium. The survivors, who were completely at the mercy of the Samnites, were dismissed unhurt by Pontius. They had to surrender their arms and to pass under the yoke; and, as the price of their deliverance, the consuls and the other commanders swore, in the name of the republic, to a humiliating peace. The Roman state, however, refused to ratify the treaty. Nearly thirty years afterward, Pontius was defeated by Q. Fabius Gurgus (292), was taken prisoner, and was put to death after the triumph of the consul.

PONTIUS AQUILA. Vid. AQUILA.

PONTIUS PILATUS was the sixth procurator of Judæa, and the successor of Valerius Gratus. He held the office for ten years in the reign of Tiberius, from A.D. 26 to 36, and it was during his government that CHRIST taught, suffered, and died. By his tyrannical conduct he excited an insurrection at Jerusalem, and at a later period commotions in Samaria also, which were not put down without the loss of life. The Samaritans complained of his conduct to Vitellius, the governor of Syria, who deprived him of his office, and sent him to Rome to answer before the emperor the accusations that were brought against him. Eusebius states that Pilatus put an end to his own life at the commencement of the reign of Caligula, worn out by the many misfortunes he had experienced. The early Christian writers refer frequently to an official report, made by Pilatus to the Emperor Tiberius, of the condemnation and death of CHRIST. It is very doubtful whether this document was genuine; and it is certain that the acts of Pilate, as they are called, which are extant in Greek, as well as his two Latin letters to the emperor, are the productions of a later age.

PONTIUS TELESINUS. 1. A Samnite, and commander of a Samnite army, with which he fought against Sulla. He was defeated by Sulla in a hard-fought battle near the Colline gate, B.C. 82. He fell in the fight; his head was cut off, and carried under the walls of Præneste, to let the younger Marius know that his last hope of success was gone.—2. Brother of the preceding, was shut up in Præneste with the younger Marius, when his brother was defeated by Sulla. After the death of the elder Pontius, Marius and Telesinus, finding it impossible to escape from Præneste, resolved to die by one another's hands. Telesinus fell first, and Marius put an end to his own life, or was slain by his slave.

PONTUS (ὁ Πόντος). 1. The northeasternmost district of Asia Minor, along the coast of the Euxine, east of the River Halys, having originally no specific name, was spoken of as the country ἐν Πόντῳ, on the Pontus (Euxinus), and hence acquired the name of Pontus, which is first found in Xenophon's Anabasis. The term, however, was used very indefinitely, until the settlement of the boundaries of the country as a Roman province. Originally it was regarded as a part of CAPPADOCIA; but its parts were best known by the names of the different tribes who dwelt along the coast, and of whom some account is given by Xenophon in the Anabasis. We learn from the legends of the Argonauts, who are represented as visiting this coast, and the Amazons, whose abodes are placed about the River Thermodon, east of the Iris, as well as from other poetical allusions, that the Greeks had some knowledge of these southeastern shores of the Euxine at a very early period. A great accession to such knowledge was made by the information gained by Xenophon and his comrades when they passed through the country in their famous retreat; and long afterward the Romans became well acquainted with it by means of the Mithradatic war, and Pompey's subsequent expedition through Pontus into the countries at the foot of the Caucasus. The name first acquired a political rather than a territorial importance, through the foundation of a new kingdom in it, about the beginning of the fourth century B.C., by ARIOBARZANES I. The history of the gradual growth of this kingdom until, under Mithradates VI., it threatened the Roman empire in Asia, is given under the names of its kings, of whom the following is the list:

(1.) ARIOBARZANES I., exact date unknown: (2.) MITHRADATES I., to B. C. 363: (3.) ARIOBARZANES II., 363-337: (4.) MITHRADATES II., 337-302: (5.) MITHRADATES III., 302-266: (6.) ARIOBARZANES III., 266-240? (7.) MITHRADATES IV., 240-190? (8.) PHARNACES I., 190-156? (9.) MITHRADATES V. EUERGETES, 156-120? (10.) MITHRADATES VI. EUPATOR, 120-63: (11.) PHARNACES II. 63-47. After the death of Pharnaces, the reduced kingdom retained a nominal existence under his son Darius, who was made king by Antony in B.C. 39, but was soon deposed; and under POLEMON I. and POLEMON II., till about A.D. 62, when the country was constituted by Nero a Roman province. Of this province the western boundary was the River Halys, which divided it from Paphlagonia; the furthest eastern limit was the Phasis, which separated it from Colchis; but others carry it only as far as Trapezus, and others to an intermediate point, at the River Acampsis: on the south it was divided from Galatia, Cappadocia, and Armenia Minor by the great chain of the Paryadres and by its branches. It was divided into the three districts of PONTUS GALATICUS, in the west, bordering on Galatia, P. POLEMONIACUS in the centre, so called from its capital POLEMONIUM, and P. CAPPADOCIUS in the east, bordering on Cappadocia (Armenia Minor). In the new division of the provinces under Constantine, these three districts were reduced to two, HELENOPONTUS in the west, so called in honor of the emperor's mother, Helena, and PONTUS POLEMONIACUS in the east. The country was also divided into smaller districts, named from the towns they surrounded and the tribes who peopled them. Pontus was a mountainous country; wild and barren in the east, where the great chains approach the Euxine; but in the west watered by the great rivers HALYS and IRIS and their tributaries, the valleys of which, as well as the land along the coast, are extremely fertile. Besides corn and olives, it was famous for its fruit trees, and some of the best of our common fruits are said to have been brought to Europe from this quarter; for example, the cherry (vid. CERASUS). The sides of the mountains were covered with fine timber, and their lower slopes with box and other shrubs. The eastern part was rich in minerals, and contained the celebrated iron mines of the CHALYBES. Pontus was peopled by numerous tribes, belonging probably to very different races, though the Semitic (Syro-Arabian) race appears to have been the prevailing one, and hence the inhabitants were included under the general name of LEUCOSYRI. The chief of these races are spoken of in separate articles.—[2. The part of Lower Mœsia which lay between the Euxine, the mouths of the Ister, and Mount Hæmus, and forming, therefore, a considerable tract along the shore, was sometimes called Pontus: of this frequent mention is made in the poetry of Ovid. Tomi lay in this district, and Ovid's Epistolæ e Ponto derived their name from this quarter.]

PONTUS EUXINUS, or simply PONTUS (ὁ Πόντος, Πόντος Ἐὐξείνως: τὸ Ποντικὸν πέλαγος, Mare Euxinum: now the Black Sea, Turk. Kara Deñiz, Grk. Maurethalassa, Russ. Tcheriago More or Czarne-More, all names of the same meaning, and supposed to have originated from the terror with which it was at first regarded by the Turkish mariners, as the first wide expanse of sea with which they became acquainted), the great inland sea inclosed by Asia Minor on the south, Colchis on the east, Sarmatia on the north, and Dacia and Thracia on the west, and having no other outlet than the narrow BOSPORUS THRACIUS in its southwestern corner. It lies between 28° and 41° 30' east longitude, and between 41° and 46° 40' north latitude, its length being about seven hundred miles, and its breadth varying from four hundred to one hundred and sixty. Its surface contains more than one hundred and eighty thousand square miles. It receives the drainage of an immense extent of country in Europe and in Asia; but much the greater portion of its waters flows from the former continent by the following rivers: the Ister or Danubius (now Danube), whose basin contains the greater part of central Europe; the Tyras or Danaster (now Dniester), Hypanis or Bogus (now Boug), Borysthenes (now Dnieper), and Tanaïs (now Don), which drain the immense plains of Southern Russia, and flow into the northern side of the Euxine, the last of them (i. e., the Tanaïs) through the Palus Mæotis (now Sea of Azov). The space thus drained is calculated at above eight hundred and sixty thousand square miles, or nearly one fifth of the whole surface of Europe. In Asia, the basin of the Euxine contains, first, the triangular piece of Sarmatia Asiatica between the Tanaïs on the north, the Caucasus on the south, and on the east the Hippici Montes, which form the watershed dividing the tributaries of the Euxine from those of the Caspian; and the waters of this space flow into the Tanaïs and the Palus Mæotis, and the largest of them is the Hypanis or Vardanes (now Kuban), which comes down to the Palus Mæotis and the Euxine at their junction, and divides its waters between them: next we have the narrow strip of land between the Caucasus and the northeastern coast of the sea; then on the east, Colchis, hemmed in between the Caucasus and Moschici Montes, and watered by the Phasis; and lastly, on the south, the whole of that part of Asia Minor which lies between the Paryadres and Antitaurus on the east and southeast, the Taurus on the south, and the highlands of Phrygia on the west, the chief rivers of this portion being the Iris (now Yeshil Irmak), the Halys (now Kizil Irmak), and the Sangarius (now Sakariyeh). The whole of the Asiatic basin of the Euxine is estimated at one hundred thousand square miles. As might be expected from this vast influx of fresh water, the water is much less salt than that of the Ocean. The waters which the Euxine receives from the rivers that flow directly into it, and also from the Palus Mæotis (now Sea of Azov) through the Bosphorus Cimmerius (now Straits of Kaffa or Yenikaleh), find their exit at the southwestern corner, through the Bosphorus Thracius (now Channel of Constantinople), into the Propontis (now Sea of Marmara), and thence in a constant rapid current through the Hellespontus (now Straits of Gallipoli or Dardanelles) into the Ægeum Mare (now Archipelago). The Argonautic and other legends show that the Greeks had some acquaintance with this sea at a very early period. It is said that they at first called it Ἄξεως (inhospitable), from the savage character of the races on its coast, and from the supposed terrors of its navigation, and that afterward, on their favorite principle of euphemism (i. e., abstaining from words of evil omen), they changed its name to Ἐὐξείνως, Ion. Ἐὐξείνως, hospitable. The Greeks of Asia Minor, especially the people of Miletus, founded many colonies and commercial emporiums on its shores, and as early as the Persian wars we find Athens carrying on a regular trade with these settlements in the corn grown in the great plains on its northern side (the Ukraine) and in the Chersonesus Taurica (now Crimea), which have ever since supplied Western Europe with large quantities of grain. The history of the settlements themselves will be found under their several names. The Romans had a pretty accurate knowledge of the sea. An account of its coasts exists in Greek, entitled "Periplus Maris Euxini," ascribed to Arrian, who lived in the reign of Hadrian. VID. ARRIANUS.

POPULŌNIA or -IUM (Populoniensis: Populonia), an ancient town of Etruria, situated on a lofty hill, sinking abruptly to the sea, and forming a peninsula. According to one tradition it was founded by the Corsicans; but according to another it was a colony from Volaterræ, or was taken from the Corsicans by the Volaterrani. It was not one of the twelve Etruscan cities, and was never a place of political importance; but it carried on an extensive commerce, and was the principal sea-port of Etruria. It was destroyed by Sulla in the civil wars, and was in ruins in the time of Strabo. There are still remains of the walls of the ancient Populonia, showing that the city was only about one and a half miles in circumference.

PORCIA. 1. Sister of Cato Uticensis, married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, consul B.C. 54, who was slain in the battle of Pharsalia. She died in 46.—2. Daughter of Cato Uticensis by his first wife Atilia. She was married first to M. Bibulus, consul 59, to whom she bore three children. Bibulus died in 48; and in 45 she married M. Brutus, the assassin of Julius Cæsar. She inherited all her father's republican principles, and likewise his courage and firmness of will. She induced her husband, on the night before the fifteenth of March, to disclose to her the conspiracy against Cæsar's life, and she is reported to have wounded herself in the thigh in order to show that she had a courageous soul, and could be trusted with the secret. She put an end to her own life after the death of Brutus in 42. The common tale was, that her friends, suspecting her design, had taken all weapons out of her way, and that she therefore destroyed herself by swallowing live coals. The real fact may have been that she suffocated herself by the vapor of a charcoal fire, which we know was a frequent means of self-destruction among the Romans.

PORPHYRIÛ, POMPONIÛS, the most valuable among the ancient commentators on Horace. He lived after Festus and Acro. [These scholia are printed in several editions of Horace, the latest is that of G. Braunhard, Lips., 1831, seq., 4 vols. 8vo.]

PORPHYRIÛN (Πορφύριον), one of the giants who fought against the gods. When he attempted to offer violence to Juno (Hera), or to throw the island of Delos against the gods, Jupiter (Zeus) hurled a thunder-bolt at him, and Hercules completed his destruction with his arrows.

PORPHÛRIS (Πορφύρις), an earlier name of the island of NISYRUS.

PORPHÛRIÛS (Πορφύριος), usually called PORPHYRY, the celebrated antagonist of Christianity, was a Greek philosopher of the Neo-Platonic school. He was born A.D. 233, either in Bateana in Palestine or at Tyre. His original name was Melech, the Greek form of the Syrophœnician Melech, a word which signified king. The name Porphyrius (in allusion to the usual color of royal robes) was subsequently devised for him by his preceptor Longinus. After studying under Origen at Cæsarea, and under Apollonius and Longinus at Athens, he settled at Rome in his thirtieth year, and there became a diligent disciple of Plotinus. He soon gained the confidence of Plotinus, and was intrusted by the latter with the difficult and delicate duty of correcting and arranging his writings. Vid.

PLOTINUS. After remaining in Rome six years, Porphyry fell into an unsettled state of mind, and began to entertain the idea of suicide, in order to get free from the shackles of the flesh; but on the advice of Plotinus he took a voyage to Sicily, where he resided for some time. It was during his residence in Sicily that he wrote his treatise against the Christian religion, in fifteen books. Of the remainder of his life we know very little. He returned to Rome, where he continued to teach until his death, which took place about 305 or 306. Late in life he married Marcella, the widow of one of his friends, and the mother of seven children, with the view, as he avowed, of superintending their education. As a writer Porphyry deserves considerable praise. His style is tolerably clear, and not unfrequently exhibits both imagination and vigor. His learning was most extensive. A great degree of critical and philosophical acumen was not to be expected in one so ardently attached to the enthusiastic and somewhat fanatical system of Plotinus. His attempt to prove the identity of the Platonic and Aristotelic systems would alone be sufficient to show this. Nevertheless, his acquaintance with the authors whom he quotes was manifestly far from superficial. His most celebrated work was his treatise against the Christian religion; but of its nature and merits we are not able to judge, as it has not come down to us. It was publicly destroyed by order of the Emperor Theodosius. The attack was sufficiently vigorous to call forth replies from above thirty different antagonists, the most distinguished of whom were Methodius, Apollinaris, and Eusebius. A large number, however, of his works has come down to us, of which his Life of Pythagoras and Life of Plotinus are some of the best known.

PORPHYRIÛS, PUBLILIÛS OPTATIÛS, a Roman poet, who lived in the age of Constantine the Great. He wrote a Panegyric upon Constantine; three Idyllia, namely, 1. Ara Pythia, 2. Syrinx, 3. Organon, with the lines so arranged as to represent the form of these objects; and five Epigrams.

[PORRIMA. Vid. POSTVERTA.]

PORSENA* OF PORSENNA, IARS, king of the Etruscan town of Clusium, marched against Rome at the head of a vast army, in order to restore Tarquinius Superbus to the throne. He took possession of the hill Janiculum, and would have entered the city by the bridge which connected Rome with the Janiculum, had it not been for the superhuman prowess of Horatius Cocles, who kept the whole Etruscan army at bay, while his comrades brok down the bridge behind him. Vid. COYLES. The Etruscans proceeded to lay siege to the city, which soon began to suffer from famine. Thereupon a young Roman, named C. Mucius, resolved to deliver his country by murdering the invading king. He accordingly went over to the Etruscan camp, but, ignorant of the person of Porsena, killed the royal secretary instead. Seized, and threatened with torture, he thrust his right hand into the fire on the altar, and there let it burn, to show how little he heeded pain. Astonished at his courage, the king bade him depart in peace; and Scævola, as he was henceforward called, told him, out of gratitude, to make peace with Rome, since three hundred noble youths had sworn to take the life of the king, and he was the first upon whom the lot had fallen. Porsena thereupon made peace with the Romans and withdrew his troops from the Janiculum

* The quantity of the penultimate is doubtful. It is short in Horace and Martial, but long in Virgil.

after receiving twenty hostages from the Romans. Such was the tale by which Roman vanity consoled one of the earliest and greatest disasters of the city. The real fact is, that Rome was completely conquered by Porsena. This is expressly stated by Tacitus (Hist., iii., 72), and is confirmed by other writers. Pliny tells us that so thorough was the subjection of the Romans that they were expressly prohibited from using iron for any other purpose but agriculture. The Romans, however, did not long remain subject to the Etruscans. After the conquest of Rome, Aruns, the son of Porsena, proceeded to attack Aricia, but was defeated before the city by the united forces of the Latin cities, assisted by the Greeks of Cumæ. The Etruscans appear, in consequence, to have been confined to their own territory on the right bank of the Tiber, and the Romans to have availed themselves of the opportunity to recover their independence.

PORTHΛION (Πορθάων), son of Agenor and Epicaste, was king of Pleuron and Calydon in Ætolia, and married to Euryte, by whom he became the father of CENEUS, Agrius, Alcathous, Melas, Leucopeus, and Sterope.

PORTHMYUS (Πόρθμος), a harbor in Eubœa, belonging to Eretria, opposite the coast of Attica.

PORTUNUS or PORTYMNUS, the protecting genius of harbors among the Romans. He was invoked to grant a happy return from a voyage. Hence a temple was erected to him at the port of the Tiber, from whence the road descended to the port of Ostia. At his temple an annual festival, the Portunalia, was celebrated on the 17th of August. When the Romans became familiar with Greek mythology, Portunus was identified with the Greek Palæmon. Vid. PALÆMON.

PORUS (Πώρος). 1. King of the Indian provinces east of the River Hydaspes, offered a formidable resistance to Alexander when the latter attempted to cross this river, B.C. 327. The battle which he fought with Alexander was one of the most severely contested which occurred during the whole of Alexander's campaigns. Porus displayed great personal courage in the battle; and when brought before the conqueror, he proudly demanded to be treated in a manner worthy of a king. This magnanimity at once conciliated the favor of Alexander, who not only restored to him his dominions, but increased them by large accessions of territory. From this time Porus became firmly attached to his generous conqueror, whom he accompanied to the Hyphasis. In 321 Porus was treacherously put to death by Eudemus, who commanded the Macedonian troops in the adjacent province. We are told that Porus was a man of gigantic stature—not less than five cubits in height; and his personal strength and prowess in war were not less conspicuous than his valor.—2. Another Indian monarch, who, at the time of Alexander's expedition, ruled over the district termed Gandaris, east of the River Hydraotes. His dominions were subdued by Hephæstion, and annexed to those of the preceding Porus, who was his kinsman.

POSEIDON (Ποσειδών), called NEPTŪNUS by the Romans, was the god of the Mediterranean Sea. His name seems to be connected with Πόρος, and ποταμός, according to which he is the god of the fluid element. He was a son of Cronos (Saturn) and Rhea (whence he is called Cronius, and by Latin poets Saturnius). He was accordingly a brother of Zeus (Jupiter), Hades (Pluto), Hera (Juno), Hestia (Vesta), and Demeter (Ceres), and it was determined by lot that he should rule over the sea. Like his brothers and sisters, he was, after his birth, swallowed by his father Cronos (Saturn), but thrown up again. According to others, he was concealed by Rhea, after his birth, among a flock of lambs, and his mother pretended to have given birth to a young horse, which she gave to Cronos (Saturn) to devour. In the Homeric poems Poseidon (Neptune) is described as equal to Zeus (Jupiter) in dignity, but less powerful. He resents the attempts of Zeus (Jupiter) to intimidate him; he even threatens his mightier brother, and once conspired with Hera (Juno) and Athena (Minerva) to put him into chains; but on other occasions we find him submissive to Zeus (Jupiter). The palace of Poseidon (Neptune) was in the depth of the sea near Ægæ in Eubœa, where he kept his horses with brazen hoofs and golden manes. With these horses he rides in a chariot over the waves of the sea, which become smooth as he approaches, and the monsters of the deep recognize him and play around his chariot. Generally he yoked his horses to his chariot himself, but sometimes he was assisted by Amphitrite. Although he generally dwelt in the sea, still he also appears at Olympus in the assembly of the gods. Poseidon (Neptune), in conjunction with Apollo, is said to have built the walls of Troy for Laomedon, whence Troy is called Neptunia Pergama. Laomedon refused to give these gods the reward which had been stipulated, and even dismissed them with threats. Poseidon (Neptune), in consequence, sent a marine monster, which was on the point of devouring Laomedon's daughter, when it was killed by Hercules; and he continued to bear an implacable hatred against the Trojans. He sided with the Greeks in the war against Troy, sometimes witnessing the contest as a spectator from the heights of Thrace, and sometimes interfering in person, assuming the appearance of a mortal hero and encouraging the Greeks, while Zeus (Jupiter) favored the Trojans. In the Odyssey, Poseidon (Neptune) appears hostile to Ulysses, whom he prevents from returning home in consequence of his having blinded Polyphemus, a son of Poseidon (Neptune) by the nymph Thoosa. Being the ruler of the sea (the Mediterranean), he is described as gathering clouds and calling forth storms, but at the same time he has it in his power to grant a successful voyage and save those who are in danger; and all other marine divinities are subject to him. As the sea surrounds and holds the earth, he himself is described as the god who holds the earth (γαιήτορος), and who has it in his power to shake the earth (ἐνοσίχθων, κινήτηρ γῆς). He was further regarded as the creator of the horse. It is said that when Poseidon (Neptune) and Athena (Minerva) disputed as to which of them should give the name to the capital of Attica, the gods decided that it should receive its name from the deity who should bestow upon man the most use ful gift. Poseidon (Neptune) then created the horse, and Athena (Minerva) called forth the olive-tree, in consequence of which the honor was conferred upon the goddess. According to others, however, Poseidon (Neptune) did not create the horse in Attica, but in Thessaly, where he also gave the famous horses to Pelæus. Poseidon (Neptune) was accordingly believed to have taught men the art of managing horses by the bridle, and to have been the originator and protector of horse races. Hence he was also represented on horseback, or riding in a chariot drawn by two or four horses, and is designated by the epithets ἵππιος, ἵππειος, or ἵππιος ἄναξ. He even metamorphosed himself into a horse for the purpose of deceiving Demeter (Ceres). The symbol of Poseidon's (Neptune's) power was the trident, or a spear with three points, with which he used to shatter rocks, to call forth or subdue storms, to shake the earth, and the like. Herodotus states that the name and worship of Poseidon (Neptune) were brought into Greece from Libya; but he was probably a divinity of Pelasgian origin, and originally a personification of the fertilizing power of water, from which the transition to regarding him as the god of the sea was not difficult. The following legends respecting Poseidon (Neptune) deserve to be mentioned. In conjunction with Zeus (Jupiter) he fought against Cronos (Saturn) and the Titans; and in the contest with the Giants he pursued Polybotes across the sea as far as Cos, and there killed him by throwing the island upon him. He further crushed the Centaurs when they were pursued by Hercules, under a mountain in Leucosia, the island of the Sirens. He sued, together with Zeus (Jupiter), for the hand of Thetis; but he withdrew when Themis prophesied that the son of Thetis would be greater than his father. When Ares (Mars) had been caught in the wonderful net by Hephaestus (Vulcan), the latter set him free at the request of Poseidon (Neptune); but the latter god afterward brought a charge against Ares (Mars) before the Areopagus for having killed his son Halirrhothius. At the request of Minos, king of Crete, Poseidon (Neptune) caused a bull to rise from the sea, which the king promised to sacrifice; but when Minos treacherously concealed the animal among a herd of oxen, the god punished Minos by causing his wife Pasiphaë to fall in love with the bull. Poseidon (Neptune) was married to Amphitrite, by whom he had three children, Triton, Rhode, and Benthescyme; but he had also a vast number of children by other divinities and mortal women. His worship extended over all Greece and Southern Italy, but he was more especially revered in Peloponnesus and in the Ionic towns on the coast. The sacrifices offered to him generally consisted of black and white bulls; but wild boars and rams were also sacrificed to him. Horse and chariot races were held in his honor on the Corinthian isthmus. The Panionia, or the festival of all the Ionians near Mycale, was celebrated in honor of Poseidon (Neptune). In works of art, Poseidon (Neptune) may be easily recognized by his attributes, the dolphin, the horse, or the trident, and he was frequently represented in groups along with Amphitrite, Tritons, Nereids, dolphins, the Dioscuri, Palæmon, Pegasus, Bellerophontes, Thalassa, Ino, and Galene. His figure does not present the majestic calm which characterizes his brother Zeus (Jupiter); but as the state of the sea is varying, so also is the god represented sometimes in violent agitation and sometimes in a state of repose. The Roman god Neptunus is spoken of in a separate article.

ΠΟΣΙΔΙΠΠΟΣ (Ποσειδίππος, Ποσιδίππος). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the New Comedy, was a native of Cassandrea in Macedonia. He was reckoned one of the six most celebrated poets of the New Comedy. In time, he was the last of all the poets of the New Comedy. He began to exhibit dramas in the third year after the death of Menander, that is, in B.C. 289. [The fragments of his plays are contained in Meineke's Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. ii., p. 1141-49, edit. minor.]—2. An epigrammatic poet who was probably a different person from the comic poet, though he seems to have lived about the same time. His epigrams formed a part of the Garland of Meleager, and twenty-two of them are preserved in the Greek Anthology.

ΠΟΣΙΔΙΝΙΑ (Ποσειδώνιον), the name of several promontories sacred to Poseidon (Neptune). 1. (Now Punta della Licosa), in Lucania, opposite the island Leucosia, the southern point of the Gulf of Pæstum.—2. In Epirus, opposite the northeast point of Corcyra.—3. (Now Cape Stavros), in Thessaly, forming the western point of the Sinus Pagasæus, perhaps the same as the promontory which Livy (xxxii., 46) calls Zelasium.—4. (Now Cape Helene), the southwestern point of Chios.—5. On the western coast of Caria, between Miletus and the Iassius Sinus, with a town of the same name upon it.—6. On the western coast of Arabia, with an altar dedicated to Poseidon (Neptune) by Ariston, whom Ptolemy had sent to explore the Arabian Gulf.—7. (Now Posseda), a sea-port town in Syria, in the district Cassiotis.

ΠΟΣΙΔΩΝΙΟΝ (Ποσειδώνιον: now Cape Possidini or Kassandhrea), a promontory on the western coast of the peninsula Pallene in Macedonia, not far from Mende.

ΠΟΣΙΔΩΝΙΟΣ (Ποσειδώνιος), a distinguished Stoic philosopher, was a native of Apamea in Syria. The date of his birth is not known with any exactness, but it may be placed about B.C. 135. He studied at Athens under Panætius, after whose death (112) Posidonius set out on his travels. After visiting most of the countries on the coast of the Mediterranean, he fixed his abode at Rhodes, where he became the president of the Stoic school. He also took a prominent part in the political affairs of Rhodes, and was sent as ambassador to Rome in 86. Cicero, when he visited Rhodes, received instruction from Posidonius. Pompey also had a great admiration for Posidonius, and visited him twice, in 67 and 62. To the occasion of his first visit probably belongs the story that Posidonius, to prevent the disappointment of his distinguished visitor, though severely afflicted with the gout, had a long discourse on the topic that pain is not an evil. In 51 Posidonius removed to Rome, and appears to have died soon after at the age of 84. Posidonius was a man of extensive and varied acquirements in almost all departments of human knowledge. Cicero thought so highly of his powers that he requested him to write an account of his consulship. As a physical investigator he was greatly superior to the Stoics generally, attaching himself in this respect rather to Aristotle. His geographical and historical knowledge was very extensive. He cultivated astronomy with considerable diligence. He also constructed a planetary machine, or revolving sphere, to exhibit the daily motions of the sun, moon, and planets. His calculation of the circumference of the earth differed widely from that of Eratosthenes. He made it only one hundred and eighty thousand stadia, and his measurement was pretty generally adopted. None of the writings of Posidonius have come down to us entire. His fragments are collected by Bake, Lugd. Bat., 1810.

POSTUMIA CASTRA (now Salado), a fortress in Hispania Bætica, on a hill near the River Salsum (now Salado).

POSTUMIA GENS, patrician, was one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome. Its members frequently held the highest offices of the state, from the banishment of the kings to the downfall of the republic. The most distinguished family in the gens was that of ALBUS or ALBINUS; but we also find at the commencement of the republic families of the names of Megellus and Tubertus.

POSTUMUS, whose full name was M. Cassianus Latinus Postumus, stands second in the list of the so-called thirty tyrants. Being nominated by Valerian governor of Gaul, he assumed the title of emperor in A. D. 258, while Valerian was prosecuting his campaign against the Persians. Postumus maintained a strong and just government, and preserved Gaul from the devastation of the warlike tribes upon the eastern border. After reigning nearly ten years, he was slain by his soldiers in 267, and Lælianus proclaimed emperor in his stead.

POSTVERTA or POSTVORTA, properly a surname of Carmenta, describing her as turning backward and looking at the past, which she revealed to poets and other mortals. In like manner, the prophetic power, with which she looked into the future, is indicated by the surnames Antevorta, Prorsa (i. e., Proversa), and Porrina. Poets, however, have personified these attributes of Carmenta, and thus describe them as the companions of the goddess.

PŌTAMI or PŌTĀMUS (Ποταμῶς; Ποτάμιος; now Keratia), a demus in the south of Attica, belonging to the tribe Leontis, where the tomb of Ion was shown.

PŌTĀMON (Ποτάμων). 1. A rhetorician of Mytilene, lived in the time of Tiberius Cæsar, whose favor he enjoyed.—2. A philosopher of Alexandria, who is said to have introduced at Rome an eclectic sect of philosophy. He appears to have lived at Rome a little before the time of Plotinus, and to have intrusted his children to the guardianship of the latter.

POTENTIA (Potentinus). 1. A town of Picenum, on the River Flomis, between Ancona and Castellum Firmantum, was made a Roman colony in B. C. 186.—2. (Now Potenza), a town of Lucania, on the Via Popilia, east of Forum Popilii.

POTHINUS, a eunuch, the guardian of the young King Ptolemy, recommended the assassination of Pompey when the latter fled to Egypt, B. C. 48. Pothinus plotted against Cæsar when he came to Alexandria shortly afterward, and was put to death by Cæsar's order.

POTIDÆA (Ποτιδαία; Ποτιδαίτης; now Pinaka), a town in Macedonia, on the narrow isthmus of the peninsula Pallene, was a strongly-fortified place, and one of considerable importance. It was a colony of the Corinthians, and must have been founded before the Persian wars, though the time of its foundation is not recorded. It afterward became tributary to Athens, and its revolt from the latter city in B. C. 432 was one of the immediate causes of the Peloponnesian war. It was taken by the Athenians in 429, after a siege of more than two years, its inhabitants expelled, and their place supplied by Athenian colonists. In 356 it was taken by Philip, who destroyed the city, and gave its territory to the Olynthians. Cassander, however, built a new city on the same site, to which he gave the name of CASSANDRÆA (Κασσανδρεία; Κασσανδρέως), and which he peopled with the remains of the old population and with the inhabitants of Olynthus and the surrounding towns, so that it soon became the most flourishing city in all Macedonia. It was taken and plundered by the Huns, but was restored by Justinian.

POTIDANIA, a fortress in the northeast of Ætolia, near the frontiers of Locris.

POTITIL. Vid. PINARIA GENS.

POTITUS, the name of an ancient and celebrated family of the Valeria gens. This family disappears about the time of the Samnite wars; but the name was revived at a later period by the Valeria gens as a prænomen: thus we find mention of a Potitus Valerius Messala, who was consul suffectus in B. C. 29.

POTNIÆ (Ποτνιαί; Ποτνιεύς), a small town in Bœotia, on the Asopus, ten stadia south of Thebes, on the road to Platææ. The adjective Potniades (sing. Potnias) is an epithet frequently given to the mares which tore to death Glaucus of Potniæ. Vid. GLAUCUS, No. 1.

PRAASPA. Vid. PHRAATA.

PRACTIUS (Πράκτιος; now Borgas or Muskakoi-Su), a river of the Troad, rising in Mount Ida, and flowing into the Hellespont north of Abydus.

PRÆNESTE (Prænestinus; now Palestrina), one of the most ancient towns of Latium, was situated on a steep and lofty hill, about twenty miles southeast of Rome, with which it was connected by a road called Via Prænestina. It was probably a Pelasgic city, but it claimed a Greek origin, and was said to have been founded by Telegonus, the son of Ulysses. It was strongly fortified by nature and by art, and frequently resisted the attacks of the Roman. Together with the other Latin towns, it became subject to Rome, and was at a later period made a Roman colony. It was here that the younger Marius took refuge, and was for a considerable time besieged by Sulla's troops. Præneste possessed a very celebrated and ancient temple of Fortuna, with an oracle, which is often mentioned under the name of Prænestinæ sortes. It also had a temple of Juno. In consequence of its lofty situation, Præneste was a cool and healthy residence in the great heats of summer (frigidum Præneste, Hor., Carm., iii., 4. 22), and was therefore much frequented at that season by the wealthy Romans. The remains of the ancient walls and some other antiquities are still to be seen at Palestrina.

PRÆSUS (Πραισός: Πραΐσιος), an inland town in the east of Crete, belonging to the Eleoeretes, which was destroyed by the neighboring town of Hierapytna.

PRÆTŌRIA AUGUSTA. Vid. AUGUSTA, No. 4.

[PRÆTŪTI, a people of Central Italy, who are often assigned to Picenum, though they were of a different race from the Picentes. Their territory was fertile, and celebrated for its wine. The principal places in their land were Interamna and Hadria (now Atri).]

PRĀS (Πράς, gen. Πραρός: Πράρες), a town of Thessaly, in the west of the district Phthiotis, on the northeastern slope of Mount Narthacius.

PRĀSĪĒ (Πρασιά: Πρασιεύς). 1. OR PRĀSĪA (Πρασία), a town of the Eleuthero-lacones, on the eastern coast of Laconia, was taken and destroyed by the Athenians in the second year of the Peloponnesian war.—2. (Now Prassa), a demus in Attica, south of Stiria, belonging to the tribe Pandionis, with a temple of Apollo.

PRĀSĪAS LACUS (Πρασιάς λίμνη: now Takino), a lake in Thrace, between the Strymon and Nestus, and near the Strymonic Gulf, with silver mines in the neighborhood.

PRĀSĪ, PRĀSĪI, and PARRHĀSĪI (Πράσιοι: Sanscrit Prachinas, i. e., people of the Eastern country), a great and powerful people of India on the Ganges, governed at the time of Seleucus I. by King SANDROCOTTUS. Their capital city was Palibothra (now Patna); and the extent of the kingdom seems to have embraced the whole valley of the Upper Ganges, at least as far down as that city. At a later time the monarchy declined, so that in Ptolemy we only find the name as that of the inhabitants of a small district, called Prasiaca (Πρασιακή), about the River Soa.

PRĀSĪDUS MARE (Πρασώδης θάλασσα or κόλπος), the southwestern part of the Indian Ocean, about the Promontory PRĀSUM.

PRĀSUM (Πράσον ἀκρωτήριον: now Cape Delgado), a promontory on the eastern coast of Africa, in 10½° south latitude, appears to have been the southernmost point to which the ancient knowledge of this coast extended.

PRĀTĪNAS (Πρατίνας), one of the early tragic poets at Athens, whose combined efforts brought the art to its perfection, was a native of Phlius, and was therefore by birth a Dorian. It is not stated at what time he went to Athens; but he was older than Chærilus, and younger than Æschylus, with both of whom he competed for the prize about B.C. 500. The step in the progress of the art which was ascribed to Pratinas was the separation of the satyric from the tragic drama. His plays were much esteemed. Pratinas also ranked high among the lyric as well as the dramatic poets of his age. He may, perhaps, be considered to have shared with his contemporary Iasus the honor of founding the Athenian school of dithyrambic poetry. [The fragments of Pratinas are contained in Wagner's Tragic. Græc. Fragm., p. 7–10.]

PRAXAGŌRAS (Πραξαγόρας), a celebrated physician, was a native of the island of Cos, and lived in the fourth century B.C. He belonged to the medical sect of the Dogmatici, and was celebrated for his knowledge of medical science in general, and especially for his attainments in anatomy and physiology.

PRAXĪAS (Πραξίας), an Athenian sculptor of the age of Phidias, but of the more archaic school of Calamis, commenced the execution of the statues in the pediments of the great temple of Apollo at Delphi, but died while he was still engaged upon the work. His date may be placed about B.C. 448 and onward.

PRAXĪDICE (Πραξιδική), i. e., the goddess who carries out the objects of justice, or watches that justice is done to men. When Menelaus arrived in Laconia, on his return from Troy, he set up a statue of Praxidice near Gythcum, not far from the spot where Paris, in carrying off Helen, had founded a sanctuary of Aphrodite (Venus) Migonitis. Near Haliartus, in Bœotia, we meet with the worship of Praxidicæ, in the plural: they were here called daughters of Oxyges, and their names were Alalcomœnia, Thelxinœa, and Aulis. In the Orphic poets Praxidicæ seems to be a surname of Persephone (Proserpina).

PRAXILLA (Πράξιλλα), of Sicyon, a lyric poetess, who flourished about B.C. 450, and was one of the nine poetesses who were distinguished as the Lyric Muses. Her scholia were among the most celebrated compositions of that species. She belonged to the Dorian school of lyric poetry, but there were also traces of Æolic influence in her rhythms, and even in her dialect. [The fragments of her poems are given in Praxilla Græcænicæ vatis quæ extant residua, Upsala, 1826; and are found also in the collections of Schneidewin and Bergk.]

PRAXĪPHĪNES (Πραξιφάνης), a Peripatetic philosopher, a native either of Mytilene or of Rhodes, was a pupil of Theophrastus, and lived about B.C. 322. Epicurus is said to have been one of his pupils. Praxiphanes paid especial attention to grammatical studies, and is hence named along with Aristotle as the founder and creator of the science of grammar.

PRAXĪTELES (Πραξιτέλης), one of the most distinguished artists of ancient Greece, was both a statuary in bronze and a sculptor in marble. We know nothing of his personal history, except that he was a citizen, if not a native, of Athens, and that his career as an artist was intimately connected with that city. He probably flourished about B.C. 364 and onward. Praxiteles stands, with Scopas, at the head of the later Attic school, so called in contradistinction to the earlier Attic school of Phidias. Without attempting those sublime impersonations of divine majesty in which Phidias had been so inimitably successful, Praxiteles was unsurpassed in the exhibition of the softer beauties of the human form, especially in the female figure. The most celebrated work of Praxiteles was his marble statue of Aphrodite (Venus), which was distinguished from other statues of the goddess by the name of the Cnidians, who purchased it. It was always esteemed the most perfectly beautiful of the statues of the goddess. Many made the voyage to Cnidus to pressly to behold it. So highly did the Cnidians themselves esteem their treasure, that when King Nicomedes offered them, as the price of it, to pay off the whole of their heavy public debt, they preferred to endure any suffering rather than part with the work which gave their city its chief renown. It was afterward carried to Constantinople, where it perished by fire in the reign of Justinian. Praxiteles modelled it from a favorite courtesan named Phryne, of whom he also made more than one portrait statue. Another of the celebrated works of Praxiteles was his statue of Eros. It was preserved at Thespiæ, where it was dedicated by Phryne; and an interesting story is told of the manner in which she became possessed of it. Praxiteles had promised to give Phryne whichever of his works she might choose, but he was unwilling to tell her which of them, in his own opinion, was the best. To discover this, she sent a slave to tell Praxiteles that a fire had broken out in his house, and that most of his works had already perished. On hearing this message, the artist rushed out, exclaiming that all his toil was lost if the fire had touched his Satyr or his Eros. Upon this, Phryne confessed the stratagem, and chose the Eros. This statue was removed to Rome by Caligula, restored to Thespiæ by Claudius, and carried back by Nero to Rome, where it stood in Pliny's time in the schools of Octavia, and it finally perished in the conflagration of that building in the reign of Titus. Praxiteles had two sons, who were also distinguished sculptors, Timarchus and Cephsodotus.

ΠΡΑΧΪΘΗΑ (Πραξιθέα), daughter of Phrasimus and Diogenia, was the wife of Erechtheus, and mother of Cecrops, Pandorus, Metion, Orneus, Procris, Creusa, Chthonia, and Orithyia.

PRÆCIANI, a people in Gallia Aquitania, at the foot of the Pyrenees.

PRÆLIUS LACUS (now Lago di Castiglione), a lake in Etruria, near the coast, near the northern end of which was a small island.

[PRÆMNIS (Πρήμνις). Vid. PRIMIS.]

PRÆPESINTHUS (Πρεπείσινθος), one of the smaller Cyclades, between Oliaros and Siphnos.

[PRÆXASPES (Πρηξάσπης). 1. A Persian, held in the highest esteem and greatly trusted by Cambyses: he was employed by the latter to make away with his brother Smerdis secretly. His fidelity was severely tested on one occasion, when Cambyses, in one of his fits of phrensy, shot the son of Præxaspes through the heart with an arrow before the eyes of his parent to prove that his hand was steady, and that the charge against him of too great fondness for wine was unfounded. When the false Smerdis usurped the throne, Cambyses suspected Præxaspes of treachery, but the latter cleared himself. Subsequently the magi endeavored to gain Præxaspes to their side, but he, pretending at first to favor their views by denying the assassination of Smerdis, declared before the assembled Persians the truth, and exposed the scheme of the magi, and then threw himself from the tower on which he was standing.—2. Son of Aspathines, one of the naval commanders of Xerxes.]

PRÆMIDES, that is, a son of Priam, by which name Hector, Paris, Helenus, Deiphobus, and the other sons of Priam are frequently called.

PRÆIUMS (Πριάμος), the famous king of Troy at the time of the Trojan war. He was a son of Laomedon and Strymo or Placia. His original name is said to have been Podarces, i. e., "the swift-footed," which was changed into Priamus, "the ransomed" (from πρίμαιναι), because he was the only surviving son of Laomedon, and was ransomed by his sister Hesione after he had fallen into the hands of Ilercules. He is said to have been first married to Arisbe, the daughter of Merops, by whom he became the father of Æsacus; but afterward he gave up Arisbe to Hyrtacus, and married Hecuba, by whom he had the following children: Hector, Alexander or Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Pammon, Polites, Antiphus, Hipponous, Polydorus, Troilus, Creusa, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra. By other women he had a great many children besides. According to the Homeric tradition, he was the father of fifty sons, nineteen of whom were children of Hecuba, to whom others add an equal number of daughters. In the earlier part of his reign Priam is said to have supported the Phrygians in their war against the Amazons. When the Greeks landed on the Trojan coast Priam was already advanced in years, and took no active part in the war. Once only did he venture upon the field of battle, to conclude the agreement respecting the single combat between Paris and Menelaus. After the death of Hector, Priam, accompanied by Mercury (Hermes), went to the tent of Achilles to ransom his son's body for burial, and obtained it. His death is not mentioned by Homer, but is related by later poets. When the Greeks entered Troy, the aged king put on his armor, and was on the point of rushing against the enemy, but he was prevailed on by Hecuba to take refuge with herself and her daughters as a suppliant at the altar of Jupiter (Zeus). While he was tarrying in the temple, his son Polites, pursued by Pyrrhus, rushed into the sacred spot, and expired at the feet of his father, whereupon Priam, overcome with indignation, hurled his spear with feeble hand against Pyrrhus, but was forthwith killed by the latter. Virgil mentions (Æn., v., 564) another Priam, a son of Polites, and a grandson of King Priam.

PRÆIANSUS (Πριάνσος: Πριάνσιος, Πριανσιεύς), a town in Crete, on the southern coast, south of Lyctus, confounded by Strabo with Præsus.

PRÆIAPUS (Πριάπος), son of Bacchus (Dionysus) and Venus (Aphrodite). It is said that Venus (Aphrodite), who was in love with Bacchus (Dionysus), went to meet the god on his return from India, but soon abandoned him, and proceeded to Lampsacus on the Hellespont to give birth to the child of the god. Juno (Hera), who was dissatisfied with her conduct, caused her to give birth to a child of extreme ugliness, who was named Priapus. The earliest Greek poets, such as Homer and Hesiod, do not mention this divinity, and it was only in later times that he was honored with divine worship. He was worshipped more especially at Lampsacus on the Hellespont, whence he is sometimes called Hellespontiacus. He was regarded as the promoter of fertility both in vegetation and in all animals connected with an agricultural life; and in this capacity he was worshipped as the protector of flocks of sheep and goats, of bees, of the vine, of all garden produce, and even of fishing. Like other divinities presiding over agricultural pursuits, he was believed to be possessed of prophetic powers, and is sometimes mentioned in the plural. As Priapus had many attributes in common with other gods of fertility, the Orphics identified him with their mystic Bacchus (Dionysus), Mercury (Hermes), Helios, &c. The Attic legends connect Priapus with such sensual and licentious beings as Conisalus, Orphanes, and Tychon. In like manner, he was confounded by the Italians with Mutunus or Muttunus, the personification of the fructifying power in nature. The sacrifices offered to him consisted of the first-fruits of gardens, vineyards, and fields, of milk, honey, cakes, rams, asses, and fishes. He was represented in carved images, mostly in the form of herms, carrying fruit in his garment, and either a sickle or cornucopia in his hand. The herms of Priapus in Italy, like those of other rustic divinities, were usually painted red, whence the god is called ruber or rubicundus.

ΠΡΙΑΨΟΣ (Πρίαπος, Ion. Πρήπος : Πριαπηνός : ruins at Καταβοα). 1. A city of Mysia, on the Propontis, east of Parium, with a small but excellent harbor. It was a colony of the Milesians, and a chief seat of the worship of PRIAPUS. The surrounding district was called ΠΡΙΑΨΙΣ (Πριαψίς) and ΠΡΙΑΨΕΝΕ (Πριαπηνή).—(2. A small island of the Ægean Sea, near Ephesus.)

ΠΡΙΕΝΕ (Πρήνη : Πριηνεύς, Πρήνιος : Priēnus, pl. Priēnenses : ruins at Samsun), one of the twelve Ionian cities on the coast of Asia Minor, stood in the northwestern corner of Caria, at the southern foot of Mount Mycale, and on the northern side of the Sinus Latmicus. Its foundation was ascribed mythically to the Nereid Ægyptus, in conjunction with Cadmeans, from whom it was also called Καδμή. It stood originally on the sea-shore, and had two harbors and a small fleet, but the change in the coast by the alluvial deposits of the Mæander left it some distance inland. It was of much religious importance in connection with the Panionian festival on Mount Mycale, at which the people of Priene took precedence in virtue of their being the supposed descendants of those of Helice in Greece Proper. The city was also celebrated as the birth-place of Bias.

PRIFERNUM, a town of the Vestini, on the eastern coast of Central Italy.

[PRILIS LACUS, called by Cicero LACUS PRELIUS (now Lago di Castiglione), a lake of Etruria, near the city of Rusellæ, and just above the River Æmbrò (now Ombrone).]

[PRIMIS OF PREMNIS (Πρήμις or Πρήμνις). 1. Called Magna, to distinguish it from No. 2, situated near the junction of the Astaboras with the Nile, immediately north of the island of Meroë.—2. (Now Ibrcem, with Egyptian and Roman ruins), on the Nile, further down than No. 1, occupied as a frontier post by the Romans.]

PRIMUS, M. ANTONIUS, a native of Tolosa in Gaul, was condemned of forgery (falsum) in the reign of Nero, was expelled the senate, of which he was a member, and was banished from the city. After the death of Nero (68), he was restored to his former rank by Galba, and appointed to the command of the seventh legion, which was stationed in Pannonia. He was one of the first generals in Europe who declared in favor of Vespasian, and he rendered him the most important services. In conjunction with the governors of Mœsia and Pannonia, he invaded Italy, gained a decisive victory over the Vitellian army at Bedriacum, and took Cremona, which he allowed his soldiers to pillage and destroy. He afterward forced his way into Rome, notwithstanding the obstinate resistance of the Vitellian troops, and had the government of the city till the arrival of Mucianus from Syria. Vid. MUCIANUS, No. 2. We learn from Martial, who was a friend of Antonius Primus, that he was alive at the accession of Trajan.

PRISCIANUS, a Roman grammarian, surnamed Cæsariensis, either because he was born at Cæsarea, or educated there. He flourished about A.D. 450, and taught grammar at Constantinople. He was celebrated for the extent and depth of his grammatical knowledge, of which he has left the evidence in his work on the subject, entitled Commentariorum grammaticorum Libri XVIII., addressed to his friend and patron, the consul Julianus. Other titles are, however, frequently given to it. The first sixteen books treat of the eight parts of speech recognized by the ancient grammarians, letters, syllables, &c. The last two books are on syntax. This treatise soon became the standard work on Latin grammar, and in the epitome of Rabanus Maurus obtained an extensive circulation. The other works of Priscianus still extant are, 1. A grammatical catechism on twelve lines of the Æneid, manifestly intended as a school book. 2. A treatise on accents. 3. A treatise on the symbols used to denote numbers and weights, and on coins and numbers. 4. On the metres of Terence. 5. A translation of the Προγυμνάσματα (Præexercitamenta) of Hermogenes. 6. On the declensions of nouns. 7. A poem on the Emperor Anastasius, in three hundred and twelve hexameters, with a preface in twenty-two iambic lines. 8. A piece De Ponderibus et Mensuris, in verse. 9. An Epitome phænomenon, or De Sideribus, in verse. 10. A free translation of the Periegesis of Dionysius, in one thousand four hundred and twenty-seven lines, manifestly made for the instruction of youth. 11. A couple of epigrams. The best edition of Priscianus is by Krehl, Lips., 1819-20, 2 vols. 8vo.

PRISCIANUS, THEODŌRUS, a physician, and a pupil of Vindicianus, lived in the fourth century after Christ. He is supposed to have lived at the court of Constantinople, and to have attained the dignity of Archiater. He is the author of a Latin work, entitled Rerum Medicarum Libri Quatuor, published in 1532, both at Strasburg and at Basel.

PRISCUS (Πρήσκος), a Byzantine historian, was a native of Panium in Thrace, and was one of the ambassadors sent by Theodosius the Younger to Attila, A.D. 445. He died about 471. Priscus wrote an account of his embassy to Attila, enriched by digressions on the life and reign of that king. The work was in eight books, but only fragments of it have come down to us. Priscus was an excellent and trustworthy historian, and his style was remarkably elegant and pure. The fragments are published, with those of Dexippus and others, by Bekker and Niebuhr, in the Bonn Collection of the Byzantines, 1829, 8vo.

PRISCUS, HELVIDIUS, son-in-law of Thræsea Pætus, and, like him, distinguished by his love of virtue, philosophy, and liberty. He was quaestor in Achaia during the reign of Nero, and tribune of the plebs A.D. 56. When Thræsea was put to death by Nero (66), Priscus was banished from Italy. He was recalled to Rome by Galba (68), but in consequence of his freedom of speech and love of independence, he was again banished by Vespasian, and was shortly afterward put to death by order of this emperor. His life was written by Herennius Senecio at the request of his widow Fannia; and the tyrant Domitian, in consequence of this work, subsequently put Senecio to death, and sent Fannia into exile. Priscus left a son, Helvidius, who was put to death by Domitian.

PRISCUS, SERVILIUS. The Prisci were an ancient family of the Servilia gens, and filled the highest offices of the state during the early years of the republic. They also bore the agnomen of Structus, which is always appended to their name in the East, till it was supplanted by that of Fidenas, which was first obtained by Q. Servilius Priscus Structus, who took Fidenæ in his dictatorship, B.C. 435, and which was also borne by his descendants.

PRISCUS, TARQUINIUS. Vid. TARQUINIUS.

PRIVERNUM (Privernas, -âtis: now Piperno), an ancient town of Latium, on the River Amasenus, belonged to the Volscians. It was conquered by the Romans at an early period, and was subsequently made a colony.

[PRIVERNUS, a Rutulian warrior under Turnus, slain by Capys.]

PROÆRESIUS (Προαίρησιος), a teacher of rhetoric, was a native of Armenia, and was born about A.D. 276. He first studied at Antioch under Ulpian, and afterward at Athens under Julianus. He became at a later time the chief teacher of rhetoric at Athens, and enjoyed a very high reputation. He died in 368, in his ninety-second year.

[PROBA, FALCONIA, a poetess, greatly admired in the Middle Ages, but whose real name and the place of whose nativity are uncertain. Her only production now extant, a Cento Virgilianus, contains narratives in hexameter verse of striking events in the Old and New Testament, expressed in lines and portions of lines derived from the poems of Virgil. The best editions of the Cento Virgilianus are by Meibomius, Helmst., 4to, 1597; and of Kromayer, Hal. Magd., 8vo, 1719.]

PROBALINTHUS (Προβάλινθος: Προβαλίνσιος), a demus in Attica, south of Marathon, belonging to the tribe Pandionis.

PROBATIA (Προβατία), a river of Bœotia, which, after passing through the territory of Trachin, and receiving its tributary the Hereyna, flowed into the Lake Copais.

PROBUS, ÆMILIUS. Vid. NEPOS, CORNELIUS.

PROBUS, M. AURELIUS, Roman emperor A.D. 276-282, was a native of Sirmium in Pannonia, and rose to distinction by his military abilities. He was appointed by the Emperor Tacitus governor of the whole East, and, upon the death of that sovereign, the purple was forced upon his acceptance by the armies of Syria. The downfall of Florianus speedily removed his only rival (vid. FLORIANUS), and he was enthusiastically hailed by the united voice of the senate, the people, and the legions. The reign of Probus presents a series of the most brilliant achievements. He defeated the barbarians on the frontiers of Gaul and Illyricum, and in other parts of the Roman empire, and put down the rebellions of Saturninus at Alexandria, and of Proculus and Bonosus in Gaul. But, after crushing all external and internal foes, he was killed at Sirmium by his own soldiers, who had risen in mutiny against him because he had employed them in laborious public works. Probus was as just and virtuous as he was warlike, and is deservedly regarded as one of the greatest and best of the Roman emperors.

PROBUS, VALERIUS. 1. Of Berytus, a Roman grammarian, who lived in the time of Nero. To this Probus we may assign those annotations on Terence, from which fragments are quoted in the scholia on the dramatist.—2. A Roman grammarian, flourished some years before A. Gellius, and therefore about the beginning of the second century. He was the author of commentaries on Virgil, and possessed a copy of a portion, at least, of the Georgics, which had been corrected by the hand of the poet himself. These are the commentaries so frequently cited by Servius; but the Scholia in Bucolica et Georgica, now extant under the name of Probus, belong to a much later period. This Probus was probably the author of the life of Persius, commonly ascribed to Suetonius. There is extant a work upon grammar, in two books, entitled M. Valerii Probi Grammaticæ Institutiones; but this work was probably not written by either of the preceding grammarians. It is published in the collections of Putschius, Hannov., 1605, and of Lindemann, Lips., 1831.

PROCAS, one of the fabulous kings of Alba Longa, succeeded Aventinus, and reigned twenty-three years: he was the father of Numitor and Amulius.

PROCHÏTA (now Procida), an island off the coast of Campania, near the promontory Misenum, is said to have been torn away by an earthquake either from this promontory or from the neighboring island of Pithecusa or Ænaria [PROCILLA, JULIA, the mother of Agricola.]

[PROCELLIUS, a Roman historian, a contemporary of Cicero. He appears to have written on early Roman history, as Varro quotes his account of the origin of the Curtian Lake, as well as on the later history, as he mentions Pompey's triumph on his return from Africa.]

PROCLE (Προκλής). 1. One of the twin sons of Aristodemus. For details, vid. EURYSTHENES.—[2. Tyrant of Epidaurus, the father of Lysis or Melissa, the wife of Periander. Having revealed to the son of the latter the secret of his mother's death (vid. PERIANDER), he incurred the implacable resentment of Periander, who attacked and captured Epidaurus, and took Procles prisoner.]

PROCLUS (Πρόκλος). 1. Surnamed Diadochus (Διάδοχος), the successor, from his being regarded as the genuine successor of Plato in doctrine, was one of the most celebrated teachers of the Neo-Platonic school. He was born at Byzantium A.D. 412, but was brought up at Xan whus in Lycia, to which city his parents belonged, and which Proclus himself regarded as his native place. He studied at Alexandria under Olympiodorus, and afterward at Athens under Plutarchus and Syrianus. At an early age his philosophical attainments attracted the attention and admiration of his contemporaries. He had written his commentary on the Timæus of Plato, as well as many other treatises, by his twenty-eighth year. On the death of Syrianus, Proclus succeeded him in his school, and inherited from him the house in which he resided and taught. Marinus, in his life of Proclus, records, with intense admiration, the perfection to which his master attained in all virtues. The highest of these virtues were, in the estimation of Marinus, those of a purifying and ascetic kind. From animal food he almost totally abstained; fasts and vigils he observed with scrupulous exactitude. The reverence with which he honored the sun and moon would seem to have been unbounded. He celebrated all the important religious festivals of every nation, himself composing hymns in honor, not only of Grecian deities, but of those of other nations also. Nor were departed heroes and philosophers excepted from this religious veneration; and he even performed sacred rites in honor of the departed spirits of the entire human race. It was, of course, not surprising that such a man should be favored with various apparitions and miraculous interpositions of the gods. He used to tell how a god had once appeared and proclaimed to him the glory of the city. But the still higher grade of what, in the language of the school, was termed the theurgic virtue, he attained by his profound meditations on the oracles, and the Orphic and Chaldaic mysteries, into the profound secrets of which he was initiated by Asclepienia, the daughter of Plutarchus, who alone was in complete possession of the theurgic knowledge and discipline, which had descended to her from the great Nestorius. He profited so much by her instructions as to be able, according to Marinus, to call down rain in a time of drought, to stop an earthquake, and to procure the immediate intervention of Æsculapius to cure the daughter of his friend Archiadas. Proclus died A.D. 485. During the last five years of his life he had become superannuated, his strength having been exhausted by his fastings and other ascetic practices. As a philosopher, Proclus enjoyed the highest celebrity among his contemporaries and successors; but his philosophical system is characterized by vagueness, mysticism, and want of good sense. He professed that his design was not to bring forward views of his own, but simply to expound Plato, in doing which he proceeded on the idea that every thing in Plato must be brought into accordance with the mystical theology of Orpheus. He wrote a separate work on the coincidence of the doctrines of Orpheus, Pythagoras, and Plato. It was much in the same spirit that he attempted to blend together the logical method of Aristotle and the fanciful speculations of Neo-Platonic mysticism. Several of the works of Proclus are still extant. The most important of them consist of Commentaries on Plato, a treatise on various theological and philosophical subjects. There is no complete edition of Proclus. The edition of Cousin (Paris, 6 vols. 8vo, 1820-1827) contains the following treatises of Proclus: On Providence and Fate; On Ten Doubts about Providence; On the Nature of Evil; a Commentary on the Alcibiades, and a Commentary on the Parmenides. The other principal works of Proclus are: On the Theology of Plato, in six books; Theological Elements; a Commentary on the Timæus of Plato; five Hymns of an Orphic character. Several of these have been translated into English by Thomas Taylor. Proclus was also a distinguished mathematician and grammarian. His Commentaries on the first book of Euclid, and on the Works and Days of Hesiod, are still extant.—[2. EUTYCHIUS, a grammarian, who flourished in the second century, born at Sicca, in Africa. He was the instructor of M. Antoninus, and is called the most learned grammarian of his age.]

PROCNE (Πρόκνη), daughter of King Pandion of Athens, and wife of Tereus. Her story is given under TEREUS.

PROCONNĒSUS (Προκόννησος, or Προικόννησος, i. e., Fawn Island, now Marmara), an island of the Propontis (now Sea of Marmara), which takes from it its modern name, off the northern coast of Mysia, northwest of the peninsula of Cyzicus or Dolionis. The latter was also called Proconnesus from πρόξ (fawn), because it was a favorite resort of deer in the fawning season, whence it was also called ELAPHONNESUS (Ἐλαφόννησος, i. e., deer-island); and the two were distinguished by the names of Old and New Proconnesus. The island was celebrated for its marble, and hence its modern name. It was the native place of the poet ARISTEAS.

PROCOPIUS (Προκόπιος). 1. A native of Cilicia, and a relative of the Emperor Julian, served with distinction under Constantius II. and Julian. Having incurred the suspicions of Jovian and of his successor Valens, Procopius remained in concealment for about two years; but in A.D. 365 he was proclaimed emperor at Constantinople, while Valens was staying at Cæsarea in Cappadocia. Both parties prepared for war. In the following year (366) the forces of Procopius were defeated in two great battles. Procopius himself was taken prisoner, and put to death by order of Valens.—2. An eminent Byzantine historian, was born at Cæsarea, in Palestine, about A.D. 500. He went to Constantinople when still a young man, and there obtained so much distinction as an advocate and a professor of eloquence, that he attracted the attention of Belisarius, who appointed him his secretary in 527. In this capacity Procopius accompanied the great hero on his different wars in Asia, Africa, and Italy, being frequently employed in state business of importance, or in conducting military expeditions. Procopius returned with Belisarius to Constantinople a little before 542. His eminent talents were appreciated by the Emperor Justinian, who conferred upon him the title of illustis, made him a senator, and in 562 created him prefect of Constantinople. Procopius died about the same time as Justinian, 565. As an historian, Procopius deserves great praise. His style is good, formed upon classic models, often elegant, and generally full of vigor. His works are: 1. Histories (Ἱστορίαι), in eight books; viz., two On the Persian War, containing the period from 408–553, and treating more fully of the author's own times; two On the War with the Vandals, 395–545; four On the Gothic War, or, properly speaking, only three books, the fourth (eighth) being a sort of supplement containing various matters, and going down to the beginning of 553. It was continued by Agathias till 559. The work is extremely interesting; the descriptions of the habits, &c., of the barbarians are faithful, and done in a masterly style. 2. On the Public Buildings erected by Justinian (Κτίσματα), in six books. A work equally interesting and valuable in its kind, though apparently too much seasoned with flattery of the emperor. 3. Anecdota (Ἀνεκδότα), a collection of anecdotes, some of them witty and pleasant, but others most indecent, reflecting upon Justinian, the Empress Theodora, Belisarius, and other eminent persons. It is a complete Chronique Scandaleuse of the court of Constantinople, from 549 till 562. 4. Orationes, probably extracts from the "History," which is rather overstocked with harangues and speeches. The best edition of the collected works of Procopius is by Dindorf, Bonn, 3 vols. 8vo, 1833–1838; [the best edition of the Anecdota is by Orelli, Lipsiæ, 1827, 8vo.]

PROCRIS (Πρόκρις), daughter of Erechtheus and wife of Cephalus. For details, vid. CΕΡΗΑΛUS.

PROCRUSTES (Προκρούστης), that is, "the Stretcher," a surname of the famous robber Polypemon or Damastes. He used to tie all travellers who fell into his hands upon a bed: if they were shorter than the bed, he stretched their limbs till they were of the same length; if they were longer than the bed, he made them of the same size by cutting off some of their limbs. He was slain by Theseus, on the Cephissus, in Attica. The bed of Procrustes is used proverbially even at the present day.

PROCCULEIUS, C., a Roman eque, one of the friends of Augustus, was sent by the latter, after the victory at Actium, to Antony and Cleopatra. It is of this Procculeius that Horace speaks (Carm., ii., 2). He is said to have divided his property with his brothers (perhaps cousins) Cæpio and Murena, who had lost their property in the civil wars. Procculeius put an end to his life by taking gypsum, when suffering from a disease in the stomach.

PROCULUS, the jurist, was the contemporary of the jurist Nerva the younger, who was probably the father of the Emperor Nerva. The fact that Proculus gave his name to the school or sect (Proculiani or Proculicani, as the name is also written) which was opposed to that of the Sabiniani, shows that he was a jurist of note. Proculus is often cited, and there are thirty-seven extracts from him in the Digest from his eight books of Epistolæ. He appears to have written notes on Labeo. Some writers suppose that Proculus is the Licinius Proculus who was Præfectus Prætorio under Otho.

PROCULUS, JULIUS, a Roman senator, is said, in the legend of Romulus, to have informed the sorrowing Roman people, after the strange departure of their king from the world, that Romulus had descended from heaven and appeared to him, bidding him tell the people to honor him in future as a god under the name of Quirinus.

PRŌDĪCUS (Πρόδικος), the celebrated sophist, was a native of Iulis, in the island of Ceos. He lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war and subsequently; but the date can not be determined either of his birth or of his death. Prodicus came frequently to Athens on the public business of his native city. He was brought forward in the Clouds and the Birds of Aristophanes, which belong respectively to B.C. 423 and 414. Prodicus is mentioned as one of the teachers of Isocrates, and he was alive at the time of the death of Socrates (399). Suidas relates that Prodicus was put to death by the Athenians as a corrupter of the youth, but this statement sounds very suspicious. He is mentioned both by Plato and Xenophon with more respect than the other sophists. Like Protagoras and others, he travelled through Greece, delivering lectures for money, and in this way he amassed a large fortune. He paid especial attention to the correct use of words. We have the substance of one of his lectures preserved by Xenophon in the well-known fable called "The choice of Hercules." When Hercules, as he entered upon manhood, was upon the point of choosing between virtue and vice, there appeared to him two women, the one of dignified beauty, adorned with purity, modesty, and discretion, the other of a voluptuous form, and meretricious look and dress. The latter promised to lead him by the shortest road, without any toil, to the enjoyment of every pleasure. The other, while she reminded him of his ancestors and his noble nature, did not conceal from him that the gods have granted nothing really beautiful and good without toil and labor. The former sought to deter him from the path of virtue by urging its difficulties; the latter impressed upon him the emptiness of pleasure, and the honor and happiness flowing from a life of virtue. Thereupon Hercules decided in favor of virtue.

PROERNA (Πρόερνα), a town of Thessaly, in the western part of the district of Phthiotis, on the western slope of Mount Narthacius, and near the sources of the Apidanus.

PRÆTIDES. Vid. PRÆTUS.

PRÆTUS (Προίτρος), son of Abas and Ocalea, and twin-brother of Acrisius. In the dispute between the two brothers for the kingdom of Argos, Prætus was expelled, whereupon he fled to Iobates, in Lycia, and married Antea or Sthenebæa, the daughter of the latter. With the assistance of Iobates, Prætus was restored to his kingdom, and took Tiryns, which was now fortified by the Cyclopes. Acrisius then shared his kingdom with his brother, surrendering to him Tiryns, Midea, and the coast of Argolis. By his wife, Prætus became the father of three daughters, Lysippe, Iphinoë, and Iphianassa, who are often mentioned under the general name of PRÆTIDES. When these daughters arrived at the age of maturity, they were stricken with madness, the cause of which is differently related. Some say that it was a punishment inflicted upon them by Bacchus (Dionysus) because they had despised his worship; others relate that they were driven mad by Juno (Hera) because they presumed to consider themselves more handsome than the goddess, or because they had stolen some of the gold of her statue. The plensy spread to the other women of Argos; till at length Prætus agreed to divide his kingdom between Melampus and his brother Bias, upon the former promising that he would cure the women of their madness. Melampus then chose the most robust among the young men, gave chase to the mad women, amid shouting and dancing, and drove them as far as Sicyon. During this pursuit Iphinoë died, but the two other daughters were cured by Melampus by means of purifications, and were then married to Melampus and Bias. The place where the cure was effected upon his daughters is not the same in all traditions, some mentioning the well Anigros, others the fountain Clitor in Arcadia, or Lusi in Arcadia. Besides these daughters, Prætus had a son, Megapenthes. When Bellerophon came to Prætus to be purified of a murder which he had committed, the wife of Prætus fell in love with him; but, as Bellerophon declined her advances, she charged him before Prætus with having made improper proposals to her. Prætus then sent Bellerophon to Iobates, in Lycia, with a letter desiring the latter to murder Bellerophon. Vid. BELLEROPHON. According to Ovid (Met., v., 238), Aerisius was expelled from his kingdom by Prætus; and Perseus, the grandson of Acrisius, avenged his grandfather by turning Prætus into stone by means of the head of Medusa.

PROMËTHEUS (Προμηθεύς), son of the Titan Iapetus and Clymene, and brother of Atlas, Menœtius, and Epimetheus. His name signifies "forethought," as that of his brother Epimetheus denotes "afterthought." Once in the reign of Jupiter (Zeus), when gods and men were disputing with one another at Mecone (afterward Sicyon), Prometheus, with a view of deceiving Jupiter (Zeus), cut up a bull and divided it into two parts: he wrapped up the best parts and the intestines in the skin, and at the top he placed the stomach, which is one of the worst parts, while the second heap consisted of the bones covered with fat. When Jupiter (Zeus) pointed out to him how badly he had made the division, Prometheus desired him to choose; but Jupiter (Zeus), in his anger, and seeing through the stratagem of Prometheus, chose the heap of bones covered with the fat. The father of the gods avenged himself by withholding fire from mortals, but Prometheus stole it in a hollow tube (νάρθηξ, ferula). Jupiter (Zeus) thereupon chained Prometheus to a pillar, where an eagle consumed in the daytime his liver, which was restored in each succeeding night. Prometheus was thus exposed to perpetual torture; but Hercules killed the eagle and delivered the sufferer, with the consent of Jupiter (Zeus), who in this way had an opportunity of allowing his son to gain immortal fame. Further in order to punish men, Jupiter (Zeus) gave Pandora as a present to Epimetheus, in consequence of which diseases and sufferings of every kind befell mortals. (For details, vid. PANDORA.) This is an outline of the legend about Prometheus, as contained in the poems of Hesiod. Æschylus, in his trilogy Prometheus, added various new features to this legend. Although Prometheus belonged to the Titans, he is nevertheless represented by Æschylus as having assisted Jupiter (Zeus) against the Titans. But when Jupiter (Zeus) wanted to extirpate the whole race of man, whose place he proposed to fill by an entirely new race of beings, Prometheus prevented the execution of the scheme, and saved mankind from destruction. Prometheus further deprived them of their knowledge of the future, and gave them hope instead. He taught them the use of fire, made them acquainted with architecture, astronomy, mathematics, writing, the treatment of domestic animals, navigation, medicine, the art of prophecy, working in metal, and all the other arts. But, as he had acted in all these things contrary to the will of Jupiter (Zeus), the latter ordered Vulcan (Hephestus) to chain him to a rock in Scythia, which was done in the presence of Cratos and Bia, two ministers of Jupiter (Zeus). Prometheus, however, still continued to defy Jupiter (Zeus), and declared that it was the decree of fate, by which Jupiter (Zeus) was destined to be dethroned by his own son. As Prometheus steadfastly refused to give any explanation of this decree, Jupiter (Zeus) hurled him into Tartarus, together with the rock to which he was chained. After the lapse of a long time, Prometheus returned to the upper world, to endure a fresh course of suffering, for he was now fastened to Mount Caucasus, and his liver devoured by an eagle, as related in the Hesiodic legend. This state of suffering was to last until some other god, of his own accord, should take his place, and descend into Tartarus for him. This came to pass when Chiron, who had been incurably wounded by an arrow of Hercules, desired to go into Hades; and Jupiter (Zeus) allowed him to supply the place of Prometheus. According to others, however, Jupiter (Zeus) himself delivered Prometheus, when the Titan was at length prevailed upon to reveal to Jupiter (Zeus) the decree of fate, which was, that if he should become by Thetis the father of a son, that son should deprive him of the sovereignty. There was also a legend which related that Prometheus had created man out of earth and water, either at the very beginning of the human race, or after the flood of Deucalion, when Jupiter (Zeus) is said to have ordered him and Minerva (Athena) to make men out of the mud, and the winds to breathe life into them. Prometheus is said to have given to men a portion of all the qualities possessed by the other animals (Hor., Carm., i., 16, 13). The kind of earth out of which Prometheus formed men was shown in later times near Panopens in Phœcis. In the legend of Prometheus, he often appears in connection with Minerva (Athena). Thus he is said to have been punished on Mount Caucasus for the criminal love he entertained for her; and he is further said, with her assistance, to have ascended into heaven, and there secretly to have lighted his torch at the chariot of Helios, in order to bring down the fire to man. At Athens Prometheus had a sanctuary in the Academy, from whence a torch-race took place in honor of him.

ΠΡΩΜΟΝΑ (Πρωμόνα: now Petrovacz, on Mount Promina), a mountain fortress in the interior of Dalmatia.

[PROMULUS, a Trojan warrior, slain by Turnus in Italy.]

ΠΡΩΝΑΪΔΗΣ (Προναΐδης), an Athenian, is said to have been the teacher of Homer. He is enumerated among those who used the Pelagic letters, before the introduction of the Phœnician, and is characterized as a graceful composer of song.

ΠΡΩΝΑΧ (Πρωναξ), son of Talaus and Lysimache, brother of Adrastus and Eriphyle, and father of Lycurgus and Amphithea. According to some traditions, the Nemean games were instituted in honor of Pronax.

ΠΡΩΝΝΙ (Πρόννοι. Προναίος), a town on the eastern coast of Cephallenia, and one of the four towns of the island.

ΠΡΩΝΟΜΟΣ (Πρόνομος), of Thebes, son of Œniadas, was one of the most distinguished auletic musicians of Greece at the time of the Peloponnesian war. He was the instructor of Alcibiades in flute-playing. He invented a new sort of flute, the compass of which was such that melodies could be played upon it in all the three modes of music, the Dorian, the Phrygian, and the Lydian, for each of which, before this invention, a separate flute had been necessary.

ΠΡΩΝΟΣ (Πρόνος). 1. Son of Phegeus, and brother of Agenor, in conjunction with whom he slew Alcæmon. (For details, vid. ΑΓΕΝΟΡ and ΑΛΚΜΕΩΝ.)—[2. A Trojan warrior, slain by Patroclus in the Trojan war.]

ΠΡΩΝΩΒΑ, a surname of Juno among the Romans, describing her as the deity presiding over marriage.

PROPERTIUS, SEX. AURELIUS, the Roman poet, was probably born about B.C. 51. He tells us that he was a native of Umbria, where it borders on Etruria, but nowhere mentions the exact spot. He was not descended from a family of any distinction (ii., 24, 37), and he was deprived of his paternal estate by an agrarian division, probably that in 36, after the Sicilian war. At the time of this misfortune he had not yet assumed the togâ virilis, and was therefore under sixteen years of age. He had already lost his father, who, it has been conjectured, was one of the victims sacrificed after the taking of Perugia; but this notion does not rest on any satisfactory grounds. We have no account of Propertius's education; but from one of his elegies (iv., 1) it would seem that he was destined to be an advocate, but abandoned the profession for that of poetry. The history of his life, so far as it is known to us, is the history of his amours, nor can it be said how much of this is fiction. He began to write poetry at a very early age, and the merit of his productions soon attracted the attention and patronage of Mæcenas. This was most probably shortly after the death of Antony in 30, when Propertius was about 21. It was probably in 32 or 31 that Propertius first became acquainted with his Cynthia. She was a native of Tibur, and her real name was Hostia. As Propertius (iii., 20, 8) alludes to her doctus avus, it is probable that she was a grand-daughter of Hostius, who wrote a poem on the Histric war. Vid. HOSTIUS. She seems to have inherited a considerable portion of the family talent, and was herself a poetess, besides being skilled in music, dancing, and needle-work. It appears that Propertius subsequently married, probably after Cynthia's death, and left legitimate issue, since the younger Pliny twice mentions Passienus Paulus as descended from him. This must have been through the female line. The year of Propertius's death is altogether unknown. Propertius resided on the Esquiline, near the gardens of Mæcenas. He seems to have cultivated the friendship of his brother poets, as Ponticus, Bassus, Ovid, and others. He mentions Virgil (ii., 34, 63) in a way that shows he had heard parts of the Æneid privately recited. But though he belonged to the circle of Mæcenas, he never once mentions Horace. He is equally silent about Tibullus. His not mentioning Ovid is best explained by the difference in their ages; for Ovid alludes more than once to Propertius, and with evident affection. As an elegiac poet, a high rank must be awarded to Propertius, and among the ancients it was a disputed point whether the preference should be given to him or to Tibullus. To the modern reader, however, the elegies of Propertius are not nearly so attractive as those of Tibullus. This arises partly from their obscurity, but in a great measure, also, from a certain want of nature in them. The fault of Propertius was too pedantic an imitation of the Greeks. His whole ambition was to become the Roman Callimachus (iv., 1, 63), whom, as well as Philetas and other of the Greek elegiac poets, he made his model. He abounds with obscure Greek myths, as well as Greek forms of expression, and the same pedantry infects even his versification. Tibullus generally, and Ovid almost invariably, close their pentameter with a word contained in an iambic foot; Propertius, especially in his first book, frequently ends with a word of three, or four, or even five syllables. The best editions of Propertius are by Burmann, Utrecht, 1780; by Kuinoel, Leipzig, 1804; by Lachmann, Leipzig, 1816; and by Hertzberg, Halle, 1844, 1845.

ΠΡΟΠΗΘΑΣΙΑ (Προφθασία: now probably Peshavarun), the northernmost city of Drangiana, on the borders of Asia, was probably the place where PHILotas was put to death.

ΠΡΟΠΟΝΤΙΣ (ἡ Προποντις: now Sea of Marmara), so called from its position with reference to the Pontus (Euxinus), and thus more fully described as ἡ πρὸ τοῦ Πόντου τοῦ Ἐὐξείνου θάλασσα, and "Vestibulum Ponti," is the small sea which united the Euxine and the Ægean (vid. PONTUS EUXINUS), and divides Europe (Thracia) from Asia (Mysia and Bithynia). It is of an irregular oval shape, running out to the east into two deep gulfs, the Sinus Astaceenus (now Gulf of Ismid) and the Sinus Cianus (now Gulf of Modonia), and containing several islands. It received the waters of the Ῥῆνυ δακτύου and other rivers of Eastern Mysia and Western Bithynia, flowing from Mount Ida and Olympus; and several important Greek cities stood on its shores, the chief of which were BYZANTIUM and HERACLEA PERINTHUS on the north, and Cyzicus on the south. Its length is calculated by Herodotus at one thousand four hundred stadia (one hundred and forty geographical miles) and its greatest breadth at five hundred stadia (fifty geographical miles), which is very near the truth.

PROSPALTA (τὰ Πρόσπαλτα: Προσπάλιτος), a demus in the south of Attica, belonging to the tribe Acamantis.

PROSPER, a celebrated ecclesiastical writer, was a native of Aquitania, and flourished during the first half of the fifth century. He distinguished himself by his numerous writings in defence of the doctrines of Augustine against the attacks of the Semipelagians. Many of his theological works are extant; and there are two Chronicles bearing his name: 1. Chronicon Consulare, extending from A.D. 379, the date at which the chronicle of Jerome ends, down to 455, the events being arranged according to the years of the Roman consuls. We find short notices with regard to the Roman emperors, the Roman bishops, and political occurrences in general, but the troubles of the Church are especially dwelt upon, and, above all, the Pelagian heresy. 2. Chronicon Imperiale, comprehended within the same limits as the preceding (379-455), but the computations proceed according to the years of the Roman emperors, and not according to the consuls. While it agrees with the Chronicon Consulare in its general plan, it differs from it in many particulars, especially in the very brief allusions to the Pelagian controversy, and in the slight, almost disrespectful notices of Augustine. The second of these Chronicles was probably not written by Prosper of Aquitania, and is assigned by most critics to Prosper Tiro, who, it is imagined, flourished in the sixth century. There are likewise several poems which have come down to us under the name of Prosper. The best edition of Prosper's works is the Benedictine, Paris, 1711.

PROSYMNA (Πρόσμυνα: Προσυμναίος), an ancient town of Argolis, with a temple of Juno (Hera), north of Argos.

PRŌTA (Πρότα: now Prote), an island in the Propontis, near Chalcedon.

PROTAGŌRAS (Πρωταγόρας), a celebrated sophist, was born at Abdera, in Thrace, probably about B.C. 480, and died about 411, at the age of nearly seventy years. It is said that Protagoras was once a poor porter, and that the skill with which he had fastened together, and poised upon his shoulders, a large bundle of wood, attracted the attention of Democritus, who conceived a liking for him, took him under his care, and instructed him in philosophy. This well-known story, however, appears to have arisen out of the statement of Aristotle, that Protagoras invented a sort of porter's knot for the more convenient carrying of burdens. In addition to which, Protagoras was about twenty years older than Democritus. Protagoras was the first who called himself a sophist, and taught for pay; and he practiced his profession for the space of forty years. He must have come to Athens before B.C. 445, since he drew up a code of laws for the Thurians, who left Athens for the first time in that year.

Whether he accompanied the colonists to Thurii, we are not informed; but at the time of the plague (430) we find him again in Athens. Between his first and second visit to Athens, he had spent some time in Sicily, where he had acquired great fame, and he brought with him to Athens many admirers out of other Greek cities through which he had passed. His instructions were so highly valued that he sometimes received one hundred minæ from a pupil; and Plato says that Protagoras made more money than Phidias and ten other sculptors. In 411 he was accused of impiety by Pythodorus, one of the Four Hundred. His impeachment was founded on his book on the gods, which began with the statement: "Respecting the gods, I am unable to know whether they exist or do not exist." The impeachment was followed by his banishment, or, as others affirm, only by the burning of his book. Protagoras wrote a large number of works, of which the most important were entitled Truth (Ἀλήθεια), and On the Gods (Περὶ Θεῶν). The first contained the theory refuted by Plato in the Theætetus. Plato gives a vivid picture of the teaching of Protagoras in the dialogue that bears his name. Protagoras was especially celebrated for his skill in the rhetorical art. By way of practice in the art, he was accustomed to make his pupils discuss Theses (communes loci); an exercise which is also recommended by Cicero. He also directed his attention to language, and endeavored to explain difficult passages in the poets.

[PROTEAS (Πρωτεύς). 1. An Athenian general in the time of the Peloponnesian war, the son of Epicles. He was one of the three commanders of the squadron sent out to assist the Coreyreans in their contest with the Corinthians. Again, in the first year of the Peloponnesian war, Proteas was one of the three commanders of the fleet of one hundred ships sent round Peloponnesus.—2. Son of Andronicus, a Macedonian officer in the service of Antipater.]

PROTESĪLAUS (Πρωτεσίλαος), son of Iphiclus and Astyoche, belonged to Phylace in Thessaly. He is called Phylacius and Phylacides, either from his native place, or from his being a grandson of Phylacus. He led the warriors of several Thessalian places against Troy, and was the first of all the Greeks who was killed by the Trojans, being the first who leaped from the ships upon the Trojan coast. According to the common tradition, he was slain by Hector. Protesilaus is most celebrated in ancient story for the strong affection existing between him and his wife Laodamia, the daughter of Acastus. (For details, vid. LAODAMIA.) His tomb was shown near Eleus, in the Thracian Chersonesus, where a magnificent temple was erected to him. There was a belief that nymphs had planted elm-trees around his grave, which died away when they had grown sufficiently high to see Troy, and that fresh shoots then sprang from the roots. There was also a sanctuary of Protesilaus at Phylace, at which funeral games were celebrated.

PROTEUS (Πρωτεύς), the prophetic old man of the sea, is described in the earliest legends as a subject of Neptune (Poseidon), whose flocks (the seals) he tended. According to Homer, he resided in the island of Pharos, at the distance of one day's sail from the River Ægyptus (Nile); whereas Virgil places his residence in the island of Carpathos, between Crete and Rhodes. At midday Proteus rose from the sea, and slept in the shadow of the rocks of the coast, with the monsters of the deep lying around him. Any one wishing to learn from him the future, was obliged to catch hold of him at that time; as soon as he was seized, he assumed every possible shape, in order to escape the necessity of prophesying; but whenever he saw that his endeavors were of no avail, he resumed his usual form, and told the truth. After finishing his prophecy he returned into the sea. Homer ascribes to him a daughter Idothea. Another set of traditions describes Proteus as a son of Neptune (Poseidon), and as a king of Egypt, who had two sons, Telegonus and Polygonus or Tmolus. His Egyptian name is said to have been Cetes, for which the Greeks substituted that of Proteus. His wife is called Psamathe or Torone, and, besides the above-mentioned sons, Theoclymenus and Theonoë are likewise called his children. He is said to have hospitably received Bacchus (Dionysus) during his wanderings. Mercury (Hermes) brought to him Helena after her abduction, or, according to others, Proteus himself took her from Paris, gave to the lover a phantom, and restored the true Helen to Menelaus after his return from Troy.

[PROTHOENOR (Προθόηνωρ), a son of Areilycus, was one of the leaders of the Boeotians against Troy, where he was slain by Polydamas.]

[PROTHOUS (Πρόθοος), a son of Tenthredon, commander of the Magnetes who dwelt about Mount Pelion and the River Peneus, was one of the Greek heroes at Troy.]

[PROTO (Πρωτό), one of the Nereids.]

PROTŒGENES (Πρωτογένης), a celebrated Greek painter. He was a native of Caunus, in Caria, a city subject to the Rhodians, and flourished B.C. 332-300. He resided at Rhodes almost entirely; the only other city of Greece which he is said to have visited is Athens, where he executed one of his great works in the Propylæa. Up to his 50th year he is said to have lived in poverty and in comparative obscurity, supporting himself by painting ships, which at that period used to be decorated with elaborate pictorial devices. His fame had, however, reached the ears of Apelles, who, upon visiting Rhodes, made it his first business to seek out Protogenes. As the surest way of making the merits of Protogenes known to his fellow-citizens, Apelles offered him, for his finished works, the enormous sum of fifty talents apiece, and thus led the Rhodians to understand what an artist they had among them. Protogenes was distinguished by the care with which he wrought up his pictures. His master-piece was the picture of Ialysus, the tutelary hero of Rhodes, on which he is said to have spent seven years, or even, according to another statement, eleven; and to have painted it four times over. This picture was so highly prized, even in the artist's lifetime, that when Demetrius Poliorcetes was using every effort to subdue Rhodes, he refrained from attacking the city at its most vulnerable point, lest he should injure this picture, which had been placed in that quarter. There is a celebrated story about this picture, relating to the accidental production of one of the most effective parts of it, the foam at the mouth of a tired hound. The artist, it is said, dissatisfied with his repeated attempts to produce the desired effect, at last, in his vexation, dashed the sponge, with which he had repeatedly effaced his work, against the faulty place; and the sponge, charged as it was by repeated use with the necessary colors, left a mark in which the painter recognized the very foam which his art had failed to produce.

PROTŒGENIA (Πρωτογένεια), daughter of Deucalion and Pyrrha, and wife of Loerus; but Jupiter (Zeus) carried her off, and became by her the father of Opus.

[PROTOMACHUS (Πρωτόμαχος), an Athenian commander at the battle of the Arginusæ, had charge of the right wing, and defeated the enemy. He retired into voluntary exile to avoid the action brought at Athens against the commanders in that battle.]

PRŒXENUS (Πρόξενος), a Bœotian, was a disciple of Gorgias, and a friend of Xenophon. Being connected by the ties of hospitality with the younger Cyrus, the latter engaged him in his service. He was seized by Tissaphernes and put to death, with the other Greek generals. It was at the invitation of Proxenus that Xenophon was induced to enter the service of Cyrus.

PRUDENTIUS, AURÉLIUS CLEMENS, the earliest of the Christian poets of any celebrity, was a native of Spain, and was born A.D. 348. After practicing as an advocate, and discharging the duties of a civil and criminal judge in two important cities, he received from the Emperor Theodosius, or Honorius, a high military appointment at court; but as he advanced in years, he became sensible of the emptiness of worldly honor, and earnest in the exercises of religion. His poems are composed in a great variety of metres, but possess little merit either in expression or in substance. The Latinity is impure, abounding both in words altogether barbarous, and in classical words employed in a barbarous sense; and the author is totally ignorant or regardless of the common laws of prosody. The best editions of Prudentius are by Arevalus, Rom., 1788 and 1789, 2 vols. 4to., and by Obbarius, Tubing., 1845, 8vo.

PRŒSA or PRŒSIAS (Πρωσία: Προουσιεύς). 1. P. AD OLYMPUM (Π. ἢ ἐπὶ τῷ Ὀλύμπῳ: now Brusa), a great city of Bithynia, on the northern side of Mount Olympus, fifteen Roman miles from Cius and twenty-five from Nicæa, was built by Prusias, king of Bithynia, or, according to some, by Hannibal.—2. Some writers distinguish from this a smaller city, called P. AD HYPPIUM or HYPPIUM (πρὸς τῷ Ἰππίῳ ποταμῷ Ptol.; sub Hypio monte, Plin.), which stood northwest of the former, and was originally called CIERUS (Κίερος), and belonged to the territory of Heraclea, but was conquered by Prusias, who named it after himself. It stood northwest of the former. Perhaps it is only another name for Cius.

PRŒSIAS (Πρωσίας). 1. I. King of Bithynia from about B.C. 228 to 180, though the date neither of his accession nor of his death is exactly known. He was the son of Zieles, whom he succeeded. He appears to have been a monarch of vigor and ability, and raised his kingdom of Bithynia to a much higher pitch of power and prosperity than it had previously attained. It was at his court that Hannibal took refuge; and when the Romans demanded the surrender of the Carthaginian general, the king basely gave his consent, and Hannibal only escaped falling into the hands of his enemies by a voluntary death.—2. II. King of Bithynia, son and successor of the preceding, reigned from about 180 to 149. He courted assiduously the alliance of the Romans. He carried on war with Attalus, king of Pergamus, with whom, however, he was compelled by the Romans to conclude peace in 154. He was slain in 149 by order of his son Nicomedes, as is related in the life of the latter. Vid. NICOMEDES, No. 2. Prusias is described to us as a man in whom personal deformity was combined with a character the most vicious and degraded. His passion for the chase is attested by the epithet of the "Huntsman" (Κυνηγός).

PRYMNESIA or PRYMNEUS (Πρυμνησία, Πρυμνησός, Πρυμνησός: ruins at Scid-el-Ghazi), a city in the north of Phrygia, which appears, from its coins, to have been a chief seat of the worship of Midas as a hero.

PRYTANIS (Πρύτανις), king of Sparta, of the Proclid line, was the son of Eurypon, and fourth king of that race.

[PSAMATHE (Ψαμάθη). 1. Daughter of Nereus and Doris, by Æacus mother of Phocus.—2. Daughter of Crotopus in Argos, mother of Linus.]

PSAMATHUS (Ψαμαθός, -οὔνητος: Ψαμμαθούνητος, Ψαμμαθούσιος), a sea-port town in Laconia, near the promontory Tenarus.

PSAMMENITUS (Ψαμμήνιτος), king of Egypt, succeeded his father Amasis in B.C. 526, and reigned only six months. He was conquered by Cambyses in 525, and his country made a province of the Persian empire. His life was spared by Cambyses, but as he was detected shortly afterward in endeavoring to excite a revolt among the Egyptians, he was compelled to put an end to his life by drinking bull's blood.

PSAMMIS (Ψάμμις), king of Egypt, succeeded his father Necho, and reigned from B.C. 601 to 595. He carried on war against Æthiopia, and died immediately after his return from the latter country. He was succeeded by his son Apries.

PSAMMITICHUS or PSAMMETICUS (Ψαμμίτιχος or Ψαμμήτιχος), the Greek form of the Egyptian PSAMETIK, a king of Egypt, and founder of the Saitic dynasty, reigned from B.C. 671 to 617. He was originally one of the twelve kings who obtained an independent sovereignty in the confus: n which followed the death of Setho. Having been driven into banishment by the other kings, he took refuge in the marshes; but shortly afterward, with the aid of some Ionian and Carian pirates, he conquered the other kings, and became sole ruler of Egypt. He provided a settlement for his Greek mercenaries on the Pelusiac or eastern branch of the Nile, a little below Bubastis, and he appears to have mainly relied upon them for the maintenance of his power. In order to facilitate intercourse between the Greeks and his other subjects, he ordered a number of Egyptian children to live with them, that they might learn the Greek language; and from them sprung the class of interpreters. The employment of foreign mercenaries by Psammitichus gave great offence to the military caste in Egypt; and being indignant at other treatment which they received from him, they emigrated in a body of two hundred and forty thousand men into Æthiopia, where settlements were assigned to them by the Æthiopian king. It must, therefore, have been chiefly with his Ionian and Carian troops that Psammitichus carried on his wars against Syria and Phœnicia. He laid siege to the city of Azotus (the Ashdod of Scripture) for twenty-nine years, till he took it. As Psammitichus had displeased a large portion of his subjects by the introduction of foreigners, he seems to have paid especial court to the priesthood. He built the southern propylæa of the temple of Vulcan (Hephæstus) at Memphis, and a splendid aula, with a portico round it, for the habitation of Apis, in front of the temple.

[PSAPHIS (Ψαφίς, now Calano according to Leake), the northernmost demus of Attica.]

PSELCIS (Ψελκίς: ruins at Dakke or Dekkeh), the chief city in the Dodecaschœnus, that is, the northern part of Æthiopia, which was adjacent to Egypt, to which it was regarded by the Romans as belonging. The city stood on the western bank of the Nile, between Syene and Tachompo, the latter of which was so far eclipsed by Pselcis as to acquire the name of Contrapselcis. Under the later empire, Pselcis was garrisoned by a body of German horsemen.

PSSELLUS (Ψέλλος). 1. MICHAEL PSELLUS, the elder, of Andros, flourished in the ninth century after Christ. He was a learned man, and an eager student of the Alexandrian philosophy. He was probably the author of some of the works which are ascribed to the younger Pselcus. — 2. MICHAEL CONSTANTIUS PSELLUS, the younger, a far more celebrated person, flourished in the eleventh century of our era. He was born at Constantinople 1020, and lived at least till 1105. He taught philosophy, rhetoric, and dialectics at Constantinople, where he stood forth as almost the last upholder of the falling cause of learning. The emperors honored him with the title of Prince of the Philosophers. His works are both in prose and poetry, on a vast variety of subjects, and distinguished by an eloquence and taste which are worthy of a better period. They are too numerous to be mentioned in this place.

PSÖRIS (Ψωρίς: Ψωρίδιος: now Khan of Tripotamo), a town in the northwest of Arcadia, on the River Erymanthus, is said to have been originally called PHŒGIA. It sided with the Ætolians against the Achæans, but was taken B.C. 219 by Philip, king of Macedonia, who was then in alliance with the Achæans.

PSÛCHĒ (Ψυχή), "the soul," occurs, in the later times of antiquity, as a personification of the human soul. Psyche was the youngest of the three daughters of a king, and excited by her beauty the jealousy and envy of Venus. In order to avenge herself, the goddess ordered Cupid or Amor to inspire Psyche with a love for the most contemptible of all men; but Cupid was so stricken with her beauty that he himself fell in love with her. He accordingly conveyed her to a charming spot, where, unseen and unknown, he visited her every night, and left her as soon as the day began to dawn. Psyche might have continued to enjoy this state of happiness if she had attended to the advice of her lover, who told her never to give way to her curiosity, or to inquire who he was. But her jealous sisters made her believe that in the darkness of night she was embracing some hideous monster, and accordingly once, while Cupid was asleep, she drew near to him with a lamp, and, to her amazement, beheld the most handsome and lovely of the gods. In her excitement of joy and fear, a drop of hot oil fell from her lamp upon his shoulder. This awoke Cupid, who censured her for her mistrust, and escaped. Psyche's happiness was now gone, and after attempting in vain to throw herself into a river, she wandered about from temple to temple, inquiring after her lover, and at length came to the palace of Venus. There her real sufferings began, for Venus retained her, treated her as a slave, and imposed upon her the hardest and most humiliating labors. Psyche would have perished under the weight of her sufferings, had not Cupid, who still loved her in secret; invisibly comforted and assisted her in her toils. With his aid she at last succeeded in overcoming the jealousy and hatred of Venus: she became immortal, and was united to him forever. It is not difficult to recognize in this lovely story the idea of which it is merely the mythical embodiment; for Psyche is evidently the human soul, which is purified by passions and misfortunes, and is thus prepared for the enjoyment of true and pure happiness. In works of art Psyche is represented as a maiden with the wings of a butterfly, along with Cupid in the different situations described in the allegory.

PSYCHĪUM (Ψύχιον), a town on the southern coast of Crete.

PSYLLI (Ψύλλοι), a Libyan people, the earliest known inhabitants of the district of Northern Africa called Cyrenaica.

PSYRA (τὰ Ψυρά: Ψυρίος; now Ipsara), a small island of the Ægean Sea, forty stadia (four geographical miles) in circuit, lying fifty stadia (five geographical miles) west of the northwestern point of Chios. It had a city of the same name.

PSYTTALÆA. Vid. SALAMIS.

PTELĒOS (Πτελέως), a small lake in Mysia, near Ophryniūm, on the coast of the Hellespont.

PTELĒUM (Πτελεόν: Πτελεάτης, Πτελεούσιος). 1. (Now Felia), an ancient sea-port town of Thessaly, in the district Phthiotis, at the southwestern extremity of the Sinus Pagasæus, was destroyed by the Romans.—2. A town in Elis Triphylia, said to have been a colony from the preceding.—3. A fortress of Ionia, on the coast of Asia Minor, belonging to Erythræ.

[PTERELÆUS (Πτερέλαιος), son of Taphius, king of the island Taphos, father of Comætho: according to Strabo, he was a son of Deionceus.]

[PTERIA (Περία), according to Herodotus, capital of a district of the same name belonging to Cappadocia; according to Stephanus of Byzantium, however, who also calls the place Πτέριον, it was a city of Media.]

PTOLEMÆUS (Πτολεμαῖος), usually called PTOLEMY. I. Minor historical persons. 1. Nephew of Antigonus, king of Asia. He carried on war in Greece on behalf of Antigonus, but in 310 he abandoned the cause of his uncle, and concluded a treaty with Cassander and Ptolemy the son of Lagus. He soon gave offence to the Egyptian king, and was, in consequence, compelled to put an end to his life by poison, B.C. 309.—

2. Son of Lysimachus, king of Thrace. He was the eldest of the three sons of that monarch by his last wife Arsinoë, and the only one who escaped falling into the hands of Ptolemy Ceraunus.—3. Son of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, by his wife Antigone, the step-daughter of Ptolemy Lagi. When only fifteen years of age he was left by his father in charge of his hereditary dominions, when Pyrrhus himself set out on his expedition to Italy, 280. At a later time he fought under his father in Greece, and was slain in the course of Pyrrhus's campaign in the Peloponnesus, 272.—4. Surnamed PHILADELPHUS, son of M. Antony, the triumvir, by Cleopatra. After the death of Antony, 30, his life was spared by Augustus at the intercession of Juba and Cleopatra, and he was brought up by Octavia with her own children.

II. Kings of Egypt.

I. Surnamed SOTER, the Preserver, but more commonly known as the son of Lagus, reigned B.C. 323–285. His father Lagus was a Macedonian of ignoble birth, but his mother Arsinoë had been a concubine of Philip of Macedon, on which account it seems to have been generally believed that Ptolemy was in reality the offspring of that monarch. Ptolemy is mentioned among the friends of the young Alexander before the death of Philip. He accompanied Alexander throughout his campaigns in Asia, and was always treated by the king with the greatest favor. On the division of the empire which followed Alexander's death (323), Ptolemy obtained the government of Egypt. In 321 his dominions were invaded by Perdiccas, the regent; but the assassination of Perdiccas by his mutinous soldiers soon delivered Ptolemy from this danger. In the following year Ptolemy enlarged his dominions by seizing upon the important satrapy of Phœnicia and Cœlesyria. It was probably during this expedition that he made himself master of Jerusalem by attacking the city on the Sabbath day. A few years afterward (316) Ptolemy entered into an alliance with Cassander and Lysimachus against Antigonus, whose growing power had excited their common apprehensions. In the war which followed, Antigonus conquered Cœlesyria and Phœnicia (315, 314); but Ptolemy recovered these provinces by the defeat of Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, in 312. In 311 hostilities were suspended by a general peace. This peace, however, was of short duration, and Ptolemy appears to have been the first to recommence the war. He crossed over to Greece, where he announced himself as the liberator of the Greeks, but he effected little. In 306 Ptolemy was defeated by Demetrius in a great sea-fight off Salamis in Cyprus. In consequence of this defeat, Ptolemy lost the important island of Cyprus, which had previously been subject to him. Antigonus was so much elated by this victory as to assume the title of king, an example which Ptolemy, notwithstanding his defeat, immediately followed. Antigonus and Demetrius followed up their success by the invasion of Egypt, but were compelled to return to Syria without effecting any thing. Next year (305) Ptolemy rendered the most important assistance to the Rhodians, who were besieged by Demetrius; and when Demetrius was at length compelled to raise the siege (304), the Rhodians paid divine honors to the Egyptian monarch as their savior and preserver (Σωτήρ), a title which appears to have been now bestowed upon Ptolemy for the first time. Ptolemy took comparatively little part in the contest, which led to the decisive battle of Ipsus, in which Antigonus was defeated and slain (301). The latter years of Ptolemy's reign appear to have been devoted almost entirely to the arts of peace, and to promoting the internal prosperity of his dominions. In 285 Ptolemy abdicated in favor of his youngest son Ptolemy Philadelphus, the child of his latest and most beloved wife, Berenice, excluding from the throne his two eldest sons Ptolemy Ceraunus and Meleager, the offspring of Eurydice. The elder Ptolemy survived this event two years, and died in 283. His reign is variously estimated at thirty-eight or forty years, according as we include or not these two years which followed his abdication. The character of Ptolemy has been generally represented in a very favorable light by historians, and there is no doubt that if we compare him with his contemporary and rival potentates he appears to deserve the praises bestowed upon his mildness and moderation. But it is only with this important qualification that they can be admitted, for there are many evidences that he did not shrink from any measure that he deemed requisite in order to carry out the objects of his ambition. But as a ruler Ptolemy certainly deserves the highest praise. By his able and vigorous administration he laid the foundations of the wealth and prosperity which Egypt enjoyed for a long period. Under his fostering care Alexandria quickly rose to the place designed for it by its founder, that of the greatest commercial city of the world. Not less eminent were the services rendered by Ptolemy to the advancement of literature and science. In this department, indeed, it is not always easy to distinguish the portion of credit due to the father from that of his son; but it seems certain that to the elder monarch belongs the merit of having originated those literary institutions which assumed a more definite and regular form, as well as a more prominent place, under his successor. Such appears to have been the case with the two most celebrated of all, the Library and the Museum of Alexandria. The first suggestion of these important foundations is ascribed by some writers to Demetrius of Phalerus, who spent all the latter years of his life at the court of Ptolemy. But many other men of literary eminence were also gathered around the Egyptian king, among whom may be especially noticed the great geometer Euclid, the philosophers Stilpo of Megara, Theodoros of Cyrene, and Diodorus surnamed Cronus; as well as the elegiac poet Philetas of Cos, and the grammarian Zenodotus. To the two last we are told Ptolemy confided the literary education of his son Philadelphus. Many anecdotes sufficiently attest the free intercourse which subsisted between the king and the men of letters by whom he was surrounded, and prove that the easy familiarity of his manners corresponded with his simple and unostentatious habits of life. We also find him maintaining a correspondence with Menander, whom he in vain endeavored to attract to his court, and sending overtures probably of a similar nature to Theophrastus. Nor were the fine arts neglected: the rival painters Antiphilus and Apelles both exercised their talents at Alexandria, where some of their most celebrated pictures were produced. Ptolemy was himself an author: he composed a history of the wars of Alexander, which is frequently cited by later writers, and is one of the chief authorities which Arrian made the groundwork of his own history.—II. PHILADELPHUS (B.C. 235–247), the son of Ptolemy I. by his wife Berenice, was born in the island of Cos, 309. His long reign was marked by few events of a striking character. He was engaged in war with his half-brother Magas, who had governed Cyrene as viceroy under Ptolemy Soter, but on the death of that monarch not only asserted his independence, but even attempted to invade Egypt. Magas was supported by Antiochus II., king of Syria; and the war was at length terminated by a treaty, which left Magas in undisputed possession of the Cyrenaica, while his infant daughter Berenice was betrothed to Ptolemy, the son of Philadelphus. Ptolemy also concluded a treaty with the Romans. He was frequently engaged in hostilities with Syria, which were terminated toward the close of his reign by a treaty of peace, by which Ptolemy gave his daughter Berenice in marriage to Antiochus II. Ptolemy's chief care, however, was directed to the internal administration of his kingdom, and to the patronage of literature and science. The institutions of which the foundations had been laid by his father quickly rose under his fostering care to the highest prosperity. The Museum of Alexandria became the resort and abode of all the most distinguished men of letters of the day, and in the library attached to it were accumulated all the treasures of ancient learning. Among the other illustrious names which adorned the reign of Ptolemy may be mentioned those of the poets Philetas and Theocritus, the philosophers Hegesias and Theodoros, the mathematician Euclid, and the astronomers Timocharis, Aristarchus of Samos, and Aratus. Nor was his patronage confined to the ordinary cycle of Hellenic literature. By his interest in natural history he gave a stimulus to the pursuit of that science, which gave birth to many important works, while he himself formed collections of rare animals within the precincts of the royal palace. It was during his reign also, and perhaps at his desire, that Manetho gave to the world in a Greek form the historical records of the Egyptians; and according to a well-known tradition, it was by his express command that the Holy Scriptures of the Jews were translated into Greek. The new cities or colonies founded by Philadelphus in different parts of his dominions were extremely numerous. On the Red Sea alone we find at least two bearing the name of Arsinoë, one called after another of his sisters Philotera, and two cities named in honor of his mother Berenice. The same names occur also in Cilicia and Syria; and in the latter country he founded the important fortress of Ptolemais in Palestine. All authorities concur in attesting the great power and wealth to which the Egyptian monarchy was raised under Philadelphus. He possessed at the close of his reign a standing army of two hundred thousand foot and forty thousand horse, besides war-chariots and elephants; a fleet of one thousand five hundred ships, and a sum of seven hundred and forty thousand talents in his treasury; while he derived from Egypt alone an annual revenue of fourteen thousand eight hundred talents. His dominions comprised, besides Egypt itself, and portions of Æthiopia, Arabia, and Libya, the important provinces of Phœnicia and Cœlesyria, together with Cyprus, Lycia, Caria, and the Cyclades; and during a great part at least of his reign, Cilicia and Pamphylia also. Before his death Cyrene was reunited to the monarchy by the marriage of his son Ptolemy with Berenice, the daughter of Magas. The private life and relations of Philadelphus do not exhibit his character in as favorable a light as we might have inferred from the splendor of his administration. He put to death two of his brothers, and he banished his first wife Arsinoë, the daughter of Lysimachus, to Coptos in Upper Egypt, on a charge of conspiracy. After her removal Ptolemy married his own sister Arsinoë, the widow of Lysimachus: a flagrant violation of the religious notions of the Greeks, but which was frequently imitated by his successors. He evinced his affection for Arsinoë not only by bestowing her name upon many of his newly-founded colonies, but by assuming himself the surname of Philadelphus, a title which some writers referred in derision to his unnatural treatment of his two brothers. By this second marriage Ptolemy had no issue, but his first wife had borne him two sons—Ptolemy, who succeeded him on the throne, and Lysimachus; and a daughter, Berenice, whose marriage to Antiochus II., king of Syria, has been already mentioned.—III. EUERGETES (B.C. 247–222), eldest son and successor of Philadelphus. Shortly after his accession he invaded Syria, in order to avenge the death of his sister Berenice. VID. BERENICE, No. 2. He met with the most striking success. He advanced as far as Babylon and Susa, and after reducing all Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Susiana, received the submission of all the upper provinces of Asia as far as the confines of Bactria and India. From this career of conquest he was recalled by the news of seditions in Egypt, and returned to that country, carrying with him an immense booty, comprising, among other objects, all the statues of the Egyptian deities which had been carried off by Cambyses to Babylon or Persia. These he restored to their respective temples, an act by which he earned the greatest popularity with his native Egyptian subjects, who bestowed on him, in consequence, the title of Euergetes (the Benefactor), by which he is generally known. While the arms of the king himself were thus successful in the East, his fleets reduced the maritime provinces of Asia, including Cilicia, Pamphylia, and Ionia, as far as the Hellespont, together with Lysimachia and other important places on the coast of Thrace, which continued for a long period subject to the Egyptian rule. Concerning the events which followed the return of Euergetes to his own dominions (probably in 243), we are almost wholly in the dark; but it appears that the greater part of the eastern provinces speedily fell again into the hands of Seleucus, while Ptolemy retained possession of the maritime regions and a great part of Syria itself. He soon obtained a valuable ally in the person of Antiochus Hierax, the younger brother of Seleucus, whom he supported in his wars against his elder brother. We find Euergetes maintaining the same friendly relations as his father with Rome. During the latter years of his reign he subdued the Ethiopian tribes on his southern frontier, and advanced as far as Adule, a port on the Red Sea, where he established an emporium, and set up an inscription commemorating the exploits of his reign. To a copy of this, accidentally preserved to us by an Egyptian monk, Cosmas Indicopleustes, we are indebted for much of the scanty information we possess concerning his reign. Ptolemy Euergetes is scarcely less celebrated than his father for his patronage of literature and science; he added so largely to the library at Alexandria that he has been sometimes erroneously deemed its founder. Eratosthenes, Apollonius Rhodius, and Aristophanes the grammarian, flourished at Alexandria during his reign—sufficient to prove that the literature and learning of the Alexandrian school still retained their former eminence. By his wife Berenice, who survived him, Euergetes left three children: 1. Ptolemy, his successor; 2. Magas; and, 3. Arsinoë, afterward married to her brother Ptolemy Philopator.—IV. PHILOPATOR (B.C. 222–205), eldest son and successor of Euergetes. He was very far from inheriting the virtues or abilities of his father; and his reign was the commencement of the decline of the Egyptian kingdom, which had been raised to such a height of power and prosperity by his three predecessors. Its first beginning was stained with crimes of the darkest kind. He put to death his mother Berenice, and his brother Magas, and his uncle Lysimachus, the brother of Euergetes. He then gave himself up without restraint to a life of indolence and luxury, while he abandoned to his minister Sosibius the care of all political affairs. The latter seems to have been as incapable as his master, and the kingdom was allowed to fall into a state of the utmost disorder, of which Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, was not slow to avail himself. In the first two campaigns (219, 218), Antiochus conquered the greater part of Cœlesyria and Palestine, but in the third year of the war (217) he was completely defeated by Ptolemy in person at the decisive battle of Raphia, and was glad to conclude a peace with the Egyptian monarch. On his return from his Syrian expedition, Ptolemy gave himself up more and more to every species of vice and debauchery. His mistress Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, divided with Sosibius the patronage and distribution of all places of honor or profit. Toward the close of his reign Ptolemy put to death his wife Arsinoë. His debaucheries shortened his life. He died in 205, leaving only one son, a child of five years old. We find Ptolemy following up the policy of his predecessors by cultivating the friendship of the Romans, to whom he furnished large supplies of corn during their struggle with Carthage. Plunged as he was in vice and debauchery, Philopator appears to have still inherited something of the love of letters for which his predecessors were so conspicuous. We find him associating on familiar terms with philosophers and men of letters, and especially patronising the distinguished grammarian Aristarchus.—V. EPIPHANES (B.C. 205–181), son and successor of Ptolemy IV. He was a child of five years old at the death of his father, 205. Philip king of Macedonia and Antiochus III. of Syria determined to take advantage of the minority of Ptolemy, and entered into a league to divide his dominions between them. In pursuance of this arrangement, Antiochus conquered Cœlesyria, while Philip reduced the Cyclades and the cities in Thrace which had still remained subject to Egypt. In this emergency the Egyptian ministers had recourse to the powerful intervention of the Romans, who commanded both monarchs to refrain from further hostilities, and restore all the conquered cities. In order to evade this demand without openly opposing the power of Rome, Antiochus concluded a treaty with Egypt, by which it was agreed that the young king should marry Cleopatra, the daughter of Antiochus, and receive back the Syrian provinces as her dower. This treaty took place in 199, but the marriage was not actually solemnized until six years after. The administration of Egypt was placed in the hands of Aristomenes, a man who was every way worthy of the charge. As early, however, as 196, the young king was declared of full age, and the ceremony of his anacletaria, or coronation, was solemnized with great magnificence. It was on this occasion that the decree was issued which has been preserved to us in the celebrated inscription known as the Rosetta stone, a monument of great interest in regard to the internal history of Egypt under the Ptolemies, independent of its importance as having afforded the key to the discovery of hieroglyphics. In 193 the marriage of Ptolemy with the Syrian princess Cleopatra was solemnized at Raphia. Ptolemy, however, refused to assist his father-in-law in the war against the Romans, which was at this time on the eve of breaking out, and he continued steadfast in his alliance with Rome. But he derived no advantage from the treaty which concluded it, and Antiochus still retained possession of Cœlesyria and Phœnicia. As long as Ptolemy continued under the guidance and influence of Aristomenes, his administration was equitable and popular. Gradually, however, he became estranged from his able and virtuous minister, and threw himself more and more into the power of flatterers and vicious companions, until at length he was induced to rid himself of Aristomenes, who was compelled to take poison. Toward the close of his reign Ptolemy conceived the project of recovering Cœlesyria from Seleucus, the successor of Antiochus, and had assembled a large mercenary force for that purpose; but having, by an unguarded expression, excited the apprehensions of some of his friends, he was cut off by poison in the twenty-fourth year of his reign and the twenty-ninth of his age, 181. He left two sons, both named Ptolemy, who subsequently ascended the throne, under the names of Ptolemy Philometor and Euergetes II., and a daughter who bore her mother's name of Cleopatra. His reign was marked by the rapid decline of the Egyptian monarchy, for the provinces and cities wrested from it during his minority by Antiochus and Philip were never recovered, and at his death Cyprus and the Cyrenaica were almost the only foreign possessions still attached to the crown of Egypt.—VI. PHILOMETOR (B.C. 181–146), eldest son and successor of Ptolemy V. He was a child at the death of his father in 181, and the regency was assumed during his minority by his mother Cleopatra, who, by her able administration, maintained the kingdom in a state of tranquillity. But after her death in 173, the chief power fell into the hands of Eulæus and Lenæus, ministers as corrupt as they were incapable, who had the rashness to engage in war with Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, in the vain hope of recovering the provinces of Cœlesyria and Phœnicia. But their army was totally defeated by Antiochus near Pelusium, and Antiochus was able to advance without opposition as far as Memphis, 170. The young king himself fell into his hands, but was treated with kindness and distinction, as Antiochus hoped by his means to make himself the master of Egypt. On learning the captivity of his brother, the young Ptolemy, who was then at Alexandria with his sister Cleopatra, assumed the title of king, under the name of Euergetes II., and prepared to defend the capital to the utmost. Antiochus hereupon laid siege to Alexandria, but he was unable to take the city, and withdrew into Syria, after establishing Philometor as king at Memphis, but retaining in his hands the frontier fortress of Pelusium. This last circumstance, together with the ravages committed by the Syrian troops, awakened Philometor, who had hitherto been a mere puppet in the hands of the Syrian king, to a sense of his true position, and he hastened to make overtures of peace to his brother and sister at Alexandria. It was agreed that the two brothers should reign together, and that Philometor should marry his sister Cleopatra. But this arrangement did not suit the views of Antiochus, who immediately renewed hostilities. The two brothers were unable to offer any effectual opposition, and he had advanced a second time to the walls of Alexandria, when he was met by a Roman embassy, headed by M. Popilius Lænæus, who haughtily commanded him instantly to desist from hostilities. Antiochus did not venture to disobey, and withdrew to his own dominions, 163. Dissensions soon broke out between the two brothers, and Euergetes expelled Philometor from Alexandria. Hereupon Philometor repaired in person to Rome, 164, where he was received by the senate with the utmost honor, and deputies were appointed to reinstate him in the sovereign power. This they effected with little opposition, but they settled that Euergetes should obtain Cyrene as a separate kingdom. Euergetes, however, shortly afterward laid claim to Cyprus as well, in which he was supported by the Romans; but Philometor refused to surrender the island to him, and in the war which ensued, Euergetes was taken prisoner by his brother, who not only spared his life, but sent him back to Cyrene on condition that he should thenceforth content himself with that kingdom. The attention of Philometor appears to have been from this time principally directed to the side of Syria. Demetrius Soter having sought, during the dissensions between the two brothers, to make himself master of Cyprus, Ptolemy now supported the usurper Alexander Balas, to whom he gave his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, 150. But when Ptolemy advanced with an army to the assistance of his son-in-law, Ammonius, the favorite and minister of Alexander, formed a plot against the life of Ptolemy; whereupon the latter took away his daughter Cleopatra from her faithless husband, and bestowed her hand on Demetrius Nicator, the son of Soter, whose cause he now espoused. In conjunction with Demetrius, Ptolemy carried on war against Alexander, whom he defeated in a decisive battle; but he died a few days afterward, in consequence of an injury which he received from a fall from his horse in this battle, 146. He had reigned thirty-five years from the period of his first accession, and eighteen from his restoration by the Romans: Philometor is praised for the mildness and humanity of his disposition. Polybius even tells us that not a single citizen of Alexandria was put to death by him for any political or private offence. On the whole, if not one of the greatest, he was at least one of the best of the race of the Ptolemies. He left three children: 1. A son, Ptolemy, who was proclaimed king after his father's death, under the name Ptolemy Eupator, but was put to death almost immediately after by his uncle Euergetes. 2. A daughter, Cleopatra, married first to Alexander Balas, then to Demetrius II., king of Syria; and, 3. Another daughter, also named Cleopatra, who was afterward married to her uncle Ptolemy Euergetes.—VII. EUERGETES II. or PHYSCON (Φύσκων), that is, Big-Belly, reigned B.C. 146–117. His history down to the death of his brother has been already given. In order to secure undisputed possession of the throne, he married his sister Cleopatra, the widow of his brother Philometor, and put to death his nephew Ptolemy, who had been proclaimed king under the surname of Eupator. A reign thus commenced in blood was continued in a similar spirit. Many of the leading citizens of Alexandria, who had taken part against him on the death of his brother, were put to death, while the populace were given up to the cruelties of his mercenary troops, and the streets of the city were repeatedly deluged with blood. Thousands of the inhabitants fled from the scene of such horrors, and the population of Alexandria was so greatly thinned that the king found himself compelled to invite foreign settlers from all quarters to repeople his deserted capital. At the same time that he thus incurred the hatred of his subjects by his cruelties, he rendered himself an object of their aversion and contempt by abandoning himself to the most degrading vices. In consequence of these, he had become bloated and deformed in person, and enormously corpulent, whence the Alexandrians gave him the nickname of Physcon, by which appellation he is more universally known. His union with Cleopatra was not of long duration. He became enamored of his niece Cleopatra (the offspring of his wife by her former marriage with Philometor), and he did not hesitate to divorce the mother and receive her daughter instead as his wife and queen. By this proceeding he alienated still more the minds of his Greek subjects; and his vices and cruelties at length produced an insurrection at Alexandria. Thereupon he fled to Cyprus, and the Alexandrians declared his sister Cleopatra queen (130). Enraged at this, Ptolemy put to death Memphitis, his son by Cleopatra, and sent his head and hands to his unhappy mother. But Cleopatra having been shortly afterward expelled from Alexandria in her turn, Ptolemy found himself unexpectedly reinstated on the throne (127). His sister Cleopatra fled to the court of her elder daughter Cleopatra, the wife of Demetrius II., king of Syria, who espoused the cause of the fugitive. Ptolemy, in revenge, set up against him a pretender named Zabinas or Zebina, who assumed the title of Alexander II. But the usurper behaved with such haughtiness to Ptolemy, that the latter suddenly changed his policy, became reconciled to his sister Cleopatra, whom he permitted to return to Egypt, and gave his daughter Tryphæna in marriage to Antiochus Grypus, the son of Demetrius. Ptolemy died after reigning twenty-nine years from the death of his brother Philometor; but he himself reckoned the years of his reign from the date of his first assumption of the regal title in 170. Although the character of Ptolemy Physcon was stained by the most infamous vices and by the most sanguinary cruelty, he still retained that love of letters which appears to have been hereditary in the whole race of the Ptolemies. He had in his youth been a pupil of Aristarchus, and not only courted the society of learned men, but was himself the author of a work called Ἱστοριήματα, or memoirs, which extended to twenty-four books. He left two sons: Ptolemy, afterward known as Soter II., and Alexander, both of whom subsequently ascended the throne of Egypt; and three daughters: 1. Cleopatra, married to her brother Ptolemy Soter; 2. Tryphæna, the wife of Antiochus Grypus, king of Syria; and, 3. Selene, who was unmarried at her father's death. To his natural son Ptolemy, surnamed Apion, he bequeathed by his will the separate kingdom of Cyrene.—VIII. SOTER II., and also PHILOMETOR, but more commonly called LATHYRUS or LATHURUS (Λάθυρος), reigned B.C. 117–107 and also 89–81. Although he was of full age at the time of his father's death (117), he was obliged to reign jointly with his mother, Cleopatra, who had been appointed by the will of her late husband to succeed him on the throne. She was, indeed, desirous of associating with herself her younger son, Ptolemy Alexander; but since Lathyrus was popular with the Alexandrians, she was obliged to give way, and sent Alexander to Cyprus. After declaring Lathyrus king, she compelled him to repudiate his sister Cleopatra, of whose influence she was jealous, and to marry his younger sister Selene in her stead. After reigning ten years jointly with his mother, he was expelled from Alexandria by an insurrection of the people which she had excited against him (107). His brother Alexander now assumed the sovereignty of Egypt, in conjunction with his mother, while Lathyrus was able to establish himself in the possession of Cyprus. Cleopatra, indeed, attempted to dispossess him of that island also, but without success, and Ptolemy held it as an independent kingdom for the eighteen years during which Cleopatra and Alexander reigned in Egypt. After the death of Cleopatra and the expulsion of Alexander in 89, Ptolemy Lathyrus was recalled by the Alexandrians, and established anew on the throne of Egypt, which he occupied thenceforth without interruption till his death in 81. The most important event of this period was the revolt of Thebes, in Upper Egypt, which was still powerful enough to hold out for nearly three years against the arms of Ptolemy, but at the end of that time was taken and reduced to the state of ruin in which it has ever since remained. Lathyrus reigned in all thirty-five years and a half; ten in conjunction with his mother (117-107), eighteen in Cyprus (107-89), and seven and a half as sole ruler of Egypt. He left only one daughter, Berenice, called also Cleopatra, who succeeded him on the throne; and two sons, both named Ptolemy, who, though illegitimate, became severally kings of Egypt and Cyprus.—IX. ALEXANDER I., youngest son of Ptolemy VII., reigned conjointly with his mother Cleopatra from the expulsion of his brother Lathyrus, B.C. 107 to 90. In this year he assassinated his mother; but he had not reigned alone a year, when he was compelled by a general sedition of the populace and military to quit Alexandria. He, however, raised fresh troops, but was totally defeated in a sea-fight by the rebels; whereupon Lathyrus was recalled by the Alexandrians to Egypt, as has been already related. Alexander now attempted to make himself master of Cyprus, and invaded that island, but was defeated and slain. He left a son, Alexander, who afterward ascended the throne of Egypt.—X. ALEXANDER II., son of the preceding, was at Rome at the death of Ptolemy Lathyrus in 81. Sulla, who was then dictator, nominated the young Alexander (who had obtained a high place in his favor) king of Egypt, and sent him to take possession of the crown. It was, however, agreed, in deference to the claims of Cleopatra Berenice, the daughter of Lathyrus, whom the Alexandrians had already placed on the throne, that Alexander should marry her, and admit her to share the sovereign power. He complied with the letter of this treaty by marrying Cleopatra, but only nineteen days afterward caused her to be assassinated. The Alexandrians thereupon rose against their new monarch and put him to death.—XI. DIONYSUS, but more commonly known by the appellation of AULETES, the flute-player, was an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrus. When the assassination of Berenice and the death of Alexander II. had completed the extinction of the legitimate race of the Lagide, Ptolemy was proclaimed king by the Alexandrians, B.C. 80. He was anxious to obtain from the Roman senate their ratification of his title to the crown, but it was not till the consulship of Cæsar (59) that he was able to purchase by vast bribes the desired privilege. He had expended immense sums in the pursuit of this object, which he was compelled to raise by the imposition of fresh taxes, and the discontent thus excited combining with the contempt entertained for his character, led to his expulsion by the Alexandrians in 58. Thereupon he proceeded in person to Rome to procure from the senate his restoration. His first reception was promising; and he procured a decree from the senate commanding his restoration, and intrusting the charge of effecting it to P. Lentulus Spinther, then proconsul of Cilicia. Meanwhile, the Alexandrians sent an embassy of one hundred of their leading citizens to plead their cause with the Roman senate; but Ptolemy had the audacity to cause the deputies, on their arrival in Italy, to be waylaid, and the greater part of them murdered. The indignation excited at Rome by this proceeding produced a reaction: the tribunes took up the matter against the nobility; and an oracle was produced from the Sibylline books, forbidding the restoration of the king by an armed force. The intrigues and disputes thus raised were protracted throughout the year 56, and at length Ptolemy, despairing of a favorable result, quitted Rome in disgust, and withdrew to Ephesus. But in 55, A. Gabinius, who was proconsul in Syria, was induced, by the influence of Pompey, aided by the enormous bribe of 10,000 talents from Ptolemy himself, to undertake his restoration. The Alexandrians had in the mean time placed on the throne of Egypt Berenice, the eldest daughter of Ptolemy, who had married Archelaus, the son of the general of Mithradates, and they opposed Gabinius with an army on the confines of the kingdom. They were, however, defeated in three successive battles, Archelaus was slain, and Ptolemy once more established on the throne, 55. One of his first acts was to put to death his daughter Berenice, and many of the leading citizens of Alexandria. He survived his restoration only three years and a half, during which time he was supported by a large body of Roman soldiers who had been left behind by Gabinius for his protection. He died in 51, after a reign of twenty-nine years from the date of his first accession. He left two sons, both named Ptolemy, and two daughters, Cleopatra and Arsinoë.—XII. Eldest son of the preceding. By his father's will the sovereign power was left to himself and his sister Cleopatra jointly, and this arrangement was carried into effect without opposition, 51. Auletes had also referred the execution of his will to the Roman senate, and the latter accepted the office, confirmed its provisions, and bestowed on Pompey the title of guardian of the young king. But the approach of the civil war prevented them from taking any active part in the administration of affairs, which fell into the hands of a eunuch named Pothinus. It was not long before dissensions broke out between the latter and Cleopatra, which ended in the expulsion of the princess, after she had reigned in conjunction with her brother about three years, 48. Hereupon she took refuge in Syria, and assembled an army, with which she invaded Egypt. The young king, accompanied by his guardian, met her at Pelusium, and it was while the two armies were here encamped opposite to one another that Pompey landed in Egypt, to throw himself as a suppliant on the protection of Ptolemy; but he was assassinated by the orders of Pothinus, before he could obtain an interview with the king himself. Shortly after, Cæsar arrived in Egypt, and took upon himself to settle the dispute between Ptolemy and his sister. But as Cleopatra's charms gained for her the support of Cæsar, Pothinus determined to excite an insurrection against Cæsar. Hence arose what is usually called the Alexandrian war. Ptolemy, who was at first in Cæsar's hands, managed to escape, and put himself at the head of the insurgents; but he was defeated by Cæsar, and was drowned in an attempt to escape by the river (47).—XIII. Youngest son of Ptolemy Auletes, was declared king by Cæsar in conjunction with Cleopatra, after the death of his elder brother Ptolemy XII., 47; and although he was a mere boy, it was decreed that he should marry his sister, with whom he was thus to share the power. Both his marriage and regal title were, of course, purely nominal; and in 43 Cleopatra put him to death.

III. Kings of other Countries.

1. Surnamed ALORITES, that is, of Alorus, regent, or, according to some authors, king of Macedonia. He obtained the supreme power by the assassination of Alexander II., the eldest son of Amyntas, B.C. 367, but was, in his turn, assassinated by Perdiccas III., 364.—2. Surnamed ΑΠΙΟΝ, king of Cyrene (117–96), was an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Physcon, king of Egypt, who left him by his will the kingdom of the Cyrenaïca. At his death in 96, Apion bequeathed his kingdom by his will to the Roman people. The senate, however, refused to accept the legacy, and declared the cities of the Cyrenaïca free. They were not reduced to the condition of a province till near thirty years afterward.—3. Surnamed CERAUNUS, king of Macedonia, was the son of Ptolemy I., king of Egypt, by his second wife Eurydice. When his father in 285 set aside the claim of Ceraunus to the throne, and appointed his younger son, Ptolemy Philadelphus, his successor, Ceraunus repaired to the court of Lysimachus. After Lysimachus had perished in battle against Seleucus (281), Ptolemy Ceraunus was received by the latter in the most friendly manner; but shortly afterward (280) he basely assassinated Seleucus, and took possession of the Macedonian throne. After reigning a few months, he was defeated in battle by the Gauls, taken prisoner, and put to death.—4. Tetrarch of CHALCIS in Syria, the son of Mennæus. He appears to have held the cities of Heliopolis and Chalcis as well as the mountain district of Ituræa, from whence he was in the habit of infesting Damascus and the more wealthy parts of Cœlesyria with predatory incursions. He reigned from about 70 to 40, when he was succeeded by his son Lysanias.—5. King of CYPRUS, was the younger brother of Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, being, like him, an illegitimate son of Ptolemy Lathyrus. He was acknowledged as king of Cyprus at the same time that his brother Auletes obtained possession of the throne of Egypt, 80. He had offended P. Clodius by neglecting to ransom him when he had fallen into the hands of the Cilician pirates; and accordingly Clodius, when he became tribune (58), brought forward a law to deprive Ptolemy of his kingdom, and reduce Cyprus to a Roman province. Cato, who had to carry into execution this nefarious decree, sent to Ptolemy, advising him to submit, and offering him his personal safety, with the office of high-priest at Paphos, and a liberal maintenance. But the unhappy king refused these offers, and put an end to his own life, 57.—6. King of EPIRUS, was the second son of Alexander II., king of Epirus, and Olympias, and grandson of the great Pyrrhus. He succeeded to the throne on the death of his elder brother, Pyrrhus II., but reigned only a very short time. The date of his reign can not be fixed with certainty, but as he was contemporary with Demetrius II., king of Macedonia, it may be placed between 239–229.—7. King of MAURETANIA, was the son and successor of Juba II. By his mother Cleopatra he was descended from the kings of Egypt, whose name he bore. The period of his accession can not be determined with certainty, but we know that he was on the throne in A.D. 18. He continued to reign without interruption till A.D. 40, when he was summoned to Rome by Caligula, and shortly after put to death, his great riches having excited the cupidity of the emperor.

IV. Literary.

1. CLAUDIUS PTOLEMÆUS, a celebrated mathematician, astronomer, and geographer. Of Ptolemy himself we know absolutely nothing but his date. He certainly observed in A.D. 139, at Alexandria; and, since he survived Antoninus, he was alive A.D. 161. His writings are as follows: 1. Μεγάλη Σύνταξις τῆς Ἀστρονομίας, usually known by its Arabic name of Almagest. Since the Tetrabiblus, the work on astrology, was also entitled σύνταξις, the Arabs, to distinguish the two, probably called the greater work μεγάλη, and afterward μεγίστη: the title Almagest is a compound of this last adjective and the Arabic article. The Almagest is divided into thirteen books. It treats of the relations of the earth and heaven; the effect of position upon the earth; the theory of the sun and moon, without which that of the stars can not be undertaken; the sphere of the fixed stars, and those of the five stars called planets. The seventh and eighth books are the most interesting to the modern astronomer, as they contain a catalogue of the stars. This catalogue gives the longitudes and latitudes of one thousand and twenty-two stars, described by their positions in the constellations. It seems that this catalogue is in the main really that of Hipparchus, altered to Ptolemy's own time by assuming the value of the precession of the equinoxes given by Hipparchus as the least which could be; some changes having also been made by Ptolemy's own observations. Indeed, the whole work of Ptolemy appears to have been based upon the observations of Hipparchus, whom he constantly cites as his authority. The best edition of the Almagest is by Halma, Paris, 1813, 1816, 2 vols. 4to. There are also two other volumes by Halma (1819-1820), which contain some of the other writings of Ptolemy.—2. Τετραβιβλος σύνταξις, generally called Tetrabiblon, or Quadrupartitum de Apotelesmatibus et Judiciis Astrorum. With this goes another small work, called καρπός, or Fructus Librorum Suorum, often called Centiloquium, from its containing a hundred aphorisms. Both of these works are astrological, and it has been doubted by some whether they be genuine. But the doubt merely arises from the feeling that the contents are unworthy of Ptolemy.—3. Κανὼν Βασιλέων, a catalogue of Assyrian, Persian, Greek, and Roman sovereigns, with the length of their reigns, several times referred to by Syncellus.—4. Φάσεις ἀπλανῶν ἰστέρων καὶ συναγωγή ἐπισημασεῶν, De Apparentiis et Significationibus inerrantium, an annual list of sidereal phænomena.—5, 6. De Analemmae et Planisphaerium. These works are obtained from the Arabic. The Analemma is a collection of graphical processes for facilitating the construction of sun-dials. The Planisphere is a description of the stereographic projection, in which the eye is at the pole of the circle on which the sphere is projected.—7. Περὶ ὑποθέσεων τῶν πλανημένων, De Planetarum Hypothesibus. This is a brief statement of the principal hypotheses employed in the Almagest for the explanation of the heavenly motions.—8. Ἀρμονικῶν βιβλία γ', a treatise on the theory of the musical scale.—9. Περὶ κριτηρίου καὶ ἡγεμονικῆ, De Judicandi Facultate et Animi Principatu, a metaphysical work, attributed to Ptolemy.—10. Γεωγραφικὴ Ὑφήγησις, in eight books, the great geographical work of Ptolemy. This work was the last attempt made by the ancients to form a complete geographical system; it was accepted as the text-book of the science; and it maintained that position during the Middle Ages, and until the fifteenth century, when the rapid progress of maritime discovery caused it to be superseded. It contains, however, very little information respecting the objects of interest connected with the different countries and places; for, with the exception of the introductory matter in the first book, and the latter part of the work, it is a mere catalogue of the names of places, with their longitudes and latitudes, and with a few incidental references to objects of interest. The latitudes of Ptolemy are tolerably correct; but his longitudes are very wide of the truth, his length of the known world, from east to west, being much too great. It is well worthy, however, of remark, in passing, that the modern world owes much to this error; for it tended to encourage that belief in the practicability of a western passage to the Indies, which occasioned the discovery of America by Columbus. The first book is introductory. The next six and a half books (ii.-vii., 4) are occupied with the description of the known world, beginning with the West of Europe, the description of which is contained in book ii.; next comes the East of Europe, in book iii.; then Africa, in book iv.; then Western or Lesser Asia, in book v.; then the Greater Asia, in book vi.; then India, the Chersonesus Aurea, Serica, the Sinæ, and Taprobane, in book vii., cc. 1-4. The form in which the description is given is that of lists of places, with their longitudes and latitudes, arranged under the heads, first, of the three continents, and then of the several countries and tribes. Prefixed to each section is a brief general description of the boundaries and divisions of the part about to be described; and remarks of a miscellaneous character, are interspersed among the lists, to which, however, they bear but a small proportion. The remaining part of the seventh, and the whole of the eighth book, are occupied with a description of a set of maps of the known world. These maps are still extant. The best edition of the Geographia of Ptolemy is by Petrus Bertius, Lugd. Bat., 1619, fol.; reprinted Antwerp, 1624, fol.—2. Of Megalopolis, the son of Agesarchus, wrote a history of King Ptolemy IV. Philopator.—3. An Egyptian priest of Mendes, who wrote on the ancient history of Egypt. He probably lived under the first Roman emperors.—4. Surnamed ΣΠΕΜΝΥΣ, a grammarian of Alexandria, flourished under Trajan and Hadrian. An epitome of one of his works is preserved by Photius.

ΠΤΟΛΕΜΑΙΣ (Πτολεμαῖς: Πτολεμαίτης and Πτολεμαεύς). 1. Also called ΑΣΕ ('Ακκῆ, a corruption of the native name Acco, Old Testament: now, in Arabic, Akka, French St. Jean d'Acre, English Acre), a celebrated city on the coast of Phœnicia, south of Tyre, and north of Mount Carmel, lies at the bottom of a bay surrounded by mountains, in a position marked out by nature as a key of the passage between Coele Syria and Palestine. It is one of the oldest cities of Phœnicia, being mentioned in the Book of Judges (i., 31). Under the Persians it was made the head-quarters of the expeditions against Egypt; but it was not till the decline of Tyre that it acquired its great importance as a military and commercial city. The Ptolemy who enlarged and strengthened it, and from whom it obtained its Greek name, is supposed to have been Ptolemy I. the son of Lagus. After the change of its name, its citadel continued to be called Acc. Under the Romans it was a colony, and belonged to Galilee. To recount its great celebrity in mediæval and modern history does not fall within the province of this work.—2. (At or near the modern El-Lahum), a small town of Middle Egypt, in the Nomos Arsinoïtes, between Arsinoë and Heracleopolis the Great.—3. P. ΗΕΡΜΙ (Π. ἡ Ἐρμείου, Πτολεμαϊκὴ πόλις: now Mensieh, ruins), a city of Upper Egypt, on the western bank of the Nile, below Abydos, was a place of great importance under the Ptolemies, who enlarged and adorned it, and made it a purely Greek city, exempt from all peculiarly Egyptian laws and customs.—4. P. ΤΗΒΡΩΝ, or ΕΠΙΦΘΕΡΑΣ (Π. Θερῶν, ἡ ἐπὶ Θέρας), a port on the Red Sea, on the coast of the Trogl dytæ, an emporium for the trade with India and Arabia, but chiefly remarkable in the history of mathematical geography, inasmuch as, the sun having been observed to be directly over it forty-five days before and after the summer solstice, the place was taken as one of the fixed points for determining the length of a degree of a great circle on the earth's surface.—5. (Now Tolmæta, or Tolomæta, ruins), on the northwestern coast of Cyrenaica, one of the five great cities of the Libyan Pentapolis, was at first only the port of BARCA, which lay one hundred stadia (ten geographical miles) inland, but which was so entirely eclipsed by Ptolemæ's that, under the Romans, even the name of Barca was transferred to the latter city. From which of the Ptolemies it took its name, we are not informed. Its magnificence is attested by its splendid ruins, which are now partly covered by the sea. They are four miles in circumference, and contain the remains of several temples, three theatres, and an aqueduct.

PTOON (Πτόων: now Palca and Strutzina), a mountain in Bœotia, an offshoot of Helicon, which extends from the southeast side of the Lake Copais southward to the coast.

PUBLICŪLA, or POPLICŪLA, or POPLICŪLA, a Roman cognomen, signified "one who courts the people" (from populus and colo), and thus "a friend of the people." The form Poplicula or Poplicola was the more ancient, but Publicola was the one usually employed by the Romans in later times.

PUBLICŪLA, P. VALĒRIUS, took an active part in expelling the Tarquins from the city, and was thereupon elected consul with Brutus (B. C. 509). He secured the liberties of the people by proposing several laws, one of the most important of which was that every citizen who was condemned by a magistrate should have the right of appeal to the people. He also ordered the lictors to lower the fasces before the people, as an acknowledgment that their power was superior to that of the consuls. Hence he became so great a favorite with the people, that he received the surname of Publicola. He was consul three times again, namely, in 508, 507, and 504. He died in 503. He was buried at the public expense, and the matrons mourned for him ten months, as they had done for Brutus. The descendants of Publicola bore the same name, and several of them held the highest offices of state during the early years of the republic.

PUBLICŪLA, GELLIUS. 1. L., consul with Cn. Lentulus Clodianus, B.C. 72. Both consuls carried on war against Spartacus, but were defeated by the latter. In 70 Gellius was censor, and in 67 and 66 he served as one of Pompey's legates in the war against the pirates. He belonged to the aristocratical party. In 63 he warmly supported Cicero in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy. In 59 he opposed the agrarian law of Cæsar, and in 57 he spoke in favor of Cicero's recall from exile. He was alive in 55, when Cicero delivered his speech against Piso, but he probably died soon afterward. He was married twice. He must have reached a great age, since he is mentioned as the contubernalis of C. Papirius Carbo, who was consul in 120.—2. L., son of the preceding by his first wife. He espoused the republican party after Cæsar's death (44), and went with M. Brutus to Asia. After plotting against the lives of both Brutus and Cassius, he deserted to the triumvirs, Octavianus and Antony. He was rewarded for his treachery by the consulship in 36. In the war between Octavianus and Antony, he espoused the side of the latter, and commanded the right wing of Antony's fleet at the battle of Actium.—3. Brother probably of No. 1, is called step-son of L. Marcius Philippus, consul 91, and brother of L. Marcius Philippus, consul 56. According to Cicero's account, he was a profligate and a spendthrift, and having dissipated his property, united himself to P. Clodius.

PUBLICĪLIA, the second wife of M. Tullius Cicero, whom he married B.C. 46. As Cicero was then sixty years of age, and Publilia quite young, the marriage occasioned great scandal. It appears that Cicero was at the time in great pecuniary embarrassments; and after the divorce of Terentia, he was anxious to contract a new marriage for the purpose of obtaining money to pay his debts. Publilia had a large fortune, which had been left to Cicero in trust for her. The marriage proved an unhappy one, as might have been expected; and Cicero divorced her in 45.

PUBLICĪUS PHILO. Vid. PHILO.

PUBLICĪUS, VOLĒRO, tribune of the plebs B.C. 472, and again 471, effected an important change in the Roman constitution. In virtue of the laws which he proposed, the tribunes of the plebs and the ædiles were elected by the comitia tributa instead of by the comitia centuriata, as had previously been the case, and the tribes obtained the power of deliberating and determining in all matters affecting the whole nation, and not such only as concerned the plebs. Some said that the number of the tribunes was now for the first time raised to five, having been only two previously.

PUBLICĪUS SYRUS. Vid. SYRUS.

PŪCĪNUM (Πούκιννον), a fortress in Istria, in the north of Italy, on the road from Aquileia to Pola, was situated on a steep rock, which produced wine, mentioned by Pliny under the name of Vinum Pucinum.

PUDICĪTĪA (Αἰδώς), a personification of modesty, was worshipped both in Greece and at Rome. At Athens an altar was dedicated to her. At Rome two sanctuaries were dedicated to her, one under the name of Pudicitia patricia, and the other under that of Pudicitia plebeia. The former was in the forum Boarium, near the temple of Hercules. When the patrician Virginia was driven from this sanctuary by the other patrician women, because she had married the plebeian consul L. Volumnius, she built a separate sanctuary to Pudicitia plebeia in the Vicus Longus.

PULCHER, CLAUDIUS. Vid. CLAUDIUS.

PULCHĒRIA, eldest daughter of the Emperor Arcadius, was born A.D. 399. In 414, when she was only fifteen years of age, she became the guardian of her brother Theodosius, and was declared Augusta or empress. She had the virtual government in her hands during the whole lifetime of her brother, who died in 450. On his death she remained at the head of af fairs, and shortly afterward she married Marcian, with whom she continued to reign in common till her death in 453. Pulcheria was a woman of ability, and was celebrated for her piety, and her public and private virtues.

PULCHRUM PROMONTORIUM (καλὸν ἀκρωτήριον), a promontory on the northern coast of the Carthaginian territory in Northern Africa, where the elder Scipio Africanus landed; probably identical with the APOLLINIS PROMONTORIUM.

PULLUS, L. JŪNIŪS, consul B.C. 249, in the first Punic war. His fleet was destroyed by a storm, on account, it was said, of his neglecting the auspices. In despair, he put an end to his own life.

PURPIENUS MAXIMUS, M. CLŌDIŪS, was elected emperor with Balbinus in A.D. 238, when the senate received intelligence of the death of the two Gordians in Africa; but the new emperors were slain by the soldiers at Rome in the same year.

PŪPIŪS, a Roman dramatist, whose compositions are characterized by Horace as the "lacrymosa poemata Pupi."

PŪRA (Πούρα: now probably Bunpur), the capital of Gedrosia, in the interior of the country, on the borders of Carmania.

PURPURĀRIÆ INSŪLÆ (now probably the Ma-deira group), a group of islands in the Atlantic Ocean, off the northwestern coast of Africa, which are supposed to have derived their name from the purple muscles which abound on the opposite coast of Africa (Gætulia). The islands of Hera (Ἡρα) and Autolala (Αὐτολάλα), mentioned by Ptolemy, appear to belong to the group.

PURPUREŌ, L. FURIVS, prætor B.C. 200, obtained Cisalpine Gaul as his province, and gained a brilliant victory over the Gauls, who had laid siege to Cremona. He was consul 196, when he defeated the Boii.

PŪTEŌLĀNUS, a country house of Cicero near Puteoli, where he wrote his Quæstiones Academicæ, and where the Emperor Hadrian was buried.

PŪTEŌLĀNUS SINUS (now Bay of Naples), a bay of the sea on the coast of Campania, between the promontory Misenum and the promontory of Minerva, which was originally called Cumanus, but afterward Puteolanus, from the town Puteoli. The northwest corner of it was separated by a dike eight stadia in length from the rest of the bay, thus forming the LŪCRIVUS LACUS.

PŪTEŌLI (Puteolānus: now Pozzuoli), originally named DICÆARCHIA (Δικαιαρχία, Δικαίῳ-ρχεια: Δικαιαρχεύς, Δικαιαρχέτης, -χίτης), a celebrated sea-port town of Campania, situated on a promontory on the east side of the Puteolanus Sinus, and a little to the east of Cumæ, B.C. 521, under the name of Dicæarchia. In the second Punic war it was fortified by the Romans, who changed its name into that of Putcoli, either from its numerous wells, or from the stench arising from the mineral springs in its neighborhood. The town was indebted for its importance to its excellent harbor, which was protected by an extensive mole formed from the celebrated reddish earth of the neighboring hills. This earth, called Pozzolana, when mixed with chalk, forms an excellent cement, which in course of time becomes as hard in water as stone. The mole was built on arches like a bridge, and seventeen of the piers are still visible projecting above the water. To this mole Caligula attached a floating bridge, which extended as far as Baiæ, a distance of two miles. Puteoli was the chief emporium for the commerce with Alexandria and with the greater part of Spain. The town was colonized by the Romans in B.C. 194, and also anew by Augustus, Nero, and Vespasian. It was destroyed by Alaric in A.D. 410, by Genseric in 455, and also by Totilas in 545, but was on each occasion speedily rebuilt. There are still many ruins of the ancient town at the modern Pozzuoli. Of these the most important are the remains of the temple of Serapis, of the amphitheatre, and of the mole already described.

PŪTRŪT (now probably Hamamet), a sea-port town of Africa Propria (Zeugitana) on the Gulf of Neapolis (now Gulf of Hamamet). Its name is evidently Phœnician.

PŪDNA (Πύδνα: Πύδναϊος: now Kitron), a town of Macedonia, in the district Pieria, was situated at a small distance west of the Thermaic Gulf, on which it had a harbor. It was originally a Greek colony, but it was subdued by the Macedonian kings, from whom, however, it frequently revolted. Toward the end of the Peloponnesian war it was taken after a long siege by Archelaus, and its inhabitants removed twenty stadia inland; but at a later period we still find the town situated on the coast. It again revolted from the Macedonians, and was subdued by Philip, who enlarged and fortified the place. It was here that Olympias sustained a long siege against Cassander, B.C. 317-316. It is especially memorable on account of the victory gained under its walls by Æmilius Paulus over Perseus, the last king of Macedonia, 168. Under the Romans it was also called Citrum or Citrus.

PŪGĒLA or PHYGĒLA (Πύγελα, Φύγελα), a small town of Ionia, on the coast of Lydia, with a temple of Diana (Artemis) Munychia. Tradition ascribed its foundation to Agamemnon on his return from Troy.

PŪGMAI (Πυγμαῖοι, i. e., men of the height of a pygmæ, i. e., thirteen and a half inches), a fabulous people, first mentioned by Homer (Il., iii., 5), as dwelling on the shores of Ocean, and attacked by cranes in spring time. The fable is repeated by numerous writers, in various forms, especially as to the locality, some placing them in Æthiopia, others in India, and others in the extreme north of the earth. The story is referred to by Ovid and Juvenal, and forms the subject of several works of art.

PŪGMĀLĪON (Πυγμαλίον). 1. King of Cyprus and father of Metharme. He is said to have fallen in love with the ivory image of a maiden which he himself had made, and therefore to have prayed to Venus (Aphrodite) to breathe life into it. When the request was granted, Pygmalion married the maiden, and became by her the father of Paphus.—2. Son of Belus and brother of Dido, who murdered Sichæus, Dido's husband. For details, vid. Dido.

PŪYLĀDES (Πυλάδες). 1. Son of Strophius and Anaxibia, a sister of Agamemnon. His father was king of Phocis; and after the death of Aga-

Memnon, Orestes was secretly carried to his father's court. Here Pylades contracted that friendship with Orestes which became proverbial. He assisted Orestes in murdering his mother Clytæmnestra, and also accompanied him to the Tauric Chersonesus; and he eventually married his sister Electra, by whom he became the father of Hellanicus, Medon, and Strophius. For details, vid. ORESTES.—2. A pantomimic dancer in the reign of Augustus, spoken of under BATHYLLUS.

PYLÆ (Πύλα, i. e., Gates). 1. A general name for any narrow pass, such as THERMOPYLÆ, Pylæ Albania, Caspia, &c. (Vid. the several specific names.)—2. Two small islands at the entrance into the Arabicus Sinus (now Red Sea) from the Erythræan Sea.

PYLÆMÈNES (Πυλαμένης), appears to have been the name of many kings of Paphlagonia, so as to have become a kind of hereditary appellation, like that of Ptolemy in Egypt and Arsaces in Parthia. We have, however, very little definite information concerning them.

[PYLÆUS (Πύλαιος), son of Lethus, leader of the Pelasgians from Larissa, an ally of the Trojans.]

[PYLARTES (Πυλάρτης), a Trojan warrior, slain by Patroclus.]

PYLAS (Πύλας), son of Cteson, and king of Megara, who, after slaying Bias, his own father's brother, founded the town of Pylos in Peloponnesus, and gave Megara to Pandion, who had married his daughter Pylia, and accordingly was his son-in-law.

PYLÈNE (Πυλήνη), an ancient town of Ætolia, on the southern slope of Mount Aracynthus, on whose site PROSCHUM was subsequently built.

[PYLON (Πύλων), a Trojan warrior, slain by Polybetes.]

PÝLOS (Πύλος), the name of three towns on the western coast of Peloponnesus. 1. In Elis, at the foot of Mount Scollis, and about seventy or eighty stadia from the city of Elis, on the road to Olympia, near the confluence of the Ladon and the Peneus. It is said to have been founded by Pylon or Pylas of Megara, to have been destroyed by Hercules, and to have been afterward rebuilt by the Eleans.—2. In Triphylia, about thirty stadia from the coast, on the River Mamaus, west of the Mountain Minthe, and north of Lepreum.—3. In the southwest of Messenia, was situated at the foot of Mount Ægaleos on a promontory at the northern entrance of the basin, now called the Bay of Navarino, the largest and safest harbor in all Greece. This harbor was fronted and protected by the small island of Sphaacteria (now Sphagia), which stretched along the coast about a mile and three quarters, leaving only two narrow entrances at each end. In the second Messenian war the inhabitants of Pylos offered a long and brave resistance to the Spartans; but after the capture of Ira, they were obliged to quit their native country with the rest of the Messenians. Pylos now remained in ruins, but again became memorable in the Peloponnesian war, when the Athenians under Demosthenes built a fort on the promontory Coryphasium, a little south of the ancient city, and just within the northern entrance to the harbor (B.C. 425). The attempts of the Spartans to dislodge the Athenians proved unavailing; and the capture by Cleon of the Spartans, who had landed in the island of Sphaacteria, was one of the most important events in the whole war.—There has been much controversy, which of these three places was the Pylos founded by Neleus, and governed by Nestor and his descendants. The town in Elis has little or no claim to the honor, and the choice lies between the towns in Triphylia and Messenia. The ancients usually decided in favor of the Messenian Pylos; but most modern critics support the claims of the Triphylian city.

[PYRÆCHMES (Πυραϊχμης), leader of the Pæonians, an ally of the Trojans, slain by Patroclus according to Homer, or by Diomedes according to Dictys.]

PYRAMIA (τὰ Πυράμια), a town of Argolis, in the district Thyreatis, where Danaus is said to have landed.

PYRÆMUS. Vid. THISBÆ.

PYRÆMUS (Πύραμος: now Jihan), one of the largest rivers of Asia Minor, rises in the anti-Taurus range, near Arabissus in Cataonia (the southeastern part of Cappadocia), and after running southeast, first under ground, and then as a navigable river, breaks through the Taurus chain by a deep and narrow ravine, and then flows southwest through Cilicia in a deep and rapid stream, about one stadium (six hundred and six feet) in width, and falls into the sea near Mallus. Its ancient name is said to have been LEUCOSYRUS, from the LEUCOSYRI who dwelt on its banks.

[PYRANDER (Πύρανδρος), a historian of an unknown period, wrote a work entitled Πελοποννησιακά.]

[PYRASUS (Πύρασος), a city of the Thessalian district Phthiotis, mentioned by Homer, but already in Strabo's time in ruins: it was situated on the coast, twenty stadia (two geographical miles) from Thebæ, with a Demetrium.]

[PYRASUS (Πύρασος), a Trojan warrior, slain by Ajax.]

PYRÈNE OR PYRÈNÆI MONTES (Πυρήνη, τὰ Πυρρηναία ὄρη: now Pyrenees), a range of mountains extending from the Atlantic to the Mediterranean, and forming the boundary between Gaul and Spain. The length of these mountains is about two hundred and seventy miles in a straight line; their breadth varies from about forty miles to twenty; their greatest height is between eleven thousand and twelve thousand feet. The Romans first became acquainted with these mountains by their campaigns against the Carthaginians in Spain in the second Punic war. Their name, however, had travelled eastward at a much earlier period, since Herodotus (ii., 33) speaks of a city Pyrene belonging to the Celts, near which the Ister rises. The ancient writers usually derived the name from πῦρ, "fire," and then, according to a common practice, invented a story to explain the false etymology, relating that a great fire once raged upon the mountains. The name, however, is probably connected with the Celtic Byrin or Bryn, "a mountain." The continuation of the mountains along the Mare Cantabrium was called Saltus Vasconum, and still further west Mons Vindius or Vinnius. The Romans were acquainted with only three passes over the Pyrenees, the one on the west near Carasæ (now Garis), not far from the Mare Cantabricum, the one in the middle leading from Cæsaraugusta to Beneharnum (now Baréges), and the one on the east, which was most frequently used, near the coast of the Mediterranean by Juncaria (now Junquera).

PYRĒNES PROMONTORIŪM, or PROMONTORIUM VĒNĒRIS (now Cape Creus), the southeastern extremity of the Pyrenees in Spain, on the frontiers of Gaul, derived its second name from a temple of Venus on the promontory.

PYRGI. L (Πύργοι or Πύργος: Πυργίτης), the most southerly town of Triphylia in Elis, near the Messenian frontier, said to have been founded by the Minyæ.—2. (Pyrgensis: now Santa Severa), an ancient Pelagie town on the coast of Etruria, was used as the port of Cære or Agylla, and was a place of considerable importance as a commercial emporium. It was at an early period the head-quarters of the Tyrrenian pirates. It possessed a very wealthy temple of Ilithyia, which Dionysius of Syracuse plundered in B.C. 384. Pyrgi is mentioned at a later time as a Roman colony, but lost its importance under the Roman dominion. There are still remains at Sta Severa of the ancient polygonal walls of Pyrgi.

[PYRGO, nurse of the children of Priam, accompanied Eneas after the destruction of Troy, and showed the Trojan women that it was a goddess, and not Beroe, who urged them to fire the Trojan ships in Sicily.]

PYRGOŪTELES (Πυργοτέλης), one of the most celebrated gem engravers of ancient Greece, was a contemporary of Alexander the Great, who placed him on a level with Apelles and Lysippus, by naming him as the only artist who was permitted to engrave seal-rings for the king.

PYRŪCIUS, a Greek painter, who probably lived soon after the time of Alexander the Great. He devoted himself entirely to the production of small pictures of low and mean subjects.

PYRPHLĒŪETHON (Πυρφλεγέθων), that is, flaming with fire, the name of one of the rivers in the lower world.

PYROMĀCHUS, the name of two artists. The name occurs in four different forms, namely, Phyromachus, Phylomachus, Philomachus, and Pyromachus. 1. An Athenian sculptor, who executed the bas-reliefs on the frieze of the temple of Minerva (Athena) Polias, about B.C. 415. The true form of his name appears to have been Phyromachus.—2. An artist who flourished B.C. 295–240, is mentioned by Pliny (xxxiv., 8, s. 19) as one of those statues who represented the battles of Attalus and Eumenes against the Gauls. Of these battles the most celebrated was that which obtained for Attalus I. the title of king, about 241. It is supposed by the best writers on ancient art that the celebrated statue of a dying combatant, popularly called the Dying Gladiator, is a copy from one of the bronze statues in the works mentioned by Pliny. It is evidently the statue of a Celt.

PYRRĪA (Πύρρα: Πυρραῖος). 1. A town on the western coast of the island of Lesbos, on the inner part of the deep bay named after it, and consequently on the narrowest part of the island.—2. A town and promontory of Phthiotis in Thessaly, on the Pagasan Gulf, and near the frontiers of Magnesia. Off this promontory there were two small islands, named Pyrrha and Deucalion.—3. A small Ionian town in Caria, on the northern side of the Sinus Latmicus, and fifty stadia from the mouth of the Mæander.

PYRRHI CASTRA (Πύρρον χῆραξ), a fortified place in the north of Laconia, where Pyrrhus probably encamped in his invasion of the country in B.C. 272.

PYRRHĪCHUS (Πύρριχος), a town of the Eleuthero-lacones in the southwest of Laconia.

PYRRHO (Πύρρων), the founder of the Skeptical or Pyrrhonian school of philosophy, was a native of Elis in Peloponnesus. He is said to have been poor, and to have followed at first the profession of a painter. He is then said to have been attracted to philosophy by the books of Democritus, to have attended the lectures of Bryson, a disciple of Stilpon, to have attached himself closely to Anaxarehus, and with him to have joined the expedition of Alexander the Great. During the greater part of his life he lived in retirement, and endeavored to render himself independent of all external circumstances. His disciple Timon extolled with admiration his divine repose of soul, and his indifference to pleasure or pain. So highly was he valued by his fellow-citizens that they made him their high priest, and erected a monument to him after his death. The Athenians conferred upon him the rights of citizenship. We know little respecting the principles of his skeptical philosophy; and the ridiculous tales told about him by Diogenes Laertius are probably the invention of his enemies. He asserted that certain knowledge on any subject was unattainable, and that the great object of man ought to be to lead a virtuous life. Pyrrho wrote no works, except a poem addressed to Alexander, which was rewarded by the latter in a royal manner. His philosophical system was first reduced to writing by his disciple Timon. He reached the age of ninety years, but we have no mention of the year either of his birth or of his death.

PYRRHUS (Πύρρος). 1. Mythological. Vid. NEOPTOLEMUS.—2. King of Epirus, son of Æacides and Phthia, was born B.C. 318. His ancestors claimed descent from Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles, who was said to have settled in Epirus after the Trojan war, and to have become the founder of the race of Molossian kings. On the deposition of his father by the Epirots (vid. ÆACIDES), Pyrrhus, who was then a child of only two years old, was saved from destruction by the faithful adherents of the king, who carried him to Glaucias, the king of the Taulantians, an Illyrian people. Glaucias took the child under his care, and brought him up with his own children. He not only refused to surrender Pyrrhus to Cassander, but about ten years afterward he marched into Epirus at the head of an army, and placed Pyrrhus on the throne, leaving him, however, under the care of guardians, as he was then only twelve years of age. In the course of four or five years, however, Cassander, who had gained his supremacy in Greece, prevailed upon the Epirots to expel their young king. Pyrrhus, who was still only seventeen years of age, joined Demetrius, who had married his sister Deïdamia, accompanied him to Asia, and was present at the battle of Ipsus, 301, in which he gained great renown for his valor. Antigonus fell in the battle, and Demetrius became a fugitive; but Pyrrhus did not desert his brother-in-law in his misfortunes, and shortly afterward went for him as a hostage into Egypt. Here he was fortunate enough to win the favor of Berenice, the wife of Ptolemy, and received in marriage Antigone, her daughter by her first husband. Ptolemy now supplied him with a fleet and forces, with which he returned to Epirus. Neoptolemus, who had reigned from the time that Pyrrhus had been driven from the kingdom, agreed to share the sovereignty with Pyrrhus. But such an arrangement could not last long, and Pyrrhus anticipated his own destruction by putting his rival to death. This appears to have happened in 295, in which year Pyrrhus is said to have begun to reign. He was now twenty-three years old, and he soon became one of the most popular princes of his time. His daring courage made him a favorite with his troops, and his affability and generosity secured the love of his people. He seems at an early age to have taken Alexander as his model, and to have been fired with the ambition of imitating his exploits and treading in his footsteps. His eyes were first directed to the conquest of Macedonia. By assisting Alexander, the son of Cassander, against his brother Antipater, he obtained possession of the whole of the Macedonian dominions on the western side of Greece. But the Macedonian throne itself fell into the hands of Demetrius, greatly to the disappointment of Pyrrhus. The two former friends now became the most deadly enemies, and open war broke out between them in 291. After the war had been carried on with great vigor and various vicissitudes for four years, Pyrrhus joined the coalition formed in 287 by Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus against Demetrius. Lysimachus and Pyrrhus invaded Macedonia; Demetrius was deserted by his troops, and obliged to fly in disguise; and the kingdom was divided between Lysimachus and Pyrrhus. But the latter did not long retain his portion; the Macedonians preferred the rule of their old general Lysimachus, and Pyrrhus was accordingly driven out of the country after a reign of seven months (286). For the next few years Pyrrhus reigned quietly in Epirus without embarking in any new enterprise. But a life of inactivity was insupportable to him, and accordingly he readily accepted the invitation of the Tarentines to assist them in their war against the Romans. He crossed over to Italy early in 280, in the thirty-eighth year of his age. He took with him twenty thousand foot, three thousand horse, two thousand archers, five hundred slingers, and either fifty or twenty elephants, having previously sent Milo, one of his generals, with a detachment of three thousand men. As soon as he arrived at Tarentum, he began to make vigorous preparations for carrying on the war; and as the giddy and licentious inhabitants of Tarentum complained of the severity of his discipline, he forthwith treated them as their master rather than as their ally, shut up the theatre and all other public places, and compelled their young men to serve in his ranks. In the first campaign (280), the Roman consul, M. Valerius Lævinus, was defeated by Pyrrhus near Heraclea, on the bank of the River Siris. The battle was long and bravely contested, and it was not till Pyrrhus brought forward his elephants, which bore down every thing before them, that the Romans took to flight. The loss of Pyrrhus, though inferior to that of the Romans, was still very considerable. A large proportion of his officers and best troops had fallen; and he said, as he viewed the field of battle, "Another such victory, and I must return to Epirus alone." He therefore availed himself of his success to send his minister Cineas to Rome with proposals of peace, while he himself marched slowly toward the city. His proposals, however, were rejected by the senate. He accordingly continued his march, ravaging the Roman territory as he went along. He advanced within twenty-four miles of Rome; but as he found it impossible to compel the Romans to accept the peace, he retraced his steps, and withdrew into winter-quarters to Tarentum. As soon as the armies were quartered for the winter, the Romans sent an embassy to Pyrrhus to endeavor to obtain the ransom of the Roman prisoners. The ambassadors were received by Pyrrhus in the most distinguished manner; and his interviews with C. Fabricius, who was at the head of the embassy, form one of the most celebrated stories in Roman history. Vid. FABRICIUS. In the second campaign (279), Pyrrhus gained another victory near Asculum over the Romans, who were commanded by the consuls P. Decius Mus and P. Sulpicius Saverrio. The battle, however, was followed by no decisive results, and the brunt of it had again fallen, as in the previous year, almost exclusively on the Greek troops of the king. He was therefore unwilling to hazard his surviving Greeks by another campaign with the Romans, and accordingly he lent a ready ear to the invitations of the Greeks in Sicily, who begged him to come to their assistance against the Carthaginians. The Romans were likewise anxious to get rid of so formidable an opponent, that they might complete the subjugation of Southern Italy without further interruption. When both parties had the same wishes, it was not difficult to find a pretext for bringing the war to a conclusion. This was afforded at the beginning of the following year (278) by one of the servants of Pyrrhus deserting to the Romans and proposing to the consuls to poison his master. The consuls Fabricius and Æmilius sent back the deserters to the king, stating that they abhorred a victory gained by treason. Thereupon Pyrrhus, to show his gratitude, sent Cineas to Rome with all the Roman prisoners, without ransom and without conditions; and the Romans granted him a truce, though not a formal peace, as he had not consented to evacuate Italy. Pyrrhus now crossed over into Sicily, where he remained upward of two years, from the middle of 478 to the latter end of 476. At first he met with brilliant success, defeated the Carthaginians, and took Eryx; but having failed in an attempt upon Lilybæum, he lost his popularity with the Greeks, who began to form cabals and plots against him. This led to retaliation on the part of Pyrrhus, and to acts which were deemed both cruel and tyrannical by the Greeks. His position in Sicily at length became so uncomfortable and dangerous that he soon became anxious to abandon the island. Accordingly, when his Italian allies again begged him to come to their assistance, he gladly complied with their request. Pyrrhus returned to Italy in the autumn of 276. In the following year (275) the war was brought to a close. Pyrrhus was defeated with great loss near Beneventum by the Roman consul Curius Dentatus, and was obliged to leave Italy. He brought back with him to Epirus only eight thousand foot and five hundred horse, and had not money to maintain even these without undertaking new wars. Accordingly, in 273, he invaded Macedonia, of which Antigonus Gonatas, the son of Demetrius, was then king. His only object at first seems to have been plunder; but his success far exceeded his expectations. Antigonus was deserted by his own troops, and Pyrrhus thus became king of Macedonia a second time. But scarcely had he obtained possession of the kingdom before his restless spirit drove him into new enterprises. On the invitation of Cleonymus, he turned his arms against Sparta, but was repulsed in an attack upon this city. From Sparta he marched toward Argos in order to support Aristæas, one of the leading citizens at Argos, against his rival Aristippus, whose cause was espoused by Antigonus. In the night time Aristæas admitted Pyrrhus into the city; but the alarm having been given, the citadel and all the strong places were seized by the Argives of the opposite faction. On the dawn of day Pyrrhus saw that it would be necessary for him to retreat; and as he was fighting his way out of the city, an Argive woman hurled down from the house-top a ponderous tile, which struck Pyrrhus on the back of his neck. He fell from his horse stunned with the blow, and being recognized by some of the soldiers of Antigonus, was quickly dispatched. His head was cut off and carried to Antigonus, who turned away from the sight, and ordered the body to be interred with becoming honors. Pyrrhus perished in 272, in the forty-sixth year of his age, and in the twenty-third of his reign. He was the greatest warrior and one of the best princes of his time. With his daring courage, his military skill, and his kingly bearing, he might have become the most powerful monarch of his day if he had steadily pursued the immediate object before him. But he never rested satisfied with any acquisition, and was ever grasping at some fresh object: hence Antigonus compared him to a gambler, who made many good throws with the dice, but was unable to make the proper use of the game. Pyrrhus was regarded in subsequent times as one of the greatest generals that had ever lived. Hannibal said that of all generals Pyrrhus was the first, Scipio the second, and himself the third; or, according to another version of the story, Alexander was the first, Pyrrhus the second, and himself the third. Pyrrhus wrote a work on the art of war, which was read in the time of Cicero; and his commentaries are quoted by both Dionysius and Plutarch. Pyrrhus married four wives: 1. Antigone, the daughter of Berenice. 2. A daughter of Audoleon, king of the Pæonians. 3. Baccenna, a daughter of Bardylis, king of the Illyrians. 4. Lanassa, a daughter of Agathocles of Syracuse. His children were, 1. Ptolemy, born 295; killed in battle, 272. 2. Alexander, who succeeded his father as king of Epirus. 3. Helenus. 4. Nereis, who married Gelon of Syracuse. 5. Olympias, who married her own brother Alexander. 6. Deidamia or Laodamia.—3. II. King of Epirus, son of Alexander II. and Olympias, and grandson of Pyrrhus I., was a child at the time of his father's death (between 262 and 258). During his minority the kingdom was governed by his mother Olympias. According to one account, Olympias survived Pyrrhus, who died soon after he had grown up to manhood; according to another account, Olympias had poisoned a maiden to whom Pyrrhus was attached, and was herself poisoned by him in revenge.

ΠΥΘΑΓΩΡΑΣ (Πυθαγόρας). 1. A celebrated Greek philosopher, was a native of Samos, and the son of Mnesarchus, who was either a merchant, or, according to others, an engraver of signets. The date of his birth is uncertain, but all authorities agree that he flourished in the times of Polycrates and Tarquinius Superbus (B.C. 540-510). He studied in his own country under Creophilus, Pherecydes of Syros, and others, and is said to have visited Egypt and many countries of the East for the purpose of acquiring knowledge. We have not much trustworthy evidence either as to the kind and amount of knowledge which he acquired, or as to his definite philosophical views. It is certain, however, that he believed in the transmigration of souls; and he is said to have pretended that he had been Euphorbus, the son of Panthus, in the Trojan war, as well as various other characters. He is further said to have discovered the propositions that the triangle inscribed in a semicircle is right-angled, that the square on the hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle is equal to the sum of the squares on the sides. There is a celebrated story of his having discovered the arithmetical relations of the musical scale by observing accidentally the various sounds produced by hammers of different weights striking upon an anvil, and suspending by strings weights equal to those of the different hammers. The retailers of the story, of course, never took the trouble to verify the experiment, or they would have discovered that different hammers do not produce different sounds from the same anvil, any more than different clappers do from the same bell. Discoveries in astronomy are also attributed to Pythagoras. There can be little doubt that he paid great attention to arithmetic, and its application to weights, measures, and the theory of music. Apart from all direct testimony, however, it may safely be affirmed, that the very remarkable influence exerted by Pythagoras, and even the fact that he was made the hero of so many marvellous stories, prove him to have been a man both of singular capabilities and of great acquirements. It may also be affirmed with safety that the religious element was the predominant one in the character of Pythagoras, and that religious ascendancy in connection with a certain mystic religious system was the object which he chiefly labored to secure. It was this religious element which made the profoundest impression upon his contemporaries. They regarded him as standing in a peculiarly close connection with the gods. The Crotonians even identified him with the Hyperborean Apollo. And without viewing him as an impostor, we may easily believe that he himself, to some extent, shared the same views. He pretended to divination and prophecy; and he appears as the revealer of a mode of life calculated to raise his disciples above the level of mankind, and to recommend them to the favor of the gods. No certainty can be arrived at as to the length of time spent by Pythagoras in Egypt or the East, or as to his residence and efforts in Samos or other Grecian cities, before he settled at Crotona in Italy. He probably removed to Crotona because he found it impossible to realize his schemes in his native country while under the tyranny of Polycrates. The reason why he selected Crotona as the sphere of his operations it is impossible to ascertain; but soon after his arrival in that city he attained extensive influence, and gained over great numbers to enter into his views. His adherents were chiefly of the noble and wealthy classes. Three hundred of these were formed into a select brotherhood or club, bound by a sort of vow to Pythagoras and each other, for the purpose of cultivating the religious and ascetic observances enjoined by their master, and of studying his religious and philosophical theories. Every thing that was done and taught among the members was kept a profound secret from all without its pale. It was an old Pythagorean maxim, that every thing was not to be told to every body. There were also gradations among the members themselves. In the admission of candidates Pythagoras is said to have placed great reliance on his physiognomical discernment. If admitted, they had to pass through a period of probation, in which their powers of maintaining silence were especially tested, as well as their general temper, disposition, and mental capacity. As regards the nature of the esoteric instruction to which only the most approved members of the fraternity were admitted, some have supposed that it had reference to the political views of Pythagoras. Others have maintained, with greater probability, that it related mainly to the orgies, or secret religious doctrines and usages, which undoubtedly formed a prominent feature in the Pythagorean system, and were peculiarly connected with the worship of Apollo. There were some outward peculiarities of an ascetic kind in the mode of life to which the members of the brotherhood were subjected. Some represent him as forbidding all animal food; but all the members can not have been subjected to this prohibition, since the athletic Milo, for instance, could not possibly have dispensed with animal food. According to some ancient authorities, he allowed the use of all kinds of animal food except the flesh of oxen used for ploughing, and rams. There is a similar discrepancy as to the prohibition of fish and beans. But temperance of all kinds seems to have been strictly enjoined.

It is also stated that they had common meals, resembling the Spartan syssitia, at which they met in companies of ten. Considerable importance seems to have been attached to music and gymnastics in the daily exercises of the disciples. Their whole discipline is represented as tending to produce a lofty serenity and self-possession, regarding the exhibition of which various anecdotes were current in antiquity. Among the best ascertained features of the brotherhood are the devoted attachment of the members to each other, and their sovereign contempt for those who did not belong to their ranks. It appears that they had some secret conventional symbols, by which members of the fraternity could recognize each other, even if they had never met before. Clubs similar to that at Crotona were established at Sybaris, Metapontum, Tarentum, and other cities of Magna Græcia. The institutions of Pythagoras were certainly not intended to withdraw those who adopted them from active exertion, that they might devote themselves exclusively to religious and philosophical contemplations. He rather aimed at the production of a calm bearing and elevated tone of character, through which those trained in the discipline of the Pythagorean life should exhibit in their personal and social capacities a reflection of the order and harmony of the universe. Whether he had any distinct political designs in the foundation of his brotherhood is doubtful; but it was perfectly natural, even without any express design on his part, that a club such as the Three Hundred of Crotona should gradually come to mingle political with other objects, and, by the facilities afforded by their secret and compact organization, should speedily gain extensive political influence. That this influence should be decisively on the side of aristocracy or oligarchy resulted naturally both from the nature of the Pythagorean institutions, and from the rank and social position of the members of the brotherhood. Through them, of course, Pythagoras himself exercised a large amount of indirect influence over the affairs both of Crotona and of other Italian cities. This Pythagorean brotherhood or order resembled in many respects the one founded by Loyola. It is easy to understand how this aristocratical and exclusive club would excite the jealousy and hostility not only of the democratical party in Crotona, but also of a considerable number of the opposite faction. The hatred which they had excited speedily led to their destruction. The populace of Crotona rose against them; and an attack was made upon them while assembled either in the house of Milo, or in some other place of meeting. The building was set on fire, and many of the assembled members perished; only the younger and more active escaped. Similar commotions ensued in the other cities of Magna Græcia in which Pythagorean clubs had been formed. As an active and organized brotherhood, the Pythagorean order was every where suppressed; but the Pythagoreans still continued to exist as a sect, the members of which kept up among themselves their religious observances and scientific pursuits, while individuals, as in the case of Archytas, acquired now and then great political influence. Respecting the fate of Pythagoras himself, the accounts varied. Some say that he perished in the temple with his disciples, others that he fled first to Tarentum, and that, being driven thence, he escaped to Metapontum, and there starved himself to death. His tomb was shown at Metapontum in the time of Cicero. According to some accounts, Pythagoras married Theano, a lady of Crotona, and had a daughter Damo, and a son Telauges, or, according to others, two daughters, Damo and Myia; while other notices seem to imply that he had a wife and a daughter grown up when he came to Crotona. When we come to inquire what were the philosophical or religious opinions held by Pythagoras himself, we are met at the outset by the difficulty that even the authors from whom we have to draw possessed no authentic records bearing upon the age of Pythagoras himself. If Pythagoras ever wrote any thing, his writings perished with him, or not long after. The probability is that he wrote nothing. Every thing current under his name in antiquity was spurious. It is all but certain that Philolaus was the first who published the Pythagorean doctrines, at any rate in a written form. (Vid. PHILOLAUS.) Still there was so marked a peculiarity running through the Pythagorean philosophy, that there can be little question as to the germs of the system, at any rate, having been derived from Pythagoras himself. Pythagoras resembled the philosophers of the Ionic school, who undertook to solve, by means of a single primordial principle, the vague problem of the origin and constitution of the universe as a whole. His predilection for mathematical studies led him to trace the origin of all things to number, his theory being suggested, or at all events confirmed, by the observation of various numerical relations, or analogies to them, in the phenomena of the universe. Musical principles likewise played almost as important a part in the Pythagorean system as mathematical or numerical ideas. We find running through the entire system the idea that order, or harmony of relation, is the regulating principle of the whole universe. The intervals between the heavenly bodies were supposed to be determined according to the laws and relations of musical harmony. Hence arose the celebrated doctrine of the harmony of the spheres; for the heavenly bodies, in their motion, could not but occasion a certain sound or note, depending on their distances and velocities; and as these were determined by the laws of harmonical intervals, the notes altogether formed a regular musical scale or harmony. This harmony, however, we do not hear, either because we have been accustomed to it from the first, and have never had an opportunity of contrasting it with stillness, or because the sound is so powerful as to exceed our capacities for hearing. The ethics of the Pythagoreans consisted more in ascetic practice, and maxims for the restraint of the passions, especially of anger, and the cultivation of the power of endurance, than in scientific theory. What of the latter they had was, as might be expected, intimately connected with their number-theory. Happiness consisted in the science of the perfection of the virtues of the soul, or in the perfect science of numbers.

Likeness to the Deity was to be the object of all our endeavors, man becoming better as he approaches the gods, who are the guardians and guides of men. Great importance was attached to the influence of music in controlling the force of the passions. Self-examination was strongly insisted on. The transmigration of souls was viewed apparently in the light of a process of purification. Souls under the dominion of sensuality either passed into the bodies of animals, or, if incurable, were thrust down into Tartarus, to meet with expiation or condign punishment. The pure were exalted to higher modes of life, and at last attained to incorporeal existence. As regards the fruits of this system of training or belief, it is interesting to remark, that wherever we have notices of distinguished Pythagoreans, we usually hear of them as men of great uprightness, conscientiousness, and self-restraint, and as capable of devoted and enduring friendship. Vid. ARCHYTAS, DAMON, and PHINTIAS.—2. Of Rhegium, one of the most celebrated statuarys of Greece, probably flourished B.C. 480–430. His most important works appear to have been his statues of athletes.

ΠΥΘΕΑΣ (Pythæas). 1. An Athenian orator, distinguished by his unceasing animosity against Demosthenes. He had no political principles, made no pretensions to honesty, and changed sides as often as suited his convenience or his interest. Of the part that he took in political affairs only two or three facts are recorded. He opposed the honors which the Athenians proposed to confer upon Alexander, but he afterward espoused the interests of the Macedonian party. He accused Demosthenes of having received bribes from Harpalus. In the Lamian war, B.C. 322, he joined Antipater, and had thus the satisfaction of surviving his great enemy Demosthenes. He is said to have been the author of the well-known saying, that the orations of Demosthenes smelt of the lamp.—2. Of Massilia in Gaul, a celebrated Greek navigator, who sailed to the western and northern parts of Europe, and wrote a work containing the results of his discoveries. He probably lived in the time of Alexander the Great, or shortly afterward. He appears to have undertaken voyages, one in which he visited Britain and Thule, and of which he probably gave an account in his work On the Ocean; and a second, undertaken after his return from his first voyage, in which he coasted along the whole of Europe from Gadir (now Cadiz) to the Tanais, and the description of which probably formed the subject of his Periplus. Pytheas made Thule a six days' sail from Britain, and said that the day and the night were each six months long in Thule; hence some modern writers have supposed that he must have reached Iceland, while others have maintained that he advanced as far as the Shetland Islands. But either supposition is very improbable, and neither is necessary; for reports of the great length of the day and night in the northern parts of Europe had already reached the Greeks, before the time of Pytheas. There has been likewise much dispute as to what river we are to understand by the Tanais. The most probable conjecture is that, upon reaching the Elbe, Pytheas concluded that he had arrived at the Tanais, separating Europe from Asia.—3. A silver-chaser, who flourished at Rome in the age immediately following that of Pompey, and whose productions commanded a remarkably high price.

ΠΥΘΙΑΣ (Πυθιάς). 1. The sister or adopted daughter of Hermias, and the wife of Aristotle.—2. Daughter of Aristotle and Pythias.

ΠΥΘΙΪΜ (Πύθιον). 1. A place in Attica, not far from Eleusis.—2. A town of Thessaly in the eastern part of the district Hestiatotis, which, with Azoros and Doliche, formed a Tripolis.

ΠΥΘΙΪΣ (Πύθιος), a Lydian, the son of Atys, was a man of enormous wealth, which he derived from his gold mines in the neighborhood of Celænæ in Phrygia. When Xerxes arrived at Celænæ, Pythius banqueted him and his whole army. His five sons accompanied Xerxes. Pythius, alarmed by an eclipse of the sun which happened, came to Xerxes, and begged that the eldest might be left behind. This request so enraged the king that he had the young man immediately killed and cut in two, and the two portions of his body placed on either side of the road, and then ordered the army to march between them.

[ΠΥΘΟ. Vid. DELPHI.]

ΠΥΘΟΚΛΕΪΔΗΣ (Πυθοκλείδης), a celebrated musician of the time of Pericles, was a native of Ceos, and flourished at Athens, under the patronage of Pericles, whom he instructed in his art.

ΠΥΘΟΔΩΡΙΣ (Πυθοδώρις), wife of Polemon I., king of Pontus. After the death of her husband she retained possession of the government. She subsequently married Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, but after his death (A.D. 17) returned to her own kingdom, of which she continued to administer the affairs herself until her decease, which probably did not take place until A.D. 38. Of her two sons, the one, Zenon, became king of Armenia, while the other, Polemon, succeeded her on the throne of Pontus.

ΠΥΘΩΝ (Πύθων). 1. The celebrated serpent, which was produced from the mud left on the earth after the deluge of Deucalion. He lived in the caves of Mount Parnassus, but was slain by Apollo, who founded the Pythian games in commemoration of his victory, and received in consequence the surname Pythius.—2. Of Catania, a dramatic poet of the time of Alexander, whom he accompanied into Asia, and whose army he entertained with a satyric drama when they were celebrating the Dionysia on the banks of the Hydaspes. The drama was in ridicule of Harpalus and the Athenians. [The fragments of Python are contained in Wagner's Trag. Græc. Fragm., p. 134-136, Paris, 1846.]

ΠΥΞΙΤΗΣ (Πυξίτης: now Vitcheh), a river of Pontus, falling into the Euxine near Trapezus.

QUADI, a powerful German people of the Suevic race, dwelt in the southeast of Germany, between Mount Gabreta, the Hercynian forest, the Sarmatian mountains, and the Danube. They were bounded on the west by the Marcomanni, with whom they were always closely united, on the north by the Gothini and Osi, on the east by the Iazyges Metanastæ, from whom they were separated by the River Granus (now Gran), and on the south by the Pannonians, from whom they were divided by the Danube. They probably settled in this district at the same time as the Marcomanni made themselves masters of Bohemia (vid. MARCOMANNI); but we have no account of the earlier settlements of the Quadi. When Maroboduus, and shortly afterward his successor Catualla, had been expelled from their dominions and had taken refuge with the Romans in the reign of Tiberius, the Romans assigned to the barbarians, who had accompanied these monarchs, and who consisted chiefly of Marcomanni and Quadi, the country between the Marus (now March? Morava? or Marosch?) and Cusus (now Waag?), and gave to them as king Vannius, who belonged to the Quadi. Vannius was expelled by his nephews Vangio and Sido, but this new kingdom of the Quadi continued for a long time afterward under Roman protection. In the reign of M. Aurelius, however, the Quadi joined the Marcomanni and other German tribes in the long and bloody war against the empire, which lasted during the greater part of that emperor's reign. The independence of the Quadi and Marcomanni was secured by the peace which Commodus made with them in A.D. 180. Their name is especially memorable in the history of this war by the victory which M. Aurelius gained over them in 174, when his army was in great danger of being destroyed by the barbarians, and was said to have been saved by a sudden storm, which was attributed to the prayers of his Christian soldiers. (Vid. p. 131, b.) The Quadi disappear from history toward the end of the fourth century. They probably migrated with the Suevi further west.

QUADRATUS, one of the Apostolic Fathers, and an early apologist for the Christian religion. He passed the early part of his life in Asia Minor, and was afterward bishop of the Church at Athens. He presented his Apology to Hadrian in the tenth year of his reign (A.D. 126). This apology has been long lost.

QUADRATUS, ASINIUS, lived in the times of Philippus I. and II., emperors of Rome (A.D. 244-249), and wrote two historical works in the Greek language. 1. A history of Rome, in fifteen books, in the Ionic dialect, called Χιλιοετηρίς, because it related the history of the city, from its foundation to the thousandth year of its nativity (A.D. 248), when the Ludi Sæculares were performed with extraordinary pomp. 2. A history of Parthia.

QUADRATUS, FANNIUS, a contemporary of Horace, was one of those envious Roman poets who tried to depreciate Horace, because his writings threw their own into the shade.

QUADRATUS, L. NINNIVS, tribune of the plebs B.C. 58, distinguished himself by his opposition to the measures of his colleague, P. Clodius, against Cicero.

QUADRATUS, UMMIDIUS. 1. Governor of Syria during the latter end of the reign of Claudius, and the commencement of the reign of Nero, from about A.D. 51 to 60.—2. A friend and admirer of the younger Pliny, whom he took as his model in oratory.

QUADRIFRONS, a surname of Janus. It is said that after the conquest of the Faliscans an image of Janus was found with four foreheads. Hence a temple of Janus Quadrifrons was afterward built in the Forum transitorium, which had four gates. The fact of the god being represented with four heads is considered by the ancients to be an indication of his being the divinity presiding over the year with its four seasons.

QUADRIGARIUS, Q. CLAUDIUS, a Roman historian who flourished B.C. 100-78. His work, which contained at least twenty-three books, commenced immediately after the destruction of Rome by the Gauls, and must in all probability have come down to the death of Sulla, since the seventh consulship of Marius was commemorated in the nineteenth book. By Livy he is uniformly referred to simply as Claudius or Clodius. By other authors he is cited as Quintius, as Claudius, as Q. Claudius, as Claudius Quadrigarius, or as Quadrigarius. From the caution evinced by Livy in making use of him as an authority, especially in matters relating to numbers, it would appear that he was disposed to indulge, although in a less degree, in those exaggerations which disfigured the productions of his contemporary Valerius Antias. It is somewhat remarkable that he is nowhere noticed by Cicero. By A. Gellius, on the other hand, he is quoted repeatedly, and praised in the warmest terms.

QUARIATES, a people in Gallia Narbonensis, on the western slope of the Alpes Cottiae, in the valley of Queiras.

QUIES, the personification of tranquillity, was worshipped as a divinity by the Romans. She had one sanctuary on the Via Lavicana, probably a pleasant resting-place for the weary traveller, and another outside the Porta Collina.

QUIETUS, Q. LUSIUS. 1. An independent Moorish chief, served with distinction under Trajan both in the Dacian and Parthian wars. Trajan made him governor of Judæa, and raised him to the consulship in A.D. 116 or 117. After Trajan's death he returned to his native country, but he was suspected by Hadrian of fomenting the disturbances which then prevailed in Mauretania, and was shortly afterward put to death by order of Hadrian.—[2. C. FULVIUS, included in the list of the thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio, was one of the two sons of that Marianus who assumed the purple after the capture of Valerian. Having charge of the eastern provinces, when he heard of the defeat and death of his father and brother, he took refuge in Emesa, where he was besieged, captured, and slain by Odenathus in A.D. 262.]

QUINTILIUS VARUS. Vid. VARUS.

QUINTIA, or QUINCTIA GENS, an ancient patrician gens at Rome, was one of the Alban houses removed to Rome by Tullus Hostilius, and enrolled by him among the patricians. Its members often held, throughout the whole history of the republic, the highest offices of the state. Its three most distinguished families bore the names of Capitolinus, Cincinnatus, and Flaminius.

[QUINTIANUS AFRANIUS, a senator of dissolute life, had been ridiculed by Nero in a poem, and in revenge took part in Piso's conspiracy against that emperor. On the detection of the conspiracy, he had to put an end to his life.]

QUINTILIANUS, M. FABIUS, the most celebrated of Roman rhetoricians, was born at Calagurris (now Calahorra), in Spain, A.D. 40. If not reared at Rome, he must, at least, have completed his education there, for he himself informs us that, while yet a very young man, he attended the lectures of Domitius Afer, who died in 59. Having revisited Spain, he returned from thence (68) in the train of Galba, and forthwith began to practice at the bar, where he acquired considerable reputation. But he was chiefly distinguished as a teacher of eloquence, bearing away the palm in this department from all his rivals, and associating his name, even to a proverb, with pre-eminence in the art. Among his pupils were numbered Pliny the younger and the two grand-nephews of Domitian. By this prince he was invested with the insignia and title of consul (consularia ornamenta), and is, moreover, celebrated as the first public instructor who, in virtue of the endowment by Vespasian, received a regular salary from the imperial exchequer. After having devoted twenty years, commencing probably with 69, to the duties of his profession, he retired into private life, and is supposed to have died about 118. The great work of Quintilian is a complete system of rhetoric in twelve books, entitled De Institutione Oratoria Libri XII., or sometimes Institutiones Oratorie, dedicated to his friend Marcellus Victorius, himself a celebrated orator, and a favorite at court. It was written during the reign of Domitian, while the author was discharging his duties as preceptor to the sons of the emperor's niece. In a short preface to his bookseller Trypho, he acquaints us that he commenced this undertaking after he had retired from his labors as a public instructor (probably in 89), and that he finished his task in little more than two years. The first book contains a dissertation on the preliminary training requisite before a youth can enter directly upon the studies necessary to mould an accomplished orator, and presents us with a carefully-sketched outline of the method to be pursued in educating children, from the time they leave the cradle until they pass from the hands of the grammarian. In the second book we find an exposition of the first principles of rhetoric, together with an investigation into the nature or essence of the art. The five following are devoted to invention and arrangement (inventio, dispositio); the eighth, ninth, tenth, and eleventh, to composition (including the proper use of the figures of speech) and delivery, comprised under the general term elocutio; and the last is occupied with what the author considers by far the most important portion of his project, an inquiry, namely, into various circumstances not included in a course of scholastic discipline, but essential to the formation of a perfect public speaker, such as his manners; his moral character; the principles by which he must be guided in undertaking, in preparing, and in conducting causes; the peculiar style of eloquence which he may adopt with greatest advantage; the collateral studies to be pursued; the age at which it is most suitable to commence pleading; the necessity of retiring before the powers begin to fail; and various other kindred topics. This production bears throughout the impress of a clear, sound judgment, keen discrimination, and pure taste, improved by extensive reading, deep reflection, and long practice. The diction is highly polished and very graceful. The sections which possess the greatest interest for general readers are those chapters in the first book which relate to elementary education, and the commencement of the tenth book, which furnishes us with a compressed but spirited history of Greek and Roman literature. There are also extant one hundred and sixty-four declamations under the name of Quintilian, nineteen of considerable length; the remaining one hundred and forty-five, which form the concluding portion only of a collection which originally extended to three hundred and eighty-eight pieces, are mere skeletons or fragments. No one believes these to be the genuine productions of Quintilian, and few suppose that they proceeded from any one individual. They apparently belong not only to different persons, but to different periods, and neither in style nor in substance do they offer any thing which is either attractive or useful. Some scholars suppose that the anonymous Dialogus de Oratoribus, usually printed among the works of Tacitus, ought to be assigned to Quintilian. The best editions of Quintilian are by Burmann, 2 vols. 4to, Lug. Bat., 1720; by Gesner, 4to, Gott., 1738; and by Spalding and Zumpt, 6 vols. 8vo, Lips., 1798-1829.

QUINTILLUS, M. AURELIUS, the brother of the Emperor M. Aurelius Claudius, was elevated to the throne by the troops whom he commanded at Aquileia in A.D. 270. But as the army at Sirmium, where Claudius died, had proclaimed Aurelian emperor, Quintillus put an end to his own life, seeing himself deserted by his own soldiers, to whom the rigor of his discipline had given offence.

T. QUINTIUS CAPITOLINUS BARBATUS, a celebrated general in the early history of the republic, and equally distinguished in the internal history of the state. He frequently acted as mediator between the patricians and plebeians, with both of whom he was held in the highest esteem. He was six times consul, namely, in B.C. 471, 468, 465, 446, 443, 439. Several of his descendants held the consulship, but none of these require mention except T. QUINTIUS PENNUS CAPITOLINUS CRISPINUS, who was consul 208, and was defeated by Hannibal.

QUINTUS, an eminent physician at Rome in the former half of the second century after Christ. He was so much superior to his medical colleagues that they grew jealous of his eminence, and formed a sort of coalition against him, and forced him to quit the city by charging him with killing his patients. He died about A.D. 148.

QUINTUS CURTIUS. Vid. CURTIUS.

QUINTUS SMYRNEUS (Κόνιντος Συμωναίος), commonly called QUINTUS CALABER, from the circumstance that the first copy through which his poem became known was found in a convent at Otranto in Calabria. He was the author of an epic poem in fourteen books, entitled τὰ μεθ' Ὀμηρον, or παραλειπούμενα Ὀμήρω. Scarcely any thing is known of his personal history; but it appears most probable that he lived toward the end of the fourth century after Christ. The matters treated of in his poem are the events of the Trojan war from the death of Hector to the return of the Greeks. In phraseology, similes, and other technicalities, Quintus closely copied Homer. The materials for his poem he found in the works of the earlier poets of the epic cycle. But not a single poetical idea of his own seems ever to have inspired him. His gods and heroes are alike devoid of all character; every thing like pathos or moral interest was quite beyond his powers. With respect to chronology, his poem is as punctual as a diary. His style, however, is clear, and marked on the whole by purity and good taste, without any bombast or exaggeration. There can be little doubt that his work is nothing more than an amplification or remodelling of the poems of Arctinus and Lesches. He appears to have also made diligent use of Apollonius. The best edition is by Tychsen, Strasburg, 1807: [it is also contained in the Poetae Epici Graeci Minores, in Didot's Bibliotheca Graeca, Paris, 1840.]

QUIRINALIS MONS. Vid. ROMA.

QUIRINUS, a Sabine word, perhaps derived from quiris, a lance or spear. It occurs first of all as the name of Romulus, after he had been raised to the rank of a divinity; and the festival celebrated in his honor bore the name of Quirinalia. It is also used as a surname of Mars, Janus, and even of Augustus.

QUIRINUS, P. SULPICIUS, was a native of Lanuvium, and of obscure origin, but was raised to the highest honors by Augustus. He was consul B.C. 12, and subsequently carried on war against some of the robber tribes dwelling in the mountains of Cilicia. In B.C. 1, Augustus appointed him to direct the counsels of his grandson C. Caesar, then in Armenia. Some years afterward, but not before A.D. 5, he was appointed governor of Syria, and while in this office he took a census of the Jewish people. This is the statement of Josephus, and appears to be at variance with that of Luke, who speaks as if the census or enrollment of Cyrenius (i. e., Quirinus) was made at the time of the birth of Christ. Quirinus had been married to Emilia Lepida, whom he divorced: but in A.D. 20, twenty years after the divorce, he brought an accusation against her. The conduct of Quirinus met with general disapprobation as harsh and revengeful. He died in A.D. 21, and was honored with a public funeral.

QUIZA (Κοιζα: now Giza, near Oran), a municipium on the coast of Mauretania Caesariensis, in Northern Africa, forty Roman miles west of Arsenaria.

R.

RAAMES OF RAMESES (LXX. Ραμεσσή), a city of Lower Egypt, built as a treasure city by the captive Israelites under the oppression of the Pharaoh "who knew not Joseph" (Exod., i., 11), and usually identified with HEROOPOLIS.

RABATHMOBA (Ραβαθμόβα, i. e., Rabbath-Moab in the Old Testament; also called Rabbah, Ar, Ar-Moab, and afterward Areopolis: now Rabbah), the ancient capital of the Moabites, lay in a fertile plain on the eastern side of the Dead Sea, and south of the River Arnon, in the district of Moabitis in Arabia Petraea, or, according to the latter division of the provinces, in Palaestina Tertia.

RABBATAMĀNA (Ραβατάμανα, i. e., Rabbath Ammon in the Old Testament; ruins at Ammon), the ancient capital of the Ammonites, lay in Peræa, on a southern tributary of the Jabbok, northeast of the Dead Sea. Ptolemy II. Philadelphus gave it the name of PHILADELPHIA, and it long continued a flourishing and splendid city.

RABIRIUS. I. C., an aged senator, was accused in B.C. 63, by T. Labienus, tribune of the plebs, of having put to death the tribune L. Apuleius Saturninus in 100, nearly forty years before. Vid. SATURNINUS. The accusation was set on foot at the instigation of Cæsar, who judged it necessary to deter the senate from resorting to arms against the popular party. To make the warning still more striking, Labienus did not proceed against him on the charge of majestas, but revived the old accusation of perduellio, which had been discontinued for some centuries, since persons found guilty of the latter crime were given over to the public executioner and hanged on the accursed tree. The Duumviri Perduellionis appointed to try Rabirius were C. Cæsar himself and his relative L. Cæsar. With such judges the result could not be doubtful; Rabirius was forthwith condemned; and the sentence of death would have been carried into effect, had he not availed himself of his right of appeal to the people in the comitia of the centuries. The case excited the greatest interest, since it was not simply the life or death of Rabirius, but the power and authority of the senate, which were at stake. Rabirius was defended by Cicero; but the eloquence of his advocate was of no avail, and the people would have ratified the decision of the duumvirs, had not the meeting been broken up by the prætor Q. Metellus Celer, who removed the military flag which floated on the Janiculum. This was in accordance with an ancient custom, which was intended to prevent the Campus Martius from being surprised by an enemy when the territory of Rome scarcely extended beyond the boundaries of the city.—2. C. RABIRIUS POSTUMUS, was the son of the sister of the preceding. He was born after the death of his father, whence his surname Postumus; and he was adopted by his uncle, whence his name C. Rabirius. He had lent large sums of money to Ptolemy Auletes; and after the restoration of Ptolemy to his kingdom by means of Gabinius in B.C. 55, Rabirius repaired to Alexandria, and was invested by the king with the office of Diacetes, or chief treasurer. In this office he had to amass money both for himself and for Gabinius; but his extortions were so terrible that Ptolemy had him apprehended, either to secure him against the wrath of the people, or to satisfy their indignation, lest they should drive him again from his kingdom. Rabirius escaped from prison, probably through the connivance of the king, and returned to Rome. Here a trial awaited him. Gabinius had been sentenced to pay a heavy fine on account of his extortions in Egypt; and as he was unable to pay this fine, a suit was instituted against Rabirius, who was liable to make up the deficiency if it could be proved that he had received any of the money of which Gabinius had illegally become possessed. Rabirius was defended by Cicero, and was probably condemned. He is mentioned at a later time (46) as serving under Cæsar, who sent him from Africa into Sicily, in order to obtain provisions for his army.—3. A Roman poet, who lived in the last years of the republic, and wrote a poem on the Civil Wars. A portion of this poem was found at Herulanæum, and was edited by Kreyssig, under the title "Carminis Latini de bello Actiaco s. Alexandrino fragmenta," 4to, Sehneberg, 1814.

RACILIUS, L., tribune of the plebs B.C. 56, and a warm friend of Cicero and of Lentulus Spinther. In the civil war Ræilius espoused Cæsar's party, and was with his army in Spain in 48. There he entered into the conspiracy formed against the life of Q. Cassius Longinus, the governor of that province, and was put to death, with the other conspirators, by Longinus.

RADAGAIUS, a Seythian, invaded Italy at the head of a formidable host of barbarians in the reign of the Emperor Honorius. He was defeated by Stilicho, near Florence, in A.D. 408, and was put to death after the battle, although he had capitulated on condition that his life should be saved.

[RÆTI (more correct than Rhæti). Vid. RHÆTIA.]

RAMA or ARIMATHÆA (Ραμᾶ, Ἀριμαθαία: now Er-Ram), a town of Judæa, north of Jerusalem, in the mountains of Ephraim, frequently mentioned both in the Old and New Testament.

RAMBACIA (Ραμβακία), the chief city of the Orizæ, on the coast of Gedrosia, colonized by Alexander the Great.

RAMITHA. Vid. LAODICEA, No. 3.

RAMSES, the name of many kings of Egypt of the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth dynasties. It was during this era that most of the great monuments of Egypt were erected, and the name is consequently of frequent occurrence on these monuments, where it appears under the form of Ramessu. In Julius Africanus and Eusebius it is written Ramses, Rameses, or Ramesses. The most celebrated of the kings of this name is, however, usually called Sesostris by the Greek writers. Vid. SESOSTRIS.

RAPHĀNA or RAPHANÆ (Ραφάναι: ruins at Rafanjat), a city of Syria, in the district of Cassiotis, at the northern extremity of Lebanon.

RAPHIA or RAPHĒA (Ράφια, Ράφεια: now Re-pha), a sea-port town in the extreme southwest of Palestine, beyond Gaza, on the edge of the desert. Having been destroyed in some manner unknown to us, it was restored by Gabinius.—[At this place Ptolemy Philopator gained a decisive victory over Antiochus the Great. Vid. PTOLEMY.]

RATIARIA (now Arzer Palanka), an important town in Mæsia Superior, on the Danube, the head-quarters of a Roman legion, and the station of one of the Roman fleets on the Danube.

RATOMAGUS or ROTOMAGUS (now Rouen), the chief town of the Vellocasses in Gallia Lugdunensis.

RAUDI CAMPI. Vid. CAMPI RAUDII.

RAURACI, a people in Gallia Belgica, bounded on the south by the Helvetii, on the west by the Sequani, on the north by the Tribocci, and on the east by the Rhine. They must have been a people of considerable importance, as twenty-three thousand of them are said to have emigrated with the Helvetii in B.C. 58, and they possessed several towns, of which the most important were Augusta (now Augst) and Basilia (now Basle or Bâle).

RAURANUM (now Rom or Raum, near Chenay), a town of the Pictones in Gallia Aquitania, south of Limonum.

RAUSIUM or RAUSIA (now Ragusa), a town on the coast of Dalmatia, is not mentioned till a late period, and only rose into importance after the destruction of Epidaurus.

RAVENNA (Ravennas, -âtis: now Ravenna), an important town in Gallia Cisalpina, on the River Bedesis, and about a mile from the sea, though it is now about five miles in the interior, in consequence of the sea having receded all along this coast. Ravenna was situated in the midst of marshes, and was only accessible in one direction by land, probably by the road leading from Ariminum. The town laid claim to a high antiquity. It was said to have been founded by Thessalians (Pelasgians), and afterward to have passed into the hands of the Umbrians, but it long remained an insignificant place, and its greatness does not begin till the time of the empire, when Augustus made it one of the two chief stations of the Roman fleet. This emperor not only enlarged the town, but caused a large harbor to be constructed on the coast, capable of containing two hundred and forty triremes, and he connected this harbor with the Po by means of a canal called Padusa or Augusta Fossa. This harbor was called Classes, and between it and Ravenna a new town sprung up, to which the name of Cæsarea was given. All three were subsequently formed into one town, and were surrounded by strong fortifications. Ravenna thus suddenly became one of the most important places in the north of Italy. The town itself, however, was mean in appearance. In consequence of the marshy nature of the soil, most of the houses were built of wood, and since an arm of the canal was carried through some of the principal streets, the communication was carried on to a great extent by gondolas, as in modern Venice. The town, also, was very deficient in a supply of good drinking-water; but it was not considered unhealthy, since the canals drained the marshes to a great extent, and the ebb and flow of the tide prevented the waters from stagnating. In the neighborhood good wine was grown, notwithstanding the marshy nature of the soil. When the Roman empire was threatened by the barbarians, the emperors of the West took up their residence at Ravenna, which, on account of its situation and its fortifications, was regarded as impregnable. After the downfall of the Western empire, Theodoric also made it the capital of his kingdom; and after the overthrow of the Gothic dominion by Narses, it became the residence of the exarchs or the governors of the Byzantine empire in Italy till the Lombards took the town, A.D. 752. The modern Ravenna stands on the site of the ancient town; the village Porto di Fuori on the site of Cæsarea; and the ancient harbor is called Porto Vecchio del Caudiano.

REATE (Reatinus: now Rieti), an ancient town of the Sabines in Central Italy, said to have been founded by the Aborigines or Pelasgians, was situated on the Lacus Velinus and the Via Salaria. It was the chief place of assembly for the Sabines, and was subsequently a prefectura or a municipium. The valley in which Reate was situated was so beautiful that it received the name of Tempe; and in its neighborhood is the celebrated waterfall, which is now known under the name of the fall of Terni or the Cascade delle Marmore. This waterfall owed its origin to a canal constructed by M'. Curius Dentatus, in order to carry off the superfluous waters from the Lake Velinus into the River Nar. It falls into this river from a height of one hundred and forty feet. By this undertaking, the Reatini gained a large quantity of land, which was called Rosca Rura. Reate was celebrated for its mules and asses.

REBILUS, C. CANINIUS, one of Cæsar's legates in Gaul and in the civil war. On the last day of December in B.C. 45, on the sudden death of the consul Q. Fabius Maximus, Cæsar made Rebilus consul for the few remaining hours of the day.

REDICULUS, a Roman divinity, who had a temple near the Porta Capena, and who was believed to have received his name from having induced Hannibal, when he was near the gates of the city, to return (redire) southward. A place on the Appian road, near the second mile-stone from the city, was called Campus Rediculi. This divinity was probably one of the Lares of the city of Rome.

REDONES, a people in the interior of Gallia Lugdunensis, whose chief town was Condate (now Rennes).

REDUX, i. e., "the divinity who leads the traveller back to his home in safety," occurs as a surname of Fortuna.

REGALIÄNUS, REGALIÄNUS, or REGILLIÄNUS, a Dacian, who served with distinction under the emperors Claudius and Valerian. The Mæsians, terrified by the cruelties inflicted by Gallienus on those who had taken part in the rebellion of Ingenuus, suddenly proclaimed Regaliänus emperor, and quickly, with the consent of the soldiers, in a new fit of alarm, put him to death, A.D. 263. Hence he is enumerated among the thirty tyrants.

REGIÄNA (now Villa de Rayna), a town in Hispania Bætica, on the road from Hispalis to Emerita.

REGILLUM, a small place in the Sabine territory, from which Appius Claudius migrated to Rome. Its site is uncertain, as it disappeared at an early period.

REGILLUS, ÆMILIUS. 1. M., had been declared consul, with T. Otacilius, for B.C. 214, by the centuria prærogativa, and would have been elected had not Q. Fabius Maximus, who presided at the comitia, pointed out that there was need of generals of more experience to cope with Hannibal. Regillus died in 205, at which time he is spoken of as Flamen Martialis.—2. L., son of the preceding, was prætor 190, when he received the command of the fleet in the war against Antiochus.

REGILLUS LACUS, a lake in Latium, memorable for the victory gained on its banks by the Romans over the Latins, B.C. 498. It was east of Rome, in the territory of Tusculum, and between Laticum and Gabii; but it can not be identified with certainty with any modern lake. It perhaps occupied the site of the valley of Isidoro, which is now dry.

REGINUM OF CASTRA REGINA (now Regensburg), a Roman fortress in Vindelicia, on the Danube, and on the road leading to Vindobona, was the head-quarters of a Roman legion.

REGIUM FLUMEN. Vid. NAARMALCHA.

REGIUM LEPIDI, REGIUM LEPIDUM, or simply REGIUM, also FORUM LEPIDI (Regienses a Lepido: now Reggio), a town of the Boii in Gallia Cisalpina, between Mutina and Tarentum, which was probably made a colony by the consul M. Æmilius Lepidus, when he constructed the Æmilia Via through Cisalpine Gaul, though we have no record of the foundation of the colony.

REGULUS, M. AQUILIUS, was one of the delatores or informers in the time of Nero, and thus rose from poverty to great wealth. Under Domitian he resumed his old trade, and became one of the instruments of that tyrant's cruelty. He survived Domitian, and is frequently spoken of by Pliny with the greatest detestation and contempt. Martial, on the contrary, who flattered all the creatures of Domitian, celebrates the virtues, the wisdom, and the eloquence of Regulus.

REGULUS, ATRIUS. 1. M., consul B.C. 335, carried on war against the Sidicini.—2. M., consul 294, carried on war against the Samnites.—3. M., consul 267, conquered the Sallentini, took the town of Brundisium, and obtained, in consequence, the honor of a triumph. In 256 he was consul a second time with L. Manlius Vulso Longus. The two consuls defeated the Carthaginian fleet, and afterward landed in Africa with a large force. They met with great and striking success; and after Manlius returned to Rome with half of the army, Regulus remained in Africa with the other half, and prosecuted the war with the utmost vigor. The Carthaginian generals Hasdrubal, Bostar, and Hamilcar avoided the plains, where their cavalry and elephants would have given them an advantage over the Roman army, and withdrew into the mountains. There they were attacked by Regulus, and defeated with great loss; fifteen thousand men are said to have been killed in battle, and five thousand men, with eighteen elephants, to have been taken. The Carthaginian troops retired within the walls of the city, and Regulus now overran the country without opposition. Numerous towns fell into the power of the Romans, and among others Tunis, at the distance of only twenty miles from the capital. The Carthaginians, in despair, sent a herald to Regulus to solicit peace. But the Roman general would only grant it on such intolerable terms that the Carthaginians resolved to continue the war and hold out to the last. In the midst of their distress and alarm, success came to them from an unexpected quarter. Among the Greek mercenaries who had lately arrived at Carthage was a Lacedæmonian of the name of Xanthippus. He pointed out to the Carthaginians that their defeat was owing to the incompetency of their generals, and not to the superiority of the Roman arms; and he inspired such confidence in the people that he was forthwith placed at the head of their troops. Relying on his four thousand cavalry and one hundred elephants, Xanthippus boldly marched into the open country to meet the enemy. In the battle which ensued, Regulus was totally defeated; thirty thousand of his men were slain; scarcely two thousand escaped to Clypea; and Regulus himself was taken prisoner, with five hundred more (B.C. 255). Regulus remained in captivity for the next five years, till 250, when the Carthaginians, after their defeat by the proconsul Metellus, sent an embassy to Rome to solicit peace, or at least an exchange of prisoners. They allowed Regulus to accompany the ambassadors on the promise that he would return to Carthage if their proposals were declined, thinking that he would persuade his countrymen to agree to an exchange of prisoners in order to obtain his own liberty. This embassy of Regulus is one of the most celebrated stories in Roman history. The orators and poets related how Regulus at first refused to enter the city as a slave of the Carthaginians; how afterward he would not give his opinion in the senate, as he had ceased by his captivity to be a member of that illustrious body; how, at length, when he was allowed by the Romans to speak, he endeavored to dissuade the senate from assenting to a peace, or even to an exchange of prisoners; and when he saw them wavering, from their desire of redeeming him from captivity, how he told them that the Carthaginians had given him a slow poison, which would soon terminate his life; and how, finally, when the senate, through his influence, refused the offers of the Carthaginians, he firmly resisted all the persuasions of his friends to remain in Rome, and returned to Carthage, where a martyr's death awaited him. On his arrival at Carthage he is said to have been put to death with the most execrating tortures. It was related that he was placed in a chest covered over in the inside with iron nails, and thus perished; and other writers stated, in addition, that after his eyelids had been cut off, he was first thrown into a dark dungeon, and then suddenly exposed to the full rays of a burning sun. When the news of the barbarous death of Regulus reached Rome, the senate is said to have given Hamilcar and Bostar, two of the noblest Carthaginian prisoners, to the family of Regulus, who revenged themselves by putting them to death with cruel tortures. This celebrated tale, however, has not been allowed to pass without question in modern times. Many writers supposed that it was invented in order to excuse the cruelties perpetrated by the family of Regulus on the Carthaginian prisoners committed to their custody. Regulus was one of the favorite characters of early Roman story. Not only was he celebrated on account of his heroism in giving the senate advice which secured him a martyr's death, but also on account of his frugality and simplicity of life. Like Fabrieius and Curius, he lived on his hereditary farm, which he cultivated with his own hands; and subsequent ages loved to tell how he petitioned the senate for his recall from Africa when he was in the full career of victory, as his farm was going to ruin in his absence, and his family was suffering from want

—4. C., surnamed SERRANUS, consul 257, when he defeated the Carthaginian fleet off the Liparæan islands, and obtained possession of the islands of Lipara and Melite. He was consul a second time in 250 with L. Manlius Vulso. The two consuls undertook the siege of Lilybæum; but they were foiled in their attempts to carry the place by storm, and after losing a great number of men, were obliged to turn the siege into a blockade. This Regulus is the first Atilius who bears the surname Serranus, which afterward became the name of a distinct family in the gens. The origin of this name is spoken of under SERRANUS.—5. M., son of No. 3, was consul 227, and again 217, in the latter of which years he was elected to supply the place of C. Flaminius, who had fallen in the battle of the Trasimene Lake. He was censor in 214.—6. C., consul 225, conquered the Sardinians, who had revolted. On his return to Italy he fought against the Gauls, and fell in the battle.

REII APOLLINARES (now Riez), a Roman colony in Gallia Narbonensis, with the surname Julia Augusta, east of the River Druentia, north of Forum Voconii, and northwest of Forum Julii.

REMESIĀNA or ROMESIĀNA (now Mustapha Palanka), a town in Mæsia Superior, between Naisus and Serdica.

REMĪ or RHĒMĪ, one of the most powerful people in Gallia Belgica, inhabited the country through which the Axona flowed, and were bounded on the south by the Nervii, on the southeast by the Veromandui, on the east by the Suessiones and Bellovacii, and on the west by the Nervii. They formed an alliance with Cæsar when the rest of the Belgæ made war against him, B.C. 57. Their chief town was Durocortorum, afterward called Remi (now Rheims).

RESAINA, RESÆNA, RESINA (Ῥέσαινα, Ῥέσινα; now Ras-el-Ain), a city of Mesopotamia, near the sources of the Chaboras, on the road from Carra to Nisibis. After its restoration and fortification by Theodosius, it was called THEODOSIOPOLIS (Θεοδοσιούπολις). Whether it is the same as the Resen of the Old Testament (Gen., x., 12) seems very doubtful.

RESTIO, ANTIUS. 1. The author of a sumptuary law of uncertain date, but passed after the sumptuary law of the consul Æmilius Lepidus, B.C. 78, and before the one of Cæsar.—2. Probably a son of the preceding, proscribed by the triumvirs in 43, but preserved by the fidelity of a slave.

Q., consul 68, and proconsul in Cilicia in the following year. On his return to Rome in 66 he sued for a triumph, but as obstacles were thrown in the way by certain parties, he remained outside the city to prosecute his claims, and was still there when the Catilinarian conspiracy broke out in 63. The senate sent him to Fæsulæ to watch the movements of C. Mallius or Manlius, Catiline's general. [Manlius sent proposals of peace to Marcus, but the latter refused to listen to his terms unless he consented to lay down his arms. Marcus Rex married the eldest sister of Clo dius. He died before B.C. 61, without leaving his brother-in-law the inheritance he had expected.]

RHA (Ῥά: now Volga), a great river of Asia, first mentioned by Ptolemy, who describes it as rising in the north of Sarmatia, in two branches, Rha Occidentalis and Rha Orientalis (now the Volga and the Kama), after the junction of which it flowed southwest, forming the boundary between Sarmatia Asiatica and Sythia, till near the Tanaïs (now Don), where it suddenly turns to the southeast, and falls into the north-western part of the Caspian.

RHADAMANTHUS (Ῥαδάμανθος), son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Europa, and brother of King Minos of Crete. From fear of his brother he fled to Ocalea in Bœotia, and there married Alemene. In consequence of his justice throughout life, he became, after his death, one of the judges in the lower world.

RHÆTIA, a Roman province south of the Danube, was originally distinct from Vindelicia, and was bounded on the west by the Helvetii, on the east by Noricum, on the north by Vindelicia, and on the south by Cisalpine Gaul, thus corresponding to the Grisons in Switzerland, and to the greater part of the Tyrol. Toward the end of the first century, however, Vindelicia was added to the province of Rhætia, whence Tacitus speaks of Augusta Vindelicozum as situated in Rhætia. At a later time Rhætia was subdivided into two provinces, Rhætia Prima and Rhætia Secunda, the former of which answered to the old province of Rhætia, and the latter to that of Vindelicia. The boundaries between the two provinces are not accurately defined, but it may be stated in general that they were separated from each other by the Brigantinus Lacus (now Lake of Constance) and the River Cenus (now Inn). Vindelicia is spoken of in a separate article. Vid. VINDELICIA. Rhætia was a very mountainous country, since the main chain of the Alps ran through the greater part of the province. These mountains were called Alpes Rhætice, and extended from the Saint Gothard to the Orteler by the pass by the Stelvio; and in them rose the Cenus (now Inn) and most of the chief rivers in the north of Italy, such as the Athesis (now Adige), and the Addua (now Adda). The valleys produced corn and excellent wine, the latter of which was much esteemed in Italy. Augustus drank Rhætian wine in preference to all others. The original inhabitants of the country, the RHÆTI, are said by most ancient writers to have been Tuscans, who were driven out of the north of Italy by the invasion of the Celts, and who took refuge in this mountainous district under a leader called Rhætus. Many modern writers suppose the Rhæti and the Etruscans to have been the same people, only they invert the ancient tradition, and believe that the Rhæti descended from their original abodes on the Alps, and settled first in the north of Italy and next in the country afterward called Etruria. They support this view by the fact that the Etruscans were called in their own language Rasena, which seems merely another form of Rhæti, as well as by other arguments, into which it is unnecessary to enter in this place. It is impossible to arrive at any certain conclusion respecting the original population of the country. In the time of the Romans the country was inhabited by various Celtic tribes. The Rhæti are first mentioned by Polybius. They were a brave and warlike people, and caused the Romans much trouble by their marauding incursions into Gaul and the north of Italy. They were not subdued by the Romans till the reign of Augustus, and they offered a brave and desperate resistance against both Drusus and Tiberius, who finally conquered them. Rhætia was then formed into a Roman province, to which Vindelicia was afterward added, as has been already stated. The victories of Drusus and Tiberius were celebrated by Horace (Carm. iv., 14). The Rhæti were divided into several tribes, such as the LEFONTI, VENNONES, TRIDENTINI, &c. The only town in Rhætia of any importance was TRIDENTINUM (now Trent).

ΡΗΙΩÆ (Ῥαίαι, Ῥάγια, Ῥαγιά : Ῥαγνός : ruins at Rai, southeast of Tehran), the greatest city of Media, lay in the extreme north of Great Media, at the southern foot of the mountains (Caspian Mons) which border the southern shores of the Caspian Sea, and on the western side of the great pass through those mountains called the Caspiæ Pylæ. It was therefore the key of Media toward Parthia and Hyrcania. Having been destroyed by an earthquake, it was restored by Seleucus Nicator, and named ΕΥΡΩΠΟΣ (Εὐρωπός). In the Parthian wars it was again destroyed, but it was rebuilt by Arsaces, and called ARSACIA (Ἀρσακία). In the Middle Ages it was still a great city under its original name, slightly altered (Rai); and it was finally destroyed by the Tartars in the twelfth century. The surrounding district, which was a rugged volcanic region, subject to frequent earthquakes, was called Ῥαγιάνη.

ΡΗΛΜΝῸΣ (Ῥαμνούος, -ούντος : Ῥαμνούσιος : now Obrio Kastro), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Æantis, which derived its name from the rhamnus, a kind of prickly shrub. (Ῥαμνούος is an adjective, a contraction of Ῥαμνός, which comes from Ῥάμνος). Rhamnus was situated on a small rocky peninsula on the eastern coast of Attica, sixty stadia from Marathon. It possessed a celebrated temple of Nemesis, who is hence called by the Latin poets Rhamnusia dea or virgo. In this temple there was a colossal statue of the goddess made by Agoracritus, the disciple of Phidias. Another account, but less trustworthy, relates that the statue was the work of Phidias, and was made out of the block of Parian marble which the Persians brought with them for the purpose of setting up a trophy, when they were defeated at Marathon. There are still remains of this temple, as well as of a smaller one to the same goddess.

[RAMPHIAS (Ῥαμφίας), a Lacedæmonian, father of Clearchus, was one of the three ambassadors who were sent to Athens in B.C. 432 with the final demand of Sparta for the independence of all the Greek states. The demand was refused, and the Peloponnesian war ensued. In B.C. 422, Ramphias, with two colleagues, commanded a force of nine hundred men, intended for the strengthening of Brasidas in Thrace; but their passage through Thessaly was opposed by the Thesalians, and, hearing also of the battle of Amphipolis and the death of Brasidas, they returned to Sparta.]

RHAMP SINITUS (Ῥαμφίνιτος), one of the ancient kings of Egypt, succeeded Proteus, and was succeeded by Cheops. This king is said to have possessed immense wealth; and in order to keep it safe, he had a treasury built of stone, respecting the robbery of which Herodotus (ii., 121) relates a romantic story, which bears a great resemblance to the one told about the treasury built by the two brothers Agamemdes and Trophonius of Orchomenus. Vid. ΑΓΑΜΕΔΕΣ. Rhapsinitus belongs to the twentieth dynasty, and is known in inscriptions by the name of Ramessu Neter-kek-pen.

ΡΗΑΡΤΑ (τὰ Ῥαρτά), the southernmost seaport known to the ancients, the capital of the district of Barbaria or Azania, on the eastern coast of Africa. It stood on a river called RHAPTUM (now Doara), and near a promontory called RHAPTUM (now Formosa), and the people of the district were called Ῥάψιοι Αἰθίοπες.

[RHATHINES (Ῥαθίνης), a Persian, was one of the commanders sent by Pharnabazus to aid the Bithynians in opposing the passage of the Cyrean Greeks under Xenophon through Bithynia, B.C. 400. The satrap's forces were completely defeated. We hear again of Rhatines in B.C. 396, as one of the commanders for Pharnabazus of a body of cavalry, which worsted that of Agesilaus in a skirmish near Dascylium.]

ΡΗΕΑ (Ῥέα, Epic and Ion. Ῥεία, Ῥείη, or Ῥέη), an ancient Greek goddess, appears to have been a goddess of the earth. She is represented as a daughter of Uranus (Cælus) and Ge (Terra), and the wife of Cronos (Saturn), by whom she became the mother of Hestia (Vesta), Demeter (Ceres), Hera (Juno), Hades (Pluto), Poseidon (Neptune), and Zeus (Jupiter). Cronos devoured all his children by Rhea, but when she was on the point of giving birth to Zeus (Jupiter), she went to Lyctus in Crete, by the advice of her parents. When Zeus (Jupiter) was born, she gave to Cronos (Saturn) a stone wrapped up like an infant, which the god swallowed, supposing it to be his child. Crete was undoubtedly the earliest seat of the worship of Rhea, though many other parts of Greece laid claim to the honor of being the birth-place of Zeus (Jupiter). Rhea was afterward identified by the Greeks in Asia Minor with the great Asiatic goddess, known under the name of "the Great Mother," or the "Mother of the Gods," and also bearing other names, such as Cybele, Agdistis, Dindymene, &c. Hence her worship became of a wild and enthusiastic character, and various Eastern rites were added to it, which soon spread throughout the whole of Greece. From the orgiastic nature of these rites, her worship became closely connected with that of Dionysus (Bacchus). Under the name of Cybele her worship was universal in Phrygia. Under the name of Agdistis, she was worshipped with great solemnity at Pessinus in Galatia, which town was regarded as the principal seat of her worship. Under different names we might trace the worship of Rhea even much further east, as far as the Euphrates and even Bactriana. She was, in fact, the great goddess of the Eastern world, and we find her worshipped there under a variety of forms and names. As regards the Romans, they had from the earliest times worshipped Jupiter and his mother Ops, the wife of Saturn. During the war with Hannibal the Romans fetched the image of the Mother of the Gods from Pessinus; but the worship then introduced was quite new to them, and either maintained itself as distinct from the worship of Ops, or became united with it. A temple was built to her on the Palatine, and the Roman matrons honored her with the festival of the Megalesia. In all European countries Rhea was conceived to be accompanied by the Curetes, who are inseparably connected with the birth and bringing up of Jupiter (Zeus) in Crete, and in Phrygia by the Corybantes, Atys, and Agdistis. The Corybantes were her enthusiastic priests, who with drums, cymbals, horns, and in full armor, performed their orgiastic dances in the forests and on the mountains of Phrygia. In Rome the Galli were her priests. The lion was sacred to her. In works of art she is usually represented seated on a throne, adorned with the mural crown, from which a veil hangs down. Lions appear crouching on the right and left of her throne, and sometimes she is seen riding in a chariot drawn by lions.

RHEA SILVIA. Vid. ROMULUS.

RHĒBAS (Ῥήβας, Ῥήβαος: now Riva), a river of Bithynia, in Asia Minor, falling into the Euxine northeast of Chalcedon; very small and insignificant in itself, but much celebrated in the Argonautic legends.

RHĒDŌNES. Vid. REDONES.

RHĒGIŪM (Ῥήγιον: Rhegium: now Reggio), a celebrated Greek town on the coast of Brutium, in the south of Italy, was situated on the Fretum Siculum, or the straits which separate Italy and Sicily. The ancients derived its name from the verb ῥήγνυμι ("break"), because it was supposed that Sicily was at this place torn asunder from Italy. Rhegium was founded about the beginning of the first Messenian war, B.C. 743, by Æolian Chalcidians from Eubœa and by Doric Messenians, who had quitted their native country on the commencement of hostilities between Sparta and Messenia. At the end of the second Messenian war, 663, a large body of Messenians, under the conduct of the sons of Aristomenes, settled at Rhegium, which now became a flourishing and important city, and extended its authority over several of the neighboring towns. Even before the Persian wars Rhegium was sufficiently powerful to send three thousand of its citizens to the assistance of the Tarentines, and in the time of the elder Dionysius it possessed a fleet of eighty ships of war. The government was an aristocracy, but in the beginning of the fifth century B.C., Anaxilaus, who was of a Messenian family, made himself tyrant of the place. In 494 this Anaxilans conquered Zancle in Sicily, the name of which he changed into Messana. He ruled over the two cities, and on his death in 476 he bequeathed his power to his sons. About ten years afterward (466) his sons were driven out of Rhegium and Messana, and republican governments were established in both cities, which now became independent of one another. At a later period Rhegium incurred the deadly enmity of the elder Dionysius in consequence of a personal insult which the inhabitants had offered him. It is said that when he asked the Rhegians to give him one of their maidens for his wife, they replied that they could only grant him the daughter of their public executioner. Dionysius carried on war against the city for a long time, and after two or three unsuccessful attempts he at length took the place, which he treated with the greatest severity. Rhegium never recovered its former greatness, though it still continued to be a place of considerable importance. The younger Dionysius gave it the name of Phœbia, but this name never came into general use, and was speedily forgotten. The Rhegians having applied to Rome for assistance when Pyrrhus was in the south of Italy, the Romans placed in the town a garrison of four thousand soldiers, who had been levied among the Latin colonies in Campania. These troops seized the town in 279, killed or expelled the male inhabitants, and took possession of their wives and children. The Romans were too much engaged at the time with their war against Pyrrhus to take notice of this outrage; but when Pyrrhus was driven out of Italy, they took signal vengeance upon these Campanians, and restored the surviving Rhegians to their city. Rhegium suffered greatly from an earthquake shortly before the breaking out of the Social war, 90; but its population was augmented by Augustus, who settled here a number of veterans from his fleet, whence the town bears in Ptolemy the surname Julium. Rhegium was the place from which persons usually crossed over to Sicily, but the spot at which they embarked was called COLUMNA RHĒGINA (Ῥηγίνων στήλις: now Torre di Carallo), and was one hundred stadia north of the town. The Greek language continued to be spoken at Rhegium till a very late time, and the town was subject to the Byzantine court long after the downfall of the Western empire.

RHĒNĒA (Ῥήνεα, also Ῥήνη, Ῥηναία), formerly called Otygia and Celadussa, an island in the Ægean Sea and one of the Cyclades, west of Delos, from which it was divided by a narrow strait only four stadia in width. When Poly-crates took the island, he dedicated it to Apollo, and united it by a chain to Delos; and Nicias connected the two islands by means of a bridge. When the Athenians purified Delos in B.C. 426, they removed all the dead from the latter island to Rhenea.

RHĒNUS. 1. (Now Rhein in German, Rhine in English), one of the great rivers in Europe, forming in ancient times the boundary between Gaul and Germany, rises in Mons Adula (now St. Gothard) not far from the sources of the Rhone, and flows first in a westerly direction, passing through the Lacus Brigantinus (now Lake of Constance) till it reaches Basilia (now Basle), where it takes a northerly direction, and eventually flows into the ocean by several mouths. The ancients spoke of two main arms into which the Rhine was divided in entering the territory of the Batavi, of which the one on the east continued to bear the name of Rhenus, while that on the west, into which the Mosa (now Maas or Meuse) flowed, was called Vahaliſ (now Waal). After Drusus, in B.C. 12, had connected the Flevo Lacus (now Zuyder-See) with the Rhine by means of a canal, in making which he probably made use of the bed of the Yssel, we find mention of three mouths of the Rhine. Of these the names, as given by Pliny, are, on the west, Helium (the Vahalis of other writers); in the centre, Rhenus; and on the east, Flevum; but at a later time we again find mention of only two mouths. The Rhine is described by the ancients as a broad, rapid, and deep river. It receives many tributaries, of which the most important were the Mosella (now Moselle) and Mosa (now Maas or Meuse) on the left, and the Nicer (now Neckar), Mœnus (now Main), and Luppia (now Lippe) on the right. It passed through various tribes, of which the principal on the west were the Nantuates, Helvetii, Sequani, Mediomatrici, Tribocci, Treviri, Ubii, Batavi, and Canninefates, and the principal on the east were the Rheti, Vindelici, Mattiaci, Sigambri, Tencteri, Usipetes, Brueteri, and Frisii. The length of the Rhine is stated differently by the ancient writers. Its whole course amounts to about nine hundred and fifty miles. The inundations of the Rhine near its mouth are mentioned by the ancients. Cæsar was the first Roman general who crossed the Rhine. He threw a bridge of boats across the river, probably in the neighborhood of Cologne. The etymology of the name is doubtful; some connect it with rinnen or rinnan, according to which it would mean the "current" or "stream;" others with rhen or rein, that is, the "clear" river.—2. (Now Reno), a tributary of the Padus (now Po) in Gallia Cisalpina, near Bononia, on a small island of which Octavianus, Antony, and Lepidus formed the celebrated triumvirate. The small river Lavinus (now Lavino) flows into the Rhenus; and Appian places in the Lavinus the island on which the triumvirate was formed.

[RHEOMITHRES ('Ρεομίθρης), a Persian, who joined in the general revolt of the western provinces from Artaxerxes Mnemon in B.C. 362, and was employed by his confederates to go to Tachos, king of Egypt, for aid. Although successful in this application, he made his own peace with Artaxerxes by betraying a number of the rebel chiefs. He was also one of the commanders of the Persian cavalry in the battle at the Granicus, B.C. 334, and fell in the battle at Issus, B.C. 333.]

RHEPHĀIM, a valley of Judæa, continuous with the valley of Hinnom, southwest of Jerusalem. Rhephaim was also the name of a very ancient people of Palestine.

RHĒSUS ('Ρῆσος). 1. A river-god in Bithynia, one of the sons of Oceanus and Tethys.—2. Son of King Etoneus in Thrace, marched to the assistance of the Trojans in their war with the Greeks. An oracle had declared that Troy would never be taken if the snow-white horses of Rhesus should once drink the water of the Xanthus, and feed upon the grass of the Trojan plain. But as soon as Rhesus had reached the Trojan territory, and had pitched his tents late at night, Ulysses and Diomedes penetrated into his camp, slew Rhesus himself, and carried off his horses. In later writers Rhesus is described as a son of Strymon and Euterpe, or Calliope, or Terpsichore.

[RHEXENOR ('Ρῆξήνωρ), son of Nausithons, the king of the Phæacians, and accordingly a brother of Alcinoüs.]

RHĪLĀNUS ('Ριῳός), of Crete, a distinguished Alexandrian poet and grammarian, flourished B.C. 222. He wrote several epic poems, one of which was on the Messenian wars. He also wrote epigrams, ten of which are preserved in the Palatine Anthology, and one by Athenæus. His fragments are printed in Gaisford's Poeta Minores Græci; and separately edited by Nie. Saal, Bonn, 1831.

RHIDAGUS, a tributary of the River Ziobetis, in Parthia; [but vid. ΖΙΟΒΕΤΙΣ.]

RHINOCOLŪRA or RHINOCORURA (τὰ 'Ρινκόλουρα or 'Ρινκόρουρα, and ἡ 'Ρινκόλουρα or 'Ρινκόρουρα: now Kulat-el-Arish), the frontier town of Egypt and Palestine, lay in the midst of the desert, at the mouth of the brook (now El-Arish), which was the boundary between the countries, and which is called in Scripture the river of Egypt. It was sometimes reckoned to Syria, sometimes to Egypt. Its name, "The-cut-off-noses," is derived from its having been the place of exile of criminals who had first been so mutilated under the Æthiopian dynasty of kings of Egypt.

RHINTHŌN ('Ρίνθων), of Syracuse or Tarentum, said to have been the son of a potter, was a dramatic poet, of that species of burlesque tragedy which was called φλυακογραφία or ιλαροτραγῳδία, and flourished in the reign of Ptolemy I., king of Egypt. When he is placed at the head of the composers of this burlesque drama, we are not to suppose that he actually invented it, but that he was the first to develop in a written form, and to introduce into Greek literature, a species of dramatic composition, which had already long existed as a popular amusement among the Greeks of Southern Italy and Sicily, and especially at Tarentum. The species of drama which he cultivated may be described as an exhibition of the subjects of tragedy, in the spirit and style of comedy. A poet of this description was called φλύαξ. This name, and that of the drama itself, φλυακογραφία, seem to have been the genuine terms used at Tarentum. Rhinthon wrote thirty-eight dramas.

RHIP.EI MONTES (τὰ 'Ρίπαϊα ὄρη, also 'Ρίπαι,

the name of a lofty range of mountains in the northern part of the earth, respecting which there are diverse statements in the ancient writers. The name seems to have been given by the Greek poets quite indefinitely to all the mountains in the northern parts of Europe and Asia. Thus the Rhipæi Montes are sometimes called the Hyperborei Montes. Vid. HYPERBOREI. The later geographical writers place the Rhipæan Mountains northeast of Mount Alaurus, on the frontiers of Asiatic Sarmatia, and state that the Tanais rises in these mountains. According to this account, the Rhipæan Mountains may be regarded as a western branch of the Ural Mountains.

RHIUM ('Ρίον: now Castello di Morea), a promontory in Achaia, opposite the promontory of Antirrhium (now Castello di Romelia), on the borders of Aetolia and Locris, with which it formed the narrow entrance to the Corinthian Gulf, which straits are now called the Little Dardanelles. It is sometimes called 'Αχαϊκὸν 'Ρίον, to distinguish it from the opposite promontory, which was surnamed Μολυκρικὸν or Αίτωλικὸν. On the promontory of Rhium there was a temple of Neptune (Poseidon).

RHIZON or RHIZINIUM ('Ρίζων: 'Ριζωνίτης: now Risano), an ancient town in Dalmatia, situated at the upper end of the gulf, called after it Rhizonæus Sinus (now Gulf of Cattaro). [It is mentioned by Polybius as a strong place, to which Teuta, queen of the Illyrians, withdrew on being attacked by the Romans.]

RHODA or RHODUS ('Ρόδη, 'Ρόδος: now Rozas), a Greek emporium on the coast of the Indigetæ, in Hispania Tarraconensis, founded by the Rhodians, and subsequently occupied by the inhabitants of Massilia.

RHODŪNUS (now Rhône), one of the chief rivers of Gaul, rises in Mons Adula on the Pennine Alps, not far from the sources of the Rhine, flows first in a westerly direction, and, after passing through the Lacus Lemanus, turns to the south, passes by the towns of Lugdunum, Vienna, Avenio, and Arelate, receives several tributaries, and finally falls by several mouths into the Sinus Gallicus in the Mediterranean. The number of the mouths of the Rhone is stated differently by the ancient writers, which is not surprising, as the river has frequently altered its course near the sea. Pliny mentions three mouths, of which the most important was called Os Massalioticum, while the two others bore the general name of Libyza ora, being distinguished from each other as the Os Hispaniense and the Os Metapinum. Besides these mouths there was a canal to the east of the Os Massalioticum, called Fossa Mariana, which was dug by order of Marius during his war with the Cimbrî, in order to make an easier connection between the Rhone and the Mediterranean, as the mouths of the river were frequently choked up with sand. The Rhone is a very rapid river, and its upward navigation is therefore difficult, though it is navigable for large vessels as high as Lugdunum, and by means of the Arar still further north.

RHODE. Vid. RHODOS.

[RHODIA and RHODIOPOLIS ('Ρόδια, 'Ροδιόπολις: 'Ροδιεύς, 'Ροδιοπολίτης: now Eski-Hissar, ruins), a mountain city of Lycia, near Corydallus, with a temple of Æsculapius (Asclepius).]

RHODIUS ('Ρόδιος: now probably the Brook of the Dardanelles), a small river of the Troad, mentioned by both Homer and Hesiod. It rose on the lower slopes of Mount Ida, and flowed northwest into the Hellespont, between Abydus and Dardanus, after receiving the Selleis from the west. It is identified by some with the River Ψύδιος, which Thucydides mentions, between Cynossema and Abydus. Some made it erroneously a tributary of the Æsepus. It is found mentioned on the coins of Dardanus.

[RHODOGŪNE ('Ροδογούνη). 1. A daughter of Artaxerxes Muenion, was given in marriage by him to Orontes. Vid. ORONTES, No. 3.—2. Daughter of Mithradates I., king of Parthia, given by him in marriage to Demetrius Nicator, king of Syria. Vid. ARSACES, No. 6.]

[RHODOPE ('Ροδόπη), a fountain nymph, daughter of the river-god Strymon, wife of the Thracian Hæmus, and mother of Hebrus. She is mentioned also among the playmates of Proserpina (Persephone).]

RHODŌPE ('Ροδόπη), one of the highest ranges of mountains in Thrace, extending from Mount Scomius, east of the River Nestus and the boundaries of Macedonia, in a southeasterly direction almost down to the coast. It is highest in its northern part, and is thickly covered with wood. Rhodope, like the rest of Thrace, was sacred to Dionysus (Bacchus), and is frequently mentioned by the poets in connection with the worship of this god.

[RHODŌRHOK, a Rhodian statesman, who exerted himself when hostilities broke out between Perseus and the Romans to preserve unbroken the connection between his countrymen and the latter. He was one of the deputies sent, B.C. 167, to convey a golden crown to Rome.]

RHODŌPIS ('Ροδόπις), a celebrated Greek courtesan, of Thracian origin, was a fellow-slave with the poet Æsop, both of them belonging to the Samian Iadmon. She afterward became the property of Xanthes, another Samian, who carried her to Naucratis in Egypt, in the reign of Amasis, and at this great sea-port she carried on the trade of an hetera for the benefit of her master. While thus employed, Charaxus, the brother of the poetess Sappho, who had come to Naucratis as a merchant, fell in love with her, and ransomed her from slavery for a large sum of money. She was, in consequence, attacked by Sappho in a poem. She continued to live at Naucratis, and with the tenth part of her gains she dedicated at Delphi ten iron spits, which were seen by Herodotus. She is called Rhodopis by Herodotus, but Sappho in her poem spoke of her under the name of Doricha. It is therefore probable that Doricha was her real name, and that she received that of Rhodopis, which signifies the "rosy-cheeked," on account of her beauty. There was a tale current in Greece that Rhodopis built the third pyramid. It has been conjectured, with great probability, that in consequence of her name Rhodopis, the "rosy-cheeked," she was confounded with Nitocris, the beautiful Egyptian queen, and the heroine of many an Egyptian legend, who is said by the ancient chronologers to have built the third pyramid.

RHODOS (Ῥόδος), sometimes called RHODĒ, daughter of Neptune (Poseidon) and Halia, or of Helios and Amphitrite, or of Neptune (Poseidon) and Venus (Aphrodite), or, lastly, of Oceanus. From her the island of Rhodes is said to have derived its name; and in this island she bore to Helios seven sons.

[RHODUNTIA (Ῥοδουντία), a fortress on Mount Ceta, near Heraclea and Thermopylæ; according to Livy, one of the summits of Ceta.]

RHODUS (Ῥόδος; Ῥόδοσ, Rhodius; now Rhodos, Rhodes), the easternmost island of the Ægean, or, more specifically, of the Carpathian Sea, lies off the southern coast of Caria, due south of the promontory of Cynossema (now Cape Aloupo), at the distance of about twelve geographical miles. Its length, from northeast to southwest, is about forty-five miles; its greatest breadth about twenty to twenty-five. In early times it was called Æthraea and Ophiussa, and several other names. The earliest Greek records make mention of it. Mythological stories ascribed its origin to the power of Apollo, who raised it from beneath the waves; and its first peopling to the Telchines, children of Thalatta (the Sea), upon whose destruction by a deluge the Heliodæ were planted in the island by Helios, where they formed seven tribes, and founded a kingdom, which soon became flourishing by their skill in astronomy and navigation, and other sciences and arts. These traditions appear to signify the early peopling of the island by some of the civilized races of Western Asia, probably the Phœnicians. After other alleged migrations into the island, we come to its Hellenic colonization, which is ascribed to Tlepolemus, the son of Hercules, before the Trojan war, and after that war to Althamenes. Homer mentions the three Dorian settlements in Rhodes, namely, Lindus, Ialysus, and Camirus; and these cities, with Cos, Cnidus, and Halicarnassus, formed the Dorian Hexapolis, which was established, from a period of unknown antiquity, in the southwestern corner of Asia Minor. Rhodes soon became a great maritime state, or rather confederacy, the island being parcelled out between the three cities above mentioned. The Rhodians made distant voyages, and founded numerous colonies, of which the chief were Rhoda in Iberia; Gela in Sicily; Parthenope, Salacia, Siris, and Sybaris in Italy; settlements in the Bælearic Islands; and, in their own neighborhood, Soli in Cilicia, and Gagæ and Corydalla in Lycia. During this early period the government of each of the three cities seems to have been monarchical; but about B.C. 660 the whole island seems to have been united in an oligarchical republic, the chief magistrates of which, called prytanes, were taken from the family of the Eratidæ, who had been the royal family of Ialysus. Vid. DIAGORAS, DORIEUS. At the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, Rhodes was one of those Dorian maritime states which were subject to Athens; but in the twentieth year of the war, 412, it joined the Spartan alliance, and the oligarchical party, which had been depressed, and their leaders, the Eratidæ, expelled, recovered their former power under Dorieus. In 408, the new capital, called Rhodus, was built, and peopled from the three ancient cities of Ialysus, Lindus, and Camirus. The history of the island now presents a series of conflicts between the democratical and oligarchical parties, and of subjection to Athens and Sparta in turn, till the end of the Social war, 355, when its independence was acknowledged. Then followed a conflict with the princes of Caria, during which the island was for a time subject to Artemisia, and, nominally at least, to Idrieus. During this period there were great internal dissensions, which were at length composed by a mixed form of government, uniting the elements of aristocracy and democracy. At the Macedonian conquest, they submitted to Alexander; but, upon his death, they expelled the Macedonian garrison. In the ensuing wars they formed an alliance with Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, and their city, Rhodes, successfully endured a most famous siege by the forces of Demetrius Polioretetes, who at length, in admiration of the valor of the besieged, presented them with the engines he had used against the city, from the sale of which they defrayed the cost of the celebrated Colossus, which is described under the name of its artist, CHARES. The state now for a long time flourished, with an extensive commerce, and with such a maritime power that it compelled the Byzantines to remit the toll which they levied on ships passing the Bosphorus. At length they came into connection with the Romans, whose alliance they joined, with Attalus, king of Pergamus, in the war against Philip III. of Macedon. In the ensuing war with Antiochus, the Rhodians gave the Romans great aid with their fleet; and, in the subsequent partition of the Syrian possessions of Asia Minor, they were rewarded by the supremacy of S. Caria, where they had had settlements from an early period. Vid. ΠΕΡΛΑ ΡΗΘΙΟΡΟΜ. A temporary interruption of their alliance with Rome was caused by their espousing the cause of Perseus, for which they were severely punished, 168; but they recovered the favor of Rome by the important naval aid they rendered in the Mithradatic war. In the civil wars they took part with Cæsar, and suffered in consequence from Cassius, 42, but were afterward compensated for their losses by the favor of Antonius. They were at length deprived of their independence by Claudius; and their prosperity received its final blow from an earthquake, which laid the city of Rhodes in ruins, in the reign of Antoninus Pius, A.D. 155. The celebrated mediæval history of the island, as the seat of the Knights of St. John, does not belong to this work. The island is of great beauty and fertility, with a delicious climate. It was further celebrated as the home of distinguished schools of Greek art and of Greek oratory. The city of Rhodes was famous for the beauty and regularity of its architecture, and the number of statues which adorned it; it was designed by Hippodamus of Miletus (Comp. IALYSUS, LINDUS, and CAMIRUS.)

RHÆCUS (Ῥαῖκος). 1. A Centaur, who, in conjunction with Hylæus, pursued Atalanta in Arcadia, but was killed by her with an arrow. The Roman poets call him Rhæcus, and relate that he was wounded at the nuptials of Pirithous.— 2. Son of Phileas or Philæus, of Samos, an ar architect and statuary belonging to the earliest period of the history of Greek art, is mentioned as the head of a family of Samian artists. He flourished about B.C. 640. He was the first architect of the great temple of Juno (Hera) at Syracuse, which Theodorus completed. In conjunction with Smilis and Theodorus, he constructed the labyrinth of Lemnos; and he, and the members of his family who succeeded him, invented the art of casting statues in bronze and iron.

[RHOMETALCES (Ρομητάλλκης). 1. I., king of Thrace, was brother of Cotys, and uncle and guardian of Rhaseuporis, at whose death, B.C. 13, he was expelled from Thrace. About two years afterward Rhometalces received from Augustus his nephew's dominions, with some additions, since Tacitus calls him king of all Thrace. On his death Augustus divided his kingdom between his son Cotys and his brother Rhaseuporis.—2. II., King of Thrace, nephew of the preceding, and son of Rhaseuporis, received a portion of the Thracian kingdom on the deposition of his father. He remained faithful to the Romans, and aided in putting down the Thracian malcontents in A.D. 26. Caligula, in A.D. 38, assigned the whole of Thrace to Rhometalces.]

[RHĒO (Ροιῶ), a daughter of Staphylus, beloved by Apollo, to whom she bore Anius: she had been put in a chest, and set afloat on the sea by her father, but was wafted safely to Eubœa (or Delos).]

[RHĒSACES (Ροισάκης in Arrian and Plutarch; Ρωσάκης, Diod.), a Persian, who deduced his lineage from one of the seven chiefs who overthrew the government of the Magi, was satrap of Ionia and Lydia about 350 B.C., and was associated with the Theban Lacrates in the war against Egypt. In the battle at the Granicus, having assailed Alexander, he was slain by that monarch's own hand. Diodorus and Curtius, however, say that, having cleft the king's helmet with his sword, his hand was cut off by Clitus.]

RHĒTĒUM (τὸ Ροίτειον ἄκρον, ἢ Ροιτεῖα ἄκρη, Ροιτήϊα ἄκρα: Virg. Rhœtea litora: now Cape Intepere or Barbieri), a promontory, or a strip of rocky coast breaking into several promontories, in Mysia, on the Hellespont, near Ætantium, with a town of the same name (now probably Paleo Castro).

RHĒTUS. 1. A centaur. Vid. RHĒCUS.—2. One of the giants, who was slain by Bacchus (Dionysus); he is usually called Eurytus.—3. One of the companions of Phineus, slain by Perseus.—4. King of the Marrubii in Italy, father of Anchemolus. Vid. ANCHEMOLUS.—5. A Rutulian slain among the sine nomine plebem by Euryalus.]

[RHOMBĪTES MAGNUS and MINOR (Ρομβίτης μέγας and ἐλάσσων), two rivers of Asiatic Sarmatia, which fell into two bays of the Palus Mæotis, both abounding in fish: of these the smaller, according to Strabo, was six hundred stadia from the Anticities; the larger, eight hundred stadia northeast of the smaller, and just as far southwest from the Tanais. The larger river is the modern Jei, Jeisse, or Jea; the smaller, the Tschelbasch or the Beisu; according to others, the Atschujef.]

what east of the promontory named after it (σκόπελος ὁ Ρωσσικός, now Cape Torose or Dog's Cape), and at the southern point of the above-named gulf, in the neighborhood of the Syrian passes. At this mountain pass Pococke found ruins of ancient walls, which probably belonged to the city Rhōsus.]

[RHŌTĀNUS (Ρότανος, now, according to Mannert, Dalesani), a small river of Corsica, flowing into the Tyrrhenian Sea at about the middle of the eastern coast, not far from Aleria.]

RĪŌXOLĀNI or ROXOLĀNI, a warlike people in European Sarmatia, on the coast of the Palus Mæotis, and between the Borysthenes and the Tanais, usually supposed to be the ancestors of the modern Russians. They frequently attacked and plundered the Roman provinces south of the Danube; and Hadrian was even obliged to pay them tribute. They are mentioned as late as the eleventh century. They fought with lances and with long swords wielded with both hands; and their armies were composed chiefly of cavalry.

[RĪUBON (Ροῦβων, now probably the Dūna), a river of European Sarmatia, falling into the Oceanus Sarmaticus between the Chronus and Turuntus.]

RĪYNDĀCUS (Ρυνδακός: now Edrenos), or LYCUS, a considerable river of Asia Minor. Rising in Mount Dindymene, opposite to the sources of the Hermus, it flows north through Phrygia, then turns northwest, then west, and then north, through the Lake Apolloniatis, into the Propontis. From the point where it left Phrygia, it formed the boundary of Mysia and Bithynia. Its chief tributary, which joins it from the west below the Lake Apolloniatis, was called MACESRUS. On the banks of the Rhyndacus Lucullus gained a great victory over Mithradates, B.C. 73.

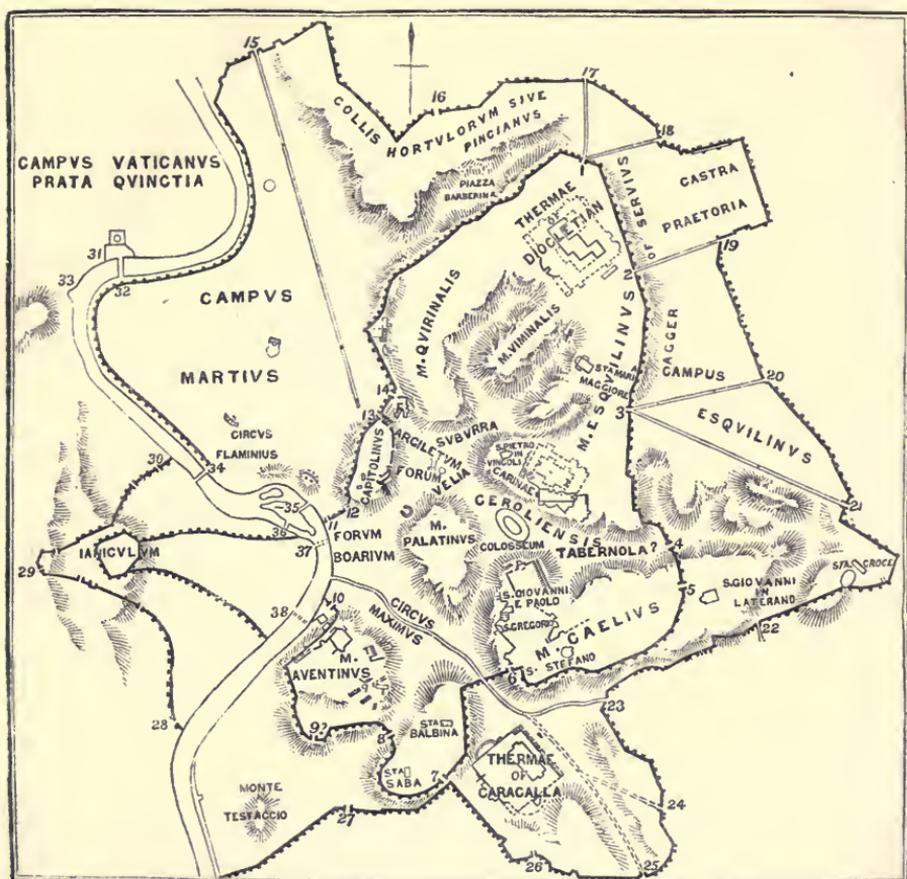

RĪYRES (Ρύρες and other forms: Ρυραῖος), one of the twelve cities of Achaia, situated between Ægium and Patræ. It was destroyed by Augustus, and its inhabitants removed to Patræ.

RĪYTIUM (Ρύτιον), a town in Crete, mentioned by Homer, which is identified by modern writers, but without any sufficient reasons, with the later Ritymna.

RICĪMER, the Roman "King-Maker," was the son of a Suevian chief, and was brought up at the court of Valentinian III. He served with distinction under Aëtius, in the reign of Valentinian III. In A.D. 456 he commanded the fleet of the Emperor Avitus, with which he gained a great victory over the Vandals, and in the same year he deposed Avitus; but as he was a barbarian by birth, he would not assume the title of emperor, but gave it to Majorian, intending to keep the real power in his own hands. But as Majorian proved more able and energetic than Ricimer had expected, he was put to death in 461 by order of Ricimer, who now raised Libius Severus to the throne. On the death of Severus in 465, Ricimer kept the government in his own hands for the next eighteen months; but in 467 Anthemius was appointed Emperor of the West by Leo, emperor of the East. Ricimer acquiesced in the appointment, and received the daughter of Anthemius in marriage; but in 472 he made war against his father-in-law, and took Rome by storm. Anthemius perished in the assault, and Olybrius ROBĪGUS or ROBĪGO, is described by some Latin writers as a divinity worshipped for the purpose of averting blight or too great heat from the young corn-fields. The festival of the Robigalia was celebrated on the twenty-fifth of April, and was said to have been instituted by Numa. But considering the uncertainty of the ancients themselves as to whether the divinity was masculine or feminine, and that the Romans did not pay divine honors to any evil demon, it is probable that the divinity Robigus or Robigo is only an abstraction of the later Romans from the festival of the Robigalia.

ROMA (Romanus: now Rome), the capital of Italy and of the world, was situated on the left bank of the River Tiber, on the northwestern confines of Latium, about sixteen miles from the sea.—A. HISTORY OF THE CITY. Rome is said to have been a colony from Alba Longa, and to have been founded by Romulus about B.C. 753. Vid. ROMULUS. All traditions agree that the original city comprised only the Mons Palatinus or Palatium, and some portion of the ground immediately below it. It was surrounded by walls, which followed the line of the Pomerium (vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.), and was built in a square form, whence it was called Roma Quadrata. This city on the Palatine was inhabited only by Latins. On the neighboring hills there also existed from the earliest times settlements of Sabines and Etruscans. The Sabine town, probably called Quirium, and inhabited by Quirites, was situated on the hills to the north of the Palatine, that is, the Quirinalis and Capitolinus, or Capitolium, on the latter of which hills was the Sabine Arx or citadel. These Latin and Sabine towns afterward became united, according to tradition, in the reign of Romulus, and the two nations formed one collective body, known under the name of "Populus Romanus (et) Quirites." The Etruscans were settled on Mons Cælius, and extended over Mons Cispius and Mons Oppius, which are part of the Esquiline. These Etruscans were at an early period incorporated in the Roman state, but were compelled to abandon their seats on the hills, and to take up their abode in the plains between the Cælius and the Esquiline, whence the Vicus Tuscus derived its name. Under the kings the city rapidly grew in population and in size. Æneus Marcius added the Mons Aventinus to the city. The same king also built a fortress on the Janiculus, a hill on the other side of the Tiber, as a protection against the Etruscans, and connected it with the city by means of the Pons Sublicius. Rome was still further improved and enlarged by Tarquinius Priscus and Servius Tullius. The former of these kings constructed the vast sewers (cloacæ), by which the lower part of the city between the Palatine and Capitol was drained, and which still remain without a stone displaced. He also laid out the Circus Maximus and the Forum, and, according to some traditions, commenced the erection of the Capitoline temple, which was finished by Tarquinius Superbus. The completion of the city, however, was ascribed to Servius Tullius. This king added the Mons Viminalis and Mons Esquilinus, and surrounded the whole city with a line of fortifications, which comprised all the seven hills of Rome (Palatinus, Capitolinus, Quirinalis, Cælius, Aventinus, Viminalis, Esquilinus). Hence Rome was called Urbs Septicollis. These fortifications were about seven miles in circumference. At the same time, Servius extended the pomerium so as to make the sacred inclosure of the city identical with its walls. In B.C. 390 Rome was entirely destroyed by the Gauls, with the exception of a few houses on the Palatine. On the departure of the barbarians it was rebuilt in great haste and confusion, without any attention to regularity, and with narrow and crooked streets. After the conquest of the Carthaginians and of the monarchs of Macedonia and Syria, the city began to be adorned with many public buildings and handsome private houses; and it was still further embellished by Augustus, who introduced great improvements into all parts of the city, and both erected many public buildings himself, and induced all the leading nobles of his court to follow his example. So greatly had the appearance of the city improved during his long and prosperous reign, that he used to boast that he had found the city of brick, and had left it of marble. Still the main features of the city remained the same; and the narrow streets and mean houses formed a striking and disagreeable contrast to the splendid public buildings and magnificent palaces which had been recently erected. The great fire at Rome in the reign of Nero (A.D. 64) destroyed two thirds of the city. Nero availed himself of this opportunity to indulge his passion for building; and the city now assumed a more regular and stately appearance. The new streets were made both wide and straight; the height of the houses was restricted; and a certain part of each was required to be built of Gabian or Alban stone, which was proof against fire. Rome had long since extended beyond the walls of Servius Tullius; but down to the third century of the Christian era the walls of this monarch continued to mark the limits of the city properly so called. These walls, however, had long since been rendered quite useless, and the city was therefore left without any fortifications. Accordingly, the Emperor Aurelian determined to surround Rome with new walls, which embraced the city of Servius Tullius and all the suburbs which had subsequently grown up around it, such as the M. Janiculus on the right bank of the Tiber, and the Collis Hortulorum or Mons Pincianus on the left bank of the river, to the north of the Quirinalis. The walls of Aurelian were commenced by this emperor before he set out on his expedition against Zenobia (A.D. 271), and were terminated by his successor Probus. They were about eleven miles in circumference. They were restored by Honorius, and were also partly rebuilt by Belisarius.—B. DIVISIONS OF THE CITY. Rome was divided by Servius Tullius into four Regiones or districts, corresponding to the four city tribes. Their names were, 1. Suburana, comprehending the space from the Subura to the Cælius, both inclusive. 2. Esquilina, comprehending the Esquiline Hill. 3. Collina, extending over the Quirinal and Viminal. 4. Palatina, comprehending the Palatine Hill. The Capitoline, as the seat of the gods, and the Aventine, were not included in these regiones. These regiones were again subdivided into twenty-seven Sacella Argæorum, which were probably erected where two streets (compita) crossed each other. It is probable that each of the four regiones contained six of these sacella, and that the remaining three belonged to the Capitoline. The division of Servius Tullius into four regiones remained unchanged till the time of Augustus; but this emperor made a fresh division of the city into fourteen regiones, which comprised both the ancient city of Servius Tullius and all the suburbs which had been subsequently added. This division was made by Augustus to facilitate the internal government of the city. The names of the regiones were, 1. Porta Capena, at the southeast corner of the city, by the Porta Capena. 2. Calimontium, northeast of the preceding, embracing M. Cælius. 3. Isis et Serapis, northwest of No. 2, in the valley between the Cælius, the Palatine and Esquiline. 4. Via Sacra, northwest of No. 3, embracing the valley between the Esquiline, Viminal, and Quirinal, toward the Palatine. 5. Esquilina cum Colle Viminali, northeast of No. 4, comprehending the whole of the Esquiline and Viminal. 6. Alta Semita, northwest of No. 5, comprising the Quirinal. 7. Via Lata, west of No. 6, between the Quirinal and Campus Martius. 8. Forum Romanum, south of No. 7, comprehending the Capitoline and the valley between it and the Palatine. 9. Circus Flaminius, northwest of No. 8, extending as far as the Tiber, and comprehending the whole of the Campus Martius. 10. Palatium, southeast of No. 8, containing the Palatine. 11. Circus Maximus, southwest of No. 10, comprehending the plain between the Palatine, Aventine, and Tiber. 12. Piscina Publica, southeast of No. 11. 13. Aventinus, northwest of No. 12, embracing the Aventine. 14. Trans Tiberim, the only region on the right bank of the river, containing the Insula Tiberina, the valley between the river and the Janiculum, and a part of this mountain. Each of these regiones was subdivided into a certain number of Vici, analogous to the sacella of Servius Tullius. The houses were divided into two different classes, called respectively domus and insulæ. The former were the dwellings of the Roman nobles, corresponding to the modern palazzi; the latter were the habitations of the middle and lower classes. Each insulæ contained several apartments or sets of apartments, which were let to different families, and it was frequently surrounded with shops. The insulæ contained several stories; and as the value of ground increased in Rome, they were frequently built of a dangerous height. Hence Augustus restricted the height of all new houses to seventy feet, and Trajan to sixty feet. No houses of any description were allowed to be built close together at Rome, and it was provided by the Twelve Tables that a space of at least five feet should be left between every house. The number of insulæ, of course, greatly exceeded that of the domi. It is stated that there were forty-six thousand six hundred and two insulæ at Rome, but only one thousand seven hundred and ninety domus.—C. SIZE AND POPULATION OF THE CITY. It has been already stated that the circumference of the walls of Servius Tullius was about seven miles; but a great part of the space included within these walls was at first not covered with buildings. Subsequently, as we have seen, the city greatly extended beyond these limits; and a measurement has come down to us, made in the reign of Vespasian, by which it appears to have been about thirteen miles in circumference. It was probably about this time that Rome reached its greatest size. The walls of Aurelian were only about eleven miles in circuit. It is more difficult to determine the population of the city at any given period. We learn, however, from the Monumentum Ancyranum, that the plebs urbana in the time of Augustus was three hundred and twenty thousand. This did not include the women, nor the senators, nor knights; so that the free population could not have been less than six hundred and fifty thousand. To this number we must add the slaves, who must have been at least as numerous as the free population. Consequently, the whole population of Rome in the time of Augustus must have been at least one million three hundred thousand, and in all probability greatly exceeded that number. Moreover, as we know that the city continued to increase in size and population down to the time of Vespasian and Trajan, we shall not be far wrong in supposing that the city contained nearly two millions of inhabitants in the reigns of those emperors.—D. WALLS AND GATES. I. WALLS OF ROMULUS. The direction of this wall is described by Tacitus. Commencing at the Forum Boarium, the site of which is marked by the arch erected there to Septimius Severus, it ran along the foot of the Palatine, having the valley afterward occupied by the Circus Maximus on the right, as far as the altar of Consus, nearly opposite to the extremity of the Circus; thence it turned round the southern angle of the Palatine, followed the foot of the hill nearly in a straight line to the Curie Veteres, which stood not far from the site of the Arch of Constantine; thence ascended the steep slope, at the summit of which stands the Arch of Titus, and descended again on the other side to the angle of the Forum, which was then a morass. In this wall there were three gates, the number prescribed by the rules of the Etruscan religion. 1. Porta Mugonia or Mugionis, also called Porta vetus Palatii, at the northern slope of the Palatine, at the point where the Via Sacra and the Via Nova met. 2. Porta Romanula, at the western angle of the hill, near the temple of Victory, and between the modern churches of S. Teodoro and Santa Anastasia. 3. The name and position of the third gate is not mentioned, for the Porta Janualis appears to be identical with the Janus or archway, commonly known as the temple of Janus, which stood on the other side of the Forum, and could have had no connection with the original city of Romulus.—II. WALLS OF SERVIUS TULLIUS. It is stated that this king surrounded the whole city with a wall of hewn stone; but there are many reasons for questioning this statement. The seven hills on which Rome was built were most of them of great natural strength, having sides actually precipitous, or easily rendered so by cutting away the soft tufo rock. Instead, therefore, of building a wall around the whole circuit of the city, Servius Tullius appears only to have connected the several hills by walls or trenches drawn across the narrow valleys which separated them. The most formidable part of these fortifications was the agger or mound which extended across the broad table-land formed by the junction of the Quirinal, Esquiline, and Viminal, since it was on this side that the city was most open to the attacks of the enemy. The agger was a great rampart or mound of earth, fifty feet wide and above sixty high, faced with flagstones and flanked with towers, and at its foot was a moat one hundred feet broad and thirty deep. There are still traces of this work. Starting from the southern extremity of this mound at the Porta Esquilina, the fortifications of Servius ran along the outside edge of the Cælian and Aventine Hills to the River Tiber by the Porta Trigemina. From this point to the Porta Flumentana, near the southwestern extremity of the Capitoline Hill, there appears to have been no wall, the river itself being considered a sufficient defence. At the Porta Flumentana the fortifications again commenced, and ran along the outside edge of the Capitoline and Quirinal Hills till they reached the northern extremity of the agger at the Porta Collina. The number of the gates in the walls of Servius is uncertain, and the position of many of them is doubtful. Pliny, indeed, states that their number was thirty-seven; but it is almost certain that this number includes many mere openings made through the walls to connect different parts of the city with the suburbs, since the walls of Servius had long since ceased to be regarded. The following is a list of the gates as far as they can be ascertained: 1. Porta Collina, at the northerly extremity of the agger, and the most northern of all the gates, stood at the point of junction of the Via Salaria and Via Nomentana, just above the northern angle of the Vigna dei Certosini. 2. P. Viminalis, south of No. 1, and in the centre of the agger. 3. P. Esquilina, south of No. 2, on the site of the arch of Gallienus, which probably replaced it; the Via Prænestina and Labicana began here. 4. P. Querquetulana, south of No. 3. 5. P. Cæliomontana, south of No. 4, on the heights of Mons Cælius, behind the hospital of S. Giovanni in Laterano, at the point of junction of the two modern streets which bear the name of S. Stefano Rotondo, and the SS. Quattro Coronati. 6. P. Capena, one of the most celebrated of all the Roman gates, from which issued the Via Appia. It stood southwest of No. 5, and at the southwest foot of the Cælian, on the spot now occupied by the grounds of the Villa Mattei. 7, 8, 9. P. Lavernalis, P. Raudusculana, and P. Nævica, three of the most southerly gates of Rome, lying between the Cælian and the Aventine. The walls of Servius probably here took a great bend to the south, inclosing the heights of Sta Balbina and Sta Saba. 10. P. Minucia, probably west of the three preceding, and on the south of the Aventine. 11. P. Trigemina, on the northwest of the Aventine, near the Tiber and the great salt magazines. 12. P. Flumentana, north of the preceding, near the southwestern slope of the Capitol and close to the Tiber. 13. P. Carmentalis, north of No. 12, and at the foot of the southwestern slope of the Capitoline, near the altar of Carmenta, and leading to the Forum Olitorium and the Theatre of Marcellus. This gate contained two passages, of which the right-hand one was called Porta Scelerata from the time that the three hundred Fabii passed through it, and was always avoided. 14. P. Ratumenalis, north of No. 13, and at the northwestern slope of the Capitoline, leading from the Forum of Trajan to the Campus Martius. 15. P. Fontinalis, north of No. 14, on the western slope of the Quirinal, also leading to the Campus Martius. 16. P. Sanqualis, north of No. 15, also on the western slope of the same hill. 17. P. Salutaris, north of No. 16, on the northwestern slope of the same hill, near the temple of Salus. 18. P. Triumphalis. The position of this gate is quite uncertain, except that it led, more or less directly, to the Campus Martius.—III. WALLS OF AURELIAN. These walls are essentially the same as those which surround the modern city of Rome, with the exception of the part beyond the Tiber. The Janiculum and the adjacent suburb was the only portion beyond the Tiber which was included within the fortifications of Aurelian; for the Vatican was not surrounded with walls till the time of Leo IV., in the ninth century. On the left bank of the Tiber the walls of Aurelian embraced on the north the Collis Hortulorum or Pincianus, on the west the Campus Martius, on the east the Campus Esquilinus, and on the south the Mons Testaceus. There were fourteen gates in the Aurelian walls, most of which derived their names from the roads issuing from them. These were, on the northern side, 1. P. Aurelia, on the Tiber in front of the Pons Ælius. 2. P. Pinciana, on the hill of the same name. 3. P. Salaria, extant under the same name, but restored in modern times. 4. P. Nomentana, leading to the ancient P. Collina. On the eastern side, 5. P. Tiburtina, leading to the old Porta Esquilina, now Porta S. Lorenzo. 6. P. Prænestina, now Porta Maggiore. On the southern side, 7. P. Asinaria, on the site of the modern Porta S. Giovanni. 8. P. Metronis, or Metronii, or Metrotroia, which has now disappeared, probably at the entrance to the Cælian, between S. Stefano Rotondo and the Villa Mattei. 9. P. Latina, now walled up. 10. P. Appia, now Porta S. Pancrazio. The roads through this gate and through No. 9 both led to the old Porta Capena. 11. P. Ostiensis, leading to Ostia, now Porta S. Paolo. On the western side, 12. P. Portuensis, on the other side of the Tiber, near the river, from which issued the road to Portus. 13. A second P. Aurelia, on the western slope of the Janiculus, now Porta S. Pancrazio. 14. P. Septimiana, near the Tiber, which was destroyed by Alexander VI.—E. BRIDGES. There were eight bridges across the Tiber, which probably ran in the following order from north to south: 1. Pons Ælius, which was built by Hadrian, and led from the city to the mausoleum of that emperor, now the bridge and castle of St. Angelo. 2. P. Neronianus, or Vaticanus, which led from the Campus Martius to the Vatican and the gardens of Caligula and Nero. The remains of its piers may still be seen, when the waters of the Tiber are low, at the back of the Hospital of San Spirito. 3. P. Aurelius, sometimes, but erroneously, called Janiculensis, which led to the Janiculus and the Porta Aurelia. It occupied the site of the present "Ponte Sisto," which was built by Sixtus IV. upon the ruins of the old bridge. 4, 5. P. Fabricius and P. Cestius, the two bridges which connected the Insula Tiberina with the opposite sides of the river, the former with the city, the latter with the Janiculus. Both are still remaining. The P. Fabricius, which was built by one L. Fabricius, curator viarum, a short time before the conspiracy of Catilinè, now bears the name of "Ponte Quattro Capì." The P. Cestius, which was built at a much later age, is now called "Ponte S. Bartolommeo." 6. P. Senatorius or Palatinus, below the island of the Tiber, formed the communication between the Palatine and its neighborhood and the Janiculus. 7. P. Sublicius, the oldest of the Roman bridges, said to have been built by Ancus Marcius when he erected a fort on the Janiculus. It was built of wood, whence its name, which comes from sublices, "wooden beams." It was carried away several times by the river, but from a feeling of religious respect was always rebuilt of wood down to the latest times. 8. P. Milvius or Mulvius, now "Ponte Molle," was situated outside the city, north of the P. Ælius, and was built by Æmilius Scaurus the censor.—F. INTERIOR OF THE CITY. I. FORA AND CAMPI. The Fora were open spaces of ground, paved with stones, surrounded by buildings, and used as market places, or for the transaction of public business. An account of the Fora is given elsewhere. Vid. FORUM. The Campi were also open spaces of ground, but much larger, covered with grass, planted with trees, and adorned with works of art. They were used by the people as places of exercise and amusement, and may be compared with the London parks. These Campi were, 1. Campus Martius, the open plain lying between the city walls and the Tiber, of which the southern part, in the neighborhood of the Circus Flaminius, was called Campus Flaminius, or Prata Flaminia. This plain, which was by far the most celebrated of all, is spoken of separately. Vid. CAMPUS MARTIUS. 2. Campus Sceleratus, close to the Porta Collina and within the walls of Servius, where the vestals who had broken their vows of chastity were entombed alive. 3. Campus Agrippæ, probably on the southwestern slope of the Pincian Hill, east of the Campus Martius, on the right of the Corso, and north of the Piazza degli Apostoli. 4. Campus Esquilinus, outside of the agger of Servius and near the Porta Esquilina, where criminals were executed, and the lower classes were buried. The greater part of this plain was afterward converted into pleasured grounds belonging to the palace of Mæcenas. 5. Campus Viminalis, on the eastern slope of the Viminal, near the Villa Negroni.—II. STREETS AND DISTRICTS. There are said to have been, in all, two hundred and fifteen streets in Rome. The broad streets were called Via and Vici;* the narrow streets Angiportus. The chief streets were, 1. Via Sacra, the principal street in Rome. It began near the Sacellum Streniæ, in the valley between the Cælian and the Esquiline, and, leaving the Flavian Amphitheatre (Colosseum) on the left, ran along the northern slope of the Palatine, passing under the arch of Titus, and past the Forum Romanum, till it reached the Capitol. 2. Via Lata, led from the northern side of the Capitol and the Porta Ratumena to the Porta Flaminia, whence the northern part of it was called Via Flaminia. 3. Via Nova, by the side of the western slope of the Palatine, led from the ancient Porta Romanula and the Velabrum to the Forum, and was connected by a side street with the Via Sacra. 4. Vicus Jugarius, led from the Porta Carmentalis, under the Capitol, to the Forum Romanum, which it entered near the Basilica Julia and the Lacus Sævilius. 5. Vicus Tuscus, connected the Velabrum with the Forum, running west of, and nearly parallel with, the Via Nova. It contained a great number of shops, where articles of luxury were sold, and its inhabitants did not possess the best of characters (Tusci turba impia vici, Hor., Sat., ii., 3, 228). 6. Vicus Cyprius, ran from the Forum to the Esquiline. The upper part of it, turning on the right to the Urbis Clivus, was called Sceleratus Vicus, because Tullia here drove her chariot over the corpse of her father Servius. 7. Vicus Patricius, in the valley between the Esquiline and the Viminal, in the direction of the modern Via Urbana and Via di S. Pudenziana. 8. Vicus Africus, in the district of the Esquiline, but the exact situation of which can not be determined, said to have been so called because African hostages were kept here during the first Punic war. 9. Vicus Sandalarius, also in the district of the Esquiline, extending as far as the heights of the Carinæ. Besides the shops of the shoemakers, from whom it derived its name, it contained several booksellers' shops. 10. Vicus Vitriarius or Vitrarius, in the southeastern part of the city, near the Porta Capena. 11. Vicus Longus, in the Vallis Quirini, between the Quirinal and Viminal, now S. Vitale. 12. Caput Africa, near the Colosseum, the modern Via de S. Quattro Coronati. 13. Subura or Suburra, a district, through which a street of the same name ran, was the whole valley between the Esquiline, Quirinal, and Viminal. It was one of the most frequented parts of the town, and contained a great number of shops and brothels. 14. Velia, a height near the Forum, which extended from the Palatine, near the arch of Titus, to the Esquiline, and which separated the valley of the Forum from that of the Colosseum. On the Velia were situated the Basilica of Constantine and the temple of Venus and Rome. 15. Carina, a district on the southwestern part of the Esquiline, or the modern height of S. Pietro in Vincoli, where Pompey, Cicero, and many distinguished Romans lived. 16. Velabrum, a district on the western slope of the Palatine, between the Vicus Tuscus and the Forum Boarium, was originally a morass. 17. Æquimelum, a place at the eastern foot of the Capitol and by the side of the Vicus Jugarius, where the house of Sp. Mælius once stood. (Vid. p. 467, b.) 18. Argiletum, a district of uncertain site, but probably at the southern extremity of the Quirinal, between the Subura, the Forum of Nerva, and the Temple of Peace. The etymology of the name is uncertain; some of the ancients derived it from argilla, "white clay;" others from a hero Argus, a friend of Evander, who is said to have been buried here. 19. Lautumia, a district near the Argiletum and the Forum Piscatorium, on which subsequently the Basilica Porcia was built. In this district was one of the state prisons, called Lautumia, or Carcer Lautumiarum.—III. TEMPLES. There are said to have been four hundred temples in Rome. Of these the following, enumerated for the most part in chronological order, were the principal: 1. Templum Jovis Feretrii, on the Capitoline, the oldest of all the Roman temples, built, according to tradition, by Romulus, and restored by Augustus. 2. T. Fidei, likewise on the Capitoline, built by Numa, and restored successively by A. Atilius Collatinus and M. Æmilius Scaurus. 3. T. Jani, also called Janus Bifrons or Biformis, Janus Geminus, and Janus Quirinus, also built by Numa, was, properly speaking, not a temple, but a passage with an entrance at each end, the gates of which were opened during war and closed in times of peace. It was situated northeast of the Forum toward the Quirinal. There were also other temples of Janus at Rome, of which one was near the Theatre of Marcellus, and the other near the Forum of Nerva. 4. Ædes Vestæ, a round temple built by Numa, in the southern part of the forum, or on the slope of the Palatine adjoining the Regia Numæ, probably near Sta Maria Liberatrice. The Atrium Vestæ, also called Atrium Regium, probably formed a part of the Regia Numæ, which may be regarded as forming a portion of the building sacred to Vesta. 5. T. Dianæ, on the Aventine, which hill is hence called by Martial Collis Dianæ, built by Servius Tullius, as the place of meeting for the Romans and the members of the Latin league, and restored by Augustus, probably near the modern church S. Prisca. 6. T. Lunæ, frequently confounded with the preceding, also built by Servius Tullius, and on the Aventine, probably on the side adjoining the Circus. 7. T. Jovis, usually called the Capitolium, situated on the southern summit of the Capitoline Hill, was vowed by Tarquinius Priscus and built by Tarquinius Superbus. It was the most magnificent of all the temples in Rome, and is described elsewhere. Vid. CAPITOLIUM. 8. T. Saturni, which was also used as the Ærarium, on the Clivus Capitolinus and by the Forum, to which it is supposed that the three pillars in the Forum belong. It was built by Tarquinius Superbus, and restored successively by L. Munatius Plancus and Septimius Severus. 9. Ædes Castoris or T. Castoris et Pollucis, by the Forum, near the fountain of Juturna, in which the senate frequently assembled. It was vowed by the dictator A. Postumius in the great battle with the Latins, near the Lake Regillus, and was successively restored by L. Metellus Dalmaticus, Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius. 10. T. Mercurii, between the Circus Maximus and the Aventine. 11. T. Cereris, on the slope of the Aventine, near the circus. 12. T. Apollinis, between the Circus Maximus and the theatre of Marcellus, near the Porticus Octaviæ, where the senate often assembled. 13. T. Junonis Regina, on the Aventine. 14. T. Martis Extramuranei, before the Porta Capena, on the Via Appia. 15. T. Junonis Moneta, on the area of the Capitoline, where the house of M. Manlius had stood. 16. T. Junonis Lucina, on the western summit of the Esquiline. 17. T. Concordiæ, on the slope of the Capitoline, above the Forum, in which the senate frequently assembled. There were probably two temples of Concordia, both by the Forum, of which the more ancient was consecrated by Camillus, and the other by L. Opimius after the death of C. Gracchus. The remains of the ancient temple of Concordia are to be seen behind the arch of Septimius Severus. 18. T. Salutis, on the slope of the Quirinal, near the Porta Salutaris, adorned with paintings by Fabius Pictor, burned down in the reign of Claudius. 19. T. Bellona, before the Circus Flaminius, and near the confines of the Campus Martius, in which the senate assembled in order to give audience to foreign ambassadors, and to receive applications from generals who solicited the honor of a triumph. 20. T. Jovis Victoris, on the Palatine, between the Domus Augusti and the Curia Vetus. 21. T. Victoriæ, on the summit of the Palatine, or the Clivus Victoriæ, above the Porta Romanula and the circus, in which the statue of the mother of the gods was at first preserved. 22. T. Magnæ Matris Idææ, near the preceding and the Casa Romuli, in which the above-named statue of the goddess was placed thirteen years after its arrival in Rome. 23. T. Jovis Statoris, near the arch of Titus on the Via Sacra, where the senate frequently assembled. 24. T. Quirini, on the Quirinal, where also the senate frequently assembled, enlarged and adorned by Augustus. 25. T. Fortunæ, built by Servius Tullius in the Forum Boarium. 26. T. Æsculapii, in the island of the Tiber, which was called after it, Insula Æsculapii. 27. T. Mentis and Veneris Erycinæ, both of which were built at the same time, and close to one another, on the Capitoline. There was also another temple of Venus Erycina before the Porta Collina. 28. T. Honoris and Virtutis, which were built, close to one another, near the Porta Capena and Via Appia, by Marcellus, and adorned with Greek works of art brought from Syracuse. 29. T. Jovis, in the island of the Tiber, near the temple of Æsculapius. 30. T. Fauni, in the island of the Tiber. 31. T. Spei, in the Forum Oltorium. 32. T. Junonis Sospitæ or Matutæ, in the Forum Oltorium, near the theatre of Marcellus. 33. T. Pietatis, in the Forum Oltorium, which was pulled down in order to make room for the theatre of Marcellus.

* Vicus properly signified a quarter of the city, but the principal street in a vicus was frequently called by the name of the vicus to which it belonged.

34. Ædes Fortuna Equestris, in the Campus Flaminius, near the theatre of Pompey, built by Fulvius Placcus, the roof of which, made of marble, was brought from a temple of Juno Lucina in Bruttium. It was probably burned down in the reign of Augustus or Tiberius, since in A.D. 22 we are told there was no temple of Fortuna Equestris at Rome. There were other temples of Fortuna on the Palatine, Quirinal, &c. 35. Ædes Herculis Musarum, close to the Porticus Octaviæ, and between the theatre of Marcellus and the Circus Flaminius, built by M. Fulvius Nobilior, and adorned with the statues of the Muses brought from Ambracia. 36. T. Honoris et Virtutis, built by Marius, but of uncertain site: some modern writers suppose it to have been on the Esquiline, others on the Capitoline. 37. T. Martis, in the Campus Martius, near the Circus Flaminius, built by D. Brutus Callaicus, and adorned with a colossal statue of the god. 38. T. Veneris Genetricis, in the Forum of Cæsar, before which Cæsar's equestrian statue was placed. 39. T. Martis Ultoris, in the Forum of Augustus, to which belong the three splendid Corinthian pillars near the convent S. Annunziata. 40. T. Apollinis, on the Palatine, surrounded by a porticus, in which was the celebrated Palatine library. 41. Pantheon, a celebrated temple in the Campus Martius, built by Agrippa: it is described in a separate article. Vid. PANTEON. 42. T. Augusti, founded by Tiberius and completed by Caligula, on the slope of the Palatine toward the Via Nova. It stood before the temple of Minerva, from which it was probably separated by the Via Nova. 43. T. Pacis, one of the most splendid temples in the city, built by Vespasian on the Velia. 44. T. Isis et Serapidis, in the third Regio, which was named after the temple. 45. T. Vespasiani et Titi, in the Forum alongside of the temple of Concordia. 46. T. Antonini et Faustine, at the further end of the northern side of the Forum, under the Velia. The remains of this temple are in the modern church of S. Lorenzo in Miranda. 47. T. Minervæ, on the southern side of the Forum, behind the temple of Augustus, built by Domitian. 48. T. Bona Dea, a very ancient temple on a spot of the Aventine, which was called Saxum Sacrum, but removed by Hadrian, undoubtedly on the southeastern side of the hill, opposite the heights of S. Sabba and S. Balbina. 49. T. Romæ et Veneris, subsequently called T. Urbis, a large and splendid temple, built by Hadrian, between the Esquiline and Palatine, northeast of the Colosseum. It was burned down in the reign of Maxentius, but was subsequently restored. Its remains are between the Colosseum and the Church of S. Maria or S. Francesca Romana. 50. T. Solis, at the upper end of the Circus Maximus. 51. T. Herculis, in the Forum Boarium, probably the round temple still extant of S. Maria del Sole, which used to be erroneously regarded as the temple of Vesta. There was another temple of Hercules by the Circus Maximus, near the Porta Trigemina. 52. T. Solis, a splendid temple, built by Aurelian, east of the Quirinal. 53. T. Flora, an ancient temple on the southern point of the Quirinal, but the time of its foundation is not recorded. 54. Vulcanale was not a temple, but only an area dedicated to the god, with an altar, on the northern side of the Forum above the Comitium: it was so large that not only were the Curia Hostilia and the Ædes Concordiæ built there, but also a fish-market was held in the place.—IV. CIRCI. The Circi were places for chariot-races and horse-races. 1. Circus Maximus, frequently called simply the Circus, was founded by Tarquinius Priscus, in the plain between the Palatine and Aventine, and was successively enlarged by Julius Cæsar and Trajan. Under the emperors it contained seats for three hundred and eighty-five thousand persons. It was restored by Constantine the Great, and games were celebrated in it as late as the sixth century. 2. C. Flaminius, erected by Flaminius in B.C. 221, in the Prata Flaminia, before the Porta Carmentalis; it was not sufficiently large for the population of Rome, and was therefore seldom used. 3. C. Neronis, erected by Caligula in the gardens of Agrippina on the other side of the Tiber. There was also another C. Neronis on the other side of the Tiber, near the Moles Hadriani, in the gardens of Domitia. 4. C. Palatinus, on the Palatine, in which the Ludi Palatini were celebrated. There are traces of it in the Orto Roncioni, on the southern part of the hill. 5. C. Helioagabali, in the gardens of this emperor, behind the Amphitheatrum Castrense, at the eastern point of the Aurelian Walls. 6. C. Mazentii, commonly called Circo di Caracalla, before the Porta Appia, in the southern part of the city. Among the Circi we may reckon, 7. The Stadium, likewise called C. Agonalis and C. Alexandri, in the Campus Martius, erected by Domitian in place of the wooden stadium built by Augustus. It contained seats for thirty-three thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight persons. Its remains still exist in the Piazza Navona.—V. THEATRES. Theatres were not built at Rome till a comparatively late period, and long after the Circi. At first they were only made of wood for temporary purposes, and were afterward broken up; but many of these wooden theatres were, notwithstanding, constructed with great magnificence. The splendid wooden theatre of M. Æmilii Scaurus was capable of containing eighty thousand spectators. 1. Theatrum Pompeii, the first permanent stone theatre, was erected by Cneius Pompey, B.C. 55, in the Campus Martius, northeast of the Circus Flaminius, after the model of the theatre of Mytilene. It contained seats for forty thousand spectators. It was restored successively by Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Diocletian, and Theodorice. Its ruins are by the Palazzo Pio, not far from the Campo di Fiore. 2. Th. Cornelii Balbi, southeast of the preceding, near the Tiber, on the site of the Palazzo Cenci. It was dedicated by Cornelius Balbus in B.C. 13, was partly burned down under Titus, but was subsequently restored. It contained seats for eleven thousand six hundred persons. 3. Th. Marcelli, in the Forum Olitorium, west of the preceding, between the slope of the Capitoline and the island of the Tiber, on the site of the temple of Pietas. It was begun by Julius Cæsar, and dedicated by Augustus, in B.C. 13, to the memory of his nephew Marcellus. It was restored by Vespasian, and perhaps also by Alexander Severus. It contained seats for twenty thousand spectators. The remains of its cavea exist near the Piazza Montanara. These were the only three theatres at Rome, whence Ovid speaks of terna theatra. There was, however, an Odeum or concert-house, which may be classed among the theatres. 4. Odeum, in the Campus Martius, built by Domitian, though some writers attribute its erection to Trajan. It contained seats for about eleven thousand persons.—VI. AMPHITHEATRES. The amphitheatres, like the theatres, were originally made of wood for temporary purposes. They were used for the shows of gladiators and wild beasts. The first wooden amphitheatre was built by C. Scribonius Curio (the celebrated partisan of Cæsar), and the next by Julius Cæsar during his perpetual dictatorship, B.C. 46. 1. Amph. Statilii Tauri, in the Campus Martius, was the first stone amphitheatre in Rome, and was built by Statilius Taurus, B.C. 30. This edifice was the only one of the kind until the building of the Flavian amphitheatre. It did not satisfy Caligula, who commenced an amphitheatre near the Septa; but the work was not continued by Claudius. Nero too, A.D. 57, erected a vast amphitheatre of wood, but this was only a temporary building. The amphitheatre of Taurus was destroyed in the burning of Rome, A.D. 64, and was probably never restored, as it is not again mentioned. 2. Amph. Flavium, or, as it has been called since the time of Bede, the Colosseum or Coliseum, a name said to be derived from the Colossus of Nero, which stood close by. It was situated in the valley between the Cælius, the Esquiline, and the Velia, on the marshy ground which was previously the pond of Nero's palace. It was commenced by Vespasian, and was completed by Titus, who dedicated it in A.D. 80, when five thousand animals of different kinds were slaughtered. This wonderful building, of which there are still extensive remains, covered nearly six acres of ground, and furnished seats for eighty-seven thousand spectators. In the reign of Macrinus it was struck by lightning, and so much damage was done to it that the games were for some years celebrated in the Stadium. Its restoration was commenced by Elagabalus, and completed by Alexander Severus. 3. Amph. Castrense, at the southeast of the Aurelian Walls.—VII. NAUMACHIÆ. These were buildings of a kind similar to the amphitheatres. They were used for representations of sea-fights, and consisted of artificial lakes or ponds, with stone seats around them to accommodate the spectators. 1. Naumachia Julii Cæsaris, in the middle part of the Campus Martius, called the "Lesser Codeta." This lake was filled up in the time of Augustus, so that we find in later writers mention of only two naumachie. 2. N. Augusti, constructed by Augustus on the other side of the Tiber, under the Janiculus, and near the Porta Portuensis. It was subsequently called the Vetus Naumachia, to distinguish it from the following one. 3. N. Domitiani, constructed by the Emperor Domitian, probably on the other side of the Tiber, under the Vatican and the Circus Neronis.—VIII. THERMÆ. The thermæ were some of the most magnificent buildings of imperial Rome. They were distinct from the Balneæ, or common baths, of which there were a great number at Rome. In the thermæ the baths constituted a small part of the building.

They were, properly speaking, a Roman adaptation of the Greek gymnasia, and besides the baths, they contained places for athletic games and youthful sports, exedræ or public halls, porticoes and vestibules for the idle, and libraries for the learned. They were decorated with the finest objects of art, and adorned with fountains, and shaded walks and plantations. 1. Thermæ Agrippæ, in the Campus Martius, erected by M. Agrippa. The Pantheon, still existing, is supposed by some, but without sufficient reason, to have served originally as a vestibule to these Thermæ. 2. Th. Neronis, erected by Nero in the Campus Martius, alongside of the Thermæ of Agrippa: they were restored by Alexander Severus, and were from that time called Th. Alexandrinæ. 3. Th. Titi, on the Esquiline, near the amphitheatre of this emperor, of which there are still considerable remains. 4. Th. Trajani, also on the Esquiline, immediately behind the two preceding, toward the northeast. 5. Th. Commodianæ and Th. Severianæ, close to one another, near S. Balbina, in the southeastern part of the city. 6. Th. Antoninianæ, also in the southeastern part of the city, behind the two preceding, one of the most magnificent of all the Thermæ, in which two thousand three hundred men could bathe at the same time. The greater part of it was built by Caracalla, and it was completed by Elagabalus and Alexander Severus. There are still extensive remains of this immense building below S. Balbina. 7. Th. Diocletiani, in the northeastern part of the city, between the Agger of Servius and the Viminal and Quirinali. It was the most extensive of all the Thermæ, containing a library, picture gallery, Odeum, &c., and such immense baths that three thousand men could bathe in them at the same time. There are still extensive remains of this building near S. Maria d'Angeli. 8. Th. Constantini, on the Quirinal, on the site of the modern Palazzo Rospigliosi, but of which all traces have disappeared. The following Thermæ were smaller and less celebrated. 9. Th. Decianæ, on the Aventine. 10. Th. Suranæ, erected by Trajan to the memory of his friend Sulpicius Sura, also in the neighborhood of the Aventine, probably the same as the Th. Variana. 11. Th. Philippi, near S. Matteo in Merulana. 12. Th. Agrippinæ, on the Viminal, behind S. Lorenzo. 13. Th. Caii et Lucii, on the Esquiline, called in the Middle Ages the Terme di Galluccio.—IX. BASILICÆ. The Basilicæ were buildings which served as courts of law, and exchanges or places of meeting for merchants and men of business. 1. Basilica Porcia, erected by M. Porcius Cato, in the Forum adjoining the Curia, B.C. 184. It was burned down along with the Curia in the riots which followed the death of Clodius, 52. 2. B. Fulvia, also called Æmilia et Fulvia, because it was built by the censors L. Æmilius Lepidus and M. Fulvius Nobilior in 179. It was situated in the Forum near the preceding one. It was restored by Æmilius Paulus in the time of Cæsar, and was hence called B. Æmilia or Pauli. It was dedicated by his son Paulus Æmilius Lepidus in his consulship, 34. It was burned down twenty years afterward (14), and was rebuilt nominally by Paulus Lepidus, but in reality by

Augustus and the friends of Paulus. The new building was a most magnificent one; its columns of Phrygian marble were especially celebrated. It was repaired by another Lepidus in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 22. 3. B. Sempronia, built by Ti. Sempronius Gracchus, B.C. 171, in the Forum at the end of the Vicus Tuscus. 4. B. Opimia, in the Forum near the temple of Concordia. 5. B. Julia, commenced by Julius Cæsar and finished by Augustus, in the Forum between the temples of Castor and Saturn, probably on the site of the B. Sempronia mentioned above. Some writers suppose that Æmilius Paulus built two Basilicæ, and that the B. Julia occupied the site of one of them. 6. B. Argentaria, in the Forum near the Clivus Argentarius and before the temple of Concordia, probably the same as the one mentioned under the name of B. Vasularia. The remains of this building are behind S. Martina, alongside of the Salita di Marforio. 7. B. Ulpia, in the middle of the Forum of Trajan, of which there are still considerable remains. 8. B. Constantiana, between the temple of Peace and the temple of Rome and Venus. — X. PORTICOES. The porticoes (Porticus) were covered walks, supported by columns, and open on one side. There were several public porticoes at Rome, many of them of great size, which were used as places of recreation, and for the transaction of business. 1. Porticus Pompeii, adjoining the theatre of Pompey, and erected to afford shelter to the spectators in the theatre during a shower of rain. It was restored by Diocletian, and was hence called P. Jovia. 2. P. Argonautarum, or Neptuni or Agrippæ, erected by Agrippa in the Campus Martius around the temple of Neptune, and adorned with a celebrated painting of the Argonauts. 3. P. Philippi, by the side of the T. Hercules Musarum and the Porticus Octaviæ, built by M. Philippus, the father-in-law of Augustus, and adorned with splendid works of art. 4. P. Minucii, in the Campus Martius, near the Circus Flaminius, built by Q. Minucius Rufus in B.C. 109, to commemorate his victories over the Scordisci and Triballi in the preceding year. There appear to have been two porticoes of this name, since we find mention of a Minucia Vetus et Frumentaria. It appears that the tesseræ, or tickets, which entitled persons to a share in the public distributions of corn, were given to them in the P. Minucia. 5. P. Metelli, built by Q. Metellus after his triumph over Perseus, king of Macedonia, B.C. 146. It was situated in the Campus Martius, between the Circus Flaminius and the theatre of Marcellus, and surrounded the two temples of Jupiter Stator and Juno Regina. 6. P. Octavia, built by Augustus on the site of the P. Metelli just mentioned, in honor of his sister Octavia. It was a magnificent building, containing a vast number of works of art and a public library, in which the senate frequently assembled; hence it is sometimes called Curia Octavia. It was burned down in the reign of Titus. Its ruins are near the church of S. Angelo in Pescaria. 7. P. Octavia, which must be carefully distinguished from the P. Octavia just mentioned, was built by Cn. Octavius, who commanded the Roman fleet in the war against Perseus, king of Macedonia. It was situated in the Campus Martius, between the theatre of Pompey and the Circus Flaminius. It was rebuilt by Augustus, and contained two rows of columns of the Corinthian order, with brazen capitals, whence it was also called P. Corinthia. 8. P. Europæ, probably at the foot of the Pincius, in which the foot-races took place. 9. P. Polæ, built by the sister of Agrippa in the Campus Agrippæ, in which also foot-races took place. 10. P. Livia, on the Esquiline, surrounding a temple of Concordia. 11. P. Julia, or P. Caii et Lucii, built by Julia in honor of these two sons of Agrippa, was probably also situated on the Esquiline near the Thermæ Caii et Lucii. The following porticoes were less celebrated: 12. P. Vipsania, supposed by some writers to be only a later name of the P. Argonautarum. 13. P. Claudia, on the Esquiline. — XI. TRIUMPHAL ARCHES. The triumphal arches (Arcus) were structures peculiar to the Romans, and were erected by victorious generals in commemoration of their victories. They were built across the principal streets of the city, and, according to the space of their respective localities, consisted either of a single arch-way, or of a central one for carriages, with two smaller ones on each side for foot passengers. Ancient writers mention twenty-one arches in the city of Rome. Of these the most important were, 1. Arcus Fabianus, also called Fornix Fabianus, near the beginning of the Via Sacra, built by Fabius Maximus in B.C. 121, in commemoration of his victory over the Allobroges. 2. A. Drusi, erected by the senate in B.C. 9, in honor of Nero Claudius Drusus. It was situated on the Via Appia, and still exists, forming the inner gate of the Porta di S. Sebastiano. 3. A. Augusti, in the Forum near the house of Julius Cæsar. 4. A. Tiberii, near the temple of Saturn, on the Clivus Capitolinus, erected by Tiberius, A.D. 16, in honor of the victories of Germanicus in Germany. 5. A. Claudii, in the plain east of the Quirinal, erected A.D. 51, to commemorate the victories of Claudius in Britain. Remains of it have been dug up at the beginning of the Piazza di Sciarra, by the Via di Pietra. 6. A. Titi, in the middle of the Via Sacra, at the foot of the Palatine, which still exists. It was erected to the honor of Titus, after his conquest of Judæa, but was not finished till after his death, since in the inscription upon it he is called "Divus," and he is also represented as being carried up to heaven upon an eagle. The bas-reliefs of this arch represent the spoils from the temple of Jerusalem carried in triumphal procession. 7. A. Trajani, in the Forum of this emperor, at the point where you enter it from the Forum of Augustus. 8. A. Veri, on the Via Appia, erected to the honor of Verus after his victory over the Parthians. 9. A. Marci Aurelii, in the seventh Regio, probably erected to commemorate the victory of this emperor over the Marcomanni. It existed under different names near the Piazza Fiano down to 1662, when it was broken up by order of Alexander VII. 10. A. Septimii Severi, in the Forum at the end of the Via Sacra and the Clivus Capitolinus, before the temple of Concordia, and still extant near the church of SS. Sergio e Bacco, was erected by the senate, A.D. 203, in honor of Septimius Severus and his two sons, Caracalla and Geta, on account of his victories over the Parthians and Arabians. 11. A. Gordiani, on the Esquiline. 12. A. Gallieni, erected to the honor of Gallienus by a private individual, M. Aurelius Victor, also on the Esquiline, southeast of the Porta Esquilina. It is still extant near the Church of S. Vito. 13. A. Diocletiani, probably identical with the A. Novus in the seventh Regio. 14. A. Constantini, at the entrance to the valley between the Palatine and the Cælius, is still extant. It was erected by the senate in honor of Constantine after his victory over Maxentius, A.D. 312. It is profusely ornamented, and many of the bas-reliefs which adorn it were taken from one of the arches erected in the time of Trajan. 15. A. Theodosiani, Gratiani et Valentiniani, opposite the Pons Ælius and the Moles Hadriani.—XII. CURIÆ OR SENATE-HOUSES. 1. Curia Hostilia, frequently called Curia simply, was built by Tullus Hostilius, and was used as the ordinary place of assembly for the senate down to the time of Julius Cæsar. It stood in the Forum, on the northern side of the Comitium. It was burned to the ground in the riots which followed the death of Clodius, B.C. 52. It was, however, soon rebuilt, the direction of the work being intrusted to Faustus, the son of the dictator Sulla; but scarcely had it been finished, when the senate, at the suggestion of Cæsar, decreed that it should be destroyed, and a temple of Fortune erected on its site, while a new curia should be erected, which should bear the name of Julia. (vid. below.) 2. C. Pompeia or Pompeii, attached to the Portico of Pompey in the Campus Martius. It was in this curia that Cæsar was assassinated on the Ides of March. 3. C. Julia, the decree for the erection of which has been mentioned above, was finished and consecrated by Augustus. It did not stand on the site of the Curia Hostilia, as many modern writers have supposed, but at the southwestern angle of the Comitium, between the temple of Vesta and that of Castor and Pollux. 4. C. Pompiliana, built by Domitian and restored by Diocletian, was the usual place of the senate's meeting from the time of Domitian. It was situated alongside of the temple of Janus, which was said to have been built by Numa Pompilius, whence this curia was called Pompiliana.—XIII. PRISONS. There were two public prisons (carceres) in Rome. The more ancient one, called Carcer Mamertinus (a name, however, which does not occur in any ancient author), was built by Ancus Marcius on the slope of the Capitoline overhanging the Forum. It was enlarged by Servius Tullius, who added to it a dismal subterranean dungeon, called from him Tullianum, where the conspirators of Catiline were put to death. This dungeon was twelve feet under ground, walled on each side, and arched over with stone-work. It is still extant, and serves as a subterranean chapel to a small church built on the spot called S. Pietro in Carcere. Near this prison were the Scala Gemonia or steps, down which the bodies of those who had been executed were thrown into the Forum, to be exposed to the gaze of the Roman populace. The other state prison was called Lautumia, and was probably situated toward the northern side of the Forum, near the Curia Hostilia and Basilica Porcia. Some writers, however, suppose Lautumia to be only another name of the Carcer Mamertinus.—XIV. CASTRA OR BARRACKS. 1. Castra Prætoria, in the north-eastern corner of the city, on the slope of the Quirinal and Viminal, and beyond the Thermæ of Diocletian, were built by the Emperor Tiberius in the form of a Roman camp. Here the prætorian troops or imperial guards were always quartered. 2. Castra Peregrina, on the Cælius, probably built by Septimius Severus for the use of the foreign troops, who might serve as a counterpoise against the prætorians.—XV. AQUEDUCTS. The aqueducts (Aquæductus) supplied Rome with an abundance of pure water from the hills which surround the Campagna. The Romans at first had recourse to the Tiber and to wells sunk in the city. It was not till B.C. 313 that the first aqueduct was constructed, but their number was gradually increased till they amounted to fourteen in the time of Procopius, that is, the sixth century of the Christian era. 1. Aqua Appia, was begun by the censor Appius Claudius Cæcus in B.C. 313. Its sources were near the Via Prænestina, between the seventh and eighth mile-stones, and its termination was at the Salinæ by the Porta Trigemina. Its length was eleven thousand one hundred and ninety passus, for eleven thousand one hundred and thirty of which it was carried under the earth, and for the remaining sixty passus, within the city, from the Porta Capena to the Porta Trigemina, it was on arches. No traces of it remain. 2. Anio Vetus, commenced B.C. 273, by the censor M^r. Curius Dentatus, and finished by M. Fulvius Flaccus. The water was derived from the River Anio, above Tibur, at a distance of twenty Roman miles from the city; but, on account of its windings, its actual length was forty-three miles, of which length less than a quarter of a mile only (viz., two hundred and twenty-one passus) was above the ground. There are considerable remains of this aqueduct on the Aurelian wall, near the Porta Maggiore, and also in the neighborhood of Tivoli. 3. Aqua Marcia, which brought the coldest and most wholesome water to Rome, was built by the prætor Q. Marcius Rex, by command of the senate, in B.C. 144. It commenced at the side of the Via Valeria, thirty-six miles from Rome; its length was sixty-one thousand seven hundred and ten and a half passus, of which only seven thousand four hundred and sixty-three were above ground; namely, five hundred and twenty-eight on solid substractions, and six thousand nine hundred and thirty-five on arches. It was high enough to supply water to the summit of the Capitoline Mount. It was repaired by Agrippa in his ædileship, B.C. 33 (vid. below, No. 5), and the volume of its water was increased by Augustus, by means of the water of a spring eight hundred passus from it: the short aqueduct which conveyed this water was called Aqua Augusta, but is never enumerated as a distinct aqueduct. Several arches of the Aqua Marcia are still standing. 4. Aqua Tepula, which was built by the censors Cn. Servilius Cæpio and L. Cassius Longinus in B.C. 127, began in a spot in the Lucullan or Tuscan land, two miles to the right of the tenth mile-stone on the Via Latina. It was afterward connected with,—5. Aqua Julia. Among the splendid public works executed by Agrippa in his aedileship, B.C. 33, was the formation of a new aqueduct, and the restoration of all the old ones. From a source two miles to the right of the twelfth mile-stone of the Via Latina, he constructed his aqueduct (the Aqua Julia) first to the Aqua Tepula, in which it was merged as far as the reservoir (piscina) on the Via Latina, seven miles from Rome. From the reservoir the water was carried along two distinct channels, on the same substructions (which were probably the original substructions of the Aqua Tepula newly restored), the lower channel being called the Aqua Tepula, and the upper the Aqua Julia; and this double aqueduct again was united with the Aqua Marcia, over the water-course of which the other two were carried. The monument erected at the junction of these three aqueducts is still to be seen close to the Porta S. Lorenzo. It bears an inscription referring to the repairs under Caracalla. The whole course of the Aqua Julia, from its source, amounted to fifteen thousand four hundred and twenty-six passus, partly on massive substructions and partly on arches. 6. Aqua Virgo, built by Agrippa to supply his baths. Its water was as highly esteemed for bathing as that of the Aqua Marcia was for drinking. It commenced by the eighth mile-stone on the Via Collatina, and was conducted by a very circuitous route, chiefly under the ground, to the M. Pincius, whence it was carried on arches to the Campus Martius: its length was fourteen thousand one hundred and five passus, of which twelve thousand eight hundred and sixty-five were under ground. 7. Aqua Alsietina, sometimes called also Aqua Augusta, on the other side of the Tiber, was constructed by Augustus from the Lacus Alsietinus (Lago di Martignano), which lay six thousand five hundred passus to the right of the fourteenth mile-stone, on the Via Claudia, and was brought to the part of the Regio Transtiberina below the Janiculus. Its length was twenty-two thousand one hundred and seventy-two passus, of which only three hundred and fifty-eight were on arches; and its water was so bad that it could only have been intended for the supply of Augustus's Nau-machia, and for watering gardens. 8, 9. Aqua Claudia and Anio Novus (or Aqua Aniena Nova), the two most magnificent of all the aqueducts, both commenced by Caligula in A.D. 36, and finished by Claudius in A.D. 50. The Aqua Claudia commenced near the thirty-eighth mile-stone on the Via Sublacensis. Its water was reckoned the best after the Marcia. Its length was forty-six thousand four hundred and six passus (nearly forty-six and a half miles), of which nine thousand five hundred and sixty-seven were on arches. The Anio Novus began at the forty-second mile-stone on the Via Sublacensis. Its length was fifty-eight thousand seven hundred passus (nearly fifty-nine miles), and some of its arches were one hundred and nine feet high. In the neighborhood of the city these two aqueducts were united, forming two channels on the same arches, the Claudia below and the Anio Novus above. An interesting monument connected with these aqueducts is the gate now called Porta Maggiore, which was originally a magnificent double arch, by means of which the aqueduct was carried over the Via Labicana and the Via Prænestina. Over the double arch are three inscriptions, which record the names of Claudius as the builder, and of Vespasian and Titus as the restorers of the aqueduct. By the side of this arch the aqueduct passes along the wall of Aurelian for some distance, and then it is continued upon the Arcus Neroniani or Cælimontani, which were added by Nero to the original structure, and which terminated at the temple of Claudius, which was also built by Nero on the Cælius, where the water was probably conveyed to a castellum already built for the Aqua Julia, and for a branch of the Aqua Marcia, which had been at some previous time continued to the Cælius. 10. Aqua Crabra, which had its source near that of the Julia, and which was originally carried right through the Circus Maximus; but the water was so bad that Agrippa would not bring it into the Julia, but abandoned it to the people of the Tusculan land. Hence it was called Aqua Damnata. At a later period, part of the water was brought into the Aqua Julia. Considerable traces of it remain. 11. Aqua Trajana, was brought by Trajan from the Lacus Sabatinus (now Bracciano) to supply the Janiculus and the Regio Transtiberina. 12. Aqua Alexandrina, constructed by Alexander Severus; its source was in the lands of Tusculum, about fourteen miles from Rome, between Gabii and the Lake Regillus. Its small height shows that it was intended for the baths of Severus, which were in one of the valleys of Rome. 13. Aqua Septimiana, built by Septimius Severus, was perhaps only a branch of the Aqua Julia, formed by the emperor to bring water to his baths. 14. Aqua Algentia had its source at Mount Algidus by the Via Tusculana. Its builder is unknown. Three of these aqueducts still supply the modern city of Rome with water. (1.) The Aqua Vergine, the ancient Aqua Virgo, which was restored by Pope Pius IV., and further embellished by Benedict XIV. and Clement XIII. The chief portion of its waters gush out through the beautiful Fontana di Trevi, but it also supplies twelve other public fountains and the greater part of the lower city. (2.) The Aqua Felice, named after the conventual name of its restorer, Sixtus V. (Fra Felice), is probably a part of the ancient Aqua Claudia, though some take it for the Alexandrina. It supplies twenty-seven public fountains and the eastern part of the city. (3.) The Aqua Paola, the ancient Alsietina, supplies the Transtevere and the Vatican, and feeds, among others, the splendid fountains before St. Peter's.—XVI. SEWERS. Of these the most celebrated was the Cloaca Maxima, constructed by Tarquinius Priscus, which was formed to carry off the waters brought down from the adjacent hills into the Velabrum and valley of the Forum. It empties itself into the Tiber nearly opposite one extremity of the Insula Tiberina. This cloaca was formed by three arches, one within the other, the innermost of which is a semicircular vault about fourteen feet in diameter. It is still extant in its original state, with not a stone displaced.—XVII. PALACES. 1. Palatium, or the imperial palace, was situated on the northeast side of the Palatine, between the arch of Titus and the sanctuary of Vesta ; its front was turned toward the Forum, and the approach to it was from the Via Sacra, close by the arch of Titus. It was originally the house of the orator Hortensius, and was enlarged by Augustus, who made it the imperial residence. A part of the Palatium was called Domus Tiberiana, which was originally a separate house of Tiberius on the Palatine, and was afterward united to the palace of Augustus. It was on the side of the hill turned toward the Circus and the Velabrum, and is sometimes called Postica Pars Palatii. It was through this part of the palace that the Emperor Otho fled into the Velabrum. We read of the Domus Tiberiana even after the imperial palace had been burned to the ground in the reign of Nero ; whence it follows that when the palace was rebuilt a portion of it still continued to bear this name. The Palatium was considerably enlarged by Caligula ; but it did not satisfy Nero's love of pomp and splendor. Nero built two magnificent palaces, which must be distinguished from one another. The first, called the Domus Transitoria Neronis, covered the whole of the Palatine, and extended as far as the Esquiline to the gardens of Mæcenas. This palace was burned to the ground in the great fire of Rome, whereupon Nero commenced a new palace, known by the name of Domus Aurea, which embraced the whole of the Palatine, the Velia, the valley of the Colosseum, and the heights of the Thermæ of Titus, extended near the Esquiline gate, and was cut through not only by the Via Sacra, but also by other streets. The whole building, however, was not finished at the time of Nero's death ; and Vespasian confined the imperial palace to the Palatine, converting the other parts of the Domus Aurea into public or private buildings. The palace itself was not finished till the time of Domitian, who adorned it with numerous works of art. The Emperor Septimius Severus added on the south side of the Palatine a building called the Septizonium, which was probably intended as an Atrium. There were considerable remains of this Septizonium down to the end of the sixteenth century, when Sixtus V. caused them to be destroyed, and the pillars brought to the Vatican. Among the numerous private palaces at Rome the following were some of the most important.

2. Domus Ciceronis, close to the Porticus Catuli, probably on the northeastern edge of the Palatine, was built by M. Lavius Drusus, and purchased by Cicero of one of the Crassi. It was destroyed by Claudius after the banishment of Cicero, but was subsequently rebuilt at the public expense.

3. D. Pompeii, the palace of Pompey, was situated in the Carinæ near the temple of Tellus. It was afterward the residence of M. Antonius.

4. D. Crassi, the palace of L. Crassus the orator, on the Palatine.

5. D. Scavri, also on the Palatine, celebrated for its magnificence, subsequently belonged to Clodius.

6. D. Lateranorum, on the eastern confines of the Cælius, was a palace originally belonging to the distinguished family of the Plautii Laterani ; but after the execution of Plautius Lateranus under Nero, it became imperial property. It was given by Septimius Severus to his friend Lateranus, and was subsequently the palace of Constantine, who adorned it with great magnificence. The modern palace of the Lateran occupies its site.

—XVIII. HORTI. The Horti were parks or gardens, which were laid out by wealthy Roman nobles on the hills around the city, and were adorned with beautiful buildings and works of art.

1. Horti Luculliani, on Mount Pincius, which hill was hence called Collis Hortorum. They were laid out by Lucullus, the conqueror of Mithradates. In the reign of Claudius they belonged to Valerius Asiaticus, who was put to death through the influence of Messalina, chiefly because she coveted the possession of these gardens. From this time they appear to have belonged to the imperial house.

2. H. Sallustiani, laid out by the historian Sallust, on his return from Numidia, in the valley between the Quirinal and the Pincius.

3. H. Casaris, bequeathed by Julius Cæsar to the people, were situated on the right bank of the Tiber, at the foot of the Janiculus, probably on the spot where Augustus afterward constructed his great Naumachia.

4. H. Mæcenatis, in the Campus Esquilinus, bequeathed by Mæcenas to Augustus, and frequently used by the imperial family.

5. H. Agrippinæ, on the right bank of the Tiber, in which Caligula built his Circus. It was here that Nero burned the Christians to serve as lights for his nocturnal games, after previously wrapping them up in pitch.

6. H. Domitia, also on the right bank of the Tiber, in which Hadrian built his Mausoleum.

7. H. Pallantiani, on the Esquiline, laid out by Pallas, the powerful freedman of Claudius.

8. H. Getae, on the other side of the Tiber, laid out by Septimius Severus.

—XIX. SEPULCHRAL MONUMENTS.

1. Mausoleum Augusti, was situated in the Campus Martius, and was built by Augustus as the burial-place of the imperial family. It was surrounded with an extensive garden or park, and was considered one of the most magnificent buildings of his reign ; but there are only some insignificant ruins of it still extant.

2. Mausoleum Hadriani, was commenced by Hadrian in the gardens of Domitia, on the right bank of the Tiber, and was connected with the city by the Pons Ælius ; it was finished and dedicated by Antoninus Pius, A.D. 140. Here were buried Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, L. Verus, Commodus, and probably also Septimius Severus, Geta, and Caracalla. This building, stripped of its ornaments, still forms the fortress of modern Rome (the castle of S. Angelo).

3. Mausoleum Helena, a round building on the Esquiline, of considerable extent, erected by Constantine as the sepulchre of his mother. Its remains, situated in the street on the right of the Porta Maggiore, are now called Torre Pignattara.

4. Sepulcrum Scipionum, the burial-place of the Scipios, was situated, left of the Via Appia, near the Porta Capena. Most of the tombs of the distinguished Roman families during the Republican period lay on the Via Appia. The tomb of the Scipios was discovered in 1780, about four hundred paces within the modern Porta S. Sebastiano. It contained many interesting monuments and inscriptions, which are now deposited in the Museo Pio-Clementino.

5. Sepulcrum Cæcilia Metella, erected to the memory of Cæcilia Metella, the daughter of Metellus Creticus, not far from the Circus Maxentii. This imposing monument is still extant, and known oy the name of Capo di Bove. 6. Sepulcrum Cestii, situated south of the Aventine, near the Porta Ostiensis, being partly within and partly without the walls of Aurelian. This monument, which is still extant, is in the form of a Pyramid, and was built in the time of Augustus for a certain C. Cestius. 7. Sepulcrum Septimii Severi, on the Via Appia, built by Septimius Severus in his life-time, after the model of his Sepulchrum. (Vid. above, XVI., No. 1).—XIX. COLUMNS. Columns (Columnæ) were frequently erected at Rome to commemorate persons and events. 1. Columna Mænia, near the end of the Forum, toward the Capitol, was erected to the honor of the consul C. Mænius, who conquered the Latins and took the town of Antium, B.C. 338. 2. Col. Rostrata, also in the Forum, erected in honor of the consul C. Duilius, to commemorate his victory over the Carthaginian fleet, B.C. 260. The name of Rostrata was given to it from its being adorned with the beaks of the conquered ships. The inscription upon this column, written in obsolete Latin, is still preserved. 3. Col. Trajani, in the Forum, in which the ashes of the Emperor Trajan were deposited. This column is still extant, and is one of the most interesting monuments of ancient Rome. It is, including the pedestal, one hundred and seventeen feet high. The top was originally crowned with the statue of the emperor; it is now surmounted by that of the apostle Peter. A spiral bas-relief is folded round the pillar, which represents the emperor's wars against Decebalus and the Dacians, and is one of the most valuable authorities for archæological inquiries. 4. Col. Antonini Pii, erected in honor of Antoninus Pius after his death, consisted of a column of red granite on a pediment of white marble, and was situated in the Campus Martius, near the temple dedicated to this emperor. It stood at an earlier period not far from the Curia Innocenziana on Monte Citorio, in the garden of the Casa della Missione. At present the basis only is extant, and is preserved in the garden of the Vatican. 5. Col. M. Aurelii Antonini, generally called the Antonine Column, erected to the memory of the Emperor M. Aurelius, also in the Campus Martius, and still extant. It is an imitation of the Column of Trajan, and contains bas-reliefs representing the wars of M. Aurelius against the Marcomanni.—XX. OBELISKS. The Obelisks (Obelisci) at Rome were mostly works of Egyptian art, which were transported from Egypt to Rome in the time of the emperors. Augustus caused two obelisks to be brought to Rome, one of which was erected in the Circus and another in the Campus Martius. The former was restored in 1589, and is called at present the Flaminian Obelisk. Its whole height is about one hundred and sixteen feet, and without the base about seventy-eight feet. The obelisk in the Campus Martius was set up by Augustus as a sun-dial. It stands at present on the Monte Citorio, where it was placed in 1792. Its whole height is about one hundred and ten feet, and without the base about seventy-one feet. Another obelisk was brought to Rome by Caligula, and placed on the Vatican in the Circus of Caligula. It stands at present in front of St. Peter's, where it was placed in 1586, and its whole height is about one hundred and thirty-two feet, and without the base and modern ornaments at top about eighty-three feet. But the largest obelisk at Rome is that which was originally transported from Heliopolis to Alexandria by Constantine, and conveyed to Rome by his son Constantius, who placed it in the Circus Maximus. Its present position is before the north portico of the Lateran church, where it was placed in 1588. Its whole height is about one hundred and forty-nine feet, and without the base about one hundred and five feet. There are eight other obelisks at Rome, besides those mentioned above, but none of them are of historical importance.—G. ROADS LEADING OUT OF ROME. Of these the most important were, 1. Via Latina, the most ancient of the south roads, which issued at first from the Porta Capena, and after the time of Aurelian from the Porta Latina. It joined the Via Appia at Beneventum. 2. Via Appia, the Great South Road, also issued from the Porta Capena, and was the most celebrated of all the Roman roads. It was commenced by Appius Claudius when censor, and was eventually carried to Brundisium. Vid. APPIA VIA. 3. Via Ostiensis, originally passed through the Porta Trigemina, afterward through the Porta Ostiensis, and kept the left bank of the Tiber to Ostia. 4. Via Portuensis, issued from the same gate as the Via Ostiensis, and kept the right bank of the Tiber to Portus, the new harbor founded by Claudius, near Ostia. 5. Via Labicana, issued from the Porta Esquilina, and passing Labicum, fell into the Via Latina at the station ad Bivium, thirty miles from Rome. 6. Via Prænestina, originally the Via Gabina, issued at first from the Porta Esquilina, and subsequently from the Porta Prænestina. Passing through Gabii and Præneste, it joined the Via Latina just below Anagnina. 7. Via Tiburtina, issued originally from the Porta Esquilina, or from the Porta Viminalis, and subsequently from the Porta Tiburtina, and proceeded to Tibur, from which it was continued under the name of the Via Valeria, past Corfinium to Adria. 8. Via Nomentana, anciently Ficulnensis, ran from the Porta Collina, subsequently from the Porta Nomentana, across the Anio to Nomentum, and a little beyond fell into the Via Salaria at Eretrum. 9. Via Salaria, ran from the Porta Collina, subsequently from the Porta Salaria, past Fidenæ to Reate and Asculum Picenum. At Castrum Truentinum it reached the coast, which it followed until it joined the Via Flaminia at Ancona. 10. Via Flaminia, the Great North Road, commenced in the censorship of C. Flaminus, issued from the Porta Flaminia, and proceeded past Ocriculum, Narnia, and Pisaurum to Ariminum, from which town it was continued under the name of the Via Æmilia to Placentia and Aquileia. 11. Via Aurelia, the Great Coast Road, issued originally from the Porta Janiculensis. It reached the coast at Alsium, and followed the shore of the Lower Sea along Etruria and Liguria by Genoa, as far as Forum Julii in Gaul.

ROMULÆA, an ancient town of the Hirpini in Samnium, on the road from Beneventum to Tarentum, destroyed at an early period by the Romans.

ROMULUS, the founder of the city of Rome, must not be regarded as a real personage. The stories about him are mythical, and represent the traditional belief of the Roman people respecting their origin. Romulus, which is only a lengthened form of Romus, is the Roman people represented as an individual. The common legend about Romulus ran as follows: At Alba Longa there reigned a succession of kings, descended from Iulus, the son of Æneas. One of the last of these kings left two sons, Numitor and Amulius. The latter, who was the younger, deprived Numitor of the kingdom, but allowed him to live in the enjoyment of his private fortune. Fearful, however, lest the heirs of Numitor might not submit so quietly to his usurpation, he caused his only son to be murdered, and made his daughter Silvia, or Rhea Silvia, one of the Vestal virgins. Silvia was violated by Mars, and in course of time gave birth to twins. Amulius doomed the guilty Vestal and her babes to be drowned in the river. In the Anio Silvia exchanged her earthly life for that of a goddess, and became the wife of the river god. The stream carried the cradle in which the children were lying into the Tiber, which had overflowed its banks far and wide. It was stranded at the foot of the Palatine, and overturned on the root of a wild fig-tree, which, under the name of the Ficus Ruminalis, was preserved and held sacred for many ages after. A she-wolf, which had come to drink of the stream, carried them into her den hard by, and suckled them, where they were discovered by Faustulus, the king's shepherd, who took the children to his own house, and gave them to the care of his wife, Acca Larentia. They were called ROMULUS and REMUS, and were brought up with the other shepherds on the Palatine Hill. As they grew up, they became distinguished by the beauty of their person and the bravery of their deeds, and fought boldly against wild beasts and robbers. A quarrel having arisen between these shepherds and the herdsmen of Numitor, who stalled their cattle on the neighboring hill of the Aventine, Remus was taken by a stratagem, during the absence of his brother, and carried off to Numitor. This led to the discovery of the parentage both of Romulus and Remus, who now slew Amulius, and placed their grandfather Numitor on the throne. Romulus and Remus loved their old abode, and therefore left Alba to found a city on the banks of the Tiber. A strife arose between the brothers where the city should be built, and after whose name it should be called. Romulus wished to build it on the Palatine, Remus on the Aventine. It was agreed that the question should be decided by augury; and each took his station on the top of his chosen hill. The night passed away, and as the day was dawning Remus saw six vultures; but at sun-rise, when these tidings were brought to Romulus, twelve vultures flew by him. Each claimed the augury in his own favor; but the shepherds decided for Romulus, and Remus was obliged to yield. Romulus now proceeded to mark out the pomarium of his city (vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.), and to raise the wall. Remus, who still resented the wrong he had suffered, leaped over the wall in scorn, whereupon he was slain by his brother. As soon as the city was built, Romulus found his people too few in numbers. He therefore set apart, on the Capitoline Hill, an asylum or a sanctuary, in which homicides and runaway slaves might take refuge. The city thus became filled with men, but they wanted women. Romulus, therefore, tried to form treaties with the neighboring tribes, in order to obtain connubium, or the right of legal marriage with their citizens; but his offers were treated with disdain, and he accordingly resolved to obtain by force what he could not gain by entreaty. In the fourth month after the foundation of the city, he proclaimed that games were to be celebrated in honor of the god Consus, and invited his neighbors, the Latins and Sabines, to the festival. Suspecting no treachery, they came in numbers, with their wives and children. But the Roman youths rushed upon their guests and carried off the virgins. The parents of the virgins returned home and prepared for vengeance. The inhabitants of three of the Latin towns, Cænina, Antemnæ, and Crustumerium, took up arms, one after the other, and were successively defeated by the Romans. Romulus slew with his own hand Aeron, king of Cænina, and dedicated his arms and armor, as spolia opima, to Jupiter. At last the Sabine king, Titus Tatius, advanced with a powerful army against Rome. The fortress of the Saturnian, afterward called the Capitoline Hill, was surrendered to the Sabines by the treachery of Tarpeia, the daughter of the commander of the fortress. Vid. TARPEIA. On the next day the Romans endeavored to recover the hill, and a long and desperate battle was fought in the valley between the Palatine and the Capitoline. At length, when both parties were exhausted with the struggle, the Sabine women rushed in between them, and prayed their husbands and fathers to be reconciled. Their prayer was heard; the two people not only made peace, but agreed to form only one nation. The Romans continued to dwell on the Palatine under their king Romulus; the Sabines built a new town on the Capitoline and Quirinal Hills, where they lived under their king Titus Tatius. The two kings and their senates met for deliberation in the valley between the Palatine and Capitoline Hills, which was hence called comitium, or the place of meeting. But this union did not last long. Titus Tatius was slain at a festival at Lavinium by some Laurentines, to whom he had refused satisfaction for outrages which had been committed by his kinsmen. Henceforward Romulus ruled alone over both Romans and Sabines. After reigning thirty-seven years, he was at length taken away from the world. One day, as he was reviewing his people in the Campus Martius, near the Goat's Pool, the sun was suddenly eclipsed, darkness overspread the earth, and a dreadful storm dispersed the people. When daylight had returned Romulus had disappeared, for his father Mars had carried him up to heaven in a fiery chariot (Quirinus Martis equis Acheronta fugit. Hor., Carm., iii., 3). Shortly afterward he appeared in more than mortal beauty to Proculus Julius, and bade him tell the Romans to worship him as their guardian god under the name of Quirinus. Such was the glorified end of Romulus in the genuine le gend. But as it staggered the faith of a later age, a tale was invented to account for his mysterious disappearance. It was related that the senators, discontented with the tyrannical rule of their king, murdered him during the gloom of a tempest, cut up his body, and carried home the mangled pieces under their robes. As Romulus was regarded as the founder of Rome, its most ancient political institutions and the organization of the people were ascribed to him. Thus he is said to have divided the people into three tribes, which bore the names Ramnes, Tities, and Luceres. The Ramnes were supposed to have derived their name from Romulus, the Tities from Titus Tatius the Sabine king, and the Luceres from Lucumo, an Etruscan chief, who had assisted Romulus in the war against the Sabines. Each tribe contained ten curiæ, which received their names from the thirty Sabine women who had brought about the peace between the Romans and their own people. Further, each curia contained ten gentes, and each gens one hundred men. Thus the people, according to the general belief, were divided originally into three tribes, thirty curiæ, and three hundred gentes, which mustered three thousand men, who fought on foot, and were called a legion. Besides those there were three hundred horsemen, called Celeres, the same body as the Equites of a later time. To assist him in the government of the people, Romulus is said to have selected a number of the aged men in the state, who were called Patres or Senatores. The council itself, which was called the senatus, originally consisted of one hundred members; but this number was increased to two hundred when the Sabines were incorporated in the state. In addition to the senate, there was another assembly, consisting of the members of the gentes, which bore the name of comitia curiata, because they voted in it according to their division into curiæ.

ROSCILLUS. Vid. ÆGUS.

ROSCIUS. 1. L., a Roman ambassador sent to Fidenæ in B.C. 439. He and his three colleagues were killed by the inhabitants of Fidenæ, at the instigation of Lar Tolumnius, king of the Veientes. The statues of all four were erected in the Rostra at Rome.—2. SEX., of Ameria, a town in Umbria. The father of this Roscius had been murdered at the instigation of two of his relations and fellow-townsmen, T. Roscius Magnus and T. Roscius Capito, who coveted the wealth of their neighbor. These two Roscii struck a bargain with Chrysoonus, the freedman and favorite of Sulla, to divide the property of the murdered man between them. But as the proceeding excited the utmost indignation at Ameria, and the magistrates of the town made an effort to obtain from Sulla the restitution of the property to the son, the robbers accused young Roscius of the murder of his father, and hired witnesses to swear to the fact. Roscius was defended by Cicero (B.C. 80) in an oration which is still extant, and was acquitted. Cicero's speech was greatly admired at the time, and though at a later period he found fault with it himself, as bearing marks of youthful exaggeration, it displays abundant evidence of his great oratorical powers.—3. Q., the most celebrated comic actor at Rome, was a native of Solonium, a small place in the neighborhood of Lanuvium. His histrionic powers procured him the favor of many of the Roman nobles, and, among others, of the dictator Sulla, who presented him with a gold ring, the symbol of equestrian rank. Roscius enjoyed the friendship of Cicero, who constantly speaks of him in terms both of admiration and affection. Roscius was considered by the Romans to have reached such perfection in his own profession, that it became the fashion to call every one who became particularly distinguished in his own art by the name of Roscius. In his younger years Cicero received instruction from Roscius; and at a later time he and Roscius often used to try which of them could express a thought with the greatest effect, the orator by his eloquence, or the actor by his gestures. These exercises gave Roscius so high an opinion of his art, that he wrote a work in which he compared eloquence and acting. Like his celebrated contemporary, the tragic actor Æsopus, Roscius realized an immense fortune by his profession. He died in 62. One of Cicero's extant orations is entitled Pro Q. Roscio Comedo. It was delivered before the judex C. Piso, probably in 68, and relates to a claim for fifty thousand sesterces, which one C. Fannius Chærea brought against Roscius.—4. FABĀTUS. Vid. FABĀTUS.—5. RODOMAGUS. Vid. RATOMAGUS.

ROXANA (Ρωξάνη), daughter of Oxyartes the Bactrian, fell into the hands of Alexander on his capture of the hill-fort in Sogdiana, named "the rock," B.C. 327. Alexander was so captivated by her charms that he married her. Soon after Alexander's death (323) she gave birth to a son (Alexander Ægus), who was admitted to share the nominal sovereignty with Arrhidæus, under the regency of Perdiccas. Before the birth of the boy she had drawn Statura, or Barsine, to Babylon by a friendly letter, and there caused her to be murdered. Roxana afterward crossed over to Europe with her son, and placed herself under the protection of Olympias. She shared the fortunes of Olympias, and threw herself into Pydna along with the latter, where they were besieged by Cassander. In 316 Pydna was taken by Cassander, Olympias was put to death, and Roxana and her son were placed in confinement in Amphipolis. Here they were detained under the charge of Glaucias till 311, in which year, soon after the general peace then concluded, they were murdered in accordance with orders from Cassander.

[RUBELLII PLAUTUS. C., son of Rubellius and of Julia, great-grandson of the Emperor Tiberius, was involved in the accusations which Junia Silana brought against Agrippina A.D. 55: he was ordered by Nero to withdraw from Rome to his estates in Asia, where he employed himself in the study of the Stoic philosophy; but in A.D. 62, Nero's fears having been again excited against Rubellius, the latter was murdered by order of the emperor.]

RUBI (Rubustinus: now Ruvo), a town in Apulia, on the road from Canusium to Brundisium.

RUBICO, a small river in Italy, falling into the Adriatic a little north of Ariminum, formed the boundary in the republican period between the province of Gallia Cisalpina and Italia Proper. It is celebrated in history on account of Cæsar's passage across it at the head of his army, by which act he declared war against the republic. A papal decree, issued in 1756, declared the modern Lusa to be the ancient Rubico, but the Pisatello, a little further north, has better claims to this honor.

RUBRA SAXA, called Rubræ Breves (sc. Petræ) by Martial, a small place in Etruria only a few miles from Rome, near the River Cremera, and on the Via Flaminia. It was near this spot that the great battle was fought in which Maxentius was defeated by Constantine, A.D. 312.

[RUBRENIUS LAPPA, a later Roman tragic writer, whose Atrcus is mentioned by Juvenal (vii. 72).]

RUBRÆSUS LACUS. Vid. NARBO.

RUBRICATUS. 1. Or UBUS (now Seibous), a considerable river of Numidia in Northern Africa, rising in the mountains southeast of Cirta (now Constantineh), flowing northeast, and falling into the Mediterranean east of Hippo Regius (now Bonah).—2. (Now Llobregat), a small river of Hispania Tarraconensis, flowing into the sea west of Barcelona.

[RUBRIUS. 1. Tribune of the plebs along with C. Gracchus, proposed the law for founding the colony at Carthage, which was carried into effect.—2. Q. RUBRIUS VARRO, who was declared a public enemy along with Marius in B.C. 88, is mentioned by Cicero as an energetic and passionate accuser.—3. One of the companions of Verres in his iniquities.—4. L., a senator, was taken prisoner by Cæsar at the capture of Corfinium B.C. 49, and was dismissed by him uninjured.]

RUBRUM MARE. Vid. ERYTHRÆUM MARE.

RUDIÆ (Rudinus: now Rotigliano or Ruge), a town of the Pucetii in Apulia, on the road from Brundisium to Venusia, was originally a Greek colony, and afterward a Roman municipium. Rudia is celebrated as the birth-place of Ennius.

RUESIUM, a town of the Vellavi or Velauni, hence called simply Civitas Vellavorum, in Gallia Aquitania (in the modern Velay), probably the modern St. Paulien or Paulhan, on the frontiers of Auvergne.

RUFINUS. 1. P. CORNELIUS RUFINUS, was consul B.C. 290 with M. Curius Dentatus, and, in conjunction with his colleague, brought the Samnite war to a conclusion, and obtained a triumph in consequence. He was consul a second time in 277, and carried on the war against the Samnites and the Greeks in Southern Italy. The chief event of his second consulship was the capture of the important town of Croton. In 275 Rufinus was expelled from the senate by the censors C. Fabricius and Q. Æmilius Papus, on account of his possessing ten pounds of silver plate. The dictator Sulla was descended from this Rufinus. His grandson was the first of the family who assumed the surname of Sulla.—2. LICINIUS RUFINUS, a jurist, who lived under Alexander Severus. There are in the Digest seventeen excerpts from twelve books of Regule by Rufinus.—3. The chief minister of state under Theodosius the Great, was an able, but, at the same time, a treacherous and dangerous man. He instigated Theodosius to those cruel measures which brought ruin upon Antioch, A.D. 390. After the death of Theodosius in 395, Rufinus exercised paramount influence over the weak Arcadius; but toward the end of the year a conspiracy was formed against him by Eutropius and Stilicho, who induced Gainas, the Gothic ally of Arcadius, to join in the plot. Rufinus was, in consequence, slain by the troops of Gainas.—4. Surnamed TYRANNIUS, or TURRANIUS, or TORANUS, a celebrated ecclesiastical writer, was probably born about A.D. 345 in Italy. He was at first an inmate of the monastery at Aquileia, and he afterward resided many years at a monastery in Palestine, where he became very intimate with St. Jerome. The two friends afterward quarreled, and Jerome attacked Rufinus with the utmost vehemence on account of his supporting the tenets of Origen. After remaining in the East for about twenty-six years, Rufinus returned to Italy in 397, where he published a Latin translation of the Apology for Origen by Pamphilus, and of the books of Origen De Principiis, together with an original tract De Adulatione Librorum Origenis. In the preface to the De Principiis, he quoted a panegyric, which Jerome had at an earlier period pronounced upon Origen. This led to a bitter correspondence between the two former friends, which was crowned by the Apologia of the one adversus Hieronymum, and the Apologia of the other adversus Rufinum. Rufinus died in Sicily in 410, to which island he had fled upon the invasion of Italy by Alaric. Several of his works are extant, but there is no complete edition of them.—5. The author of a little poem in twenty-two lines, Pasiphaes Fabula ex omnibus Metris Horatianis, which, as the name imports, contains an example of each of the different metres employed by Horace. His date is quite uncertain, but he may be the same person with the following.—6. A grammarian of Antioch, whose treatise De Metris Comicis, or, rather, extracts from it, is contained in the Grammatica Latina Auctores Antiqui of Putschius, Hannov., 1605.—7. The author of thirty-eight epigrams in the Greek Anthology. His date is uncertain; but there can be no doubt that he was a Byzantine. His verses are of the same light, amatory character as those of Agathias, Paulus, Macedonius, and others.

RUFRÆ, a town in Campania, frequently confounded with Rufrium.

RUFRIUM, a town of the Hirpini in Samnium.

RUFUS, CURTIUS. Vid. CURTIUS.

RUFUS EPHESIUS, so called from the place of his birth, a celebrated Greek physician, lived in the reign of Trajan (A.D. 98–117), and wrote several medical works, some of which are still extant.

RUFUS, L. CÆCILIUS, brother of P. Sulla by the same mother, but not by the same father. He was tribune of the plebs B.C. 63, when he rendered warm support to Cicero, and, in particular, opposed the agrarian law of Rullus. In his prætorship, 57, he joined most of the other magistrates in proposing the recall of Cicero from banishment.

RUFUS, M. CÆLIUS, a young Roman noble, distinguished as an elegant writer and eloquent speaker, but equally conspicuous for his profligacy and extravagance. Notwithstanding his vices, he lived on intimate terms with Cicero, who defended him in B.C. 56 in an oration still extant. The accusation was brought against him by Sempronius Atratinus, at the instigation of Clodia Quadrantaria, whom he had lately deserted. Clodia charged him with having borrowed money from her in order to murder Dion, the head of the embassy sent by Ptolemy Auletes to Rome; and with having made an attempt to poison her. In 52 Cælius was tribune of the plebs, and in 50 ædile. During the years 51 and 50 he carried on an active correspondence with Cicero, who was then in Cilicia, and many of the letters which he wrote to Cicero at that time are preserved in the collection of Cicero's Letters. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49 he espoused Cæsar's side, and was rewarded for his services by the prætorship in 48. Being at this time overwhelmed with debt, he availed himself of Cæsar's absence from Italy to bring forward a law for the abolition of debts. He was, however, resisted by the other magistrates and deprived of his office, whereupon he went into the south of Italy to join Milo, whom he had secretly sent for from Massilia. Milo was killed near Thurii before Cælius could join him (vid. Milo), and Cælius himself was put to death shortly afterwards at Thurii.

RUFUS, SEXTUS. Vid. SEXTUS RUFUS.

RUGII, an important people in Germany, originally dwelt on the coast of the Baltic, between the Viadus (now Oder) and the Vistula. After disappearing a long time from history, they are found at a later time in Attila's army; and after Attila's death they founded a new kingdom on the northern bank of the Danube, in Austria and Hungary, the name of which is still preserved in the modern Rugiland. They have left traces of their name in the country which they originally inhabited in the modern Rügen, Rügenvalde, Rega, Regenvalde.

RULLUS, P. SERVILIUS, tribune of the plebs B.C. 63, proposed an agrarian law, which Cicero attacked in three orations which have come down to us. It was the most extensive agrarian law that had ever been brought forward; but as it was impossible to carry such a sweeping measure, it was withdrawn by Rullus himself.

RUPILIUS, P., consul B.C. 132, prosecuted with the utmost vehemence all the adherents of Tiberius Gracchus, who had been slain in the preceding year. In his consulship he was sent into Sicily against the slaves, and brought the servile war to a close. He remained in the island as proconsul in the following year; and, with ten commissioners appointed by the senate, he made various regulations for the government of the province, which were known by the name of Leges Rupiliæ. Rupilius was condemned in the tribunate of C. Gracchus, 123, on account of his illegal and cruel acts in the prosecution of the friends of Tiberius Gracchus. He was an intimate friend of Scipio Africanus the younger, who obtained the consulship for him, but who failed in gaining the same honor for his brother Lucius. He is said to have taken his brother's failure so much to heart as to have died in consequence.

[RUPILIUS REX, P., of Præneste, having been driven from his native city, is said to have served in Africa under Atius Varus, and later, when prætor, A.U.C. 711, being proscribed by Augustus, to have fled to the camp of Brutus: here his arrogance made Horace a bitter enemy to him, and the poet subsequently took his revenge in a bitter satire on Rupilius.]

RUSCINO, a town of the Sordones or Sordi in the southeastern part of Gallia Narbonensis, at the foot of the Pyrenees, on the River Ruscino (now Tet), and on the road from Spain to Narbo. A tower of the ancient town is still extant near Perpignan, called la Tour de Rousillon.

RUSSELLÆ (Rusellanus: ruins near Grosseto), one of the most ancient cities of Etruria, situated on an eminence east of the Lake Prelius and on the Via Aurelia. It is first mentioned in the time of Tarquinius Priscus. It was taken by the Romans in B.C. 294, when two thousand of its inhabitants were slain, and as many more made prisoners. It was subsequently a Roman colony, and continued in existence till 1138, when its inhabitants were removed to Grosseto. The walls of Rusellæ still remain, and are some of the most ancient in Italy. They are formed of enormous masses of travertine, piled up without regard to form, with small stones inserted in the interstices. The masses vary from six to eight feet in length, and from four to eight in height. The area inclosed by the walls forms an irregular quadrangle, between ten thousand and eleven thousand feet, or about two miles in circuit.

RUSICĀDA (southeast of the modern Storah, ruins), a sea-port and Roman colony in Numidia, used especially as the port of Cirta.

RUSPINUM, a town of Africa Propria (Byzantium), two miles from the sea, between Leptis Parva and Hadrumetum.

RUSSADIR (now Ras-ud-Dir, or Capo di Tres Forcas: Rus in ancient Punic, and Ras in Arabic, alike mean cape), a promontory of Mauretania Tingitana, in Northern Africa, on the coast of the Metagonitæ. Southeast of it was a city of the same name (now probably Melillah).

RUSTICUS, FABIVS, a Roman historian, and a contemporary of Claudius and Nero.

RUSTICUS, L. JUVENIVS ARULENUS, more usually called Arulenus Rusticus, but sometimes Junius Rusticus. He was a friend and pupil of Pætus Thrasea, and an ardent admirer of the Stoic philosophy. He was put to death by Domitian, because he had written a panegyric upon Thrasea.

RUSUCURRUM (now Coleah, opposite Algier), a considerable sea-port in the eastern part of Mauretania Cæsariensis, constituted a Roman colony under Claudius.

RUTENI, a people in Gallia Aquitania, on the frontiers of Gallia Narbonensis, in the modern Rœrgææ. Their chief town was Segodunum, afterward Civitas Rutenorum (now Rodez). The country of the Ruteni contained silver mines, and produced excellent flax.

[RUTILIA, the mother of C. Cotta, the orator, accompanied her son into exile in B.C. 91, and remained with him abroad till his return some years afterward.]

RUTILIUS LUPUS. Vid. LUPUS.

RUTILIUS NUMATIÄNUS, CLAUDIUS, a Roman poet, and a native of Gaul, lived at the beginning of the fifth century of the Christian era. He resided at Rome a considerable time, where he attained the dignity of præfectus urbi about A.D. 413 or 414. He afterward returned to his native country, and has described his return to Gaul in an elegiac poem, which bears the title of Itinerarium, or De Reditu. Of this poem the first book, consisting of six hundred and forty-four lines, and a small portion of the second, have come down to us. It is superior both in poetical coloring and purity of language to most of the productions of the age; and the passage in which he celebrates the praises of Rome is not unworthy of the pen of Claudian. Rutilius was a heathen, and attacks the Jews and monks with no small severity. The best edition is by A. W. Zumpt, Berlin, 1840.

RUTILIUS RUFUS, P., a Roman statesman and orator. He was military tribune under Scipio in the Numantine war, prætor B.C. 111, consul 105, and legatus in 95 under Q. Mucius Scævola, proconsul of Asia. While acting in this capacity, he displayed so much honesty and firmness in repressing the extortions of the publicani, that he became an object of fear and hatred to the whole body. Accordingly, on his return to Rome, he was impeached of malversation (de repetundis), found guilty, and compelled to withdraw into banishment, 92. He retired first to Mytilene, and from thence to Smyrna, where he fixed his abode, and passed the remainder of his days in tranquillity, having refused to return to Rome, although recalled by Sulla. Besides his orations, Rutilius wrote an autobiography, and a History of Rome in Greek, which contained an account of the Numantine war, but we know not what period it embraced.

RUTILUS, C. MARCIUS, was consul B.C. 357, when he took the town of Privernum. In 356 he was appointed dictator, being the first time that a plebeian had attained this dignity. In his dictatorship he defeated the Etruscans with great slaughter. In 352 he was consul a second time; and in 351 he was the first plebeian censor. He was consul for the third time in 344, for the fourth time in 342. The son of this Rutilus took the surname of Censorinus, which in the next generation entirely supplanted that of Rutilus, and became the name of the family. Vid. CENSORINUS.

RUTÜBA (now Roya), a river on the coast of Liguria, which flows into the sea near Albium Intemelium.

RUTÜLI, an ancient people in Italy, inhabiting a narrow slip of country on the coast of Latium, a little to the south of the Tiber. Their chief town was Ardea, which was the residence of Turnus. They were subdued at an early period by the Romans, and disappear from history.

RÛRÛB and RÛRÛRÛÆ (now Richborough), a port-town of the Carthii in the southeast of Britain, from which persons frequently passed over to the harbor of Gessoriacum in Gaul. Excellent oysters were obtained in the neighborhood of this place (Rutupino edita fundo ostrea, Juv., iv., 141). There are still several Roman remains at Richborough.

SĀBA (Sāba). 1. (In the Old Testament, Sheba), the capital of the SĀBĀI in Arabia Felix, lay on a high woody mountain, and was pointed out by an Arabian tradition as the residence of the "Queen of Sheba," who went to Jerusalem to hear the wisdom of Solomon. Its exact site is doubtful. — 2. There was another city of the same name in the interior of Arabia Felix, where a place Sabea is still found, about in the centre of El-Yemen. — 3. A sea-port town of Æthiopia, on the Red Sea, south of Ptolemaïs Theron. A town called Sabār and Sābbāra is mentioned by Ptolemy, who places it on the Sinus Adulitanus; and about in the same position Strabo mentions a town Sabæ (Sābat) as distinct from Saba. The sites of these places (if they are really different) are sought by geographers at Nowarat, or Port Mornington, in the southern part of the coast of Nubia, and Massawah on Foul Bay, on the northeastern coast of Abyssinia.

SĀBĪCON (Sābakōn), a king of Æthiopia, who invaded Egypt in the reign of the blind king Anysis, whom he dethroned and drove into the marshes. The Æthiopian conqueror then reigned over Egypt for fifty years, but at length quitted the country in consequence of a dream, whereupon Anysis regained his kingdom. This is the account which Herodotus received from the priests (ii., 137-140); but it appears from Manetho that there were three Æthiopian kings who reigned over Egypt, named Sabacon, Sebichus, and Taracus, whose collective reigns amount to forty or fifty years, and who form the twenty-fifth dynasty of that writer. The account of Manetho is to be preferred to that of Herodotus. It appears that this Æthiopian dynasty reigned over Egypt in the latter half of the eighth century before the Christian era. They are mentioned in the Jewish records. The So, king of Egypt, with whom Hosea, king of Israel, made an alliance about B.C. 722 (2 Kings, xvii., 4), was probably the same as Sebichus; and the Tirhakah, king of the Æthiopians, who was preparing to make war against Sennacherib in 711 (Is., xxxvii., 9), is the same as Taracus.

SĀBĀI or SĀBÆ (Sābāioi, Sābāi): in the Old Testament, Shebaitim), one of the chief people of Arabia, dwelt in the southwestern corner of the peninsula, in the most beautiful part of Arabia Felix, the north and centre of the province of El-Yemen. So, at least, Ptolemy places them; but the earlier geographers give them a wider extent, quite to the south of El-Yemen. The fact seems to be that they are the chief representatives of a race which, at an early period, was widely spread on both sides of the southern part of the Red Sea, where Arabia and Æthiopia all but joined at the narrow strait of Bab-el-Mandeb; and hence, probably, the confusion often made between the Sheba and Seba of Scripture, or between the Shebaïim of Arabia and the Sebaïim of Æthiopia. Another proof of the wide extent of this race is furnished by the mention, in the book of Job, of Sabæans as far north, probably, as Arabia Deserta (Job, i., 15). The Sabæans of El-Yemen were celebrated for their wealth and luxury. Their country produced all the most precious spices and perfumes of Arabia, and they carried on an extensive trade with the East. Their capital was at SABA, where we are told that their king was kept a close prisoner in his palace. The monarchy was not hereditary, but descended according to an order of succession arranged among the chief families of the country.

SABATE, a town of Etruria, on the road from Cosa to Rome, and on the northwestern corner of a lake, which was named after it LACUS SABATINUS (now Lago di Bracciano).

[SABATIA VADA OF SABATIUM VADUM. Vid. SAVO.]

SABATINI, a people in Campania, who derived their name from the River Sabatus (now Sabato), a tributary of the Calor, which flows into the Volturnus.

[SABATRA OR SOATRA, a town of Lycaonia, where, according to Strabo, water was so scarce as to be an article of sale. On the neighboring downs were numerous wild asses.]

SABAZIUS (Σαβάζιος), a Phrygian divinity, commonly described as a son of Rhea or Cybele. In later times he was identified with the mystic Dionysus (Bacchus), who hence is sometimes called Dionysus Sabazius. For the same reason, Sabazius is called a son of Zeus (Jupiter) by Persephone (Proserpina), and is said to have been reared by a nymph Nyssa; though others, by philosophical speculations, were led to consider him a son of Cabirus, Dionysus (Bacchus), or Cronos (Saturn). He was torn by the Titans into seven pieces. The connection of Sabazius with the Phrygian mother of the gods accounts for the fact that he was identified, to a certain extent, with Zeus (Jupiter) himself, who is mentioned as Zeus (Jupiter) Sabazius, both Zeus (Jupiter) and Dionysus (Bacchus) having been brought up by Cybele or Rhea. His worship and festivals (Sabazia) were also introduced into Greece; but, at least in the time of Demosthenes, it was not thought reputable to take part in them, for they were celebrated at night by both sexes in a licentious manner. Serpents, which were sacred to him, acted a prominent part at the Sabazia and in the processions: the god himself was represented with horns, because, it is said, he was the first that yoked oxen to the plough for agriculture.

[SABBATA. Vid. SAVO.]

SABELLIUS, an heresiarch of the third century, of whose personal history hardly any thing is known. He broached his heresies in the Libyan Pentapolis, of which he appears to have been a native. His characteristic dogma related to the Divine Nature, in which he conceived that there was only one hypostasis or person, identifying with each other the Father, the Son, and the Spirit, "so that in one hypostasis there are three designations" (ὡς εἶναι ἐν μιᾷ ὑποστάσει τρεῖς ὀνομασίας).

SABINA, the wife of the Emperor Hadrian, was the grand-niece of Trajan, being the daughter of Matidia, who was the daughter of Marciana, the sister of Trajan. Sabina was married to Hadrian about A.D. 100 through the influence of Plotina, the wife of Trajan. The marriage did not prove a happy one. Sabina at length put an end to her life, and there was a report that she had even been poisoned by her husband. She was certainly alive in 136, and probably did not die till 139, a few months before Hadrian. She was enrolled among the gods after her decease.

SABINA, POPPÆA, a woman of surpassing beauty, but licentious morals, was the daughter of T. Ollius, but assumed the name of her maternal grandfather Poppæus Sabinus, who had been consul in A.D. 9. She was first married to Rufius Crispinus, and afterward to Otho, who was one of the boon companions of Nero. The latter soon became enamored of her; and, in order to get Otho out of the way, Nero sent him to govern the province of Lusitania (58). Poppæa now became the acknowledged mistress of Nero, over whom she exercised absolute sway. Anxious to become the wife of the emperor, she persuaded Nero first to murder his mother Agrippina (59), who was opposed to such a disgraceful union, and next to divorce and shortly afterward put to death his innocent and virtuous wife Octavia (62). Immediately after the divorce of Octavia, Poppæa became the wife of Nero. In the following year she gave birth to a daughter at Antium, but the infant died at the age of four months. In 65 Poppæa was pregnant again, but was killed by a kick from her brutal husband in a fit of passion. She was enrolled, among the gods, and a magnificent temple was dedicated to her by Nero. Poppæa was inordinately fond of luxury and pomp, and took immense pains to preserve the beauty of her person. Thus we are told that all her mules were shod with gold, and that five hundred asses were daily milked to supply her with a bath.

SABINI, one of the most ancient and powerful of the nations of Central Italy. The ancients usually derived their name from Sabinus, a son of the native god Sancus. The different tribes of the Sabine race were widely spread over the whole of Central Italy, and were connected with the Opicans, Umbrians, and those other nations whose languages were akin to the Greek. The earliest traces of the Sabines are found in the neighborhood of Amiternum, at the foot of the main chain of the Apennines, whence they spread as far south as the confines of Lucania and Apulia. The Sabines may be divided into three great classes, called by the names of Sabini, Sabelli, and Samnites respectively. The SABINI proper inhabited the country between the Nar, the Anio, and the Tiber, between Latium, Etruria, Umbria, and Picenum. This district was mountainous, and better adapted for pasturage than corn. The chief towns were Amiternum, Reate, Nursia, Cutiliæ, Cures, Erctum, and Nomentum. The SABELLI were the smaller tribes who issued from the Sabines. To these belong the Vestini, Marsi, Marrucini, Peligni, Frentani, and Hirpini. In addition to these communities, to whom the name of Sabellians is usually restricted, the Picentes in Picenum, the Picentini, who were transplanted from the latter country to Campania, and the Lucani, were also of Sabine origin. The SAMNITES, who were by far the most powerful of all the Sabine communities, are treated of in a separate article. Vid. SAMNIUM. There were certain national characteristics which distinguished the whole Sabine race. They were a people of simple and virtuous habits, faithful to their word, and imbued with deep religious feeling. Hence we find frequent mention of omens and prodigies in their country. They were a migratory race, and adopted a peculiar system of emigration. In times of great danger and distress they vowed a Ver Sacrum, or Sacred Spring; and all the children born in that spring were regarded as sacred to the god, and were compelled, at the end of twenty years, to leave their native country and seek a new home in foreign lands. The form of government among the Sabines was republican, but in war they chose a sovereign ruler (Embratur), whom the Romans sometimes call dictator and sometimes king. With the exception of the Sabines in Lucania and Campania, they never attained any high degree of civilization or mental culture; but they were always distinguished by their love of freedom, which they maintained with the greatest bravery. Of this the Samnites were the most striking example. After the decline of the Etruscan power, the Samnites were for a long time the greatest people in Italy; and if they had remained united, they might have conquered the whole peninsula. The Sabines formed one of the elements of which the Roman people was composed. In the time of Romulus, a portion of the Sabines, after the rape of their wives and daughters, became incorporated with the Romans, and the two nations were united into one under the general name of Quirites. The remainder of the Sabini proper, who were less warlike than the Samnites and Sabellians, were finally subdued by M. Curius Dentatus, B.C. 290, and received the Roman franchise, sine suffragio. The Sabellian tribes concluded a treaty with the Romans at an early period, namely, the Vestini in 328, and the Marsi, Marucini, Peligni, and Frentani in 304; but these communities again took up arms against the Romans in the Social war (90-88), which ended in the complete subjugation of all the Sabellian tribes. The history of the wars between the Samnites and the Romans is given under SAMNIUM.

SABINUS. 1. A contemporary poet and a friend of Ovid. Ovid informs us that Sabinus had written answers to six of the Epistola Heroidum of Ovid. Three answers enumerated by Ovid in this passage are printed in many editions of the poet's works as the genuine poems of Sabinus; but they were written by a modern scholar, Angelus Sabinus, about the year 1467. —2. M. CÆLIUS, a Roman jurist, who succeeded Cassius Longinus, was consul A.D. 69. He was not the Sabinus from whom the Sabiniani took their name. He wrote a work, Ad Edictum Ædilium Curulium. There are no extracts from Cælius in the Digest, but he is often cited, sometimes as Cælius Sabinus, sometimes by the name of Sabinus only. —3. C. CALVISIUS, one of Cæsar's legates in the civil war, B.C. 48. In 45 he received the province of Africa from Cæsar. Having been elected prætor in 44, he obtained from Antony the province of Africa again; but he did not return to Africa, as the senate, after the departure of Antony for Mutina, conferred it upon Q. Cornificius. Sabinus was consul 39, and in the following year commanded the fleet of Octavianus in the war with Sextus Pompey. He was superseded by Agrippa in the command of the fleet. He is mentioned, too, at a later time as one of the friends of Octavianus. —4. T. FLAVIUS, father of the Emperor Vespasian, was one of the farmers of the taxes in Asia, and afterward carried on business as a money-lender among the Helvetians. —5. FLAVIUS, elder son of the preceding, and brother of the Emperor Vespasian. He governed Mœsia for seven years during the reign of Claudius, and held the important office of præfectus urbis during the last eleven years of Nero's reign. He was removed from this office by Galba, but was replaced in it on the accession of Otho, who was anxious to conciliate Vespasian, who commanded the Roman legions in the East. He continued to retain the dignity under Vitellius; but when Vespasian was proclaimed general by the legions in the East, and Antonius Primus and his other generals in the West, after the defeat of the troops of Vitellius, were marching upon Rome, Vitellius, despairing of success, offered to surrender the empire, and to place the supreme power in the hands of Sabinus till the arrival of his brother. The German soldiers of Vitellius, however, refused submission to this arrangement, and resolved to support their sovereign by arms. Sabinus thereupon took refuge in the Capitol, where he was attacked by the Vitellian troops. In the assault the Capitol was burned to the ground, Sabinus was taken prisoner, and put to death by the soldiers in the presence of Vitellius, who endeavored in vain to save his life. Sabinus was a man of distinguished reputation and of unspotted character. He left two sons, Flavius Sabinus and Flavius Clemens. Vid. CLEMENS. —6. FLAVIUS, son of the preceding, married Julia, the daughter of his cousin Titus. He was consul 82, with his cousin Domitian, but was afterward slain by the latter. —7. MASSURIUS, a hearer of Ateius Capito, was a distinguished jurist in the time of Tiberius. This is the Sabinus from whom the school of the Sabiniani took its name. Vid. CAPITO. There is no direct excerpt from Sabinus in the Digest, but he is often cited by other jurists, who commented upon his Libri tres Juris Civilis. It is conjectured that Persius means to refer to this work (Sat., v., 90) when he says, "Excepto si quid Masuri rubrica vetavit." Massurius also wrote numerous other works, which are cited by name in the Digest. —8. ΝΥΜΦΙΔΙΟΥΣ. Vid. ΝΥΜΦΙΔΙΟΥΣ. —9. POPPÆUS, consul A.D. 9, was appointed in the lifetime of Augustus governor of Mœsia, and was not only confirmed in this government by Tiberius, but received from the latter the provinces of Achaia and Macedonia in addition. He continued to hold these provinces till his death in 35, having ruled over Mœsia for twenty-four years. He was the maternal grandfather of Poppæa Sabina, the mistress and afterward the wife of Nero.—10. Q. TITURIVS, onc of Cæsar's legates in Gaul, who perished along with Aurunculeius Cotta in the attack made upon them by Ambiorix in B.C. 54.

SABIS (now Sambre). 1. A broad and deep river in Gallia Belgica and in the territory of the Ambiani, falling into the River Mosa.—2. A small river on the coast of Carmania.—3. Vid. SAPIIS.

SABRATA. Vid. ABROTONUM.

SABRINA, also called SABRIANA (now Severn), a river in the west of Britain, which flowed by Venta Silurum into the ocean.

[SABRINA ÆSTUARIVM OF SABRIANA ÆSTUARIVM (Σαβριανα εἰχχνοῖς), the estuary formed by the River Sabrina (now Severn). Vid. SABRINA.]

[SABURA OR SABURRA, the commander of Juba's forces in Africa, defeated C. Curio, Cæsar's general, in B.C. 49. He was destroyed, with all his forces, in B.C. 46, by P. SITTIVS.]

SACĀDAS (Σακάδας), of Argos, an eminent Greek musician, was one of the masters who established at Sparta the second great school of music, of which Thaletas was the founder, as Terpander had been of the first. He gained the prize for flute-playing at the first of the musical contests which the Amphictyons established in connection with the Pythian games (B.C. 590), and also at the next two festivals in succession (586, 582). Sacadas was a composer of elegies as well as a musician.

SACÆ (Σάκαι), one of the most numerous and most powerful of the Scythian nomad tribes, had their abodes east and northeast of the Massagætæ, as far as Serica, in the steppes of Central Asia, which are now peopled by the Kirghiz Khasaks, in whose name that of their ancestors is traced by some geographers. They were very warlike, and excelled especially as cavalry, and as archers both on horse and foot. Their women shared in their military spirit; and, if we are to believe Ælian, they had the custom of settling before marriage whether the man or woman should rule the house, by the result of a combat between them. In early times they extended their predatory incursions as far west as Armenia and Cappadocia. They were made tributary to the Persian empire, to the army of which they furnished a large force of cavalry and archers, who were among the best troops that the kings of Persia had. It should be remembered that the name of the Sacæ is often used loosely for other Scythian tribes, and sometimes for the Scythians in general.

SACĀSÈNE (Σακασηνή), a fertile district of Armenia Major, on the River Cyrus and the confines of Albania, so called from its having been at one period conquered by the Sacæ. A district of Drangiana bore the same name for a similar reason.

SACER MONS. 1. An isolated hill in the country of the Sabines, on the right bank of the Anio, and west of the Via Nomentana, three miles from Rome, to which the plebeians repaired in their celebrated secessions. The hill is not called by any special name at the present day, but there is upon its summit the Torre di Specchio.—2. A mountain in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the Minius, probably the modern Puerto de Rabanon, near Ponferrada.

SACĪLI, with the surname Martialium, a town of the Turduli in Hispania Bætica.

SACRA VIA. Vid. ROMA, p. 748, b.

SACRARIÆ, a town in Umbria, on the road between Treba and Spoletium, supposed by some to be identical with Clitumni Fanum on the River Clitumnus.

[SACRATIVIR, M., of Capua, a Roman eque, who fell fighting on Cæsar's side at the battle of Dyrrachium, B.C. 48.]

SACRIPORTUS, a small place in Latium, of uncertain site, memorable for the victory of Sulla over the younger Marius, B.C. 82.

[SACROVIR, JULIUS, and JULIUS FLORUS, two Gauls, the former an Æduan, the latter a Treviran, were both of noble family, and had received the Roman citizenship on account of their services. These chiefs, in the reign of Tibcrius, A.D. 21, excited an insurrection among the Gauls. Florus, who had excited the Belgæ to revolt, was soon overthrown, while Sacrovir, who had stirred up the Ædui, though at first in a measure successful, was defeated by the Roman legate Silius: they both, after their defeat, put themselves to death.]

SACRUM FLUMEN. 1. (Now Uras), a river on the western coast of Sardinia.—2. (Now Tavignano), a river on the eastern coast of Corsica, which flowed into the sea at Aleria.

SACRUM PROMONTORIUM. 1. (Now Cape St. Vincent), on the western coast of Spain, said by Strabo to be the most westerly point in the whole earth.—2. (Now Cape Corso), the north-eastern point of Corsica.—3. (Now Cape Iria, also Makri, Efta Kavi, or Jedi Burun, i. e., the seven points), the extreme point of the mountain Cragus in Lycia, between Xanthus and Telmissus.—4. (Now Cape Khelidoni), another promontory in Lycia, near the confines of Pamphylia, and opposite the Chelidonian islands, whence it is also called PROMONTORIUM CHELIDONIUM.

[SADALES, the son of Cotys, king of Thrace, was sent by his father to the assistance of Pompey, and fought on his side against Cæsar in B.C. 48. In conjunction with Scipio, he defeated L. Cassius Longinus, one of Cæsar's legates. He was pardoned by Cæsar after the battle of Pharsalia. He died in B.C. 42, leaving his dominions to the Romans.]

SADYATTES (Σαδάρτης), king of Lydia, succeeded his father Ards, and reigned B.C. 629–617. He carried on war with the Milesians for six years, and at his death bequeathed the war to his son and successor Alyattes. Vid. ALYATTES.

SÆPINUM OR SEPĪNUM (Sepinas, -atis: now Sepino), a municipium in Samnium, on the road from Allifæ to Beneventum.

SETĪBIS. 1. (Now Alcoy?), a river on the southern coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, west of the Suero.—2. Or SETĪBIS (Setabitanus: now Jativa), an important town of the Contestani in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a Roman municipium, was situated on a hill south of the Suero, and was celebrated for its manufacture of linen.

SAGALASSUS (Σαγαλασσός: now ruins at Allahshun), a large fortified city of Pisidia, near the Phrygian border, a day's journey southeast of Apamea Cibotus. It lay, as its large ruins still show, in the form of an amphitheatre on the side of a hill, and had a citadel on a rock thirty feet high. Its inhabitants were reckoned the bravest of the Pisidians, and seem, from the word Ἀκεδαίμων on their coins, to have claimed a Spartan origin. Among the ruins of the city are the remains of a very fine temple; of an amphitheatre, and of fifty-two other large buildings.

SAGĀNUS (Σαγανός), a small river on the coast of Carmania.

SAGAPA, one of the mouths of the Ināus.

SĀGĀRIS (Ovid, Ex Pont., iv., 10, 47), a river of Sarmatia Europæa, falling into a bay in the northwest of the Euxine, which was called after it SAGARICUS SINUS, and which also received the River Axiaces. The bay appears to be that on which Odessa now stands, and the rivers the Bol-Kovialnik and the Mal-Kovialnik.

SAGARTII (Σαγάρτιοι), according to Herodotus, a nomad people of Persis. Afterward they are found, on the authority of Ptolemy, in Media and the passes of Mount Zagros.

SAGRA, a small river in Magna Græcia, on the southeastern coast of Bruttium, falling into the sea between Caulonia and Locri, on the banks of which a memorable victory was gained by ten thousand Locrians over one hundred and twenty thousand Crotoniats. This victory appeared so extraordinary, that it gave rise to the proverbial expression, "It is truer than what happened on the Sagra," when a person wished to make any strong asseveration.

SAGUNTĪA. 1. (Now Xigona or Gigonza, northwest of Medina Sidonia), a town in the western part of Hispania Bætica, south of the Bætis.—2. A town of the Arevaci in Hispania Tarraconensis, southwest of Bilbilis, near the Mons Solarius.

SAGUNTUM, more rarely SAGUNTUS (Saguntinus: now Muriedro), a town of the Edetani or Sedetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, south of the Iberus, on the River Palantias, about three miles from the coast. It is said to have been founded by Greeks from Zacynthus, with whom Rutulians from Ardea were intermingled, whence it is sometimes called Ausonia Saguntus. It was situated on an eminence in the midst of a fertile country, and became a place of great commercial importance. Although south of the Iberus, it had formed an alliance with the Romans; and its siege by Hannibal, B.C. 219, was the immediate cause of the second Punic war. The inhabitants defended their city with the utmost bravery against Hannibal, who did not succeed in taking the place till after a siege of nearly eight months. The greater part of the city was destroyed by Hannibal; but it was rebuilt by the Romans eight years afterward, and made a colony. Saguntum was celebrated for its manufacture of beautiful drinking-cups; and the figs of the surrounding country were much valued in antiquity. The ruins of the ancient town, consisting of a theatre and a temple of Bacchus, are extant at Muriedro, which is a corruption of Muri veteres.

SĀIS (Σάϊς, Σαίτης: ruins at Sa-el-Hajjar), a great city of Egypt, in the Delta, on the eastern side of the Canopic branch of the Nile. It was the ancient capital of Lower Egypt, and contained the palace and burial-place of the Pharaohs, as well as the tomb of Osiris. It was the chief seat of the worship of the Egyptian goddess Neith (also called Sais), who had here a splendid temple in the middle of an artificial lake, where a great feast of lamps was celebrated yearly by worshippers from all parts of Egypt. The city gave its name to the Saites Nomos.

SĀITIS (Σαίτης), a surname of Minerva (Athena), under which she had a sanctuary on Mount Pontinus, near Lerna, in Argolis. The name was traced by the Greeks to the Egyptians, among whom Minerva (Athena) was said to have been called Sais.

SALA. 1. (Now Saale), a river of Germany, between which and the Rhine Drusus died. It was a tributary of the Albis.—2. (Now Saale), also a river of Germany and a tributary of the Mœnus, which formed the boundary between the Hermunduri and Chatti, with great salt springs in its neighborhood, for the possession of which these two communities frequently contended.—3. (Now Burargag), a river in the northern part of the western coast of Mauretania Tingitana, rises in the Atlas Minor, and falls into the Atlantic, north of a town of the same name.—4. A river in the same province, south of the one last mentioned, rises in the Atlas Major, and falls into the Atlantic near the southern boundary of Mauretania.—5. A Samothracian town in Thrace, on the coast of the Ægean Sea, west of the mouth of the Hebrus.—6. A town in Pannonia, on the road from Sabaria to Pætonio.—7. (Now Shella), a town in the northern part of the western coast of Mauretania Tingitana, south of the mouth of the river of the same name mentioned under No. 3. This town was the furthest place in Mauretania toward the south possessed by the Romans; for, although the province nominally extended further south, the Romans never fully subdued the nomad tribes beyond this point.

SALACĪA, the female divinity of the sea among the Romans, and the wife of Neptune. The name is evidently connected with sal (ἅλς), and accordingly denotes the wide, open sea.

SALACĪA (now Alcaacer do Sal), a municipium of Lusitania, in the territory of the Turdetani, northwest of Pax Julia and southwest of Ebora, with the surname of Urbs Imperatoria, celebrated for its woollen manufactures.

SALĀMIS (Σαλαμίς: Σαλαμίνιος). 1. (Now Koluri), an island off the western coast of Attica, from which it is separated by a narrow channel. It forms the southern boundary of the Bay of Eleusis. Its form is that of an irregular semi-circle toward the west, with many small indentations along the coast. Its greatest length, from north to south, is about ten miles, and its width, in its broadest part, from east to west, is a little more. In ancient times it is said to have been called Pityussa, from the pines which grew in it, and also Seiras and Cychræa, from the names of two native heroes. It is further said to have been called Salamis from a daughter of Asopus of this name. It was colonized at an early time by the Æacidae of Ægina. Telamon, the son of Æacus, fled thither after the murder of his half-brother Peleus, and became sovereign of the island. His son Ajax accompanied the Greeks with twelve Salaminian ships to the Trojan war. Salamis continued an independent state till about the beginning of the fortieth Olympiad (B.C. 620), when a dispute arose for its possession between the Megarians and the Athenians. After a long struggle, it first fell into the hands of the Megarians, but was finally taken possession of by the Athenians through a stratagem of Solon (vid. SOLON), and became one of the Attic demi. It continued to belong to Athens till the time of Cassander, when its inhabitants voluntarily surrendered it to the Macedonians, 318. The Athenians recovered the island in 232 through means of Aratus, and punished the Salaminians for their desertion to the Macedonians with great severity. The old city of Salamis stood on the south side of the island, opposite Ægina; but this was afterward deserted, and a new city of the same name built on the eastern coast, opposite Attica, on a small bay now called Ambelakia. Even this new city was in ruins in the time of Pausanias. At the extremity of the southern promontory forming this bay was the small island of ΨΥΤΤΑΛΙΑ (now Lyssokutali), which is about a mile long, and from two hundred to three hundred yards wide. Salamis is chiefly memorable on account of the great battle fought off its coast, in which the Persian fleet of Xerxes was defeated by the Greeks, B.C. 480. The battle took place in the strait between the eastern part of the island and the coast of Attica, and the Greek fleet was drawn up in the small bay in front of the town of Salamis. The battle was witnessed from the Attic coast by Xerxes, who had erected for himself a lofty throne on one of the projecting declivities of Mount Ægaleos.—2. A city of Cyprus, situated in the middle of the eastern coast, a little north of the River Pedieus. It is said to have been founded by Teucer, the son of Telamon, who gave it the name of his native island, from which he had been banished by his father. Salamis possessed an excellent harbor, and was by far the most important city in the whole of Cyprus. It became subject to the Persians with the rest of the island; but it recovered its independence about 385, under Evagoras, who extended his sovereignty over the greater part of the island. VID. CYPRUS. Under the Romans the whole of the eastern part of the island formed part of the territory of Salamis. In the time of Trajan a great part of the town was destroyed in an insurrection of the Jews; and under Constantine it suffered still more from an earthquake, which buried a large portion of the inhabitants beneath its ruins. It was, however, rebuilt by Constantine, who gave it the name of Constantia, and made it the capital of the island. There are still a few ruins of this town.

SALAPIA (Salapinus: now Salpi), an ancient town of Apulia, in the district Daunia, was situated south of Sipontum, on a lake named after it. According to the common tradition it was founded by Diomedes, though others ascribe its foundation to the Rhodian Elpias. It is not mentioned till the second Punic war, when it revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, but it subsequently surrendered to the Romans, and delivered to the latter the Carthaginian garrison stationed in the town. The original site of Salapia was at some distance from the coast but, in consequence of the unhealthy exhalations arising from the lake above mentioned, the inhabitants removed to a new town on the sea-coast, which was built by M. Hostilius with the approbation of the Roman senate, about B.C. 200. This new town served as the harbor of Arpi. The ruins of the ancient town still exist at some distance from the coast at the village of Salpi.

SALAPINA PALUS (now Lago di Salpi), a lake of Apulia, between the mouths of the Cerbalus and Aufidus, which derived its name from the town of Salapia situated upon it, and which M. Hostilius connected with the Adriatic by means of a canal.

SALARIA, a town of the Bastetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, and a Roman colony.

SALARIA VIA. VID. ROMA, p. 756, b

SALASSI, a brave and warlike people in Gallia Transpadana, in the valley of the Duria, at the foot of the Graian and Pennine Alps, whom some regarded as a branch of the Salyes or Saluvii in Gaul. They defended the passes of the Alps in their territory with such obstinacy and courage that it was long before the Romans were able to subdue them. At length, in the reign of Augustus, the country was permanently occupied by Terentius Varro with a powerful Roman force; the greater part of the Salassi were destroyed in battle, and the rest, amounting to thirty-six thousand, were sold as slaves. Their chief town was Augusta Prætoria (now Aosta), which Augustus colonized with soldiers of the Prætorian cohorts.

SALDÆ (Σάλδα: ruins at Boujayah or Delyz ?), a large sea-port town of Northern Africa, originally the eastern frontier town of the kingdom of Mauretania, afterward in Mauretania Cæsariensis, and, after the division of that province, the western frontier town of Mauretania Sitifensis. Augustus made it a colony.

SALDUBA. 1. (Now Rio Verde), a river in the territory of the Turduli in Hispania Bætica, at the mouth of which was situated a town of the same name.—2. VID. CÆSARAUGUSTA.

SALÆ (Σάλη), a town on the coast of Thrace.

SALÉBRO, a place in Etruria between Cosa and Populonium.

SALÉUS BASSUS. VID. BASSUS.

SALÉM, i. e., peace, the original name of JERUSALEM (Gen., xiv., 18).

SALENTINI OR SALLENTINI, a people in the southern part of Calabria, who dwelt around the promontory Iapygium, which is hence called SALENTINUM OR SALENTINA. They laid claim to a Greek origin, and pretended to have come from Crete into Italy under the guidance of Idomeneus. They were subdued by the Romans at the conclusion of their war with Pyrrhus, and having revolted in the second Punic war, were again easily reduced to subjection.

[SALENTINUM PROMONTORIUM. VID. SALENTINI.]

SALERNUM (Salernitanus: now Salerno), an ancient town in Campania, at the innermost corner of the Sinus Pæstanus, was situated on a height not far from the coast, and possessed a harbor at the foot of the hill. It was made a Roman colony at the same time as Puteoli, B.C.

194; but it attained its greatest prosperity in the Middle Ages, after it had been fortified by the Lombards.

SALGANEUS OF SALGANĒA (Σαλγανεύς: Σαλγά-νιος, Σαλγανεΐτης), a small town of Bœotia, on the Euripus, and on the road from Anhedon to Chalcis.

[SALIENUS, T., a centurion in Cæsar's army in Africa, in B.C. 46, induced the two Titii to surrender their ship to C. Virgilius, the Pompeian leader. He was subsequently dismissed from the army by Cæsar with disgrace.—2. CLEMENS, a senator in the reign of Nero.]

SALINÆ, salt-works, the name of several towns which possessed salt-works in their vicinity. 1. A town in Britain, on the eastern coast, in the southern part of Lincolnshire.—2. A town of the Suetrii, in the Maritime Alps, in Gallia Narbonensis, east of Reii.—3. (Now Torre delle Saline), a place on the coast of Apulia, near Salapia.—4. A place in Picenum, on the River Sannes (now Salino).—5. (Now Torda), a place in Dacia.—6. SALINÆ HERCULEÆ, near Herculanium, in Campania.

SALINATOR, LIVIUS. 1. M., consul B.C. 219 with L. Æmilius Paulus, carried on war along with his colleague against the Illyrians. On their return to Rome, both consuls were brought to trial on the charge of having unfairly divided the booty among the soldiers. Paulus escaped with difficulty, but Livius was condemned. The sentence seems to have been an unjust one, and Livius took his disgrace so much to heart that he left the city and retired to his estate, in the country, where he lived some years without taking any part in public affairs. In 210 the consuls compelled him to return to the city, and in 207 he was elected consul a second time with C. Claudius Nero. He shared with his colleague in the glory of defeating Hasdrubal on the Metaurus. (For details, vid. NERO, CLAUDIUS, No. 2.) Next year (206) Livius was stationed in Etruria as proconsul, with an army, and his imperium was prolonged for two successive years. In 204 he was censor with his former colleague in the consulship, Claudius Nero. The two censors had long been enemies; and their long-smothered resentment now burst forth, and occasioned no small scandal in the state. Livius, in his censorship, imposed a tax upon salt, in consequence of which he received the surname of Salinator, which seems to have been given him in derision, but which became, notwithstanding, hereditary in his family.—2. C., curule ædile 203, and prætor 202; in which year he obtained Bruttium as his province. In 193 he fought under the consul against the Boii, and in the same year was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship.—3. C., prætor 191, when he had the command of the fleet in the war against Antiochus. He was consul 188, and obtained Gaul as his province.

SALLUSTIUS OF SALLUSTIUS (Σαλούστιος). 1. Præfectus Prætorio under the Emperor Julian, with whom he was on terms of friendship. Sallustius was a heathen, but dissuaded the emperor from persecuting the Christians. He was probably the author of a treatise Περὶ Θεῶν καὶ κόσμου, which is still extant. If so, he was attached to the doctrines of the Neo-Platonists.

The best edition of this treatise is by Orellius, Turici, 1821.—2. A Cynic philosopher of some note, who lived in the latter part of the fifth century after Christ. He was a native of Emesa in Syria, and studied successively at Emesa, Alexandria, and Athens. Sallustius was suspected of holding somewhat impious opinions regarding the gods. He seems, at least, to have been unsparing in his attacks upon the fanatical theology of the Neo-Platonists.

SALLUSTIUS CRISPUS, C., or SALUSTIUS. 1. The Roman historian, belonged to a plebeian family, and was born B.C. 86 at Amiternum, in the country of the Sabines. He was quæstor about 59, and tribune of the plebs in 52, the year in which Clodius was killed by Milo. In his tribunate he joined the popular party, and took an active part in opposing Milo. It is said that he had been caught by Milo in the act of adultery with his wife Fausta, the daughter of the dictator Sulla; that he had received a sound whipping from the husband, and that he had been let off only on payment of a sum of money. In 50 Sallust was expelled from the senate by the censors, probably because he belonged to Cæsar's party, though some give as the ground of his ejection from the senate the act of adultery already mentioned. In the civil war he followed Cæsar's fortune. In 47 we find him prætor elect, by obtaining which dignity he was restored to his rank. He nearly lost his life in a mutiny of some of Cæsar's troops in Campania, who had been led thither to pass over into Africa. He accompanied Cæsar in his African war, 46, and was left by Cæsar as the governor of Numidia, in which capacity he is charged with having oppressed the people, and enriched himself by unjust means. He was accused of maladministration before Cæsar, but it does not appear that he was brought to trial. The charge is somewhat confirmed by the fact of his becoming immensely rich, as was shown by the expensive gardens which he formed (horti Sallustiani) on the Quirinalis. He retired into privacy after he returned from Africa, and he passed quietly through the troublesome period after Cæsar's death. He died 34, about four years before the battle of Actium. The story of his marrying Cicero's wife Terentia ought to be rejected. It was probably not till after his return from Africa that Sallust wrote his historical works. 1. The Catilina, or Bellum Catilinarianum, is a history of the conspiracy of Catiline during the consulship of Cicero, 63. The introduction to this history, which some critics admire, is only a feeble and rhetorical attempt to act the philosopher and moralist. The history, however, is valuable. Sallust was a living spectator of the events which he describes, and, considering that he was not a friend of Cicero, and was a partisan of Cæsar, he wrote with fairness. The speeches which he has inserted in his history are certainly his own composition; but we may assume that Cæsar's speech was extant, and that he gave the substance of it. 2. The Jugurtha, or Bellum Jugurthinum, contains the history of the war of the Romans against Jugurtha, king of Numidia, which began 111 and continued until 106. It is likely enough that Sallust was led to write this work from having resided in Africa, and that he collected some materials there. He cites the Punic Books of King Hiempsal as authority for his general geographical description (Jug., c. 17). The Jugurthine war has a philosophical introduction of the same stamp as that to the Catilina. As a history of the campaign, the Jugurthine war is of no value: there is a total neglect of geographical precision, and apparently not a very strict regard to chronology. 3. Sallustius also wrote Historiarum Libri Quinque, which were dedicated to Lucullus, a son of L. Licinius Lucullus. The work is supposed to have comprised the period from the consulship of M. Æmilius Lepidus and Q. Lutatius Catulus, 78, the year of Sulla's death, to the consulship of L. Vulcatius Tullus and M. Æmilius Lepidus, 66, the year in which Cicero was prætor. This work is lost, with the exception of fragments which have been collected and arranged. The fragments contain, among other things, several orations and letters. Some fragments belonging to the third book, and relating to the war with Spartacus, have been published from a Vatican MS. in the present century. 4. Duæ Epistolæ de Re Publica ordinanda, which appear to be addressed to Cæsar at the time when he was engaged in his Spanish campaign (49) against Pétreius and Afranius, and are attributed to Sallust; but the opinions of critics on their authenticity are divided. 5. The Declamatio in Sallustium, which is attributed to Cicero, is generally admitted to be the work of some rhetorician, the matter of which is the well-known hostility between the orator and the historian. The same opinion is generally maintained as to the Declamatio in Ciceronem, which is attributed to Sallust. Some of the Roman writers considered that Sallustius imitated the style of Thucydides. His language is generally concise and perspicuous: perhaps his love of brevity may have caused the ambiguity that is sometimes found in his sentences. He also affected archaic words. Though he has considerable merit as a writer, his art is always apparent. He had no pretensions to great research or precision about facts. His reflections have often something of the same artificial and constrained character as his expressions. One may judge that his object was to obtain distinction as a writer; that style was what he thought of more than matter. He has, however, probably the merit of being the first Roman who wrote what is usually called history. He was not above his contemporaries as a politician; he was a party man, and there are no indications of any comprehensive views, which had a whole nation for their object. He hated the nobility, as a man may do, without loving the people. The best editions of Sallust are by Corte, Lips., 1724; Gerlach, Basil., 1823-1831, 3 vols.; and by Kritz, Lips., 1828-1834, 2 vols.; [second edition, 1847, 2 vols.]—2. The grandson of the sister of the historian, was adopted by the latter, and inherited his great wealth. In imitation of Mæcenas, he preferred remaining a Roman eque. On the fall of Mæcenas he became the principal adviser of Augustus. He died in A.D. 20, at an advanced age. One of Horace's odes (Carm., ii., 2) is addressed to him.

nassus, the water of which was believed to have the property of rendering those who bathed in it effeminate.]

SALMANTICA (now Salamanca), called HELMANTICA or HERMANDICA by Livy, and ELMANTICA by Polybius, an important town of the Vettones in Lusitania, south of the Durus, on the road from Emerita to Cæsaraugusta. It was taken by Hannibal. A bridge was built here by Trajan, of which the piers still exist.

SALMÔNE or SALMÔNĪA (Σαλμώνη, Σαλμωνία), a town of Elis, in the district Pisatis, on the River Enipeus, said to have been founded by Salmoneus.

SALMÔNEUS (Σαλμωνεύς), son of Æolus and Enarete, and brother of Sisyphus. He was first married to Alcidece and afterward to Sidero; by the former of whom he became the father of Tyro. He originally lived in Thessaly, but emigrated to Elis, where he built the town of Salmone. His presumption and arrogance were so great that he deemed himself equal to Jupiter (Zeus), and ordered sacrifices to be offered to himself; nay, he even imitated the thunder and lightning of Jupiter (Zeus), but the father of the gods killed him with his thunderbolt, destroyed his town, and punished him in the lower world. His daughter Tyro bears the patronymic Salmonis.

SALMÔNĪUM or SALMÔNE (Σαλμώνιον, Σαλμώνη: now Cape Salmon), the most easterly promontory of Crete.

SALMYDESSUS, called HALMYDESSUS also in later times (Σαλμυδησσός, Ἁλμυδησσός: Σαλμυδησσός: now Midja or Midjeh), a town of Thrace, on the coast of the Euxine, south of the promontory Thynias. The name was originally applied to the whole coast from this promontory to the entrance of the Bosphorus; and it was from this coast that the Black Sea obtained the name of Pontus Azenos (Ἄξενος), or inhospitable. The coast itself was rendered dangerous by shallows and marshes, and the inhabitants were accustomed to plunder any ships that were driven upon them.

SALO (now Xalon), a tributary of the Iberus in Celtiberia, which flowed by Bilbilis, the birth-place of Martial, who accordingly frequently mentions it in his poems.

SALŌNA, SALŌNÆ, or SALON (Σάλωνα: now Salona), an important town of Illyria and the capital of Dalmatia, was situated on a small bay of the sea. It was strongly fortified by the Romans after their conquest of the country, and was at a later time made a Roman colony, and the seat of a conventus juridicus. The Emperor Diocletian was born at the small village Dioclea near Salona; and after his abdication he retired to the neighborhood of this town, and here spent the rest of his days. The remains of his magnificent palace are still to be seen at the village of Spalatro, the ancient SPOLATUM, three miles south of Salona.

SALONINUS, P. LICINIUS CORNĒLIUS VALERIANUS, son of Gallienus and Salonina, grandson of the Emperor Valerian. When his father and grandfather assumed the title of Augustus in A.D. 253, the youth received the designation of Cæsar. Some years afterward he was left in Gaul, and was put to death upon the capture of Colonia Agrippina by Postumus in 259, being about seventeen years old.

SALORDURUM (now Solure or Solothurn), a town of the Helvetii, on the road from Aventicum to Vindonissa, was fortified by the Romans about A.D. 350.

SALVIANUS, an accomplished ecclesiastical writer of the fifth century, was born in the vicinity of Treves, and passed the latter part of his life as a presbyter of the church at Marseilles. The following works of Salvianus are still extant: 1. Adversus Avaritiam Libri IV., ad Ecclesiam Catholicam, published under the name of Timotheus about A.D. 440. 2. De Providentia s. de Gubernatione Dei et de Justo Dei presentique Judicio Libri, written during the inroads by the barbarians upon the Roman empire, 451-455. 3. Epistole IX., addressed to friends upon familiar topics. The best edition of these works is by Baluzius, 8vo, Paris, 1684.

SALVIDIENUS RUFUS, Q., one of the early friends of Octavianus (Augustus), whose fleet he commanded in the war against Sextus Pompeius, B.C. 42. In the Perusinian war (41-40) he took an active part as one of Octavianus's legates against L. Antonius and Fulvia. He was afterward sent into Gallia Narbonensis, from whence he wrote to M. Antonius, offering to induce the troops in his province to desert from Octavianus. But Antonius, who had just been reconciled to Octavianus, betrayed the treachery of Salvidienus. The latter was forthwith summoned to Rome on some pretext, and on his arrival was accused by Octavianus in the senate, and condemned to death, 40.

SALUS, a Roman goddess, the personification of health, prosperity, and the public welfare. In the first of these three senses she answers closely to the Greek Hygieia, and was accordingly represented in works of art with the same attributes as the Greek goddess. In the second sense she represents prosperity in general. In the third sense she is the goddess of the public welfare (Salus publica or Romana). In this capacity a temple had been vowed to her, in the year B.C. 397, by the censor C. Junius Bubulcus, on the Quirinal Hill, which was afterward decorated with paintings by C. Fabius Pictor. She was worshipped publicly on the 30th of April, in conjunction with Pax, Concordia, and Janus. It had been customary at Rome every year, about the time when the consuls entered upon their office, for the augurs and other high-priests to observe the signs for the purpose of ascertaining the fortunes of the republic during the coming year: this observation of the signs was called augurium Salutis. In the time of Cicero this ceremony had become neglected; but Augustus restored it, and the custom afterward remained as long as paganism was the religion of the state. Salus was represented, like Fortuna, with a rudder, a globe at her feet, and sometimes in a sitting posture, pouring from a patera a libation upon an altar, around which a serpent is winding.

SALYÈS or SALLUVIÏ, the most powerful and most celebrated of all the Ligurian tribes, inhabited the southern coast of Gaul from the Rhone to the Maritime Alps. They were troublesome neighbors to Massilia, with which city they frequently carried on war. They were subdued by the Romans in B.C. 123 after a long and obstinate struggle, and the colony of Aquæ Sextiæ was founded in their territory by the consul Sextius.

SAMĀRIA (Σαμάρεια: Heb. Shomron; Chaldee, Shamraïn; Σαμαρείς, Σαμαρείτης, Samaritæ, pl. Σαμαρείται, Σαμαρείται, Samaritæ), afterward SĒBASTE (Σεβαστή: ruins at Sebustieh), one of the chief cities of Palestine, was built by Omri, king of Israel (about B.C. 922), on a hill in the midst of a plain surrounded by mountains, just in the centre of Palestine, west of the Jordan. Its name was derived from Shemer, the owner of the hill which Omri purchased for its site. It was the capital of the kingdom of Israel, and the chief seat of the idolatrous worship to which the ten tribes were addicted, until it was taken by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria (about B.C. 720), who carried away the inhabitants of the city and of the surrounding country, which is also known in history as Samaria (vid. below), and replaced them by heathen tribes from the eastern provinces of his empire. These settlers, being troubled with the wild beasts, who had become numerous in the depopulated country, and Esarhaddon sent them a priest of the tribe of Levi, who resided at Bethel, and taught them the worship of the true God. The result was a strange mixture of religions and of races. When the Jews returned from the Babylonish captivity, those of the Samaritans who worshipped Jehovah offered to assist them in rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem; but their aid was refused, and hence arose the lasting hatred between the Jews and the Samaritans. This religious animosity reached its height when, in the reign of Darius Nothus, the son of the Jewish high-priest, having married the daughter of Sanballat, governor of Samaria, went over to the Samaritans and became high-priest of a temple which his father-in-law built for him on Mount Gerizim, near Sichem. The erection of this temple had also the effect of diminishing the importance of the city of Samaria. Under

The Syrian kings and the Maccabean princes, we find the name of Samaria used distinctly as that of a province, which consisted of the district between Galilee on the north and Judæa on the south. In the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Samaritans escaped by conforming to the king's edicts and dedicating the temple on Mount Gerizim to Jupiter (Zeus) Hellenius, B.C. 167. As the power of the Asmonean princes increased, they attacked the Samaritans; and, about B.C. 129, John Hyrcanus took and destroyed the temple on Mount Gerizim and the city of Samaria. The latter seems to have been soon rebuilt. Pompey assigned the district to the province of Syria, and Gabinus fortified the city anew. Augustus gave the district to Herod, who greatly renovated the city of Samaria, which he called Sebaste, in honor of his patron. Still, as the Samaritans continued to worship on Mount Gerizim, even after their temple had been destroyed, the neighboring city of Sichem was regarded as their capital, and, as it grew, Samaria declined; and, by the fourth century of our era, it had become a place of no importance. Its beautiful site is now occupied by a poor village, which bears the Greek name of the city, slightly altered, viz., Sebustieh. As a district of Palestine, Samaria extended from Ginæa (now Jenin) on the north, to Bethhoron, northwest of Gibeon, on the south; or, along the coast, from a little south of Cæsarea on the north, to a little north of Joppa on the south. It was intersected by the mountains of Ephraim, running north and south through its middle, and by their lateral branches, which divide the country into beautiful and fertile valleys. For its political history after the time of Herod the Great, vid. PALÆSTINA. A remnant of the ancient Samaritans have remained in the country to the present day, especially at Nablous (the ancient Sichem), and have preserved their ancient version of the Five Books of Moses, the only part of the Old Testament which they acknowledge. This version is known as the Samaritan Pentateuch, and is of vast importance in biblical criticism.

SAMAROBRIVA, afterward AMBIANI (now Amiens), the chief town of the Ambiani in Gallia Belgica, on the River Samara; whence its name, which signifies Samara-Bridge.

SAMBANA (Σάμβανα), a city of Assyria, two days' journey north of Sittace. In its neighborhood dwelt the people called Sambatæ (Σαμβάται).

SAMBASTÆ (Σαμβαστæ), a people of India intra Gangem, on the Lower Indus, near the island Patalene. The fort of Sevistan or Schoun in the same neighborhood has been thought to preserve their name, and is by some identified with the Brahman city taken by Alexander.

SAMOS or SAMOS (Σάμω, Σάμοσ), the ancient name of Cephallenia. Vid. CEPHALLENIA. It was also the name of one of the four towns of Cephallenia. The town Same or Samos was situated on the eastern coast, opposite Ithaca. and was taken and destroyed by the Romans B.C. 189.

SAMIA (Σαμία: now Khaiassa), a town of Elis in the district Triphylia, south of Olympia, between Lepreum and the Alpheus, with a citadel called SAMICUM (Σαμικόν), the same as the Homeric Arene.

[SAMICUM. Vid. SAMIA.]

SAMINTHUS (Σάμινθος: near Phiklia), a place in Argolis, on the western edge of the Argive plain, opposite Mycenæ.

SAMNIUM (Samnites, more rarely Samnitæ, pl.), a country in the centre of Italy, bounded on the north by the Marsi, Peligni, and Marrucini, on the west by Latium and Campania, on the south by Lucania, and on the east by the Frentani and Apulia. The Samnites were an offshoot of the Sabines, who emigrated from their country between the Nar, the Tiber, and the Anio, before the foundation of Rome, and settled in the country afterward called Samnium. Vid. SABINI. This country was at the time of their migration inhabited by Opicans, whom the Samnites conquered, and whose language they adopted; for we find, at a later time, that the Samnites spoke Opican or Oscan. Samnium is a country marked by striking physical features. The greater part of it is occupied by a huge mass of mountains, called at the present day the Matese, which stands out from the central line of the Apennines. The circumference of the Matese is between seventy and eighty miles, and its greatest height is six thousand feet. The two most important tribes of the Samnites were the CAUDINI and PENTRI, of whom the former occupied the southern side, and the latter the northern side of the Matese. To the Caudini belonged the towns of Allifæ, Telesia, and Beneventum; to the Pentri, those of Æsernia, Bovianum, and Sepinum. Besides these two chief tribes, we find mention of the Caraceni, who dwelt north of the Pentri, and to whom the town of Aufidena belonged; and of the Hirpini, who dwelt southeast of the Caudini, but who are sometimes mentioned as distinct from the Samnites. The Samnites were distinguished for their bravery and love of freedom. Issuing from their mountain fastnesses, they overran a great part of Campania; and it was in consequence of Capua applying to the Romans for assistance against the Samnites that war broke out between the two nations in B.C. 343. The Romans found the Samnites the most warlike and formidable enemies whom they had yet encountered in Italy; and the war, which commenced in 343, was continued with few interruptions for the space of fifty-three years. It was not till 290, when all their bravest troops had fallen, and their country had been repeatedly ravaged in every direction by the Roman legions, that the Samnites sued for peace and submitted to the supremacy of Rome. They never, however, lost their love of freedom; and, accordingly, they not only joined the other Italian allies in the war against Rome (90), but, even after the other allies had submitted, they still continued in arms. The civil war between Marius and Sulla gave them hopes of recovering their independence; but they were defeated before the gates of Rome (82), the greater part of their troops fell in battle, and the remainder were put to death. Their towns were laid waste, the inhabitants sold as slaves, and their place supplied by Roman colonists.

[SAMOLAS (Σαμόλας), an Achaean, one of the three commissioners sent by the Greek auxiliaries of Cyrus from Cotyora to Sinope in B.C. 400 for ships to convey the army to Heraclea. Not long after, when the Greeks were at Calpe, we find Samolas commanding a division of the reserve in the successful engagement with the allied troops of the Bithynians and Pharnabazus.]

SAMOS or ΣΑΜΟΣ (Σάμος: Σάμιος, Samius: now Grk. Samo, Turk. Susam Adassi), one of the principal islands of the Ægean Sea, lying in that portion of it called the Icarian Sea, off the coast of Ionia, from which it is separated only by a narrow strait formed by the overlapping of its eastern promontory Posidium (now Cape Colonna) with the westernmost spur of Mount Mycale, Promontorium Trogilium (now Cape S. Maria). This strait, which is little more than three fourths of a mile wide, was the scene of the battle of MYCALE. The island is formed by a range of mountains extending from east to west, whence it derived its name; for Σάμος was an old Greek word signifying a mountain: and the same root is seen in Same, the old name of Cephallenia, and Samothrace, i. e., the Thracian Samos. The circumference of the island is about eighty miles. It was and is very fertile; and some of its products are indicated by its ancient names, Drysa, Anthemura, Melamphyllus, and Cyparissia. According to the earliest traditions, it was a chief seat of the Carians and Leleges, and the residence of their first king, Ancæus; and was afterward colonized by Æolians from Lesbos, and by Ionians from Epidaurus. In the earliest historical records, we find Samos decidedly Ionian, and a powerful member of the Ionic confederacy. Thucydides tells us that the Samians were the first of the Greeks, after the Corinthians, who paid great attention to naval affairs. They early acquired such power at sea, that, besides obtaining possession of parts of the opposite coast of Asia, they founded many colonies; among which were Bisantia and Perinthus, in Thrace; Celenderis and Nagidus, in Cilicia; Cydonia, in Crete; Dicæarchia (Puteoli), in Italy; and Zanele (Messana), in Sicily. After a transition from the state of an heroic monarchy, through an aristocracy, to a democracy, the island became subject to the most distinguished of the so-called tyrants, POLYCRATES (B.C. 532), under whom its power and splendor reached their highest pitch, and Samos would probably have become the mistress of the Ægean but for the murder of Polycrates. At this period the Samians had extensive commercial relations with Egypt, and they obtained from Amasis the privilege of a separate temple at Naucratis. Their commerce extended into the interior of Africa, partly through their relations with Cyrene, and also by means of a settlement which they effected in one of the Oases, seven days' journey from Thebes. The Samians now became subject to the Persian empire, under which they were governed by tyrants, with a brief interval at the time of the Ionic revolt, until the battle of Mycale, which made them independent, B.C. 479. They now joined the Athenian confederacy, of which they continued independent members until B.C. 440, when an opportunity arose for reducing them to entire subjection and depriving them of their fleet, which was effected by Pericles after an obstinate resistance of nine months' duration. (For the details, vid. the histories of Greece.) In the Peloponnesian war, Samos held firm to Athens to the last; and in the history of the latter part of that war, the island becomes extremely important as the headquarters of the exiled democratical party of the Athenians. Transferred to Sparta after the battle of Ægospotami, 405, it was soon restored to Athens by that of Cnidus, 394, but went over to Sparta again in 390. Soon after, it fell into the hands of the Persians, being conquered by the satrap Tigranes; but it was recovered by Timotheus for Athens. In the Social war, the Athenians successfully defended it against the attacks of the confederated Chians, Rhodians, and Byzantines, and placed in it a body of two thousand cleruchi, B.C. 352. After Alexander's death, it was taken from the Athenians by Perdicas, 323, but restored to them by Polysperchon, 319. In the subsequent period, it seems to have been rather nominally than really a part of the Greco-Syrian kingdom: we find it engaged in a long contest with Priene on a question of boundary, which was referred to Antiochus II., and afterward to the Roman senate. In the Macedonian war, Samos was taken by the Rhodians again, B.C. 200. In the Syrian war, the Samians took part with Antiochus the Great against Rome. Little further mention is made of Samos till the time of Mithradates, with whom it took part in his first war against Rome, on the conclusion of which it was finally united to the province of Asia, B.C. 84. Meanwhile it had greatly declined, and during the war it had been wasted by the incursions of pirates. Its prosperity was partially restored under the propraetorship of Q. Cicero, B.C. 62, but still more by the residence in it of Antony and Cleopatra, 32, and afterward of Octavianus, who made Samos a free state. It was favored by Caligula, but was deprived of its freedom by Vespasian, and it sank into insignificance as early as the second century, although its departed glory is found still recorded, under the Emperor Decius, by the inscription on its coins, Σαμίον πρότον Ιωνίας. Samos may be regarded as almost the chief centre of Ionian manners, energies, luxury, science, and art. In very early times there was a native school of statuary, at the head of which was Rhæcus, to whom tradition ascribed the invention of casting in metal. Vid. RHÆCUS, TELECLEUS, THEODORUS. In the hands of the same school architecture flourished greatly: the Heraeum, one of the finest of Greek temples, was erected in a marsh, on the western side of the city of Samos; and the city itself, especially under the government of Polycrates, was furnished with other splendid works, among which was an aqueduct pierced through a mountain. Samian architects became famous also beyond their own island; as, for example, Mandrocles, who constructed Darius's bridge over the Bos porus. In painting, the island produced Calliphon, Theodorus, Agatharchus, and Timanthes. Its pottery was celebrated throughout the ancient world. In literature, Samos was made illustrious by the poets Asius, Chærilus, and Æschriou; by the philosophers Pythagoras and Melissus; and by the historians Pagæus and Duris. The capital city, also called SAMOS, stood on the southeastern side of the island, opposite Promontorium Trogilium, partly on the shore, and partly rising on the hills behind in the form of an amphitheatre. It had a magnificent harbor, and numerous splendid buildings, among which, besides the Heræum and other temples, the chief were the senate-house, the theatre, and a gymnasium dedicated to Eros. In the time of Herodotus, Samos was reckoned one of the finest cities of the world. Its ruins are so considerable as to allow its plan to be traced: there are remains of its walls and towers, and of the theatre and aqueduct. The Heræum already mentioned, celebrated as one of the best early specimens of the Doric order of architecture, and as the chief centre of the worship of Juno (Hera) among the Ionian Greeks, stood about two miles west of the city. Its erection is ascribed to Rhæcus and his sons. It was burned by the Persians, but soon rebuilt, probably in the time of Polycrates. This second temple was of the Ionic order, decastyle dipteral, three hundred and forty-six feet long by one hundred and eighty-nine wide, and is spoken of by Herodotus as the largest temple that he knew. It was gradually filled with works of sculpture and painting, of which it was plundered, first by the pirates in the Mithradatic war, then by Verres, and lastly by Marcus Antonius. Nothing is left of it but traces of the foundations and a single capital and base.

ΣΑΜΟΣΑΤΑ (τὰ Σαμόσατα : Σαμοσατεῖς, Samosatensis : now Someisat), the capital of the province, and afterward kingdom, of Commagene, in the north of Syria, stood on the right bank of the Euphrates, northwest of Edessa. It was strongly fortified as a frontier post against Osroëne. In the first century of our era it was the capital of the kings of Commagene. It is celebrated in literary history as the birth-place of Lucian, and in church history as that of the heretic Paul, bishop of Antioch, in the third century. Nothing remains of it but a heap of ruins on an artificial mound.

ΣΑΜΟΘΡΑΚΕ (Σαμοθράκη, Σαμοθρακία, Ερ. ἡ Σάμος Ὀρητικὴ : Σαμόθρακες : now Samothraki), a small island in the north of the Ægean Sea, opposite the mouth of the Hebrus in Thrace, from which it was thirty-eight miles distant. It is about thirty-two miles in circumference, and contains in its centre a lofty mountain, called ΣΑΔΕΚ, from which Homer says that Troy could be seen. Samothraee bore various names in ancient times. It is said to have been called Melite, Saonnesus, Leueosia, and more frequently Dardania, from Dardanus, the founder of Troy, who is reported to have settled here. Homer calls the island simply Samos; sometimes the Thracian Samos, because it was colonized, according to some accounts, from Samos on the coast of Asia Minor. Samothraee was the chief seat of the worship of the Cabiri (vid. CABIRI), and was celebrated for its religious mysteries, which were some of the most famous in the ancient world. Their origin dates from the time of the Pelasgians, who are said to have been the original inhabitants of the island; and they enjoyed great celebrity down to a very late period. Both Philip of Macedon and his wife Olympias were initiated in them. The political history of Samothraee is of little importance. The Samothracians fought on the side of Xerxes at the battle of Salamis; and at this time they possessed on the Thracian main land a few places, such as Sale, Serrhion, Mesambria, and Tempyra. In the time of the Macedonian kings, Samothraee appears to have been regarded as a kind of asylum, and Perseus accordingly fled thither after his defeat by the Romans at the battle of Pydna.

SAMPISGERAMUS, the name of a petty prince of Emesa in Syria, a nickname given by Cicero to Cneius Pompeius.

SANCHUNIATHON (Σαχνουνιάθων), said to have been an ancient Phœnician writer, whose works were translated into Greek by Philo Byblius, who lived in the latter half of the first century of the Christian era. A considerable fragment of the translation of Philo is preserved by Eusebius in the first book of his Præparatio Evangelica. The most opposite opinions have been held by the learned respecting the authenticity and value of the work of Sanchuniathon; but it is now generally agreed among modern scholars that the work was a forgery of Philo. Nor is it difficult to see with what object the forgery was executed. Philo was one of the many adherents of the doctrine of Euhemerus, that all the gods were originally men, who had distinguished themselves in their lives as kings, warriors, or benefactors of man, and became worshipped as divinities after their death. This doctrine Philo applied to the religious system of the Oriental nations, and especially of the Phœnicians; and in order to gain more credit for his statements, he pretended that they were taken from an ancient Phœnician writer. Sanchuniathon, he says, was a native of Berytus, lived in the time of Semiramis, and dedicated his work to Abibalus, king of Berytus. The fragments of this work have been published separately by J. C. Orelli, Lips., 1826. In 1835 a manuscript, purporting to be the entire translation of Philo Byblius, was discovered in a convent in Portugal. The Greek text was published by Wagenfeld, Bremæ, 1837. It was at first regarded as genuine, but is now universally agreed to have been the forgery of a later age.

SANCUS, SANGUS, or SEMO SANCUS, a Roman divinity said to have been originally a Sabine god, and identical with Hercules and Dius Fidius. The name, which is etymologically the same as Sanctus, and connected with Sancire seems to justify this belief, and characterizes Sancus as a divinity presiding over oaths. Sancus also had a temple at Rome, on the Quirinal, opposite that of Quirinus, and close by the gate, which derived from him the name of Sanguialis porta. This sanctuary was the same as that of Dius Fidius, which was consecrated B.C. 465 by Sp. Postumius, but was said to have been founded by Tarquinius Superbus.

SANDROCOTTUS (Σανδρόκοττος), an Indian king at the time of Seleucus Nicator, ruled over the powerful nation of the Gangaridæ and Prasii on the banks of the Ganges. He was a man of mean origin, and was the leader of a band of robbers before he obtained the supreme power. In the troubles which followed the death of Alexander, he extended his dominions over the greater part of Northern India, and conquered the Macedonians, who had been left by Alexander in the Punjab. His dominions were invaded by Seleucus, who did not, however, succeed in the object of his expedition; for, in the peace concluded between the two monarchs, Seleucus ceded to Sandrocottus not only his conquests in the Punjab, but also the country of the Paropamisus. Seleucus, in return, received five hundred war elephants. Megasthenes subsequently resided for many years at the court of Sandrocottus as the ambassador of Seleucus. VID. MEGASTHENES. Sandrocottus is probably the same as the Chandragupta of the Sanscrit writers. The history of Chandragupta forms the subject of a Hindoo drama, entitled Mudra Rakhasa, which has been translated from the Sanscrit by Prof. Wilson.

Sanga is mentioned as one of the friends of Cicero who besought the consul L. Piso, in B.C. 58, not to support Clodius in his measures against Cicero.]

SANGĀRIUS, SANGĀRIS, or SĀGĀRIS (Σαγγάριος, Σάγαρος, Σάγαρος: now Sakariyeh), the largest river of Asia Minor after the Halys, had its source in a mountain called Adoreus, near the little town of Sangia, on the borders of Galatia and Phrygia, whence it flowed first north through Galatia, then west and northwest through the northeastern part of Phrygia, and then north through Bithynia, of which it originally formed the eastern boundary. It fell at last into the Euxine, about half way between the Bosphorus and Heraclea. It was navigable in the lower part of its course. Its chief tributaries were the Thymbres or Thymbrus, the Bathys, and the Gallus, flowing into it from the west.

SANNYRĪON (Σανυρίων), an Athenian comic poet, belonging to the later years of the Old Comedy, and the beginning of the Middle. He flourished B.C. 407 and onward. We know nothing of his personal history except that his excessive leanness was ridiculed by Strattis and Aristophanes.

SANTŌNES or SANTŌNI, a powerful people in Gallia Aquitania, dwell on the coast of the ocean, north of the Garumna. Under the Romans they were a free people. Their chief town was Mediolanum, afterward Santones (now Saintes). Their country produced a species of wormwood which was much valued.

Σάπφαρ, Τάφαρον: ruins at Dhafar), one of the chief cities of Arabia, stood on the southern coast of Arabia Felix, opposite to the Aromata Promontorium (now Cape Guardafui) in Africa. It was the capital of the Homeritæ, a part of which tribe bore the name of Sapharitæ or Sappharitæ (Σαφαρίται).

SĀPOR. VID. SASSANIDÆ.

SĀPPO (Σαπφώ, or, in her own Æolic dialect, Ψάφφα), one of the two great leaders of the Æolian school of lyric poetry (Alcæus being the other), was a native of Mytilene, or, as some said, of Eresos in Lesbos. Her father's name was Scamandronymus, who died when she was only six years old. She had three brothers, Charaxus, Larichus, and Eurigius. Charaxus was violently upbraided by his sister in a poem because he became so enamored of the courtesan Rhodopis at Naucratis, in Egypt, as to ransom her from slavery at an immense price. VID. CHARAXUS. Sappho was contemporary with Alcæus, Stesichorus, and Pittacus. That she was not only contemporary, but lived in friendly intercourse with Alcæus, is shown by existing fragments of the poetry of both. Of the events of her life we have no other information than an obscure allusion in the Parian Marble, and in Ovid (Her., xv., 51), to her flight from Mytilene to Sicily to escape some unknown danger, between 604 and 592; and the common story that, being in love with Phaon, and finding her love unrequited, she leaped down from the Leucadian rock. This story, however, seems to have been an invention of later times. The name of Phaon does not occur in one of Sappho's poems, and there is no evidence that it was mentioned in her poems. As for the leap from the Leucadian rock, it is a mere metaphor, which is taken from an expiatory rite connected with the worship of Apollo, which seems to have been a frequent poetical image. At Mytilene Sappho appears to have been the centre of a female literary society, most of the members of which were her pupils in poetry, fashion, and gallantry. Modern writers have indeed attempted to prove that the moral character of Sappho was free from all reproach; but it is impossible to read the fragments which remain of her poetry without being forced to come to the conclusion that a female who could write such poetry could not be the pure and virtuous woman which her modern apologists pretend. Of her poetical genius, however, there can not be a question. The ancient writers agree in expressing the most unbounded admiration for her poetry. Already in her own age the recitation of one of her poems so affected Solon that he expressed an earnest desire to learn it before he died. Her lyric poems formed nine books, but of these only fragments have come down to us. The most important is a splendid ode to Aphrodite (Venus), of which we perhaps possess the whole. The best separate edition of the fragments is by Neue, Berol, 1827.

SARANCÆ, SARANGÆ, or SARANGES (Σαράγγαι, Σαράγγες, Herod.), a people of Sogdiana.

SARĀVUS (now Saar), a small river in Gaul, flowing into the Mosella on its right bank.

SARDĀNĀPĀLUS (Σαρδανάπαλος), the last king of the Assyrian empire of Ninus or Nineveh, noted for his luxury, licentiousness, and effeminacy. He passed his time in his palace unseen by any of his subjects, dressed in female apparel, and surrounded by concubines. At length Arbaces, satrap of Media, and Belesys, the noblest of the Chaldean priests, resolved to renounce allegiance to such a worthless monarch, and advanced at the head of a formidable army against Nineveh. But all of a sudden the effeminate prince threw off his luxurious habits, and appeared an undaunted warrior. Placing himself at the head of his troops, he twice defeated the rebels, but was at length worsted and obliged to shut himself up in Nineveh. Here he sustained a siege for two years, till at length, finding it impossible to hold out any longer, he collected all his treasures, wives, and concubines, and placing them on an immense pile which he had constructed, set it on fire, and thus destroyed both himself and them. The enemies then obtained possession of the city. This is the account of Ctesias, which has been preserved by Diodorus Siculus, and which has been followed by most subsequent writers and chronologists. The death of Sardanapalus and the fall of the Assyrian empire is placed B.C. 876. Modern writers, however, have shown that the whole narrative of Ctesias is mythical, and must not be received as a genuine history. The legend of Sardanapalus, who so strangely appears at one time sunk in the lowest effeminacy, and immediately afterward a heroic warrior, has probably arisen from his being the same with the god Sandon, who was worshipped extensively in Asia, both as a heroic and a female divinity. The account of Ctesias is also in direct contradiction to Herodotus and the writers of the Old Testament. Herodotus places the revolt of the Medes from the Assyrians about 710, but relates that an Assyrian kingdom still continued to exist, which was not destroyed till the capture of Nineveh by the Median king Cyaxares, about 606. Further, the writers of the Old Testament represent the Assyrian empire in its glory in the eighth century before the Christian era. It was during this period that Pul, Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, and Sennacherib appear as powerful kings of Assyria, who, not contented with their previous dominions, subdued Israel, Phœnicia, and the surrounding countries. In order to reconcile these statements with those of Ctesias, modern writers have invented two Assyrian kingdoms at Nineveh, one which was destroyed on the death of Sardanapalus, and another which was established after that event, and fell on the capture of Nineveh by Cyaxares. But this is a purely gratuitous assumption, unsupported by any evidence. We have only records of one Assyrian empire and of one destruction of Nineveh.

SARDEMSUS, a branch of Mount Taurus, extending southward on the borders of Pisidia and Pamphylia as far as Plaselis in Lycia, whence it was continued in the chain called Climax. It divided the district of Milyas from Pisidia Proper.

SARDĒNE (Σαρδῆνη), a mountain of Mysia, north of the Herinus, near Cyme. The town of Neontichos was built on its side.

[SARDES. Vid. SARDIS.]

SARDI. Vid. SARDINIA.

[SARDICA, also called ULPĪA SARDICA (now Triaditza, near Sophia), a city of Mœsia Superior, in a plain watered by the River Cæscus. It derived its name Ulpia from the inhabitants of Ulpia, in Dacia Trajani, having been transferred thither. In its vicinity the Emperor Maximian was born, and it was also famous for a council held there.]

SARDĪNĪA (ἡ Σαρδῶ or Σαρδῶν, G. Σαρδόνος, D. Σαρδοί, A. Σαρδῶ: subsequently Σαρδῶνία, Σαρδανία, or Σαρδηνία: Σαρδῶνος, Σαρδόνιος, Σαρδῶνιος, Sardus: now Sardinia), a large island in the Mediterranean, is in shape in the form of a parallelogram, upward of one hundred and forty nautical miles in length from north to south, with an average breadth of sixty. It was regarded by the ancients as the largest of the Mediterranean islands, and this opinion, though usually considered an error, is now found to be correct, since it appears by actual admeasurement that Sardinia is a little larger than Sicily. Sardinia lies in almost a central position between Spain, Gaul, Italy, and Africa. The ancients derived its name from Sardus, a son of Hercules, who was worshipped in the island under the name of Sardus pater. The Greeks called it Ichnusa (Ἰχνησοῦσα), from its resemblance to the print of a foot, and Sandalīōtis (Σανδαλιῶτις), from its likeness to a sandal. A chain of mountains runs along the whole of the eastern side of the island from north to south, occupying about one third of its surface. These mountains were called by the ancients Inṣani Montes, a name which they probably derived from their wild and savage appearance, and from their being the haunt of numerous robbers. In the western and southern parts of Sardinia there are numerous plains, intersected by ranges of smaller hills; but this part of the island was in antiquity, as in the present day, exceedingly unhealthy. The principal rivers are the Terminus (now Termino) in the north, the Thyrus (now Oristano) on the west (the largest river in the island), and the Flumen Sacrum (now Uras) and the Sæprus (now Flumendoso) on the east. The chief towns in the island were, on the northern coast, Tibula (now Porte Pollo) and Turris Libyssonis; on the southern coast, Sulci and Caralis (now Cagliari); on the eastern coast, Olbia; and in the interior, Cornus (now Corneto) and Nora (now Nurri). Sardinia was very fertile, but was not extensively cultivated, in consequence of the uncivilized character of its inhabitants. Still, the plains in the western and southern parts of the island produced a great quantity of corn, of which a large quantity was exported to Rome every year. Among the products of the island, one of the most celebrated was the Sardonica herba, a poisonous plant, which was said to produce fatal convulsions in the person who ate of it. These convulsions agitated and distorted the mouth so that the person appeared to laugh, though in excruciating pain; hence the well-known risus Sardonicus. No plant possessing these properties is found at present in Sardinia; and it is not impossible that the whole tale may have arisen from a piece of bad etymology, since we find mention in Homer of the Σαρδάνιος γέλωρ, which can not have any reference to Sardinia, but is probably connected with the verb σαίρειν, "to grin." Another of the principal productions of Sardinia was its wool, which was obtained from a breed of domestic animals between a sheep and a goat, called musmones. The skins of these animals were used by the inhabitants as clothes, whence we find them often called Pelliti and Mastrucati. Sardinia also contained a large quantity of the precious metals, especially silver, the mines of which were worked in antiquity to a great extent. There were likewise numerous mineral springs, and large quantities of salt were manufactured on the western and southern coasts. The population of Sardinia was of a very mixed kind. To what race the original inhabitants belonged we are not informed; but it appears that Phœnicians, Tyrrhenians, and Carthaginians settled in the island at different periods. The Greeks are also said to have planted colonies in the island, but this account is very suspicious. The first Greek colony is said to have been led by Iolaus, a son of Hercules, and from him a tribe in the island, called Iolai (Ἰόλαοι, Ἰολαῖοι, Ἰολαεῖς), or Ilienses (Ἰλιεῖς) derived their name. These were some of the most ancient inhabitants of Sardinia, and were probably not of Greek, but Tyrrhenian origin. Their name is still preserved in the modern town of Iliola, in the middle of the western coast. We also find in the island Corsi, who had crossed over from Corsica, and Balari, who were probably descendants of the Iberian and Libyan mercenaries of the Carthaginians, who revolted from the latter in the first Punic war, and settled in the mountains. At a later time all these names became merged under the general appellation of SARDI, although, even in the Roman period, we still find mention of several tribes in the island under distinct names. The Sardi are described as a rude and savage people, addicted to thievery and lying. Sardinia was known to the Greeks as early as B.C. 500, since we find that Histæus of Miletus promised Darius that he would render the island of Sardo tributary to his power. It was conquered by the Carthaginians at an early period, and continued in their possession till the end of the first Punic war. Shortly after this event, the Romans availed themselves of the dangerous war which the Carthaginians were carrying on against their mercenaries in Africa to take possession of Sardinia, B.C.:238. It was now formed into a Roman province, under the government of a prætor; but a large portion of it was only nominally subject to the Romans, and it was not till after many years and numerous revolts that the inhabitants submitted to the Roman dominion. It was after one of these revolts that so many Sardinians were thrown upon the slave-market as to give rise to the proverb "Sardi venales," to indicate any cheap and worthless commodity. In fact, the inhabitants of the mountains in the eastern side of the island were never completely subdued, and gave trouble to the Romans even in the time of Tiberius. Sardinia continued to belong to the Roman empire till the fifth century, when it was taken possession of by the Vandals.

SARDIS or SARDES (αἱ Σάρδεαι, Ion. Σάρδεις, contracted Σάρδεις: Σάρδιος, Σαρδιάνιος, Ion. Σαρδιηνός, Sardiânus: ruins at Sart), one of the most ancient and famous cities of Asia Minor, and the capital of the great Lydian monarchy, stood on the southern edge of the rich valley of the Hermus, at the northern foot of Mount Tmolus, on the little River Pactolus, thirty stadia (three geographical miles) south of the junction of that river with the Hermus. On a lofty precipitous rock, forming an outpost of the range of Tmolus, was the almost impregnable citadel, which some suppose to be the Hyde of Homer, who, though he never mentions the Lydians or Sardis by name, speaks of Mount Tmolus and the Lake of Gyges. The erection of this citadel was ascribed to Meles, an ancient king of Lydia. It was surrounded by a triple wall, and contained the palace and treasury of the Lydian kings. At the downfall of the Lydian empire it resisted all the attacks of Cyrus, and was only taken by surprise. The story is told by Herodotus, who relates other legends of the fortress. The rest of the city, which stood on the plain on both sides of the Pactolus, was very slightly built, and was repeatedly burned down, first by the Cimmerians, then by the Greeks in the great Ionic revolt, and again, in part at least, by Antiochus the Great; but on each occasion it was restored. For its history as the capital of the Lydian monarchy, vid. LYDIA. Under the Persian and Greco-Syrian empires, it was the residence of the satrap of Lydia. The rise of Pergamus greatly diminished its importance; but under the Romans it was still a considerable city, and the seat of a conventus juridicus. In the reign of Tiberius it was almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake, but it was restored by the emperor's aid. It was one of the earliest seats of the Christian religion, and one of the seven churches of the province of Asia, to which St. John addressed the Apocalypse; but the apostle's language implies that the church at Sardis had already sunk into almost hopeless decay (Rev., iii., 1, foll.). In the wars of the Middle Ages the city was entirely destroyed, and its site now presents one of the most melancholy scenes of desolation to be found among the ruins of ancient cities. Though its remains extend over a large surface on the plain, they scarcely present an object of importance, except two or three Ionic columns, belonging probably to a celebrated temple of Cybele. The chief of the other remains are those of a theatre, stadium, and a building supposed to be the senate-house. The triple wall of the acropolis can still be traced, and some of its lofty towers are standing. The necropolis of the city stood on the banks of the Lake of Gyges (vid. GYGÆUS LACUS), near which the sepulchre of Alyattes may still be seen. Vid. ALYATTES.

SARDOUM OF SARDONICUM MARE (τὸ Σαρδῶνον ἢ Σαρδόνιον πέλαγος), the part of the Mediterranean Sea on the west and south of Sardinia, separated from the Libyan Sea by a line drawn from the promontory Lilybæum in Sicily.

[SARDUS, a son of Hercules. Vid. SARDINIA.]

[SARE, a village of the Maronitæ in Thrace, mentioned by Livy (xxxviii., 41).]

SAREPTA OF SAREPHTHA (Σάρεφθα, Σάρεπτα, Σάρπητα: in the Old Testament, Zarephath: now Sarafend, Serphant, or Tzarphand), a city of Phœnicia, about ten miles south of Sidon, to the territory of which it belonged; well known as the scene of two miracles of Elijah (1 Kings, xvii.). It was celebrated for its wine.

SARGËTIA (now Stricl or Strey), a tributary of the Marosch, a river in Dacia, on which was situated the residence of Decebalus.

SARÏPHI MONTES (τὰ Σάρφιβα ὄρη: now Hazarreh Mountains), a mountain-range of Central Asia, separating Margiana on the north from Aria on the south, and forming a western part of the great chain of the Indian Caucasus, which may be regarded as a prolongation through Central Asia of the chain of Anti-Taurus.

SARMATÆ OF SAURŌMATÆ (Σαρμάται, Strabo; Σαυρομάται, Herod.), a people of Asia, dwelling on the northeast of the Palus Mæotis (now Sea of Azov), east of the River Tanais (now Don), which separated them from the Scythians of Europe. This is the account of Herodotus, who tells us that the Sarmatians were allied to the Scythians, and spoke a corrupted form of the Scythian language; and that their origin was ascribed to the intercourse of Scythians with Amazons. Strabo also places the Sauromatæ between the Tanais and the Caspian; but he elsewhere uses the word in the much more extended sense, in which it was used by the Romans and by the later geographers. Vid. SARMATIA.

SARMATIA (ἡ Σαρματία: Σαρμάται, Σαυρομάται: the eastern part of Poland, and southern part of Russia in Europe), a name first used by Mela for the part of Northern Europe and Asia extending from the Vistula (now Wisla) and the SARMATICI MONTES on the west, which divided it from Germany, to the Rha (now Volga) on the east, which divided it from Scythia; bounded on the southwest and south by the rivers Ister (now Danube), Tibiscus (now Theiss), and Tyras (now Dniester), which divided it from Pannonia and Dacia, and, further, by the Euxine, and beyond it by Mount Caucasus, which divided it from Colchis, Iberia, and Albania; and extending on the north as far as the Baltic and the unknown regions of Northern Europe. The part of this country which lies in Europe just corresponds to the Scythia of Herodotus. The people from whom the name of Sarmatia was derived inhabited only a small portion of the country. Vid. SARMATÆ. The greater part of it was peopled by Scythian tribes; but some of the inhabitants of its western part seem to have been of German origin, as the VENEDI on the Baltic, and the IAZYGES, RHOXOLANI, and HAMAXOBI in Southern Russia; the chief of the other tribes west of the Tanais were the Alani or Alani Scythæ, a Scythian people who came out of Asia and settled in the central parts of Russia. Vid. ALANI. The people east of the Tanais were not of sufficient importance in ancient history to require specific mention. The whole country was divided by the River Tanais (now Don) into two parts, called respectively Sarmatia Europæa and Sarmatia Asiatica (ἡ ἐν Ἐυρώπῃ and ἡ ἐν Ἀσίᾳ Σαρματία); but it should be observed that, according to the modern division of the continent, the whole of Sarmatia belongs to Europe. It should also be noticed that the Chersonesus Taurica (now Crimæa), though falling within the specified limits, was not considered as a part of Sarmatia, but as a separate country.

SARMATICÆ PORTÆ (αἱ Σαρματικαὶ πόλαι: now Pass of Dariel), the central pass of the Caucasus, leading from Iberia to Sarmatia. It was more commonly called Caucasiæ Portæ. Vid. CAUCASUS. It was also called Caspiæ Portæ, apparently through a confusion with the pass of that name at the eastern end of the Caucasus. Vid. CASPIÆ PORTÆ. The remains of an ancient wall are still seen in the pass.

SARMATICI MONTES (τὰ Σαρματικὰ ὄρη: part of the Carpathian Mountains), a range of mountains in Central Europe, extending from the sources of the Vistula to the Danube, between Germany on the west and Sarmatia on the east.

SARMATICUS OCEANUS and PONTUS, SARMATICUM MARE (Σαρματικός ὠκεανός: now Baltic), a great sea, washing the northern coast of European Sarmatia.

[SARMENTUS, a runaway slave, employed by Mæcenæ as a scribe, and forming one of his train on the Brundisian journey so humorously described by Horace (Sat., i., 5, 52, sqq.).]

[SARMIA (now Guernsey), an island of the Atlantic Ocean, lying in the channel between Gallia and Britannia.]

SARMIZEGETHUSA (near Vachely, also called Gradischte, ruins), one of the most important towns of Dacia, and the residence of its kings, was situated on the River Sargetia (now Stricl or Strey). It was subsequently a Roman colony under the name of Colonia Ulpia Trajana Aug., and the capital of the province in which a legion had its head-quarters.

SARNUS (now Sarno), a river in Campania, flowing by Nuceria, and falling into the Sinus Puteolanus near Pompeii. Its course was changed by the great eruption of Vesuvius, A.D. 79. On its banks dwelt a people named Sarrastes, who are said to have migrated from Peloponnesus.

SARŌN (Σάρων: in the Old Testament, Sharon), a most beautiful and fertile plain of Palestine, extending along the coast north of Joppa toward Cæsarea; celebrated for its pastures and its flocks.

SARŌNICUS SINUS (Σαρωνικός κόλπος, also πόρος, πέλαγος, and πόντος: now Gulf of Egina), a bay of the Ægean Sea lying between Attica and Argolis, and commencing between the promontory of Sunium in Attica and that of Scyllæum in Argolis. It contains within it the islands of Ægina and Salamis. Its name was usually derived from Saron, king of Trœzene, who was supposed to have been drowned in this part of the sea while swimming in pursuit of a stag.

SARPEDŌN (Σαρπήδων). 1. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Europa, and brother of Minos and Rhadamanthus. Being involved in a quarrel with Minos about Miletus, he took refuge with Cilix, whom he assisted against the Lycians. Vid. MILETUS. He afterward became king of the Lycians, and Jupiter (Zeus) granted him the privilege of living three generations.—2. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Laodamia, or, according to others, of Evander and Deidamia, and a brother of Clarus and Themon, was a Lycian prince. In the Trojan war he was an ally of the Trojans, and distinguished himself by his valor, but was slain by Patroclus. Apollo, by the command of Jupiter (Zeus), cleansed Sarpedon's body from blood and dust, covered it with ambrosia, and gave it to Sleep and Death to carry into Lycia, there to be honorably buried.

SARPĒDŌN PROMONTORIUM (Σαρπηδωνία ἄκρα: now Cape Lissan el Kapch), a promontory of Cilicia, in longitude 34° east, eighty stadia west of the mouth of the Calycadnus. In the peace between the Romans and Antiochus the Great, the western boundary of the Syrian kingdom was fixed here.

SARPĒDŌNĪUM PROMONTORIUM (ἡ Σαρπηδωνίη ἄκρα), a promontory of Thrace, between the mouths of the rivers Melas and Erginus, opposite the island of Imbros.

SARRASTES. Vid. SARNUS.

SARS (now Sar), a small river on the western coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, between the Promontorium Nerium and the Minius.

SARSINA (Sarsinas, -atis: now Sarsina), an ancient town of Umbria, on the River Sapis, southwest of Ariminum, and subsequently a Roman municipium, celebrated as the birth-place of the comic poet Plautus.

SARSUS (ὁ Σάρσος: now Seihān), a considerable river in the southeast of Asia Minor. Rising in the Anti-Taurus, in the centre of Cappadocia, it flows south past Comana to the borders of Cilicia, where it receives a western branch that has run nearly parallel to it; and thence, flowing through Cilicia Campestris in a winding course, it falls into the sea a little east of the mouth of the Cydnus, and southeast of Tarsus. Xenophon gives three plethra (three hundred and three feet) for its width at its mouth.

[SASERNA. 1. The name of two writers, father and son, on agriculture, who lived in the time between Cato and Varro.—2. C. and P., two brothers, who served under Julius Cæsar in the African war, B.C. 46, and one of whom is mentioned by Cicero as a friend of Antonius and Octavianus after the death of Cæsar.]

SASO OR SASONIS INSULA (now Saseno, Sassoto, Sassa), a small rocky island off the coast of Illyria, north of the Acroceranian promontory, much frequented by pirates.

SASPIRES, or -I, or SAPIRES (Σάσπειρες, Σασπειροί, Σάπειρες, Σάππειρες), a Scythian people of Asia, south of Colchis and north of Media, in an inland position (i. e. in Armenia) according to Herodotus, but, according to others, on the coast of the Euxine.

SASSANIDÆ, the name of a dynasty which reigned in Persia from A.D. 226 to A.D. 651.

1. ARTAXERXES (the ARDISHIR or ARDSHIR of the Persians), the founder of the dynasty of the Sassanidæ, reigned A.D. 226-240. He was a son of one Babek, an inferior officer, who was the son of Sassan, perhaps a person of some consequence, since his royal descendants chose to call themselves after him. Artaxerxes had served with distinction in the army of Artabanus, the king of Parthia, was rewarded with ingratitude, and took revenge in revolt. He obtained assistance from several grantees, and having met with success, claimed the throne on the plea of being descended from the ancient kings of Persia, the progeny of the great Cyrus. The people warmly supported his cause, as he declared himself the champion of the ancient Persian religion. In 226 Artabanus was defeated in a decisive battle, and Artaxerxes thereupon assumed the pompous but national title of "King of Kings." One of his first legislative acts was the restoration of the pure religion of Zoroaster and the worship of fire. The reigning branch of the Parthian Arsacidæ was exterminated, but some collateral branches were suffered to live and to enjoy the privileges of Persian grantees, who, along with the Magi, formed a sort of senate. Having succeeded in establishing his authority at home, Artaxerxes demanded from the Emperor Alexander Severus the immediate cession of all those portions of the Roman empire that had belonged to Persia in the time of Cyrus and Xerxes, that is, the whole of the Roman possessions in Asia as well as Egypt. An immediate war between the two empires was the direct consequence. After a severe contest, peace was restored, shortly after the murder of Alexander in 237, each nation retaining the possessions which they held before the breaking out of the war.—2. SAPOR I. (SHAPUR), the son and successor of Artaxerxes I., reigned 240-273. He carried on war first against Gordian and afterward against Valerian. The latter emperor was defeated by Sapor, taken prisoner, and kept in captivity for the remainder of his life. After the capture of Valerian, Sapor conquered Syria, destroyed Antioch, and, having made himself master of the passes in the Taurus, laid Tarsus in ashes, and took Cæsarea. His further progress was stopped by Odenathus and Zenobia, who drove the king back beyond the Euphrates, and founded a new empire, over which they ruled at Palmyra. In his reign lived the celebrated Mani, who, endeavoring to amalgamate the Christian and Zoroastrian religions, gave rise to the famous sect of the Manichæans, who spread over the whole East, exposing themselves to most sanguinary persecutions from both Christians and fire-worshippers.—3. HORMISDAS I. (HORMUZ), son of the preceding, who reigned only one year, and died 274.—4. VARANES or VARANES I. (BAHRAM or BAHARAM), son of Hormisdas I., reigned 274-277. He carried on unprofitable wars against Zenobia, and, after her captivity, was involved in a contest with Aurclian, which, however, was not attended with any serious results, on account of the sudden death of Aurelian in 275. In his reign the celebrated Mani was put to death.—5. VARANES II. (BAHRAM), son of Varanes I., reigned 277-294. He was defeated by Carus, who took both Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and his dominions were only saved from further conquests by the sudden death of Carus (283).—6. VARANES III. (BAHRAM), elder son of Varanes II., died after a reign of eight months, 294.—7. NARBES (NARSI), younger son of Varanes II., reigned 294-303. He carried on a formidable war against the Emperor Dioetian The Roman army was commanded by Galerius Cæsar, who in the first campaign (296) sustained most signal defeats in Mesopotamia, and fled in disgrace to Antioch. In the second campaign Narses was defeated with great loss, and was obliged to conclude a peace with the Romans, by which he ceded to Diocletian Mesopotamia, five small provinces beyond the Tigris, the kingdom of Armenia, some adjacent Median districts, and the supremacy over Iberia, the kings of which were henceforth under the protection of Rome. In 303 Narses abdicated in favor of his son, and died soon afterward.—8. HORMISDAS II. (HORMUZ), son of Narses, reigned 303-310. During his reign nothing of importance happened regarding Rome.—9. SAPOR II. POSTUMUS (SHAPUR), son of Hormisdas II., was born after the death of his father, and was crowned in his mother's womb, the Magi placing the diadem with great solemnity upon the body of his mother. He reigned 310-381. His reign was signalized by a cruel persecution of the Christians. He carried on war for many years against Constantius II. and his successors. The armies of Constantius were repeatedly defeated; Julian, as is related elsewhere (vid. JULIANUS), perished in battle; and the war was at length brought to a conclusion by Jovian ceding to the Persians the five provinces beyond the Tigris, and the fortresses of Nisibis, Singara, &c. Iberia and Armenia were left to their fate, and were completely reduced by Sapor in 365 and the following year. Sapor has been surnamed the Great, and no Persian king had ever caused such terror to Rome as this monarch.—10. ARTAXERXES II. (ARDISHIR), the successor of Sapor II., reigned 381-385. He was a prince of royal blood, but was not a son of Sapor.—11. SAPOR III. (SHAPUR), reigned 385-390. He sent an embassy to Theodosius the Great, with splendid presents, which was returned by a Greek embassy headed by Stilicho going to Persia. Owing to these diplomatic transactions, an arrangement was made in 384, according to which Armenia and Iberia recovered their independence.—12. VARANES IV. (BAHRAM), reigned A.D. 390-404, or perhaps not so long. He was the brother of Sapor III., and founded Kermanshah, still a flourishing town.—13. YESDIGERD I. (YEZDIJIRD), surnamed ULATHIM, or the SINNER, son or brother of the preceding, reigned 404-420 or 421. He was on friendly terms with the Emperor Arcadius, who is said to have appointed him the guardian of his infant son and successor, Theodosius the Younger. He concluded a peace with Arcadius for one hundred years.—14. VARANES V. (BAHRAM), son of Yesdigerd I., surnamed GOUR, or the "WILD ASS," on account of his passion for the chase of that animal, reigned 420 or 421-448. He persecuted his Christian subjects with such severity that thousands of them took refuge within the Roman dominions. He carried on war with Theodosius, which was terminated by a peace for one hundred years, which peace lasted till the twelfth year of the reign of the Emperor Anastasius. During the latter part of his reign Varanes carried on wars against the Huns, Turks, and Indians, in which he is said to have achieved those valorous deeds for which he has ever since continued to be a favorite hero in Persian poetry. He was accidentally drowned in a deep well together with his horse, and neither man nor beast ever rose again from the fathomless pit.—15. YEZDIGERD II., son of the preceding, reigned 448-458. The persecutions against the Christians were renewed by him with unheard-of cruelty. His relations with Rome were peaceful.—16. HORMISDAS III. (HORMUZ), and, 17. PEROSES (FITROZE), sons of the preceding, claimed the succession, and rose in arms against each other. Peroses gained the throne by the assistance of the White Huns, against whom he turned his sword in after years. He perished in a great battle with them in 484, together with all of his sons except Pallas and Cobades.—18. PALLAS (PAL-LASH), who reigned 484-488, had to contest the throne with Cobades. He perished in a battle with his brother Cobades in 488.—19. COBADES (KOBAD), reigned 488-498, and again 501 or 502-531. The years from 498 till 502 were filled up by the short reign of, 20. ZAMES (JAMASPES). The latter was the brother of Cobades, whom he dethroned, and compelled to fly to the Huns, with whose assistance Cobades recovered his throne about 502. He carried on war with success against the Emperor Anastasius; but in consequence of the Huns, who had previously been his auxiliaries, turning their arms against him, he made peace with Anastasius in 505, on receiving eleven thousand pounds of gold as an indemnity. He also restored Mesopotamia and his other conquests to the Romans, being unable to maintain his authority there on account of the protracted war with the Huns. About this time the Romans constructed the fortress of Dara, the strongest bulwark against Persia, and situated in the very face of Ctesiphon. The war with Constantinople was renewed in 521, in the reign of the Emperor Justin I.—21. CHOSROES I. (KHOSRU or KHOSREW), surnamed NUSIRWAN, or "the generous mind," reigned 531-579. He carried on several wars against the Romans. The first war was finished in 532 or 533, Justinian having purchased peace by an annual tribute of four hundred and forty thousand pieces of gold. One of the conditions of Chosroes was, that seven Greek, but pagan philosophers, who had resided some time at the Persian court, should be allowed to live in the Roman empire without being subject to the imperial laws against pagans. The second war lasted from 540 to 561. Peace was concluded on condition of Justinian promising an annual tribute of forty thousand pieces of gold, and receiving, in return, the cession of the Persian claims upon Colchis and Lazica. The third war broke out in 571, in the reign of Justin II., but Chosroes died before it was concluded. Chosroes was one of the greatest kings of Persia. In his protracted wars with the Romans he disputed the field with the conquerors of Africa and Italy, and with those very generals, Tiberius and Mauricius, who brought Persia to the brink of ruin but a few years after his death. His empire extended from the Indus to the Red Sea, and large tracts in Central Asia, perhaps a portion of Eastern Europe, recognized him for a time as their sovereign. He received embassies and presents from the remotest kings of Asia and Africa. His internal government was despotic and cruel, but of that firm description which pleases Orientals, so that he still lives in the memory of the Persians as a model of justice. He provided for all the wants of his subjects; and agriculture, trade, and learning were equally protected by him. He caused the best Greek, Latin, and Indian works to be translated into Persian.—22. HORMISDAS IV. (HORMUZ), son of CHOSROES, reigned 579–590. He continued the war with the Romans, which had been bequeathed him by his father, but was defeated successively by Mauricius and Heraclius. Hormisdas was deprived of his sight, and subsequently put to death by the Persian aristocracy.—23. VARANES VI. (BAHRAM) SHUBIN, a royal prince, usurped the throne on the death of Hormisdas, and reigned 590–591. Unable to maintain the throne against Chosroes, who was supported by the Emperor Mauricius, he fled to the Turks.—24. CHOSROES II. (KHOSRU) PURWIZ, reigned 590 or 591–628. He was the son of Hormisdas IV., and recovered his father's throne with the assistance of the Emperor Mauricius. After the murder of Mauricius, Chosroes declared war against the tyrant Phocas, and met with extraordinary success. In several successive campaigns he conquered Mesopotamia, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Asia Minor, and finally pitched his camp at Chalcedon, opposite Constantinople. At length Heraclius saved the empire from the brink of ruin, and in a series of splendid campaigns not only recovered the provinces which the Romans had lost, but carried his victorious arms into the heart of the Persian empire. Borne down by his misfortunes, and worn out by age and fatigue, Chosroes resolved, in 628, to abdicate in favor of his son Merdaza; but Shirweh, or Siroes, his eldest son, anticipated his design, and at the head of a band of conspirators seized upon the person of his father, deposed him, and put him to death. The Orientals say that Chosroes reigned six years too long. No Persian king lived in such splendor as Chosroes; and however fabulous the Eastern accounts respecting his magnificence may be, they are true in the main, as is attested by the Western writers.—25. SIROES (SHIRWEH), reigned only eight months, 628. He concluded peace with the Emperor Heraclius. The numerous captives were restored on both sides. Siroes also restored the holy cross which had been taken at the conquest of Jerusalem.—26. ARTAXERXES III. (ARDISHIR), the infant son of Siroes, was murdered a few days after the death of his father. He was the last male Sassanid. After him the throne was disputed by a host of candidates of both sexes and doubtful descent, who had no sooner ascended the throne than they were hurried from it into death or captivity. The last king was YESDIGERD III., who was defeated and slain in 651 by Kaleb, the general of the khalif Abu-Bekr. Persia now became a Mohammedan country.

SASSŪLA, a town in Latium, belonging to the territory of Tibur.

SITĀLA (τὰ Σάραλα, ἢ Σαράλα), a considerable town in the northeast of Armenia Minor, important as the key of the mountain passes into Pontus. It stood at the junction of four roads leading to places on the Euxine, a little north of the Euphrates, in a valley surrounded by mountains, three hundred and twenty-five Roman miles from Cæsarea in Cappadocia, and one hundred and thirty-five from Trapezus. Under the later Roman empire it was the station of the fifteenth legion. Notwithstanding the above indications, its site has not yet been identified with certainty.

SATARCHÆ, a Scythian tribe on the eastern coast of the Tauric Chersonesus.

[SATASPES (Σατάσπης), a Persian, son of Teaspes, sentenced by Xerxes to be impaled for having offered violence to the daughter of Zopyrus, the son of Megabyzus: this punishment was remitted on condition of his circumnavigating Africa. He set sail accordingly from Egypt, passed through the Straits of Gibraltar, and continued his voyage for a considerable time southward, but at length became discouraged, and returned home. Xerxes thereupon caused the original sentence to be executed.]

SATICŪLA (Saticulanus), a town of Samnium, situated upon a mountain on the frontiers of Campania, probably upon one of the furthest heights of the mountain chain of Cajazzo. It was conquered by the Romans and colonized B.C. 313.

SATNĪŌIS (Σατνιῶεις: now Tuzla), a river in the south of the Troad, rising in Mount Ida, and flowing west into the Ægean north of Promontorium Leetum, between Larissa and Hamaxitus.

[SATNIUS (Σάντιος), son of Enops and of a river-nymph of the Satniōis, slain by Ajax, son of Oïleus, in the Trojan war.]

[SATRÆ (Σάτραι), a people of Thrace, on Mount Pangæus, between the Nestus and the Strymon, a very brave race, and hence never deprived of their freedom; they dwell upon lofty heights covered with forests and snow. On one of their hills was an oracle of Bacchus (Dionysus), whose priests were the Bessi, whence it is probable that they themselves were only a branch of the Bessi.]

SATRĪCUM (Satricanus: now Casale di Conca), a town in Latium, near Antium, to the territory of which it belonged. It was destroyed by the Romans.

SATŪRÆ PALUS (now Lago di Paola), a lake or marsh in Latium, formed by the River Nymphæus, and near the Promontory Circeium.

SATURĪUM or SATUREĪUM (now Saturo), a town in the south of Italy, near Tarentum, celebrated for its horses. (Hor., Sat., i. 6, 59).

SATURNĪA. 1. An ancient name of Italy. Vid. ITALIA.—2. (Saturninus: now Saturnia), formerly called AURINIA, an ancient town of Etruria, said to have been founded by the Pelasgians, was situated in the territory of Caletta, on the road from Rome to Cosa, about twenty miles from the sea. It was colonized by the Romans, B.C. 183. The ancient town was rather more than two miles in circuit, and there are still remains of its walls and tombs.

SATURNĪNUS I., one of the Thirty Tyrants, was a general of Vnlerian, by whom he was much beloved. Disgusted by the debauchery of Gallienus, he accepted from the soldiers the title of emperor, but was put to death by the troops, who could not endure the sternness of his discipline. The country, however, in which these events took place is not mentioned.—If a native of Gaul, and an able officer, was appointed by Aurelian commander of the Eastern frontier, and was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria during the reign of Probus. He was eventually slain by the soldiers of Probus, although the emperor would willingly have spared his life.

SATURNINUS, L. ANTONIUS, governor of Upper Germany in the reign of Domitian, raised a rebellion against that emperor A.D. 91, but was defeated and put to death by Appius Maximus, the general of Domitian.

SATURNINUS, L. APFULEIUS, the celebrated demagogue, was quæstor B.C. 104, and tribune of the plebs for the first time, 102. He entered into a close alliance with Marius and his friends, and soon acquired great popularity. He became a candidate for the tribunate for the second time, 100. At the same time, Glaucia, who, next to Saturninus, was the greatest demagogue of the day, offered himself as a candidate for the prætorship, and Marius for the consulship. Marius and Glaucia carried their elections; but A. Nonius, a partisan of the aristocracy, was chosen tribune instead of Saturninus. Nonius, however, was murdered on the same evening by the emissaries of Glaucia and Saturninus, and early the following morning Saturninus was chosen to fill up the vacancy. As soon as he had entered upon his tribunate, he brought forward an agrarian law, which led to the banishment of Metellus Numidicus, as is related elsewhere. Vid. METELLUS, No. 10. Saturninus proposed other popular measures, such as a Lex Frumentaria, and a law for founding new colonies in Sicily, Achaia, and Macedonia. In the comitia for the election of the magistrates for the following year, Saturninus obtained the tribunate for the third time, and along with him there was chosen a certain Equitius, a runaway slave, who pretended to be a son of Tiberius Gracchus. Glaucia was at the same time a candidate for the consulship; the two other candidates were M. Antonius and C. Memmius. The election of M. Antonius was certain, and the struggle lay between Glaucia and Memmius. As the latter seemed likely to carry his election, Saturninus and Glaucia hired some ruffians who murdered him openly in the comitia. This last act produced a complete reaction against Saturninus and his associates. The senate declared them public enemies, and ordered the consuls to put them down by force. Marius was unwilling to act against his friends, but he had no alternative, and his backwardness was compensated by the zeal of others. Driven out of the forum, Saturninus, Glaucia, and the quæstor Saufeius took refuge in the Capitol, but the partisans of the senate cut off the pipes which supplied the Capitol with water. Unable to hold out any longer, they surrendered to Marius. The latter did all he could to save their lives: as soon as they descended from the Capitol, he placed them for security in the Curia Hostilia, but the mob pulled off the tiles of the senate-house, and pelted them with the tiles till they died. The senate gave their sanction to these proceedings by rewarding with the citizenship a slave of the name of Scæva, who claimed the honor of having killed Saturninus. Nearly forty years after these events, the tribune T. Labienus accused an aged senator Rabirius of having been the murderer of Saturninus. An account of this trial is given elsewhere. Vid. RABIRIUS.

SATURNINUS, CLAUDIUS, a jurist from whose Liber Singularis de Pœnis Paganorum there is a single excerpt in the Digest. He was prætor under Antoninus Pius.

SATURNINUS, POMPEIUS, a contemporary of the younger Pliny, is praised by the latter as a distinguished orator, historian, and poet. Several of Pliny's letters are addressed to him.

SATURNINUS, C. SENTIUS. 1. Proprætor of Macedonia during the Social war, and probably for some time afterward. He defeated the Thracians, who had invaded his province.—2. One of the persons of distinguished rank who deserted Sextus Pompeius in B.C. 35, and passed over to Octavianus. He was consul in 19, and afterward appointed to the government of Syria. Three sons of Saturninus accompanied him as legati to Syria, and were present with their father at the trial of Herod's sons at Berytus in B.C. 6.

SATURNINUS, VENULEIUS, a Roman jurist, is said to have been a pupil of Papinianus, and a consiliarius of Alexander Severus. There are seventy-one excerpts from his writings in the Digest.

SATURNIVS, that is, a son of Saturnus, and accordingly used as a surname of Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto. For the same reason, the name of SATURNIA is given both to Juno and Vesta.

SATURNUS, a mythical king of Italy, to whom was ascribed the introduction of agriculture and the habits of civilized life in general. The name is connected with the verb sero, sevi, satum. The Romans invariably identified Saturnus with the Greek Cronos, and hence made the former the father of Jupiter, Neptune, Pluto, Juno, &c. (vid. CRONOS); but there is, in reality, no resemblance between the attributes of the two deities, except that both were regarded as the most ancient divinities in their respective countries. The resemblance is much stronger between Demeter and Saturn, for all that the Greeks ascribe to their Demeter is ascribed by the Italians to Saturn. Saturnus, then, deriving his name from sowing, is justly called the introducer of civilization and social order, both of which are inseparably connected with agriculture. His reign is conceived for the same reason to have been the golden age of Italy, and more especially of the Aborigines, his subjects. As agricultural industry is the source of wealth and plenty, his wife was Ops, the representative of plenty. The story ran that the god came to Italy, in the reign of Janus, by whom he was hospitably received, and that he formed a settlement on the Capitoline Hill, which was hence called the Saturnian Hill. At the foot of that hill, on the road leading up to the Capitol, there stood in after times the temple of Saturn. Saturn then taught the people agriculture, suppressed their savage mode of life, and introduced among them civilization and morality. The result was, that the whole country was called Saturnia, or the land of plenty. Saturn was suddenly removed from earth to the abodes of the gods, whereupon Janus erected an altar to him in the forum. It is further related that Latium received its name (from lateo) from this disappearance of Saturn, who for the same reason was regarded by some as a divinity of the nether world. Respecting the festival solemnized by the Romans in honor of Saturn, vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v. SATURNALIA. The statue of Saturnus was hollow and filled with oil, probably to denote the fertility of Latium in olives; in his hand he held a crooked pruning knife, and his feet were surrounded with a woollen ribbon. In the pediment of the temple of Saturn were seen two figures resembling Tritons with horns, and whose lower extremities grew out of the ground; the temple itself was used as the treasury of the state, and many laws also were deposited in it.

SATYRI (Σάτυροι), the name of a class of beings in Greek mythology who are inseparably connected with the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus), and represent the luxuriant vital powers of nature. Homer does not mention the Satyrs. Hesiod describes them as a race good for nothing and unfit for work. They are commonly said to be the sons of Mercury (Hermes) and Iphthima, or of the Naiads. The Satyrs are represented with bristly hair, the nose round and somewhat turned upward, the ears pointed at the top like those of animals, with two small horns growing out of the top of the forehead, and with a tail like that of a horse or goat. In works of art they are represented at different stages of life; the older ones were commonly called Sileni, and the younger ones are termed Satyrisci. The Satyrs are always described as fond of wine (whence they often appear either with a cup or a thyrsus in their hand), and of every kind of sensual pleasure, whence they are seen sleeping, playing musical instruments, or engaged in voluptuous dances with nymphs. Like all the gods dwelling in forests and fields, they were greatly dreaded by mortals. Later writers, especially the Roman poets, confound the Satyrs with the Italian Fauni, and accordingly represent them with larger horns and goats' feet, although originally they were quite distinct kinds of beings. Satyrs usually appear with flutes, the thyrsus, syrinx, the shepherd's staff, cups or bags filled with wine; they are dressed with the skins of animals, and wear wreaths of vine, ivy, or fir. Representations of them are still very numerous, but the most celebrated in antiquity was the Satyr of Praxicles at Athens.

SATYRUS (Σάτυρος). 1. I. King of Bosphorus, was a son of Spartaecus I., and reigned B.C. 407 or 406–393. He maintained friendly relations with Athens. He was slain at the siege of Theodosia in 393, and was succeeded by his son Leuceon.—2. II. King of Bosphorus, was the eldest of the sons of Parisades I., whom he succeeded in 311, but reigned only nine months.—3. A distinguished comic actor at Athens, is said to have given instructions to Demosthenes in the art of giving full effect to his speeches by appropriate action.—4. A distinguished Peripatetic philosopher and historian, who lived in the time of Ptolemy Philopator, if not later. He wrote a collection of biographies, among which were lives of Philip and Demosthenes, and which is frequently cited by ancient writers.—5. A physician in the second century after Christ, who wrote some works which are no longer extant.

SAUPEIUS. 1. C., quæstor B.C. 100, was one of the partisans of Saturninus, took refuge with him in the Capitol, and was slain along with his leader when they were obliged to surrender to Marius.—2. L., a Roman eques, was an intimate friend of Atticus, and a warm admirer of the Epicurean philosophy. He had very valuable property in Italy, which was confiscated by the triumvirs, but was restored to him through the exertions of Atticus.

SAULÖE PARTHAUNISA (Σανλώη Παρθαύνισσα), the later capital of Parthia, called by the Greeks Nisæa. Its site is not known.

SAUROMATES (Σαυρομάτης), the name of several kings of Bosphorus, who are for the most part known only from their coins. We find kings of this name reigning over Bosphorus from the time of Augustus to that of Constantine.

SAVERRIÖ, P. Sulpicius. 1. Consul B.C. 304, when he carried on the war against the Samnites. He was censor in 219 with Sempronius Sophus, his former colleague in the consulship. In their censorship two new tribes were formed, the Aniensis and Terentina.—2. Son of the preceding, consul 279 with P. Decius Mus, commanded, with his colleague, against Pyrrhus.

SAVO (now Saone), a river in Campania, which flows into the sea south of Sinuessa.

SAVUS (now Save or Sau), a navigable tributary of the Danube, which rises in the Carnic Alps, forms first the boundary between Noricum and Italy, and afterward between Pannonia and Illyria, and falls into the Danube near Singidunum.

SAXA, Decidius, a native of Celtiberia, was originally one of Cæsar's common soldiers. He was tribune of the plebs in B.C. 44, and after Cæsar's death in this year he took an active part in supporting the friends of his murdered patron. He served under M. Antonius in the siege of Mutina, and subsequently under both Antonius and Octavianus in their war against Brutus and Cassius. After the battle of Philippi Saxa accompanied Antony to the East, and was made by the latter governor of Syria. Here he was defeated by the younger Labienus and the Parthians, and was slain in the flight after the battle (B.C. 40).

SAXA, Q. Voconius, tribune of the plebs B.C. 169, proposed the Voconia lex, which was supported by the elder Cato, who spoke in its favor when he was sixty-five years of age. Respecting this lex, vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.

SAXA RUBRA. Vid. RUBRA SAXA.

SAXONES, a powerful people in Germany, who originally dwelt in the southern part of the Cimbric Chersonesus, between the rivers Albis and Chalusus (now Trave), consequently in the modern Holstein. They are not mentioned by Tacitus and Pliny, since these writers appear to have comprehended all the inhabitants of the Cimbric Chersonesus under the general name of Cimbri. The Saxones first occur in history in A.D. 286, when they are mentioned as brave and skillful sailors, who often joined the Chauci in piratical expeditions against the coast of Gaul. The Saxones afterward appear at the head of a powerful confederacy of Germanic communities, who became united under the general name of Saxons, and who eventually occupied the country between the Elbe, the Rhine, the Lippe, and the German Ocean. A portion of the Saxons, in conjunction with the Angli, led by Hengist and Horsa, conquered Britain, as is well known, about the middle of the fifth century. The Romans never came into close contact with the Saxons.

[SCÆA PORTA (Σκαίη πύλη, usually in pl. Σκαίαι πύλαι), a celebrated gate of Troy, on the west side, toward the sea: near it was the tomb of Laomedon. Vid. TROJA.]

SCÆVA, CASSIUS, a centurion in Cæsar's army, who distinguished himself by his extraordinary feats of valor at the battle of Dyrrhachium. He survived the battle, and is mentioned as one of the partisans of Cæsar after the death of the latter.

SCÆVOLA, Q. CERVIDIUS, a Roman jurist, lived under Antoninus Pius. He wrote several works, and there are three hundred and seven excerpts from him in the Digest.

SCÆVOLA, MUCIUS. I. C., the hero of a celebrated story in early Roman history. When King Porsenna was blockading Rome, C. Mucius, a young man of the patrician class, resolved to rid his country of the invader. He went out of the city, with a dagger hid beneath his dress, and approached the place where Porsenna was sitting, with a secretary by his side, dressed nearly in the same style as the king himself. Mistaking the secretary for the king, Mucius killed him on the spot. He was seized by the king's guards, and brought before the royal seat, when he declared his name, and his design to kill the king himself, and told him that there were many more Romans ready to attempt his life. The king, in his passion and alarm, ordered him to be burned alive unless he explained more clearly what he meant by his vague threats, upon which Mucius thrust his right hand into a fire which was already lighted for a sacrifice, and held it there without flinching. The king, who was amazed at his firmness, ordered him to be removed from the altar, and bade him go away free and uninjured. To make some return to the king for his generous behavior, Mucius told him that there were three hundred of the first youths of Rome who had agreed with one another to kill the king, that the lot fell on him to make the first attempt, and that the rest would do the same when their turn came. Mucius received the name of Scævola, or left-handed, from the circumstance of the loss of his right hand. Porsenna, being alarmed for his life, which he could not secure against so many desperate men, made proposals of peace to the Romans, and evacuated the territory. The patricians gave Mucius a tract of land beyond the Tiber, which was thenceforth called Mucia Prata. The Mucius of this story was a patrician, but the Mucii of the historical period were plebeians.—2. Q., prætor B.C. 215, had Sardinia for his province, where he remained for the next three years. He was decemvir sacrorum, and died 209.—3. Q., probably son of No. 2, was prætor 179, with Sicily for his province, and consul 174.—4. P., rother of No. 3, was prætor with his brother

179, and consul 175. In his consulship he gained a victory over the Ligurians.—5. P., probably son of No. 4, was tribune of the plebs 141, prætor urbanus 136, and consul 133, the year in which Tiberius Gracchus lost his life. In 131 he succeeded his brother Mucianus (vid. MUCIANUS) as pontifex maximus. Scævola was distinguished for his knowledge of the Jus Pontificum. He was also famed for his skill in playing at ball, as well as at the game called Duodecim Scripta. His fame as a lawyer is recorded by Cicero in several passages. There is no excerpt from his writings in the Digest, but he is cited several times by the jurists whose works were used for that compilation.—6. Q., called the AUGUR, was son of No. 3, and married the daughter of C. Lælius, the friend of Scipio Africanus the younger. He was tribune of the plebs 128, plebeian ædile 125, and as prætor was governor of the province of Asia in 121, the year in which C. Gracchus lost his life. He was prosecuted after his return from his province for the offence of repetundæ in 120 by T. Albius, but was acquitted. He was consul 117. He lived at least to the tribunate of P. Sulpicius Rufus 88. Cicero, who was born 106, informs us that, after he had put on the toga virilis, his father took him to Scævola, who was then an old man, and that he kept as close to him as he could, in order to profit by his remarks. After his death Cicero became a hearer of Q. Mucius Scævola, the pontifex. The augur was distinguished for his knowledge of the law; but none of his writings are recorded. Mucia, the augur's daughter, married L. Licinius Crassus, the orator, who was consul 95, with Q. Mucius Scævola, the pontifex maximus; whence it appears that the Q. Mucius, who is one of the speakers in the treatise de Oratore, is not the pontifex and the colleague of Crassus, but the augur, the father-in-law of Crassus. He is also one of the speakers in the Lælius sive de Amicitia (c. 1), and in the de Republica (1, 12).—7. Q., PONTIFEX MAXIMUS, was son of No. 5, and is quoted by Cicero as an example of a son who aimed at excellence in that which had given his father distinction. He was tribune of the plebs in 106, curule ædile in 104, and consul 95, with Licinius Crassus, the orator, as his colleague. After his consulship Scævola was the governor (proconsul) of the province of Asia, in which capacity he gained the esteem of the people who were under his government. Subsequently he was made pontifex maximus, by which title he is often distinguished from Q. Mucius the augur. He lost his life in the consulship of C. Marius the younger and Cn. Papirius Carbo (82), having been proscribed by the Marian party, from which we may conclude that he belonged to Sulla's party. His body was thrown into the Tiber. The virtues of Scævola are recorded by Cicero, who, after the death of the augur, became an attendant (auditor) of the pontifex. The purity of his moral character, his exalted notions of equity and fair dealing, his abilities as an administrator, an orator, and a jurist, place him among the first of the illustrious men of all ages and countries. He was, says Cicero, the most eloquent of jurists, and the most learned jurist among orators. Q. Scævola the pontifex is the first Roman to whom we can attribute a scientific and systematic handling of the Jus Civile, which he accomplished in a work in eighteen books. He also wrote a Liber Singularis περὶ ὅρων, a work on Definitions, or perhaps, rather, short rules of law, from which there are four excerpts in the Digest. This is the oldest work from which there are any excerpts in the Digest, and even these may have been taken at second hand.

SCALĀBIS (now Santarem), a town in Lusitania, on the road from Olisipo to Emerita and Bracara, also a Roman colony with the surname Præsidium Julium, and the seat of one of the three Conventus Juridici of the province. The town is erroneously called Scalabiscus by Ptolemy.

SCALDIS (now Scheldt), an important river in the north of Gallia Belgica, flowing into the ocean, but which Cæsar erroneously makes a tributary of the Mosa. Ptolemy calls this river Tabudas or Tabullas, which name it continued to bear in the Middle Ages under the form of Tabul or Tabula.

SCAMANDER (Σκάμανδρος). 1. A river in the western part of the northern coast of Sicily, falling into the sea near Segesta.—2. The celebrated river of the Troad. Vid. Troas. As a mythological personage, the river-god was called Xanthus by the gods. His contest with Achilles is described by Homer (Il., xxi., 136, foll.).

SCAMANDRĪUS (Σκαμάνδριος). 1. Son of Hector and Andromache, whom the people of Troy called Astyanax, because his father was the protector of the city of Troy.—[2. A Trojan warrior, son of Strophius, slain by Menelaus.]

SCAMBŌNĪDÆ (Σκαμβονίδαι), a demus in Attica, between Athens and Eleusis, belonging to the tribe Leontis.

SCAMPA (Σκάμπα: now Skumbi or Iscampi), a town in the interior of Greek Illyria, on the Via Egnatia, between Clodiana and Lychnidus.

SCANDĒA (Σκάνδεια), a port-town on the eastern side of the island Cythera, forming the harbor of the town of Cythera, from which it was ten stadia distant.

SCANDĪA or SCANDINAVĪA, the name given by the ancients to Norway, Sweden, and the surrounding islands. Even the later Romans had a very imperfect knowledge of the Scandinavian peninsula. They supposed it to have been surrounded by the ocean, and to have been composed of several islands called by Ptolemy Scandiae. Of these the largest bore especially the name of Scandia or Scandinavia, by which the modern Sweden was undoubtedly indicated. This country was inhabited by the Hilleviones, of whom the Sniones and Sitones appear to have been tribes.

SCANDĪLA (now Scandole), a small island in the northeast of the Ægean Sea, between Peparethos and Scyros.

SCANTĪA SILVA, a wood in Campania, in which were probably the Aquæ Scantiæ mentioned by Pliny.

[SCANTILLA, MANLIA, the wife of Didius Julianus, whom she urged to buy the empire when set up for sale: she enjoyed the title Augusta during the brief period of her husband's reign.]

SCAPTE HYLE (Σκαπτὴ ὕλη), also called, but less correctly, SCAPTESYLE (Σκαπτησύλη), a small town on the coast of Thrace, opposite the island of Thasos. It contained celebrated gold mines, which were originally worked by the Thasians. Thucydides, who had some property in these mines, retired to this place after his banishment from Athens, and here arranged the materials for his history.

SCAPTĪA (Scaptiensis or Scaptius), an ancient town in Latium, which gave its name to a Roman tribe, but which disappeared at an early period.

[SCAPULA QUINTIUS, T., a Roman officer, passed over into Spain with Cn. Pompeius, and took an active part against Cæsar: he fought at the battle of Munda, B.C. 45, and after the battle, seeing that all was lost, fled to Corduba, and there burned himself to death on a pyre which he had erected for that purpose.]

SCAPŪLA, P. OSTORIUS, succeeded A. Plautius as governor of Britain about A.D. 50. He defeated the powerful tribe of the Silures, took prisoner their king Caractacus, and sent him in chains to Rome. In consequence of this success he received the insignia of a triumph, but died soon afterward in the province.

SCARABANTĪA (now Edenburg), a town in Pannonia Superior, on the road from Vindobona to Pætovio, and a municipium with the surname Flavia Augusta.

SCARDŌNA (Σκαρδῶνα or Σκάρδων). 1. (Now Skardona or Skardin), the chief town of Liburnia in Illyria, on the right bank of the Titius, twelve miles from its mouth, the seat of a Conventus Juridicus.—2. (Now Arbe), a small island off the coast of Liburnia, also called Arba, which was the name of the principal town.

SCARDUS or SCORDUS MONS (τὸ Σκάρδον ὄρος), a small range of lofty mountains, forming the boundary between Mæsia and Macedonia.

SCARPE, SCARPHĒA, or SCARPHĪA (Σκάρφη, Σκάρφεια, Σκαρφή: Σκαρφεύς, Σκαρφεύς, Σκαρφατος, Σκάρφιος), a town of the Epicnemidii Locri, ten stadia from the coast, at which the roads united leading through Thermopylae. It possessed a harbor on the coast, probably at the mouth of the River Boagrius.

SCARFONNA (now Charpeigne), a town in Gallia Belgica, on the Mosella, and on the road from Tullum to Divodurum.

SCATO or CATO, VETTĪUS, one of the Italian generals in the Marsic war, B.C. 90. He defeated the consuls, L. Julius Cæsar and P. Rutilius Lupus, in two successive battles. He was afterward taken prisoner, and was being dragged to death by his own slave as he was stabled before the Roman general, being thus delivered from the ignominy and punishment that awaited him.

SCAURUS, ÆMILIUS. 1. M., raised his family from obscurity to the highest rank among the Roman nobles. He was born in B.C. 163. His father, notwithstanding his patrician descent, had been obliged, through poverty, to carry on the trade of a coal merchant, and left his son a very slender patrimony. The latter had thought at first of carrying on the trade of a money-lender; but he finally resolved to devote himself to the study of eloquence, with the hope of rising to the honors of the state. He likewise served in the army, where he appears to have gained some distinction. He was curule ædile in 123

He obtained the consulship in 115, when he carried on war with success against several of the Alpine tribes. In 112 he was sent at the head of an embassy to Jugurtha; and in 111 he accompanied the consul L. Calpurnius Bestia, as one of his legates, in the war against Jugurtha. The Numidian king bestowed large sums of money upon both Bestia and Scaurus, in consequence of which the consul granted the king most favorable terms of peace. This disgraceful transaction excited the greatest indignation at Rome; and C. Mamilius, the tribune of the plebs, 110, brought forward a bill by which an inquiry was to be instituted against all those who had received bribes from Jugurtha. Although Scaurus had been one of the most guilty, such was his influence in the state that he contrived to be appointed one of the three quæsitores who were elected under the bill for the purpose of prosecuting the criminals. But, though he thus secured himself, he was unable to save any of his accomplices. Bestia and many others were condemned. In 109, Scaurus was censor with M. Livius Drusus. In his consulship he restored the Milvian bridge, and constructed the Æmilian road, which ran by Pisæ and Luna as far as Dertona. In 107 he was elected consul a second time, in place of L. Cassius Longinus, who had fallen in battle against the Tigurini. In the struggles between the aristocratical and popular parties, Scaurus was always a warm supporter of the former. He was several times accused of different offences, chiefly by his private enemies; but such was his influence in the state that he was always acquitted. He died about 89. By his wife Cæcilia Scaurus had three children, two sons mentioned below, and a daughter Æmilia, first married to M. Glabrio, and next to Cn. Pompey, subsequently the triumvir.—2. M., eldest son of the preceding, and step-son of the dictator Sulla, whom his mother Cæcilia married after the death of his father. In the third Mithradatic war he served under Pompey as questor. The latter sent him to Damascus with an army, and from thence he marched into Judæa to settle the disputes between the brothers Hyrcanus and Aristobulus. Scaurus was left by Pompey in the command of Syria with two legions. During his government of Syria he made a predatory incursion into Arabia Petræa, but withdrew on the payment of three hundred talents by Aretas, the king of the country. He was curule ædile in 58, when he celebrated the public games with extraordinary splendor. The temporary theatre which he built accommodated eighty thousand spectators, and was adorned in the most magnificent manner. Three hundred and sixty pillars decorated the stage, arranged in three stories, of which the lowest was made of white marble, the middle one of glass, and the highest of gilt wood. The combats of wild beasts were equally astonishing. One hundred and fifty panthers were exhibited in the circus, and five crocodiles and a hippopotamus were seen for the first time at Rome. In 56 he was prætor, and in the following year governed the province of Sardinia, which he plundered without mercy. On his return to Rome he was accused of the crime of repetundæ. He was defended by Cicero, Hortensius, and others, and was acquitted, notwithstanding his guilt. He was accused again in 52, under Pompey's new law against ambitus, and was condemned. He married Mucia, who had been previously the wife of Pompey, and by her he had one son (No. 4).—3. Younger son of No. 1, fought under the proconsul, Q. Catulus, against the Cimbri at the Athesis, and, having fled from the field, was indignantly commanded by his father not to come into his presence, whereupon the youth put an end to his life.—4. M., son of No. 2, and Mucia, the former wife of Pompey the triumvir, and consequently the half-brother of Sextus Pompey. He accompanied the latter into Asia after the defeat of his fleet in Sicily, but betrayed him into the hands of the generals of M. Antonius in 35. After the battle of Actium he fell into the power of Octavianus, and escaped death, to which he had been sentenced, only through the intercession of his mother, Mucia.—5. MAMERCUS, son of No. 4, was a distinguished orator and poet, but of a dissolute character. He was a member of the senate at the time of the accession of Tiberius, A.D. 14, when he offended this suspicious emperor by some remarks which he made in the senate. Being accused of majestas in 34, he put an end to his own life.

SCAURUS, M. AURÆLIUS, consul suffectus B.C. 108, was three years afterward consular legate in Gaul, where he was defeated by the Cimbri, taken prisoner, and put to death.

SCAURUS, Q. TERENTIUS, a celebrated grammarian who flourished under the Emperor Hadrian, and whose son was one of the preceptors of the Emperor Verus. He was the author of an Ars Grammatica, and of commentaries upon Plantus, Virgil, and the Ars Poëtica of Horace, which are known to us from a few scattered notices only, for the tract entitled Q. Terentii Scauri de Orthographia ad Theopum included in the "Grammaticæ Latinæ Auctores Antiqui" of Putschius (Hannov., 1605), is not believed to be a genuine production of this Scaurus.

SCELERATUS CAMPUS. Vid. ROMA, p. 748, a.

SCENÆ (Σκηναί, i. e., the tents), a town of Mesopotamia, on the borders of Babylonia, on a canal of the Euphrates, twenty-five days' journey below Zeugma. It belonged to the SCENITÆ, and was evidently only a collection of tents or huts.

SCENITÆ (Σκηνίται, i. e., dwellers in tents), the general name used by the Greeks for the Bedawee (Bedouin) tribes of Arabia Deserta. It was also applied to nomad tribes in Africa, who likewise lived in tents.

SCEPSIS (Σκῆψις: now probably ruins at Esiki-Upsi or Esiki-Shupshe), an ancient city in the interior of the Troad, southeast of Alexandria, in the mountains of Ida. Its inhabitants were removed by Antigonus to Alexandria; but, being permitted by Lysimachus to return to their homes, they built a new city, called ἡ νέα κώμη, and the remains of the old town were then called Παλαισκῆψις. Scepsis is celebrated in literary history as the place where certain MSS. of Aristotle and Theophrastus were buried, to prevent their transference to Pergainus. When dug up again, they were found nearly destroyed by mould and worms, and in this condition they were removed by Sulla to Athens. The philo-opher Metrodorus and the grammarian Demetrius were natives of Scepsis.

SCERDILAIIDAS or SCERDILÆDUS (Σκερδίλαιδας or Σκερδίλαιδος), king of Illyria, was in all probability a son of Pleuratus, and younger brother of Agion, both of them kings of that country. After the defeat and abdication of Teuta (B.C. 229), he probably succeeded to a portion of her dominions, but did not assume the title of king till after the death of his nephew Pinnes. He carried on war for some years against Philip, king of Macedonia, and thus appears as an ally of the Romans. He probably died about 205, and was succeeded by his son Pleuratus.

[SCHEDIA (Σχέδια), a large village of Lower Egypt, on the great canal which united Alexandria with the Canobic mouth of the Nile, four schœni from Alexandria, was the station of the splendid galleys in which the prefects visited the upper districts.]

SCĒDĪVS (Σχέδιος). 1. Son of Iphitus and Hippolyte, commanded the Phocians in the war against Troy, along with his brother Epistrophus. He was slain by Hector, and his remains were carried from Troy to Anticyra in Phocis.—2. Son of Perimedes, likewise a Phocian who was killed at Troy by Hector.

SCĒRA (Scherinus), a town in the interior of Sicily, in the southwest part of the island.

SCHĒRA. Vid. ΠΗΛΑΓΕΣ.

[SCĒRIA (Via, ἡ σχιστῆ ὁδός, now Zimeno or Zemino), a road leading from Delphi over a declivity of Parnassus to Daulis, and still further northward, deriving its name from the fact that it began in a mountain gorge, and then, two geographical miles east of Delphi, at a place called Τρεῖς κέλευθοι, divided itself into two roads, one to the northeast toward Daulis, the other to the southeast toward Lebadea or Helicon. At the point where the three roads met was erected the tumulus to commemorate the murder of Laius by Œdipus, which was said to have occurred there.]

SCĒVENS (Σχοῖνος; Σχοινιεύς), a town of Bœotia, on a river of the same name, and on the road from Thebes to Anthedon.

SCĒVĒVS (Σχοινεύς, -οῦντος). 1. A harbor of Corinth, north of Cenchrææ, at the narrowest part of the isthmus.—2. A place in the interior of Arcadia, near Methydrium.

SCĪATHVS (Σκιάθος; Σκιάθιος; now Skiatho), a small island in the Ægean Sea, north of Eubœa and east of the Magnesian coast of Thessaly, with a town of the same name upon it. It is said to have been originally colonized by Pelasgians from Thrace. It is frequently mentioned in the history of the invasion of Greece by Xerxes, since the Persian and Grecian fleets were stationed near its coasts. It subsequently became one of the subject allies of Athens, but attained such little prosperity that it only had to pay the small tribute of two hundred drachmæ yearly. Its chief town was destroyed by the last Philip of Macedonia. At a later time it was restored by Antonius to the Athenians. Sciathus produced good wine.

SCĪDRVS (Σκίδρος), a place in the south of Italy, of uncertain site, in which some of the Sybarites settled after the destruction of their own city.

SCĪLLŪS (Σκιλλοῦς, -οῦντος; Σκιλλοῦντος, 50

Σκιλλοῦσιος), a town of Elis, in the district Triphylia, on the River Selinus, twenty stadia south of Olympia. It was destroyed by the Eleans in the war which they carried on against the Pisæans, whose cause had been espoused by the inhabitants of Scillus. The Lacedæmonians subsequently took possession of the territory of Scillus; and, although the Eleans still laid claim to it, they gave it to Xenophon after his banishment from Athens. Xenophon resided at this place during the remainder of his life, and erected here a sanctuary to Diana (Artemis), which he had vowed during the retreat of the Ten Thousand.

SCĪNOMÆVS, a small place in the southeastern part of Gallia Transpadana, in the kingdom of Cottius, west of Segusio, at the pass across the Alps.

SCĪŌNE (Σκίωνη; Σκιωναῖος, Σκιωνεύς), the chief town in the Macedonian peninsula of Palæne, on the western coast. It is said to have been founded by some Pelægians of Achaia, who settled here after their return from Troy. It revolted from the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war, but was retaken by Cleon; whereupon all the men were put to death, the women and children sold as slaves, and the town given to the Platæans.

SCĪPIO, the name of an illustrious patrician family of the Cornelia gens. This name, which signifies a stick or staff, is said to have been given to the founder of the family, because he served as a staff in directing his blind father. This family produced some of the greatest men in Rome, and to them she was more indebted than to any others for the empire of the world. The family tomb of the Scipios was discovered in 1780, on the left of the Appia Via, about four hundred paces within the modern Porta S. Sebastiano. The inscriptions and other curiosities are now deposited in the Museo Pio-Clementino at Rome. 1. P. CORNELIUS SCĪPIO, magister equitum B.C. 396, and consular tribune 395 and 394.—2. L. CORN. SCĪPIO, consul 350.—3. P. CORN. SCĪPIO BARBATVS, consul 328, and dictator 306. He was also pontifex maximus.—4. L. CORN. SCĪPIO BARBATVS, consul 298, when he carried on war against the Etruscans, and defeated them near Volaterræ. He also served under the consuls in 297, 295, and 293, against the Samnites. This Scipio was the great-grandfather of the conqueror of Hannibal. The genealogy of the family can be traced with more certainty from this time.—5. CN. CORN. SCĪPIO ASINA, son of No. 4, was consul 260, in the first Punic war. In an attempt upon the Liparæan islands, he was taken prisoner with seventeen ships. He probably recovered his liberty when Regulus invaded Africa, for he was consul a second time in 254. In this year he and his colleague, A. Atilius Calatinus, crossed over into Sicily and took the town of Panormus.—6. L. CORN. SCĪPIO, also son of No. 4, was consul 259. He drove the Carthaginians out of Sardinia and Corsica, defeating Hanno, the Carthaginian commander. He was censor in 258.—7. P. CORN. SCĪPIO ASINA, son of No. 5, was consul 221, and carried on war, with his colleague M. Minucius Rufus, against the Istri, who were subdued by the consuls. He is mentioned again in 211, when he recommended that the senate should recall all the generals and armies from Italy for the defence of the capital, because Hannibal was marching upon the city.—8. P. CORN. SCIPIO, son of No. 6, was consul, with Ti. Sempronius Longus, in 218, the first year of the second Punic war. He sailed with an army to Gaul, in order to encounter Hannibal before crossing the Alps; but, finding that Hannibal had crossed the Rhone, and had got the start of him by a three days' march, he resolved to sail back to Italy and await Hannibal's arrival in Cisalpine Gaul. But as the Romans had an army of twenty-five thousand men in Cisalpine Gaul, under the command of two prætors, Scipio sent into Spain the army which he had brought with him, under the command of his brother Cn. Scipio. On his return to Italy, Scipio took the command of the army in Cisalpine Gaul, and hastened to meet Hannibal. An engagement took place between the cavalry and light-armed troops of the two armies. The Romans were defeated; the consul himself received a severe wound, and was only saved from death by the courage of his young son Publius, the future conqueror of Hannibal. Scipio now retreated across the Ticinus, crossed the Po also, first took up his quarters at Placentia, and subsequently withdrew to the hills on the left bank of the Trebia, where he was joined by the other consul, Sempronius Longus. The latter resolved upon a battle, in opposition to the advice of his colleague. The result was the complete defeat of the Roman army, which was obliged to take refuge within the walls of Placentia. In the following year, 217, Scipio, whose imperium had been prolonged, crossed over into Spain. He and his brother Cneius continued in Spain till their death in 211; but the history of their campaigns, though important in their results, is full of confusions and contradictions. They gained several victories over the enemy, and they felt themselves so strong by the beginning of 212, that they resolved to cross the Iberus, and to make a vigorous effort to drive the Carthaginians out of Spain. They accordingly divided their forces, but they were defeated and slain in battle by the Carthaginians.—9. Cn. CORN. SCIPIO CALVUS, son of No. 6, and brother of No. 8, was consul 222, with M. Claudius Marcellus. In conjunction with his colleague, he carried on war against the Insularians. In 218 he carried on war as the legate of his brother Publius for eight years in Spain, as has been related above.—10. P. CORN. SCIPIO AFRICANUS MAJOR, son of No. 8, was born in 234. He was unquestionably one of the greatest men of Rome, and he acquired at an early age the confidence and admiration of his countrymen. His enthusiastic mind led him to believe that he was a special favorite of the gods, and he never engaged in any public or private business without first going to the Capitol, where he sat some time alone, enjoying communication from the gods. For all he proposed or executed, he alleged the divine approval; and the Roman people gave credit to his assertions, and regarded him as a being almost superior to the common race of men. There can be no doubt that Scipio believed himself in the divine revelations, which he asserted to have been vouchsafed to him, and the extraordinary success which attended all his enterprises must have deepened this belief. He is first mentioned in 218 at the battle of the Ticinus, when he saved the life of his father, as has been already related. He fought at Cannæ two years afterward (216), when he was already a tribune of the soldiers, and was one of the few Roman officers who survived that fatal day. He was chosen, along with Appius Claudius, to command the remains of the army, which had taken refuge at Canusium; and it was owing to his youthful heroism and presence of mind that the Roman nobles, who had thought of leaving Italy in despair, were prevented from carrying their rash project into effect. He had already gained the favor of the people to such an extent that he was elected ædile in 212, although he had not yet reached the legal age. In 210, after the death of his father and uncle in Spain, the Romans resolved to increase their army in that country, and to place it under the command of a proconsul. But when the people assembled to elect a proconsul, none of the generals of experience ventured to sue for so dangerous a command. At length Scipio, who was then barely twenty-four, offered himself as a candidate, and was chosen with enthusiasm to take the command. His success in Spain was striking and rapid. In the first campaign (210) he took the important city of Carthago Nova, and in the course of the next three years he drove the Carthaginians entirely out of Spain, and became master of that country. He returned to Rome in 206, and was elected consul for the following year (205), although he had not yet filled the office of prætor, and was only thirty years of age. He was anxious to cross over at once to Africa, and bring the contest to an end at the gates of Carthage; but the oldest members of the senate, and among them Q. Fabius Maximus, opposed his project, partly through timidity and partly through jealousy of the youthful conqueror. All that Scipio could obtain was the province of Sicily, with permission to cross over to Africa; but the senate refused him an army, thus making the permission of no practical use. But the allies had a truer view of the interests of Italy than the Roman senate, and from all the towns of Italy volunteers flocked to join the standard of the youthful hero. The senate could not refuse to allow him to enlist volunteers; and such was the enthusiasm in his favor, that he was able to cross over to Sicily with an army and a fleet contrary to the expectations and even the wishes of the senate. After spending the winter in Sicily, and completing all his preparations for the invasion of Africa, he crossed over to the latter country in the course of the following year. Success again attended his arms. The Carthaginians and their ally Syphax were defeated with great slaughter, and the former were compelled to recall Hannibal from Italy as the only hope of saving their country. The long struggle between the two nations was at length brought to a close by the battle fought near the city of Zama on the 19th of October, 202, in which Scipio gained a decisive and brilliant victory over Hannibal. Carthage had no alternative but submission; but the final treaty was not concluded till the following year (201). Scipio returned to Italy in 201, and entered Rome in triumph. He was received with universal enthusiasm, and the surname of Africanus was conferred upon him. The people wished to make him consul and dictator for life, and to erect his statue in the comitia, the rostra, the curia, and even in the Capitol, but he prudently declined all these invidious distinctions. As he did not choose to usurp the supreme power, and as he was an object of suspicion and dislike to the majority of the senate, he took no prominent part in public affairs during the next few years. He was censor in 199 with P. Ælius Pæstus, and consul a second time in 194 with Ti. Sempronius Longus. In 193 he was one of the three commissioners who were sent to Africa to mediate between Masinissa and the Carthaginians; and in the same year he was one of the ambassadors sent to Antiochus at Ephesus, at whose court Hannibal was then residing. The tale runs that he had there an interview with the great Carthaginian, who declared him the greatest general that ever lived. The compliment was paid in a manner the most flattering to Scipio. The latter had asked, "Who was the greatest general?" "Alexander the Great," was Hannibal's reply. "Who was the second?" "Pyrrhus." "Who the third?" "Myself," replied the Carthaginian. "What would you have said, then, if you had conquered me?" asked Scipio, in astonishment. "I should then have placed myself before Alexander, before Pyrrhus, and before all other generals." In 190 Africanus served as legate under his brother Lucius in the war against Antiochus the Great. Shortly after his return, he and his brother Lucius were accused of having received bribes from Antiochus to let the monarch off too leniently, and of having appropriated to their own use part of the money which had been paid by Antiochus to the Roman state. The details of the accusation are related with such discrepancies by the ancient authorities, that it is impossible to determine with certainty the true history of the affair, or the year in which it occurred. It appears, however, that there were two distinct prosecutions, and the following is perhaps the most probable history of the transaction. In 187, two tribunes of the people of the name of Petillii, instigated by Cato and the other enemies of the Scipios, required L. Scipio to render an account of all the sums of money which he had received from Antiochus. L. Scipio accordingly prepared his accounts, but as he was in the act of delivering them up, the proud conqueror of Hannibal indignantly snatched them out of his hands and tore them up in pieces before the senate. But this haughty conduct appears to have produced an unfavorable impression, and his brother, when brought to trial in the course of the same year, was declared guilty, and sentenced to pay a heavy fine. The tribune C. Minucius Augurinus ordered him to be dragged to prison and there detained till the money was paid; whereupon Africanus rescued his brother from the hands of the tribune's officer. The contest would probably have been attended with fatal results had not Tib. Gracchus, the father of the celebrated tribune, and then tribune himself, had the prudence to release Lucius from the sentence of imprisonment. The successful issue of the prosecution of Lucius emboldened his enemies to bring the great Africanus himself before the people. His accuser was M. Nævius, the tribune of the people, and the accusation was brought in 185. When the trial came on, and Africanus was summoned, he proudly reminded the people that this was the anniversary of the day on which he had defeated Hannibal at Zama, and called upon them to follow him to the Capitol, in order there to return thanks to the immortal gods, and to pray that they would grant the Roman state other citizens like himself. Scipio struck a chord which vibrated on every heart, and was followed by crowds to the Capitol. Having thus set all the laws at defiance, Scipio immediately quitted Rome, and retired to his country seat at Liternum. The tribunes wished to renew the prosecution, but Gracchus wisely persuaded them to let it drop. Scipio never returned to Rome. He passed his remaining days in the cultivation of his estate at Liternum; and, at his death, is said to have requested that his body might be buried there, and not in his ungrateful country. The year of his death is equally uncertain, but he probably died in 183. Scipio married Æmilia, the daughter of L. Æmilius Paulus, who fell at the battle of Cannæ, and by her he had four children, two sons (Nos. 12, 13) and two daughters, the elder of whom married P. Scipio Nasica Corculum (No. 17), and the younger Tib. Gracchus, and thus became the mother of the two celebrated tribunes. Vid. CORNELIA. — 11. L. CORN. SCIPIO ASIATICUS, also called ASIAGENES or ASIAGENUS, was the son of No. 8, and the brother of the great Africanus. He served under his brother in Spain; was prætor in 193, when he obtained the province of Sicily; and consul in 190 with C. Lælius. The senate had not much confidence in his abilities, and it was only through the offer of his brother Africanus to accompany him as a legate that he obtained the province of Greece and the conduct of the war against Antiochus. He defeated Antiochus at Mount Sipylus in 190, entered Rome in triumph in the following year, and assumed the surname of Asiaticus. The history of his accusation and condemnation has been already related in the life of his brother. He was a candidate for the censorship in 184, but was defeated by the old enemy of his family, M. Porcius Cato, who deprived Asiaticus of his horse at the review of the equites. It appears, therefore, that even as late as this time an eques did not forfeit his horse by becoming a senator. — 12. P. CORN. SCIPIO AFRICANUS, elder son of the great Africanus, was prevented by his weak health from taking any part in public affairs. Cicero praises his oratorical and his Greek history, and remarks that, with the greatness of his father's mind, he possessed a larger amount of learning. He had no son of his own, but adopted the son of L. Æmilius Paulus (vid. below, No. 15). — 13. L. OR CN. CORN. SCIPIO AFRICANUS, younger son of the great Africanus. He accompanied his father into Asia in 190, and was taken prisoner by Antiochus. This Scipio was a degenerate son of an illustrious sire, and only obtained the prætorship in 174 through Cicereius, who had been a scribe of his father giving way to him. In the same year he was expelled from the senate by the censors.—14. L. CORN. SCIPIO ASIATICUS, a descendant of No. 11, belonged to the Marian party, and was consul 83 with C. Norbanus. In this year Sulla returned to Italy: Scipio was deserted by his troops, and taken prisoner in his camp along with his son Lucius, but was dismissed by Sulla uninjured. He was, however, included in the proscription in the following year (82), whereupon he fled to Massilia, and passed there the remainder of his life. His daughter was married to P. Sestius.—15. P. CORN. SCIPIO ÆMILIANUS AFRICANUS MINOR, was the younger son of L. Æmilius Paulus, the conqueror of Macedonia, and was adopted by P. Scipio (No. 12), the son of the conqueror of Hannibal. He was born about 185. In his seventeenth year he accompanied his father Paulus to Greece, and fought under him at the battle of Pydna, 168. Scipio devoted himself with ardor to the study of literature, and formed an intimate friendship with Polybius when the latter came to Rome along with the other Achæan hostages in 167. Vid. Polybius. At a later period he also cultivated the acquaintance of the philosopher Panaetius, and he likewise admitted the poets Lucilius and Terence to his intimacy, and is said to have assisted the latter in the composition of his comedies. His friendship with Lælius, whose tastes and pursuits were so congenial to his own, has been immortalized by Cicero's celebrated treatise entitled "Lælius sive de Amicitia." Although thus devoted to the study of polite literature, Scipio is said to have cultivated the virtues which distinguished the older Romans, and to have made Cato the model of his conduct. If we may believe his panegyrists, he possessed all the simple virtues of an old Roman, mellowed by the refining influences of Greek civilization. Scipio first served in Spain with great distinction as military tribune under the consul L. Lucullus in 151. On the breaking out of the third Punic war in 149, he accompanied the Roman army to Africa, again with the rank of military tribune. Here he gained still more renown. By his personal bravery and military skill he repaired, to a great extent, the mistakes of the consul Manilius, whose army on one occasion he saved from destruction. He returned to Rome in 148, and had already gained such popularity, that when he became a candidate for the ædileship for the following year (147), he was elected consul, although he was only thirty-seven, and had not, therefore, attained the legal age. The senate assigned to him Africa as his province, to which he forthwith sailed, accompanied by his friends Polybius and Lælius. He prosecuted the siege of Carthage with the utmost vigor. The Carthaginians defended themselves with the courage of despair, and the Romans were unable to force their way into the city till the spring of the following year (146). The inhabitants fought from street to street, and from house to house, and the work of destruction and butchery went on for days. The fate of this once magnificent city moved Scipio to tears, and, anticipating that a similar catastrophe might one day befall Rome, he repeated the lines of the Iliad (vi., 448-9), in which Hector bewails the approaching fall of Troy. After reducing Africa to the form of a Roman province, Scipio returned to Rome in the same year, and celebrated a splendid triumph on account of his victory. The surname of Africanus, which he had inherited by adoption from the conqueror of Hannibal, had been now acquired by him by his own exploits. In 142 Scipio was censor, and in the administration of the duties of his office he attempted to repress the growing luxury and immorality of his contemporaries. His efforts, however, were thwarted by his colleague Mummius, who had himself acquired a love for Greek and Asiatic luxuries. In 139 Scipio was accused by Ti. Claudius Asellus of majestas. Asellus attacked him out of private animosity, because he had been deprived of his horse, and reduced to the condition of an ærarian by Scipio in his censorship. Scipio was acquitted, and the speeches which he delivered on the occasion obtained great celebrity, and were held in high esteem in a later age. It appears to have been after this event that Scipio was sent on an embassy to Egypt and Asia to attend to the Roman interests in those countries. The long continuance of the war in Spain again called Scipio to the consulship. He was appointed consul in his absence, and had the province of Spain assigned to him in 134. His operations were attended with success; and in 133 he brought the war to a conclusion by the capture of the city of Numantia after a long siege. He now received the surname of Numantinus in addition to that of Africanus. During his absence in Spain Tiberius Gracchus had been put to death. Scipio was married to Sempronia, the sister of the fallen tribune, but he had no sympathy with his reforms, and no sorrow for his fate. Upon his return to Rome in 132, he did not disguise his sentiments, and when asked in the assembly of the tribes by C. Papirius Carbo, the tribune, what he thought of the death of Tiberius Gracchus, he boldly replied that he was justly slain (jure casum). The people loudly expressed their disapprobation; whereupon Scipio proudly bade them to be silent. He now took the lead in opposing the popular party, and endeavored to prevent the agrarian law of Tiberius Gracchus from being carried into effect. In order to accomplish this object, he proposed in the senate (129) that all disputes respecting the lands of the allies should be taken out of the hands of the commissioners appointed under the law of Tiberius Gracchus, and should be committed to other persons. This would have been equivalent to an abrogation of the law; and accordingly, Fulvius Flaccus, Papirius Carbo, and C. Gracchus, the three commissioners, offered the most vehement opposition to his proposal. In the forum he was accused by Carbo with the bitterest invectives as the enemy of the people, and upon his again expressing his approval of the death of Tiberius Gracchus, the people shouted out, "Down with the tyrant." In the evening he went home with the intention of composing a speech for the following day; but next day he was found dead in his room. The most contradictory rumors were circulated respecting his death, but it was generally believed that he was murdered. Suspicion fell upon various persons; his wife Sempronia and ner mother Cornelia were suspected by some; Carbo, Fulvius, and C. Gracchus by others. Of all these, Carbo was most generally believed to have been guilty, and is expressly mentioned as the murderer by Cicero. The general opinion entertained by the Romans of a subsequent age respecting Scipio is given by Cicero in his work on the Republic, in which Scipio is introduced as the principal speaker.—16. P. CORN. SCIPIO NASICA, that is, "Scipio with the pointed nose," was the son of Cn. Scipio Calvus, who fell in Spain in 211. (Vid. No. 9). He is first mentioned in 204 as a young man who was judged by the senate to be the best citizen in the state, and was therefore sent to Ostia along with the Roman matrons to receive the statue of the Idæan Mother, which had been brought from Pessinus. He was curule ædile 196; prætor in 194, when he fought with success in Further Spain; and consul 191, when he defeated the Boii, and triumphed over them on his return to Rome. Scipio Nasica was a celebrated jurist, and a house was given him by the state in the Via Sacra, in order that he might be more easily consulted.—17. P. CORN. SCIPIO NASICA CORCULUM, son of No. 16, inherited from his father a love of jurisprudence, and became so celebrated for his discernment and for his knowledge of the pontifical and civil law, that he received the surname of Corculum. He married a daughter of Scipio Africanus the elder. He was consul for the first time 162, but abdicated, together with his colleague, almost immediately after they had entered upon their office, on account of some fault in the auspices. He was censor 159 with M. Popilius Lænas, and was consul a second time in 155, when he subdued the Dalmatians. He was a firm upholder of the old Roman habits and manners, and in his second consulship he induced the senate to order the demolition of a theatre, which was near completion, as injurious to public morals. When Cato repeatedly expressed his desire for the destruction of Carthage, Scipio, on the other hand, declared that he wished for its preservation, since the existence of such a rival would prove a useful check upon the licentiousness of the multitude. He was elected pontifex maximus in 150.—18. P. CORN. SCIPIO NASICA SERAPIO, son of No. 17, is chiefly known as the leader of the senate in the murder of Tiberius Gracchus. He was consul in 133, and in consequence of the severity with which he and his colleague conducted the levy of troops, they were thrown into prison by C. Curiatius, the tribune of the plebs. It was this Curiatius who gave Nasica the nickname of Serapio, from his resemblance to a person of low rank of this name; but, though given him in derision, it afterward became his distinguishing surname. In 133, when the tribes met to re-elect Tiberius Gracchus to the tribunate, and the utmost confusion prevailed in the Forum, Nasica called upon the consuls to save the republic; but as they refused to have recourse to violence, he exclaimed, "As the consul betrays the state, do you who wish to obey the laws follow me;" and, so saying, he rushed forth from the temple of Fides, where the senate was sitting, followed by the greater number of the senators. The people gave way before them, and Gracchus was assassinated as he attempted to escape. In consequence of his conduct on this occasion, Nasica became an object of such detestation to the people, that the senate found it advisable to send him on a pretended mission to Asia, although he was pontifex maximus, and ought not, therefore, to have quitted Italy. He did not venture to return to Rome, and after wandering about from place to place, died soon afterward at Pergamum.—19. P. CORN. SCIPIO NASICA, son of No. 18, was consul 111, and died during his consulship.—20. P. CORN. SCIPIO NASICA, son of No. 19, prætor 94, is mentioned by Cicero as one of the advocates of Sextus Roscius of Ameria. He married Licinia, the second daughter of L. Crassus, the orator. He had two sons, both of whom were adopted, one by his maternal grandfather L. Crassus in his testament, and is therefore called L. Licinius Crassus Scipio, and the other by Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius, consul 80, and is therefore called Q. Cæcilius Metellus Pius Scipio. This Scipio became the father-in-law of Cn. Pompey the triumvir, and fell in Africa in 46. His life is given under METELLUS, No. 15.—21. Cn. CORN. SCIPIO HISPALLUS, son of L. Scipio, who is only known as a brother of the two Scipios who fell in Spain. Hispallus was prætor 179, and consul 171.—22. Cn. CORN. SCIPIO HISPALLUS, son of No. 21, was prætor 139, when he published an edict that all Chaldeans (i. e., astrologers) should leave Rome and Italy within ten days.

[SCIRADIUM (Σκίραδιον), a promontory of Salamis, on the north side of the island, with a temple of Minerva (Athena) Sciras.]

SCIRAS or SCLĒRIAS (Σκίρας, Σκληρίας), of Tarentum, was one of the followers of Rhinthon in that peculiar sort of comedy, or rather burlesque tragedy, which was cultivated by the Dorians of Magna Græcia, and especially at Tarentum. Vid. RHINTHON.

SCIRAS (Σκίρας), a surname of Minerva (Athena), under which she had a temple in the Attic port of Phalerum, and in the island of Salamis. The foundation of the temple at Phalerum is ascribed by Pausanias to a soothsayer, Scirus of Dodona, who is said to have come to Attica at the time when the Eleusinians were at war with Erechtheus.

SCIRĪTIS (Σκίριτις), a wild and mountainous district in the north of Laconia, on the borders of Arcadia, with a town called Scirus (Σκίρος), which originally belonged to Arcadia. Its inhabitants, the SCIRĪTÆ (Σκίριται), formed a special division of the Lacedæmonian army. This body, which, in the time of the Peloponnesian war, was six hundred in number, was stationed in battle at the extreme left of the line, formed on march the vanguard, and was usually employed on the most dangerous kinds of service.

SCIRON (Σκίρων or Σκείρων), a famous robber who infested the frontier between Attica and Megaris. He not only robbed the travellers who passed through the country, but compelled them, on the Seironian rock, to wash his feet, and kicked them into the sea while they were thus employed. At the foot of the rock there was a tortoise which devoured the bodies of the robber's victims. He was slain by Theseus.

SCIRŌNĪA SAXA (Σκίρωνίδες πέτραι, also Σκίραδες: now Dereeni Bouno), large rocks on the eastern coast of Megaris, between which and the sea there was only a narrow dangerous pass, called the Scironian road (ἡ Σκιρώνη or Σκιρωνίς ὁδός: now Kaki Skala). This road was afterward enlarged by the Emperor Hadrian. The name of the rocks was derived from the celebrated robber Sciron.

SCIRRI or SCIRI, a people in European Sarmatia, on the northern coast, immediately east of the Vistula, in the modern Curland and Samogitien. The Seiri afterward joined the Huns; and to this people belonged Odoacer, the conqueror of Italy.

SCIRTŌNIUM (Σκιρτώνιον), a town in the south of Areadia, belonging to the district Ægyptis, the inhabitants of which removed to Megalopolis upon the foundation of the latter.

SCIRTUS (Σκίρτος: now Jillab), a river in Mesopotamia, flowing past Edessa into a small lake near Charræ. Its name, which signifies leaping, was derived from its rapid descent in a series of small cascades.

[SCIRUS (Σκίρος, ὁ). 1. A soothsayer of Dodona. Vid. SCIRAS.—2. (Σκίρος, ἡ), a town of Laconia. Vid. SCIRITIS.—3. (Σκίρος, ὁ), a brook near Seirum, which traversed the sacred road northwest of Athens, and watered the gardens north of Dipylon.]

SCODRA (Scodrensis: now Scodar or Scutari), one of the most important towns in Illyricum, on the left bank of the River Barbana, at the southeastern corner of the Laeus Labeatis, and about seventeen miles from the coast. It was strongly fortified, and was the residence of the Illyrian king Gentius. It subsequently contained many Roman inhabitants.

SCODRUS. Vid. SCARDUS.

SCEDĪSES, SCYDISSES, or SCORDISCUS (Σκοιδίσης, Σκυδίσης, Σκορδίσκος: now Dassim Dagh, or Chambu-Bel Dagh), a mountain in the north-east of Asia Minor, dividing Pontus Cappadocius from Armenia Minor, and forming a part of the same range as Mount Parayades.

SOOLLIS (Σκόλλις: now Sandameri), a rocky mountain between Elis and Achaia, three thousand three hundred and thirty-three feet high, which joins on the east the mountain Iampæa.

SCŌLŌTI (Σκόλοτοι), the native name of the Scythians, according to Herodotus, is in all probability the Greek form of Slave-nie or Slove-nie, the generic name of the Slavonian race. Vid. SCYTHIA. The later Greek writers call them Σκλαβηνοί.

SCŌLUS (Σκόλος: Σκόλιος, Σκωλιεύς). 1. An ancient town in Bœotia, on the road from Thebes to Aphidnæ in Attica, was situated on the northern slope of Mount Cithæron, and forty stadia south of the River Asopus.—2. A small place in Macedonia, near Olynthus.

SCOMBRARĪA (now Islote), an island in front of the bay, on the southeast coast of Spain, which formed the harbor of Carthago Nova. It received its name from the *scombr*i or mackerel taken off its coast, from which the Romans prepared their garum.

SCŌMIUS MONS (τὸ Σκόμιον ὄρος), a mountain in Macedonia, which runs east of Mount Scardus, in the direction of north to south toward Mount Hæmus.

SCŌPAS (Σκόπας). 1. An Ætolian, who held a leading position among his countrymen at the period of the outbreak of the war with Philip and the Achæans, B.C. 220. He commanded the Ætolian army in the first year of the war; and he is mentioned again as general of the Ætolians, when the latter people concluded an Alliance with the Romans to assist them against Philip (211). After the close of the war with Philip, Scopas and Dorimachus were appointed to reform the Ætolian constitution (204). Scopas had only undertaken the charge from motives of personal ambition; on finding himself disappointed in this object, he withdrew to Alexandria. Here he was received with the utmost favor by the ministers of the young king, Ptolemy V., and appointed to the chief command of the army against Antiochus the Great. At first he was successful, but was afterward defeated by Antiochus at Panium, and reduced to shut himself up within the walls of Sidon, where he was ultimately compelled by famine to surrender. Notwithstanding this ill success, he continued in high favor at the Egyptian court; but, having formed a plot in 196 to obtain by force the chief administration of the kingdom, he was arrested and put to death.—2. A distinguished sculptor, was a native of Paros, and appears to have belonged to a family of artists in that island. He flourished from B.C. 395 to 350. He was probably somewhat older than Praxiteles, with whom he stands at the head of that second period of perfected art which is called the later Attic school (in contradistinction to the earlier Attic school of Phidias), and which arose at Athens after the Peloponnesian war. Scopas was an architect and a statuary as well as a sculptor. He was the architect of the temple of Minerva (Athena) Alea at Tegea, in Arcadia, which was commenced soon after B.C. 394. He was one of the artists employed in executing the bas-reliefs which decorated the frieze of the Mausoleum at Halicarnassus in Caria. A portion of these bas-reliefs is now deposited in the British Museum. Among the single statues and groups of Scopas, the best known in modern times is his group of figures representing the destruction of the sons and daughters of Niobe. In Pliny's time the statues stood in the temple of Apollo Sosianus. The remaining statues of this group, or copies of them, are all in the Florence Gallery, with the exception of the so-called Ilioneus at Munich, which some suppose to have belonged to the group. There is a head of Niobe in the collection of Lord Yarborough which has some claim to be considered as the original. But the most esteemed of all the works of Scopas, in antiquity, was his group which stood in the shrine of Cn. Domitius in the Flaminian circus, representing Achilles conducted to the island of Leuce by the divinities of the sea. It consisted of figures of Neptune (Poseidon), Thetis, and Achilles, surrounded by Nereids, and attended by Tritons, and by an assemblage of sea monsters.

SCŌPAS (Σκόπας: now Aladan), a river of Galatia, falling into the Sangarius, from the east, at Juliopolis.

SCORDISCI, a people in Pannonia Superior, are sometimes classed among the Illyrians, but were the remains of an ancient and powerful Ἐλτιε τῆρε. They dwelt between the Savus and Dravus.

SCORDISCUS. Vid. SCÆDISIS.

SCOTI, a people mentioned, together with the PICTI, by the later Roman writers as one of the chief tribes of the ancient Caledonians. They dwelt in the south of Scotland and in Ireland; and from them the former country has derived its name.

SCOTITAS (Σκοτίτας), a woody district in the north of Laconia, on the frontiers of Tegeatis.

SCOTUSSA (Σκότουσσα: Σκοτουσσαῖος), a very ancient town of Thessaly, in the district Pelasgias, near the source of the Onchestus, and not far from the hills Cynoscephalæ, where Flamininus gained his celebrated victory over Philip, B.C. 197.

SCRIBŌNĪA, wife of Octavianus, afterward the Emperor Augustus, had been married twice before. By one of her former husbands, P. Scipio, she had two children, P. Scipio, who was consul B.C. 16, and a daughter, Cornelia, who was married to Paulus Æmilius, censor B.C. 22. Scribonia was the sister of L. Scribonius Libo, who was the father-in-law of Sextus Pompey. Augustus married her in 40, on the advice of Mæcenas, because he was then afraid that Sextus Pompey would form an alliance with Antony to crush him; but, having renewed his alliance with Antony, Octavianus divorced her, in order to marry Livia, in the following year (39), on the very day on which she had borne him a daughter, Julia. Scribonia long survived her separation from Octavianus. In A.D. 2 she accompanied, of her own accord, her daughter Julia into exile, to the island of Pandataria.

SCYLĀCE (Σκυλάκη), or SCYLACEION, an ancient city on the coast of Mysia Minor, at the foot of Mount Olympus, said to have been founded by the Pelasgians.

SCYLACĪUM, also SCYLACĒUM or SCYLLĒTĪUM (Σκυλάκιον, Σκυλακτιον, Σκυλλήτιον: now Squillace), a Greek town on the eastern coast of Bruttium, was situated on two adjoining hills at a short distance from the coast, between the rivers Cæcinus and Carcines. It is said to have been founded by the Athenians. It belonged to the territory of Croton, but was subsequently given by the elder Dionysius to the Locrians, and came eventually into the possession of the Romans. It had no harbor, whence Virgil (Æn., iii., 553) speaks of it as parifragum Scylaceum. From this town the SCYLACIUS or SCYLLĒTICUS SINUS (Σκυλλητικὸς κόλπος) derived its name. The isthmus which separated this bay from the Sinus Hipponiatis, on the western coast of

SCYLAX (Σκύλαξ). 1. Of Caryanda in Caria, was sent by Darius Hystaspis on a voyage of discovery down the Indus. Setting out from the city of Caspatyrus and the Pactyric district, Scylax reached the sea, and then sailed west through the Indian Ocean to the Red Sea, performing the whole voyage in thirty months.—2. Of Halicarnassus, a friend of Panætius, distinguished for his knowledge of the stars, and for his political influence in his own state. There is still extant a Periplus, containing a brief description of certain countries in Europe, Asia, and Africa, and bearing the name of Scylax of Caryanda. This work has been ascribed by some writers to the Scylax mentioned by Herodotus, and by others to the contemporary of Panætius and Polybius; but most modern scholars suppose the writer to have lived in the first half of the reign of Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, about B.C. 350. It is clear from internal evidence that the Periplus must have been composed after the time of Herodotus; while, from its omitting to mention any of the cities founded by Alexander, such as Alexandria in Egypt, we may conclude that it was drawn up before the reign of Alexander. It is probable that the author prefixed to his work the name of Scylax of Caryanda on account of the celebrity of this navigator. This Periplus is printed by Hudson, in his Geographi Græci Minores, and by Klansen, attached to his fragments of Hecætæus, Berlin, 1831.

SCYLAX (Σκύλαξ: now Choterlek-Irmak), a river in the southwest of Pontus, falling into the Iris, between Amasia and Gazura.

SCYLITZES or SCYLITZA, JOANNES, a Byzantine historian, surnamed, from his office, Curapalates, flourished A.D. 1081. His work extends from the death of Nicephorus I. (811) down to the reign of Nicephorus Botaniotes (1078–1081). The portion of the history of Cedrenus, which extends from the death of Nicephorus I. (811) to the close of the work (1057), is found almost verbatim in the history of Scylitzes. Hence it has been supposed that Scylitzes copied from Cedrenus, and consequently the entire work of Scylitzes has not been published separately, but only the part extending from 1057 to 1080, which has been printed as an appendix to Cedrenus. Vid. CEDRENUS. It is now, however, generally admitted that Cedrenus copied from Scylitzes.

SCYLLA (Σκύλλα) and CHARYBDIS, the names of two rocks between Italy and Sicily, and only a short distance from one another. In the one of these rocks which was nearest to Italy, there was a cave, in which dwelt Scylla, a daughter of Crætæus, a fearful monster, barking like a dog, with twelve feet, and six long necks and heads, each of which contained three rows of sharp teeth. The opposite rock, which was much lower, contained an immense fig-tree, under which dwelt Charybdis, who thrice every day swallowed down the waters of the sea, and thrice threw them up again: both were formidable to the ships which had to pass between them. This is the Homeric account. Later traditions give different accounts of Scylla's parentage. Some describe her as a monster with six heads of different animals, or with only three heads. One tradition relates that Scylla was originally a beautiful maiden, who often played with the nymphs of the sea, and was beloved by the marine god Glaucus. The latter applied to Circe for means to make Scylla return his love; but Circe, jealous of the fair maiden, threw magic herbs into the well in which Scylla was wont to bathe, by means of which the lower part of her body was changed into the tail of a fish or serpent, surrounded by dogs, while the upper part remained that of a woman. Another tradition related that Scylla was beloved by Neptune (Poseidon), and that Amphitrite, from jealousy, metamorphosed her into a monster. Hercules is said to have killed her because she stole some of the oxen of Gerion; but Phorcys is said to have restored her to life. Virgil (Æn., vi., 286) speaks of several Scyllæ, and places them in the lower world. Charybdis is described as a daughter of Neptune (Poseidon) and Terrâ (Gæa), and a voracious woman, who stole oxen from Hercules, and was hurled by the thunderbolt of Jupiter (Zeus) into the sea.

SCYLLÆUM (Σκύλλαιον). 1. (Now Sciglio), a promontory on the coast of Bruttium, at the northern entrance to the Sicilian Straits, where the monster Scylla was supposed to live. Vid. SCYLLA.—2. (Now Scilla or Sciglio), a town in Bruttium, on the above-named promontory. There are still remains of the ancient citadel.—3. A promontory in Argolis, on the coast of Trœzen, forming, with the promontory of Sunium in Attica, the entrance to the Saronic Gulf. It is said to have derived its name from Scylla, the daughter of Nisus. Vid. NISUS.

[SCYLLIAS or SCYLLIS (Σκυλλίης (Ion.), Hdt.; Σκύλλης, Paus.), a celebrated diver of Scione in Macedonia. When the Persian fleet of Xerxes was wrecked off Mount Pelion and the Promontory of Sepias, much treasure was sunk with the vessels that were overtaken by the storm; Scyllias recovered much of this treasure for the Persians, and also obtained considerable for himself. Wishing to escape from the Persians, he is said to have swum under water from Aphetæ to Artemisium, where the Greek fleet lay, a distance of eighty stadia (nearly ten miles), and to have communicated to the Greeks the plans of the Persians. This is the account of Herodotus, who, in relating the story, ranks the latter part among the ψευδέσι εἰκελα περὶ τοῦ ἀνδρός τούτου. Pausanias relates that Scyllis (as he calls him) had his daughter Cyana (al. Hydna) taught swimming, and that they two, on occasion of the storm off Pelion, dove under water and tore up the anchors of the Persian fleet, thereby causing much loss to the Persians: for this exploit, the Amphictyons consecrated at Delphi statues of Scyllis and his daughter. The statue of Cyana (Hydna) was among those that were carried from Delphi to Rome by Nero.]

SCYMNUS (Σκύμνος), of Chios, wrote a Perie-

gesis, or description of the earth, which is referred to by later writers. This work was in prose, and consequently different from the Periegesis in Iambic metre which has come down to us, and which many modern writers have erroneously ascribed to Scymnus of Chios. The poem is dedicated to Nicomedes III., king of Bithynia, who died B.C. 74; but this is quite uncertain. The best edition of the poem is by Meineke, Berlin, 1846.

[SCYRAS (Σκύραξ: now River of Dhikova), a river in the southwest of Laconia, which rises in Mount Taygetus, flows in an easterly direction, and empties into the Laconicus Sinus south of Gythenm.]

SCYROS (Σκύρος: Σκύριος: now Scyro), an island in the Ægean Sea, east of Eubœa, and one of the Sporades. It contained a town of the same name, and a river called Cephissus. Its ancient inhabitants are said to have been Pelasgians, Carians, and Dolopians. The island is frequently mentioned in the stories of the mythical period. Here Thetis concealed her son Achilles in woman's attire among the daughters of Lycomedes, in order to save him from the fate which awaited him under the walls of Troy. It was here, also, that Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles by Deidamia, was brought up, and it was from this island that Ulysses fetched him to the Trojan war. According to another tradition, the island was conquered by Achilles, in order to revenge the death of Theseus, who is said to have been treacherously destroyed in Scyros by Lycomedes. The bones of Theseus were discovered by Cimon in Scyros, after his conquest of the island in B.C. 476, and were conveyed to Athens, where they were preserved in the Thesœum. From this time Scyros continued subject to Athens till the period of the Macedonian supremacy; but the Romans compelled the last Philip to restore it to Athens in 196. The soil of Scyros was unproductive; but it was celebrated for its breed of goats, and for its quarries of variegated marble.

SCYTHĪA (ἡ Σκυθική, ἡ Σκυθία, Ion. Σκυθίη, ἡ τῶν Σκυθῶν χώρα, Herod.: Σκύθης, Scythæ, Scythæ, pl. Σκύθαι, Scythæ; fem. Σκυθίς, Scythis, Scythissa), a name applied to very different countries at different times. The Scythia of Herodotus comprises, to speak generally, the southeastern parts of Europe, between the Carpathian Mountains and the River Tanais (now Don). The Greeks became acquainted with this country through their settlements on the Euxine; and Herodotus, who had himself visited the coasts of the Euxine, collected all the information he could obtain about the Scythians and their country, and embodied the results in a most interesting digression, which forms the first part of his fourth book. The details, for which there is not room in this article, must be read in Herodotus. He describes the country as a square of four thousand stadia (four hundred geographical miles) each way, the western boundary being the Ister (now Danube) and the mountains of the Agathyrsi; the southern, the shores of the Euxine and Palus Mæotis, from the mouth of the Ister to that of the Tanais, this side being divided into two equal parts, of two thousand stadia each, by the mouth of the Borysthenes (now Dnieper); the eastern boundary was the Tanaïs, and on the north Scythia was divided by deserts from the Melanchleni, Androphagi, and Budini. It corresponded to the southern part of Russia in Europe. The people who inhabited this region were called by the Greeks Σκύθαι, a word of doubtful origin, which first occurs in Hesiod; but, in their own language, Σκώλοροι, i. e., Slavonians. They were believed by Herodotus to be of Asiatic origin; and his account of them, taken in connection with the description given by Hippocrates of their physical peculiarities, leaves no doubt that they were a part of the great Mongol race, who have wandered, from unknown antiquity, over the steppes of Central Asia. Herodotus says further that they were driven out of their abodes in Asia, north of the Araxes, by the Massagætæ; and that, migrating into Europe, they drove out the Cimmerians. If this account be true, it can hardly but have some connection with the irruption of the Cimmerians into Asia Minor, in the reign of the Lydian king Ardys, about B.C. 640. The Scythians were a nomad people, that is, shepherds or herdsmen, who had no fixed habitations, but roamed over a vast tract of country at their pleasure, and according to the wants of their cattle. They lived in a kind of covered wagons, which Æschylus describes as "lofty houses of wicker-work, on well-wheeled chariots." They kept large troops of horses, and were most expert in cavalry exercises and archery; and hence, as the Persian king Darius found, when he invaded their country (B.C. 507), it was almost impossible for an invading army to act against them. They simply retreated, wagons and all, before the enemy, harassing him with their light cavalry, and leaving famine and exposure, in their bare steppes, to do the rest. Like all the Mongol race, they were divided into several hordes, the chief of whom were called the Royal Scythians; and to these all the rest owned some degree of allegiance. Their government was a sort of patriarchal monarchy or chieftainship. An important modification of their habits had, however, taken place, to a certain extent, before Herodotus described them. The fertility of the plains on the north of the Euxine, and the influence of the Greek settlements at the mouth of the Borysthenes and along the coast, had led the inhabitants of this part of Scythia to settle down as cultivators of the soil, and had brought them into commercial and other relations with the Greeks. Accordingly, Herodotus mentions two classes or hordes of Scythians who had thus abandoned their nomad life; first, on the west of the Borysthenes, two tribes of Hellenized Scythians, called Callipidæ and Alazonæ; then, beyond these, "the Scythians who are ploughers (Σκύθαι ἀροτῆρες), who do not grow their corn for food, but for sale;" these dwelt about the River Hypanis (now Boug), in the region now called the Ukraine, which is still, as it was to the Greeks, a great corn-exporting country. Again, on the east of the Borysthenes were "the Scythians who are nusandainen" (Σκύθαι γεωργοί), i. e., "who grew corn for their own consumption: these were called Borysthenitæ by the Greeks; their country extended three days' journey east of the Borysthenes to the River PANTICAPES. Beyond these, to the east, dwelt "the nomad Scythians (νομάδες Σκύθαι), who neither sow nor plough at all." Herodotus expressly states that the tribes east of the Borysthenes were not Scythian. Of the history of these Scythian tribes there is little to state, beyond the tradition already mentioned, that they migrated from Asia and expelled the Cimmerians; their invasion of Media, in the reign of Cyaxares, when they held the supremacy of Western Asia for twenty-eight years and the disastrous expedition of Darius into their country. In later times they were gradually overpowered by the neighboring people, especially the Sarmatians, who gave their name to the whole country. Vid. SARMATIA. Meanwhile, the conquests of Alexander and his successors in Central Asia had made the Greeks acquainted with tribes beyond the Oxus and the Jaxartes, who resembled the Scythians, and belonged, in fact, to the same great Mongol race, and to whom, accordingly, the same name was applied. Hence, in writers of the time of the Roman empire, the name of Scythia denotes the whole of Northern Asia, from the River Rha (now Volga) on the west, which divided it from Asiatic Sarmatia, to Serica on the east, extending to India on the south. It was divided by Mount Imaus into two parts, called respectively Scythia intra Imaum, i. e., on the north-western side of the range, and Scythia extra Imaum, on its southeastern side. Of the people of this region nothing was known except some names; but the absence of knowledge was supplied by some marvellous and not uninteresting fables.

SCYTHINI (Σκυθῖναι), a people on the western border of Armenia, through whose country the Greeks under Xenophon marched four days' journey. Their territory was bounded on the east by the River Harpasus, and on the west by the River Apsarus.

SCYTHINUS (Σκυθῖνος), of Teos, an iambic poet, turned into verse the great work of the philosopher Heraclitus, of which a considerable fragment is preserved by Stobæus.

SCYTHŌRŌLIS (Σκυθόρολις): in the Old Testament, Bethshean; ruins at Beisan), an important city of Palestine, in the southeast of Galilee, according to the usual division, but sometimes also reckoned to Samaria, sometimes to Decapolis, and sometimes to Coele Syria. It stood on a hill in the Jordan valley, west of the river, and near one of its fords. Its site was fertilized by numerous springs; and to this advantage, as well as to its being the centre of several roads, it owed its great prosperity and its importance in the history of Palestine. It is often mentioned in Old Testament history, in the time of the Maccabees, and under the Romans. It had a mixed population of Canaanites, Philistines, and Assyrian settlers; Josephus adds Scythians, but this is perhaps an error, founded on a false etymology of the name. Under the later Roman empire it became the seat of the Archbishop of Palestina Secunda, and it continued a flourishing city to the time of the first Crusade.

SCYTHŌTAURI, TAURI SCYTHÆ, or TAUROSCYTHÆ, a people of Sarmatia Europæa, just without the Chersonesus Taurica, between the rivers Carcinites and Hypanis, as far as the tongue of land called Dromos Achilleos.

SEBASTE (Σεβαστή = Augusta: Σεβαστηνός). 1. (Now ruins at Ayash), a city on the coast of Cilicia Aspera, built for a residence by Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, to whom the Romans had granted the sovereignty of Cilicia, and named in honor of Augustus. It stood west of the River Lamus, on a small island called Eleousa, the name of which appears to have been afterward transferred to the city.—2. (Now Segikler), a city of Phrygia, north-west of Eumonia.—3. Vid. CABIRA. This city was also called Σεβάστεια.—4. Vid. SAMARIA.

SEBASTŌPŌLIS (Σεβαστόπολις: now Tarkhal), a city of Pontus, on the Iris, southeast of Amasia, by some identified with GAZIURA. There were some other places of the name, which do not require particular notice.

SEBENNYTUS (Σεβέννυτος, ἡ Σεβέννυτικὴ πόλις: now ruins at Semenmout), a considerable city of Lower Egypt, in the Delta, on the western side of the branch of the Nile called after it the Sebennytic Mouth, just at the fork made by this and the Phatnitic Mouth, and south of Busiris. It was the capital of the Nomos Sebennytes or Sebennyiticus.

SEBĒTHUS (now Maddalena), a small river in Campania, flowing round Vesuvius, and falling into the Sinus Puteolanus at the eastern side of Neapolis.

SEBŪS LACUS (now Lago Seo or Iseo), a lake in Gallia Cisalpina, formed by the River Ollius between the lakes Larius and Benacus.

[SEBOSUS, STATIUS, a writer on geography, cited by Pliny. He is, perhaps, the same as Sebosus, the friend of Catulus.]

SECUNDUS, POMPŌNIUS. 1. A distinguished poet in the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius. He was one of the friends of Sejanus, and on the fall of that minister in A.D. 31, was thrown into prison, where he remained till the accession of Caligula in 37, by whom he was released. He was consul in 41, and in the reign of Claudius commanded in Germany, when he defeated the Chatti. Secundus was an intimate friend of the elder Pliny, who wrote his life in two books. His tragedies were the most celebrated of his literary compositions.—[2. JULIUS, a Roman orator, and a friend of Quintilian, is one of the speakers in the Dialogus de Oratoribus, usually ascribed to Tacitus.]

SEDĒTANI. Vid. EDETANI.

SEDIŪTUS, VOLCĀTIUS, from whose work De Poëtis A. Gellius (xv., 24) has preserved thirteen iambic seuarians, in which the principal Latin comic dramatists are enumerated in the order of merit. In this "Canon," as it has been termed, the first place is assigned to Cæcilius Statius, the second to Plautus, the third to Nævius, the fourth to Licinius, the fifth to Attilius, the sixth to Terentius, the seventh to Turpilius, the eighth to Trabea, the ninth to Luscius, the tenth, "causa antiquitatis," to Ennius.

SEDULIUS, CÆLIUS, of Seville, a Christian poet, flourished about A.D. 450. Of his personal history we know nothing. His works are: 1. Paschale Carmen s. Mirabilium Divinorum Libri V., in heroic measure. 2. Veteris et Novi Testamenti Collatio, a sort of hymn containing a collection of texts from the Old and New Testaments, arranged in such a manner as to enable the reader to compare the two dispensations. 3. Hymnus de Christo, an account of the life and miracles of Christ. 4. De Verbi Incarnatione, a Cento Virgilianus. The best editions are by Cellarius, Hal., 1704 and 1739; by Arntzenius, Leovard., 1761; and by Arevalus, Rom., 1794.

SEDŪNI, an Alpine people in Gallia Belgica, east of the Lake of Geneva, in the valley of the Rhone, in the modern Vallais. Their chief town was called Civitas Sedunorum, the modern Sion.

SEDUŠI, a German people, forming part of the army of Ariovistus when he invaded Gaul, B.C. 58. They are not mentioned at a later period, and consequently their site can not be determined.

[SEGALLAUNI OR SEGOVELLAUNI, a people of Gallia Narbonensis, between the Vocontii and Allobroges, to whom Ptolemy assigns the city Valentia.]

SEGĒSĀMA OR SEGĪSĀMO (Segisamonensis: now Sasamo), a town of the Murbogi or Turmodigi in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Tarraco to Asturica.

SEGESTA (Segestanus: ruins near Alcamo) the later Roman form of the town, called by the Greeks EGESTA or ÆGESTA (Ἐγέστα, Αἰγέστα, in Virg. Acesta: Ἐγεσταιός, Αἰγεστανός, Acestæus), situated in the north-west of Sicily, near the coast, between Panormus and Drepanum. It is said to have been founded by the Trojans on two small rivers, to which they gave the names of Simois and Scamander; hence the Romans made it a colony of Æneas. One tradition, indeed, ascribed to it a Greek origin; but in later times it was never regarded as a Greek city. Its inhabitants were constantly engaged in hostilities with Selinus; and it was at their solicitation that the Athenians were led to embark in their unfortunate expedition against Sicily. The town was taken by Agathocles, who destroyed or sold as slaves all its inhabitants, peopled the city with a body of deserters, and changed its name into that of Dicæopolis; but after the death of this tyrant, the remains of the ancient inhabitants returned to the city and resumed their former name. In the neighborhood of the city, on the road to Drepanum, were celebrated mineral springs, called Aqua Segestana or Aqua Pintiana.

SEGESTES, a Cheruscan chieftain, the opponent of Arminius. Private injuries embittered their political feud, for Arminius carried off and forcibly married the daughter of Segestes. In A.D. 9 Segestes warned Quintilius Varus of the conspiracy of Arminius and other Cheruscan chiefs against him; but his warning was disregarded, and Varus perished. In 14 Segestes was forced by his tribesmen into a war with Rome; but he afterward made his peace with the Romans, and was allowed to reside at Narbonne.

SEGETĪA, a Roman divinity, who, together with Setia or Seja and Semonia, was invoked by the early Italians at seed-time, for Segetia, like the two other names, is connected with sero and seges.

SEGI, a German people in Gallia Belgica between the Treveri and Eburones, the name of which is still preserved in the modern town of Sinci or Signei.

SEGOBRIGA, the chief town of the Celtiberi, in Hispania Tarraconensis, southwest of Cæsaraugusta, probably in the neighborhood of the modern Priego.

[SEGODUNUM. Vid. RUTENI.]

[SEGONAX. Vid. SEGOVAX.]

SEGONTIA or SEGUNTIA, a town of the Celtiberi, in Hispania Tarraconensis, sixteen miles from Cæsaraugusta.

[SEGONTIACI, according to Cæsar (B. G., v., 21), a people in the extreme south of Britannia.]

[SEGONTIUM, a town of Britain, from which a road led to Deva: its ruins are found near Caernarvon, on the little river Sciont.]

[SEGOVAX (where the common text has SEGO-NAX), one of the kings of the nations in the south of Britannia, who aided Cassivellaunus against the Romans under Cæsar.]

SEGOVIA. 1. (Now Segovia), a town of the Arevaci, on the road from Emerita to Cæsaraugusta. A magnificent Roman aqueduct is still extant at Segovia.—2. A town in Hispania Bætica, on the Flumen Silicense, near Sacili.

SEGUSIANI, one of the most important communities in Gallia Lugdunensis, bounded by the Allobroges on the south, by the Sequani on the east, by the Ædui on the north, and by the Arverni on the west. In the time of Cæsar they were dependent on the Ædui. In their territory was the town of Lugdunum, the capital of the province.

SEGUSIO (now Susa), the capital of the Segusini and the residence of King Cottius, was situated in Gallia Transpadana, at the foot of the Cottian Alps. The triumphal arch erected at this place by Cottius in honor of Augustus is still extant.

SEIUS STRABO. Vid. SEJANUS.

SEIANUS, ÆLIUS, was born at Vulsinii, in Etruria, and was the son of Seius Strabo, who was commander of the prætorian troops at the close of the reign of Augustus, A.D. 14. In the same year Sejanus was made the colleague of his father in the command of the prætorian bands; and upon his father being sent as governor to Egypt, he obtained the sole command of these troops. He ultimately gained such influence over Tiberius, that this suspicious man, who was close and reserved to all mankind, opened his bosom to Sejanus, and made him his confidant. For many years he governed Tiberius; but, not content with this high position, he formed the design of obtaining the imperial power. With this view he sought to make himself popular with the soldiers, and gave posts of honor and emolument to his creatures and favorites. With the same object, he resolved to get rid of all the members of the imperial family. He debauched Livia, the wife of Drusus, the son of Tiberius; and by promising her marriage and a participation in the imperial power, he was enabled to poison Drusus with her connivance and assistance (23). An accident increased the credit of Sejanus, and confirmed the confidence of Tiberius. The emperor, with Sejanus and others, was feasting in a natural cave, between Amyclæ, which was on the sea-coast, and the hills of Fundi. The entrance of the cave suddenly fell in and crushed some of the slaves; and all the guests, in alarm, tried to make their escape. Sejanus, resting his knees on the couch of Tiberius, and placing his shoulders under the falling rock, protected his master, and was discovered in this posture by the soldiers who came to their relief. After Tiberius had shut himself up in the island of Capræa, Sejanus had full scope for his machinations; and the death of Livia, the mother of Tiberius (29), was followed by the banishment of Agrippina and her sons Nero and Drusus. Tiberius at last began to suspect the designs of Sejanus, and felt that it was time to rid himself of a man who was almost more than a rival. To cover his schemes and remove Sejanus from about him, Tiberius made him joint consul with himself in 31. He then sent Sertorius Macro to Rome, with a commission to take the command of the prætorian cohorts. Macro, after assuring himself of the troops, and depriving Sejanus of his usual guard, produced a letter from Tiberius to the senate, in which the emperor expressed his apprehensions of Sejanus. The consul Regulus conducted him to prison, and the people loaded him with insult and outrage. The senate on the same day decreed his death, and he was immediately executed. His body was dragged about the streets, and finally thrown into the Tiber. Many of the friends of Sejanus perished at the same time; and his son and daughter shared his fate.

[SELEMNUS (Σέλεμνος, now River of Kastritza), a river of Achaia, emptying near the promontory Rhium, to the waters of which tradition ascribed the power of curing the pangs of love.]

SELÈNE (Σελήνη), called LUNA by the Romans, was the goddess of the moon, or the moon personified as a divine being. She is called a daughter of Hyperion and Thia, and accordingly a sister of Helios (Sol) and Eos (Aurora); but others speak of her as a daughter of Hyperion by Euryphaessa, or of Pallas, or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Latona. She is also called Phœbe, as the sister of Phœbus, the god of the sun. By Endymion, whom she loved, and whom she sent to sleep in order to kiss him, she became the mother of fifty daughters; and to Jupiter (Zeus) she bore Pandia, Ersa, and Nemca. Pan also is said to have had connection with her in the shape of a white ram. Selene is described as a very beautiful goddess, with long wings and a golden diadem. She rode, like her brother Helios, across the heavens in a chariot drawn by two white horses. In later times Selene was identified with Artemis or Diana, and the worship of the two became amalgamated. In works of art, however, the two divinities are usually distinguished; the face of Selene being more full and round, her figure less tall, and always clothed in a long robe; her veil forms an arch over her head, and above it there is the crescent. At Rome Luna had a temple on the Aventine.

SELÈNE. Vid. CLEOPATRA, No. 9.

SELEUCIA, and rarely SELEUCIA (Σελεύκεια: Σελευκεία: Seleuceensis, Seleucenus), the name of several cities in Asia, built by Seleucus I., king of Syria. 1. S. AD TIGRIN (ἡ ἐπὶ τοῦ Τίγριτος ποταμοῦ, πρὸς Τίγρει, ἀπὸ Τίγριτος), also called S. BABYLONIA (Σ. ἡ ἐν Βαβυλωνίᾳ), S. A-

SYRIÆ, and S. PARTHORUM, a great city on the confines of Assyria and Babylonia, and for a long time the capital of Western Asia, until it was eclipsed by CTESIPHON. Its exact site has been disputed; but the most probable opinion is that it stood on the western bank of the Tigris, north of its junction with the Royal Canal, opposite to the mouth of the River Delas or Silla (now Diala), and to the spot where Ctesiphon was afterward built by the Parthians. It was a little to the south of the modern city of Bagdad. Perhaps a better site could not be found in Western Asia. It commanded the navigation of the Tigris and Euphrates, and the whole plain of those two rivers; and it stood at the junction of all the chief caravan roads by which the traffic between eastern and western Asia was carried on. In addition to these advantages, its people had, by the gift of Seleucus, the government of their own affairs. It was built in the form of an eagle with expanded wings, and was peopled by settlers from Assyria, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Syria, and Judæa. It rapidly rose, and eclipsed Babylon in wealth and splendor. Even after the Parthian kings had become masters of the banks of the Tigris, and had fixed their residence at Ctesiphon, Seleucia, though deprived of much of its importance, remained a very considerable city. In the reign of Titus, it had, according to Pliny, six hundred thousand inhabitants. It was burned by Trajan in his Parthian expedition, and again by L. Verus, the colleague of M. Aurelius Antoninus, when its population is given by different authorities as three hundred thousand or four hundred thousand. It was again taken by Severus; and from this blow it never recovered. In Julian's expedition it was found entirely deserted.—2. SELEUCIA PIERIA (Σ. Πιερία, ἡ ἐν Πιερίᾳ, ἡ πρὸς Ἀντιοχείᾳ, ἡ πρὸς Θαλάσσει, ἡ ἐπιθαλάσσια, ruins, called Seleukeh or Kerse, near Suadeiah), a great city and fortress of Syria, founded by Seleucus in April, B.C. 300, one month before the foundation of Antioch. It stood on the site of an ancient fortress, on the rocks overhanging the sea, at the foot of Mount Pieria, about four miles north of the Orontes, and twelve miles west of Antioch. Its natural strength was improved by every known art of fortification, to which were added all the works of architecture and engineering required to make it a splendid city and a great sea-port, while it obtained abundant supplies from the fertile plain between the city and Antioch. The remains of Seleucus I. were interred at Seleucia, in a mausoleum surrounded by a grove. In the war with Egypt, which ensued upon the murder of Antiochus II., Seleucia surrendered to Ptolemy III. Euergetes (B.C. 246). It was afterward recovered by Antiochus the Great (219). In the war between Antiochus VIII. and IX., the people of Seleucia made themselves independent (109 or 108). Afterward, having successfully resisted the attacks of Tigranes for fourteen years (84-70), they were confirmed in their freedom by Pompey. The city had fallen entirely into decay by the sixth century of our era. There are considerable ruins of the harbor and mole, of the walls of the city, and of its necropolis. The surrounding district was called

SELEUCIS.—3. SELEUCIA AD BELUM, a city of

Syria, in the valley of the Orontes, near Apamea. Its site is doubtful.—4. SELEUCIA TRACHEÏTIS (now ruins at Selefskeh), an important city of Cilicia Aspera, was built by Seleucus I. on the western bank of the River Calycadnus, about four miles from its mouth, and peopled with the inhabitants of several neighboring cities. It had an oracle of Apollo, and annual games in honor of Jupiter (Zeus) Olympius. It vied with Tarsus in power and splendor, and was a free city under the Romans. It has remarkable claims to renown both in political and literary history: in the former, as the place where Trajan and Frederic Barbarossa died; in the latter, as the birth-place of the philosophers Athenæus and Xenarchus, of the sophist Alexander, the secretary of M. Aurelius Antoninus, and of other learned men. On its site are still seen the ruins of temples, porticoes, aqueducts, and tombs.—5. SELEUCIA IN MESOPOTAMIA (now Bir), on the left bank of the Euphrates, opposite to the ford of Zeugma, was a fortress of considerable importance in ancient military history.—6. A considerable city of Margiana, built by Alexander the Great, in a beautiful situation, and called Alexandrea; destroyed by the barbarians, and rebuilt by Antiochus I., who named it Seleucia after his father Seleucus I. The Roman prisoners taken at the defeat of Crassus by the Parthians were settled here by King Orodes.—7. SELEUCIA IN CARIA. (Vid. TRALLES.) There were other cities of the name, of less importance, in Pisidia, Pamphylia, Palestine, and Elymaïs.

SELEUCIS (Σελευκίς). 1. The most beautiful and fertile district of Syria, containing the north-western part of the country, between Mount Amanus on the north, the Mediterranean on the west, the districts of Cyrrhæstic and Chalybonitis on the northeast, the desert on the east, and Cœlesyria and the mountains of Lebanon on the south. It included the valley of the Lower Orontes, and contained the four great cities of Antioch, Seleucia, Laodicea, and Apamea, whence it was also called Tetrapolis. In later times the name was confined to the small district north of the Orontes, the southern part of the former Seleucis being divided into Casiotis, west of the Orontes, and Apamene, east of the river.—2. A district of Cappadocia.—3. A name which Seleucus I. endeavored to give to the Caspian Sea, in memory of a voyage of exploration made round it by his command.

SELEUCUS (Σελευκος), the name of several kings of Syria. I. Surnamed Nicator, the founder of the Syrian monarchy, reigned B.C. 312-280. He was the son of Antiochus, a Macedonian of distinction among the officers of Philip II., and was born about 358. He accompanied Alexander on his expedition to Asia, and distinguished himself particularly in the Indian campaigns. After the death of Alexander (323) he espoused the side of Perdiccas, whom he accompanied on his expedition against Egypt; but he took a leading part in the mutiny of the soldiers, which ended in the death of Perdiccas (321). In the second partition of the provinces which followed, Seleucus obtained the wealthy and important satrapy of Babylonia. In the war between Antigonus and Eumenes, Seleucus afforded efficient support to the former; but after the death of Eumenes (316), Antigonus began to treat the other satraps as his subjects. Thereupon Seleucus fled to Egypt, where he induced Ptolemy to unite with Lysimachus and Cassander in a league against their common enemy. In the war that ensued Seleucus took an active part. At length, in 312, he recovered Babylon; and it is from this period that the Syrian monarchy is commonly reckoned to commence. This era of the Seleucidæ, as it is termed, has been determined by chronologers to the 1st of October, 312. Soon afterward Seleucus defeated Nicanor, the satrap of Media, and followed up his victory by the conquest of Susiana, Media, and some adjacent districts. For the next few years he gradually extended his power over all the eastern provinces which had formed part of the empire of Alexander, from the Euphrates to the banks of the Oxus and the Indus. In 306 Seleucus followed the example of Antigonus and Ptolemy, by formally assuming the regal title and diadem. In 302 he joined the league formed for the second time by Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander, against their common enemy Antigonus. The united forces of Seleucus and Lysimachus gained a decisive victory over Antigonus at Ipsus (301), in which Antigonus himself was slain. In the division of the spoil, Seleucus obtained the largest share, being rewarded for his services with a great part of Asia Minor (which was divided between him and Lysimachus), as well as with the whole of Syria, from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean. The empire of Seleucus was now by far the most extensive and powerful of those which had been formed out of the dominions of Alexander. It comprised the whole of Asia, from the remote provinces of Bactria and Sogdiana to the coasts of Phœnicia, and from the Paropamisus to the central plains of Phrygia, where the boundary which separated him from Lysimachus is not clearly defined. Seleucus appears to have felt the difficulty of exercising a vigilant control over so extensive an empire, and accordingly, in 293, he consigned the government of all the provinces beyond the Euphrates to his son Antiochus, upon whom he bestowed the title of king, as well as the hand of his own youthful wife, Stratonice, for whom the prince had conceived a violent attachment. In 288, the ambitious designs of Demetrius (now become king of Macedonia) once more aroused the common jealousy of his old adversaries, and led Seleucus again to unite in a league with Ptolemy and Lysimachus against him. After Demetrius had been driven from his kingdom by Lysimachus, he transported the seat of war into Asia Minor, but he was compelled to surrender to Seleucus in 286. The Syrian king kept Demetrius in confinement till three years afterward, but during the whole of that time treated him in a friendly and liberal manner. For some time jealousies had existed between Seleucus and Lysimachus; but the immediate cause of the war between the two monarchs, which terminated in the defeat and death of Lysimachus (281), is related in the life of the latter. Seleucus now crossed the Hellespont in order to take possession of the throne of Macedonia, which had been left vacant by the death of Lysimachus; but he had advanced no farther than Lysimachia, when he was assassinated by Ptolemy Ceraunus, to whom, as the son of his old friend and ally, he had extended a friendly protection. His death took place in the beginning of 280, only seven months after that of Lysimachus, and in the thirty-second year of his reign. He was in his seventy-eighth year. Seleucus appears to have carried out, with great energy and perseverance, the projects originally formed by Alexander himself for the Hellenization of his Asiatic empire; and we find him founding, in almost every province, Greek or Macedonian colonies, which became so many centres of civilization and refinement. Of these no less than sixteen are mentioned as bearing the name of Antiochia, after his father; five that of Laodicea, from his mother; seven were called after himself, Seleucia; three from the name of his first wife, Apamea; and one Stratonicea, from his second wife, the daughter of Demetrius. Numerous other cities, whose names attest their Macedonian origin—Berœa, Edessa, Pella, &c.—likewise owed their first foundation to Seleucus. —II. Surnamed CALLINICUS (246–226), was the eldest son of Antiochus II. by his first wife Laodice. The first measure of his administration, or rather that of his mother, was to put to death his step-mother Berenice, together with her infant son. This act of cruelty produced the most disastrous effects. In order to avenge his sister, Ptolemy Euergetes, king of Egypt, invaded the dominions of Seleucus, and not only made himself master of Antioch and the whole of Syria, but carried his arms unopposed beyond the Euphrates and the Tigris. During these operations Seleucus kept wholly aloof; but when Ptolemy had been recalled to his own dominions by domestic disturbances, he recovered possession of the greater part of the provinces which he had lost. Soon afterward Seleucus became involved in a dangerous war with his brother Antiochus Hierax, who attempted to obtain Asia Minor as an independent kingdom for himself. This war lasted several years, but was at length terminated by the decisive defeat of Antiochus, who was obliged to quit Asia Minor and take refuge in Egypt. Seleucus undertook an expedition to the East, with the view of reducing the revolted provinces of Parthia and Bactria, which had availed themselves of the disordered state of the Syrian empire to throw off its yoke. He was, however, defeated by Arsaces, king of Parthia, in a great battle, which was long after celebrated by the Parthians as the foundation of their independence. After the expulsion of Antiochus, Attalus, king of Pergamus, extended his dominions over the greater part of Asia Minor; and Seleucus appears to have been engaged in an expedition for the recovery of these provinces, when he was accidentally killed by a fall from his horse, in the twenty-first year of his reign, 226. He left two sons, who successively ascended the throne, Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus, afterward surnamed the Great. His own surname of Callinicus was probably assumed after his recovery of the provinces that had been overrun by Ptolemy. —III. Surnamed CERAUNUS (226–223), eldest son and successor of Seleucus II. The surname of Ceraunus was given him by the soldiery, appar ently in derision, as he appears to have been feeble both in mind and body. He was assassinated by two of his officers, after a reign of only three years, and was succeeded by his brother, Antiochus the Great.—IV. Surnamed PHILOPATOR (187–175), was the son and successor of Antiochus the Great. The defeat of his father by the Romans, and the ignominious peace which followed it, had greatly diminished the power of the Syrian monarchy, and the reign of Seleucus was, in consequence, feeble and inglorious, and was marked by no striking events. He was assassinated in 175 by one of his own ministers. He left two children: Demetrius, who subsequently ascended the throne; and Laodice, married to Perseus, king of Macedonia.—V. Eldest son of Demetrius II., assumed the royal diadem on learning the death of his father, 125; but his mother Cleopatra, who had herself put Demetrius to death, was indignant at hearing that her son had ventured to take such a step without her authority, and caused Seleucus also to be assassinated.—VI. Surnamed EPIPHANES, and also Nicator (95–93), was the eldest of the five sons of Antiochus VIII. Grypus. On the death of his father in 95, he ascended the throne, and defeated and slew in battle his uncle Antiochus Cyzicenus, who had laid claim to the kingdom. But shortly after Seleucus was in his turn defeated by Antiochus Eusebes, the son of Cyzicenus, and expelled from Syria. He took refuge in Cilicia, where he established himself in the city of Mopsuestia; but, in consequence of his tyranny, he was burned to death by the inhabitants in his palace.

SELGE (Σελγη: Σελγεύς: now Sark? ruins), one of the chief of the independent mountain cities of Pisidia, stood on the southern side of Mount Taurus, on the Eurymedon, just where the river breaks through the mountain chain. On a rock above it was a citadel named Κεοβέδιον, in which was a temple of Juno (Hera). Its inhabitants, who were the most warlike of all the Pisidians, claimed descent from the Lacedæmonians, and inscribed the name Λακεδαιμων on their coins. They could bring an army of twenty thousand men into the field, and, as late as the fifth century, we find them beating back a horde of Goths. In a valley near the city, in the heart of lofty mountains, grew wine, and oil, and other products of the most luxuriant vegetation.

[Σελσόνε (Σελγοῦσαι, Ptol.), a people on the western coast of Britannia Barbara, in the eastern part of the modern Galloway and in Dumfriesshire.]

SELINŪS (Σελινόυς, -όντος, contraction of σελινόεις, from σέλινον, "parsley"). 1. A small river on the southwestern coast of Sicily, flowing by the town of the same name.—2. (Now Crestena), a river of Elis, in the district Triphylia, near Scillus, flowing into the Alpheus west of Olympia.—3. (Now Vostitza), a river of Achaia, rising in Mount Erymanthus.—4. A tributary of the Caicus in Mysia, flowing by the town of Pergamum.—5. (Σελινόωντιος, Σελινόσιος: near the modern Castel vetrano, ruins), one of the most important towns in Sicily, situated upon a hill on the southwestern coast, and upon a river of the same name. It was founded by the Dorians from Megara Hyblæa, on the eastern coast of Sicily, B.C. 628. It soon attained great prosperity; but it was taken by the Carthaginians in 409, when most of its inhabitants were slain or sold as slaves, and the greater part of the city destroyed. The population of Selinus must at that time have been very considerable, since we are told that sixteen thousand men fell in the siege and conquest of the town, five thousand were carried to Carthage as slaves, two thousand six hundred fled to Agrigentum, and many others took refuge in the surrounding villages. The Carthaginians, however, allowed the inhabitants to return to Selinus in the course of the same year, and it continued to be a place of secondary importance till 249, when it was again destroyed by the Carthaginians, and its inhabitants transferred to Lilybæum. The surrounding country produced excellent wheat. East of Selinus, on the road to Agrigentum, were celebrated mineral springs called Agua Selinuntia, subsequently Agua Laboda or Labodes, the modern Baths of Sciaccia. There are still considerable ruins of Selinus.—6. (Now Selenti), a town in Cilicia, situated on the coast, and upon a rock which was almost entirely surrounded by the sea. In consequence of the death of the Emperor Trajan in this town, it was for a long time called Trajanopolis.

SELLASIA (Σελασία or Σελασία), a town in Laconia, north of Sparta, was situated near the River Cenus, and commanded one of the principal passes leading to Sparta. Here the celebrated battle was fought between Cleomenes III. and Antigonos Doson, B.C. 221, in which the former was defeated.

SELLĒIS (Σελλήεις). 1. A river in Elis, on which the Homeric Ephyra stood, rising in Mount Pholoë, and falling into the sea south of the Peneus.—2. A river near Sicyon.—3. A river in Troas, near Arisbe, and a tributary of the Rhodius.

SELLI OF HELL. Vid. DODONA.

SELYMBRĪA OR SELYBRĪA (Σηλυμβρία, Σηλυβρία, Dor. Σηλυμβρία: Σηλυμβριανός: now Selivria), an important town in Thrace, situated on the Propontis. It was a colony of the Megarians, and was founded earlier than Byzantium. It perhaps derived its name from its founder Selys and the Thracian word Bria, a town. It continued to be a place of considerable importance till its conquest by Philip, the father of Alexander, from which time its decline may be dated. Under the later emperors it was called Eudoxiupolis, in honor of Eudoxia, the wife of Arcadius; but it afterward recovered its ancient name.

SEMĒCHŌNĪTIS OR SAMACHONITIS LACUS (Σεμεχωνίτις, Σαμαχωνίτις, and -ιτών λίμνη: in the Old Testament, Waters of Merom: now Nahr-el-Huleh), a small lake in the north of Palestine, the highest of the three formed by the Jordan, both branches of which fall into its northern end, while the river flows out of its southern end in one stream. The valley in which it lies is inclosed on the west and east by mountains belonging to the two ranges of Lebanon, forming a position which has been of military importance both in ancient and modern times, especially as the great Damascus road crosses the Jordan just below the lake. According to the division of Palestine under the Roman empire, it belonged to Galilee, but in earlier times, under the Syrian kings, it was reckoned to Cœlesyria.

SEMELE (Σεμέλη), daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, at Thebes, and accordingly sister of Ivo, Agave, Autonoe, and Polydorus. She was beloved by Jupiter (Zeus). Juno (Hera), stimulated by jealousy, appeared to her in the form of her aged nurse Beroë, and induced her to ask Jupiter (Zeus) to visit her in the same splendor and majesty with which he appeared to Juno (Hera). Jupiter (Zeus) warned her of the danger of her request; but as he had sworn to grant whatever she desired, he was obliged to comply with her prayer. He accordingly appeared before her as the god of thunder, and Semele was consumed by the lightning; but Jupiter (Zeus) saved her child Bacchus (Dionysus), with whom she was pregnant. Her son afterward carried her out of the lower world, and conducted her to Olympus, where she became immortal under the name of Thyone.

SEMIRAMIS (Σεμίραμις) and NINUS (Νίνος), the mythical founders of the Assyrian empire of Ninus or Nineveh. Ninus was a great warrior, who built the town of Ninus or Nineveh about B.C. 2182, and subdued the greater part of Asia. Semiramis was the daughter of the fish-goddess Derceto of Ascalon in Syria by a Syrian youth; but, being ashamed of her frailty, she made away with the youth, and exposed her infant daughter. But the child was miraculously preserved by doves, who fed her till she was discovered by the shepherds of the neighborhood. She was then brought up by the chief shepherd of the royal herds, whose name was Simmas, and from whom she derived the name of Semiramis. Her surpassing beauty attracted the notice of Onnes, one of the king's friends and generals, who married her. He subsequently sent for his wife to the army, where the Assyrians were engaged in the siege of Bactra, which they had long endeavored in vain to take. Upon her arrival in the camp she planned an attack upon the citadel of the town, mounted the walls with a few brave followers, and obtained possession of the place. Ninus was so charmed by her bravery and beauty that he resolved to make her his wife, whereupon her unfortunate husband put an end to his life. By Ninus Semiramis had a son, Ninyas, and on the death of Ninus she succeeded him on the throne. According to another account, Semiramis had obtained from her husband permission to rule over Asia for five days, and availed herself of this opportunity to cast the king into a dungeon, or, as is also related, to put him to death, and thus obtained the sovereign power. Her fame threw into the shade that of Ninus; and later ages loved to tell of her marvellous deeds and her heroic achievements. She built numerous cities, and erected many wonderful buildings; and several of the most extraordinary works in the East, which were extant in a later age, and the authors of which were unknown, were ascribed by popular tradition to this queen. In Nineveh she erected a tomb for her husband, nine stadia high and ten wide; she built the city of Babylon, with all its wonders; and she constructed the hanging gardens in Media, of which later writers give us such strange accounts. Besides conquering many nations of Asia, she subdued Egypt and a great part of Æthiopia, but was unsuccessful in an attack which she made upon India. After a reign of forty-two years she resigned the sovereignty to her son Ninyas, and disappeared from the earth, taking her flight to heaven in the form of a dove. The fabulous nature of this narrative is apparent. It is probable that Semiramis was originally a Syrian goddess, perhaps the same who was worshipped at Ascalon under the name of Astarte, or the Heavenly Aphrodite, to whom the dove was sacred. Hence the stories of her voluptuousness, which were current even in the time of Augustus (Ov., Am., i., 5, 11).

SEMNÖNES, more rarely SENNÖNES, a German people, described by Tacitus as the most powerful tribe of the Suevic race, dwelt between the rivers Viadus (now Oder) and Albis (now Elbe), from the Riesengebirge in the south as far as the country around Frankfurt on the Oder and Potsdam in the north.

SEMO SANCUS. Vid. SANCUS.

SEMPRONIA. 1. Daughter of Tib. Gracchus, censor B.C. 169, and sister of the two celebrated tribunes, married Scipio Africanus minor. — 2. Wife of D. Junius Brutus, consul 77, was a woman of great personal attractions and literary accomplishments, but of a profligate character. She took part in Catiline's conspiracy, though her husband was not privy to it.

SEMPRONIA GENS, was of great antiquity, and one of its members, A. Sempronius Atratinus, obtained the consulship as early as B.C. 497, twelve years after the foundation of the republic. The Sempronii were divided into many families, of which the ATRATINI were patrician, but all the others were plebeian: their names are ASELLIO, BLÆSUS, GRACCIUS, SOPHUS, TUDITANUS.

SENA (Senensis). 1. (Now Senigaglia), sur-named GALLICA, and sometimes called SENOGALLIA, a town on the coast of Umbria, at the mouth of the small river Sena, was founded by the Senones, a Gallic people, and was made a colony by the Romans after the conquest of the Senones, B.C. 283. In the civil war it espoused the Marian party, and was taken and sacked by Pompey. — 2. (Now Siena), a town in Etruria and a Roman colony, on the road from Clusium to Florentia, is only mentioned in the times of the emperors.

SENECA. 1. M. ANNAEUS, the rhetorician, was born at Corduba (now Cordoba), in Spain, about B.C. 61. Seneca was at Rome in the early period of the power of Augustus, for he says that he had seen Ovid declaiming before Arellius Fuscus. He afterward returned to Spain, and married Helvia, by whom he had three sons, L. Annaeus Seneca, L. Annaeus Mela or Mella, the father of the poet Lucan, and M. Novatus. Novatus was the eldest son, and took the name of Junius Gallio upon being adopted by Junius Gallio. Seneca was rich, and he belonged to the equestrian class. At a later period Seneca returned to Rome, where he resided till his death, which probably occurred near the end of the reign of Tiberius. Two of Seneca's works have come down to us. 1. Controversiarum Libri decem which he addressed to his three sons. The first, second, seventh, eighth, and tenth books only are extant, and these are somewhat mutilated: of the other books only fragments remain. These Controversiæ are rhetorical exercises on imaginary cases, filled with commonplaces, such as a man of large verbal memory and great reading carries about with him as his ready money. 2. Suasoriarum Liber, which is probably not complete. We may collect from its contents what the subjects were on which the rhetoricians of that age exercised their wits: one of them is, "Shall Cicero apologize to M. Antonius? Shall he agree to burn his Philipics, if Antonius requires it?" Another is, "Shall Alexander embark on the ocean?" If there are some good ideas and apt expressions in these puerile declamations, they have no value where they stand, and probably most of them are borrowed. No merit of form can compensate for worthlessness of matter. The best edition of these works is by A. Schottus, Heidelberg, 1603, frequently reprinted.—2. L. ANNÆUS, the philosopher, the son of the preceding, was born at Corduba, probably a few years B.C., and brought to Rome by his parents when he was a child. Though he was naturally of a weak body, he was a hard student from his youth, and he devoted himself with great ardor to rhetoric and philosophy. He also soon gained distinction as a pleader of causes, and he excited the jealousy and hatred of Caligula by the ability with which he conducted a case in the senate before the emperor. In the first year of the reign of Claudius (A.D. 41), Seneca was banished to Corsica on account of his intimacy with Julia, the niece of Claudius, of whom Messalina was jealous. After eight years' residence in Corsica, Seneca was recalled (59) by the influence of Agrippina, who had just married her uncle the Emperor Claudius. He now obtained a prætorship, and was made the tutor of the young Domitius, afterward the Emperor Nero, who was the son of Agrippina by a former husband. On the accession of his pupil to the imperial throne (54) after the death of Claudius, Seneca became one of the chief advisers of the young emperor. He exerted his influence to check Nero's vicious propensities, but at the same time he profited from his position to amass an immense fortune. He supported Nero in his contests with his mother Agrippina, and was not only a party to the death of the latter (60), but he wrote the letter which Nero addressed to the senate in justification of the murder. After the death of his mother Nero abandoned himself without any restraint to his vicious propensities; and the presence of Seneca soon became irksome to him, while the wealth of the philosopher excited the emperor's cupidity. Burrus, the præfect of the prætorian guards, who had always been a firm supporter of Seneca, died in 63. His death broke the power of Seneca; and Nero now fell into the hands of persons who were exactly suited to his taste. Tigellinus and Fennius Rufus, who succeeded Burrus in the command of the prætorians, began an attack on Seneca. His enormous wealth, his gardens and villas, more magnificent than those of the emperor, his exclusive claims to eloquence, and his disparagement of Nero's skill in driving and singing, were all urged against him; and it was time, they said, for Nero to get rid of a teacher. Seneca heard of the charges against him: he was rich, and he knew that Nero wanted money. He asked the emperor for permission to retire, and offered to surrender all that he had. Nero affected to be grateful for his past services, refused the proffered gift, and sent him away with perfidious assurances of his respect and affection. Seneca now altered his mode of life, saw little company, and seldom visited the city, on the ground of feeble health, or being occupied with his philosophical studies. The conspiracy of Piso (65) gave the emperor a pretext for putting his teacher to death, though there was not complete evidence of Seneca being a party to the conspiracy. Seneca was at the time returning from Campania, and had rested at a villa four miles from the city. Nero sent a tribune to him with the order of death. Without showing any sign of alarm, Seneca cheered his weeping friends by reminding them of the lessons of philosophy. Embracing his wife Pompeia Paulina, he prayed her to moderate her grief, and to console herself for the loss of her husband by the reflection that he had lived an honorable life. But as Paulina protested that she would die with him, Seneca consented, and the same blow opened the veins in the arms of both. Seneca's body was attenuated by age and meagre diet; the blood would not flow easily, and he opened the veins in his legs. His torture was excessive; and, to save himself and his wife the pain of seeing one another suffer, he bade her retire to her chamber. His last words were taken down in writing by persons who were called in for the purpose, and were afterward published. Seneca's torments being still prolonged, he took hemlock from his friend and physician, Statius Annæus, but it had no effect. At last he entered a warm bath, and as he sprinkled some of the water on the slaves nearest to him, he said that he made a libation to Jupiter the Liberator. He was then taken into a vapor stove, where he was quickly suffocated. Seneca died, as was the fashion among the Romans, with the courage of a stoic, but with somewhat of a theatrical affectation, which detracts from the dignity of the scene. Seneca's great misfortune was to have known Nero; and though we can not say that he was a truly great or a truly good man, his character will not lose by comparison with that of many others who have been placed in equally difficult circumstances. Seneca's fame rests on his numerous writings, of which the following are extant: 1. De Ira, in three books, addressed to Novatus, probably the earliest of Seneca's works. In the first book he combats what Aristotle says of Anger in his Ethics. 2. De Consolatione ad Helviam Matrem Liber, a consolatory letter to his mother, written during his residence in Corsica. It is one of his best treatises. 3. De Consolatione ad Polybium Liber, also written in Corsica. If it is the work of Seneca, it does him no credit. Polybius was the powerful freedman of Claudius, and the Consolatio is intended to comfort him on the occasion of the loss of his brother. But it also contains adulation of the emperor, and many expressions unworthy of a true stoic or of an honest man. 4. Liber de Consolatione ad Marciam, written after his return from exile, was designed to console Marcia for the loss of her son. Marcia was the daughter of A. Cremutinus Cordus. 5. De Providentia Liber, or Quare bonis viris mala accidunt cum sit Providentia, is addressed to the younger Lucilius, procurator of Sicily. The question that is here discussed often engaged the ancient philosophers: the stoical solution of the difficulty is that suicide is the remedy when misfortune has become intolerable. In this discourse Seneca says that he intends to prove "that Providence hath a power over all things, and that God is always present with us." 6. De Animi Tranquillitate, addressed to Serenus, probably written soon after Seneca's return from exile. It is in the form of a letter rather than a treatise: the object is to discover the means by which tranquillity of mind can be obtained. 7. De Constantia Sapientis seu quod in sapientem non cadit injuria, also addressed to Serenus, is founded on the stoical doctrine of the impassiveness of the wise man. 8. De Clementia ad Neronem Casarem Libri duo, written at the beginning of Nero's reign. There is too much of the flatterer in this; but the advice is good. The second book is incomplete. It is in the first chapter of this second book that the anecdote is told of Nero's unwillingness to sign a sentence of execution, and his exclamation, "I would I could neither read nor write." 9. De Brevitate Vitæ ad Paulinum Liber, recommends the proper employment of time and the getting of wisdom as the chief purpose of life. 10. De Vita Beata ad Gallionem, addressed to his brother, L. Junius Gallio, is probably one of the later works of Seneca, in which he maintains the stoical doctrine that there is no happiness without virtue; but he does not deny that other things, as health and riches, have their value. The conclusion of the treatise is lost. 11. De Otio aut Secusso Sapientis, is sometimes joined to No. 10. 12. De Beneficiis Libri septem, addressed to Æbucius Liberalis, is an excellent discussion of the way of conferring a favor, and of the duties of the giver and of the receiver. The handling is not very methodical, but it is very complete. It is a treatise which all persons might read with profit. 13. Epistola ad Lucilium, one hundred and twenty-four in number, are not the correspondence of daily life, like that of Cicero, but a collection of moral maxims and remarks without any systematic order. They contain much good matter, and have been favorite reading with many distinguished men. It is possible that these letters, and, indeed, many of Seneca's moral treatises, were written in the latter part of his life, and probably after he had lost the favor of Nero. That Seneca sought consolation and tranquillity of mind in literary occupation is manifest. 14. Apocolocyntosis, is a satire against the Emperor Claudius. The word is a play on the term Apotheosis or deification, and is equivalent in meaning to Pumpkinification, or the reception of Claudius among the pumpkins. The subject was well enough, but the treatment has no great merit; and Seneca probably had no other object than to gratify his spite against the emperor. 15. Questionum Naturalium Libri septem, addressed to Lucilius

Junior, is not a systematic work, but a collection of natural facts from various writers, Greek and Roman, many of which are curious. The first book treats of meteors, the second of thunder and lightning, the third of water, the fourth of hail, snow, and ice, the fifth of winds, the sixth of earthquakes and the sources of the Nile, and the seventh of comets. Moral remarks are scattered through the work; and, indeed, the design of the whole appears to be to find a foundation for ethic, the chief part of philosophy, in the knowledge of nature (Physic). 16. Tragediæ, ten in number. They are entitled Hercules Furens, Thyestes, Thebais or Phænissa, Hippolytus or Phædra, Œdipus, Troades or Hecuba, Medea, Agamemnon, Hercules Œtæus, and Octavia. The titles themselves, with the exception of the Octavia, indicate sufficiently what the tragedies are, Greek mythological subjects treated in a peculiar fashion. They are written in Iambic senarii, interspersed with choral parts, in anapestic and other metres. The subject of the Octavia is Nero's ill-treatment of his wife, his passion for Poppæa, and the exile of Octavia. These tragedies are not adapted, and certainly were never intended for the stage. They were designed for reading or for recitation after the Roman fashion, and they bear the stamp of a rhetorical age. They contain many striking passages, and have some merit as poems. Moral sentiments and maxims abound, and the style and character of Seneca are as conspicuous here as in his prose works. The judgments on Seneca's writings have been as various as the opinions about his character, and both in extremes. It has been said of him that he looks best in quotations; but this is an admission that there is something worth quoting, which can not be said of all writers. That Seneca possessed great mental powers can not be doubted. He had seen much of human life, and he knew well what man was. His philosophy, so far as he adopted a system, was the stoical, but it was rather an eclecticism of stoicism than pure stoicism. His style is antithetical, and apparently labored; and when there is much labor, there is generally affectation. Yet his language is clear and forcible; it is not mere words: there is thought always. It would not be easy to name any modern writer who has treated on morality, and has said so much that is practically good and true, or has treated the matter in so attractive a way. The best editions of Seneca are by J. F. Gronovius, Leiden, 1649-1658, 4 vols. 12mo; by Ruhkopf, Leipzig, 1797-1811, 5 vols. 8vo; and the Bipont edition, Strassburg, 1809, 5 vols. 8vo. [A new edition is in course of publication by Fickert, of which three volumes have appeared, Leipzig, 1842-5.]

SENECIO, HERENNIIUS. 1. Was a native of Bætica in Spain, where he served as questor. SENIA (Senensis: now Segna or Zengg), a Roman colony in Liburnia in Illyricum, on the coast, and on the road from Aquileia to Siscia.

SENONES, a powerful people in Gallia Lugdunensis, dwelt along the upper course of the Sequana (now Seine), and were bounded on the north by the Parisii, on the west by the Carnutes, on the south by the Ædii, and on the east by the Lingones and Mandubii. Their chief town was Agendicum, afterward called Senones (now Sens). A portion of this people crossed the Alps about B.C. 400, in order to settle in Italy; and as the greater part of Upper Italy was already occupied by other Celtic tribes, the Senones were obliged to penetrate a considerable distance to the south, and took up their abode on the Adriatic Sea, between the Rivers Utis and Æsis (between Ravenna and Ancona), after expelling the Umbrians. In this country they founded the town of Sena. They extended their ravages into Etruria; and it was in consequence of the interference of the Romans while they were laying siege to Clusium that they marched against Rome and took the city, B.C. 390. From this time we find them engaged in constant hostilities with the Romans, till they were at length completely subdued, and the greater part of them destroyed by the consul Dolabella, 293.

SENTINUM (Sentinas, Sentinatis: ruins near Sassoferrato), a fortified town in Umbria, not far from the River Æsis.

SEPLASIA, one of the principal streets in Capua, where perfumes and luxuries of a similar kind were sold.

SEPPHŌRIS (Σεπφωρίς: now Sefurieh), a city of Palestine, in the middle of Galilee, about half way between Mount Carmel and the Lake of Tiberias, was an insignificant place until Herod Antipas fortified it, and made it the capital of Galilee, under the name of DIOCÆSARĒA. It was the seat of one of the five Jewish Sanhedrim, and continued to flourish until the fourth century, when it was destroyed by the Cæsar Gallus on account of a revolt of its inhabitants.

SEPTEM AQUÆ, a place in the territory of the Sabini, near Reate.

SEPTEM FRATRES (Ἑπτὰ ἀδελφοί: now Jebel Zatout, i. e., Apes' Hill), a mountain on the northern coast of Mauretania Tingitana, at the narrowest part of the Fretum Gaditanum (now Straits of Gibraltar), connected by a low tongue of land with the promontory of ABYLA, which is also included under the modern name.

SEPTEM MARĪA, the name given by the ancients to the lagoons formed at the mouth of the Po by the frequent overflows of this river. Persons usually sailed through these lagoons from Ravenna to Altinum.

SEPTEMPĒDA (Septempedanus: now San Scerino), a Roman municipium in the interior of Picenum, on the road from Auximum to Urbs Salvia.

SEPTĪMIUS TĪTIUS, a Roman poet, whom Horace (i., 3, 9-14) represents as having ventured to quaff a draught from the Pindaric spring, and as having been ambitious to achieve distinction in tragedy. In this passage Horace speaks of him under the name of Titus; and he is probably the same individual with the Septimius who is addressed in the sixth ode of the second book, and who is introduced in the ninth epistle of the first book.

SEQUANA (now Seine), one of the principal rivers of Gaul, rising in the central parts of that country, and flowing through the province of Gallia Lugdunensis into the ocean opposite Britain. It is three hundred and forty-six miles in length. Its principal affluents are the Matrona (now Marne), Esia (now Oise), with its tributary the Axona (now Aisne) and Incaunus (now Yonne). This river has a slow current, and is navigable beyond Lutetia Parisiorum (now Paris).

SEQUANI, a powerful Celtic people in Gallia Belgica, separated from the Helvetii by Mons Jurassus, from the Ædii by the Arar, and from the province Narbonensis by the Rhone, inhabiting the country called Franche Comté and Burgundy. In the later division of the provinces of the empire, the country of the Sequani formed a special province under the name of Maxima Sequanorum. They derived their name from the River Sequana, which had its source in the northwestern frontiers of their territory; but their country was chiefly watered by the rivers Arar and Dubis. Their chief town was Vesontio (now Besançon). They were governed by kings of their own, and were constantly at war with the Ædii.

SEQUESTER, VIBIUS, the name attached to a glossary which professes to give an account of the geographical names contained in the Roman poets. The tract is divided into seven sections: 1. Flumina. 2. Fontes. 3. Lacus. 4. Nemora. 5. Paludes. 6. Montes. 7. Gentes. To which, in some MSS., an eighth is added, containing a list of the seven wonders of the world. Concerning the author personally we know nothing; and he probably lived not earlier than the middle of the fifth century. The best edition is by Oberlinus, Argent., 1778.

SERAPĪŌN (Σεραπίων), a physician of Alexandria, who lived in the third century B.C. He belonged to the sect of the Empirici, and so much extended and improved the system of Philinus, that the invention of it is by some authors attributed to him. Serapion wrote against Hippocrates with much vehemence; but neither this, nor any of his other works, is now extant. He is several times mentioned and quoted by Celsus, Galen, and others.

SERDICA or SARDICA, an important town in Upper Mœsia, and the capital of Dacia Interior, situated in a fertile plain near the sources of the Cæsus, and on the road from Naissus to Philippopolis. It was the birth-place of the Emperor Maximianus; it was destroyed by Attila, but was soon afterward rebuilt; and it bore in the Middle Ages the name of Triaditza. Its extensive ruins are to be seen south of Sophia. Serdica derived its name from the Thracian people SERDI.

SERĒNA, niece of Theodosius the Great, foster-mother of the Emperor Honorius, and wife of Stilicho.

SERĒNUS, ANNÆUS, one of the most intimate friends of the philosopher Seneca, who dedicated to him his work De Tranquillitate and De Constantia. He was prefectus vigilum under Nero, and died in consequence of eating a poisonous kind of fungus.

SERĒNUS, Q. SAMMONIUS, (or Samonicus), enjoyed a high reputation at Rome, in the early part of the third century after Christ, as a man of taste and varied knowledge. As the friend of Geta, by whom his compositions were studied with great pleasure, he was murdered while at supper, by command of Caracalla, A.D. 212, leaving behind him many learned works. His son, who bore the same name, was the preceptor of the younger Gordian, and bequeathed to his pupil the magnificent library which he had inherited from his father. A medical poem, extending to one hundred and fifteen hexameter lines, has descended to us under the title Q. Sereni Sammonici de Medicina præcepta saluberrima, or Præcepta de Medicina parvo pretio parabili, which is usually ascribed to the elder Sammonicus. It contains a considerable amount of information, extracted from the best authorities, on natural history and the healing art, mixed up with a number of puerile superstitions, the whole expressed in plain and almost prosaic language. The best edition is that of Burmann, in his Poëta Latini Minores (4to, Leid., 1731, vol. ii., p. 187-388).

SERĒNUS, A. SEPTIMIUS, a Roman lyric poet, who exercised his muse chiefly in depicting the charms of the country and the delight of rural pursuits. His works are lost, but are frequently quoted by the grammarians.

SERES. Vid. SERICA.

[SERGESTUS, a Trojan warrior, who accompanied Æneas to Italy after the destruction of Troy, and from whom the Sergia gens were fabled to have derived their name and lineage.]

[SERGIA, sister of Catiline, was married to Q. Cæcilius, a Roman eques, who was slain by his brother-in-law during the proscription of Sulla. Sergia, like her brother, bore a bad character.]

SERGIA GENS, patrician. The Sergii traced their descent from the Trojan Sergestus (Virg., Æn., v., 121). The Sergii were distinguished in the early history of the republic, and the first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was L. Sergius Fidenas, in B.C. 437. Catiline belonged to this gens. Vid. CATILINA. The Sergii bore also the surnames of Esquilinus, Fidenas, Orata, Paulus, Planicus, and Silus; but none of them are of sufficient importance to require a separate notice.

SERGIVS, a grammarian of uncertain date, but later than the fourth century after Christ, the author of two tracts; the first entitled In primam Donati Editionem Commentarium; the second, In secundam Donati Editionem Commentaria. They are printed in the Grammaticæ Latinæ auctores antiqui of Putschius (Hannov., 1605, p. 1816-1838).

SERĪCA (ἡ Σηρικὴ, Σῆρες; Sères, also rarely in the sing. Σῆρ, Sër), a country in the extreme east of Asia, famous as the native region of the silk-worm, which was also called σήρ; and hence the adjective "sericus" for silken. The name was known to the western nations at a very early period, through the use of silk, first in Western Asia, and afterward in Greece. It is clear, however, that, until some time after the commencement of our era, the name had no distinct geographical signification. Serica and Seres were simply the unknown country and people in the far East, from whom the article of commerce, silk, was obtained. At a later period, some knowledge of the country was obtained from the traders, the results of which are recorded by Ptolemy, who names several positions that can be identified with reasonable probability, but the detailed mention of which does not fall within the object of this work. The Serica of Ptolemy corresponds to the north-western part of China, and the adjacent portions of Tibet and Chinese Tartary. The capital, SERA, is supposed by most to be Singan, on the Hoang-ho, but by some Peking. The country was bounded, according to Ptolemy, on the north by unknown regions, on the west by Scythia, on the south and southeast by India and the Sinaë. The people were said by some to be of Indian, by others of Scythian origin, and by others to be a mixed race. The Great Wall of China is mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus under the name of Aggeres Serinum.

SERIPHUS (Σερίφος: Σερίφιος: now Serpho), an island in the Ægean Sea, and one of the Cyclades, lying between Cythus and Siphnus. It was a small rocky island about twelve miles in circumference. It is celebrated in mythology as the island where Danaë and Perseus landed after they had been exposed by Acrisius, where Perseus was brought up, and where he afterward turned the inhabitants into stone with the Gorgon's head. Seriphus was colonized by Ionians from Athens, and it was one of the few islands which refused submission to Xerxes. At a later time the inhabitants of Seriphus were noted for their poverty and wretchedness; and for this reason the island was employed by the Roman emperors as a place of banishment for state criminals. The ancient writers relate that the frogs in Seriphos were mute.

SERMYLA (Σερμύλη: Σερμύλιος), a town in Macedonia, on the isthmus of the peninsula Sithonia.

SERRANUS, ATILIVS. Serranus was originally an agnomen of C. Atilius Regulus, consul B.C. 257, but afterward became the name of a distinct family of the Atilia gens. Most of the ancient writers derive the name from serere, and relate that Regulus received the surname of Serranus, because he was engaged in sowing when the news was brought him of his elevation to the consulship (Virg., Æn., vi., 845). It appears, however, from coins, that Saranus is the proper form of the name, and some modern writers think that it is derived from Saranum, a town of Umbria.—1. C., prætor B.C. 218, the first year of the second Punic war, and was sent into Northern Italy. At a later period of the year he resigned his command to the consul P. Scipio. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship for 216.—2. C., curule ædile 193, with L. Scribonius Libo. They were the first ædiles who exhibited the Megalesia as ludi scenici. He was prætor 185.—3. A., prætor 192, when he obtained, as his province, Macedonia and the command of the fleet. He was prætor a second time in 173. He was consul in 170.—4. M., prætor 174, when he obtained the province of Sardinia.—5. M., prætor 152, in Further Spain, defeated the Lusitani.—6. SEX., consul 136.—7. C., consul 106 with Q. Servilius Cæpio, the year in which Cicero and Pompey were born. Although a “stultissimus homo” according to Cicero, he was elected in preference to Q. Catulus. He was one of the senators who took up arms against Saturninus in 100.—8. SEX., surnamed GAVIANUS, because he originally belonged to the Gavia gens. He was quæstor in 63 in the consulship of Cicero, who treated him with distinguished favor; but in his tribunate of the plebs, 57, he took an active part in opposing Cicero's recall from banishment. After Cicero's return to Rome he put his veto upon the decree of the senate restoring to Cicero the site on which his house had stood, but he found it advisable to withdraw his opposition.

SERRHIUM (Σέρρειον), a promontory of Thrace in the Ægean Sea, opposite the island of Samothrace, with a fortress of the same name upon it.

SERTORIUS, Q., one of the most extraordinary men in the later times of the republic, was a native of Nursia, a Sabine village, and was born of obscure but respectable parents. He served under Marius in the war against the Teutones; and before the battle of Aquæ Sextiæ (now Aix), B.C. 102, he entered the camp of the Teutones in disguise as a spy, for which hazardous undertaking his intrepid character and some knowledge of the Gallic language well qualified him. He also served as tribune militum in Spain under T. Didius (97). He was quæstor in 91, and had before this time lost an eye in battle. On the outbreak of the civil war in 88, he declared himself against the party of the nobles, though he was by no means an admirer of his old commander, C. Marius, whose character he well understood. He commanded one of the four armies which besieged Rome under Marius and Cinna. He was, however, opposed to the bloody massacre which ensued after Marius and Cinna entered Rome; and he was so indignant at the horrible deeds committed by the slaves whom Marius kept as guards, that he fell upon them in their camp, and speared four thousand of them. In 83 Sertorius was prætor, and either in this year or the following he went into Spain, which had been assigned to him as his province by the Marian party. After collecting a small body of troops in Spain, he crossed over to Mauretania, where he gained a victory over Paccianus, one of Sulla's generals. In consequence of his success in Africa, he was invited by the Lusitani, who were exposed to the invasion of the Romans, to become their leader. He gained great influence over the Lusitanians and the other barbarians in Spain, and soon succeeded in forming an army which for some years successfully opposed all the power of Rome. He also availed himself of the superstitious character of the people among whom he was to strengthen his authority over them. A fawn was brought to him by one of the natives as a present, which soon became so tame as to accompany him in his walks, and attend him on all occasions. After Sulla had become master of Italy, Sertorius was joined by many Romans who had been proscribed by the dictator; and this not only added to his consideration, but brought him many good officers. In 79 Metellus Pius was sent into Spain with a considerable force against Sertorius; but Metellus could effect nothing against the enemy. He was unable to bring Sertorius to any decisive battle, but was constantly harassed by the guerilla warfare of the latter. In 77 Sertorius was joined by M. Perperna with fifty-three cohorts. Vid. PERPERNA. To give some show of form to his formidable power, Sertorius established a senate of three hundred, into which no provincial was admitted; but, to soothe the more distinguished Spaniards, and to have some security for their fidelity, he established a school at Huesca (now Oscæ), in Aragon, for the education of their children in Greek and Roman learning. The continued want of success on the part of Metellus induced the Romans to send Pompey to his assistance, but with an independent command. Pompey arrived in Spain in 76 with thirty thousand infantry and one thousand cavalry, but even with this formidable force he was unable to gain any decisive advantages over Sertorius. For the next five years Sertorius kept both Metellus and Pompey at bay, and cut to pieces a large number of their forces. Sertorius was at length assassinated in 72 at a banquet by Perperna and some other Roman officers, who had long been jealous of the authority of their commander.

SERVILIA. 1. Daughter of Q. Servilius Cæpio and the daughter of Livia, the sister of the celebrated M. Livius Drusus, tribune of the plebs B.C. 91. Servilia was married twice; first to M. Junius Brutus, by whom she became the mother of the murderer of Cæsar, and secondly to D. Junius Silanus, consul 62. She was the favorite mistress of the dictator Cæsar; and it is reported that Brutus was her son by Cæsar. This tale, however, can not be true, as Cæsar was only fifteen years older than Brutus, the former having been born in 100, and the latter in 85. She survived both her lover and her son. After the battle of Philippi, Antony sent her the ashes of her son.—2. Sister of the preceding, was the second wife of L. Lucullus, consul 74. She bore Lucullus a son, but, like her sister, she was faithless to her husband; and the latter, after putting up with her conduct for some time from regard to M. Cato Uticensis, her half-brother, at length divorced her.

SERVILIA GENS, was one of the Alban houses removed to Rome by Tullus Hostilius. This gens was very celebrated during the early ages of the republic, and it continued to produce men of influence in the state down to the imperial period. It was divided into numerous families, of which the most important bore the names of AHALA, CÆPIO, CASCA, GLAUCIA, RULLUS, VATIA.

SERVIVS MAURVS HONORĀTUS, or SERVIVS MARIVS HONORĀTUS, a celebrated Latin grammarian, contemporary with Macrobius, who introduces him among the dramatis personæ of the Saturnalia. His most celebrated production was an elaborate commentary upon Virgil. This is, nominally at least, still extant; but, from the widely different forms which it assumes in different MSS., it is clear that it must have been changed and interpolated to such an extent by the transcribers of the Middle Ages that it is impossible to determine how much belongs to Servius and how much to later hands. Even in its present condition, however, it is deservedly regarded as the most important and valuable of all the Latin Scholia. It is attached to many of the earlier editions of Virgil, but it will be found under its best form in the edition of Virgil by Burmann. [A separate edition was published by Lion, Göttingen, 1825, 2 vols. 8vo.] We possess also the following treatises bearing the name of Servius: 1. In secundam Donati Editionem Interpretatio. 2. De Ratione ultimarum Syllabarum ad Aquilinum Liber. 3. Ars de centum Metris s. Centimetrum.

SERVIVS TULLIVS. Vid. TULLIVS.

SĒSĪMVS (Σησαίμωσ), a little coast river of Paphlagonia, with a town of the same name: both called afterward AMASTRIS.

SESOSTRIS (Σέσωστρις), the name given by the Greeks to the great King of Egypt, who is called in Manetho and on the monuments Ramses or Ramesses. Ramses is a name common to several kings of the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth dynasties; but Sesostris must be identified with Ramses, the third king of the nineteenth dynasty, the son of Seti, and the father of Menephtah. Sesostris was a great conqueror. He is said to have subdued Æthiopia, the greater part of Asia, and the Thracians in Europe; and in all the countries which he conquered he erected stela, on which he inscribed his own name. He returned to Egypt after an absence of nine years, and the countless captives whom he brought back with him were employed in the erection of numerous public works. Memorials of Ramses-Sesostris still exist throughout the whole of Egypt, from the mouth of the Nile to the south of Nubia. In the remains of his palace-temple at Thebes we see his victories and conquests represented on the walls, and we can still trace there some of the nations of Africa and Asia whom he subdued. The name of Sesostris is not found on monuments, and it was probably a popular surname given to the great hero of the nineteenth dynasty, and borrowed from Sesostris, one of the renowned kings of the twelfth dynasty, or perhaps from Sesorthus, a king of the third dynasty.

SESTIANÆ ARÆ (now Cape Villano), the most westerly promontory on the northern coast of Hispania Tarraconensis in Gallæcia, with three altars consecrated to Augustus.

SESTĪNUM (Sestinas, -atis: now Sestino), a town in Umbria, on the Apennines, near the sources of the Pisaurus.

SESTIVS. Vid. SEXTIVS.

SESTVS (Σηστός; Σήσιος: now Ialova), a town in Thraee, situated at the narrowest part of the Hellespont, opposite Abydos in Asia, from which it was only seven stadia distant. It was founded by the Æolians. It was celebrated in Grecian poetry on account of the loves of Leander and Hero (vid. LEANDER), and in history on account of the bridge of boats which Xerxes here built across the Hellespont. Sestus was always reckoned a place of importance in consequence of its commanding, to a great extent, the passage of the Hellespont. It was for some time in the possession of the Persians, but was retaken by the Greeks, B.C. 478, after a long siege. It subsequently formed part of the Athenian empire.

[SESVII, a people of Gallia Celtica, inhabiting part of the department de l'Orne and of that of Calvados: Seez, in the former of these, recalls the ancient name.]

SETĀBIS. Vid. SĒTABIS.

SETHON (Σηθών), a priest of Vulean (Hephæstus), made himself master of Egypt after the expulsion of Sabaeon, king of the Æthiopians, and was succeeded by the Dodearchia, or government of the twelve chiefs, which ended in the sole sovereignty of Psammitichus. Herodotus relates (ii., 141) that in Sethon's reign, Sanaeharibus, king of the Arabians and Assyrians, advanced against Egypt, at which Sethon was in great alarm, as he had insulted the warrior class, and deprived them of their lands, and they now refused to follow him to the war. But the god Vulcan (Hephæstus) came to his assistance; for while the two armies were encamped near Pelusium, the field-mice in the night gnawed to pieces the bow-strings, the quivers, and the shield-handles of the Assyrians, who fled on the following day with great loss. The recollection of this miracle was perpetuated by a statue of the king in the temple of Vulcan (Hephæstus), holding a mouse in his hand, and saying, "Let every man look at me and be pious." This Sanaeharibus is the Sennacherib of the Scriptures, and the destruction of the Assyrians at Pelusium is evidently only another version of the miraculous destruction of the Assyrians by the angel of the Lord, when they had advanced against Jerusalem in the reign of Hezekiah. According to the Jewish records, this event happened in B.C. 711.

SĒTĪA (Setinus: now Sezza or Sesse), an ancient town of Latium, in the east of the Pontine Marshes, originally belonged to the Volseian confederacy, but was subsequently taken by the Romans and colonized. It was here that the Romans kept the Carthaginian hostages. It was celebrated for the excellent wine grown in the neighborhood of the town, which was reckoned in the time of Augustus the finest wine in Italy.

[SETIUM PROMONTORIUM (now Cape Cette), a promontory on the south coast of Gallia, north-east of Agatha (now Agde), and near the island Blason (now Brescon).]

SEVERUS, M. AURELIUS ALEXANDER, usually called ALEXANDER SEVERUS, Roman emperor A.D. 222-235, the son of Gessius Marcianus and Julia Mamaea, and first cousin of Elagabalus, was born at Arce, in Phœnicia, in the temple of Alexander the Great, to which his parents had repaired for the celebration of a festival, the 1st of October, A.D. 205. His original name appears to have been Alexianus Bassianus, the latter appellation having been derived from his maternal grandfather. Upon the elevation of Elagabalus, he accompanied his mother and the court to Rome, a report having been spread abroad that he also, as well as the emperor, was the son of Caracalla. In 221 he was adopted by Elagabalus and created Cæsar. The names Alexianus and Bassianus were laid aside, and those of M. Aurelius Alexander substituted; M. Aurelius in virtue of his adoption; Alexander in consequence, as was asserted, of a direct revelation on the part of the Syrian god. On the death of Elagabalus, on the 11th of March, A.D. 222, Alexander ascended the throne, adding Severus to his other designations, in order to mark more explicitly the descent which he claimed from the father of Caracalla. After reigning in peace some years, during which he reformed many abuses in the state, he was involved in a war with Artaxerxes, king of Persia, who had lately founded the new empire of the Sassanidæ on the ruins of the Parthian monarchy. Alexander gained a great victory over Artaxerxes in 232; but he was unable to prosecute his advantage in consequence of intelligence having reached him of a great movement among the German tribes. He celebrated a triumph at Rome in 233, and in the following year (234) set out for Gaul, which the Germans were devastating; but, before he had made any progress in the campaign, he was waylaid by a small band of mutinous soldiers, instigated, it is said, by Maximinus, and slain, along with his mother, in the early part of 235, in the thirtieth year of his age and the fourteenth of his reign. Alexander Severus was distinguished by justice, wisdom, and clemency in all public transactions, and by the simplicity and purity of his private life.

SEVERUS, A. CÆCINA. Vid. CÆCINA.

SEVERUS, CASSIUS, a celebrated orator and satirical writer in the time of Augustus and Tiberius, was born about B.C. 50, at Longula, in Latium. He was a man of low origin and dissolute character, but was much feared by the severity of his attacks upon the Roman nobles. He must have commenced his career as a public slanderer very early, if he is the person against whom the sixth epode of Horace is directed, as is supposed by many ancient and modern commentators. Toward the latter end of the reign of Augustus, Severus was banished by Augustus to the island of Crete on account of his libellous verses; but as he still continued to write libels, he was removed by Tiberius, in A.D. 24, to the desolate island of Seriphos, where he died in great poverty in the twenty-fifth year of his exile, A.D. 33.

SEVERUS, CORNELIUS, the author of a poem entitled Bellum Siculum, was contemporary with Ovid, by whom he is addressed in one of the Epistles written from Pontus.

SEVERUS, FLAVIUS VALERIUS, Roman emperor A.D. 306-307. He was proclaimed Cæsar by Galerius in 305; and on the death of Constantius Chlorus in the following year, he was further proclaimed Augustus by Galerius. Soon afterward he was sent against Maxentius, who had assumed the imperial title at Rome. The expedition, however, was unsuccessful; and Severus, having surrendered at Ravenna, was taken prisoner to Rome and compelled to put an end to his life.

SEVERUS, LEBIUS, Roman emperor A.D. 461-465, was a Lucanian by birth, and owed his accession to Ricimer, who placed him on the throne after the assassination of Majorian. During his reign the real government was in the hands of Ricimer. Severus died a natural death.

SEVERUS, SEPTIMIUS L., Roman emperor A.D. 193-211, was born 146, near Leptis in Africa. After holding various important military commands under M. Aurelius and Commodus, he was at length appointed commander-in-chief of the army in Pannonia and Illyria. By this army he was proclaimed emperor after the death of Pertinax (193). He forthwith marched upon Rome, where Julianus had been made emperor by the prætorian troops. Julianus was put to death upon his arrival before the city. Vid. JULIANUS. Severus then turned his arms against Pescennius Niger, who had been saluted emperor by the eastern legions. The struggle was brought to a close by a decisive battle near Issus, in which Niger was defeated by Severus, and, having been shortly afterward taken prisoner, was put to death by order of the latter (194). Severus then laid siege to Byzantium, which refused to submit to him even after the death of Niger, and which was not taken till 196. The city was treated with great severity by Severus. Its walls were levelled with the earth, its soldiers and magistrates put to death, and the town itself, deprived of all its political privileges, made over to the Perinthians. During the continuance of this siege, Severus had crossed the Euphrates (195) and subdued the Mesopotamian Arabians. He returned to Italy in 196, and in the same year proceeded to Gaul to oppose Albinus, who had been proclaimed emperor by the troops in that country. Albinus was defeated and slain in a terrible battle fought near Lyons on the 19th of February, 197. Severus returned to Rome in the same year; but after remaining a short time in the capital, he set out for the East in order to repel the invasion of the Parthians, who were ravaging Mesopotamia. He crossed the Euphrates early in 198, and commenced a series of operations which were attended with brilliant results. Seleucia and Babylon were evacuated by the enemy, and Ctesiphon was taken and plundered after a short siege. After spending three years in the East, and visiting Arabia, Palestine, and Egypt, Severus returned to Rome in 202. For the next seven years he remained tranquilly at Rome, but in 203 he went to Britain with his sons Caracalla and Geta. Here he carried on war against the Caledonians, and erected the celebrated wall, which bore his name, from the Solway to the mouth of the Tyne. After remaining two years in Britain, he died at Eboracum (York) on the 4th of February, 211, in the sixty-fifth year of his age and the eighteenth of his reign.

SEVERUS, SULPICIUS, chiefly celebrated as an ecclesiastical historian, was a native of Aquitania, and flourished toward the close of the fourth century under Arcadius and Honorius. He was descended from a noble family, and was originally an advocate; but he eventually became a presbyter of the church, and attached himself closely to St. Martin of Tours. The extant works of Severus are, 1. Historia Sacra, an epitome of sacred history, extending from the creation of the world to the consulship of Stilicho and Aurelianus, A.D. 400. 2. Vita S. Martini Turonensis. 3. Tres Epistolæ. 4. Dialogi duo, containing a review of the dissensions which had arisen among ecclesiastics in the East regarding the works of Origen. 5. Epistolæ Sex. The best edition of the complete works of Severus is by Hieronymus de Prato, 4to, 2 vols., Veron., 1741-1754.

SEUTHES (Σεῦθος), the name of several kings of the Odrysians in Thrace. Of these the most important was the nephew of Sitalces, whom he succeeded on the throne in 424. During a long reign he raised his kingdom to a height of power and prosperity which it had never previously attained.

SEXTILÆ AQUÆ. Vid. AQUÆ SEXTILÆ.

SEXTIUS OR SESTIUS. 1. P., quæstor B.C. 63, and tribune of the plebs 57. In the latter year he took an active part in obtaining Cicero's recall from banishment. Like Milo, he kept a band of armed retainers to oppose P. Clodius and his partisans; and in the following year (56) he was accused of Vis on account of his violent acts during his tribunate. He was defended by Cicero in an oration still extant, and was acquitted on the 14th of March, chiefly in consequence of the powerful influence of Pompey. In 53 Sextius was prætor. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, Sextius first espoused Pompey's party, but he afterward joined Cæsar, who sent him, in 48, into Cappadocia. He was alive in 43, as appears from Cicero's correspondence.—2. L., son of the preceding by his first wife, Postumia. He served under M. Brutus in Macedonia, but subsequently became the friend of Augustus. One of Horace's odes is addressed to him.—3. T., one of Cæsar's legates in Gaul, and afterward governor of the province of Numidia or New Africa, at the time of Cæsar's death (44). Here he carried on war against Q. Cornificius, who held the province of Old Africa, and whom he defeated and slew in battle.

SEXTIUS CALVINUS. Vid. CALVINUS.

SEXTUS EMPIRICUS, was a physician, and received his name Empiricus from belonging to the school of the Empirici. He was a contemporary of Galen, and lived in the first half of the third century of the Christian era. Nothing is known of his life. He belonged to the Skeptical school of philosophy. Two of his works are extant: 1. Πυθώνια Ἰστοριῶσις ἢ σκεπτικὰ ὑπομνήματα, containing the doctrines of the Sceptics in three books. 2. Πρὸς τοὺς μαθηματικοὺς ἀντιρρητικοί, against the Mathematici; in eleven books, is an attack upon all positive philosophy. The first six books are a refutation of the six sciences of grammar, rhetoric, geometry, arithmetic, astrology, and music. The remaining five books are directed against logicians, physical philosophers, and ethical writers, and form, in fact, a distinct work, which may be viewed as belonging to the Ἰστοριῶσις. The two works are a great repository of doubts; the language is as clear and perspicuous as the subject will allow. Edited by Fabricius, Lips., 1718. [A reimpression of this edition appeared at Leipzig, 1842, 2 vols. 8vo: a new edition, with an amended text, was published by Bekker at Berlin, 1842.]

[SEXTUS, of Chæroneæ, Plutarch's sister's son, a Stoic philosopher, instructor of the Emperor Antoninus.]

SEXTUS RUFUS. 1. The name prefixed to a work entitled De Regionibus Urbis Romæ, published by Onuphrius Panvinus at Frankfort in 1558. This work is believed by the best topographers to have been compiled at a late period, and is not regarded as a document of authority.—2. SEXTUS RUFUS is also the name prefixed to an abridgment of Roman History in twenty-eight short chapters, entitled Breviarium de Victoriis et Provinciis Populi Romani, and executed by command of the Emperor Valens, to whom it is dedicated. This work is usually printed with the larger editions of Eutropius, and of the minor Roman historians. There are no grounds for establishing a connection between Sextus Rufus the historian and the author of the work De Regionibus.

SIBÆ OR SIBI (Σίβαι, Σίβοι), a rude people in the northwest of India (in the Punjab), above the confluence of the Rivers Hydaspes (now Jelum) and Acesines (now Chenab), who were clothed in skins and armed with clubs, and whom, therefore, the soldiers of Alexander regarded, whether seriously or in jest, as descendants of Hercules.

SIBYLLÆ (Σίβυλλαι), the name by which several prophetic women are designated. The first Sibyl, from whom all the rest are said to have derived their name, is called a daughter of Dardanus and Neso. Some authors mention only four Sibyls, the Erythræan, the Samian, the Egyptian, and the Sardinian; but it was more commonly believed that there were ten, namely, the Babylonian, the Libyan, the Delphian (an elder Delphian, who was a daughter of Zeus and Lamia, and a younger one), the Cimærian, the Erythræan (also an elder and a younger one, the latter of whom was called Herophile), the Samian, the Cumæan (sometimes identified with the Erythræan), the Hellespontian or Trojan, the Phrygian, and the Tiburtine. The most celebrated of these Sibyls is the Cumæan, who is mentioned under the names of Herophile, Deino, Phemonoë, Deiphobe, Demophile, and Amalthea. She was consulted by Æneas before he descended into the lower world. She is said to have come to Italy from the East, and she is the one who, according to tradition, appeared before King Tarquinius, offering him the Sibylline books for sale. SICĀRĪI (i. e., assassins), the name given by the Romans to certain savage mountain tribes of the Lebanon, who were, like the Thugs of India, avowed murderers by profession. In the same mountains there existed, at the time of the Crusades, a branch of the fanatic sect called Assassins, whose habits resembled those of the Sicarii, and whose name the Crusaders imported into Europe; but these were of Arabian origin.

SICCA VENERIA (now probably Al-Kaff), a considerable city of Northern Africa, on the frontier of Numidia and Zcugitana, built on a hill near the River Bagradas. It derived its name from a temple of Venus, in which the goddess was worshipped with rites peculiar to the corresponding Eastern deity Astarte, whence it may be inferred that the place was a Phœnician settlement.

SICHÆUS, also called Acerbas. Vid. ACERBAS.

SICILĪA (now Sicily), one of the largest islands in the Mediterranean Sea. It was supposed by the ancients to be the same as the Homeric island Thrinacia (Θρινακία), and it was therefore frequently called THRINACIA, TRINACIA, or TRINACRIS, a name which was believed to be derived from the triangular figure of the island. For the same reason, the Roman poets called it TRIQUETRA. Its more usual name came from its later inhabitants, the Siceli, whence it was called SICELIA (Σικελία), which the Romans changed into SICILIA. As the Siceli also bore the name of Sicani, the island was also called SICANIA (Σικανία). Sicily is separated from the southern coast of Italy by a narrow channel called FRETUM SICULUM, sometimes simply FRETUM (Πορθμός), and also SCYLLÆUM FRETUM, of which the modern name is Faro di Messina. The sea on the east and south of the island was also called MARE SCULUM. The island itself is in the shape of a triangle. The northern and southern sides are about one hundred and seventy-five miles each in length, not including the windings of the coast; and the length of the eastern side is about one hundred and fifteen miles. The northwestern point, the Promontorium Lilybæum, is about ninety miles from Cape Bon, on the coast of Africa; the northeastern point, Promontorium Pelorus, is about three miles from the coast of Calabria in Italy; and the southeastern point, Promontorium Pachynus, is sixty miles from the island of Malta. Sicily formed originally part of Italy, and was torn away from it by some volcanic eruption, as the ancients generally believed. A range of mountains, which are a continuation of the Apennines, extends throughout the island from east to west. The general name of this mountain range was Nebrodi Montes (now Madonia), of which there were several offshoots known by different names. Of these the most important were the celebrated volcano Ætna on the eastern side of the island, Eryx (now St. Giuliano) in the extreme west, near Drepanum, and the Heræi Montes (now Monti Sori) in the south, running down to the promontory Pachynus. A large number of rivers flow down from the mountains, but most of them are dry, or nearly so, in the summer. The soil of Sicily was very fertile, and produced in antiquity an immense quantity of wheat, on which the population of Rome relied to a great extent for their subsistence. So celebrated was it even in early times on account of its corn, that it was represented as sacred to Demeter (Ceres), and as the favorite abode of this goddess. Hence it was in this island that her daughter Persephone (Proserpina) was carried away by Pluto. Besides corn the island produced excellent wine, saffron, honey, almonds, and the other southern fruits. The earliest inhabitants of Sicily are said to have been the savage Cyclôpes and Læstrygônes; but these are fabulous beings, and the first inhabitants mentioned in history are the SICĀNI (Σικανοί) or SICĒLI (Σικελοί), who crossed over into the island from Italy. Some writers, indeed, regard the Sicani and Siculi as two distinct tribes, supposing the latter only to have migrated from Italy, and the former to have been the aboriginal inhabitants of the country; but there is no good reason for making any distinction between them. They appear to have been a Celtic people. According to Thucydides, their original settlement was on the River Sicanus in Iberia; but as Thucydides extends Iberia as far as the Rhone, it is probable that Sicanus was a river of Gaul, and it may have been the Sequana, as some modern writers suppose. The ancient writers relate that these Sicani, being hard pressed by the Ligyes (Ligures), crossed the Alps and settled in Latium, that, being driven out of this country by the Aborigines with the help of Pelasgians, they migrated to the south of the peninsula, where they lived for a considerable time along with the CEnotrians; and that at last they crossed over to Sicily, to which they gave their name. They spread over the greater part of the island, but in later times were found chiefly in the interior and in the northern part; some of the most important towns belonging to them were Herbita, Agryium, Adranum, and Enna. The next immigrants into the island were Cretans, who are said to have come to Sicily under their king, Minos, in pursuit of Dædalus, and to have settled on the southern coast in the neighborhood of Agrigentum, where they founded Minoa (afterward Heraclea Minoa). Then came the Elymæi, a small band of fugitive Trojans, who are said to have built Entella, Eryx, and Egesta. These Cretans and Elymæi, however, if indeed they ever visited Sicily, soon became incorporated with the Siculi. The Phœnicians, likewise, at an early period formed settlements, for the purposes of commerce, on all the coasts of Sicily, but more especially on the northern and northwestern parts. They were subsequently obliged to retire from the greater part of their settlements before the increasing power of the Greeks, and to confine themselves to Motya, Solûs, and Panormus. But the most important of all the immigrants into Sicily were the Greeks. The first body of Greeks who landed in the island were Chalcidians from Eubœa, and Megarians led by the Athenian Thucles. These Greek colonists built the town of Naxos, B.C. 735. They were soon followed by other Greek colonists, who founded a number of very flourishing cities, such as Syracuse in 734, Leontini and Catana in 730, Megara Hybla in 726, Gela in 690, Selinus in 626, Agrigentum in 579, etc. The Greeks soon became the ruling race in the island, and received the name of Σικελιώται (Σικελιώται) to distinguish them from the earlier inhabitants. At a later time the Carthaginians obtained a firm footing in Sicily. Their first attempt was made in 480; but they were defeated by Gelon of Syracuse, and obliged to retire with great loss. Their second invasion in 409 was more successful. They took Selinus in this year, and four years afterward (405) the powerful city of Agrigentum. They now became the permanent masters of the western part of the island, and were engaged in frequent wars with Syracuse and the other Greek cities. The struggle between the Carthaginians and Greeks continued, with a few interruptions, down to the first Punic war; and at the close of which (241) the Carthaginians were obliged to evacuate the island, the western part of which now passed into the hands of the Romans, and was made a Roman province. The eastern part still continued under the rule of Hieron of Syracuse as an ally of Rome; but after the revolt of Syracuse in the second Punic war, and the conquest of that city by Marcellus, the whole island was made a Roman province, and was administered by a prætor. Under the Roman dominion more attention was paid to agriculture than to commerce; and, consequently, the Greek cities on the coast gradually declined in prosperity and in wealth. The inhabitants of the province received the Jus Latii from Julius Cæsar; and Antony conferred upon them, in accordance, as it was said, with Cæsar's will, the full Roman franchise. Augustus, after his conquest of Sex. Pompey, who had held the island for several years, founded colonies at Messana, Tauromenium, Catana, Syracuse, Thermæ, and Panormus. On the downfall of the Roman empire, Sicily formed part of the kingdom of the Ostrogoths; but it was taken from them by Belisarius in A.D. 536, and annexed to the Byzantine empire. It continued a province of this empire till 828, when it was conquered by the Saracens. Literature and the arts were cultivated with great success in the Greek cities of Sicily. It was the birth-place of the philosophers Empedocles, Epicharmus, and Dicæarchus; of the mathematician Archimedes; of the physicians Herodicus and Acron; of the historians Diodorus, Antiochus, Philistus, and Timæus; of the rhetorician Gorgias and of the poets Stesichorus and Theocritus.

SICINIUS. 1. L. SICINIUS BELLUTUS, the leader of the plebeians in their secession to the Sacred Mount in B.C. 494. He was chosen one of the first tribunes.—2. L. SICINIUS DENTATUS, called by some writers the Roman Achilles. He is said to have fought in one hundred and twenty battles, to have slain eight of the enemy in single combat, to have received forty-five wounds on the front of his body, and to have accompanied the triumphs of nine generals, whose victories were principally owing to his valor. He was tribune of the plebs in 454. He was put to death by the decemvirs in 450, because he endeavored to persuade the plebeians to secede to the Sacred Mount. The persons sent to assassinate him fell upon him in a lonely spot, but he killed most of them before they succeeded in dispatching him.

[SICINNUS or SICINUS (Σικίννος, Σικίνος), a Persian, according to Plutarch, a slave of Themistocles, and παιδαγωγός to his children. In B.C. 480 he was employed by his master to convey to Xerxes the intelligence of the intended flight of the Greeks from Salamis; and after the battle, when the Greeks had desisted from the further pursuit of the Persians, Themistocles again sent Sicinnus, with others, to Xerxes, to claim merit with him for having dissuaded the Greeks from intercepting his flight. As a reward for his services, Themistocles afterward enriched Sicinnus, and obtained for him the citizenship of Thespiæ.]

SICINUS (Σικίνος; Σικινίτης; now Sikino), a small island in the Ægean Sea, one of the Sporades, between Phlogandrus and Ios, with a town of the same name. It is said to have been originally called Cenoë from its cultivation of the vine, but to have been named Sicinus after a son of Thoas and Cenoë. It was probably colonized by the Ionians. During the Persian war it submitted to Xerxes, but it afterward formed part of the Athenian maritime empire.

SICŪRIS (now Segre), a river in Hispania Tarraconensis, which had its source in the territory of the Cerrctani, divided the Ilorgetes and Iacetani, flowed by Ilerda, and after receiving the River Cinga (now Cinca), fell into the Iberus near Octogesa.

SICYŌNIA (Σικυωνία), a small district in the northeast of Peloponnesus, bounded on the east by the territory of Corinth, on the west by Achæa, on the south by the territory of Phlius and Cleonæ, and on the north by the Corinthian Gulf. The area of the country was probably somewhat less than one hundred square miles. It consisted of a plain near the sea, with mountains in the interior. Its rivers, which ran in a northeasterly direction, were Sythas on the frontier of Achæa, Helisson, Selleis, and Asopus in the interior, and Nemea on the frontier of the territory of Corinth. The land was fertile, and produced excellent oil. Its almonds and its fish were also much prized. Its chief town was SICYŌN (Σικυῶν : Σικυώνιος), which was situated a little to the west of the River Asopus, and at the distance of twenty, or, according to others, twelve stadia from the sea. The ancient city, which was situated in the plain, was destroyed by Demetrius Polioretetes, and a new city, which bore for a short time the name of Demetrias, was built by him on the high ground close to the Acropolis. The harbor, which, according to some, was connected with the city by means of long walls, was well fortified, and formed a town of itself. Sicyon was one of the most ancient cities of Greece. It is said to have been originally called Ægialæa or Ægiali (Αἰγιάλεια, Αἰγιαλοί), after an ancient king, Ægialeus; to have been subsequently named Mecōne (Μηκωνή), and to have been finally called Sicyon from an Athenian of this name. Sicyon is represented by Homer as forming part of the empire of Agamemnon; but on the invasion of Peloponnesus it became subject to Phalces, the son of Telemus, and was henceforward a Dorian state. The ancient inhabitants, however, were formed into a fourth tribe called Ægialeis, which possessed equal rights with the three tribes of the Hylleis, Pamphyli, and Dymnatæ, into which the Dorian conquerors were divided. Sicyon, on account of the small extent of its territory, never attained much political importance, and was generally dependent either on Argos or Sparta. At the time of the second Messenian war it became subject to a succession of tyrants, who administered their power with moderation and justice for one hundred years. The first of these tyrants was Andreas, who began to rule B.C. 676. He was followed in succession by Myron, Aristonymus, and Clisthenes, on whose death, about 576, a republican form of government was established. Clisthenes had no male children, but only a daughter, Agariste, who was married to the Athenian Megacles. In the Persian war the Sicyonians sent fifteen ships to the battle of Salamis, and three hundred hoplites to the battle of Plataeæ. In the interval between the Persian and the Peloponnesian wars, the Sicyonians were twice defeated and their country laid waste by the Athenians, first under Tolmides in 456, and again under Pericles in 454. In the Peloponnesian war they took part with the Spartans. From this time till the Macedonian supremacy their history requires no special mention; but in the middle of the third century Sicyon took an active part in public affairs, in consequence of its being the native town of Aratus, who united it to the Achæan league in 251. Under the Romans it gradually declined; and in the time of Pausanias, in the second century of the Christian era, many of its public buildings were in ruins. Sicyon was for a long time the chief seat of Grecian art. It gave its name to one of the great schools of painting, which was founded by Eupompus, and which produced Pamphilus and Apelles. It is also said to have been the earliest school of statuary in Greece, which was introduced into Sicyon by Dipœnus and Seyllis from Crete about 560; but its earliest native artist of celebrity was Canachus. Iy-sippus was also a native of Sicyon. The town was likewise celebrated for the taste and skill displayed in the various articles of dress made by its inhabitants, among which we find mention of a particular kind of shoe, which was much prized in all parts of Greece.

SIDA, SIDE (Σίδη, Σιδίτης, and Σιδήτης, Sidites and Sidetes). 1. (Ruins at Eski Adalia), a city of Pamphylia, on the coast, a little west of the River Melas. It was an Æolian colony from Cyne in Æolis, and was a chief seat of the worship of Minerva (Athena), who is represented on its coins holding a pomegranate (σίδη) as the emblem of the city. In the division of the provinces under Constantine, it was made the capital of Pamphylia Prima.—2. The old name of POLEMONIUM, from which a flat district in the northeast of Pontus Polemoniacus, along the coast, obtained the name of Sidene (Σιδήνη).

[SIDENE (Σιδήνη), a town of Mysia, on the Granicus, already, in Strabo's time, destroyed.] [SIDERO (Σιδήρω), wife of Salmoneus, step-mother of Tyro, was slain by Pelias in the grove and at the altar of Juno.]

SIDICINI, an Ausonian people in the northwest of Campania and on the borders of Samnium, who, being hard pressed by the Samnites, united themselves to the Campanians. Their chief town was Teanum.

SIDON, gen. -ONIS (Σιδών, gen. Σιδώνος, sometimes also Σιδόνος, in the Old Testament Tsidon, or, in the English form, Zidon : Σιδών, Σιδώνιος, Σιδόνιος, Sidonius : ruins at Saida), for a long time the most powerful, and probably the most ancient of the cities of Phœnicæ. As early as the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites it is called "Great Zidon" (Joshua, xi., 8). It stood in a plain, about a mile wide, on the coast of the Mediterranean, two hundred stadia (twenty geographical miles) north of Tyre, four hundred stadia (forty geographical miles) south of Berytus, sixty-six miles west of Damascus, and a day's journey northwest of the source of the Jordan at Paneas. It had a fine double harbor, now almost filled with sand, and was strongly fortified. It was the chief seat of the maritime power of Phœnicæ, until eclipsed by its own colony, Tyre (vid. TYRUS); and its power on the land side seems to have extended over all Phœnicæ, and at one period (in the time of the Judges) over at least a part of Palestine. In the time of David and Solomon, Sidon appears to have been subject to the King of Tyre. It probably regained its former rank, as the first of the Phœnician cities, by its submission to Shalmanezar at the time of the Assyrian conquest of Syria, for we find it governed by its own king under the Babylonians and Persians. In the expedition of Xerxes against Greece, the Sidonians furnished the best ships in the whole fleet, and their king obtained the highest place, next to Xerxes, in the council, and above the King of Tyre. Sidon received the great blow to her prosperity in the reign of Artaxerxes III. Ochus, when the Sidonians, having taken part in the revolt of Phœnice and Cyprus, and being betrayed to Ochus by their own king Tennes, burned themselves with their city, B.C. 351. The city was rebuilt, but the fortifications were not restored, and the place was therefore of no further importance in military history. It shared the fortunes of the rest of Phœnice, and under the Romans it retained much of its commercial importance, which it has not yet entirely lost. In addition to its commerce, Sidon was famed for its manufactures of glass, the invention of which was said to have been made in Phœnicia.

SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS, whose full name was C. Sollius Sidonius Apollinaris, was born at Lugdunum (now Lyons) about A.D. 431. At an early age he married Papianilla, the child of Flavius Avitus; and upon the elevation of his father-in-law to the imperial dignity (456) he accompanied him to Rome, and celebrated his consulship in a poem still extant. Avitus raised Sidonius to the rank of a senator, nominated him prefect of the city, and caused his statue to be placed among the effigies which graced the library of Trajan. The downfall of Avitus threw a cloud over the fortunes of Sidonius, who, having been shut up in Lyons, and having endured the hardships of the siege, purchased pardon by a complimentary address to the victorious Majorian. The poet was not only forgiven, but was rewarded with a laureled bust, and with the title of count. After passing some years in retirement during the reign of Severus, Sidonius was dispatched to Rome (467) in the character of ambassador from the Arverni to Anthemius, and on this occasion delivered a third panegyric in honor of a third prince, which proved not less successful than his former efforts, for he was now raised to the rank of a patrician, again appointed prefect of the city, and once more honored with a statue. But a still more remarkable tribute was soon afterward rendered to his talents; for, although not a priest, the vacant see of Clermont in Auvergne was forced upon his reluctant acceptance (472) at the death of the bishop Eparelius. During the remainder of his life he devoted himself to the duties of his sacred office, and especially resisted with energy the progress of Arianism. He died in 482, or, according to others, in 484. The extant works of Sidonius are, 1. Carmina, twenty-four in number, composed in various measures upon various subjects. Of these the most important are the three panegyrics already mentioned. 2. Epistolarum Libri IX., containing one hundred and forty-seven letters, many of them interspersed with pieces of poetry. They are addressed to a wide circle of relatives and friends upon topics connected with politics, literature, and domestic occurrences, but seldom touch upon ecclesiastical matters. The writings of Sidonius are characterized by great subtlety of thought, expressed in phraseology abounding with harsh and violent metaphors. Hence he is generally obscure; but his works throughout bear the impress of an acute, vigorous, and highly-cultivated intellect. The best edition of his works is that of Sirmond, 4to, Paris, 1652.—[2. A sophist in Athens in the second century after Christ.]

SIDŪS (Σιδούς, -οὔρος : Σιδούριος), a fortified place in the territory of Corinth, on the bay of Cenchræa, and a little to the east of Crommyon. It was celebrated for its apples.

SIDUSSA (Σιδούσσα), a small place in Lydia, belonging to the territory of the Ionian city of Erythræ.

SIDŪMA (τὰ Σίδυμα: ruins at Tortoorcar Hisar), a town in the interior of Lycia, on a mountain, north of the mouth of Xanthus.

SIGA (Σίγα), a considerable sea-port town of Mauretania Cæsariensis, on a river of the same name, the mouth of which opened into a large bay, which formed the harbor of the town. Its site has not been identified with certainty.

[SIGEÏ CAMPI, in the Æneid of Virgil (vii., 294), the region around the Sigeum Promontorium.]

SIGĒUM (now Ycnisheri), the northwestern promontory of the Troad, of Asia Minor, and of all Asia, and the southern headland at the entrance of the Hellespont, opposite to the Promontorium Mastusium (now Cape Helles), at the extremity of the Thracian Chersonese. It is here that Homer places the Grecian fleet and camp during the Trojan war. Near it was a sea-port town of the same name, which was the object of contention between the Æolians and the Athenians in the war in which Pittacus distinguished himself by his valor, and in which Alcæus lost his shield. Vid. PITTACUS, ALCÆUS. It was afterward the residence of the Pisistratidæ, when they were expelled from Athens. It was destroyed by the people of Ilium soon after the Macedonian conquest.

SIGNIA (Signinus: now Segni), a town in Latium, on the east side of the Volscian Mountains, founded by Tarquinius Priscus. It was celebrated for its temple of Jupiter Urius, for its astringent wine, for its pears, and for a particular kind of pavement for the floors of houses, called opus Signinum, consisting of plaster made of tiles beaten to powder and tempered with mortar. There are still remains of the polygonal walls of the ancient town.

SIGRIUM (Σιγριον: now Sigri), the western promontory of the island of Lesbos.

SILA SILVA (now Sila), a large forest in Brutium, on the Apennines, extending south of Consentia to the Sicilian Straits, a distance of seven hundred stadia. It was celebrated for the excellent pitch which it yielded.

[SILANA (now probably Poliana), a city in the western part of Thessaly, south of the Peneus.]

SILANION (Σιλανίων), a distinguished Greek statuarius in bronze, was an Athenian and a contemporary of Lysippus, and flourished 324. The statues of Silanion belonged to two classes, ideal and actual portraits. Of the former the most celebrated was his dying Jocasta, in which a deadly paleness was given to the face by the mixture of silver with the bronze. His statue of Sappho, which stood in the prytaneum at Syracuse in the time of Verres, is alluded to by Cicero in terms of the highest praise.

SILANUS, JUNIUS. 1. M., was prætor 212 B.C. In 210 he accompanied P. Scipio to Spain, and served under him with great distinction during the whole of the war in that country. He fell in battle against the Boii in 196, fighting under the consul M. Marcellus.—2. D., surnamed MANLIANUS, son of the jurist T. Manlius Torquatus, but adopted by a D. Junius Silanus. He was prætor 142, and obtained Macedonia as his province. Being accused of extortion by the inhabitants of the province, the senate referred the investigation of the charges to his own father Torquatus, who condemned his son, and banished him from his presence; and when Silanus hanged himself in grief, his father would not attend his funeral.—3. M., consul 109, fought in this year against the Cimbri in Transalpine Gaul, and was defeated. He was accused in 104, by the tribune Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, in consequence of this defeat, but was acquitted.—4. D., stepfather of M. Brutus, the murderer of Cæsar, having married his mother Servilia. He was elected consul in 63 for the following year; and in consequence of his being consul designatus, he was first asked for his opinion by Cicero in the debate in the senate on the punishment of the Catilinarian conspirators. He was consul 62, with L. Licinius Murena, along with whom he proposed the Lex Licinia Julia.—5. M., son of No. 4 and of Servilia, served in Gaul as Cæsar's legatus in 53. After Cæsar's murder in 44, he accompanied M. Lepidus over the Alps; and in the following year Lepidus sent him with a detachment of troops into Cisalpine Gaul, where he fought on the side of Antony. He was consul in 25. He had two sisters, one married to M. Lepidus, the triumvir, and the other to C. Cassius, one of Cæsar's murderers.—6. M., consul A.D. 19, with L. Norbanus Balbus. In 33 his daughter Claudia was married to C. Cæsar, afterward the Emperor Caligula. Silanus was governor of Africa in the reign of Caligula, but was compelled by his father-in-law to put an end to his life. Julius Græcinus, the father of Agricola, had been ordered by Caligula to accuse Silanus, but he declined the odious task.—7. APP., consul A.D. 28, with P. Silius Nerva. Claudius, soon after his accession, gave to Silanus in marriage Domitia Lepida, the mother of his wife Messalina, and treated him otherwise with the greatest distinction. But shortly afterward, having refused the embraces of Messalina, he was put to death by Claudius, on the accusations of Messalina and Narcissus. The first wife of Silanus was Emilia Lepida, the proneptis or great-granddaughter of Augustus.—8. M., son of No. 7, consul 46. Silanus was proconsul of Asia at the succession of Nero in 54, and was poisoned by command of Agrippina, who feared that he might avenge the death of his brother (No. 9), and that his descent from Augustus might lead him to be preferred to the youthful Nero.—9. L., also a son of No. 7, was betrothed to Octavia, the daughter of the Emperor Claudius; but when Octavia was married to Nero in 48, Silanus knew that his fate was sealed, and therefore put an end to his life.—10. D. JUNIUS TORQUATUS SILANUS, probably also a son of No. 7, was consul 53. He was compelled by Nero in 64 to put an end to his life, because he had boasted of being descended from Augustus.—11. L. JUNIUS TORQUATUS SILANUS, son of No. 8, and consequently the atnepos, or great-great-grandson of Augustus. His descent from Augustus rendered him an object of suspicion to Nero. He was accordingly accused in 65; was sentenced to banishment; and was shortly afterward put to death at Barium in Apulia.

SILĀRUS (now Silaro), a river in Lower Italy, forming the boundary between Lucania and Campania, rises in the Apennines, and, after receiving the Tanager (now Negri) and Calor (now Calore), falls into the Sinus Pæstanus a little to the north of Pæstum. Its water is said to have petrified plants.

SILĒNUS (Σειληνός). 1. (Mythological.) It is remarked in the article Satyri that the older Satyrs were generally termed Sileni; but one of these Sileni is commonly the Silenus, who always accompanies the god, and whom he is said to have brought up and instructed. Like the other Satyrs, he is called a son of Mercury (Hermes); but others make him a son of Pan by a nymph, or of Terra (Gæa). Being the constant companion of Bacchus (Dionysus), he is said, like the god, to have been born at Nysa. Moreover, he took part in the contest with the Giants, and slew Enceladus. He is described as a jovial old man, with a bald head, a puck nose, fat and round like his wine bag, which he always carried with him, and generally intoxicated. As he could not trust his own legs, he is generally represented riding on an ass, or supported by other Satyrs. In every other respect he is described as resembling his brethren in their love of sleep, wine, and music. He is mentioned, along with Marsyas and Olympus, as the inventor of the flute, which he is often seen playing; and a special kind of dance was called after him Silenus, while he himself is designated as the dancer. But it is a peculiar feature in his character that he was conceived also as an inspired prophet, who knew all the past and the most distant future, and as a sage who despised all the gifts of fortune. When he was drunk and asleep, he was in the power of mortals, who might compel him to prophesy and sing by surrounding him with chains of flowers.—2. (Literary.) A native of Calatia, [wrote a work entitled Σικελικά in at least three books; he also wrote an account of the campaigns of Hannibal, in whose camp he was, and with whom he lived as long as fortune permitted, says Cornelius Nepos: he was also] a writer upon Roman history.—3. It was probably a different writer from the last, who is quoted several times by Athenæus and others as the author of a work on foreign words. [Silenus also compiled a collection of fabulous histories.]

SILICENSE FLUMEN, a river in Hispania Bætica, in the neighborhood of Corduba, probably the Guadajoz, or a tributary of the latter.

[SILICIUS, P. (CORONAS), one of the judges appointed to try the conspirators against the life of Cæsar in B.C. 43, according to the Lex

Pedia. He voted for the acquittal of M. Brutus, and was, on this account, afterward proscribed by the triumvirs.]

SILIUS ITALICUS, C., a Roman poet, was born about A.D. 25. The place of his birth is uncertain, as is also the import of his surname Italicus. From his early years he devoted himself to oratory and poetry, taking Cicero as his model in the former and Virgil in the latter. He acquired great reputation as an advocate, and was afterward one of the Centumviri. He was consul in 68, the year in which Nero perished; he was admitted to familiar intercourse with Vitellius, and was subsequently proconsul of Asia. His two favorite residences were a mansion near Puteoli, formerly the Academy of Cicero, and the house in the vicinity of Naples once occupied by Virgil; and here he continued to reside until he had completed his seventy-fifth year, when, in consequence of the pain caused by an incurable disease, he starved himself to death. The great work of Silius Italicus was a heroic poem in seventeen books, entitled Punica, which has descended to us entire. It contains a narrative of the events of the second Punic war, from the capture of Saguntum to the triumph of Scipio Africanus. The materials are derived almost entirely from Livy and Polybius. It is a dull, heavy performance, and hardly deserves the name of a poem. The best editions are by Drakenborch, 4to, Traj. ad Rhen., 1717, and Ruperti, 2 vols. 8vo, Goetting., 1795.

[SILO ABRONIUS. Vid. ABRONIUS SILO.]

SILO, Q. POMPÆDIUS, the leader of the Marsi in the Social war, and the soul of the whole undertaking. He fell in battle against Q. Metellus Pius, B.C. 88, and with his death the war came to an end.

SILO (Σηλώ, Σηλώ, Σηλών, Σηλοῦν: in the Old Testament, Shiloh and Shilon: ruins at Scilun), a city of Palestine, in the mountains of Ephraim, in the district afterward called Samaria; important as the seat of the sacred ark and the tabernacle from the time of Joshua to the capture of the ark in the time of Eli, after which it seems to have fallen into insignificance, though it is occasionally mentioned in the Old Testament.

SILŌAH, SILŌAM (Σηλωά, Σηλωάμ: in the Old Testament, Shiloh: now Siloah), a celebrated fountain in the southeast of Jerusalem, just without the city, at the southern entrance of the valley called Tyropæon, between the hills of Zion and Moriah. It is remarkable for the ebb and flow of its waters at the different seasons.

[SILPIA, a city of Hispania Bætica, north of the Bætis, to be sought for in the Sierra Morena. Reichard considers it as identical with the Ἥλιπγα of Polybius, which lay in this same region, and as corresponding to the modern Linares.]

SILSĪLIS (Σηλσιλις: now ruins at Hajjar Selseh or Jebel Selseh), a fortified station in Upper Egypt, on the western bank of the Nile, south of Apollinopolis the Great. The name signifies the Rock or Hill of a Chain, and is derived from the circumstance of the river flowing here in a ravine so narrow that a chain can easily be stretched across it to command the navigation.

SILŪRES, a powerful people in Britain, inhabiting South Wales, long offered a formidable resistance to the Romans, and were the only people in the island who at a later time maintained their independence against the Saxons.

[SILUS, ALBUCCIUS C., a Roman rhetorician, a native of Novaria, in the north of Italy, was ædile in his native town. Having left Novaria in consequence of a public insult, he repaired to Rome in the time of Augustus, and there acquired great renown by his oratory in the school of Plancus. Failing in one of his causes as a pleader, he left Rome for Milan, but finally retired to his native town, and there put an end to his life.]

[SILUS DOMITIUS, the former husband of Arria Galla, whom he quietly surrendered to Piso.]

SILVĀNUS, a Latin divinity of the fields and forests, to whom in the earliest times the Tyrrhenian Pelasgians are said to have dedicated a grove and a festival. He is also called the protector of the boundaries of fields. In connection with woods (sylvestris deus), he especially presided over plantations, and delighted in trees growing wild; whence he is represented as carrying the trunk of a cypress. Respecting his connection with cypress, moreover, the following story is told. Silvanus, or, according to others, Apollo, once killed by accident a hind belonging to the youth Cyparissus, with whom the god was in love: the youth, in consequence, died of grief, and was metamorphosed into a cypress. Silvanus is further described as the divinity protecting the flocks of cattle, warding off wolves, and promoting their fertility. Being the god of woods and flocks, he is also described as fond of music; the syrinx was sacred to him, and he is mentioned along with the Pans and Nymphs. Later writers even identified Silvanus with Pan, Faunus, Inuus, and Ægipan. In the Latin poets, as well as in works of art, he always appears as an old man, but as cheerful and in love with Pomona. The sacrifices offered to him consisted of grapes, corn-ears, milk, meat, wine, and pigs.

SILVĪUM (Silvius), a town of the Peucetii in Apulia, on the borders of Lucania, twenty miles southeast of Venusia.

SILVĪUS, the son of Ascanius, is said to have been so called because he was born in a wood. All the succeeding kings of Alba bore the cognomen Silvius. The series of these mythical kings is given somewhat differently by Livy, Ovid, and Dionysius, as the following list will show:

Livy.	Ovid.	Dionysius.
1. Æneas.	Æneas.	Æneas.
2. Ascanius.	Ascanius.	Ascanius.
3. Silvius.	Silvius.	Silvius.

13. Aventinus.	Aventinus.	Aventinus.
14. Proca.	Palatinus.	Procas.
15. Amulius.	Amulius.	Amulius.

[SIMARISTUS (Σμαρίστος), a Greek grammarian]

nan, author of a work entitled Συνώνυμα in at least four books.]

[SIMBRIVII LACUS, called by Tacitus SIMBRIVIA STAGNA, three small lakes formed by the Anio, in Latium, between Sublaquum and Treba, famed for the coolness and salutary properties of their waters. They were used by Claudius to increase the volume of the Aqua Claudia (vid. ROMA, p. 754, a), and by Nero to irrigate and beautify his Sublaquean villa.]

SIMMIAS (Σιμμίας). 1. Of Thebes, first the disciple of the Pythagorean philosopher Philolaus, and afterward the friend and disciple of Socrates, at whose death he was present, having come from Thebes with his brother Cebes. The two brothers are the principal speakers, besides Socrates himself, in the Phædon. Simmias wrote twenty-three dialogues on philosophical subjects, all of which are lost.—2. Of Rhodes, a poet and grammarian of the Alexandrian school, flourished about B.C. 300. The Greek Anthology contains six epigrams ascribed to Simmias, besides three short poems of that fantastic species called griphi or carmina figurata, that is, pieces in which the lines are so arranged as to make the whole poem resemble the form of some object; those of Simmias are entitled, from their forms, the Wings (πτερυγες), the Egg (ὄνυ), and the Hatchet (πέλεκυς).

[SIMMIAS (Σιμμίας), a Macedonian, son of Andromeneus, phalanx-leader in the army of Alexander the Great at the battle of Arbela. He was charged, along with his brothers Amyntas, Polemon, and Attalus, with being concerned in the conspiracy of Philotas, but was acquitted.]

SIMOIS. Vid. TROAS. As a mythological personage, the river-god Simois is the son of Oceanus and Tethys, and the father of Astyocheus and Hieroneme.

[SIMOISIUS (Σιμοίσιος), a Trojan warrior, son of Anthemion, slain in battle by Ajax, son of Telamon. He was called Simoisius because he was born on the banks of the Simois.]

SIMON (Σίμων). 1. One of the disciples of Socrates, and by trade a leather-cutter. Socrates was accustomed to visit his shop, and converse with him on various subjects. These conversations Simon afterward committed to writing, in thirty-three dialogues, all of which are lost.—2. Of Ægina, a celebrated statuary in bronze, who flourished about B.C. 475.

SIMONIDES (Σιμωνίδης). 1. Of Amorgos, was the second, both in time and in reputation, of the three principal iambic poets of the early period of Greek literature, namely, Archilochus, Simonides, and Hipponax. He was a native of Samos, whence he led a colony to the neighboring island of Amorgos, where he founded three cities, Minoa, Ægialus, and Arcesine, in the first of which he fixed his own abode. He flourished about B.C. 664. Simonides was most celebrated for his iambic poems, which were of two species, gnomic and satirical. The most important of his extant fragments is a satire upon women, in which he derives the various, though generally bad qualities of women from the variety of their origin; thus the uncleanly woman is formed from the swine; the cunning woman, from the fox; the talkative woman, from the dog, and so on. The best separate edition of the fragments of Simonides of Amorgos is by Welcker, Bonn, 1835.—2. Of Ceos, one of the most celebrated lyric poets of Greece, was the perfecter of the Elegy and Epigram, and the rival of Lasus and Pindar in the Dithyramb and the Epinician Ode. He was born at Iulis, in Ceos, B.C. 556, and was the son of Leoprotes. He appears to have been brought up to music and poetry as a profession. From his native island he proceeded to Athens, probably on the invitation of Hipparchus, who attached him to his society by great rewards. After remaining at Athens some time, probably even after the expulsion of Hippias, he went to Thessaly, where he lived under the patronage of the Aleuads and Scopads. He afterward returned to Athens, and soon had the noblest opportunity of employing his poetic powers in the celebration of the great events of the Persian wars. In 489 he conquered Æschylus in the contest for the prize which the Athenians offered for an elegy on those who fell at Marathon. Ten years later he composed the epigrams which were inscribed upon the tomb of the Spartans who fell at Thermopylæ, as well as an encomium on the same heroes; and he also celebrated the battles of Artemisium and Salamis, and the great men who commanded in them. He had completed his eightieth year, when his long poetical career at Athens was crowned by the victory which he gained with the dithyrambic chorus (477), being the fifty-sixth prize which he had carried off. Shortly after this he was invited to Syracuse by Hiero, at whose court he lived till his death in 467. Simonides was a great favorite with Hiero, and was treated by the tyrant with the greatest munificence. He still continued, when at Syracuse, to employ his muse occasionally in the service of other Grecian states. Simonides is said to have been the inventor of the mnemonic art, and of the long vowels and double letters in the Greek alphabet. He made literature a profession, and is said to have been the first who took money for his poems; and the reproach of avarice is too often brought against him by his contemporary and rival, Pindar, as well as by subsequent writers, to be altogether discredited. The chief characteristics of the poetry of Simonides were sweetness (whence his surname of Melicertes) and elaborate finish, combined with the truest poetic conception and perfect power of expression, though in originality and fervor he was far inferior, not only to the early lyric poets, such as Sappho and Alcæus, but also to his contemporary Pindar. He was probably both the most prolific and the most generally popular of all the Grecian lyric poets. The general character of his dialect is the Epic, mingled with Doric and Æolic forms. The best edition of his fragments in a separate form is by Schneidewin, Bruns., 1835.—[3. An Athenian general, who seized upon Eion, in Thrace, in the course of the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 425, but held it for a short time, since he was soon expelled with loss by the Chalcidians and Bottiæans.]

SIMPLICIUS (Σιμπλικίος), one of the last philosophers of the Neo-Platonic school, was a native of Cilicia, and a disciple of Ammonius and Damascius. In consequence of the persecutions to which the pagan philosophers were exposed in the reign of Justinian, Simplicius was one of the seven philosophers who took refuge at the court of the Persian king Chosroës. These philosophers returned home about A.D. 533, in consequence of a treaty of peace concluded between Chosroës and Justinian, in which the former had stipulated that the philosophers should be allowed to return without risk, and to practice the rites of their paternal faith. Of the subsequent fortunes of the seven philosophers we learn nothing, nor do we know where Simplicius lived and taught. Simplicius wrote commentaries on several of Aristotle's works. His commentaries on the Categories, on the De Cælo, on the Physica Auscultatio, and on the De Anima, are extant. In explaining Aristotle, Simplicius endeavors to show that Aristotle agrees with Plato even on those points which the former controverts; but, though he attaches himself too much to the Neo-Platonists, his commentaries are marked by sound sense and real learning. He also wrote a commentary on the Enchiridion of Epictetus, which is likewise extant, [and published in Schweighæuser's Epictetæ Philosophiæ Monumenta, vol. iv.; and in Didot's Scriptores Ethici Græci, Paris, 1840.]

SIMYRA (τὰ Σίμυρα: now Zamura or Sumore), a fortress on the coast of Phœnicæ, between Orthosias and the mouth of the Eleutherus, of no importance except as being the point from which the northern part of Lebanon was usually approached.

SINÆ (Σίναϊ), the easternmost people of Asia, of whom nothing but the name was known to the western nations till about the time of Ptolemy, who describes their country as bounded on the north by Serica, and on the south and west by India extra Gangem. It corresponded to the southern part of China and the eastern part of the Burmese peninsula. The detailed description of the knowledge of the ancient geographers concerning it does not fall within the province of this work.

SINAI or SINA (LXX. Σινᾶ: now Jebel-et-Tur), a cluster of dark, lofty, rocky mountains in the southern angle of the triangular peninsula inclosed between the two heads of the Red Sea, and bounded on the north by the deserts on the borders of Egypt and Palestine. The name, which signifies a region of broken and cleft rocks, is used in a wider sense for the whole peninsula, which formed a part of Arabia Petræa, and was peopled, at the time of the Exodus, by the Amalekites and Midianites, and afterward by the Nabathæan Arabs. On the other hand, the name is applied, in a narrower sense, to one particular ridge in the Sinaitic group of mountains running north and south, and terminated by two summits, of which the one on the north is called Horeb, and the one on the south Sinai or Jebel Musa, i. e., Moses' Mount. From the latter name, assigned by tradition, it has usually, but too hastily, been inferred that the southern summit was that on which God gave the law to Moses. The fact seems, however, to be that Sinai and Horeb in the Old Testament are both general names for the whole group, the former being used in the first four books of Moses, and the latter in Deuteronomy; and that the summit on which the law was given was probably that on the north, or the one usually called Horeb.

SINDA (Σίνδα: Σινδεύς, Sindensis). 1. A city of Pisidia, north of Cibyra, near the River Cauclaris.—2, 3. Vid. SINDI.

SINDI (Σινδοί). 1. A people of Asiatic Sarmatia, on the eastern coast of the Euxine, and at the foot of the Caucasus. They probably dwelt in and about the peninsula of Taman (between the Sea of Azov and the Black Sea), and to the south of the River Hypanis (now Kouban). They had a capital called SINDA (now Anapa?), with a harbor (Σινδοικὸς λιμὴν). Their country is called Σινδοική. They are also mentioned by the names of SINDONES and SINDIANI.—2. A people on the eastern coast of India extra Gangem (in Cochin China), also called SINDÆ (Σίνδαι), and with a capital city, SINDA.

SINDICE. Vid. SINDI.

SINDOMĀNA (now Schvun?), a city of India, on the lower course of the Indus, near the island of Pattalene.

SINDUS (Σίνδος), a town in the Macedonian district of Mygdonia, on the Thermaic Gulf, and at the mouth of the Echedorus.

SINGĀRA (τὰ Σίγγαρα: now Sinjar?), a strongly fortified city and Roman colony in the interior of Mesopotamia, eighty-four Roman miles south of Nisibis. It lay in a dry plain, at the foot of Mount Singaras (now Sinjar), an eastern prolongation of Mount Masius. It was the scene of the defeat of Constantius by Sapor, through which the place was lost to the Romans.

SINGIDŪNUM (now Belgrad), a town in Mœsia Superior, at the confluence of the Sava and the Danube, was a strong fortress, and the headquarters of a legion.

[SINGILI or SINGILIS, a town of Hispania Bætica, on a river of the same name, the ruins of which are found at Castillon.]

SINGITICUS SINUS. Vid. SINUS.

SINGUS (Σίγγος: Σιγγαίος), a town in Macedonia, on the eastern coast of the peninsula Sithonia, which gave its name to the Sinus Singiticus.

SINIS or SINNIS (Σίνις or Σίννις), son of Polyphemus, Pemon or Neptune (Poseidon) by Sylea, the daughter of Corinthus. He was a robber, who frequented the isthmus of Corinth, and killed the travellers whom he captured by fastening them to the top of a fir-tree, which he curbed, and then let spring up again. He himself was killed in this manner by Theseus. The name is connected with σίνουα.

SINON (Σίνων), son of Æsimus, or, according to Virgil (Æn., ii., 79), of Sisyphus, and grandson of Autolicus, was a relation of Ulysses, whom he accompanied to Troy. After the Greeks had constructed the wooden horse, Sinon mutilated his person in order to make the Trojans believe that he had been maltreated by the Greeks, and then allowed himself to be taken prisoner by the Trojans. He informed the Trojans that the wooden horse had been constructed as an atonement for the Palladium which had been carried off by the Greeks, and that if they would drag it into their own city, Asia would gain the supremacy over Greece. The Trojans believed the deceiver, and dragged the horse into the city; whereupon Sinon, in the dead of night, let the Greeks out of the horse, who thus took Troy.

SINOPE (Σινώπη: Σινωπέως, Sinopensis: ruins at Sinope, Sinoubs), the most important of all the Greek colonies on the shores of the Euxine, stood on the northern coast of Asia Minor, on the western headland of the great bay of which the delta of the River Halys forms the eastern headland, and a little east of the northernmost promontory of Asia Minor. Thus placed, and built on a peninsula, the neck of which formed two fine harbors, it had every advantage for becoming a great maritime city. Its foundation was referred mythically to the Argonaut Autolyceus, who was worshipped in the city as a hero, and had an oracle; but it appears in history as a very early colony of the Milesians. Having been destroyed in the invasion of Asia by the Cimmerians, it was restored by a new colony from Miletus, B.C. 632, and soon became the greatest commercial city on the Euxine. Several colonies were established by the Sinopians on the adjacent coasts, the chief of which were Cotyora, Trapezus, and Cerasus. Its territory, called SINŌPIS (Σινωπιάς, also Σινωπίτις), extended to the banks of the Halys. It remained an independent state till it was taken by Pharnaces I., king of Pontus. It was the birth-place and residence of Mithradates the Great, who enlarged and beautified it. After an obstinate resistance to the Romans under Lucullus, it was taken and plundered, and proclaimed a free city. Shortly before the murder of Julius Cæsar, it was colonized by the name of Julia Cæsarea Felix Sinope, and remained a flourishing city, though it never recovered its former importance. At the time of Constantine, it had declined so much as to be ranked second to Amasia. In addition to its commerce, Sinope was greatly enriched by its fisheries. It was the native city of the renowned cynic philosopher Diogenes, of the comic poet Diphilus, and of the historian Baton.

SINTICA, a district in Macedonia, inhabited by the Thracian people SINTI, extended east of Crestonia and north of Bisaltia as far as the Strymon and the Lake Prasias. Its chief town was Heraclea Sintica. The Sinti were spread over other parts of ancient Thrace, and are identified by Strabo with the Sintians (Σίντιες) of Homer, the ancient inhabitants of Lemnos.

SINUSSA (Sinuessanus: now Rocca di Mandragone), the last city of Latium on the confines of Campania, to which it originally belonged, was situated on the sea-coast and on the Via Appia, in the midst of a fertile country. It was colonized by the Romans, together with the neighboring town of Minturnæ, B.C. 296. It possessed a good harbor, and was a place of considerable commercial importance. In its neighborhood were celebrated warm baths, called AQUÆ SINUSSANÆ.

SION. Vid. JERUSALEM.

[SIPHÆ (Σίφαι) or TIPHÆ, a port town of Bœotia, on the Mare Alcyonium, in the neighborhood of Thisbe and the port Eutretus, where, according to Pausanias, was a temple of Hercules, at which yearly games were celebrated. It was famed, also, as the birth-place of Tiphys, the pilot of the Argo; Müller and Kiepert identify it with the modern Atiki.]

SIPHNIUS (Σίφνος: Σίφνιος: now Siphno), an island in the Ægean Sea, forming one of the Cyclades, southeast of Seriphus. It is of an oblong form, and about forty miles in circumference. Its original name was Merope; and it was colonized by Ionians from Athens. In consequence of their gold and silver mines, of which the remains are still visible, the Siphnians attained great prosperity, and were regarded in the time of Herodotus as the wealthiest of the islanders. Their treasury at Delphi, in which they deposited the tenth of the produce of their mines, was equal in wealth to that of any other Greek state. Their riches, however, exposed them to pillage; and a party of Samian exiles in the time of Polycrates invaded the island, and compelled them to pay one hundred talents. Siphnus was one of the few islands which refused tribute to Xerxes; and one of its ships fought on the side of the Greeks at Salamis. At a later time the mines were less productive; and Pausanias relates that in consequence of the Siphnians neglecting to send the tithe of their treasure to Delphi, the god destroyed their mines by an inundation of the sea. The moral character of the Siphnians stood low, and hence to act like a Siphnian (Σιφνιάζειν) became a term of reproach.

SIPONTUM or SIPONTUM (Sipontinus: now Sipontio), called by the Greeks SIPŪS (Σιπούς, -οῦντος), an ancient town in Apulia, in the district of Daunia, on the southern slope of Mount Garganus, and on the coast. It is said to have been founded by Diomedes, and was of Greek origin. It was colonized by the Romans, under whom it became a place of some commercial importance. The inhabitants were removed from the town by King Manfred in the thirteenth century, in consequence of the unhealthy nature of the locality, and were settled in the neighboring town of Manfredonia, founded by this monarch.

SIPYLUS (Σίπυλος: now Sipuli-Dagh), a mountain of Lydia, in Asia Minor, of volcanic formation, and rent and splintered by frequent earthquakes. It is a branch of the Tmolus, from the main chain of which it proceeds northwest along the course of the River Hermus as far as Magnesia and Sipylum. It is mentioned by Homer. The ancient capital of Mæonia was said to have been situated in the heart of the mountain chain, and to have been called by the same name; but it was early swallowed up by an earthquake, and its site became a little lake called Sale or Saloë, near which was a tumulus, supposed to be the grave of Tantalus. The mountain was rich in metals, and many mines were worked in it.

SIRACÈNE (Σιρακηνή). 1. A district of Hyrcania.—2. A district of Armenia Major.—3. Vid. SIRACENI.

SIRACÈNI, SIRĀCI, SIRĀCES (Σιρακηνοί, Σιρακοί, Σιρακες), a powerful people of Sarmatia Asiatica, dwell in the district of Siracene, east of the Palus Mæotis, as far as the River Rha (now Volga). The Romans were engaged in a war with them in A.D. 50.

SIRBŌNIS LACUS (Σιρβωνίδος λίμνη, afterward Σιρβωνίς λίμνη and Σίρβων: now Sabakat Bardowl), a large and deep lake on the coast of Lower Egypt, east of Mount Casius. Its circuit was one thousand stadia. It was strongly impregnated with asphaltus. A connection (called τὸ ἔκρηγμα) existed between the lake and the Mediterranean; but this being stopped up, the lake grew continually smaller by evaporation, and it is now nearly dry.

SIRENES (Σειρήνες), sea-nymphs who had the power of charming by their songs all who heard them. When Ulysses came near the island on the beach of which the Sirens were sitting, and endeavoring to allure him and his companions, he stuffed the ears of his companions with wax, and tied himself to the mast of his vessel, until he was so far off that he could no longer hear their song. According to Homer, the island of the Sirens was situated between Ææa and the rock of Scylla, near the southwestern coast of Italy; but the Roman poets place them on the Campanian coast. Homer says nothing of their number, but later writers mention both their names and number; some state that they were two, Aglaopheme and Thelxiepiã; and others that there were three, Pisinõe, Aglaope, and Thelxiepiã, or Parthenope, Ligia, and Leucosia. They are called daughters of Phorcus, of Achelous and Sterope, of Terpsichore, of Melpomene, of Calliope, or of Gæa. The Sirens are also connected with the legends of the Argonauts and the rape of Proserpina (Persephone). When the Argonauts sailed by the Sirens, the latter began to sing, but in vain, for Orpheus surpassed them; and as it had been decreed that they should live only till some one hearing their song should pass by unmoved, they threw themselves into the sea, and were metamorphosed into rocks. Later poets represent them as provided with wings, which they are said to have received at their own request, in order to be able to search after Proserpina (Persephone), or as a punishment from Ceres (Demeter) for not having assisted Proserpina (Persephone), or from Venus (Aphrodite), because they wished to remain virgins. Once, however, they allowed themselves to be prevailed upon by Juno (Hera) to enter into a contest with the Muses, and, being defeated, were deprived of their wings.

SIRENUSÆ, called by Virgil (Æn., v., 864) SIRENUS SCOPULI, three small uninhabited and rocky islands near the southern side of the Promontorium Misenum, off the coast of Campania, which were, according to tradition, the abode of the Sirens.

[SIRIUS (Σιρίτιος), of Neapolis in Palestine, a sophist of the fourth century A.D., a pupil of Andromachus, lived and taught a considerable time at Athens, and wrote a work entitled Progygnasmata.]

SIRIS. 1. (Now Sinno), a river in Lucania, flowing into the Tarentine Gulf, memorable for the victory which Pyrrhus gained on its banks over the Romans.—2. (Now Torre di Senna), an ancient Greek town in Lucania, at the mouth of the preceding river. Its locality was unhealthy; and after the foundation of the neighboring town of Heraclea by the Tarentines, the inhabitants of Siris were removed to the new town, of which Siris now became the harbor.

SIRMIO (now Sirmione), a beautiful promontory on the southern shore of the Lacus Benacus (now Lago di Garda), on which Catullus had an estate.

SIRMIMUM (now Mitrovitz), an important city in Pannonia Inferior, was situated on the left bank of the Savus. It was founded by the Taurisci, and under the Romans became the capital of Pannonia, and the head-quarters of all their operations in their wars against the Dacians and the neighboring barbarians. It contained a large manufactory of arms, a spacious forum, an imperial palæe, etc. It was the residence of the admiral of the first Flavian fleet on the Danube, and the birth-place of the Emperor Probus.

[SISAMNES (Σισάμνης), a Persian judge under Cambyses, who caused him to be put to death for allowing himself to be bribed to an unjust decision, and then had his skin stripped off and fastened on the judicial bench where he had sat in judgment. To this bench he appointed his son Otanes, enjoining upon him to keep his father's fate ever in mind.]

SISĀPON (now Almaden in the Sierra Morena), an important town in Hispania Bætica, north of Corduba, between the Bætis and Anas, celebrated for its silver mines and Cinnabar.

[SISCENNIUS IACCHUS, an early Roman grammarian, who taught in Gallia Togata.]

SISCIA (now Sissek), called SEGESTA by Apian, an important town in Pannonia Superior, situated upon an island formed by the rivers Savus, Colapis, and Odra, and on the road from Æmona to Sirmium. It was a strongly-fortified place, and was conquered by Tiberius in the reign of Augustus, from which time it became the most important town in all Pannonia. It was probably made a colony by Tiberius, and was colonized anew by Septimius Severus. At a later time its importance declined, and Sirmium became the chief town in Pannonia.

SISENNA, L. CORNELIUS, a Roman annalist, was prætor in the year when Sulla died (B.C. 78), and probably obtained Sicily for his province in 77. From the local knowledge thus acquired he was enabled to render good service to Verres, whose cause he espoused. During the piratical war (67) he acted as the legate of Pompey, and having been dispatched to Crete in command of an army, died in that island at the age of about fifty-two. His great work, entitled Historia, which contained the history of his own time, extended to at least fourteen or nineteen books, [though the number is uncertain]. Cicero pronounces Sisenna superior as an historian to any of his predecessors. In addition to his Historia, Sisenna translated the Milesian fables of Aristides, and he also composed a commentary upon Plautus. [The fragments of his Historia are collected by Krause in his Historicorum Romanorum Fragmenta, p. 303-315.]

SISYGAMBIS (Σισύγαβις), mother of Darius Codomannus, the last king of Persia, fell into the hands of Alexander after the battle of Issus, B.C. 333, together with the wife and daughters of Darius. Alexander treated these captives with the greatest generosity and kindness, and displayed toward Sisygambis, in particular, a reverence and delicacy of conduct, which is one of the brightest ornaments of his character. On her part, Sisygambis became so strongly attached to her conqueror, that she felt his death as a blow not less severe than that of her own son; and, overcome by this long succession of misfortunes, she put an end to her own life by voluntary starvation.

[SISYPHIDES. Vid. SISYPHUS.]

SISYPHUS (Σίσυφος), son of Æolus and Enarete, whence he is called Æolides. He was married to Merope, a daughter of Atlas or a Pleiad, and became by her the father of Glaucus, Ornytion (or Porphyrius), Thersander, and Halimus. In later accounts he is also called a son of Autolycus, and the father of Ulysses by Anticlea (vid. ANTICLEA), whence we find Ulysses sometimes called Sisyphides. He is said to have built the town of Ephyra, afterward Corinth. As king of Corinth he promoted navigation and commerce, but he was fraudulent, avaricious, and deceitful. His wickedness during life was severely punished in the lower world, where he had to roll up hill a huge marble block, which, as soon as it reached the top, always rolled down again. The special reasons for this punishment are not the same in all authors; some relate that it was because he had betrayed the designs of the gods; others, because he attacked travellers, and killed them with a huge block of stone; and others, again, because he had betrayed to Asopus that Jupiter (Zeus) had carried off Ægina, the daughter of the latter. The more usual tradition related that Sisyphus requested his wife not to bury him, and that, when she complied with his request, Sisyphus in the lower world complained of this seeming neglect, and obtained from Pluto (Hades) or Proserpina (Persephone) permission to return to the upper world to punish his wife. He then refused to return to the lower world, until Mercury (Hermes) carried him off by force; and this piece of treachery is said to have been the cause of his punishment.

SITTACE OR SITTACE (Σιτάκη, Σιττάκη: ruins at Eski-Bagdad), a great and populous city of Babylonia, near but not on the Tigris, and eight parasangs within the Median wall. Its probable site is marked by a ruin called the Tower of Nimrod. It gave the name of Sittacene to the district on the lower course of the Tigris east of Babylonia and northwest of Susiana.

SITALCES (Σιτάλκης), king of the Thracian tribe of the Odrysiens, was a son of Teres, whom he succeeded on the throne. He increased his dominions by successful wars, so that they ultimately comprised the whole territory from Abdera to the mouths of the Danube, and from Byzantium to the sources of the Strymon. At the commencement of the Peloponnesian war he entered into an alliance with the Athenians, and in 429 he invaded Macedonia with a vast army, but was obliged to retire through failure of provisions.

SITHŌNIA (Σιθωνία), the central one of the three peninsulas running out from Chaleidice in Macedonia, between the Toronaic and Singitic Gulfs. The Thracians originally extended over the greater part of Macedonia; and the ancients derived the name of Sithonia from a Thracian king Sithon. We also find mention of a Thracian people, Sithonii, on the shores of the Pontus Euxinus; and the poets frequently use Si- thonis and Sithonius in the general sense of Thracian.

SITIFI (Σίτιφα: ruins at Setif), an inland city of Mauretania Cæsariensis, on the borders of Numidia, stood upon a hill, in an extensive and beautiful plain. It first became an important place under the Romans, who made it a colony; and, upon the subdivision of Mauretania Cæsariensis into two provinces, it was made the capital of the eastern province, which was called after it Mauretania Sitifensis.

[SITIVS. Vid. SIRTIVS.]

SITTACE, SITTACÈNE. Vid. SITTACE.

SITTIVS OR SITIUS, P., of Nuceria in Campania, was connected with Catiline, and went to Spain in B.C. 64, from which country he crossed over into Mauretania in the following year. It was said that P. Sulla had sent him into Spain to excite an insurrection against the Roman government; and Cicero accordingly, when he defended Sulla in 62, was obliged to deny the truth of the charges that had been brought against Sittius. Sittius did not return to Rome. His property in Italy was sold to pay his debts, and he continued in Africa, where he fought in the wars of the kings of the country. He joined Cæsar when the latter came to Africa, in 46, to prosecute the war against the Pompeian party. He was of great service to Cæsar in this war, and at its conclusion was rewarded by Cæsar with the western part of Numidia, where he settled down, distributing the land among his soldiers. After the death of Cæsar, Arabio, the son of Masinissa, returned to Africa, and killed Sittius by stratagem.

SIVPH (Σιούφ), a city of Lower Egypt, in the Saitic nome, only mentioned by Herodotus (ii., 172).

SMARAGDUS MONS (Σμαράγδος ὄρος: now Jehel Zaburah), a mountain of Upper Egypt, near the coast of the Red Sea, north of Berenice. The extensive emerald mines, from which it obtained its name, were worked under the ancient kings of Egypt, under the Ptolemies, and under the Romans. They seem to have been exhausted, as only very few emeralds are now and then found in the neighborhood.

[SMENUS (Σμῆνος, now River of Passava), a small stream of Laconia, rising in Mount Taygētus, flowing by Las, and emptying into the Sinus Laconicus near Gytheum.]

SMERDIS (Σμερδης), the son of Cyrus, was murdered by order of his brother Cambyses. The death of Smerdis was kept a profound secret; and accordingly, when the Persians became weary of the tyranny of Cambyses, one of the Magians, named Patizithes, who had been left by Cambyses in charge of his palace and treasures, availed himself of the likeness of his brother to the deceased Smerdis to proclaim this brother as king, representing him as the younger son of Cyrus. Cambyses heard of the revolt in Syria, but he died of an accidental wound in the thigh as he was mounting his horse to march against the usurper. The false Smerdis was acknowledged as king by the Persians, and reigned for seven months without opposition. The leading Persian nobles, however, were not quite free from suspicion; and this suspicion was increased by the king never inviting any of them to the palace, and never appearing in public. Among the nobles who entertained these suspicions was Otanes, whose daughter Phædima had been one of the wives of Cambyses, and had been transferred to his successor. The new king had some years before been deprived of his ears by Cyrus for some offence; and Otanes persuaded his daughter to ascertain whether her master had really lost his ears. Phædima found out that such was the fact, and communicated the decisive information to her father. Otanes thereupon formed a conspiracy, and, in conjunction with six other noble Persians, succeeded in forcing his way into the palace, where they slew the false Smerdis and his brother Patizithes in the eighth month of their reign, B.C. 521. The usurpation of the false Smerdis was an attempt on the part of the Medes, to whom the Magians belonged, to obtain the supremacy, of which they had been deprived by Cyrus. The assassination of the false Smerdis and the accession of Darius Hystaspis again gave the ascendancy to the Persians; and the anniversary of the day on which the Magians were massacred was commemorated among the Persians by a solemn festival, called Magophonia, on which no Magian was allowed to show himself in public. The real nature of the transaction is also shown by the revolt of the Medes which followed the accession of Darius.

[SMERDOMENES (Σμερδομένης), son of Otanes, was one of the generals who had the supreme command of the land forces of Xerxes in his invasion of Greece.]

[SMILAX, a beautiful nymph enamoured of Crocus: she was changed by the gods into a flower. Vid. CROCUS.]

SMILIS (Σμίλις), son of Euclides, of Ægina, a sculptor of the legendary period, whose name appears to be derived from σμίλη, a knife for carving wood, and afterward a sculptor's chisel. Smilis is the legendary head of the Æginetan school of sculpture, just as Dædalus is the legendary head of the Attic and Cretan schools.

SMINTHEUS (Σμινθέυς), a surname of Apollo, which is derived by some from σμίθος, a mouse, and by others from the town of Sminthe in Troas. The mouse was regarded by the ancients as inspired by the vapors arising from the earth, and as the symbol of prophetic power. In the temple of Apollo at Chryse there was a statue of the god by Scopas, with a mouse under its foot, and on coins Apollo is represented carrying a mouse in his hands. Temples of Apollo Smintheus and festivals (Sminthia) existed in several parts of Greece.

SMYRNA (Σμύρνα) or MYRRA. For details, vid. ADONIS.

SMYRNA, and in many MSS. ZMYRNA (Σμύρνα: Ion. Σμύρνη: Σμυρναίος, SMYRNAÏOS: now Smyrna, Turk. Izmir), one of the most ancient and flourishing cities of Asia Minor, and the only one of the great cities on its western coast which has survived to this day, stood in a position alike remarkable for its beauty and for other natural advantages. Lying just about the centre of the western coast of Asia Minor; on the banks of the little River Meles, at the bottom of a deep bay, the Sinus Hermæus or Smyrnæus (now Gulf of Smyrna), which formed a safe and immense harbor for the largest ships up to the very walls of the city; at the foot of the rich slopes of Tmolus and at the entrance to the great and fertile valley of the Hermus, in which lay the great and wealthy city of Sardis; and in the midst of the Greek colonies on the eastern shore of the Ægean; it was marked out by nature as one of the greatest emporiums for the trade between Europe and Asia, and has preserved that character to the present day. There are various accounts of its origin. The most probable is that which represents it as an Æolian colony from Cyme. At an early period it fell, by a stratagem, into the hands of the Ionians of Colophon, and remained an Ionian city from that time forth: this appears to have happened before Ol. 23 (B.C. 688). As to the time when it became a member of the Panionic confederacy, we have only a very untrustworthy account, which refers its admission to the reign of Attalus, king of Pergamus. Its early history is also very obscure. There is an account in Strabo that it was destroyed by the Lydian king Sadyattes, and that its inhabitants were compelled to live in scattered villages until after the Macedonian conquest, when the city was rebuilt, twenty stadia from its former site, by Antigonus; but this is inconsistent with Pindar's mention of Smyrna as a beautiful city. Thus much is clear, however, that at some period the old city of Smyrna, which stood on the northeastern side of the Hermæan Gulf, was abandoned, and that it was succeeded by a new city, on the southeastern side of the same gulf (the present site), which is said to have been built by Antigonus, and which was enlarged and beautified by Lysinachus. This new city stood partly on the sea-shore and partly on a hill called Mastusia. It had a magnificent harbor, with such a depth of water that the largest ships could lie alongside the quays. The streets were paved with stone, and crossed one another at right angles. The city soon became one of the greatest and most prosperous in the world. It was especially favored by the Romans on account of the aid it rendered them in the Syrian and Mithradatic wars. It was the seat of a conventus juridicus. In the Civil Wars it was taken and partly destroyed by Dolabella, but it soon recovered. It occupies a distinguished place in the early history of Christianity, as one of the only two among the seven churches of Asia which St. John addresses in the Apocalypse without any admixture of rebuke, and as the scene of the labors and martyrdom of Polycarp. In the years A.D. 178-180, a succession of earthquakes, to which the city has always been much exposed, reduced it almost to ruins; but it was restored by the Emperor M. Antoninus. In the successive wars under the Eastern empire it was frequently much injured, but always recovered; and, under the Turks, it has survived repeated attacks of earthquake, fire, and plague, and still remains the great commercial city of the Levant. There are but few ruins of the ancient city. In addition to all her other sources of renown, Smyrna stood at the head of the cities which claimed the birth of Homer. The poet was worshipped as a Hero in a magnificent building called the Homerium ('Ὁμήρειον'). Near the sea-shore there stood a magnificent temple of Cybele, whose head appears on the coins of the city. The other divinities chiefly worshipped here were Nemesis and the nymph Smyrna, the heroine eponymus of the place, who had a shrine on the banks of the River Meles.

SMYRNA TRACHĒA. Vid. EPHEBUS.

SMYRNÆUS SINUS (Σμυρναίων κόλπος, Σμυρναϊκός κόλπος: now Gulf of Ismir or Smyrna), the great gulf on the western coast of Asia Minor, at the bottom of which Smyrna stands. Its entrance lies between Promontorium Melæna (now Cape Kara Burnu) on the west, and Phocæa (now Fokia) on the east. Its depth was reckoned at three hundred and fifty stadia. It received the River Hermus, whence it was called Hermæus Sinus (Ἑρμείος κόλπος). It is sometimes also called Μελήτρον κόλπος, from the little river Meles, on which Old Smyrna stood.

ΣΩΪΝΕΣ (Σώανες), a powerful people of the Caucasus, governed by a king who could bring two hundred thousand soldiers into the field. The mountain streams of the country contained gold, which was separated by collecting the water in sheep-skins, whence the matter-of-fact interpreters derived the legend of the golden fleece. According to Strabo, the habits of the people were such that they stood in remarkable need of other "washings." They are also called SUANI and SUANOCOLCHI (Σούανοι, Σουανοκόλχοι), and their land Suania (Σουανία).

[ΣΟΑΤΡΑ (Σόατρα, Σαΐατρα), a small town of Lycæonia, in the neighborhood of Apamea Cibotus, very scantily supplied with water. According to Texier, its site corresponds to the modern village Su Vermess, which means, "here is no water to be found."]

ΣΟΚΡΑΤΗΣ (Σωκράτης). 1. The celebrated Athenian philosopher, was born in the demus Alopece, in the immediate neighborhood of Athens, B.C. 469. His father Sophroniscus was a statuary; his mother Phænarete was a midwife. In his youth he followed the profession of his father, and attained sufficient proficiency to have executed the group of clothed Graces which was preserved in the Acropolis, and was shown as his work down to the time of Pausanias. The personal qualities of Socrates were marked and striking. His physical constitution was healthy, robust, and enduring to an extraordinary degree. He was capable of bearing fatigue or hardship, and indifferent to heat or cold, in a measure which astonished all his companions. He went barefoot in all seasons of the year, even during the winter campaign at Potidæa, under the severe frosts of Thrace; and the same homely clothing sufficed for him in winter as well as in summer. His ugly physiognomy excited the jests both of his friends and enemies, who inform us that he had a flat nose, thick lips, and prominent eyes like a satyr or Silenus. Of the circumstances of his life we are almost wholly ignorant: he served as an hoplite at Potidæa, Delium, and Amphipolis with great credit to himself. He seems never to have filled any political office until 406, in which year he was a member of the senate of Five Hundred, and one of the Prytanes, when he refused, on the occasion of the trial of the six generals, to put an unconstitutional question to the vote, in spite of all personal hazard. He displayed the same moral courage in refusing to obey the order of the Thirty Tyrants for the apprehension of Leon the Salamian. At what time Socrates relinquished his profession as a statuary we do not know; but it is certain that all the middle and later part of his life at least was devoted exclusively to the self-imposed task of teaching; excluding all other business, public or private, and to the neglect of all means of fortune. But he never opened a school, nor did he, like the sophists of his time, deliver public lectures. Every where, in the market-place, in the gymnasia, and in the work-shops, he sought and found opportunities for awakening and guiding, in boys, youth, and men, moral consciousness and the impulse after self-knowledge respecting the end and value of our actions. His object, however, was only to aid them in developing the germs of knowledge which were already present in them, not to communicate to them ready-made knowledge; and he therefore professed to practice a kind of mental midwifery, just as his mother Phænarete exercised the corresponding corporeal art. Unweariedly and inexorably did he fight against all false appearance and conceit of knowledge, in order to pave the way for correct knowledge. Consequently to the mentally proud and the mentally idle he appeared an intolerable bore, and often experienced their bitter hatred and calumny. This was probably the reason why he was selected by Aristophanes, and the other comic writers, to be attacked as a general representative of philosophical and rhetorical teaching; the more so, as his marked and repulsive physiognomy admitted so well of being imitated in the mask which the actor wore. The audience at the theatre would more readily recognize the peculiar figure which they were accustomed to see every day in the market-place, than if Prodicus or Protagoras, whom most of them did not know by sight, had been brought on the stage; nor was it of much importance either to them or to Aristophanes whether Socrates was represented as teaching what he did really teach, or something utterly different. Attached to none of the prevailing parties, Socrates found in each of them his friends and his enemies. Hated and persecuted by Critias, Charicles, and others among the Thirty Tyrants, who had a special reference to him in the decree which they issued, forbidding the teaching of the art of oratory, he was impeached after their banishment and by their opponents. An orator named Lycon, and a poet (a friend of Thrasylbus) named Meletus, had united in the impeachment with the powerful demagogue Anytus, an embittered antagonist of the sophists and their system, and one of the leaders of the band which, setting out from Phyle, forced their way into the Piræus, and drove out the Thirty Tyrants. The judges also are described as persons who had been banished, and who had returned with Thrasylbus. The chief articles of impeachment were, that Socrates was guilty of corrupting the youth, and of despising the tutelary deities of the state, putting in their place other new divinities. At the same time it had been made a matter of accusation against him, that Critias, the most ruthless of the Tyrants, had come forth from his school. Some expressions of his, in which he had found fault with the demagogical mode of electing by lot, had also been brought up against him; and there can be little doubt that use was made of his friendly relations with Theramenes, one of the most influential of the Thirty, with Plato's uncle Charmides, who fell by the side of Critias in the struggle with the popular party, and with other aristocrats, in order to irritate against him the party which at that time was dominant. The substance of the speech which Socrates delivered in his defence is probably preserved by Plato in the piece which goes under the name of the "Apology of Socrates." Being condemned by a majority of only six votes, he expresses the conviction that he deserved to be maintained at the public cost in the Prytaneum, and refuses to acquiesce in the adjudication of imprisonment, or a large fine, or banishment. He will assent to nothing more than a fine of sixty minæ, on the security of Plato, Crito, and other friends. Condemned to death by the judges, who were incensed by this speech, by a majority of eighty votes, he departs from them with the protestation that he would rather die after such a defence than live after one in which he should have endeavored to excite their pity. The sentence of death could not be carried into execution until after the return of the vessel which had been sent to Delos on the periodical Theoric mission. The thirty days which intervened between its return and the condemnation of Socrates were devoted by him to poetic attempts (the first he had ever made), and to his usual conversation with his friends. One of these conversations, on the duty of obedience to the laws, Plato has reported in the Crito, so called after the faithful follower of Socrates, who had endeavored without success to persuade him to make his escape. In another, imitated or worked up by Plato in the Phædo, Socrates, immediately before he drank the cup of hemlock, developed the grounds of his immovable conviction of the immortality of the soul. He died with composure and cheerfulness in his seventieth year, B.C. 399. Three peculiarities distinguished Socrates: 1. His long life, passed in contented poverty and in public dialectics, of which we have already spoken. 2. His persuasion of a special religious mission. He had been accustomed constantly to hear, even from his childhood, a divine voice—interfering, at moments when he was about to act, in the way of restraint, but never in the way of instigation. Such prohibitory warning was wont to come upon him very frequently, not merely on great, but even on small occasions, intercepting what he was about to do or to say. Though later writers speak of this as the Dæmon or Genius of Socrates, he himself does not personify it, but treats it merely as a "divine sign, a prophetic or supernatural voice." He was accustomed not only to obey it implicitly, but to speak of it publicly and familiarly to others, so that the fact was well known both to his friends and to his enemies. 3. His great intellectual originality, both of subject and of method, and his power of stirring and forcing the germ of inquiry and ratiocination in others. He was the first who turned his thoughts and discussions distinctly to the subject of ethics, and was the first to proclaim that "the proper study of mankind is man." With the philosophers who preceded him, the subject of examination had been Nature, or the Kosmos as one undistinguishable whole, blending together cosmogony, astronomy, geometry, physics, metaphysics, &c. In discussing ethical subjects, Socrates employed the dialectic method, and thus laid the foundation of formal logic, which was afterward expanded by Plato, and systematized by Aristotle. The originality of Socrates is shown by the results he achieved. Out of his intellectual school sprang, not merely Plato, himself a host, but all the other leaders of Grecian speculation for the next half century, and all those who continued the great line of speculative philosophy down to later times. Euclid and the Megarian school of philosophers—Aristippus and the Cyrenaic Antisthenes and Diogenes, the first of those called the Cynics—all emanated more or less directly from the stimulus imparted by Socrates, though each followed a different vein of thought. Ethics continued to be what Socrates had first made them, a distinct branch of philosophy, alongside of which politics, rhetoric, logic, and other speculations relating to man and society, gradually arranged themselves; all of them more popular, as well as more keenly controverted, than physics, which at that time presented comparatively little charm, and still less of attainable certainty. There can be no doubt that the individual influence of Socrates permanently enlarged the horizon, improved the method, and multiplied the ascendant minds of the Grecian speculative world in a manner never since paralleled. Subsequent philosophers may have had a more elaborate doctrine, and a larger number of disciples who imbibed their ideas; but none of them applied the same stimulating method with the same efficacy, and none of them struck out of other minds that fire which sets light to original thought. (A great part of this article is taken from Mr. Grote's account of Socrates in his History of Greece.)—[2. An Athenian, son of Antigenes, was one of the three commanders sent out with a fleet in B.C. 431 to ravage the coasts of the Peloponnesus. They did not effect much, being foiled in an attack on Methone by the opportune arrival of Brasidas.—3. An Achæan, one of the commanders of the Greek mercenaries of Cyrus the younger, joined that prince at Sardis with five hundred heavy-armed men. He was one of the generals who accompanied Clearchus to the tent of Tissaphernes, when they were all treacherously seized by that satrap, and subsequently put to death by order of Artaxerxes himself.]—4. The ecclesiastical historian, was born at Constantinople about A.D. 379. He was a pupil of Ammonius and Heliadius, and followed the profession of an advocate in his native city, whence he is surnamed Scholasticus. The Ecclesiastical History of Socrates extends from the reign of Constantine the Great, 306, to that of the younger Theodosius, 439. He appears to have been a man of less bigotry than most of his contemporaries, and the very difficulty of determining from internal evidence some points of his religious belief may be considered as arguing his comparative liberality. His history is divided into seven books His work is included in the editions of the ancient Greek ecclesiastical historians by Valesius, Paris, 1668; reprinted at Mentz, 1677; by Reading, Camb., 1720.

SŌDŌMA, gen. -orum and -ae, also -um, gen. -i, and -i, gen. -ōrum (τὰ Σόδομα: Σοδομίτης, Sodomita), a very ancient city of Canaan, in the beautiful valley of Siddim (ἡ Σοδομίτις), closely connected with Gomorria, over which, and the other three "cities of the plain," the King of Sodom seems to have had a sort of supremacy. In the book of Genesis we find these cities as subject, in the time of Abraham, to the King of Elam and his allies (an indication of the early supremacy in Western Asia of the masters of the Tigris and Euphrates valley), and their attempt to cast off the yoke was the occasion of the first war on record. (Gen., xiv.) Soon afterward, the abominable sins of these cities called down the divine vengeance, and they were all destroyed by fire from heaven, except Zoar, which was spared at the intercession of Lot. The beautiful valley in which they stood was overwhelmed by the Jordan and converted into the Dead Sea, whose bituminous waters still bear witness to the existence of the springs of asphaltum ("slime-pits" in our version) of which the valley of Siddim was full. It used to be assumed that, before the destruction of the cities of the plain, the Jordan flowed on into the Red Sea; [and this opinion is supported by recent observations on the nature of the country around the southern extremity of the Dead Sea; while others maintain that] there was probably always a lake which received the waters both of the Jordan and the river which still flows into the southern end of the Dead Sea; and [that] the nature of the change seems to have consisted in the enlargement of this lake by a great depression of the whole valley. The site of Sodom was probably near the southern extremity of the lake.

SŌMIS or SŌMĪAS, JŪLĪA, daughter of Julia Mæsa, and mother of Elagabalus, either by her husband Sextus Varius Marcellus, or, according to the report industriously circulated with her own consent, by Caracalla. After the accession of her son, she became his chosen counsellor, and seems to have encouraged and shared his follies and enormities. She took a place in the senate, which then, for the first time, witnessed the intrusion of a woman, and was herself the president of a sort of female parliament, which held its sittings in the Quirinal, and published edicts for the regulation of all matters connected with the morals, dress, etiquette, and equipage of the matrons. She was slain by the prætorians, in the arms of her son, on the 11th of March, A.D. 222.

SŌGDIĀNA (ἡ Σογδιανή or Σογδιανή: Old Persian, Sughdā: Σόγδιοι, Σογδιανοί, Σογδιανολ: parts of Turkestan and Bokhara, including the district still called Sogd), the northeastern province of the ancient Persian empire, separated on the south from Bactriana and Margiana by the upper course of the Oxus (now Jihoun); on the east and north from Scythia by the Sogdii Conedarum and Oxii Mountains (now Kara-Dagh, Alatan and Ak Tagh), and by the upper course of the Jaxartes (now Sihoun), and bounded on the northwest by the great deserts east of the Sea of Aral. The southern part of the country was fertile and populous. It was conquered by Cyrus, and afterward by Alexander, both of whom marked the extreme limits of their advance by cities on the Jaxartes, Cyreschata and Alexandreschata. After the Macedonian conquest it was subject to the kings, first of Syria and then of Bactria, till it was overrun by the barbarians. The natives of the country were a wild, warlike people of the great Arian race, resembling the Bactrians in their character and customs.

SŌGDIĀNUS (Σογδιανός), was one of the illegitimate sons of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus. The latter, on his death in B.C. 425, was succeeded by his legitimate son Xerxes II., but this monarch, after a reign of only two months, was murdered by Sogdianus, who now became king. Sogdianus, however, was murdered in his turn, after a reign of seven months, by his brother Ochus. Ochus reigned under the name of Darius II.

SŌLI or SŌLŌE (Σόλοι). 1. (Ethnic, Σολεύς, Solensis: ruins at Mezzelu), a city on the coast of Cilicia, between the rivers Lamus and Cydnus, said to have been colonized by Argives and Iydians from Rhodes. It was a flourishing city in the time of Alexander, who fined its people two hundred talents for their adhesion to the Persians. The city was destroyed by Tigranes, who probably transplanted the inhabitants to Tigranocerta. Pompey restored the city after his war with the pirates, and peopled it with the survivors of the defeated bands; and from this time forth it was called ΡΟΜΠΕΡΙΟΠΟΛΙΣ (Ρομπηριούπολις). It was celebrated in literary history as the birth-place of the Stoic philosopher Chrysisippus, of the comic poet Philemon, and of the astronomer and poet Aratus. Its name has been incorrectly perpetuated in the grammatical word solécism (solécismus), which is said to have been first applied to the corrupt dialect of Greek spoken by the inhabitants of this city, or, as some say, of Soli in Cyprus.—2. (Ethnic, Σόλιος: ruins at Aligora, in the valley of Solea), a considerable sea-port town in the western part of the northern coast of Cyprus, on a little river. According to some, it was a colony of the Athenians, while others ascribed its erection to a native prince [Philocyprus] acting under the advice of Solon, and others to Solon himself: the last account is doubtless an error. It had temples of Isis and Venus (Aphrodite), and there were mines in its vicinity.

SOLICINIUM, a town in Roman Germany (the Agri Decumates), on the mountain Pirus, wherc Valentinian gained a victory over the Alemanni in A.D. 369, probably in the neighborhood of the modern Heidelberg.

SOLINUS, C. JŪLĪUS, the author of a geographical compendium, divided into fifty-seven chapters, containing a brief sketch of the world as known to the ancients, diversified by historical notices, remarks on the origin, habits, religious rites, and social condition of various nations enumerated. The arrangement, and frequently the very words, are derived from the Natural History of Pliny, but little knowledge, care, or judgment is displayed in the selection.

We know nothing of Solinus himself, but he must have lived after the reign of Alexander Severus and before that of Constantine. He may, perhaps, be placed about A.D. 238. We learn from the first of two prefatory addresses, that an edition of the work had already passed into circulation, in an imperfect state, without the consent or knowledge of the author, under the appellation Collectanea Rerum Memorabilium, while on the second, revised, corrected, and published by himself, he bestowed the more ambitious title of Polyhistor; and hence we find the treatise designated in several MSS. as C. Julii Solini Grammatici Polyhistor ab ipso editus et recognitus. The most notable edition is that of Salmasius, published at Utrecht in 1689, prefixed to his "Plinianæ Exercitationes," the whole forming two large folio volumes.

SŌLŌIS (Σολοίς: now Cape Cantin, Arab. Ras el Houdik), a promontory running far out into the sea, in the southern part of the western coast of Mauretania. Herodotus believed it to be the westernmost headland of all Libya. Upon it was a Phœnician temple of Neptune (Poseidon). The later geographers under the Romans mention a MONS SOLIS (Ἡλίου ὄρος), which appears to be the same spot, its name being probably a corruption of the Greek name.

SŌLŌN (Σόλων), the celebrated Athenian legislator, was born about B.C. 638. His father Execestides was a descendant of Codrus, and his mother was a cousin of the mother of Pisistratus. Execestides had seriously crippled his resources by a too prodigal expenditure; and Solon consequently found it either necessary or convenient in his youth to betake himself to the life of a foreign trader. It is likely enough that while necessity compelled him to seek a livelihood in some mode or other, his active and inquiring spirit led him to select that pursuit which would furnish the amplest means for its gratification. Solon early distinguished himself by his poetical abilities. His first effusions were in a somewhat light and amatory strain, which afterward gave way to the more dignified and earnest purpose of inculcating profound reflections or sage advice. So widely, indeed, did his reputation spread, that he was ranked as one of the seven sages, and his name appears in all the lists of the seven. The occasion which first brought Solon prominently forward as an actor on the political stage was the contest between Athens and Megara respecting the possession of Salamis. The ill success of the attempts of the Athenians to make themselves masters of the island, had led to the enactment of a law forbidding the writing or saying any thing to urge the Athenians to renew the contest. Solon, indignant at this dishonorable renunciation of their claims, hit upon the device of feigning to be mad; and, causing a report of his condition to be spread over the city, he rushed into the agora, and there recited a short elegiac poem of one hundred lines, in which he called upon the Athenians to retrieve their disgrace and reconquer the lovely island. Pisistratus (who, however, must have been extremely young at the time) came to the support of his kinsman; the pusillanimous law was rescinded, war was declared, and Solon himself appointed to conduct it. The Megarians were driven out of the island, but a tedious war ensued, which was finally settled by the arbitration of Sparta. Both parties appealed, in support of their claim, to the authority of Homer; and it was currently believed in antiquity that Solon had surreptitiously inserted the line (Il., ii., 558) which speaks of Ajax as ranging his ships with the Athenians. The Spartans decided in favor of the Athenians about B.C. 596. Solon himself, probably, was one of those who received grants of land in Salamis, and this may account for his being termed a Salaminian. Soon after these events (about 595) Solon took a leading part in promoting hostilities on behalf of Delphi against Cirrha, and was the mover of the decree of the Amphictyons by which was declared. It does not appear, however, what active part he took in the war. According to a common story, which, however, rests only on the authority of a late writer, Solon hastened the surrender of the town by causing the waters of the Plistus to be poisoned. It was about the time of the outbreak of this war, that, in consequence of the distracted state of Attica, which was rent by civil commotions, Solon was called upon by all parties to mediate between them, and alleviate the miseries that prevailed. He was chosen archon 594, and under that legal title was invested with unlimited power for adopting such measures as the exigencies of the state demanded. In fulfillment of the task intrusted to him, Solon addressed himself to the relief of the existing distress. This he effected with the greatest discretion and success by his celebrated disburdening ordinance (σεισάχθεια), a measure consisting of various distinct provisions, calculated to relieve the debtors with as little infringement as possible on the claims of the wealthy creditors. The details of this measure, however, are involved in considerable uncertainty. We know that he depreciated the coinage, making the mina to contain one hundred drachmæ instead of seventy-three; that is to say, seventy-three of the old drachmæ produced one hundred of the new coinage, in which obligations were to be discharged, so that the debtor saved rather more than a fourth in every payment. The success of the Seisachtheia procured for Solon such confidence and popularity that he was further charged with the task of entirely remodelling the constitution. As a preliminary step, he repealed all the laws of Draco except those relating to bloodshed. Our limits only allow us to glance at the principal features of the constitution established by Solon. This constitution was based upon the timocratic principle, that is, the title of citizens to the honors and offices of the state was regulated by their wealth. All the citizens were distributed into four classes. The first class consisted of those who had an annual income of at least five hundred medimni of dry or liquid produce (equal to five hundred drachmæ, a medinnus being reckoned at a drachma), and were called Pentacosiomedimni. The second class consisted of those whose incomes ranged between three hundred and five hundred medimni or drachmæ, and were called Hippéis (Ἱππεῖς, Ἱππῆς), from their being able to keep a horse, and bound to perform military service as cavalry. The third class consisted of those whose incomes varied between two hundred and three hundred medimni or drachmæ, and were termed Zēgita (Ζευγῖται). The fourth class included all whose property fell short of two hundred medimni or drachmæ, and bore the name of Thets. The first three classes were liable to direct taxation, in the form of a graduated income tax. A direct tax, however, was an extraordinary, and not an annual payment. The fourth class were exempt from direct taxes, but of course they, as well as the rest, were liable to indirect taxes. To Solon was ascribed the institution of the Boule (βουλῆ), or deliberative assembly of Four Hundred, one hundred members being elected from each of the four tribes. He greatly enlarged the functions of the Ecclesia (ἐκκλησία), which no doubt existed before his time, though it probably possessed scarcely more power than the assemblies which we find described in the Homeric poems. He gave it the right of electing the archons and other magistrates, and, what was even more important, made the archons and magistrates accountable directly to it when their year of office was expired. He also gave it what was equivalent to a veto upon any proposed measure of the Boule, though it could not itself originate any measure. Besides the arrangement of the general political relations of the people, Solon was the author of a great variety of special laws, which do not seem to have been arranged in any systematic manner. Those relating to debtors and creditors have been already referred to. Several had for their object the encouragement of trade and manufactures. Foreign settlers were not to be naturalized as citizens unless they carried on some industrious pursuit. If a father did not teach his son some trade or profession, the son was not liable to maintain his father in his old age. The council of Areopagus had a general power to punish idleness. Solon forbade the exportation of all produce of the Attic soil except olive oil. He was the first who gave to those who died childless the power of disposing of their property by will. He enacted several laws relating to marriage, especially with regard to heiresses. The rewards which he appointed to be given to victors at the Olympic and Isthmian games are for that age unusually large (five hundred drachmæ to the former and one hundred to the latter). One of the most enrious of his regulations was that which denounced atimia against any citizen who, on the outbreak of a sedition, remained neutral. The laws of Solon were inscribed on wooden rollers (ἄξονες) and triangular tablets (κίρβεις), and were set up at first in the Acropolis, afterward in the Prytaneum. The Athenians were also indebted to Solon for some rectification of the calendar. It is said that Solon exacted from the people a solemn oath, that they would observe his laws without alteration for a certain space—ten years according to Herodotus—one hundred years according to other accounts. It is related that he was himself aware that he had been compelled to leave many imperfections in his system and code. He is said to have spoken of his laws as being not the best, but the best which the Athenians would have received. After he had completed his task, being, we are told, greatly annoyed and troubled by those who came to him with all kinds of complaints, suggestions, or criticisms about his laws, in order that he might not himself have to propose any change, he absented himself from Athens for ten years, after he had obtained the oath above referred to. He first visited Egypt, and from thence proceeded to Cyprus, where he was received with great distinction by Philocyprus, king of the little town of Ἄερα. Solon persuaded the king to remove from the old site, and build a new town on the plain. The new settlement was called Soli, in honor of the illustrious visitor. He is further said to have visited Lydia; and his interview with Cresus was one of the most celebrated stories in antiquity. Vid. CRÆSUS. During the absence of Solon the old dissensions were renewed, and shortly after his arrival at Athens, the supreme power was seized by Pisistratus. The tyrant, after his usurpation, is said to have paid considerable court to Solon, and on various occasions to have solicited his advice, which Solon did not withhold. Solon probably died about 558, two years after the overthrow of the constitution, at the age of eighty. There was a story current in antiquity that, by his own directions, his ashes were collected and scattered round the island of Salamis. Of the poems of Solon several fragments remain. They do not indicate any great degree of imaginative power, but their style is vigorous and simple. Those that were called forth by special emergencies appear to have been marked by no small degree of energy. The fragments of these poems are incorporated in the collections of the Greek gnomic poets; and there is also a separate edition of them by Bach, Lugd. Bat., 1825.

SOPATER (Σώπατρος). 1. Of Paphos, a writer of parody and burlesque (φλυαρογράφος), who flourished from B.C. 323 to 283.—2. Of Apamea, a distinguished sophist, the head for some time of the school of Plotinus, was a disciple of Iamblichus, after whose death (before A.D. 330) he went to Constantinople. Here he enjoyed the favor and personal friendship of Constantine, who afterward, however, put him to death (between A.D. 330 and 337), from the motive, as was alleged, of giving a proof of the sincerity of his own conversion to Christianity. There are several grammatical and rhetorical works extant under the name of Sopater, but the best critics ascribe these to a younger Sopater, mentioned below.—3. The younger sophist, of Apamea or of Alexandria, is supposed to have lived about two hundred years later than the former. Besides his extant works already alluded to, Photius has preserved an extract of a work entitled the Historical Extracts (ἱστολογίη), which contained a vast variety of facts and figments, collected from a great number of authors. The remains of his rhetorical works are contained in Walz's Rhetores Græci.

On the arrival of the Greeks at Cotyora, Sophænetus was fined for his negligence in allowing part of the cargoes of the vessels, which brought the old men, women, and children from Trapezus, to be pilfered. In Stephanus of Byzantium, Sophænetus is quoted four times as author of a Κύρου Ἀνάβασις, and Müller supposes him to be the same with the general of Cyrus. Vid. Müller, *Hist. Græc. SOPHÈNE (Σωφηνή, later Σωφανηνή), a district of Armenia Major, lying between the ranges of Antitaurus and Masius; separated from Melitene in Armenia Minor by the Euphrates, from Mesopotamia by the Antitaurus, and from the eastern part of Armenia Major by the River Nymphus. In the time of the Greek kings of Syria, it formed, together with the adjacent district of Acilisene, an independent western Armenian kingdom, which was subdued and united to the rest of Armenia by Tigranes.

SOPHILUS (Σώφιλος), a comic poet of the middle comedy, was a native of Sicyon or of Thebes, and flourished about B.C. 348. [A few fragments remain of his plays, collected in Meineke's Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. ii., p. 794-6, edit. min.]

[SOPHILUS. Vid. SOPHOCLES.]

SOPHOCLES (Σοφοκλῆς). 1. The celebrated tragic poet, was born at Colonus, a village little more than a mile to the northwest of Athens, B.C. 495. He was thirty years younger than Æschylus, and fifteen years older than Euripides. His father's name was Sophilus or Sophilus, of whose condition in life we know nothing for certain; but it is clear that Sophocles received an education not inferior to that of the sons of the most distinguished citizens of Athens. To both of the two leading branches of Greek education, music and gymnastics, he was carefully trained, and in both he gained the prize of a garland. Of the skill which he had attained in music and dancing in his sixteenth year, and of the perfection of his bodily form, we have conclusive evidence in the fact that, when the Athenians were assembled in solemn festival around the trophy which they had set up in Salamis to celebrate their victory over the fleet of Xerxes, Sophocles was chosen to lead, naked and with lyre in hand, the chorus which danced about the trophy, and sang the songs of triumph, 480. His first appearance as a dramatist took place in 468, under peculiarly interesting circumstances; not only from the fact that Sophocles, at the age of twenty-seven, came forward as the rival of the veteran Æschylus, whose supremacy had been maintained during an entire generation, but also from the character of the judges. The solemnities of the Great Dionysia were rendered more imposing by the occasion of the return of Cimon from his expedition to Scyros, bringing with him the bones of Theseus. Public expectation was so excited respecting the approaching dramatic contest, and party feeling ran so high, that Apsephion, the archon eponymus, whose duty it was to appoint the judges, had not yet ventured to proceed to the final act of drawing the lots for their election, when Cimon, with his nine colleagues in the command, having entered the theatre, the archon detained them at the altar, and administered to them the oath appointed for the judges in the dramatic contests. Their decision was in favor of Sophocles, who received the first prize; the second only being awarded to Æschylus, who was so mortified at his defeat that he left Athens and retired to Sicily. From this epoch Sophocles held the supremacy of the Athenian stage, until a formidable rival arose in Euripides, who gained the first prize for the first time in 441. The year 440 is a most important era in the poet's life. In the spring of that year he brought out the earliest of his extant dramas, the Antigone, a play which gave the Athenians such satisfaction, especially on account of the political wisdom it displayed, that they appointed him one of the ten strategi, of whom Pericles was the chief, in the war against Samos. It would seem that in this war Sophocles neither obtained nor sought for any military reputation: he is represented as good-humoredly repeating the judgment of Pericles concerning him, that he understood the making of poetry, but not the commanding of an army. The family dissensions which troubled his last years are connected with a well-known and beautiful story. His family consisted of two sons, Iophon, the offspring of Nicostrate, who was a free Athenian woman, and Ariston, his son by Theoris of Sicyon; and Ariston had a son named Sophocles, for whom his grandfather showed the greatest affection. Iophon, who was by the laws of Athens his father's rightful heir, jealous of his love for the young Sophocles, and apprehending that Sophocles purposed to bestow upon his grandson a large proportion of his property, is said to have summoned his father before the Phratores, who seem to have had a sort of jurisdiction in family affairs, on the charge that his mind was affected by old age. As his only reply, Sophocles exclaimed, "If I am Sophocles, I am not beside myself; and if I am beside myself, I am not Sophocles;" and then he read from his Œdipus at Colonus, which was lately written, but not yet brought out, the magnificent parodos, beginning, whereupon the judges at once dismissed the case, and rebuked Iophon for his undutiful conduct. Sophocles forgave his son, and it is probable that the reconciliation was referred to in the lines of the Œdipus at Colonus, where Antigone pleads with her father to forgive Polynices, as other fathers had been induced to forgive their bad children (v. 1192, foll.). Sophocles died soon afterward in 406, in his ninetyeth year. All the various accounts of his death and funeral are of a fictitious and poetical complexion. According to some writers, he was choked by a grape; another writer related that in a public recitation of the Antigone he sustained his voice so long without a pause that, through the weakness of extreme age, he lost his breath and his life together; while others ascribed his death to excessive joy at obtaining a victory. By the universal consent of the best critics, both of ancient and of modern times, the tragedies of Sophocles are the perfection of the Greek drama. The subjects and style of Sophocles are human, while those of Æschylus are essentially heroic. The latter excite terror, pity, and admiration, as we view them at a distance; the former bring those same feelings home to the heart, with the addition of sympathy and self-application. No individual human being can imagine himself in the position of Prometheus, or derive a personal warning from the crimes and fate of Clytemnestra; but every one can, in feeling, share the self-devotion of Antigone in giving up her life at the call of fraternal piety, and the calmness which comes over the spirit of Œdipus when he is reconciled to the gods. In Æschylus, the sufferers are the victims of an inexorable destiny; but Sophocles brings more prominently into view those faults of their own, which form one element of the destiny of which they are the victims, and is more intent upon inculcating, as the lesson taught by their woes, that wise calmness and moderation, in desires and actions, in prosperity and adversity, which the Greek poets and philosophers celebrate under the name of σωφροσύνη. On the other hand, he never descends to that level to which Euripides brought down the art, the exhibition of human passion and suffering for the mere purpose of exciting emotion in the spectators, apart from a moral end. The difference between the two poets is illustrated by the saying of Sophocles, that "he himself represented men as they ought to be, but Euripides exhibited them as they are." The number of plays ascribed to Sophocles was one hundred and thirty. He contended not only with Æschylus and Euripides, but also with Chœrilus, Aristias, Agathon, and other poets, among whom was his own son Iophon; and he carried off the first prize twenty or twenty-four times, frequently the second, and never the third. It is remarkable, as proving his growing activity and success, that of his one hundred and thirteen dramas, eighty-one were brought out after his fifty-fourth year, and also that all his extant dramas, which of course, in the judgment of the grammarians, were his best, belong to this latter period of his life. The seven extant tragedies were probably brought out in the following chronological order: Antigone, Electra, Trachiniae, Œdipus Tyrannus, Ajax, Philoctetes, Œdipus at Colonus: the last of these was brought out, after the death of the poet, by his grandson. Of the numerous editions of Sophocles, the most useful one for the ordinary student is that by Wunder, Gothæ et Erfurd, 1831-1846, 2 vols. 8vo. [Four parts have reached a second edition, begun 1839; and the other three a third. A useful edition, comprising most of Wunder's notes in English, was published by Mitchell, London, 1841-4, 2 vols. 8vo: a full and learned commentary on Sophocles is contained in Ellendt's Lexicon Sophocleum, Königsberg, 1835, 2 vols. 8vo.]—2. Son of Ariston and grandson of the elder Sophocles, was also an Athenian tragic poet. The love of his grandfather toward him has been already mentioned. In 401 he brought out the Œdipus at Colonus of his grandfather; but he did not begin to exhibit his own dramas till 396.—[3. An Athenian orator, whose oration for Euctemon is quoted by Aristotle. Ruhnken supposes that he is the same as the Sophocles mentioned by Xenophon as one of the Thirty Tyrants.]

SOPHONISBA, daughter of the Carthaginian general Hasdrubal, the son of Gisco. She had been betrothed by her father, at a very early age, to the Numidian prince Masinissa; but, at a subsequent period, Hasdrubal being desirous to gain over Syphax, the rival monarch of Numidia, to the Carthaginian alliance, offered him the hand of his daughter in marriage. The beauty and accomplishments of Sophonisba prevailed over the influence of Scipio: Syphax married her, and became the zealous supporter and ally of Carthage. Sophonisba, on her part, was assiduous in her endeavors to secure his adherence to the cause of her countrymen. After the defeat of Syphax, and the capture of his capital city of Cirta by Masinissa, Sophonisba fell into the hands of the conqueror, upon whom, however, her beauty exercised so powerful an influence that he determined to marry her himself. Their nuptials were accordingly celebrated without delay, but Scipio (who was apprehensive lest she should exercise the same influence over Masinissa which she had previously done over Syphax) refused to ratify this arrangement, and, upbraiding Masinissa with his weakness, insisted on the immediate surrender of the princess. Unable to resist this command, the Numidian king spared her the humiliation of captivity by sending her a bowl of poison, which she drank without hesitation, and thus put an end to her own life.

SOPHRON (Σώφρων), of Syracuse, was the principal writer of that species of composition called the Mime (μίμος), which was one of the numerous varieties of the Dorian Comedy. He flourished about B.C. 460–420. When Sophron is called the inventor of mimes, the meaning is, that he reduced to the form of a literary composition a species of amusement which the Greeks of Sicily, who were pre-eminent for broad humor and merriment, had practiced from time immemorial at their public festivals, and the nature of which was very similar to the Spartan Deicelesta. Such mimetic performances prevailed throughout the Dorian states under various names. One feature of the Mimes of Sophron, which formed a marked distinction between them and comic poetry, was the nature of their rhythm. There is, however, some difficulty in determining whether they were in mere prose, or in mingled poetry and prose, or in prose with a peculiar rhythmical movement, but no metrical arrangement. With regard to the substance of these compositions, their character, so far as it can be ascertained, appears to have been ethical; that is, the scenes represented were those of ordinary life, and the language employed was intended to bring out more clearly the characters of the persons exhibited in those scenes, not only for the amusement, but also for the instruction of the spectators.

Plato was a great admirer of Sophron, and the philosopher is said to have been the first who made the Mimes known at Athens. The serious purpose which was aimed at in the works of Sophron was always, as in the Attic Comedy, clothed under a sportive form; and it can easily be imagined that sometimes the latter element prevailed, even to the extent of obscenity, as the extant fragments and the parallel of the Attic Comedy combine to prove. The best collection of the fragments of Sophron is by Ahrens, De Græcæ Linguae Dialectis.

A distinguished painter, flourished at Rome in the middle of the first century B.C., and is said by Cicero to have been the head of a school of painters.]

SŒRA. 1. (Soranus: now Sora), a town in Latium, on the right bank of the River Liris, and north of Arpinum, with a strongly-fortified citadel. It was the most northerly town of the Volsci in Latium, and afterward joined the Samnites; but it was conquered by the Romans, and was twice colonized by them, since the inhabitants had destroyed the first body of colonists. There are still remains of the polygonal walls of the ancient town.—2. A town in Paphlagonia of uncertain site.

SORACTE (now Monte di S. Oreste), a celebrated mountain in Etruria, in the territory of the Falisci, near the Tiber, about twenty-four miles from Rome, but the summit of which, frequently covered with snow, was clearly visible from the city. (Vides ut alta stet nive candidum Soracte, Hor., Carm., i., 9.) The whole mountain was sacred to Apollo, and on its summit was a temple of this god. At the festival of Apollo, celebrated on this mountain, the worshippers passed over burning embers without receiving any injury. (Virg., Æn., xi., 785, seq.)

SORANUS. 1. A Sabine divinity, usually identified with Apollo, worshipped on Mount Soracte. Vid. SOCRATE.—2. The name of several physicians, of whom the most celebrated seems to have been a native of Ephesus, and to have practiced his profession first at Alexandria, and afterward at Rome, in the reigns of Trajan and Hadrian, A.D. 98–138. There are several medical works still extant under the name of Soranus, but whether they were written by the native of Ephesus can not be determined.

SORDICE (now Etang de Leucate), a lake in Gallia Narbonensis, at the foot of the Pyrenees, formed by the River Sordis.

SORDONES or SORDI, a small people in Gallia Narbonensis, at the foot of the Pyrenees, whose chief town was Ruscino.

[SOSIA GALLA, a favorite of Agrippina, the widow of Germanicus, was involved in the charge of treason against her husband C. Silius, and sent into exile by Tiberius.]

SOSIBŪS (Σωσίβιος), a distinguished Lacedæmonian grammarian, who flourished in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus (about B.C. 251), and was contemporary with Callimachus.

[SOSICLES (Σωσικλῆς), a Corinthian deputy to the congress which had in consideration the restoration of Hippas to the tyranny of Athens. His earnest opposition to that measure induced the allies to abandon the project.]

SOSIGĒNES (Σωσιγένης), the peripatetic philosopher, was the astronomer employed by Julius Cæsar to superintend the correction of the calendar (B.C. 46). He is called an Egyptian, but may be supposed to have been an Alexandrian Greek. Vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. CALENDARĪUM.

SOSIPHĀNES (Σωσιφάνης), the son of Sosicles of Syracuse, was one of the seven tragedians who were called the Tragic Pleiad. He was born at the end of the reign of Philip, and flourished B.C. 284. [A few fragments remain, collected in Wagner's Tragic. Græc. Fragm., p. 157-8.]

[SOSIUS (Σῶσις), a Syracusan, who joined Cyrus the younger with three hundred Greek mercenaries.]

SOSITHĒUS (Σωσίθεος), of Syracuse or Athens, or Alexandria in the Troad, was a distinguished tragic poet, one of the Tragic Pleiad, and the antagonist of the tragic poet Homer. He flourished about B.C. 284. [The fragments of his tragedies are collected in Wagner's Tragic. Græc. Fragm., p. 149-152.]

SOSIUS. 1. C., quæstor B.C. 66, and prætor 49. He was afterward one of Antony's principal lieutenants in the East. He was appointed by Antony, in 38, governor of Syria and Cilicia in the place of Ventidius. Like his predecessor in the government, he carried on the military operations in his province with great success. In 37 he advanced against Jerusalem along with Herod, and after hard fighting became master of the city, and placed Herod upon the throne. In return for these services, Antony obtained for Sosius the honor of a triumph in 34, and the consulship in 32. Sosius commanded the left wing of Antony's fleet at the battle of Actium. He was afterward pardoned by Octavianus, at the intercession of L. Arruntius.—2. The name of two brothers (Sosii), booksellers at Rome in the time of Horace. They were probably freedmen, perhaps of the Sosius mentioned above.

SOSIŪTA, that is, the "saving goddess," was a surname of Juno at Lanuvium and at Rome, in both of which places she had a temple. Her worship was very ancient in Latium, and was transplanted from Lanuvium to Rome.

SOSTHĒNES (Σωσθένης), a Macedonian officer of noble birth, who obtained the supreme direction of affairs during the period of confusion which followed the invasion of the Gauls. He defeated the Gauls in 280. He is included by the chronologers among the kings of Macedonia, but it is very doubtful whether he ever assumed the royal title.

SOSTRĀTUS (Σώστρατος), the name of at least four, if not five, Grecian artists, who have been frequently confounded with one another. 1. A statuary in bronze, the sister's son of Pythagoras of Rhegium, and his disciple, flourished about B.C. 424.—2. Of Chios, the instructor of Pantias, flourished about B.C. 400.—3. A statuary in bronze, whom Pliny mentions as a contemporary of Lysippus, at Ol. 114, B.C. 323, the date of Alexander's death. It is probable, however, that he was identical with the following.—4. The son of Dexiphancs, of Cnidus, was one of the great architects who flourished during and after the life of Alexander the Great. He built for Ptolemy I, the son of Lagus, the celebrated Pharos of Alexandria. He also embellished his native city, Cnidus, with a work which was one of the wonders of ancient architecture, namely, a portico, or colonnade, supporting a terrace, which served as a promenade.—5. An engraver of precious stones, whose name appears on several very beautiful cameos and intaglios.

SŌSUS (Σῶσος), of Pergamus, a worker in mosaic, and, according to Pliny, the most celebrated of all who practiced that art.

SŌTĀDES (Σωτάδης). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy, who must not be confounded with the more celebrated poet of Maronea.—2. A native of Maronea in Thrace, flourished at Alexandria about B.C. 280. He wrote lascivious poems (called φλύακες or κίναδοι) in the Ionian dialect, whence they were also called Ἰωνικοὶ λόγοι. They were also called Sotadean poems (Σωτάδεια ἄσματα). It would seem that Sotades carried his lascivious and abusive satire to the utmost lengths; and the freedoms which he took at last brought him into trouble. According to Plutarch, he made a vehement and gross attack on Ptolemy Philadelphus, on the occasion of his marriage with his sister Arsinoë, and the king threw him into prison, where he remained for a long time. According to Athenæus, the poet attacked both Lysimachus and Ptolemy, and, having fled from Alexandria, he was overtaken at Caunus by Ptolemy's general Patroclus, who shut him up in a leaden chest and cast him into the sea.

SŌTĒR (Σώτηρ), i. e., "the Saviour" (Lat. Servator or Sospes), occurs as the surname of several divinities, especially of Zeus (Jupiter). It was also a surname of Ptolemæus I, king of Egypt, as well as of several of the other later Greek kings.

[SOTERICUS (Σωτήριχος), of the Oasis, an epic poet and historian of the time of the Emperor Diocletian. To him are ascribed an Encomium on Diocletian, a poem entitled Βασσαρικὰ ἤτοι Διονυσιακά, one on Pantheia of Babylon, another on Ariadne, a life of Apollonius of Tyana, a poetical history of the capture of Thebes by Alexander the Great, entitled Πύθων ἢ Ἀλεξανδριακόν, and others.]

SŌTĪON (Σωτίων). 1. A philosopher, and a native of Alexandria, who flourished at the close of the third century B.C. He is chiefly remarkable as the author of a work (entitled Δια δολοί) on the successive teachers in the different philosophical schools. — 2. A philosopher, and also a native of Alexandria, who lived in the age of Tiberius. He was the instructor of Seneca, who derived from him his admiration of Pythagoras. It was perhaps this Sotion who was the author of a treatise on anger, quoted by Stobæus. — 3. A Peripatetic philosopher, mentioned by A. Gellius, is probably a different person from either of the preceding.

SOTTIĀTES or SOTTĪTES, a powerful and warlike people in Gallia Aquitania, on the frontiers of Gallia Narbonensis, were subdued by P. Crassus, Cæsar's legate, after a hard-fought battle. The modern Sōs probably represents the ancient town of this people.

[Sōus (Σόος), one of the earliest kings of Sparta, son of Procles, whom he succeeded on the throne, and father of Eurypon, from whom the Proclid kings were called Eurypontidæ.]

SOZŌMĒNUS (Σωζόμενος), usually called Sozomen in English, was a Greek ecclesiastical historian of the fifth century. He was probably a native of Bethelia or Bethel, a village near Gaza in Palestine. His parents were Christians. He practiced as an advocate at Constantinople, whence he is surnamed Scholasticus; and he was still engaged in his profession when he wrote his history. His ecclesiastical history, which is extant, is in nine books, and is dedicated to the Emperor Theodosius II. It commences with the reign of Constantine, and comes down a little later than the death of Honorius, A. D. 423. The work is incomplete, and breaks off in the middle of a chapter. The author, we know, had proposed to bring it down to 439, the year in which the history of Socrates ends. Sozomen excels Socrates in style, but is inferior to the latter in soundness of judgment. The history of Sozomen is printed along with the other Greek ecclesiastical historians. Vid. SOCRATES.

SOZOPŌLIS, afterward SUSOPŌLIS (Σωζόπολις, Σωζούπολις: ruins at Susu), a considerable city of Pisidia, in a plain surrounded by mountains, north of Termessus.

SPARTA (Σπάρτη, Dor. Σπάρτα: Σπαρτιάτης, Spartiātes, Spartanus), also called LACEDÆMON (Λακεδαιμόνιος, Lacedæmonius), the capital of Laconia and the chief city of Peloponnesus, was situated on the right bank of the Eurotas (now Iri), about twenty miles from the sea. It stood on a plain which contained within it several rising grounds and hills. It was bounded on the east by the Eurotas, on the northwest by the small river Œnus (now Kelissima), and on the southeast by the small river Tiasa (now Magula), both of which streams fell into the Eurotas. The plain in which Sparta stood was shut in on the east by Mount Menelaum, and on the west by Mount Taygetus; whence the city is called by Homer "the hollow Lacedæmon." It was of a circular form, about six miles in circumference, and consisted of several distinct quarters, which were originally separate villages, and which were never united into one regular town. Its site is occupied by the modern villages of Magula and Psykhiko; and the principal modern town in the neighborhood is Mistra, which lies about two miles to the west, on the slopes of Mount Taygetus

During the flourishing times of Greek independence, Sparta was never surrounded by walls, since the bravery of its citizens, and the difficulty of access to it, were supposed to render such defences needless. It was first fortified by the tyrant Nabis; but it did not possess regular walls till the time of the Romans. Sparta, unlike most Greek cities, had no proper Acropolis, but this name was only given to one of the steepest hills of the town, on the summit of which stood the temple of Athena Polichos or Chalcæus. Five distinct quarters of the city are mentioned: 1. Pitane (Πιτανή: Ethnic Πιτανάτης), which appears to have been the most important part of the city, and in which was situated the Agora, containing the council-house of the senate, and the offices of the public magistrates. It was also surrounded by various temples and other public buildings. Of these the most splendid was the Persian Stoa or portico, originally built of the spoils taken in the Persian war, and enlarged and adorned at later times. A part of the Agora was called the Chorus or dancing place, in which the Spartan youths performed dances in honor of Apollo. 2. Limna (Λίμναι), a suburb of the city, on the banks of the Eurotas, northeast of Pitane, was originally a hollow spot covered with water. 3. Mesoa or Messoa (Μεσόα, Μεσσοά: Eth. Μεσσοάτης), also by the side of the Eurotas, southeast of the preceding, containing the Dromus and the Platanistas, which was a spot nearly surrounded with water, and so called from the plane-trees growing there. 4. Cynosuira (Κυνόσυρα: Κυνόσυρεύς), in the southwest of the city, and south of Pitane. 5. Ægida (Ἄγειδαι), in the northwest of the city, and west of Pitane. The two principal streets of Sparta ran from the Agora to the extreme end of the city: these were, 1. Apheta or Aphetais (Ἀφῆται, Ἀφῆταις, sc. ὁδός), extending in a southeasterly direction past the temple of Dictynna and the tombs of the Eurypontidæ; and, 2. Skias (Σκιάς), running nearly parallel to the preceding one, but further to the east, and which derived its name from an ancient place of assembly, of a circular form, called Skias. The most important remains of ancient Sparta are the ruins of the theatre, which was near the Agora. Sparta is said to have been founded by Lacedæmon, a son of Zeus and Taygete, who married Sparta, the daughter of Eurotas, and called the city after the name of his wife. His son Amyclas is said to have been the founder of Amyclæ, which was for a long time a more important town than Sparta itself. In the mythical period, Argos was the chief city in Peloponnesus, and Sparta is represented as subject to it. Here reigned Menelaus, the younger brother of Agamemnon; and by the marriage of Orestes, the son of Agamemnon, with Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, the two kingdoms of Argos and Sparta became united. The Dorian conquest of Peloponnesus, which, according to tradition, took place eighty years after the Trojan war, made Sparta the capital of the country. Laconia fell to the share of the two sons of Aristodemus, Eurysthenes and Procles, who took up their residence at Sparta, and ruled over the kingdom conjointly. The old inhabitants of the country maintain themselves at Amyclæ, which was not conquered for a long time. After the complete subjugation of the country we find three distinct classes in the population: the Dorian conquerors, who resided in the capital, and who were called Spartiatae or Spartans; the Periæci or old Achæan inhabitants, who became tributary to the Spartans, and possessed no political rights; and the Helots, who were also a portion of the old Achæan inhabitants, but were reduced to a state of slavery. From various causes the Spartans became distracted by intestine quarrels, till at length Lycurgus, who belonged to the royal family, was selected by all parties to give a new constitution to the state. The date of Lycurgus is uncertain; but it is impossible to place it later than B.C. 825. The constitution of Lycurgus, which is described in a separate article (vid. LYCURGUS), laid the foundation of Sparta's greatness. She soon became aggressive, and gradually extended her sway over the greater part of Peloponnesus. In B.C. 743 the Spartans attacked Messenia, and after a war of twenty years subdued this country, 723. In 685 the Messenians again took up arms, but at the end of seventeen years were again completely subdued, and their country from this time forward became an integral portion of Laconia. For details, vid. MESSENIA. After the close of the second Messenian war the Spartans continued their conquests in Peloponnesus. They defeated the Tegeans, and wrested the district of Thyreæ from the Argives. At the time of the Persian invasion, they were confessedly the first people in Greece; and to them was granted by unanimous consent the chief command in the war. But after the final defeat of the Persians, the haughtiness of Pausanias disgusted most of the Greek states, particularly the Ionians, and led them to transfer the supremacy to Athens (477). From this time the power of Athens steadily increased, and Sparta possessed little influence outside of the Peloponnesus. The Spartans, however, made several attempts to check the rising greatness of Athens, and their jealousy of the latter led at length to the Peloponnesian war (431). This war ended in the overthrow of Athens, and the restoration of the supremacy of Sparta over the rest of Greece (404). But the Spartans did not retain this supremacy more than thirty years. Their decisive defeat by the Thebans under Epaminondas at the battle of Leuctra (371) gave the Spartan power a shock from which it never recovered; and the restoration of the Messenians to their country two years afterward completed the humiliation of Sparta. Thrice was the Spartan territory invaded by the Thebans, and the Spartan women saw for the first time the watch-fires of an enemy's camp. The Spartans now finally lost their supremacy over Greece, but no other Greek state succeeded to their power; and about thirty years afterward the greater part of Greece was obliged to yield to Philip of Macedon. The Spartans, however, kept haughtily aloof from the Macedonian conqueror, and refused to take part in the Asiatic expedition of his son Alexander the Great. Under the later Macedonian monarchs the power of Sparta still further declined; the institutions of Lycurgus were neglected, luxury crept into the state, the number of citizens diminished, and the landed property became vested in a few families. Agis endeavored to restore the ancient institutions of Lycurgus, but he perished in the attempt (240). Cleomenes III., who began to reign 236, was more successful. He succeeded in putting the ephors to death, and overthrowing the existing government (225); and he then made a redistribution of the landed property, and augmented the number of the Spartan citizens by admitting some of the Periæci to this honor. His reforms infused new blood into the state, and for a short time he carried on war with success against the Achæans. But Aratus, the general of the Achæans, called in the assistance of Antigonus Doseu, the king of Macedonia, who defeated Cleomenes at the decisive battle of Sellasia (221), and followed up his success by the capture of Sparta. Sparta now sank into insignificance, and was ruled by a succession of native tyrants, till at length it was compelled to abolish its peculiar institutions, and to join the Achæan league. Shortly afterward it fell, with the rest of Greece, under the Roman power.

SPARTACUS, the name of several kings of the Cimmerian Bosphorus. 1. Succeeded the dynasty of the Archæanactidæ in B.C. 438, and reigned until 431. He was succeeded by his son Seleucus. — 2. Began to reign in 427, and reigned twenty years. He was succeeded in 407 by his son Satyrus. — 3. Succeeded his father Leucon in 353, and died, leaving his kingdom to his son Parysades in 348. — 4. Son of Eumelus, began to reign in 304, and reigned twenty years.

SPARTACUS, by birth a Thracian, was successively a shepherd, a soldier, and a chief of banditti. On one of his predatory expeditions he was taken prisoner, and sold to a trainer of gladiators. In 73 he was a member of the company of Lentulus, and was detained in his school at Capua, in readiness for the games at Rome. He persuaded his fellow-prisoners to make an attempt to gain their freedom. About seventy of them broke out of the school of Lentulus, and took refuge in the crater of Vesuvius. Spartacus was chosen leader, and was soon joined by a number of runaway slaves. They were blockaded by C. Claudius Pulcher at the head of three thousand men, but Spartacus attacked the besiegers and put them to flight. His numbers rapidly increased, and for two years (B.C. 73–71) he defeated one Roman army after another, and laid waste Italy, from the foot of the Alps to the southernmost corner of the peninsula. After both the consuls of 72 had been defeated by Spartacus, M. Licinius Crassus, the prætor, was appointed to the command of the war. Crassus carried on the contest with vigor and success, and, after gaining several advantages over the enemy, at length defeated them on the River Silarus in a decisive battle, in which Spartacus was slain. The character of Spartacus has been maligned by the Roman writers. Cicero compares the vilest of his contemporaries to him: Horace speaks of him as a common robber; none recognize his greatness, but the terror of his name survived to a late period of the empire. Accident made Spartacus a shepherd, a freebooter, and a gladiator; nature formed him a hero. The excesses of his followers he could not always repress, and his efforts to restrain them often cost him his popularity. But he was in himself not less mild and just than he was able and valiant.

SPARTARIUS CAMPUS. Vid. CARTHAGO NOVA.

SPARTI (Σπαρτοί, from σπαίρω), the Sown-Men, is the name given to the armed men who sprang from the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus, and who were believed to be the ancestors of the five oldest families at Thebes.

SPARTIANUS, ÆLIUS, one of the Scriptores Historiæ Augustæ, lived in the time of Diocletian and Constantine, and wrote the biographies of, 1. Hadrianus and Ælius Verus; 2. Didius Julianus; 3. Severus; 4. Pescennius Niger; 5. Caracalla; 6. Geta. For the editions of Spartianus, vid. CAPITOLINUS.

SPARTOLUS (Σπάρτωλος), a town in the Macedonian peninsula of Chalcidice, north of Olynthus.

SPAUTA (Σπαυτα: now Lake of Urmi), a large salt-lake in the west of Media, whose waters were singularly bitter and acrid. It was also called Matiana (Ματιανή λίμνη) from the name of the people who dwelt around it.

SPERCHEUS (Σπερχειός: now Elladha), a river in the south of Thessaly, which rises in Mount Tymphrestus, runs in an easterly direction through the territory of the Ænians, and through the district Malis, and falls into the innermost corner of the Sinus Maliacus. As a river-god Spercheus is a son of Oceanus and Terra (Ge), and the father of Menesthus by Polydora, the daughter of Peleus. To this god Peleus dedicated the hair of his son Achilles, in order that he might return in safety from the Trojan war.

SPES, the personification of Hope, was worshipped at Rome, where she had several temples, the most ancient of which had been built in B.C. 354, by the consul Atilius Calatinus, near the Porta Carmentalis. The Greeks also worshipped the personification of Hope, Elpis, and they relate the beautiful allegory, that when Epimetheus opened the vessel brought to him by Pandora, from which all manner of evils were scattered over the earth, Hope alone remained behind. Hope was represented in works of art as a youthful figure, lightly walking in full attire, holding in her right hand a flower, and with the left lifting up her garment.

SPEUSIPPUS (Σπενύσιππος), the philosopher, was a native of Athens, and the son of Eurymedon and Potone, a sister of Plato. He accompanied his uncle Plato on his third journey to Syracuse, where he displayed considerable ability and prudence. He succeeded Plato as president of the Academy, but was at the head of the school for only eight years (B.C. 347-339). He died, as it appears, of a lingering paralytic illness. He wrote several works, all of which are lost, in which he developed the doctrines of his great master.

SPHACTĒRIA. Vid. PYLOS, No. 3.

SPHÆRIA (Σφαίρα: now Poros), an island off the coast of Trœzen in Argolis, and between it and the island of Calauria, with the latter of which it was connected by means of a sand-bank. Here Sphærus, the charioteer of Pelops, is said to have been buried.

[SPHÆRUS (Σφαίρος). Vid. SPHÆRIA.]

SPHÆRUS (Σφαίρος), a Stoic philosopher, studied first under Zeno of Citium, and afterward under Cleanthes. He lived at Alexandria during the reigns of the first two Ptolemies. He also taught at Lacedæmon, and was believed to have had considerable influence in moulding the character of Cleomenes. He was in repute among the Stoics for the accuracy of his definitions. He was the author of several works, all of which are lost.

SPHENDALE (Σφενδάλη: Σφενδαλείς), a demus of Attica belonging to the tribe Hippothontis, on the frontiers of Bœotia, between Tanagra and Decelea.

SPHETTUS (Σφήττος: Σφήττιος), a demus in the south of Attica, near the silver mines of Sunium, belonging to the tribe Acamantis.

[SPHODRIAS (Σφοδρίας), Spartan harmost at Thespiæ B.C. 378, attempted in a time of peace to seize upon the Piræus. Having failed in the undertaking, he was tried by the Spartan ephors, but acquitted through the influence of Agesilaus. He was slain at the battle of Leuctra, B.C. 371.]

SPHINX (Σφίγξ, gen. Σφίγγός), a she-monster, daughter of Orthus and Chimæra, born in the country of the Arimi, or of Typhon and Echidna, or lastly of Typhon and Chimæra. She is said to have proposed a riddle to the Thebans, and to have murdered all who were unable to guess it. Œdipus solved it, whereupon the Sphinx slew herself. (For details, vid. ŒDIPUS.) The legend appears to have come from Egypt, but the figure of the Sphinx is represented somewhat differently in Greek mythology and art. The Egyptian Sphinx is the figure of a lion without wings in a lying attitude, the upper part of the body being that of a human being. The Sphinxes appear in Egypt to have been set up in avenues forming the approaches to temples. The common idea of a Greek Sphinx, on the other hand, is that of a winged body of a lion, the breast and upper part being the figure of a woman. Greek Sphinxes, moreover, are not always represented in a lying attitude, but appear in different positions, as it might suit the fancy of the sculptor or poet. Thus they appear with the face of a maiden, the breast, feet, and claws of a lion, the tail of a serpent, and the wings of a bird. Sphinxes were frequently introduced by Greek artists as ornaments of architectural works.

SPINA. 1. (Now Spinazzino), a town in Gallia Cispadana, in the territory of the Lingones, on the most southerly of the mouths of the Po, which was called after it Ostium Spineticum. It was a very ancient town, said to have been founded by the Greeks, but in the time of Strabo had ceased to be a place of any importance.— 2. (Now Spino), a town in Gallia Transpadana, on the River Addua.

[SPINO, a small stream in or near Rome, which, Cicero says, together with the Almo, Nodinus, Tiberinus, and other flowing waters, was invoked in the prayers of the augurs.]

SPINTIARUS (Σπίνθαρος), of Heraclea on the Pontus, a tragic poet, contemporary with Aristophanes, who designates him as a barbarian and a Phrygian. He was also ridiculed by the other comic poets.

[SPITHRIDATES (Σπιθριδάτης), a Persian commander sent by Pharnabazus to oppose the passage of the ten thousand through Bithynia

B. C. 400. Ho afterward revolted from the Persians, and joined Agesilaus.—2. Satrap of Lydia and Ionia under Darius Codomannus, was one of the Persian commanders at the battle of the Granicus in B. C. 334, in which battle, while Alexander was engaged with Rhœsaces, Spithridates attacked him from behind, and had raised his sword to strike, when Clitus, anticipating the blow, cut off his arm. (Compare RHÆSACES.)

SPOLATUM. Vid. SALONA.

SPOLĒTIUM or SPOLETUM (Spoletinus: now Spoleto), a town in Umbria, on the Via Flaminia, colonized by the Romans B. C. 242. It suffered severely in the civil wars between Sulla and Marius. At a later time it was taken by Tullius; but its walls, which had been destroyed by the Goths, were restored by Narses.

SPŌRĀDES (Σποράδες, sc. νῆσοι, from σπείρω), a group of scattered islands in the Ægean Sea, off the island of Crete and the western coast of Asia Minor, so called in opposition to the Cyclades, which lay in a circle around Delos. The division, however, between these two groups of islands was not well defined; and we find some of the islands at one time described as belonging to the Sporades, and at another time as belonging to the Cyclades.

SPURINNA, VESTRITIUS. 1. The haruspex who warned Cæsar to beware of the Ides of March. It is related that, as Cæsar was going to the senate-house on the fatal day, he said to Spurinna in jest, "Well, the Ides of March are come," upon which the seer replied, "Yes, they are come, but they are not past."—2. A Roman general, who fought on the side of Otho against the Vitellian troops in the north of Italy. In the reign of Trajan he gained a victory over the Bructeri. Spurinna lived on terms of the closest friendship with the younger Pliny, from whom we learn that Spurinna composed lyric poems. There are extant four odes, or rather fragments of odes, in choriambic measure, ascribed to Spurinna, and which were first published by Barthius in 1613. Their genuineness, however, is very doubtful.

SPURINUS, Q. PETILLIUS, prætor urbanus in B. C. 181, in which year the books of King Numa Pompilius are said to have been discovered upon the estate of one L. Petillius. Spurius obtained possession of the books, and upon his representation to the senate that they ought not to be read and preserved, the senate ordered them to be burned. Vid. NUMA. Spurius was consul in 176, and fell in battle against the Ligurians.

STABIÆ (Stabianus: now Castell a Mare di Stabia), an ancient town in Campania, between Pompeii and Surrentum, which was destroyed by Sulla in the Social War, but which continued to exist as a small place down to the great eruption of Vesuvius in A. D. 79, when it was overwhelmed along with Pompeii and Herculaneum. It was at Stabiæ that the elder Pliny perished.

STAGIRUS, subsequently STAGIRA (Στάγειρος, τὰ Στάγειρα, ἢ Σταγείρα: Σταγειρίτης: now Stavro), a town of Macedonia in Chalcidice, on the Strymonic Gulf, and a little north of the isthmus which unites the promontory of Athos to Chalcidice. It was a colony of Andros, was founded B. C. 656, and was originally called Orthogoria. It is celebrated as the birth-place of Aristotle, and was in consequence restored by Philip, by whom it had been destroyed.

STAPHYLUS (Στάφυλος), son of Bacchus (Dionysus) and Ariadne, or of Theseus and Ariadne, and was one of the Argonauts. By Chrysothemis he became the father of three daughters, Molpadia, Rhœo, and Parthenos.

[STASÆAS, of Neapolis, a peripatetic philosopher, who lived many years at Rome with M. Piso, and was also on friendly terms with Cicero.]

STASINUS (Στασίσιος), of Cyprus, an epic poet, to whom some of the ancient writers attributed the poem of the Epic Cycle, entitled Cypria (Κύπρια). In the earliest historical period of Greek literature the Cypria was accepted without question as a work of Homer; and it is not till we come down to the times of Athenæus and the grammarians that we find any mention of Stasinus. Stasinus was said to be the son-in-law of Homer, who, according to one story, composed the Cypria, and gave it to Stasinus as his daughter's marriage portion; manifestly an attempt to reconcile the two different accounts, which ascribed it to Homer and Stasinus. The Cypria was the first, in the order of the events contained in it, of the poems of the Epic Cycle relating to the Trojan war. It embraced the period antecedent to the beginning of the Iliad, to which it was designed to form an introduction.

STATIELLI, STATIELLĀTES, or STATIELLENSES, a small tribe in Liguria, south of the Po, whose chief town was Statiellæ Aquæ (now Acqui), on the road from Genoa to Placentia.

STĀTIRA (Στάτειρα). 1. Wife of Artaxerxes II., king of Persia, was poisoned by Parysatis, the mother of the king, who was a deadly enemy of Staira.—2. Sister and wife of Darius III., celebrated as the most beautiful woman of her time. She was taken prisoner by Alexander, together with her mother-in-law Sisygambis and her daughters, after the battle of Issus, B. C. 333. They were all treated with the utmost respect by the conqueror, but Staira died shortly before the battle of Arbela, 331.—3. Also called BARSINE, elder daughter of Darius III. Vid. BARSINE.

STATIUS MURCUS. Vid. MURCUS.

[STATIUS. 1. A literary slave of Q. Cicero, whom he subsequently manumitted, had given offence to M. Cicero, as appears from the latter's letters.—2. GELLIUS, a general of the Samnites, was defeated by the Romans and taken prisoner in B. C. 305.]

STĀTIUS, P. PAPINIUS, was born at Neapolis about A. D. 61, and was the son of a distinguished grammarian. He accompanied his father to Rome, where the latter acted as the preceptor of Domitian, who held him in high honor. Under the skillful tuition of his father, the young Statius speedily rose to fame, and became peculiarly renowned for the brilliancy of his extemporaneous effusions, so that he gained the prize three times in the Alban contests; but having, after a long career of popularity, been vanquished in the quinquennial games, he retired to Neapolis, the place of his nativity, along with his wife Claudia, whose virtues he frequently commemorates. He died about A. D. 96. It has been inferred from a passage in Juvenal (vii., 82), that Statius, in his earlier years at least, was forced to struggle with poverty; but he appears to have profited by the patronage of Domitian (Silv., iv., 2), whom he addresses in strains of the most fulsome adulation. The extant works of Statius are: 1. Silvarum Libri V., a collection of thirty-two occasional poems, many of them of considerable length, divided into five books. To each book is prefixed a dedication in prose, addressed to some friend. The metre chiefly employed is the heroic hexameter, but four of the pieces (i., 6; ii., 7; iv., 3, 9) are in Phalæcian hendecasyllabics, one (iv., 5) in the Alcaic, and one (iv., 7) in the Sapphic stanza. 2. Thebaidos Libri XII., an heroic poem in twelve books, embodying the ancient legends with regard to the expedition of the Seven against Thebes. 3. Achilleidos Libri II., an heroic poem breaking off abruptly. According to the original plan, it would have comprised a complete history of the exploits of Achilles, but was probably never finished. Statius may justly claim the praise of standing in the foremost rank among the heroic poets of the Silver Age. He is in a great measure free from extravagance and pompous pretensions; but, on the other hand, in no portion of his works do we find the impress of high natural talent and imposing power. The pieces which form the Silvæ, although evidently thrown off in haste, produce a much more pleasing effect than the ambitious poems of the Thebaid or the Achilleid. The best editions of the Silvæ are by Markland, Lond., 1728, and by Sillig, Dresd., 1827. The best edition of the complete works of Statius is by Lemaire, 4 vols. 8vo, Paris, 1825-1830.

STATŌNĪA (Statoniensis), a town in Etruria, and a Roman præfectura, on the River Albinia, and on the Lacus Statoniensis, in the neighborhood of which were stone quarries, and excellent wine was grown.

STATOR, a Roman surname of Jupiter, describing him as staying the Romans in their flight from an enemy, and generally as preserving the existing order of things.

STECTŌRĪUM (Στεκτόριον; now Afioum Kara-Hisar?), a city of Great Phrygia, between Pelææ and Synnadia.

STENTOR (Στένωρ), a herald of the Greeks in the Trojan war, whose voice was as loud as that of fifty other men together. His name has become proverbial for any one shouting with an unusually loud voice.

STENTŌRIS LACUS. Vid. HERBUS.

STENYCLĒRUS (Στενυκλήρος, Dor. Στενυκλάρος; Στενυκλήριος), a town in the north of Messenia, which was the residence of the Dorian kings of the country. After the time of the third Messenian war the town is no longer mentioned; but its name continued to be given to an extensive plain in the north of Messenia.

STĒPHĀNE OR-IS (Στεφάνη, Στεφανίς; now Stefanio), a sea-port town of Paphlagonia, on the coast of the Mariandyni.

STĒPHĀNUS (Στέφανος). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the New Comedy, was probably the son of Antiphanes, some of whose plays he is said to have exhibited.—2. Of Byzantium, the author of the geographical lexicon entitled Ethnica (Ἔθνικὰ), of which, unfortunately, we possess only an epitome. Stephanus was a grammarian at Constantinople, and lived after the time of Arcadius and Honorius, and before that of Justinian II. His work was reduced to an epitome by a certain Hermolaus, who dedicated his abridgment to the Emperor Justinian II. According to the title, the chief object of the work was to specify the gentile names derived from the several names of places and countries in the ancient world. But, while this is done in every article, the amount of information given went far beyond this. Nearly every article in the epitome contains a reference to some ancient writer, as an authority for the name of the place; but in the original, as we see from the extant fragments, there were considerable quotations from the ancient authors, besides a number of very interesting particulars, topographical, historical, mythological, and others. Thus the work was not merely what it professed to be, a lexicon of a special branch of technical grammar, but a valuable dictionary of geography. How great would have been its value to us, if it had come down to us un mutilated, may be seen by any one who compares the extant fragments of the original with the corresponding articles in the epitome. These fragments, however, are unfortunately very scanty. The best editions of the Epitome of Stephanus are by Dindorf, Lips., 1825, &c., 4 vols.; by Westermann, Lips., 1839, 8vo; and by Meineke, Berlin, 1849, vol. i.

STĒRŌLĪUS, STĒRŌLĪUS, or STĒRŌLĪNUS, a surname of Saturnus, derived from Stercus, manure, because he had promoted agriculture by teaching the people the use of manure. This seems to have been the original meaning, though some Romans state that Sterculius was a surname of Picumnus, the son of Faunus, to whom likewise improvements in agriculture are ascribed.

STĒRŌPES. Vid. CYCLOPES.

[STERTINIUS, a Stoic philosopher, whom Horace (Sat., ii., 3, 296), in derision, calls the eighth of the wise men: the scholiast says that he wrote two hundred and thirty books on the Stoic philosophy in the Latin language.]

STĒSĪCHŌRUS (Στησίχορος), of Himera in Sicily, a celebrated Greek poet, contemporary with Sappho, Alcæus, Pittacus, and Phalaris, is said to have been born B.C. 632, to have flourished about 608, and to have died in 552, at the age of eighty. Of the events of his life we have only a few obscure accounts. Like other great poets, his birth is fabled to have been attended by an omen; a nightingale sat upon the babe's lips, and sung a sweet strain. He is said to have been carefully educated at Catania, and afterward to have enjoyed the friendship of Phalaris, the tyrant of Agrigentum. Many writers relate the fable of his being miraculously struck with blindness after writing an attack upon Helen, and recovering his sight when he had composed a Palinodia. He is said to have been buried at Catania by a gate of the city, which was called after him the Stesichorean gate. Stesichorus was one of the nine chiefs of lyric poetry recognized by the ancients. He stands, with Alcman, at the head of one branch of the lyric art, the choral poetry of the Dorians. He was the first to break the monotony of the strophe and antistrophe by the introduction of the epode, and his metres were much more varied, and the structure of his strophes more elaborate, than those of Alcman. His odes contained all the essential elements of the perfect choral poetry of Pindar and the tragedians. The subjects of his poems were chiefly heroic; he transferred the subjects of the old epic poetry to the lyric form, dropping, of course, the continuous narrative, and dwelling on isolated adventures of his heroes. He also composed poems on other subjects. His extant remains may be classified under the following heads: 1. Mythical Poems. 2. Hymns, Encomia, Epithalamia, Pæans. 3. Erotic Poems, and Scholia. 4. A pastoral poem, entitled Daphnis. 5. Fables. 6. Elegies. The dialect of Stesichorus was Dorian, with an intermixture of the epic. The best edition of his fragments is by Kleine, Berol., 1828.

[STESICLES (Στησίκλης, called by Diodorus Κτησίκλης), was sent by the Athenians with six hundred peltastæ to aid the Corcyreans against the Lacedæmonians under Mnasippus, B.C. 373. He was successful, and caused the withdrawal of the Lacedæmonians from Corcyra.]

STESIMBRÖTUS (Στησίμβροτος), of Thasos, a rhapsodist and historian in the time of Cimon and Pericles, who is mentioned with praise by Plato and Xenophon, and who wrote a work upon Homer, the title of which is not known. He also wrote some historical works.

STHENEBŒA (Σθενέβοια), called ANTEA by many writers, was a daughter of the Lycian king Iobates, and the wife of Prætus. Respecting her love for Bellerophon, vid. BELLEROPHONTES.

[STHENELAÏDAS (Σθενελαΐδας), a Spartan ephor, who strongly urged the declaration of war against Athens in the assembly of the Spartans and their allies before the Peloponnesian war, and contributed greatly to that determination on the part of the assembly.]

STHENEÏUS (Σθενέως). 1. Son of Perseus and Andromeda, king of Mycenæ, and husband of Nicippe, by whom he became the father of Alcinoë, Medusa, and Eurystheus. The latter, as the great enemy of Hercules (vid. HERCULES), is called by Ovid Sthenelcius hostis.—2. Son of Androgeos and grandson of Minos. He accompanied Hercules from Paros on his expedition against the Amazons, and, together with his brother Alcæus, he was appointed by Hercules ruler of Thasos.—3. Son of Actor, likewise a companion of Hercules in his expedition against the Amazons; but he died, and was buried in Paphlagonia, where he afterward appeared to the Argonauts.—4. Son of Capaneus and Evadne, belonged to the family of the Anaxagoridæ in Argos, and was the father of Cylarabes; but, according to others, his son's name was Cometes. He was one of the Epigoni, by whom Thebes was taken, and he commanded the Argives under Diomedes in the Trojan war, being the faithful friend and companion of Diomedes. He was one of the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse, and at the distribution of the booty, he was said to have received an image of a three-eyed Jupiter (Zeus), which was in after times shown at Argos. His own statue and tomb also were believed to exist at Argos.—5. Father of Cycnus, who was metamorphosed into a swan. Hence we find the swan called by Ovid Sthenelcis volucris and Sthenelcia proles.—6. A tragic poet, contemporary with Aristophanes, who attacked him in the Wasps.

STHENO. Vid. GORGONES.

[STICHIUS (Στίχιος), a leader of the Athenian forces in the Trojan war, was slain by Hector.]

STILICHO, son of a Vandal captain under the Emperor Valens, became one of the most distinguished generals of Theodosius I. On the death of Theodosius, A.D. 395, Stilicho became the real ruler of the West under the Emperor Honorius; and his power was strengthened by the death of his rival Rufinus (vid. RUFINUS), and by the marriage of his daughter Maria to Honorius. His military abilities saved the Western empire; and after gaining several victories over the barbarians, he defeated Alaric at the decisive battle of Pollentia, 403, and compelled him to retire from Italy. In 405 he gained another great victory over Radagaisus, who had invaded Italy at the head of a formidable host of barbarians. These victories raised the ambition of Stilicho to so high a pitch that he aspired to make himself master of the Roman empire; but he was apprehended and put to death at Ravenna in 408.

STILO, L. ÆLIUS PRÆCONINUS, a celebrated Roman grammarian, one of the teachers of Varro and Cicero. He received the surname of Præconinus because his father had been a præco, and that of Stilo on account of his compositions. He belonged to the aristocratic party, and accompanied Q. Metellus Numidicus into exile in B.C. 100. He wrote Commentaries on the Songs of the Sali and on the Twelve Tables, a work De Proloquiis, &c. He and his son-in-law, Ser. Claudius, may be regarded as the founders of the study of grammar at Rome. Some modern writers suppose that the work on Rhetoric ad C. Herennium, which is printed in the editions of Cicero, is the work of this Ælius, but this is mere conjecture.

STILPO (Στίλπων), a celebrated philosopher, was a native of Megara, and taught philosophy in his native town. According to one account, he engaged in dialectic encounters with Diodorus Cronus at the court of Ptolemæus Soter; while, according to another, he did not comply with the invitation of the king to visit Alexandria. He acquired a great reputation; and so high was the esteem in which he was held, that Demetrius, the son of Antigonos, spared his house at the capture of Megara. He is said to have surpassed his contemporaries in inventive power and dialectic art, and to have inspired almost all Greece with a devotion to the Megarian philosophy. He seems to have made the idea of virtue the especial object of his consideration. He maintained that the wise man ought not only to overcome every evil, but not even to be affected by any.

[STIMO, a village of Thessaly, near Gomphi, mentioned by Livy.]

STIMŪLA, the name of Semele, according to some critics, among the Romans.

STĪRĪA (Στεῖρῖα : Στεῖριεύς : ruins on the bay Porto Rafti), a demus in Attica, southeast of Brauron, belonging to the tribe Pandionis, to which there was a road from Athens called Στεῖριακὴ ὁδός. It was the birth-place of The- rameses and Thrasylbulus.

STOBÆUS, JOANNES (Ἰωάννης ὁ Στοβαῖος), derived his surname apparently from being a native of Stobi in Macedonia. Of his personal history we know nothing. Even the age in which he lived can not be fixed with accuracy, but he must have been later than Hierocles of Alexandria, whom he quotes. Probably he did not live very long after him, as he quotes no writer of a later date. We are indebted to Stobæus for a very valuable collection of extracts from earlier Greek writers. Stobæus was a man of extensive reading, in the course of which he noted down the most interesting passages. The materials which he had collected in this way he arranged, in the order of subjects, for the use of his son Septimius. This collection of extracts has come down to us, divided into two distinct works, of which one bears the title of Ἐκλογαὶ φυσικαὶ διαλεκτικαὶ καὶ ἠθικαὶ (Eclogæ Physicæ, etc.), and the other the title of Ἀνθολόγιον (Florilegium or Sermones). The Eclogæ consist for the most part of extracts conveying the views of earlier poets and prose writers on points of physics, dialectics, and ethics. The Florilegium, or Sermones, is devoted to subjects of a moral, political, and economical kind, and maxims of practical wisdom. Each chapter of the Eclogæ and Sermones is headed by a title describing its matter. The extracts quoted in illustration begin usually with passages from the poets, after whom come historians, orators, philosophers, and physicians. To Stobæus we are indebted for a large proportion of the fragments that remain of the lost works of poets. Euripides seems to have been an especial favorite with him. He has quoted above five hundred passages from him in the Sermones, one hundred and fifty from Sophocles, and above two hundred from Menander. In extracting from prose writers, Stobæus sometimes quotes verbatim, sometimes gives only an epitome of the passage. The best editions of the Eclogæ are by Heeren, Gotting, 1792-1801, 4 vols. 8vo, [and by Gaisford, Oxford, 1850, 2 vols. 8vo], and of the Florilegium by Gaisford, Oxon., 1822, 4 vols. 8vo.

STŌBI (Στόβοι : Στοβαῖος), a town of Macedonia, and the most important place in the district Pæonia, was probably situated on the River Erigon, north of Thessalonica and northeast of Heraclea. It was made a Roman colony and a municipium, and under the later emperors was the capital of the province Macedonia II. or Salutaris. It was destroyed at the end of the fourth century by the Goths; but it is still mentioned by the Byzantine writers as a fortress under the name of Stypæum (Στύπειον). Its site is unknown; for the modern Istib, which is usually supposed to stand upon the site of Stobi, lies too far to the northeast.

STĒCHĪDES INSŪLÆ (now Isle d'Hières), a group of five small islands in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Gallia Narbonensis and east of Massilia, on which the Massiliotes kept an armed force to protect their trade against pirates. The three larger islands were called Prote, Mese or Pomponiana, and Hypæa, the modern Porquerolle, Port Croz, and Isle de Levant or du Titan; the two smaller ones are probably the modern Ratoneau and Promègne.

STĒNI, a Ligurian people in the Maritime Alps, conquered by Q. Marcius Rex B.C. 118, before he founded the colony of Narbo Martius.

STRABO, a cognomen in many Roman gentes, signified a person who squinted, and is accordingly classed with Patus, though the latter word did not indicate such a complete distortion of vision as Strabo.

STRABO, the geographer, was a native of Amasia in Pontus. The date of his birth is unknown, but may perhaps be placed about B.C. 54. He lived during the whole of the reign of Augustus, and during the early part, at least, of the reign of Tiberius. He is supposed to have died about A.D. 24. He received a careful education. He studied grammar under Aristodemus at Nysa in Caria, and philosophy under Xenarchus of Seleucia in Cilicia and Boethus of Sidon. He lived some years at Rome, and also travelled much in various countries. We learn from his own work that he was with his friend Ælius Gallus in Egypt in B.C. 24. He wrote an historical work (Ἱστορικὰ Ὑπομνήματα) in forty-three books, which is lost. It began where the history of Polybius ended, and was probably continued to the battle of Actium. He also wrote a work on Geography (Γεωγραφικὰ), in seventeen books, which has come down to us entire, with the exception of the seventh, of which we have only a meagre epitome. Strabo's work, according to his own expression, was not intended for the use of all persons. It was designed for all who had had a good education, and particularly for those who were engaged in the higher departments of administration. Consistently with this view, his plan does not comprehend minute description, except when the place or the object is of great interest or importance; nor is his description limited to the physical characteristics of each country; it comprehends the important political events of which each country has been the theatre, a notice of the chief cities and the great men who have illustrated them; in short, whatever was most characteristic and interesting in every country. His work forms a striking contrast with the geography of Ptolemy, and the dry list of names, occasionally relieved by something added to them, in the geographical portion of the Natural History of Pliny. It is, in short, a book intended for reading, and it may be read; a kind of historical geography. Strabo's language is generally clear, except in those passages where the text has been corrupted; it is appropriate to the matter, simple and without affectation. The first two books of Strabo are an introduction to his Geography, and contain his views on the form and magnitude of the earth, and other subjects connected with mathematical geography. In the third book he begins his description: he devotes eight books to Europe; six to Asia; and the seventeenth and last to Egypt and Libya. The best editions of Strabo are by Casaubon, Geneva, 1587, and Paris, 1620, fol.—reprinted by Almeloveen, Amsterdam, 1707, and by Falconer, Oxford, 1807, 2 vols. fol.—by Siebenkees, and Tzschucke, Lips., 1811, 7 vols. 8vo; by Coraes, Paris, 1815, seq., 4 vols. 8vo; and by Kramer, Berlin, 1844, seq., of which only two volumes have yet appeared. This last is by far the best critical edition.

STRABO, FANNIUS. 1. C., consul B.C. 161 with M. Valerius Messala. In their consulship the rhetoricians were expelled from Rome.—2. C., son of the preceding, consul 122. He owed his election to the consulship chiefly to the influence of C. Gracchus, who was anxious to prevent his enemy Opimius from obtaining the office. But in his consulship Fannius supported the aristocracy, and took an active part in opposing the measures of Gracchus. He spoke against the proposal of Gracchus, who wished to give the Roman franchise to the Latins, in a speech which was regarded as a master-piece in the time of Cicero.—3. C., son-in-law of Lælius, and frequently confounded with No. 2. He served in Africa, under Scipio Africanus, in 146, and in Spain, under Fabius Maximus, in 142. He is introduced by Cicero as one of the speakers both in his work De Republica and in his treatise De Amicitia. He owed his celebrity in literature to his History, which was written in Latin, and of which Brutus made an abridgment.

STRABO, SEIUS. Vid. SEJANUS.

STRATOCLES (Στρατοκλῆς), an Athenian orator, and a friend of the orator Lycurgus. He was a virulent opponent of Demosthenes, whom he charged with having accepted bribes from Harpalus. Stratocles especially distinguished himself by his extravagant flattery of Demetrius.

STRATON (Στράτων). 1. Son of Arcesilaus of Lampsacus, was a distinguished peripatetic philosopher, and the tutor of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He succeeded Theophrastus as head of the school in B.C. 288, and, after presiding over it eighteen years, was succeeded by Lycon. He devoted himself especially to the study of natural science, whence he obtained the appellation of Physicus. Cicero, while speaking highly of his talents, blames him for neglecting the most necessary part of philosophy, that which has respect to virtue and morals, and giving himself up to the investigation of nature. Straton appears to have held a pantheistic system, the specific character of which can not, however, be determined. He seems to have denied the existence of any god out of the material universe, and to have held that every particle of matter has a plastic and seminal power, but without sensation or intelligence; and that life, sensation, and intellect are but forms, accidents, and affections of matter. Some modern writers have regarded Straton as a forerunner of Spinoza, while others see in his system an anticipation of the hypothesis of monads.—2. Of Sardis, an epigrammatic poet, and the compiler of a Greek Anthology, devoted to licentious subjects. Vid. PLANUDES.—3. A physician of Berytus in Phœnicia, one of whose medical formulæ is quoted by Galen.—4. Also a physician, and a pupil of Erasistratus in the third century B.C., who appears to have lived on very intimate terms with his tutor.

STRATONICE (Στρατονίκη). 1. Wife of Antigonus, king of Asia, by whom she became the mother of Demetrius Poliorcetes.—2. Daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes and Phila, the daughter of Antipater. In 300, at which time she could not have been more than seventeen years of age, she was married to Seleucus, king of Syria. Notwithstanding the disparity of their ages, she lived in harmony with the old king for some years, when it was discovered that her step-son Antiochus was deeply enamored of her, and Seleucus, in order to save the life of his son, which was endangered by the violence of his passion, gave up Stratonicë in marriage to the young prince. She bore three children to Antiochus: 1. Antiochus II., surnamed Theos; 2. Apama, married to Magas, king of Cyrene; and, 3. Stratonicë.—3. Daughter of the preceding and of Antiochus I., was married to Demetrius II., king of Macedonia. She quitted Demetrius in disgust on account of his second marriage with Pthia, the daughter of Olympias, and retired to Syria. Here she was put to death by her nephew Seleucus II., against whom she had attempted to raise a revolt.—4. Daughter of Antiochus II., king of Syria, married to Ariarathes III., king of Cappadocia.—5. One of the favorite wives of Mithradates the Great.

STRATONICĒA (Στρατονικεία, Στρατονίκη; Στρατονικεύς, Stratoniceus, Stratonicensis: now ruins at Eski-Hisar), one of the chief inland cities of Caria, built by Antiochus I. Soter, who fortified it strongly, and named it in honor of his wife Stratonicë. It stood east of Mylasa, and south of Alabanda, near the River Marsyas, a southern tributary of the Mæander. Under the Romans it was a free city, and it was improved by Hadrian. Near it stood the great temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Chrysaoreus, the centre of the national worship of the Carians. There is some reason to believe that Stratonicëa stood on the site of a former city, called Idrias, and, still earlier, Chrysaoreus.

[STRATONICUS (Στρατόνικος), of Athens, a distinguished musician of the time of Alexander the Great, famed for his wit, and the large number of pupils attending his musical instructions. He is said to have visited Nicocles in Cyprus, and there to have met his death by his too great independence.]

STRATONIS TURRIS. Vid. CÆSAREÆ, No. 3.

STRATTIS (Στράττις or Στράτις), an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, flourished from B.C. 412 to 380. [His fragments are collected in Meincke's Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. i, p. 428-441, edit. minor.]

STRATUS (Στράτος). 1. (Στράτιος: ruins near Lepenu or Lepanon), the chief town in Acarnania, ten stadia west of the Achelous. Its territory was called STRATICE. It was a strongly-fortified town, and commanded the ford of the Achelous on the high road from Ætolia to Acarnania. Hence it was a place of military importance, and was at an early period taken possession of by the Ætoliens.—2. A town in Achæa, afterward called ΔΥΜΕ.—3. A town in the west of Arcadia, in the territory of Thelpusa, perhaps the same as the Homeric Stratia.

STRONGYLE. Vid. NAXOS.

STRONGYLION (Στρογγυλίων), a distinguished Greek statuary, flourished during the last thirty or forty years of the fifth century B.C.

STROPHADES INSULÆ (Στροφάδες), formerly called PLŌTÆ (Πλωταί: now Strofadia and Strivali), two islands in the Ionian Sea, off the coast of Messenia and south of Zacynthus. The Harpies were pursued to these islands by the sons of Boreas; and it was from the circumstance of the latter returning from these islands after the pursuit that they are supposed to have obtained the name of Strophades.

STRŌPHIUS (Στρόφιός) 1. King of Phocis, son of Crissus and Antiphatia, and husband of Cydradora, Anaxibia, or Astyochia, by whom he became the father of Astydamia and Pylades. Vid. ORESTES.—[2. Father of Scamandrius, mentioned in the Iliad (v., 49).]

STRŪCHĪTES (Στρούχατες), a Median people, mentioned only by Herodotus (i., 101).

[STRŪME (Στρούμη: Στρυμνός, Στρυμῆσιος, and Στρυμναίος), on the Iissus, a city of the Thasii in Thrace: also claimed as their own by the Maronitæ, who contended with the Thasians for its possession.]

STRŪMON (now Struma, by the Turks Karasu), an important river in Macedonia, forming the boundary between that country and Thrace down to the time of Philip. It rose in Mount Scomius, flowed first south and then southeast, passed through the Lake Prasias, and, immediately south of Amphipolis, fell into a bay of the Ægean Sea, called after it STRŪMONIŪS SIKUS. The numerous cranes on its banks are frequently mentioned by ancient writers.

STRŪMONĪ (Στρυμόνιοι), the old name, according to Herodotus, of the Bithynians, who migrated into Asia Minor from the banks of the River Strymon. Bithynia was sometimes called Strymonis.

STUBĒRA, a town of Macedonia, in the district Pæonia, probably on the River Erigon.

STYMPHĪLĪDES. Vid. STYMPHALUS.

STYMPHĪLIS (Στυμφαλίς). 1. A lake in Arcadia. Vid. STYMPHALUS.—2. A district in Macedonia, between Atintania and Elimiotis.

STYMPHĪLUS (Στύμφαλος, Στύμφηλος: Στυμφάλιος), a town in the northeast of Arcadia, the territory of which was bounded on the north by Achaia, on the east by Sicyonia and Phliasia, on the south by the territory of Mantinea, and on the west by that of Orchomenus and Pheneus. The district was one of military importance, since it commanded one of the chief roads from Arcadia to Argolis. Its name is said to have been derived from Stymphalus, a son of Elatus and grandson of Arcas. The town itself was situated on a mountain of the same name, and on the northern side of the Lake STYMPHĪLIS (Στυμφαλίς: now Zaraka), on which dwelt, according to tradition, the celebrated birds called STYMPHĪLĪDES (Στυμφαλλίδες), destroyed by Hercules. (For details, vid. p. 357, b.) From this lake issued the River Stymphalus, which, after a short course, disappeared under ground, and was supposed to appear again as the River Erasinus in Argolis.

STŪRA (τὰ Στύρα: Στυρεῖς: now Stura), a town in Eubœa, on the southwest coast, not far from Carystus, and nearly opposite Marathon in Attica. The inhabitants were originally Dryopes, though they subsequently denied their descent from this people. They took an active part in the Persian war, and fought at Artemisium, Salamis, and Plataeæ. They afterward became subject to the Athenians, and paid a yearly tribute of twelve hundred drachmæ. The town was destroyed in the Lamian war by the Athenian general Phædrus, and its territory was annexed to Eretria.

STYX (Στύξ), connected with the verb στυγέω, to hate or abhor, is the name of the principal river in the nether world, around which it flows seven times. Styx is described as a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. As a nymph she dwelt at the entrance of Hades, in a lofty grove which was supported by silver columns. As a river, Styx is described as a branch of Oceanus, flowing from its tenth source; and the River Coeytus, again, is a branch of the Styx. By Pallas Styx became the mother of Zelus (zeal), Nice (victory), Bia (strength), and Cratos (power). She was the first of all the immortals who took her children to Jupiter (Zeus) to assist him against the Titans; and, in return for this, her children were allowed forever to live with Jupiter (Zeus), and Styx herself became the divinity by whom the most solemn oaths were sworn. When one of the gods had to take an oath by Styx, Iris fetched a cup full of water from the Styx, and the god, while taking the oath, poured out the water.

STYX (Στύξ: now Mavra-neria), a river in the north of Arcadia, near Nonacris, descending from a high rock, and falling into the Crathis. The ancients believed that the water of this river was poisonous; and, according to one tale, Alexander the Great was poisoned by it. It was said, also, to break all vessels made of glass, stone, metal, and any other material except of the hoof of a horse or a mule.

SUADA, the Roman personification of persuasion, the Greek Pitho (Πειθῶ), also called by the diminutive Suadela.

SŪXĒLĀ (Σούαγελα), an ancient city of Caria, near Myndus, was the burial-place of the old kings of the country.

SUASA (Suasanus: now S. Lorenzo), a municipality in Umbria, on the Sena.

SUASTUS: Vid. CHOASPES, No. 2.

SUBERTUM or SUBERTUM (Sudertanus: now Sovrietto), a town in the interior of Etruria.

SUBLAQUĒUM (Sublacensis: now Subiaco), a small town of the Æqui in Latium, on the Anio, near its source. Near it stood the celebrated villa of Claudius and Nero (Villa Sublacensis); and from it was derived the name of the Via Sublacensis, which was a branch of the Via Tiburtina.

SUBLICIŪS PONS. Vid. ROMA, p. 748, a.

SUBUR. 1. A town of the Læetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, east of Tarraco, described by some as a town of the Cosetani, and by others, again, as a town of the Ilorgetes.—2. (Now Sulu or Culu), a river in Maurctania Tingitana; flowing past the colony Banasa into the Atlantic Ocean.

SUBURA or SUBURRA. Vid. ROMA, p. 748, b.

SUBZUPARA (now Zarvi), a town in Thrace, on the road from Philippopolis to Hadrianopolis.

SUCCABAR (Σουχάβαρι, Ptol.: now Mazuna?), an inland city of Mauretania Cæsariensis, southeast of the mouth of the Chinalaph. It was a colonia, and is mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus under the name of oppidum Sugar-baritanum.

SUCCI OR SUCCORUM ANGUSTIÆ. Vid. HÆNUS.

SUCRO. 1. (Now Xucar), a river in Hispania Tarraconensis, rising in a southern branch of Mount Idubeda, in the territory of the Celtiberi, and falling south of Valencia into a gulf of the Mediterranean called after it Sinus Sucronensis (now Gulf of Valencia).—2. (Now Cullera), a town of the Edetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the preceding river, and between the Iberus and Carthago Nova.

SUDERTUM. Vid. SUBERTUM.

SUDĒTI MONTES, a range of mountains in the southeast of Germany, in which the Albis takes its rise.

SUEL (now Fuengirola), a town in Hispania Bætica, on the road from Malaca to Gades.

SUËSSA AURUNCA (Suessanus: now Sessa), a town of the Aurunci in Latium, east of the Via Appia, between Minturnæ and Teanum, on the western slope of Mons Massicus. It was situated in a beautiful district called Vescinus ager, whence it has been supposed that the town itself was at one time called Vescia. It was made a Roman colony in the Samnite wars, but must have been afterward colonized afresh, since we find it called in inscriptions Col. Julia Felix. It was the birth-place of the poet Lucilius.

SUËSSA PŌMĒTĪA (Suessanus), also called PŌMĒTĪA simply, an ancient and important town of the Volsci in Latium, south of Forum Appii, conquered by the Romans under Tarquinius Priscus, and taken a second time and sacked by the consul Servilius. It was one of the twenty-three cities situated in the plain afterward covered by the Pomptine Marshes, which are said indeed to have derived their name from this town.

SUËSSETĀNI, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, mentioned in connection with the Sédetani.

SUËSSIONES OR SUËSSŌNES, a powerful people in Gallia Belgica, who were reckoned the bravest of all the Belgic Gauls after the Bellovacii, and who could bring fifty thousand men into the field in Cæsar's time. Their King Divitiacus, shortly before Cæsar's arrival in the country, was reckoned the most powerful chief in all Gaul, and had extended his sovereignty even over Britain. The Suessiones dwelt in an extensive and fertile country east of the Bellovacii, south of the Veromandui, and west of the Remi. They possessed twelve towns, of which the capital was Noviodunum, subsequently Augusta Suessionum or Suessons (now Soissons).

SUËSSŪLA (Suessulanus: now Torre di Sessola), a town in Sannium, on the southern slope of Mount Tifata.

SUËTŌNIUS PAULINUS. Vid. PAULINUS.

SUËTŌNIUS TRANQUILLUS, C., the Roman historian, was born about the beginning of the reign of Vespasian. His father was Suetonius Lenis, who was a tribune of the thirteenth legion in the battle of Bedriacum, in which Otho was defeated. Suetonius practiced as an advocate at Rome in the reign of Trajan. He lived on intimate terms with the younger Pliny, many of whose letters are addressed to him. At the request of Pliny, Trajan granted to Suetonius the jus trium liberorum; for, though he was married, he had not three children, which number was necessary to relieve him from various legal disabilities. Suetonius was afterward appointed private secretary (Magister Epistolarum) to Hadrian, but was deprived of this office by the emperor, along with Septicius Clarus, the Præfect of the Prætorians, on the ground of associating with Sabina, the emperor's wife, without his permission. Suetonius wrote many works, of which the only ones extant are, Vita Duodecim Cæsarum, or the twelve emperors, of whom the first is C. Julius Cæsar, and the last is Domitian; Liber de illustribus Grammaticis; Liber de claris Rhetoribus; Vita Terentii, Horatii, Persii, Lucani, Juvenalis, Plinii Majoris. His chief work is his Lives of the Cæsars. Suetonius does not follow the chronological order in his Lives, but he groups together many things of the same kind. His language is very brief and precise, sometimes obscure, without any affectation of ornament. He certainly tells a prodigious number of scandalous anecdotes about the Cæsars, but there was plenty to tell about them; and if he did not choose to suppress those anecdotes which he believed to be true, that is no imputation on his veracity. As a great collection of facts of all kinds, the work on the Cæsars is invaluable for the historian of this period. His judgment and his honesty have both been attacked by some modern critics; but we are of opinion that, on both grounds, a careful study of his work will justify him. The friendship of the younger Pliny is evidence in favor of his integrity. The treatise De illustribus Grammaticis and that De claris Rhetoribus are probably only parts of a larger work. They contain a few biographical and other notices, that are occasionally useful. It has been conjectured that the few scanty lives of the Latin poets, already enumerated, belonged to a larger work De Poetis. If this conjecture be true, the short notice of the elder Pliny may not be by Suetonius. A work entitled De Viris Illustribus, which has been attributed both to Suetonius and the younger Plinius, is now unanimously assigned to Aurelius Victor. The best editions of Suetonius are by P. Burmann, Amsterdam, 1736, 2 vols. 4to, and by Baumgarten-Crusius, Lips., 1816, 3 vols. 8vo.

SUËVI, one of the greatest and most powerful races of Germany, or, more properly speaking, the collective name of a great number of German tribes, who were grouped together on account of their migratory mode of life, and spoken of in opposition to the more settled tribes, who went under the general name of Ingvævones. The Suevi are described by all the ancient writers as occupying the greater half of all Germany; but the accounts vary respecting the part of the country which they inhabited. Cæsar represents them as dwelling east of the Ubii and Sygambri, and west of the Cherusci, and their country as divided into one hundred cantons. Strabo makes them extend in an easterly direction beyond the Albis, and in a southerly as far as the sources of the Danube. Tacitus gives the name of Suevia to the whole of the east of Germany from the Danube to the Baltic. At a later time the collective name of the Suevi gradually disappeared; and the different tribes of the Suevic race were each called by their distinctive names. In the second half of the third century, however, we again find a people called Suevi, dwelling between the mouth of the Main and the Black Forest, whose name is still preserved in the modern Suabia; but this people was only a body of bold adventurers from various German tribes, who assumed the celebrated name of the Suevi in consequence of their not possessing any distinguishing appellation.

SUFES (now Sbiba), a city of Northern Africa, in the Carthaginian territory (Byzacena).

SUFETŪLA (now Sfailla), a city of Byzacena, south of Sufes, of which its name is a diminutive. It became, however, a much more important place, as a chief centre of the roads in the interior of the province of Africa. Its ruins are magnificent.

SUIDAS (Σουίδας), a Greek lexicographer, of whom nothing is known. No certain conclusions as to the age of the compiler can be derived from passages in the work, since it may have received numerous interpolations and additions. Eustathius, who lived about the end of the twelfth century of the Christian era, quotes the Lexicon of Suidas; and there are passages in the Lexicon referring to Michael Psellus, who lived at the close of the eleventh century. The Lexicon of Suidas is a dictionary of words arranged in alphabetical order, with some few peculiarities of arrangement; but it contains both words which are found in dictionaries of languages, and also names of persons and places, with extracts from ancient Greek writers, grammarians, scholiasts, and lexicographers, and some extracts from later Greek writers. The names of persons comprehend both persons who are mentioned in sacred and in profane history, which shows that if the work is by one hand, it is by a Christian. No well-conceived plan has been the basis of this work; it is incomplete as to the number of articles, and exceedingly irregular and unequal in the execution. Some articles are pretty complete, others contain no information at all. As to the biographical notices, it has been conjectured that Suidas or the compiler got them all from one source, which, it is further supposed, may be the Onomatologos or Pinax of Hesychius of Miletus. The Lexicon, though without merit as to its execution, is valuable both for the literary history of antiquity, for the explanation of words, and for the citations from many ancient writers. The best editions of the Lexicon are by Kuster, Cambridge, 1705, 3 vols. fol.; by Gaisford, Oxford, 1834, 3 vols. fol.; and by Bernardy, 4to, Halle, 1834-50 (not yet complete).

SUTONES, the general name of all the German tribes inhabiting Scandinavia.

SUISMONTIUM, a mountain in Liguria.

SULCI (Sulcitanus: now Sulci), an ancient town in Sardinia, founded by the Carthaginians, and a place of considerable maritime and commercial importance. It was situated on a promontory on the southwestern corner of the island.

SULGAS (now Sorgue), a river in Gaul, descending from the Alps, and flowing into the Rhone near Vindalum.

SULLA, CORNELIUS, the name of a patrician family. This family was originally called Ku finus (vid. RUFINUS), and the first member of it who obtained the name of Sulla was P. Cornelius Sulla, mentioned below (No. 1). The origin of the name is uncertain. Most modern writers suppose that it is a word of the same signification as Rufus or Rufinus, and refers simply to the red color of the hair or the complexion; but it has been conjectured with greater probability that it is a diminutive of Sura, which was a cognomen in several Roman gentes. It would be formed from Sura on the same analogy as puella from puera, and tenellus from tener. There is no authority for writing the word Sylla, as is done by many modern writers. On coins and inscriptions we always find Sula or Sulla, never Sylla. 1. P., great-grandfather of the dictator Sulla, and grandson of P. Cornelius Rufinus, who was twice consul in the Samnite wars. Vid. RUFINUS, CORNELIUS. His father is not mentioned. He was flamen dialis, and likewise prætor urbanus and peregrinus in B.C. 212, when he presided over the first celebration of the Ludi Apollinares.—2. P., son of No. 1, and grandfather of the dictator Sulla, was prætor in 186.—3. L., son of No. 2, and father of the dictator Sulla, lived in obscurity, and left his son only a slender fortune.—4. L. surnamed FELIX, the dictator, was born in 138. Although his father left him only a small property, his means were sufficient to secure for him a good education. He studied the Greek and Roman literature with diligence and success, and appears early to have imbibed that love for literature and art by which he was distinguished throughout life. At the same time he prosecuted pleasure with equal ardor, and his youth, as well as his manhood, was disgraced by the most sensual vices. Still his love of pleasure did not absorb all his time, nor did it emasculate his mind; for no Roman during the latter days of the republic, with the exception of Julius Cæsar, had a clearer judgment, a keener discrimination of character, or a firmer will. The slender property of Sulla was increased by the liberality of his step-mother and of a courtesan named Nicopolis, both of whom left him all their fortune. His means, though still scanty for a Roman noble, now enabled him to aspire to the honors of the state. He was quæstor in 107, when he served under Marius in Africa. Hitherto he had only been known for his profligacy; but he displayed both zeal and ability in the discharge of his duties, and soon gained the approbation of his commander, and the affections of the soldiers. It was to Sulla that Jugurtha was delivered by Bocellus; and the quæstor thus shared with the consul the glory of bringing this war to a conclusion. Sulla himself was so proud of his share in the success, that he had a seal ring engraved, representing the surrender of Jugurtha, which he continued to wear till the day of his death. Sulla continued to serve under Marius with great distinction in the campaigns against the Cimbri and Teutones; but Marius becoming jealous of the rising fame of his officer, Sulla left Marius in 102, and took a command under the colleague of Marius, Q. Catulus, who intrusted the chief management of the war to Sulla. Sulla now returned to Rome, where he appears to have lived quietly for some years. He was prætor in 93, and in the following year (92) was sent as proprætor into Cilicia, with special orders from the senate to restore Ariobarzanes to his kingdom of Cappadocia, from which he had been expelled by Mithradates. Sulla met with complete success. He defeated Gordius, the general of Mithradates, in Cappadocia, and placed Ariobarzanes on the throne. The enmity between Marius and Sulla now assumed a more deadly form. Sulla's ability and increasing reputation had already led the aristocratical party to look up to him as one of their leaders; and thus political animosity was added to private hatred. In addition to this, Marius and Sulla were both anxious to obtain the command of the impending war against Mithradates; and the success which attended Sulla's recent operations in the East had increased his popularity, and pointed him out as the most suitable person for this important command. About this time Bocchus erected in the Capitol gilded figures, representing the surrender of Jugurtha to Sulla, at which Marius was so enraged that he could scarcely be prevented from removing them by force. The exasperation of both parties became so violent that they nearly had recourse to arms against each other; but the breaking out of the Social war hushed all private quarrels for the time. Marius and Sulla both took an active part in the war against the common foe. But Marius was now advanced in years; and he had the deep mortification of finding that his achievements were thrown into the shade by the superior energy of his rival. Sulla gained some brilliant victories over the enemy, and took Bovianum, the chief town of the Samnites. He was elected consul for 88, and received from the senate the command of the Mithradatic war. The events which followed—his expulsion from Rome by Marius, his return to the city at the head of his legions, and the proscription of Marius and his leading adherents—are related in the life of Marius. Sulla remained at Rome till the end of the year, and set out for Greece at the beginning of 87, in order to carry on the war against Mithradates. He landed at Dyrrhachium, and forthwith marched against Athens, which had become the head-quarters of the Mithradatic cause in Greece. After a long and obstinate siege, Athens was taken by storm on the 1st of March in 86, and was given up to rapine and plunder. Sulla then marched against Archelaus, the general of Mithradates, whom he defeated in the neighborhood of Chæronea in Bœotia; and in the following year he again gained a decisive victory over the same general near Orchomenus. But while Sulla was carrying on the war with such success in Greece, his enemies had obtained the upper hand in Italy. The consul Cinna, who had been driven out of Rome by his colleague Octavius, soon after Sulla's departure from Italy, had entered it again with Marius at the close of the year. Both Cinna and Marius were appointed consuls 86, and all the regulations of Sulla were swept away. Sulla, however, would not return to Italy till he had brought the war against Mithradates to a conclusion: After driving the generals of Mithradates out of Greece, Sulla crossed the Hellespont and early in 84 concluded a peace with the king of Pontus. He now turned his arms against Fimbria, who had been appointed by the Marian party as his successor in the command. But the troops of Fimbria deserted their general, who put an end to his own life. Sulla now prepared to return to Italy. After leaving his legate, L. Licinius Murena, in command of the province of Asia, with two legions, he set sail with his own army to Athens. While preparing for his deadly struggle in Italy, he did not lose his interest in literature. He carried with him from Athens to Rome the valuable library of Apellicon of Teos, which contained most of the works of Aristotle and Theophrastus. Vid. APPELLICON. He landed at Brundisium in the spring of 83. The Marian party far outnumbered him in troops, and had every prospect of victory. By bribery and promises, however, Sulla gained over a large number of the Marian soldiers, and he persuaded many of the Italian towns to espouse his cause. In the field his efforts were crowned by equal success; and he was ably supported by several of the Roman nobles, who espoused his cause in different parts of Italy. Of these one of the most distinguished was the young Cn. Pompey, who was at the time only twenty-three years of age. Vid. POMPEIUS, No. 10. In the following year (82) the struggle was brought to a close by the decisive battle gained by Sulla over the Samnites and Lucanians under Pontius Telesinus before the Colline gate of Rome. This victory was followed by the surrender of Præneste and the death of the younger Marius, who had taken refuge in this town. Sulla was now master of Rome and Italy; and he resolved to take the most ample vengeance upon his enemies, and to extirpate the popular party. One of his first acts was to draw up a list of his enemies who were to be put to death, called a Proscriptio. It was the first instance of the kind in Roman history. All persons in this list were outlaws who might be killed by any one with impunity, even by slaves; their property was confiscated to the state, and was to be sold by public auction; their children and grandchildren lost their votes in the comitia, and were excluded from all public offices. Further, all who killed a proscribed person received two talents as a reward, and whoever sheltered such a person was punished with death. Terror now reigned, not only at Rome, but throughout Italy. Fresh lists of the proscribed constantly appeared. No one was safe; for Sulla gratified his friends by placing in the fatal lists their personal enemies, or persons whose property was coveted by his adherents. The confiscated property, it is true, belonged to the state, and had to be sold by public auction, but the friends and dependents of Sulla purchased it at a nominal price, as no one dared to bid against them. The number of persons who perished by the proscriptions is stated differently, but it appears to have amounted to many thousands. At the commencement of these horrors Sulla had been appointed dictator for as long a time as he judged to be necessary. This was toward the close of 81. Sulla's chief object in being invested with the dictatorship was to carry into execution, in a legal manner, the great reforms which he meditated in the constitution and the administration of justice. He had no intention of abolishing the republic, and, consequently, he caused consuls to be elected for the following year, and was elected to the office himself in 80, while he continued to hold the dictatorship. The general object of Sulla's reforms was to restore, as far as possible, the ancient Roman constitution, and to give back to the senate and the aristocracy the power which they had lost. Thus he deprived the tribunes of the plebs of all real power, and abolished altogether the legislative and judicial functions of the comitia tributa. At the beginning of 81, he celebrated a splendid triumph on account of his victory over Mithradates. In a speech which he delivered to the people at the close of the ceremony, he claimed for himself the surname of Felix, as he attributed his success in life to the favor of the gods. In order to strengthen his power, Sulla established military colonies throughout Italy. The inhabitants of the Italian towns, which had fought against Sulla, were deprived of the full Roman franchise, and were only allowed to retain the commercium: their land was confiscated and given to the soldiers who had fought under him. Twenty-three legions, or, according to another statement, forty-seven legions, received grants of land in various parts of Italy. A great number of these colonies was settled in Etruria, the population of which was thus almost entirely changed. These colonies had the strongest interest in upholding the institutions of Sulla, since any attempt to invalidate the latter would have endangered their newly-acquired possessions. Sulla likewise created at Rome a kind of body-guard for his protection by giving the citizenship to a great number of slaves who had belonged to persons proscribed by him. The slaves thus rewarded are said to have been as many as ten thousand, and were called Cornelii after him as their patron. After holding the dictatorship till the beginning of 79, Sulla resigned this office, to the surprise of all classes. He retired to his estate at Puteoli, and there, surrounded by the beauties of nature and art, he passed the remainder of his life in those literary and sensual enjoyments in which he had always taken so much pleasure. His dissolute mode of life hastened his death. The immediate cause of his death was the rupture of a blood-vessel, but some time before he had been suffering from the disgusting disease, which is known in modern times by the name of Morbus Pediculosus, or Phthiriasis. He died in 78, in the sixtieth year of his age. He was honored with a public funeral, and a monument was erected to him in the Campus Martius, the inscription on which had been composed by himself. It stated that none of his friends ever did him a kindness, and none of his enemies a wrong, without being fully repaid. Sulla was married five times: 1. To Ilia or Julia, who bore him a daughter, married to Q. Pompeius Rufus, the son of Sulla's colleague in the consulship in 88; 2. To Ælia; 3. To Celia; 4. To Cæcilia Metella, who bore him a son, who died before Sulla, and likewise twins, a son and a daughter; 5.

Valeria, who bore him a daughter after his death. Sulla wrote a history of his own life and times, called Memoirs (Ἰστοριήματα). It was dedicated to L. Lucullus, and extended to twenty-two books, the last of which was finished by Sulla a few days before his death. He also wrote Fabulæ Atellanæ, and the Greek Anthology contains a short epigram which is ascribed to him.—5. FAUSTUS, son of the dictator by his fourth wife Cæcilia Metella, and a twin brother of Fausta, was born not long before 88, the year in which his father obtained the first consulship. He and his sister received the names of Faustus and Fausta respectively on account of the good fortune of their father. At the death of his father in 78, Faustus and his sister were left under the guardianship of L. Lucullus. Faustus accompanied Pompey into Asia, and was the first who mounted the walls of the temple of Jerusalem in 63. In 60 he exhibited the gladiatorial games which his father in his last will had enjoined upon him. In 54 he was quæstor. In 52 he received from the senate the commission to rebuild the Curia Hostilia, which had been burned down in the tumults following the murder of Clodius, and which was henceforward to be called the Curia Cornelia, in honor of Faustus and his father. He married Pompey's daughter, and sided with his father-in-law in the civil war. He was present at the battle of Pharsalia, and subsequently joined the leaders of his party in Africa. After the battle of Thapsus in 46, he attempted to escape into Mauretania, but was taken prisoner by P. Sittius, and carried to Cæsar. Upon his arrival in Cæsar's camp he was murdered by the soldiers in a tumult. Faustus seems only to have resembled his father in his extravagance. We know from Cicero that he was overwhelmed with debt at the breaking out of the civil war.—6. P., nephew of the dictator, was elected consul along with P. Autronius Pætus for the year 65, but neither he nor his colleague entered upon the office, as they were accused of bribery by L. Torquatus the younger, and were condemned. It was currently believed that Sulla was privy to both of Catiline's conspiracies, and he was accordingly accused of this crime by his former accuser, L. Torquatus, and by C. Cornelius. He was defended by Hortensius and Cicero, and the speech of the latter on his behalf is still extant. He was acquitted; but, independent of the testimony of Sallust (Cat., 17), his guilt may almost be inferred from the embarrassment of his advocate. In the civil war Sulla espoused Cæsar's cause. He served under him as legate in Greece, and commanded along with Cæsar himself the right wing at the battle of Pharsalia (48). He died in 45.—7. SERV., brother of No. 6, took part in both of Catiline's conspiracies. His guilt was so evident that no one was willing to defend him; but we do not read that he was put to death along with the other conspirators.

SULMO (Sulmonensis). 1. (Now Sulmona), a town of the Peligni, in the country of the Sabines, seven miles south of Corfinium, on the road to Capua, and situated on two small mountain streams, the water of which was exceedingly cold: hence we find the town called by the poets gelidus Sulmo. It is celebrated as the birth-place of Ovid. It was destroyed by Sulla, but was afterward restored, and is mentioned as a Roman colony.—2. (Now Sermoneta), an ancient town of the Volsci in Latium, on the Ufens, which had disappeared in Pliny's time.

SULPICIA, a Roman poetess, who flourished toward the close of the first century, celebrated for sundry amatory effusions, addressed to her husband Calenus. Their general character may be gathered from the expressions of Martial, Ausonius, and Sidonius Apollinaris, by all of whom they are noticed. There is extant a satirical poem, in seventy hexameters, on the edict of Domitian, by which philosophers were banished from Rome and from Italy, which is ascribed to Sulpicia by many modern critics. It is generally appended to the editions of Juvenal and Persius.

SULPICIA GENS, was one of the most ancient Roman gentes, and produced a succession of distinguished men, from the foundation of the republic to the imperial period. The chief families of the Sulpicii during the republican period bore the names of CAMERINUS, GALBA, GALLUS, RUFUS (given below), SAVERRIO.

SULPICIVS APOLLINARIS, a contemporary of A. Gellius, was a learned grammarian. There are two poems in the Latin Anthology purporting to be written by Sulpicius of Carthage, whom some identify with the above-named Sulpicius Apollinaris. One of these poems consists of seventy-two lines, giving the argument of the twelve books of Virgil's Æneid, six lines being devoted to each book.

SULPICIVS RUFUS. 1. P., one of the most distinguished orators of his time, was born B.C. 124. He commenced public life as a supporter of the aristocratical party, and acquired great influence in the state by his splendid talents while he was still young. In 93 he was quæstor, and in 89 he served as legate of the consul Cn. Pompeius Strabo in the Marsic war. In 88 he was elected to the tribunate; but he deserted the aristocratical party, and joined Marius. The causes of this sudden change are not expressly stated; but we are told that he was overwhelmed with debt; and there can be little doubt that he was bought by Marius. Sulpicius brought forward a law in favor of Marius and his party, of which an account is given under MARIUS. When Sulla marched upon Rome at the head of his army, Marius and Sulpicius took to flight. Marius succeeded in making his escape to Africa, but Sulpicius was discovered in a villa and put to death.—2. P., probably son or grandson of the last, was one of Cæsar's legates in Gaul and in the civil war. He was prætor in 48. Cicero addresses him in 45 as imperator. It appears that he was at that time in Illyricum, along with Vatinius.—3. SERV., with the surname LEMONIA, indicating the tribe to which he belonged, was a contemporary and friend of Cicero, and of about the same age. He first devoted himself to oratory, and he studied this art with Cicero in his youth. He afterward studied law; and he became one of the best jurists as well as most eloquent orators of his age. He was quæstor of the district of Ostia in 74; curule ædile 69; prætor 65; and consul 61 with M. Claudius Marcellus. He appears to have espoused Cæsar's side in the civil war, and was appointed by Cæsar proconsul of Achaia (46 or 45). He died in 43 in the camp of M. Antony, having been sent by the senate on a mission to Antony, who was besieging Dec. Brutus in Mutina. Sulpicius wrote a great number of legal works. He is often cited by the jurists whose writings are excerpted in the Digest; but there is no excerpt directly from him in the Digest. He had numerous pupils, the most distinguished of whom were A. Ofilius and Alfenus Varus. There are extant in the collection of Cicero's Epistles (ad Fam., iv.) two letters from Sulpicius to Cicero, one of which is the well-known letter of consolation on the death of Tullia, the daughter of the orator. The same book contains several letters from Cicero to Sulpicius. He is also said to have written some erotic poetry. Sulpicius left a son Servius, who is frequently mentioned in Cicero's correspondence.

[SUMETIA (Σουμηρία), an ancient city in the eastern part of Arcadia, in the district Mænalia, said to have derived its name from Sumateus, a son of Lycaon: after the founding of Megalopolis, it fell into decay.]

SUMMĀNUS, a derivative from summus, the highest, an ancient Roman or Etruscan divinity, who was equal or even of higher rank than Jupiter. In fact, he may be regarded as the Jupiter of the night; for, as Jupiter was the god of heaven in the bright day, so Summannus was the god of the nocturnal heaven, and hurled his thunderbolts during the night. Summannus had a temple at Rome near the Circus Maximus, and there was a representation of him in the pediment of the Capitoline temple.

SŪNIUM (Σούνιον: Σουνιεύς: now Cape Colonna), a celebrated promontory forming the southern extremity of Attica, with a town of the same name upon it. Here was a splendid temple of Minerva (Athena), elevated three hundred feet above the sea, the columns of which are still extant, and have given the modern name to the promontory.—It was fortified by the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war, and remains of the ancient walls, with the temple of Minerva (Athena), are still extant.

SURA, LENTULUS. Vid. LENTULUS, No. 9.

SURA, L. LICINIUS, an intimate friend of Trajan, and three times consul, in A.D. 98, 102, and 107. On the death of Sura, Trajan honored him with a public funeral, and erected baths to perpetuate his memory. Two of Pliny's letters are addressed to him.

SŪRA (Σούρα: now Surie), a town of Syria, in the district Chalybonitis, on the Euphrates, a little west of Thapsacus.

SURANI or SUARNI (Σουρανοί), a people of Sarmatia Asiatica, near the Portæ Caucasæ and the River Rha. Their country contained many gold mines.

SURENAS, the general of the Parthians who defeated Crassus in B.C. 54. Vid. CRASSUS.

SŪRIUS (Σούριος), a tributary of the Phasis in Colchis, the water of which had the power of forming petrifications. At its confluence, with the Phasis stood a town named SURĪUM (Σούριον). The plain through which it flows is still called Suram.

SURRENTINI COLLES. Vid. SURRENTUM.

SURRENTUM (Surrentinus: now Sorrento), an ancient town of Campania, opposite Capreae, and situated on the promontory (Promontorium Minervæ, now Punta della Campanella) separating the Sinus Pæstanus from the Sinus Puteolanus. It was subsequently a Roman colony, and on the hills (Surrentini Colles) in its neighborhood was grown one of the best wines in Italy, which was strongly recommended to convalescents on account of its thinness and wholesomeness.

SŪSA, gen. -ORUM (τὰ Σοῦσα: in the Old Testament, Shushan: Σούσιος, Susianus: ruins at Shus), the winter residence of the Persian kings, stood in the district Cissia of the province Susiana, on the eastern bank of the River Chospes. Its name in old Persian signifies Lily, and that flower is said to abound in the plain in which the city stood. It was of a quadrangular form, one hundred and twenty (or, according to others, two hundred) stadia in circuit, and without fortifications; but it had a strongly-fortified citadel, containing the palace and treasury of the Persian kings. The Greek name of this citadel, Memnonice or Memnonium, is perhaps a corruption of the Aramaic Maaninon, a fortress; and this easy confusion of terms gave rise to the fable that the city was founded by Tithonus, the father of Memnon. A historical tradition ascribes its erection to Darius, the son of Hystaspes, but it existed already in the time of Daniel. (Dan., viii., 2.) (There is, however, a difficulty as to the identification of the Shushan of Daniel with the Susa of the Greeks, and as to the true position of the River Ulai or Eulæus, which can not be discussed within the limits of this article.) The climate of Susa was very hot, and hence the choice of it for the winter palace. It was here that Alexander and his generals celebrated their nuptials with the Persian princesses, B.C. 325. The site of Susa is now marked by extensive mounds, on which are found fragments of bricks and broken pottery, with cuneiform inscriptions.

SŪSĀRĪŌN (Σουσάρων), to whom the origin of the Attic Comedy is ascribed, was a native of Megara, whence he removed into Attica, to the village of Icaria, a place celebrated as a seat of the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus). This account agrees with the claim which the Megarians asserted to the invention of comedy, and which was generally admitted. Before the time of Susarion, there was, no doubt, practiced at Icaria and the other Attic villages, that extempore jesting and buffoonery which formed a marked feature of the festivals of Bacchus (Dionysus); but Susarion was the first who so regulated this species of amusement as to lay the foundation of Comedy, properly so called. The Megarian comedy appears to have flourished, in its full development, about B.C. 600 and onward; and it was introduced by Susarion into Attica between 580-564.

[SUSIA (Σουσία: now Susen or Suseni), a city of Aria, on the borders of Parthia, probably identical with the Suphtha of Ptolemy, and assigned by him to Parthia.]

SUSĪĀNA, -E, or Susis (ἡ Σουσιανή, ἡ Σουσις: nearly corresponding to Khuzistan), one of the chief provinces of the ancient Persian empire, lay between Babylonia and Persis, and between Mount Parachoatras and the head of the Persian Gulf. In this last direction, its coast extended from the junction of the Euphrates with the Tigris to about the mouth of the River Oroatis (now Tab). It was divided from Persis on the southeast and east by a mountainous tract, inhabited by independent tribes, who made even the kings of Persia pay them for a safe passage. The chief pass through these mountains was called Susides or Persides Portæ (Σουσίδεις πύλαι, αἱ πύλαι αἱ Περσίδεις, Σουσιώδεις πύλαι): its position is uncertain; perhaps it was the pass of Kelahi Sefid, in the upper valley of the Tab. On the north it was separated from Great Media by Mount Charbanus, an eastern branch of Mount Zagros, which contained the sources of the chief rivers of Susiana, the CHOSPES, the COPRATES, and the EULÆUS (the PASITIGRIS came from the mountains on the east). On the west it was divided from Assyria by an imaginary line drawn south from near the Median pass in Mount Zagros to the Tigris, and from Babylonia by the Tigris itself. The country was mountainous and cool in the north, and low and very hot in the south, and the coast along the Persian Gulf was marshy. The mountains were inhabited by various wild and independent tribes, and the plains by a quiet agricultural people, of the Scimitic race, called Susii or Susiani.

SUTRĪUM (Sutrīnus: now Sutri), an ancient town of Etruria, on the eastern side of the Saltus Ciminius, and on the road from Vulsinii to Rome. It was taken by the Romans at an early period; and in B.C. 393, or seven years after the capture of Rome by the Gauls, it was made a Roman colony. It was celebrated for its fidelity to Rome, and was, in consequence, besieged several times by the Etruscans. On one occasion it was obliged to surrender to the Etruscans, but was retaken by Camillus in the same day, whence arose the proverb ire Sutrium. There are still remains of the walls and tombs of the ancient town.

SYAGER (Σύαγρος) 1. One of the alleged ante-Homeric poets, is said to have flourished after Orpheus and Musæus, and to have been the first who sang the Trojan war.—[2. A Lacedæmonian, deputy from Sparta when the Greeks sent to Gelon of Syracuse to ask his aid against Xerxes, rejected, on behalf of his state, Gelon's demand to have the supreme command of the expedition.]

SYAGRUS (Σύαγρος ἄκρα), the greatest promontory of Arabia, is described differently by different ancient writers, but is most probably to be identified with the easternmost headland of the whole peninsula, Ras-el-Had.

SŪBĀRIS (Σύβαρις). 1. (Now Coscile or Sibari), a river in Lucania, flowing by the city of the same name, and falling into the Crathis. It derived its name from the fountain Sybaris, near Bura, in Achaia.—2. (Συβαρίτης, Sybarita), a celebrated Greek town in Lucania, was situated between the rivers Sybaris and Crathis, at a short distance from the Tarentine Gulf, and near the confines of Bruttium. It was founded

B.C. 720 by Achæans and Trœzenians, and soon attained an extraordinary degree of prosperity and wealth. It carried on an extensive commerce with Asia Minor and other countries on the Mediterranean, and its inhabitants became so notorious for their love of luxury and pleasure, that their name was employed to indicate any voluptuary. At the time of their highest prosperity their city was fifty stadia, or upward of six miles in circumference, and they exercised dominion over twenty-five towns, so that we are told they were able to bring into the field three hundred thousand men, a number, however, which appears incredible. But their prosperity was of short duration. The Achæans having expelled the Trœzencian part of the population, the latter took refuge at the neighboring city of Croton, the inhabitants of which espoused their cause. In the war which ensued between the two states, the Sybarites were completely conquered by the Crotoniats, who followed up their victory by the capture of Sybaris, which they destroyed by turning the waters of the River Crathis against the town, B.C. 510. The greater number of the surviving Sybarites took refuge in other Greek cities in Italy; but a few remained near their ancient town, and their descendants formed part of the population of Thurii, which was founded in 443 near Sybaris. Vid. THURII.

SYBŌTA (τὰ Σύβοτα: Συβότιος: now Syvota), a number of small islands off the coast of Epirus, and opposite the promontory Leucimne in Corcyra, with a harbor of the same name on the main land. It was here that a naval battle was fought between the Corcyræans and Corinthians, B.C. 432, just before the commencement of the Peloponnesian war.

SYÈNE (Συήνη: Συηνίτης and Συηνήτης, Syenites: ruins at Assouan), a city of Upper Egypt, on the eastern bank of the Nile, just below the First Cataract. It has been in all ages the southern frontier city of Egypt toward Æthiopia, and under the Romans it was kept by a garrison of three cohorts. From its neighborhood was obtained the fine red granite called Syenites lapis. It was also an important point in the astronomy and geography of the ancients, as it lay just under the tropic of Cancer, and was therefore chosen as the place through which they drew their chief parallel of latitude. Of course the sun was vertical to Syene at the time of the summer solstice, and a well was shown in which the reflection of the sun was then seen at noon; or, as the rhetorician Aristides expresses it, the disc of the sun covered the well as a vessel is covered by its lid.

SYENNËSIS (Συέννησις), a common name of the kings of Cilicia. Of these the most important are, 1. A king of Cilicia, who joined with Labynetus (Nebuchadnezzar) in mediating between Cyaxares and Alyattes, the kings respectively of Media and Lydia, probably in B.C.

610.—2. Contemporary with Darius Hystaspis to whom he was tributary. His daughter was married to Pixodarus.—3. Contemporary with Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon), ruled over Cilicia, when the younger Cyrus marched through his country in his expedition against his brother Artaxerxes. [Vid. ΕΡΥΧΑΑ.]

SYGAMBRI, SUGAMBRI, SIGAMBRI, SYCAMBRI or SICAMBRI, one of the most powerful tribes of Germany at an early time, belonged to the Istævones, and dwelt originally north of the Ubii on the Rhine, whence they spread toward the north as far as the Lippe. The Sygambri are mentioned by Cæsar, who invaded their territory. They were conquered by Tiberius in the reign of Augustus, and a large number of them were transplanted to Gaul, where they received settlements between the Maas and the Rhine as Roman subjects. The portion of the Sygambri who remained in Germany withdrew further south, probably to the mountainous country in the neighborhood of the Taunus. Shortly afterward they disappear from history, and are not mentioned again till the time of Ptolemy, who places them much further north, close to the Bructeri and the Langobardi, somewhere between the Vecht and the Yssel. At a still later period we find them forming an important part of the confederacy known under the name of Franci.

[SYLOSON (Συλοσών), son of Æaces, younger brother of Polycrates, the tyrant of Samos. Banished by his brother, he went to Egypt, and thence to Persia, after the accession of Darius, who rewarded him for some previous favor with the tyranny of the island of Samos. Syloson ruled Samos till his death, and was succeeded in the sovereignty by his son Æaces.]

SYMÆTHUS (Συμαίθος: now Giaretta), a river on the eastern coast of Sicily and at the foot of Mount Ætna, forming the boundary between Leontini and Catania; on which stood the town of Centuripæ.

SYME (Σύμη: Συμαίος, Συμεύς: now Symi), a small island off the southwestern coast of Caria, lay in the mouth of the Sinus Doridis, to the west of the promontory of Cynossema. It was one of the early Dorian states, that existed in the southwest of Asia Minor before the time of Homer. Its connection both with Cnidus and with Rhodes, between which it lay, is indicated by the tradition that it was peopled by a colony from Cnidus led by Chthonius, the son of Neptune (Poseidon) and of Syme, the daughter or Ialysus. Some time after the Trojan war, the Carians are said to have obtained possession of the island, but to have deserted it again in consequence of a severe drought. Its final settlement by the Dorians is ascribed to the time of their great migration. The island was reckoned at thirty-five miles in circuit. It had eight harbors and a town, which was also called Syme.

SYMMACHUS, Q. AURELIUS, a distinguished scholar, statesman, and orator in the latter half of the fourth century of the Christian era. By his example and authority, he inspired for a time new life and vigor into the literature of his country. He was educated in Gaul; and, having discharged the functions of quæstor and prætor, he was afterward appointed (A.D. 365) Corrector of Lucania and the Bruttii; and in 373 he was proconsul of Africa. His zeal for the ancient religion of Rome checked for a while the prosperous current of his fortunes, and involved him in danger and disgrace. Having been chosen by the senate to remonstrate with Gratian on the removal of the altar of Victory (382) from their council hall, and on the curtailment of the sums annually allowed for the maintenance of the Vestal Virgins, and for the public celebration of sacred rites, he was ordered by the indignant emperor to quit his presence, and to withdraw himself to a distance of one hundred miles from Rome. Nothing daunted by this repulse, when appointed præfect of the city (384) after the death of his persecutor, he addressed an elaborate epistle to Valentinianus, again urging the restoration of the pagan deities to their former honors. This application was resisted by St. Amhrose, and was again unsuccessful. Symmachus afterward espoused the cause of the usurper Maximus (387); but he was pardoned by Theodosius, and raised to the consulship in 391. His personal character seems to have been unimpeachable, as he performed the duties of the high offices which he filled in succession with a degree of mildness, firmness, and integrity seldom found among statesmen in that corrupt age. The extant works of Symmachus are, 1. Epistolarum Libri X., published after his death by his son. The last book contains his official correspondence, and is chiefly composed of the letters presented by him when præfect of the city to the emperors under whom he served. The remaining books comprise a multitude of epistles, addressed to a wide circle of relations, friends, and acquaintances. 2. Novem Orationum Fragmenta, published for the first time by Mai from a palimpsest in the Ambrosian library, Mediolan., 1815. The best editions of the epistles are by Juretus, Paris, 1604, and by Scioppius, Mogunt., 1608.

[SYMPLEGADES (Συμπληγάδες). Vid. CYRÆNSIS INSULÆ.]

SYNÆSIUS (Συνέσιος), one of the most elegant of the ancient Christian writers, was a native of Cyrene, and devoted himself to the study of Greek literature, first in his own city, and afterward at Alexandria, where he heard Hypatia. He became celebrated for his skill in eloquence and poetry, as well as in philosophy, in which he was a follower of Plato. About A.D. 397, he was sent by his fellow-citizens of Cyrene on an embassy to Constantinople, to present the Emperor Arcadius with a crown of gold, on which occasion he delivered an oration on the government of a kingdom (περὶ βασιλείας) which is still extant. Soon after this he embraced Christianity, and in 410 was ordained bishop of Ptolemais, the chief city of the Libyan Pentapolis. He presided over his diocese with energy and success for about twenty years, and died about 430. His writings have been objects of admiration both to ancient and modern scholars, and have obtained for him the surname of Philosopher. The best edition of his works is by Morel, Paris, 1612; much improved and enlarged, Paris, 1633; reprinted, 1640. [His ὕμνοι (Hymns), ten in number, are contained in Boissonade's Lyrici Græci, Paris, 1825, 1830.]

SYNNADA, also SYNNAS (τὰ Σύνναδα: Συμμαδεύς, Synnadensis: now probably ruins at Afion-Kara-Hisar), a city in the north of Phrygia Salutaris, at first inconsiderable, but afterward a place of much importance, and, from the time of Constantine, the capital of Phrygia Salutaris. It stood in a fruitful plain, planted with olives, near a mountain from which was quarried the very celebrated Synnadic marble, which was of a beautiful white, with red veins and spots (Συνναδικὸς λίθος, Synnadicus lapis, called also Docimiticus, from a still nearer place, Docimia).

SYPHAX (Σύφαξ), king of the Massæylians, the westernmost tribe of the Numidians. His history is related in the life of his contemporary and rival, MASINISSA. Syphax was taken prisoner by Masinissa B.C. 203, and was sent by Scipio, under the charge of Lælius, to Rome. Polybius states that he was one of the captives who adorned the triumph of Scipio, and that he died in confinement shortly after. Livy, on the contrary, asserts that he was saved from that ignominy by a timely death at Tibur, whither he had been transferred from Alba.

SYRACO. Vid. SYRACUSÆ.

SYRACŪSÆ (Συράκουσαι or Συράκοσσαι, Ion. Συρήκουσαι, also Συρακοῦσαι, Συρακούση: Συρακοῦσιος, Συρακόσιος, Syracusanus; now Siracusa in Italian, Syracuse in English), the wealthiest and most populous town in Sicily, was situated on the southern part of the eastern coast, four hundred stadia north of the promontory Plemmyrium, and ten stadia northeast of the mouth of the River Anapus, near the lake or marsh called Syraco (Συρακώ), from which it derived its name. It was founded B.C. 734, one year after the foundation of Naxos, by a colony of Corinthians and other Dorians, led by Archias the Corinthian. The town was originally confined to the island Ortygia lying immediately off the coast; but it afterward spread over the neighboring main land, and at the time of its greatest extension under the elder Dionysius it consisted of five distinct towns, each surrounded by separate walls. Some writers, indeed, describe Syracuse as consisting of four towns, but this simply arises from the fact that Epipolæ was frequently not reckoned a portion of the city. These five towns were, 1. ORTYGIA (Ὀρτυγία), frequently called simply the ISLAND (Νῆσος or Νήσος), an island of an oblong shape, about two miles in circumference, lying between the Great Harbor on the west and the Little Harbor on the east. It was, as has been already remarked, the portion of the city first built, and it contained the citadel or Acropolis, surrounded by double walls, which Timoleon caused to be destroyed. In this island also was the celebrated fountain of Arethusa. It was originally separated from the main land by a narrow channel, which was subsequently filled up by a causeway; but this causeway must at a still later time have been swept away since we find in the Roman period that the island was connected with the main land by means of a bridge.—2. ACHRADINA (Ἀχραδίνη), occupied originally the high ground of the peninsula north of Ortygia, and was surrounded on the north and east by the sea. The lower ground between Achradina and Ortygia was at first not included in the fortifications of either, but was employed partly for religious processions and partly for the burial of the dead. At the time of the siege of Syracuse by the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war (415), the city consisted only of the two parts already mentioned, Ortygia forming the inner and Achradina the outer city, but separated, as explained above, by the low ground between the two.—3. TYCHE (Τύχη), named after the temple of Tyche or Fortune, was situated northwest of Achradina, in the direction of the port called Trogius. At the time of the Athenian siege of Syracuse it was only an unfortified suburb, but it afterward became the most populous part of the city. In this quarter stood the Gymnasium.—4. NEAPOLIS (Νέα πόλις), nearly southwest of Achradina, was also, at the time of the Athenian siege of Syracuse, merely a suburb, and called TEMENITES, from having within it the statue and consecrated ground of Apollo Temenites. Neapolis contained the chief theatre of Syracuse, which was the largest in all Sicily, and many temples.—5. EPIPOLÆ (Ἐπιπολάι), a space of ground rising above the three quarters of Achradina, Tyche, and Neapolis, which gradually diminished in breadth as it rose higher, until it ended in a small conical mound. This rising ground was surrounded with strong walls by the elder Dionysius, and was thus included in Syracuse, which now became one of the most strongly fortified cities of the ancient world. The highest point of Epipolæ was called Euryelus (Εὐρύηλος), on which stood the fort Labdulum (Λάβδαλον). After Epipolæ had been added to the city, the circumference of Syracuse was one hundred and eighty stadia, or upward of twenty-two English miles; and the entire population of the city is supposed to have amounted to five hundred thousand souls at the time of its greatest prosperity. Syracuse had two harbors. The Great Harbor, still called Porto Maggiore, is a splendid bay about five miles in circumference, formed by the island Ortygia and the promontory Plemmyrium. The Small Harbor, also called Laccius (Λάκκιος), lying between Ortygia and Achradina, was capacious enough to receive a large fleet of ships of war. There were several stone quarries (lautumiæ) in Syracuse, which are frequently mentioned by ancient writers, and in which the unfortunate Athenian prisoners were confined. These quarries were partly in Achradina, on the descent from the higher ground to the lower level toward Ortygia, and partly in Neapolis, under the southern cliff of Epipolæ. From them was taken the stone of which the city was built. On one side of these quarries is the remarkable excavation, called the Ear of Dionysius, in which it is said that this tyrant confined the persons whom he suspected, and that he was able from a little apartment above to overhear the conversation of his captives. This tale, however, is clearly an invention. The city was supplied with water from an aqueduct, which was constructed by Gelon and improved by Hieron. It was brought through Epipolæ and Neapolis to Achradina and Ortygia. The modern city of Syracuse is confined to the island. The remaining quarters of the ancient city are now uninhabited, and their position marked only by a few ruins. Of these the most important are the remains of the great theatre, and of an amphitheatre of the Roman period. The government of Syracuse was originally an aristocracy; and the political power was in the hands of the landed proprietors, called Geomori or Gamori. In course of time the people, having increased in numbers and wealth, expelled the Geomori and established a democracy. But this form of government did not last long. Gelon espoused the cause of the aristocratical party, and proceeded to restore them by force of arms; but on his approach the people opened the gates to him, and he was acknowledged without opposition tyrant or sovereign of Syracuse, B.C. 485. Under his rule and that of his brother Hieron, Syracuse was raised to an unexampled degree of wealth and prosperity. Hieron died in 467, and was succeeded by his brother Thrasylbulus; but the rapacity and cruelty of the latter soon provoked a revolt among his subjects, which led to his deposition and the establishment of a democratical form of government. The next most important event in the history of Syracuse was the siege of the city by the Athenians, which ended in the total destruction of the great Athenian armament in 413. The democracy continued to exist in Syracuse till 406, when the elder Dionysius made himself tyrant of the city. After a long and prosperous reign, he was succeeded in 367 by his son, the younger Dionysius, who was finally expelled by Timoleon in 343. A republican form of government was again established; but it did not last long; and in 317 Syracuse fell under the sway of Agathocles. This tyrant died in 289; and the city being distracted by factions, the Syracusans voluntarily conferred the supreme power upon Hieron II., with the title of king, in 270. Hieron cultivated friendly relations with the Romans; but on his death in 216, at the advanced age of ninety-two, his grandson Hieronymus, who succeeded him, espoused the side of the Carthaginians. A Roman army under Marcellus was sent against Syracuse; and after a siege of two years, during which Archimedes assisted his fellow-citizens by the construction of various engines of war (vid. ARCHIMEDES), the city was taken by Marcellus in 212. From this time Syracuse became a town of the Roman province of Sicily.

[SYRACUSÆNUS PORTUS (Συρακῶσιος λιμὴν, now Porto Vecchio), a harbor on the eastern coast of Corsica, where the Syracusans had probably established a factory for their trade: according to Diodorus, it was the best harbor in the island.]

SYRIS (Σύρις), according to Herodotus, a great river of European Sarmatia, rising in the country of the Thyssagetæ, and flowing through the land of the Mæotæ into the Palus Mæotis. It has not been identified with certainty.

SYRIA DEA (Συρία θεός), "the Syrian goddess," a name by which the Syrian Astarte or Aphrodite is sometimes designated. This Astarte was a Syrian divinity, resembling in many points the Greek Aphrodite. It is not improbable that the latter was originally the Syrian Astarte; for there can be no doubt that the worship of Aphrodite came from the East to Cyprus, and thence was carried into the south of Greece.

SYRIA (ἡ Συρία, in Aramæan Surja: Σύρος, Sýrus, and sometimes Σύριος, Sýrius: now Soristan, Arab. Esh-Sham, i. e., the land on the left, Syria), a country of Western Asia, lying along the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea, between Asia Minor and Egypt. In a wider sense the word was used for the whole tract of country bounded by the Tigris on the east, the mountains of Armenia and Cilicia on the north, the Mediterranean on the west, and the Arabian Desert on the south; the whole of which was peopled by the Aramæan branch of the great Semitic (or Syro-Arabian) race, and is included in the Old Testament under the name of Aram. This region may be well described physically as the great triangular depression of Western Asia encircled on the north and northeast by the Taurus and its prolongation to the south-east, or, in other words, by the highlands of Cilicia, Cappadocia, Armenia, and Aria; and subsiding on the south and west into the Mediterranean and the Great Desert of Arabia. Even a wider extent than this is often given to Syria, so as to include the eastern part of Asia Minor, as far as the River Halys and the Euxine. The people were of the same races, and those of the north of the Taurus in Cappadocia and Pontus are called White Syrians (vid. LEUCOSYRI), in contradistinction to the people of darker complexion in Syria Proper, who are sometimes even called Black Syrians (Σύροι μέλανες). Even when the name of Syria is used in its ordinary narrower sense, it is often confounded with Assyria, which only differs from Syria by having the definite article prefixed. Again, in the narrower sense of the name, Syria still includes two districts which are often considered as not belonging to it, namely, PHENICE and PALESTINE, and a third which is likewise often considered separate, namely, COELESYRIA; but this last is generally reckoned a part of Syria. In this narrower sense, then, Syria was bounded on the west (beginning from the south) by Mount Hermon, at the southern end of Antilibanus, which separated it from Palestine, by the range of Libanus, dividing it from Phœnice, by the Mediterranean, and by Mount Amanus, which divided it from Cilicia; on the north (where it bordered on Cappadocia) by the main chain of Mount Taurus, almost exactly along the parallel of thirty-eight degrees of north latitude, and striking the Euphrates just below Juliopolis, and considerably above Samosata: hence the Euphrates forms the eastern boundary, dividing Syria first from a very small portion of Armenia, and then from Mesopotamia, to about or beyond the thirty-sixth parallel of north latitude, whence the southeastern and southern boundaries, toward Babylonia and Arabia, in the Great Desert, are exceedingly indefinite. (Compare ARABIA.) The western part of the southern boundary ran just below Damascus, being formed by the highlands of Trachonitis. The western part of the country was intersected by a series of mountains, running south from the Taurus, under the names of AMANUS, PIERIA, CASIUS, BARGYLUS, and LIBANUS, and ANTILIBANUS; and the northern part, between the Amanus and the Euphrates, was also mountainous. The chief river of Syria was the ORONTES, and the smaller rivers CHALUS and CHRYSORRHOS were also of importance. The valleys among the mountains were fertile, especially in the northern part: even the east, which is now merged in the great desert of Arabia, appears to have had more numerous and more extensive spaces capable of cultivation, and supported great cities, the ruins of which now stand in the midst of sandy wastes. In the earliest historical period, Syria contained a number of independent kingdoms, of which DAMASCUS was the most powerful. These were subdued by David, but became again independent at the end of Solomon's reign; from which time we find the kings of Damascus sometimes at war with the kings of Israel, and sometimes in alliance with them against the kings of Judah, till the reign of Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, who, having been invited by Ahaz, king of Judah, to assist him against the united forces of Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, took Damascus, and probably conquered all Syria, about B.C. 740. Having been a part successively of the Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, and Macedonian empires, it fell, after the battle of Ipsus (B.C. 301), to the share of Seleucus Nicator, and formed a part of the great kingdom of the Seleucidæ, whose history is given in the articles SELEUCUS, ANTIOCHUS, DEMETRIUS, &c. In this partition, however, Coelesyria and Palestine went, not to Syria, but to Egypt, and the possession of those provinces became the great source of contention between the Ptolemies and the Seleucids. By the irruptions of the Parthians on the east, and the unsuccessful war of Antiochus the Great with the Romans on the west, the Greek-Syrian kingdom was reduced to the limits of Syria itself, and became weaker and weaker, until it was overthrown by TIGRANES, king of Armenia, B.C. 79. Soon afterward, when the Romans had conquered Tigranes as well as Mithradates, Syria was quietly added by Pompey to the empire of the republic, and was constituted a province B.C. 54; but its northern district, COMMAGENE, was not included in this arrangement. As the eastern province of the Roman empire, and with its great desert frontier, Syria was constantly exposed to the irruptions of the Parthians, and, after them, of the Persians; but it long remained one of the most flourishing of the provinces. The attempt of Zenobia to make it the seat of empire is noticed under PALMYRA and ZENOBIA. While the Roman emperors defended this precious possession against the attacks of the Persian kings with various success, a new danger arose, as early as the fourth century, from the Arabians of the Desert, who began to be known under the name of Saracens; and, when the rise of Mohammed had given to the Arabs that great religious impulse which revolutionized the Eastern world, Syria was the first great conquest that they made from the Eastern empire, A.D. 632-638. In the time immediately succeeding the Macedonian conquest, Syria was regarded as consisting of two parts; the north, including the whole country down to the beginning of the Lebanon range, and the south, consisting of CÆLESYRIA in its more extended sense. The former, which was called Syria Proper, or Upper Syria (ἡ ἄνω Συρία, Syria Superior), was divided into four districts or tetrarchies, which were named after their respective capitals, Seleucis, Antiochiène, Laodicène, and Apamène. Under the Romans it was divided into ten districts, named (mostly after their capital cities) Commagène, Cyrrhestice, Pieria, Seleucis, Chalcidice, Chalybonitis, Palmyrène, Apamène, Cassiôtis, and Laodicène; but the last is sometimes included under Cassiôtis. (Vid. the several articles.) Constantine the Great separated from Syria the two northern districts, namely, Commagène and Cyrrhestice, and erected them into a distinct province, called Euphratensis or Euphratesia; and the rest of Syria was afterward divided by Theodosius II. into the two provinces of Syria Prima, including the sea-coast and the country north of Antioch, and having that city for its capital; and Syria Secunda, the district along the Orontes, with Apamea for its capital: the eastern districts no longer formed a part of Syria, but had fallen under the power of the Persians.

SYRIÆ PORTÆ (αἱ Συρίαὶ πύλαι: now Pass of Beilan), a most important pass between Cilicia and Syria, lying between the shore of the Gulf of Issus on the west, and Mount Amanus on the east. Xenophon, who called the pass (or, rather, its fortifications) the Gates of Cilicia and of Syria, describes it as three-stadia in length and very narrow, with walls built from the mountains to the sea at both ends (the Cilician and the Syrian), and gates in the walls (Anab., i., 4). These walls and gates are not mentioned by the historians of Alexander.

SYRIANUS (Συριανός), a Greek philosopher of the Neo-Platonic school, was a native of Alexandria, and studied at Athens under Plutarchus, whom he succeeded as head of the Neo-Platonic school in the early part of the fifth century. The most distinguished of his disciples was Proclus, who regarded him with the greatest veneration, and gave directions that at his death he should be buried in the same tomb with Syrianus. Syrianus wrote several works, some of which are extant. Of these the most valuable are the commentaries on the Metaphysics of Aristotle.

SYRINX, an Arcadian nymph, who, being pursued by Pan, fled into the River Ladon, and at her own request was metamorphosed into a reed, of which Pan then made his flute.

SYRINX (Σύριγξ), a great and strongly-fortified city of Hyrcania, and the capital of the province under the Greek kings of Syria. Perhaps it is only the Greek name of the city called, in the native language, Zadrakarta.

[SYRO, an Epicurean philosopher at Rome, on friendly terms with Cicero: Baehr thinks he is the same as the Syro who instructed Virgil in the Epicurean philosophy.]

SYROS or SYRUS (Σύρος, called Συρία by Homer, and Σύρα by a few writers: Σύριος: now Syra), an island in the Ægean Sea, and one of the Cyclades, lying between Rhenea and Cythnus. It is described by the ancients as twenty Roman miles in circumference, and as rich in pastures, wine, and corn. It contained two towns, one on the eastern side, and one on the western side of the island; of the latter there are still remains near the modern harbor of Maria della Grazia. The philosopher Pherecydes was a native of Syros.

SYRTIS, gen. -ιδος (Σύρτις, gen. -ιδος and -εως, Ion. -ιός), the Greek name for each of the two great gulfs in the eastern half of the northern coast of Africa, is derived by ancient writers from σύρω, to draw, with reference to the quicksands by which, in the Greater Syrtis at least, ships were liable to be swallowed up; but modern scholars generally prefer the derivation from the Arabic sert=a sandy desert, which is at the present day applied to the country along this coast, the REGIO SYRTICA of the ancients. Both were proverbially dangerous, the Greater Syrtis from its sand-banks and quicksands, and its unbroken exposure to the northern winds, the Lesser from its shelving rocky shores, its exposure to the northeastern winds, and the consequent variability of the tides in it. 1. SYRTIS MAJOR (ἡ μεγάλη Σύρτις: now Gulf of Sidra), the eastern of the two, is a wide and deep gulf on the shores of Tripolita and Cyrenaica, exactly opposite to the Ionic Sea, or mouth of the Adriatic, between Sicily and Peloponnesus. Its greatest depth, from north to south, is about one hundred and ten geographical miles; its width is about two hundred and thirty geographical miles, between Cephalæ Promontorium (now Ras Kharra) on the west, and Boreum Promontorium (now Ras Teyonas) on the east. (Strabo gives its width as fifteen hundred stadia, its depth fifteen hundred to eighteen hundred, and its circuit four thousand to five thousand). The Great Desert comes down close to its shores, forming a sandy coast. Vid. SYRTICA REGIO. The terror of being driven on shore in it is referred to in the narrative of Saint Paul's voyage to Italy (Acts, xxvii., 17, "fearing lest they should fall into the Syrtis"); and the dangers of a march through the loose sand on its shores, sometimes of a burning heat, and sometimes saturated with sea-water, were scarcely less formidable. — SYRTIS MINOR (ἡ μικρὰ Σύρτις: now Gulf of Khabs), lies in the southwestern angle of the great bend formed by the northern coast of Africa as it drops down to the south from the neighborhood of Carthage, and then bears again to the east; in other words, in the angle between the eastern coast of Zeugitana and Byzacena (now Tunis) and the northern coast of Tripolitana (now Tripoli). Its mouth faces the east, between Caput Vada or Brachodes Promontorium (now Ras Kapoudiah) on the north, and the island called Meninx or Lotophagitis (now Jerbah) on the south. In its mouth, near the northern extremity, lie the islands of Cercina and Cercinitis, which were often regarded as its northern extremity. Its dimensions are differently given, partly, perhaps, on account of the different points from which they were reckoned. The Greek geographers give the width as six hundred stadia (sixty geographical miles), and the circuit sixteen hundred stadia: the Romans give one hundred Roman miles for the width, and three hundred for the circuit. The true width (between Ras Kapoudiah and the eastern point of Jerbah) is about eighty geographical miles, and the greatest depth, measured westward from the line joining those points, is about sixty-five geographical miles. In Herodotus, the word Syrtis occurs in a few passages, without any distinction between the Greater and the Less. It seems most probable that he means to denote by this term the Greater Syrtis, and that he included the Lesser in the Lake TRITONIS.

SYRTICA REGIO (ἡ Συρτική: now the western part of Tripoli), the special name of that part of the northern coast of Africa which lay between the two Syrtis, from the River Triton, at the bottom of the Syrtis Minor, on the west, to the Philænorum Aræ, at the bottom of the Syrtis Major, on the east. It was, for the most part, a very narrow strip of sand, interspersed with salt marshes, between the sea and a range of mountains forming the edge of the Great Desert (now Sahara), with only here and there a few spots capable of cultivation, especially about the River Cinyps. It was peopled by Libyan tribes, the chief of whom were the Lotophagi, Macæ, Psylli, and Nasamones; and several Egyptian and Phœnician colonies were settled on the coast at an early period. The Greeks of Cyrene disputed with the Carthaginians the possession of this district until it was secured to Carthage by the self-devotion of the PHILÆNI. Under the Romans it formed a part of the province of Africa. It was often called TRIPOLITANA, from its three chief cities, ABROTONUM, CEA, and LEPTIS MAGNA; and this became its usual name under the later empire, and has been handed down to our own time in the modern name of the Regency of Tripoli.

SYRUS, a slave brought to Rome some years before the downfall of the republic, and designated, according to the usual practice, from the country of his birth. He attracted attention, while yet a youth, by his accomplishments and wit, was manumitted by his master, who probably belonged to the Clodia gens, assumed the name of Publius, from his patron, and soon became highly celebrated as a mimographer. He may be said to have flourished B.C. 45. His mimes were committed to writing, and extensively circulated at an early period; and a collection of pithy moral sayings, extracted from his works, appears to have been used as a school-book in the boyhood of St. Jerome. A compilation of this description, extending to upward of one thousand lines in iambic and trochaic measures, every apophthegm being comprised in a single line, and the whole arranged alphabetically, according to the initial letter of the first word in each, is now extant under the title Publii Syri Sententiæ. These proverbs have been drawn from various sources, and are evidently the work of many different hands; but a considerable number may be ascribed to Syrus and his contemporaries. The best editions of the Sententiæ are by Havercamp, Lugd. Bat., 1708, 1727; by Orelli, Lips., 1822; and by Bothe, in his Poetarum Latinæ Scenicorum Fragmenta, Lips., 1834.

ΤΑΒΛΕ (Τάβαι: Tabynós). 1. Now Tavi), a small inland town of Sicily.—2. (Now Daveas), a city of Caria, on the borders of Phrygia.—3. A city of Persis, in the district of Parætacene, on the road from Ecbatana to Persepolis.

TABERNÆ. Vid. TRES TABERNÆ.

[TABRACA. Vid. THABRACA.]

TABURNUS (now Taburno), a mountain belonging half to Campania and half to Samnium. Its southern side was very fertile, and was celebrated for its olive grounds. It shut in the Caudine Pass on its southern side.

ΤΙΧΑΡΕ (Τακάρη: now large ruins at Khabs), a city of Northern Africa, in the Regio Syrtica, at the innermost angle of the Syrtis Minor, to which the modern town gives its name. Under the Romans, it at first belonged to Byzacena, but it was afterward raised to a colony and made the western town of Tripolitana. It had an indifferent harbor. A little to the west was the bathing place, called, from its warm mineral springs, Aquæ Tacapitanæ (now El-Hammamel-Khabs).

TACFARINAS, a Numidian in the reign of Tiberius, had originally served among the auxiliary troops in the Roman army, but he deserted; and, having collected a body of freebooters, he became at length the acknowledged leader of the Musulami, a powerful people in the interior of Numidia, bordering on Mauretania. For some years he defied the Roman arms, but was at length defeated and slain in battle by Dolabella, A.D. 24.

TACHOMPSO (Ταχομψώ, also Tacompsós, Plin., and Μετακομψώ, Ptol.), afterward CONTRAPSELICIS, a city in the Dodecaschœnus, that is, the part of Æthiopia immediately above Egypt, built on an island (now Devar?) near the eastern bank of the river, a little above Pselcis, which stood on the opposite bank. Vid. PSELICIS.

TACHOS (Ταχός), king of Egypt, succeeded Acoris, and maintained the independence of his country for a short time during the latter end of the reign of Artaxerxes II. He invited Chabrias, the Athenian, to take the command of his fleet, and Agesilaus to undertake the supreme command of all his forces. Both Chabrias and Agesilaus came to Egypt; but the latter was much aggrieved in having only the command of the mercenaries intrusted to him. Accordingly, when Nectanabis laid claim to the Egyptian crown, Agesilaus deserted Tachos, and espoused the cause of Nectanabis, who thus became King of Egypt B.C. 361.

TACITUS. 1. C. CORNĒLIUS, the historian. The time and place of his birth are unknown. He was a little older than the younger Pliny, who was born A.D. 61. His father was probably Cornelius Tacitus, a Roman eque, who is mentioned as a procurator in Gallia Belgica, and who died in 79. Tacitus was first promoted by the Emperor Vespasian, and he received other favors from his sons Titus and Domitian. In 78 he married the daughter of C. Julius Agricola, to whom he had been betrothed in the preceding year, while Agricola was consul. In the reign of Domitian, and in A.D. 88, Tacitus was prætor, and he assisted as one of the quindecimviri at the solemnity of the Ludi Seculares which were celebrated in that year. Agricola died at Rome in 93, but neither Tacitus nor the daughter of Agricola was then with him. It is not known where Tacitus was during the last illness of Agricola. In the reign of Nerva, 97, Tacitus was appointed consul suffectus, in the place of T. Virginus Rufus, who had died in that year, and whose funeral oration he delivered. We know that Tacitus had attained oratorical distinction when the younger Pliny was commencing his career. He and Tacitus were appointed in the reign of Nerva (99) to conduct the prosecution of Marius, proconsul of Africa. Tacitus and Pliny were most intimate friends. In the collection of the letters of Pliny there are eleven letters addressed to Tacitus. The time of the death of Tacitus is unknown, but he appears to have survived Trajan, who died 117. Nothing is recorded of any children of his, though the Emperor Tacitus claimed a descent from the historian, and ordered his works to be placed in all (public) libraries. The following are the extant works of Tacitus: 1. Vita Agricola, the life of Agricola, which was written after the death of Domitian, 96, as we may probably conclude from the introduction, which was certainly written after Trajan's accession. This life is justly admired as a specimen of biography. It is a monument to the memory of a good man, and an able commander and administrator, by an affectionate son-in-law, who has portrayed, in his peculiar manner and with many masterly touches, the virtues of one of the most illustrious of the Romans. 2. Historia, which were written after the death of Nerva, 98, and before the Annales. They comprehended the period from the second consulship of Galba, 68, to the death of Domitian, 96, and the author designed to add the reigns of Nerva and Trajan. The first four books alone are extant in a complete form, and they comprehend only the events of about one year. The fifth book is imperfect, and goes no further than the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and the war of Civilis in Germany. It is not known how many books of the Histories there were, but it must have been a large work if it was all written on the same scale as the first five books. 3. Annales, which commence with the death of Augustus, 14, and comprise the period to the death of Nero, 68, a space of fifty-four years. The greater part of the fifth book is lost, and also the seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, the beginning of the eleventh, and the end of the sixteenth, which is the last book. These lost parts comprised the whole of Caligula's reign, the first five years of Claudius, and the last two of Nero. 4. De Moribus et Populis Germania, a treatise describing the Germanic nations. It is of no value as a geographical description; the first few chapters contain as much of the geography of Germany as Tacitus knew. The main matter is the description of the political institutions, the religion, and the habits of the various tribes included under the denomination of Germani. The value of the information contained in this treatise has often been discussed, and its credibility attacked; but we may estimate its true character by observing the precision of the writer as to those Germans who were best known to the Romans from being near the Rhine. That the hearsay accounts of more remote tribes must partake of the defects of all such evidence, is obvious; and we can not easily tell whether Tacitus embellished that which he heard obscurely told. But to consider the Germany as a fiction is one of those absurdities which need only be recorded, not refuted. 5. Dialogus de Oratoribus. If this dialogue is the work of Tacitus, and it probably is, it must be his earliest work, for it was written in the sixth year of Vespasian (c. 17). The style is more easy than that of the Annals, more diffuse, less condensed; but there is no obvious difference between the style of this Dialogue and the Histories, nothing so striking as to make us contend for a different authorship. Besides this, it is nothing unusual for works of the same author, which are written at different times, to vary greatly in style, especially if they treat of different matters. The old MSS. attribute this Dialogue to Tacitus. The Annals of Tacitus, the work of a mature age, contain the chief events of the period which they embrace, arranged under their several years. There seems no peculiar propriety in giving the name of Annales to this work, simply because the events are arranged in the order of time. The work of Livy may just as well be called Annals. In the Annals of Tacitus, the Princeps or Emperor is the centre about which events are grouped. Yet the most important public events, both in Italy and the provinces, are not omitted, though every thing is treated as subordinate to the exhibition of imperial power. The Histories, which were written before the Annals, are in a more diffuse style, and the treatment of the extant part is different from that of the Annals. Tacitus wrote the Histories as a contemporary; the Annals as not a contemporary. They are two distinct works, not parts of one, which is clearly shown by the very different proportions of the two works: the first four books of the Histories comprise about a year, and the first four books of the Annals comprise fourteen years. The moral dignity of Tacitus is impressed upon his works; the consciousness of a love of truth, of the integrity of his purpose. His great power is in the knowledge of the human mind, his insight into the motives of human conduct; and he found materials for this study in the history of the emperors, and particularly Tiberius, the arch-hypocrite, and perhaps half madman. His Annals are filled with dramatic scenes and striking catastrophes. He labored to produce effect by the exhibition of great personages on the stage; but as to the mass of the people we learn little from Tacitus. The style of Tacitus is peculiar, though it bears some resemblance to Sallust. In the Annals it is concise, vigorous, and pregnant with meaning; labored, but elaborated with art, and stripped of every superfluity. A single word sometimes gives effect to a sentence, and if the meaning of the word is missed, the sense of the writer is not reached. Such a work is probably the result of many transcriptions by the author. In the Annals Tacitus is generally brief and rapid in his sketches; but he is sometimes minute, and almost tedious, when he comes to work out a dramatic scene. Nor does he altogether neglect his rhetorical art when he has an opportunity for displaying it. The condensed style of Tacitus sometimes makes him obscure, but it is a kind of obscurity that is dispelled by careful reading. Yet a man must read carefully and often in order to understand him; and we can not suppose that Tacitus was ever a popular writer. His real admirers will perhaps always be few; his readers fewer still. The best editions of the complete works of Tacitus are by Oberlin, Lips., 1801, 2 vols. 8vo; by Bekker, Lips., 1831, 2 vols. 8vo; by Orelli, Zürich, 1846 and 1848, 2 vols. 8vo; [and by Ritter, Cambridge, 1848, 4 vols. 8vo].—2. M. CLAUDIUS, Roman emperor from the 25th of September, A.D. 275, until April, A.D. 276. He was elected emperor by the senate after the death of Aurelian, the army having requested the senate to nominate a successor to the imperial throne. Tacitus was at the time seventy years of age, and was with difficulty persuaded to accept the purple. The high character which he had borne before his elevation to the throne, he amply sustained during his brief reign. He endeavored to repress the luxury and licentiousness of the age by various sumptuary laws, and he himself set an example to all around by the abstemiousness, simplicity, and frugality of his own habits. The only military achievement of this reign was the defeat and expulsion from Asia Minor of a party of Goths, who had carried their devastation across the peninsula to the confines of Cilicia. He died either at Tarsus or at Tyana, about the 9th of April, 276.

TÆNÆUM (Ταίναρον: now Cape Matapan), a promontory in Laconia, forming the southerly point of the Peloponnesus, on which stood a celebrated temple of Neptune (Poseidon), possessing an inviolable asylum. A little to the north of the temple and the harbor of Achilleus was a town also called TÆNARUM or TÆNARUS, and at a later time CÆNĒPŌLIS. It was situated forty stadia from the extreme point of the promontory, and was said to have been built by Tænarus, a son of Jupiter (Zeus), or Icarus, or Elatus. On this promontory was a cave, through which Hercules is said to have dragged Cerberus to the upper world. Here also was a statue of Arion seated on a dolphin, since he is said to have landed at this spot after his miraculous preservation by a dolphin. In the time of the Romans there were celebrated marble quarries on the promontory.

TAGÆ (Ταγᾶι: now Dameghan?), a city mentioned by Polybius as in Parthia, on the border toward Hyrcania, apparently the same place which Strabo calls ΤΑΡΕ (Τάρη), and reckons to Hyrcania.

TAGASTE (ruins at Tagilt), an inland town of Numidia, on a tributary of the Bagradas, remarkable as the birth-place of St. Augustine.

TAGES, a mysterious Etruscan being, who is described as a boy with the wisdom of an old man. Once when an Etruscan, of the name of Tarchon, was ploughing in the neighborhood of Tarquinii, there suddenly rose out of the ground Tages, the son of a Genius Jovialis, and grandson of Jupiter. When Tages addressed Tarchon, the latter shrieked with fear, whereupon other Etruscans hastened to him, and in a short time all the people of Etruria were assembled around him. Tages now instructed them in the art of the haruspices, and died immediately after. The Etruscans, who had listened attentively to his instructions, afterward wrote down all he had said, and thus arose the books of Tages, which, according to some, were twelve in number.

[TAGRUS (now Yunto in the chain of Sierra de Albaridos), a mountain of Lusitania, in the neighborhood of Olisippo.]

TAGUS (Spanish Tajo, Portuguese Tejo, English Tagus), one of the chief rivers in Spain, rising in the land of the Celtiberians, between the mountains Orospeđa and Idubeda, and, after flowing in a westerly direction, falling into the Atlantic. The whole course of the Tagus exceeds five hundred and fifty English miles. At its mouth stood Olisippo (now Lisbon). The ancient writers relate that much gold sand and precious stones were found in the Tagus.

TALABRĪGA, a town in Lusitania, between Æminium and Lagobriga.

TALASSĪUS or TALASSES. Vid. THALASSIUS.

TALaura (τὰ Τάλαυρα: now Turkhal?), a fortress in Pontus, used by Mithradates the Great as a residence, and supposed by some to be identical with Gaziura.

TALĪUS (Τάλαιος), son of Bias and Pero, and king of Argos. He was married to Lysimache (Eurynome or Lysianassa), and was father of Adrastus, Parthenopæus, Pronax, Mecisteus, Aristomachus, and Eriphyle. He occurs among the Argonauts, and his tomb was shown at Argos. The patronymic Talaionides (Ταλαϊονίδης) is given to his sons, Adrastus and Mecisteus.

TALMIS (ruins at El-Kalabshch), a city of the Dodecaschœnus, that is, the district of Æthiopia immediately above Egypt, stood on the western bank of the Nile, south of Taphis, and north of Tutzis. Its ruins consist of an ancient rock-hewn temple, with splendid sculptures, and of a later temple of the Roman period, in the midst of which stands the modern village. There was a place on the opposite bank called Contra Talmis.

TALNA, JUVENTIUS. Vid. THALNA.

TALOS (Τάλως). 1. Son of Perdix, the sister of Dædalus. For details, vid. PERDIX.—2. A man of brass, the work of Vulcan (Hephæstus). This wonderful being was given to Minos by Jupiter (Zeus) or Vulcan (Hephæstus), and watched the island of Crete by walking round the island thrice every day. Whenever he saw strangers approaching, he made himself red hot in fire, and then embraced the strangers when they landed.

[TALTHYBIĀDÆ, a family in Sparta, deducing their origin from Talthybius, holding the office of herald as an hereditary honor.]

TALTHYBIUS (Ταλθύβιος), the herald of Agamemnon at Troy. He was worshipped as a hero at Sparta and Argos, where sacrifices also were offered to him.

[TALUS, a companion of Æneas, slain by Turnus in Italy.]

TAMĀRA. 1. Or TAMĀRIS (now Tambre), a small river in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the coast of Gallæcia, falling into the Atlantic between the Minius and the Præmontorium Nerium.—2. (Now Tamerton, near Plymouth), a town of the Damnonii in the south of Britain, at the mouth of the Tamarus.

TAMARICI, a people in Gallæcia, on the River Tainara.

TAMĀRIS. Vid. TAMARA.

TAMĀRUS (now Tamar), a river in the south of Britain.

TAMASSUS or TAMĀSUS (Ταμασός, Τάμασος: Ταμασίτης, Ταμάσιος), probably the same as the Homeric TEMĒSE (Τεμῆση), a town in the middle of Cyprus, northwest of Olympus, and twenty-nine miles southeast of Soloë, on the road from the latter place to Tremithus, was situated in a fertile country and in the neighborhood of extensive copper mines. Near it was a celebrated plain (ager Tamasæus), sacred to Venus. (Ov., Mét., x., 644.)

TAMBRAX (Τάμβραξ), a great city of Hyrcania, on the northern side of Mount Coronus, mentioned by Polybius. It is perhaps the same place which Strabo calls Ταμβρόκη.

TAMĒSIS or TAMĒSA (now Thames), a river in Britain, flowing into the sea on the eastern coast, on which stood Londinium. Cæsar crossed the Thames at the distance of eighty Roman miles from the sea, probably at Cowey Stakes, near Oatlands and the confluence of the Wey. There have been found in modern times in the ford of the river at this spot large stakes, which are supposed to have been the same as were fixed in the water by Cassivellaunus when he attempted to prevent Cæsar from crossing the river.

TAMNA (Τάμνα), a very great city in the southwest of Arabia Felix, the capital of the Catabani. It maintained a caravan traffic, in spices and other products of Arabia, with Gaza, from which its distance was reckoned one thousand four hundred and thirty-six Roman miles.

TAMŌS (Ταμός), a native of Memphis in Egypt, was lieutenant governor of Ionia under Tissaphernes. He afterward attached himself to the service of the younger Cyrus; upon whose death he sailed to Egypt, where he hoped to find refuge with Psammetichus, on whom he had conferred an obligation. Psammetichus, however, put him to death, in order to possess himself of his money and ships.

TAMPĪLUS or TAMPĪLUS, Βεβίλῆς. 1. CN., tribune of the plebs B.C. 204; prætor 199, when he was defeated by the Insubrians; and consul 182, when he fought against the Ligurians with success.—2. M., brother of the last, was prætor 192, and served in Greece both in this year and the following, in the war against Antiochus. In 181 he was consul, when he defeated the Ligurians.

TAMŪNĒ (Ταμύνα), a town in Eubœa, on Mount Cotylæum, in the territory of Eretria, with a temple of Apollo, said to have been built by Admetus. Here the Athenians under Phocion gained a celebrated victory over Callias of Chalcis, B.C. 354.

TAMYRĀCA (Ταμυράκη), a town and promontory of European Sarmatia, at the innermost corner of the Sinus Carcinites, which was also called from this town Sinus Tamyraces (Ταμυρικής κόλπος).

TAMYRAS or DAMŪRAS (Ταμύρας, Δαμούρας: now Damur; or Nahr-el-Kadi), a little river of Phœnicia, rising on Mount Libarus, and falling into the Mediterranean about half way between Sidon and Berytus.

TANAGER (now Negro), a river of Lucania, rising in the Apennines, which, after flowing in a northeasterly direction, loses itself under the earth near Polla for a space of about two miles, and finally falls into the Silarus near Forum Popilli.

TANAGRA (Τάναγρα: Ταναγραῖος: now Grimadha or Grimala), a celebrated town of Bœotia, situated on a steep ascent on the left bank of the Asopus, thirteen stadia from Oropus, and two hundred stadia from Platææ, in the district Tanagraea, which was also called Pœmandris. Tanagra was supposed to be the same town as the Homeric Græa. The most ancient inhabitants are said to have been the Gephyraei, who came with Cadmus from Phœnicia; but it was afterward taken possession of by the Æolian Bœotians. It was a place of considerable commercial importance, and was celebrated, among other things, for its breed of fighting cocks. At a later time it belonged to the Bœotian confederacy. Being near the frontiers of Attica, it was frequently exposed to the attacks of the Athenians; and near it the Athenians sustained a celebrated defeat, B.C. 457.

TANĀIS (Τάναϊς). 1. (Now Don, i. e., Water), a great river, which rises in the north of Sarmatia Europæa (about the centre of Russia), and flows to the southeast till it comes near the Volga, when it turns to the southwest, and falls into the northeastern angle of the Palus Mæotis (now Sea of Azov) by two principal mouths and several smaller ones. It was usually considered the boundary between Europe and Asia. Its chief tributary was the Hyrgis or Syrgis (now probably Donets).—2. (Ruins near Kassatchei), a city of Sarmatia Asiatica, on the northern side of the southern mouth of the Tanais, at a little distance from the sea. It was founded by a colony from Miletus, and became a very flourishing emporium. It reduced to subjection several of the neighboring tribes, but in its turn it became subject to the kings of Bosphorus. It was destroyed by Polemon on account of an attempted revolt, and, though afterward restored, it never regained its former prosperity.

[TANAÏS. 1. A Rutulian warrior under Turnus, slain by Æneas.—2. A freedman of Mæcenas, or, as some say, of L. Munatius Plancus, mentioned by Horace (Sat., i., 1, 105).]

TANĀQUIL. Vid. TARQUINIUS.

[TANĀRUS, (now Tanaro), a river of Liguria, which flows down from the Alpes Maritimæ, and after receiving the Stura, Fevos, and Urbis, falls into the Padus (now Po).]

TANETUM (Tanetanus: now Taneto), a town of the Boii in Gallia Cispadana, between Mutina and Parma.

TĀNIS (Τάνις: in the Old Testament, Zoan: Τανίτης: ruins at San), a very ancient city of Lower Egypt, in the eastern part of the Delta, on the right bank of the arm of the Nile, which was called after it the Tanitic, and on the southwestern side of the great lake between this and the Pelusiatic branch of the Nile, which was also called, after the city, Tanis (now Lake of Menzaleh). It was one of the capitals of Lower Egypt under the early kings, and was said by tradition to have been the residence of the court n the time of Moses. It was the chief city of the Tanites Nomos.

 TANTĀLUS (Τάνταλος). 1. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Pluto. His wife is called by some Euryanassa, by others Taygete or Dione, and by others Clytia or Eupryto. He was the father of Pelops, Broteas, and Niobe. All traditions agree in stating that he was a wealthy king; but while some call him King of Lydia, others describe him as King of Argos or Corinth. Tantalus is particularly celebrated in ancient story for the terrible punishment inflicted upon him after his death in the lower world, the causes of which are differently stated by the ancient authors. According to the common account, Jupiter (Zeus) invited him to his table, and communicated his divine counsels to him. Tantalus divulged the secrets thus intrusted to him; and he was punished in the lower world by being afflicted with a raging thirst, and at the same time placed in the midst of a lake, the waters of which always receded from him as soon as he attempted to drink them. Over his head, moreover, hung branches of fruit, which receded in like manner when he stretched out his hand to reach them. In addition to all this, there was suspended over his head a huge rock, ever threatening to crush him. Another tradition relates that, wishing to test the gods, he cut his son Pelops in pieces, boiled them, and set them before the gods at a repast. A third account states that Tantalus stole nectar and ambrosia from the table of the gods and gave them to his friends; and a fourth, lastly, relates the following story. Rhea caused the infant Jupiter (Zeus) and his nurse to be guarded in Crete by a golden dog, whom Jupiter (Zeus) afterward appointed guardian of his temple in Crete. Pandareus stole this dog, and, carrying him to Mount Sipylus in Lydia, gave him to Tantalus to take care of. But when Pandareus demanded the dog back, Tantalus took an oath that he had never received it. Jupiter (Zeus) thereupon changed Pandareus into a stone, and threw Tantalus down from Mount Sipylus. Others, again, relate that Mercury (Hermes) demanded the dog of Tantalus, and that the perjury was committed before Mercury (Hermes). Jupiter (Zeus) buried Tantalus under Mount Sipylus as a punishment; and there his tomb was shown in later times. The punishment of Tantalus was proverbial in ancient times, and from it the English language has borrowed the verb "to tantalize," that is, to hold out hopes or prospects which can not be realized. The patronymic Tantalides is frequently given to the descendants of Tantalus. Hence we find not only his son Pelops, but also Atreus, Thyestes, Agamemnon, Menelaus, and Orestes called by this name.—2. Son of Thyestes, who was killed by Atreus. Others call him a son of Broteas. He was married to Clytæmnestra before Agamemnon, and is said by some to have been killed by Agamemnon.—3. Son of Amphion and Niobe.

TANUS or TANĀUS (Τάνος or Ταναός: now Κανί), a river in the district of Thyreatis, on the eastern coast of Peloponnesus, rising in Mount Parion, and falling into the Thyreatic Gulf after forming the boundary between Argolis and Cynuria ΤΑΟΣ (Ταόκη: now Bunder-Reicht), a city on the coast of Persis, near the mouth of the River Granis, used occasionally as a royal residence. The surrounding district was called Ταοκηνή.

ΤΑΩΧΗ (Τάοχοι), a people of Pontus, on the borders of Armenia, frequently mentioned by Xenophon in the Anabasis.

ΤΑΡΕ. Vid. ΤΑΓΞ.

ΤΑΡΗΞΕ ΙΝΣΥΛΞ, a number of small islands in the Ionian Sea, lying between the coasts of Leucadia and Aearnania. They were also called the islands of the Teleboæ, and their inhabitants were in like manner named ΤΑΡΗΙ (Τάρηιοι) or ΤΕΛΕΒΩΞ (Τηλεβόαι). The largest of these islands is called ΤΑΡΗΣ (Τάφος) by Homer, but ΤΑΡΗΙΟΣ (Ταφίους) or ΤΑΡΗΪΣΑ (Ταφιοῦσα) by later writers. They are mentioned in Homer as the haunts of notorious pirates, and are celebrated in mythology on account of the war carried on between them and Electryon, king of Mycenæ.

ΤΑΡΗΑΣΣΟΣ (Ταφιασσός: now Macrinoro and Rigani), a mountain in Ætolia and Locris, properly only a southwestern continuation of Mounts Ceta and Corax.

ΤΑΡΗΣ (ruins at Ταρα), a city of the Dodecaschœnus, that is, the district of Æthiopia immediately above Egypt, stood on the western bank of the Nile, south of Tzitzis, and north of Talmis. It is also called Ταθίς and Παπίς. There was a town on the opposite bank called Contra Taphis.

ΤΑΡΗΞΕ Ο ΤΑΡΗΟΣ (Τάφραϊ or Τάφρος: Τάφρος), a town on the isthmus of the Chersonesus Taurica, so called because a trench or ditch was cut across the isthmus at this point.

ΤΑΡΗΣ. Vid. ΤΑΡΗΞ.

ΤΑΡΟΣΙΡΙΣ (Ταπόσειρις, Ταπόσιρις, Ταφόσιρις, i. e., the tomb of Osiris: ruins at Abousir), a city of Lower Egypt, on the northwestern frontier, in the Lihya Nomos, near the base of the long tongue of land on which Alexandria stood, celebrated for its claim to be considered the burial-place of Osiris. Mention is also made of a Lesser Taposiris (ἡ μικρὰ Ταπόσειρις) near it.

ΤΑΡΟΒΙΝΞ (Ταροβίνη: now Ceylon), a great island of the Indian Ocean, opposite to the southern extremity of India intra Gangem. The Greeks first became acquainted with it through the researches of Onesicritus in the time of Alexander, and through information obtained by residents in India; and the Roman geographers acquired additional knowledge respecting the island through an embassy which was sent from it to Rome in the reign of Claudius. Of the accounts given of it by the ancients, it is only necessary here to state that Ptolemy makes it very much too large, while, on the other hand, he gives much too small a southward extension to the peninsula of India.

ΤΑΡΪΡΙ (Τάπουροι or Ταπουροί), a powerful people, apparently of Scythian origin, who dwelt in Media, on the borders of Parthia, south of Mount Coronus. They also extended into Margiana, and probably further north on the eastern side of the Caspian, where their original abodes seem to have been in the mountains called by their name. The men wore black clothes and long hair, and the women white clothes and hair cut close. They were much addicted to drunkenness.

TAPŪRI MONTES (τὰ Τάπουρα ὄρη), a range of mountains on the east of the Caspian Sea, inhabited by the TAPURI.

TARAS. Vid. TARENTUM.

TARRELLI, one of the most important people in Gallia Aquitania, between the ocean (hence called Tarbellicum æquor and Tarbellus Oceanus) and the Pyrenees (hence called Tarbella Pyrene). Their country was sandy and unproductive, but contained gold and mineral springs. Their chief town was AQUÆ TARRELLICÆ or AUGUSTÆ, on the Aturus (now Dacqs on the Adour).

TARCHON, son of Tyrrhenus, who is said to have built the town of Tarquinii. (Vid. TARKINIUM.) Virgil represents him as coming to the assistance of Æneas against Turnus.

TARENTINUS SINUS (Ταρεντινὸς κόλπος: now Gulf of Tarentum), a great gulf in the south of Italy, between Bruttium, Lucania, and Calabria, beginning west near the Promontorium Lacinium, and ending east near the Promontorium Iapygium, and named after the town of Tarentum. According to Strabo, it is one thousand nine hundred and twenty stadia in circuit, and the entrance to it is seven hundred stadia wide.

TARENTUM, called TARAS by the Greeks (Τάρας, -αντος: Ταρεντινός, Tarentinus: now Taranto), an important Greek city in Italy, situated on the western coast of the peninsula of Calabria, and on a bay of the sea, about one hundred stadia in circuit, forming an excellent harbor, and being a portion of the great Gulf of Tarentum. The city stood in the midst of a beautiful and fertile country, south of Mount Aulon and west of the mouth of the Galesus. It was originally built by the Iapygians, who are said to have been joined by some Cretan colonists from the neighboring town of Uria, and it derived its name from the mythical Taras, a son of Poscidon. The greatness of Tarentum, however, dates from B.C. 708, when the original inhabitants were expelled, and the town was taken possession of by a strong body of Lacedæmonian Partheniæ under the guidance of Phalanthus. Vid. PHALANTHUS. It soon became the most powerful and flourishing city in the whole of Magna Græcia, and exercised a kind of supremacy over the other Greek cities in Italy. It carried on an extensive commerce, possessed a considerable fleet of ships of war, and was able to bring into the field, with the assistance of its allies, an army of thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse. The city itself, in its most flourishing period, contained twenty-two thousand men capable of bearing arms. The government of Tarentum was different at various periods. In the time of Darius Hystaspis, Herodotus speaks of a king (i. e., a tyrant) of Tarentum; but at a later period the government was a democracy. Archytas, who was born at Tarentum, and who lived about B.C. 400, drew up a code of laws for his native city. With the increase of wealth the citizens became luxurious and effeminate, and being hard pressed by the Luceanians and other barbarians in the neighborhood, they were obliged to apply for aid to the mother country. Archidamus, son of Agesilaus, was the first who came to their assistance in B.C. 338; and he fell in battle fighting on their behalf. The next prince whom they invited to succor them was Alexander, king of Epirus, and uncle to Alexander the Great. At first he met with considerable success, but was eventually defeated and slain by the Bruttii, in 326, near Pandosia, on the banks of the Acheron. Shortly afterward the Tarentines had to encounter a still more formidable enemy. Having attacked some Roman ships, and then grossly insulted the Roman ambassadors who had been sent to demand reparation, war was declared against the city by the powerful republic. The Tarentines were saved for a time by Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who came to their help in 280; but two years after the defeat of this monarch and his withdrawal from Italy, the city was taken by the Romans (272). In the second Punic war Tarentum revolted from Rome to Hannibal (212); but it was retaken by the Romans in 207, and was treated by them with great severity. From this time Tarentum declined in prosperity and wealth. It was subsequently made a Roman colony, and it still continued to be a place of considerable importance in the time of Augustus. Its inhabitants retained their love of luxury and ease; and it is described by Horace as molle Tarentum and imbelle Tarentum. Even after the downfall of the Western Empire the Greek language was still spoken at Tarentum; and it was long one of the chief strongholds of the Byzantine empire in the south of Italy. The town of Tarentum consisted of two parts, viz., of a peninsula or island at the entrance of the harbor, and of a town on the main land, which was connected with the island by means of a bridge. On the northwest corner of the island, close to the entrance of the harbor, was the citadel; the principal part of the town was situated southwest of the isthmus. The modern town is confined to the island or peninsula on which the citadel stood. The neighborhood of Tarentum produced the best wool in all Italy, and was also celebrated for its excellent wine, figs, pears, and other fruits. Its purple dye was also much valued in antiquity.

TARICHĒA, or ἘΞ, or ἘΞΕ (Ταρίχεια, -ῆαι, αἶται: ruins at El-Kerch), a town of Galilee, at the southern end of the Lake of Tiberias, strongly fortified, and with a turbulent population, who gave the Romans much trouble during the Jewish war. It obtained its name from the quantities of the fish of the neighboring lakes which were salted here.

TARNE (Τάρνη), a city of Lydia, on Mount Tmolus, mentioned by Homer. Pliny mentions simply a fountain of the name.

TARPA, SP. MÆCĪUS, was engaged by Pompeius to select the plays that were acted at his games exhibited in B.C. 55. Tarpa was likewise employed by Augustus as a dramatic censor.

TARPEIA, daughter of Sp. Tarpeius, the governor of the Roman citadel on the Saturnian Hill, afterward called the Capitoline, was tempted by the gold on the Sabine bracelets and collars to open a gate of the fortress to T. Tatius and his Sabines. As they entered, they threw upon her their shields, and thus crushed her to death. She was buried on the hill, and her memory was preserved by the name of the Tarpeian Rock, which was given to a part of the Capitoline. A legend still exists at Rome, which relates that the fair Tarpeia ever sits in the heart of the hill, covered with gold and jewels, and bound by a spell.

TARPHE (Tάρπη), a town in Locris, on Mount Ceta, mentioned by Homer, and subsequently called Pharygæ.

TARQUINIA. Vid. TARQUINIUS.

TARQUINI (Tarquiniensis: now Turchina, near Corneto), a city of Etruria, situated on a hill and on the River Marta, southeast of Cosa and on a road leading from the latter town to Rome. It was one of the twelve Etruscan cities, and was probably regarded as the metropolis of the Confederation. It is said to have been founded by Tarchon, the son or brother of Tyrrhenus, who was the leader of the Lydian colony from Asia to Italy. It was in the neighborhood of Tarquinii that the seer Tages appeared, from whom the Etruscans learned their civil and religious polity. Vid. TAGES. According to one account, Tarquinii was founded by Thessalians, that is, Pelasgians; but there can be no doubt that it was an original Etruscan city, and that Tarchon is merely a personification of the race of the Tyrrhenians. It was at Tarquinii that Demaratus, the father of Tarquinius Priscus, settled; and it was from this city that the Tarquinian family came to Rome. After the expulsion of Tarquinius Superbus from Rome, the Tarquinienses, in conjunction with the Veientes, espoused his cause, but they were defeated by the Romans. From this time the Tarquinienses were frequently engaged in war with the Romans; but they were at length obliged to submit to Rome about B.C. 310. Tarquinii was subsequently made a Roman colony and a municipium; but it gradually declined in importance; and in the eighth or ninth century of the Christian era it was deserted by its inhabitants, who founded Corneto on the opposite hill. There are few remains of the ancient city itself; but the cemetery of Tarquinii, consisting of a vast number of subterranean caves in the hill on which Corneto stands, is still in a state of excellent preservation, and contains numerous Etruscan paintings: here some of the most interesting remains of Etruscan art have been discovered in modern times.

TARQUINIUS, the name of a family in early Roman history, to which the fifth and seventh kings of Rome belonged. The legend of the Tarquins ran as follows. Demaratus, their ancestor, belonged to the noble family of the Bacchiadæ at Corinth, and fled from his native city when the power of his order was overthrown by Cypselus. He settled at Tarquinii in Etruria, where he had mercantile connections. He married an Etruscan wife, by whom he had two sons, Lucumo and Aruns. The latter died in the lifetime of his father, leaving his wife pregnant; but as Demaratus was ignorant of this circumstance, he bequeathed all his property to Lucumo, and died himself shortly afterward. But, although Lucumo was thus one of the most wealthy persons at Tarquinii, and had married Tanaquil, who belonged to a family of the highest rank, he was excluded, as a stranger, from all power and influence in the state. Discontented with this inferior position, and urged on by his wife, he resolved to leave Tarquinii and remove to Rome. He accordingly set out for Rome, riding in a chariot with his wife, and accompanied by a large train of followers. When they had reached the Janiculus, an eagle seized his cap, and, after carrying it away to a great height, placed it again upon his head. Tanaquil, who was skilled in the Etruscan science of augury, bade her husband hope for the highest honor from this omen. Her predictions were soon verified. The stranger was received with welcome, and he and his followers were admitted to the rights of Roman citizens. He took the name of L. TARQUINIUS, to which Livy adds PRISCUS. His wealth, his courage, and his wisdom gained him the love both of Ancus Marcius and of the people. The former appointed him guardian of his children; and, when he died, the senate and the people unanimously elected Tarquinius to the vacant throne. The reign of Tarquinius was distinguished by great exploits in war and by great works in peace. He defeated the Latins and Sabines; and the latter people ceded to him the town of Collatia, where he placed a garrison under the command of Egerius, the son of his deceased brother Aruns, who took the surname of Collatinus. Some traditions relate that Tarquinius defeated the Etruscans likewise. Among the important works which Tarquinius executed in peace, the most celebrated are the vast sewers by which the lower parts of the city were drained, and which still remain, with not a stone displaced, to bear witness to his power and wealth. He is also said in some traditions to have laid out the Circus Maximus in the valley which had been redeemed from water by the sewers, and also to have instituted the Great or Roman Games, which were henceforth performed in the Circus. The Forum, with its porticoes and rows of shops, was also his work, and he likewise began to surround the city with a stone wall, a work which was finished by his successor, Servius Tullius. The building of the Capitoline temple is, moreover, attributed to the elder Tarquinius; though most traditions ascribe this work to his son, and only the vow to the father. Tarquinius also made some changes in the constitution of the state. He added one hundred new members to the senate, who were called patres minorum gentium, to distinguish them from the old senators, who were now called patres majorum gentium. He wished to add to the three centuries of equites established by Romulus three new centuries, and to call them after himself and two of his friends. His plan was opposed by the augur Attus Navius, who gave a convincing proof that the gods were opposed to his purpose. Vid. NAVIUS. Accordingly, he gave up his design of establishing new centuries, but to each of the former centuries he associated another under the same name, so that henceforth there were the first and second Ramnes, Tities, and Luceres. He increased the number of Vestal Virgins from four to six. Tarquinius was murdered after a reign of thirty-eight years at the instigation of the sons of Ancus Marcius. But the latter did not secure the reward of their crime, for Servius Tullius, with the assistance of Tanaquil, succeeded to the vacant throne. Tarquinius left two sons and two daughters. His two sons, L. Tarquin ius and Aruns, were subsequently married to the two daughters of Servius Tullius. One of his daughters was married to Servius Tullius, and the other to M. Brutus, by whom she became the mother of the celebrated L. Brutus, the first consul at Rome. Servius Tullius, whose life is given under TULLIUS, was murdered, after a reign of forty-four years, by his son-in-law L. Tarquinius, who ascended the vacant throne.—2. L. TARQUINIUS SUPERBUS commenced his reign without any of the forms of election. One of the first acts of his reign was to abolish the rights which had been conferred upon the plebeians by Servius; and, at the same time, all the senators and patricians whom he mistrusted, or whose wealth he coveted, were put to death or driven into exile. He surrounded himself by a body-guard, by means of which he was enabled to do what he liked. His cruelty and tyranny obtained for him the surname of Superbus. But, although a tyrant at home, he raised Rome to great influence and power among the surrounding nations. He gave his daughter in marriage to Octavius Mamilius of Tusculum, the most powerful of the Latin chiefs; and under his sway Rome became the head of the Latin confederacy. He defeated the Volscians, and took the wealthy town of Suessa Pometia, with the spoils of which he commenced the erection of the Capitol which his father had vowed. In the vaults of this temple he deposited the Sibylline books, which the king purchased from a sibyl or prophetess. She had offered to sell him nine books for three hundred pieces of gold. The king refused the offer with scorn. Thereupon she went away and burned three, and then demanded the same price for the six. The king still refused. She again went away and burned three more, and still demanded the same price for the remaining three. The king now purchased the three books, and the sibyl disappeared. He next engaged in war with Gabii, one of the Latin cities, which refused to enter into the league. Unable to take the city by force of arms, Tarquinius had recourse to stratagem. His son, Sextus, pretending to be ill-treated by his father, and covered with the bloody marks of stripes, fled to Gabii. The infatuated inhabitants intrusted him with the command of their troops; whereupon he sent a messenger to his father to inquire how he should deliver the city into his hands. The king, who was walking in his garden when the messenger arrived, made no reply, but kept striking off the heads of the tallest poppies with his stick. Sextus took the hint. He put to death or banished all the leading men of the place, and then had no difficulty in compelling it to submit to his father. In the midst of his prosperity, Tarquinius fell through a shameful outrage committed by one of his sons. Tarquinius and his sons were engaged in besieging Ardea, a city of the Rutulians. Here, as the king's sons, and their cousin Tarquinius Collatinus, the son of Egerius, were feasting together, a dispute arose about the virtue of their wives. As nothing was doing in the field, they mounted their horses to visit their homes by surprise. They first went to Rome, where they surprised the king's daughters at a splendid banquet. They then hastened to Collatia, and there, though it was late in the night, they found Lucretia, the wife of Collatinus, spinning amid her handmaids. The beauty and virtue of Lucretia had fired the evil passions of Sextus. A few days afterward he returned to Collatia, where he was hospitably received by Lucretia as her husband's kinsman. In the dead of night he entered the chamber with a drawn sword: by threatening to lay a slave with his throat cut beside her, whom he would pretend to have killed in order to avenge her husband's honor, he forced her to yield to his wishes. As soon as Sextus had departed, Lucretia sent for her husband and father. Collatinus came, accompanied by L. Brutus; Lucretius, with P. Valerius, who afterward gained the surname of Publicola. They found her in an agony of sorrow. She told them what had happened, enjoined them to avenge her dishonor, and then stabbed herself to death. They all swore to avenge her. Brutus threw off his assumed stupidity, and placed himself at their head. They carried the corpse to Rome. Brutus, who was tribune ceterum, summoned the people, and related the deed of shame. All classes were inflamed with the same indignation. A decree was passed deposing the king, and banishing him and his family from the city. The army, encamped before Ardea, likewise renounced their allegiance to the tyrant. Tarquinius, with his two sons, Titus and Aruns, took refuge at Cære in Etruria. Sextus repaired to Gabii, his own principality, where he was shortly after murdered by the friends of those whom he had put to death. Tarquinius reigned twenty-four years. He was banished B.C. 510. The people of Tarquinius and Veii espoused the cause of the exiled tyrant, and marched against Rome. The two consuls advanced to meet them. A bloody battle was fought, in which Brutus and Aruns, the son of Tarquinius, slew each other. Tarquinius next repaired to Lars Porsena, the powerful king of Clusium, who marched against Rome at the head of a vast army. The history of this memorable expedition is related under PORSENA. After Porsena quitted Rome, Tarquinius took refuge with his son-in-law, Mamilius Octavius of Tusculum. Under the guidance of the latter, the Latin states espoused the cause of the exiled king, and declared war against Rome. The contest was decided by the celebrated battle of the Lake Regillus, in which the Romans gained the victory by the help of Castor and Pollux. Tarquinius himself was wounded, but escaped with his life; his son Sextus is said to have fallen in this battle, though, according to another tradition, as we have already seen, he was slain by the inhabitants of Gabii. Tarquinius Superbus had now no other state to whom he could apply for assistance. He had already survived all his family; and he now fled to Aristobulus at Cumæ, where he died a wretched and childless old man. Such is the story of the Tarquins, according to the ancient writers; but this story must not be received as a real history. The narrative contains numerous inconsistencies and impossibilities. The following is only one instance out of many. We are told that the younger Tarquinius, who was expelled from Rome in mature age, was the son of the king who ascended the throne one hundred and seven years previously in the vigor of life; and Servius Tullius, who married the daughter of Tarquinius Priscus shortly before he ascended the throne, is represented immediately after his accession as the father of two daughters whom he marries to the brothers of his own wife!

TARRACINA (Tarracinensis: now Terracina), more anciently called ANXUR (Anxuræ, Pl.), an ancient town of Latium, situated fifty-eight miles southeast of Rome, on the Via Appia and upon the coast, with a strongly-fortified citadel upon a high hill, on which stood the temple of Jupiter Anxurus. It was probably a Pelasgian town originally; but it afterward belonged to the Volsci, by whom it was called Anxur. It was conquered by the Romans, who gave it the name of Tarracina, and it was made a Roman colony B.C. 329. Three miles west of the town stood the grove of Feronia, with a temple of this goddess. The ancient walls of the citadel of Tarracina are still visible on the slope of Montecchio.

TARRICO (Tarraconensis: now Tarragona), an ancient town on the eastern coast of Spain, situated on a rock seven hundred and sixty feet high, between the River Iberus and the Pyrenees, on the River Tulcis. It was founded by the Massilians, and was made the headquarters of the two brothers P. and Cn. Scipio, in their campaigns against the Carthaginians in the second Punic war. It subsequently became a populous and flourishing town; and Augustus, who wintered here (B.C. 26) after his Cantabrian campaign, made it the capital of one of the three Spanish provinces (Hispania Tarraconensis) and also a Roman colony. Hence we find it called Colonia Tarraconensis, also Col. Victrix Togata and Col. Julia Victrix Tarraconensis. The modern town of Tarragona is built to a great extent with the remains of the ancient city; and Roman inscriptions may frequently be seen imbedded in the walls of the modern houses. The ancient Roman aqueduct, having been repaired in modern times, still supplies the modern city with water; and at a short distance to the northwest of Tarragona, along the sea-coast, is a Roman sepulchre called the tower of the Scipios, although the real place of the burial of the Scipios is quite unknown.

TARSIVS (ὁ Τάρσιος: now Tarza or Balikesiri), a river of Mysia, rising in Mount Temnus, and flowing northeast, through the Miletopolites Icus, into the Maecustus.

TARSUS, TARSOS (Ταρσός, Ταρσοί, Τερσός, Θαρσός: Ταρσεύς, Tarsensis: ruins at Tersus), the chief city of Cilicia, stood near the centre of Cilicia Campestris, on the River Cydnus, about twelve miles above its mouth, in a very large and fertile plain at the foot of Mount Taurus, the chief pass through which (Pylæ Ciliciæ) led down to Tarsus. Its position gave it the full benefit of the natural advantages of a fertile country, and the command of an important highway of commerce. It had also an excellent harbor, twelve miles from the city, which is filled up with sand. The city was of unknown antiquity. Some ascribed its foundation to the Assyrian king Sardanapalus; others to Perseus, in connection with whose legend the name of the city is fancifully derived from a hoof (ταρσός) which the winged horse Pegasus lost here; and others to the Argive chieftain Triptolemus, whose effigy appears on the coins of the city. All that can be determined with certainty seems to be that it was a very ancient city of the Syrians, who were the earliest known inhabitants of this part of Asia Minor, and that it received Greek settlers at an early period. In the time of Xenophon, who gives us the first historical notice of Tarsus, it was the capital of the Cilician prince Synnesis, and was taken by Cyrus. (Compare CILICIA.) At the time of the Macedonian invasion, it was held by the Persian troops, who were about to burn it, when they were prevented by Alexander's arrival. After playing an important part as a military post in the wars of the successors of Alexander, and under the Syrian kings, it became, by the peace between the Romans and Antiochus the Great, the frontier city of the Syrian kingdom on the northwest. As the power of the Seleucidæ declined, it suffered much from the oppression of its governors, and from the wars between the members of the royal family. At the time of the Mithradatic war, it suffered, on the one hand, from Tigranes, who overran Cilicia, and, on the other, from the pirates, who had their strongholds in the mountains of Cilicia Aspera, and made frequent incursions into the level country. From both these enemies it was rescued by Pompey, who made it the capital of the new Roman province of Cilicia, B.C. 66. In the civil war it took part with Cæsar, and assumed, in his honor, the name of JULIOPOLIS. For this the inhabitants were severely punished by Cassius, but were recompensed by Antony who made Tarsus a free city. Under Augustus the city obtained immunity from taxes, through the influence of the emperor's tutor, the Stoic Athenodorus, who was a native of the place. It enjoyed the favor, and was called by the names, of several of the later emperors. It was the scene of important events in the wars with the Persians, the Arabs, and the Turks, and also in the Crusades. The people of Tarsus were celebrated for their mental power, their readiness in repartee, and their fondness for the study of philosophy. Among the most distinguished natives of the place were the Stoics Antipater, Archedemus, Heraclides, Nestor, Zeno, and the two Athenodori; the Academic Nestor; the Epicureans Diogenes, celebrated for his powers of improvising, Lysias, who was for a time tyrant of the city, and Plutades; the tragic poets Dionysides and Bion; the satiric poets Demetrius and Boëthes, who was also a troublesome demagogue; the grammarians Artemidorus, Diodorus, and Hermogenes; the historian Hermogenes; the physicians Herodotus and Philo; and, above all, the apostle Paul, who belonged to one of several families of Jews, who had settled at Tarsus in considerable numbers under the Persian and Syrian kings.

TARTĀRUS (Τάρταρος), son of Æther and Terra (Ge), and by his mother Terra (Ge) the father of the Gigantes Typhoeus and Echidna. In the Iliad Tartarus is a place beneath the earth, as far below Hades as Heaven is above the earth, and closed by iron gates. Later poets describe Tartarus as the place in the lower world in which the spirits of wicked men are punished for their crimes; and sometimes they use the name as synonymous with Hades, or the lower world in general.

TARTĒSSUS (Ταρτησός: Ταρτήσσιος), an ancient town in Spain, and one of the chief settlements of the Phœnicians, probably the same as the Tarshish of Scripture. The position of this town has occasioned much dispute. Most of the ancient writers place it at the mouth of the River Bætis, which, they say, was originally called Tartessus. Others identify it, with more probability, with the city of Carteia on Mount Calpe, the Rock of Gibraltar. The whole country west of Gibraltar was also called TARTĒSSIS.

TARUSCON or TARASCON (Taruseonienses: now Tarascon), a town of the Salyes in Gaul, on the eastern bank of the Rhone, north of Arles, and east of Nemausus.

TARVISIUM (Tarvisanus: now Treviso), a town of Venetia, in the north of Italy, on the River Silis, which became the seat of a bishopric, and a place of importance in the Middle Ages.

TATIĀNUS (Τατιανός), a Christian writer of the second century, was born in Assyria, and was originally a teacher of rhetoric. He was afterward converted to Christianity, according to some accounts, by Justin Martyr, with whom, at any rate, he was very intimate. After Justin's death Tatian quitted Rome, where he had resided for some time, and returned into the East. There he imbibed and promulgated views of a Gnostic character, and gave rise to a new sect, called after him Tatiani. Tatian wrote numerous works, of which there is still extant an Address to the Greeks (Πρὸς Ἕλληνας), in which he points out the superiority of Christianity to the heathen religion. The best edition of this work is by Worth, Oxford, 1700.

TATIŪS, T., king of the Sabines. Vid. ROMULUS.

TATTA (ἡ Τάρτα: now Tuz-Göl), a great salt lake in the centre of Asia Minor, on the Phrygian table-land, on the confines of Phrygia, Galatia, Cappadocia, and Lycaonia. It supplies the whole surrounding country with salt, as it doubtless did in ancient times.

TAUCHIRA or TEUCHIRA (Ταύχειρα, Τεύχειρα:

ruins at Taukra), a colony of Cyrene, on the northwestern coast of Cyrenaica, in Northern Africa. Under the Ptolemies it was called Arsinoc, and was one of the five cities of the Libyan Pentapolis. It became a Roman colony, and was fortified by Justinian. It was a chief seat of the worship of Cybele, who had here a great temple and an annual festival.

TAULANTĪI (Ταυλάντιοι), a people of Illyria, in the neighborhood of Epidamnus, frequently mentioned by the Greek and Roman writers. One of the most powerful kings was Glaucias, a contemporary of Alexander the Great, who fought against the latter monarch, and at a later period afforded an asylum to the infant Pyrrhus, and refused to surrender him to Cassander.

TAUNUS (now Taunus), a range of mountains in Germany, at no great distance from the confluence of the Mœnus (now Main) and the Rhine.

TAURASĪA. Vid. TAURINI.

TAURENTUM and TAURŌIS (Ταυροέντιον, Ταυρόεις, -εντος), a fortress belonging to Massilia, and near the latter city, on the southern coast of Gaul.

TAURI, a wild and savage people in European Sarmatia, who sacrificed all strangers to a goddess whom the Greeks identified with Artemis. An account of this goddess is given elsewhere (p. 111, b). The Tauri dwelt in the peninsula which was called after them Chersonesus Taurica. Vid. CHERSONESUS, No. 2.

TAURIĀNUM (now Tauretto), a town of Bruttium, on the Via Popilia, twenty-three miles southeast of Yibo.

TAURĪNI, a people of Liguria dwelling on the upper course of the Po, at the foot of the Alps. Their chief town was Taurasia, afterward colonized by Augustus, and called Augusta Taurinorum (now Turin).

TAURIS (now Torcola), a small island off the coast of Illyria, between Pharus and Coreya.

TAURISCI, a Celtic people in Noricum, and probably the old Celtic name of the entire population of the country. They were subsequently called Norici by the Romans, after their capital Noriea.

TAUROIS. Vid. TAURENTUM.

TAUROMĒNIUM (Ταυρομένιον: Ταυρομενίτης, Tauromenitanus: now Taormina), a city on the eastern coast of Sicily, situated on Mount Taurus, from which it derived its name, and founded B.C. 358 by Andromachus with the remains of the inhabitants of Naxos, whose town had been destroyed by Dionysius nearly fifty years before. Vid. NAXOS, No. 2. Tauromenium soon became a large and flourishing city; but, in consequence of its espousing the side of Sex. Pompey against Augustus, most of its inhabitants were expelled from the city, and their place supplied by a colony of Roman veterans: hence we find the town called Col. Augusta Tauromenitana. From this time Tauromenium became a place of secondary importance. The hills in the neighborhood produced excellent wine. There are still remains of the ancient town, of which the most important is a splendid theatre cut out of the rock, and capable of holding from thirty thousand to forty thousand spectators, from which we may form some idea of the populousness of Tauromenium.

TAUROSCYTHÆ. Vid. SCYTHOTAURI.

TAURŪNUM (now Semlin), a strongly-fortified town in Pannonia, at the confluence of the Sava and the Danube.

TAURUS, STATILĪUS, a distinguished general of Octavianus. At the battle of Actium, B.C. 31, he commanded the land forces of Octavianus; which were drawn up on the shore. In 29 he defeated the Cantabri, Vaccæi, and Astures. He was consul in 26; and in 16, when the emperor went to Gaul, the government of the city and of Italy was left to Taurus, with the title of præfectus urbi. In the fourth consulship of Augustus, 30, Taurus built an amphitheatre of stone at his own expense. Vid. ROMA, p. 751, a.

TAURUS (ὁ Ταῦρος, from the Aramæan Tur, a high mountain: now Taurus, Ala-Dagh, and other special names), a great mountain chain of Asia. In its widest extent, the name was applied, by the later geographers, to the whole of the great chain which runs through Asia from west to east, forming the southern margin of the great table-land of Central Asia, which it divides from the Mediterranean coast of Asia Minor, from Syria and the Tigris and Euphrates valley, from the low lands on the north shore of the Indian Ocean, and from the two great peninsulas of India. But this is not a common use of the name. In its usual signification, it denotes the mountain chain in the south of Asia Minor, which begins at the Sacrum or Chelidonium Promontorium at the southeast angle of Lycia, surrounds the Gulf of Pamphylia, passing through the middle of Pisidia; then along the southern frontier of Lycaonia and Cappadocia, which it divides from Cilicia and Commagene; thence, after being broken through by the Euphrates, it proceeds almost due east through the south of Armenia, forming the water-shed between the sources of the Tigris on the south, and the streams which feed the Upper Euphrates and the Araxes on the north; thus it continues as far as the southern margin of the Lake Arsis, where it ceases to bear the name of Taurus, and is continued in the chain which, under the names of Niphates, Zagros, &c., forms the northeastern margin of the Tigris and Euphrates valley. This main chain sends off branches which are nearly as important as itself. In the middle of the frontier between Cilicia and Cappadocia, east of the Cilician Gates, the ANTI-TAURUS branches off to the northeast. In the east of Cilicia, the AMANUS goes off to the southwest and south. Immediately east of the Euphrates, a branch proceeds to the southeast, forming, under the name of MASIUS, the frontier between Armenia and Mesopotamia, and dividing the valley of the Upper Tigris from the waters which flow through Mesopotamia into the Euphrates. The Taurus is of moderate height, for the most part steep, and wooded to the summit. Its general character greatly resembles the mountains of Central Germany.

TAVNUM (Ταύσιον, Ταύσιον: now probably ruins at Boghaz Kieui), the capital of the Trocmi, in Galatia, stood on the eastern side of the Halys, but at some distance from the river, and formed the centre of meeting for roads leading to all parts of Asia Minor. It was therefore a place of considerable commercial importance. It had a temple and bronze colossus of Jupiter (Zeus).

ΤΑΞΙΛΑ or ΤΑΞΙΛΑ (τὰ Τάξιλα, Ταξίαλα), an important city of India intra Gangem, stood in a large and fertile plain between the Indus and the Hydaspes, and was the capital of the Indian king Taxiles in the time of Alexander. Its position has not been identified. It is not, as Major Rennell supposed, Attock; and there is no large city remaining which exactly answers to its position.

ΤΑΞΙΛΕΣ (Ταξίλης). 1. An Indian prince or king, who reigned over the tract between the Indus and the Hydaspes at the period of the expedition of Alexander, B.C. 327. His real name was Mophis or Omphis, and the Greeks appear to have called him Taxiles or Taxilas, from the name of his capital city of Taxila, near the modern Attock. On the approach of Alexander he hastened to meet him with valuable presents, and was in consequence confirmed in his kingdom by the Macedonian monarch.—2. A general in the service of Mithradates the Great, and one of those in whom he reposed the highest confidence.

ΤΑΨΓΕΤΕ (Ταψύετη), daughter of Atlas and Pleione, one of the Pleiades, from whom Mount Taygetus in Laconia is said to have derived its name. By Zeus (Jupiter) she became the mother of Lacedæmon and of Eurotas.

ΤΑΨΓΕΤΟΣ, or ΤΑΨΓΕΤΟΝ, or ΤΑΨΓΕΤΑ (Ταψύγετος, Ταψύγετον, τὰ Ταψύγετα, pl.), a lofty range of mountains of a wild and savage character, separating Laconia and Messenia, and extending from the frontiers of Arcadia down to the Promontorium Tænarum. Its highest points were called Talétus and Evóras, about three miles south of Sparta. Ταψύγετος is said to have derived its name from the nymph Taygete.

TEANUM (Teanensis). 1. APŪLUM (near Ponte Rotto), a town of Apulia, on the River Frento, and the confines of the Frentani, eighteen miles from Larinum.—2. SIDICINUM (now Teano), an important town of Campania, and the capital of the Sidicini, situated on the northern slope of Mons Massicus and on the Via Prænestina, six miles west of Cales. It was made a Roman colony by Augustus; and in its neighborhood were some celebrated medicinal springs.

TEARUS (Τέαρος: now Teara, Deara, or Dere), a river of Thrace, the waters of which were useful in curing cutaneous diseases. Herodotus relates that it rises from thirty-eight fountains, all flowing from the same rock, some warm and others cold. It falls into the Contadescus; this into the Agrianes; and the latter again into the Hebrus.

TEATE (Teatinus: now Chieti), the capital of the Marrucini, situated on a steep hill on the River Aternus, and on the road from Aternum to Corfinium.

TEEMESSA (Τέκμησσα), the daughter of the Phrygian king Telectas, whose territory was ravaged by the Greeks during a predatory excursion from Troy. Teemessa was taken prisoner, and was given to Ajax, the son of Telamon, by whom she had a son, Eurysaces.

TESSŌN (Τέκμων), a town of the Molossi in Epirus.

TECTÆUS and ANGEΛΙŌN (Τεκταῖος καὶ Ἄγγελιον), early Greek statuaries, who are always mentioned together. They were pupils of Dipœus and Scyllis, and instructors of Callon of Ægina; and therefore they must have flourished about B.C. 548.

TECTŌSĀGES (Τεκτώσαγες). 1. In Gallia. Vid.
VOLCÆ.—2. In Asia Minor. Vid. GALATIA.

TECUM or TICIS (now Tecli), a river in Gallia Narbonensis, in the territory of the Sardones, called Illiberis by the Greeks, from a town of this name upon the river.

TEGANŪS, a river in Illyricum, separating Iapydia and Liburnia.

TEGĒA (Τέγαια). 1. (Τεγεάτης: now Piali), an important city of Arcadia, and the capital of the district ΤΕΓΕΑΤΙΣ (Τεγεαίτις), which was bounded on the east by Argolis and Laconia, on the south by Laconia, on the west by Mænalía, and on the north by the territory of Mantinea. It was one of the most ancient towns of Arcadia, and is said to have been founded by Tegates, the son of Lycaon. It was formed out of nine small townships, which were united into one city by Aleus, who was thus regarded as the real founder of the city. At a later time we find Tegea divided into four tribes, each of which possessed a statue of Apollo Agyieus, who was especially honored in Tegea. The Tegeatæ long resisted the supremacy of Sparta; and it was not till the Spartans discovered the bones of Orestes that they were enabled to conquer this people. The Tegeatæ sent three thousand men to the battle of Platææ, in which they were distinguished for their bravery. They remained faithful to Sparta in the Peloponnesian war; but after the battle of Leuctra they joined the rest of the Arcadians in establishing their independence. During the wars of the Achæan league Tegea was taken both by Cle-omenes, king of Sparta, and Antigonus Doson, king of Macedonia, and the ally of the Achæans.
It continued to be a place of importance in the time both of Strabo and Pausanias. Its most splendid public building was the temple of Minerva (Athena), which was the largest and most magnificent building in the Peloponnesus.
It was erected soon after B.C. 394, in place of a more ancient temple of this goddess, which was burned down in this year. The architect was Scopas, and the sculptures in the pediments were probably by the hand of Scopas himself.—
2. A town in Crete, said to have been founded by Agamemnon.

TELĀMŌN (Τελαμών), son of Æacus and Endeis, and brother of Peleus. Having assisted Peleus in slaying their half-brother Phocus (vid.
PELEUS), Telamon was expelled from Ægina, and came to Salamis. Here he was first married to Glauce, daughter of Cychreus, king of the island, on whose death Telamon became king of Salamis. He afterward married Peribœa or Eribœa, daughter of Alcathous, by whom he became the father of Ajax, who is hence frequently called Telamoniades and Telamōnis heros. Telamon himself was one of the Calydo-nian hunters and one of the Argonauts. He was also a great friend of Hercules, whom he joined in his expedition against Laomedon of Troy, which city he was the first to enter. He there erected an altar to Hercules Callinicus or Alexicacus. Hercules, in return, gave to him Theanira or Hesione, a daughter of Laomedon, by whom he became the father of Teucer and Trambelus. On this expedition Telamon and Hercules also fought against the Meropes in Cos, on account of Chalciopé, the beautiful daughter of Eurypylius, the king of the Meropes, and against the giant Alcioneus, on the isthmus of Corinth. Telamon likewise accompanied Hercules on his expedition against the Ani-zons, and slew Melanippe.

TELĀMŌN (now Telamone), a town and harbor of Etruria, a few miles south of the River Uni-bro, said to have been founded by Telamon on his return from the Argonautic expedition. In his neighborhood a great victory was gained over the Gauls in B.C. 225. It was here that Marius landed on his return from Africa in 87.
Telamon was undoubtedly the port of the great Etruscan city recently discovered in its neighborhood, which is supposed to be the ancient Vetulonia.

[TELAMONIADES. Vid. TELAMON.]

TELCĪNES (Τελχίνες), a family of a tribe, said to have been descended from Thalassa or Poseidon. They are represented in three different aspects: 1. As cultivators of the soil and ministers of the gods. As such they came from Crete to Cyprus, and from thence to Rhodes, where they founded Camirus, Ialysus, and Lin-dus. Rhodes, which was named after them Telchinia, was abandoned by them, because they foresaw that the island would be inundated. They then spread in different directions.
Lycus went to Lycia, where he built the temple of the Lycian Apollo. This god had been worshipped by them at Lindus, and Juno (Hera) at Ialysus and Camirus. Nymphs, also, are called after them Telchinia. Neptune (Poseidon) was intrusted to them by Rhea, and they brought him up in conjunction with Caphira, a daughter of Oceanus. Rhea, Apollo, and Jupiter (Zeus), however, are also described as hostile to the Telchines. Apollo is said to have assumed the shape of a wolf, and to have thus destroyed the Telchines, and Jupiter (Zeus) to have overwhelmed them by an inundation. 2. As sorcerers and envious demons. Their very eyes and aspect are said to have been destructive. They had it in their power to bring on hail, rain, and snow, and to assume any form they pleased;
they further mixed Stygian water with sulphur, in order thereby to destroy animals and plants.
3. As artists, for they are said to have invented useful arts and institutions, and to have made images of the gods. They worked in brass and iron, made the sickle of Saturn (Cronos) and the trident of Neptune (Poseidon). This last feature in the character of the Telchines seems to have been the reason of their being classed with the Idæan Dactyls; and Strabo even states that those of the nine Rhodian Telchines who accompanied Rhea to Crete, and there brought up the infant Jupiter (Zeus), were called Curetes.

TELĒBŌE. Vid. TAPHLE.

TELĒBŌAS (Τηλεβόας), a river of Armenia Major, falling into the Euphrates; probably identical with the ARSANIAS.

[TELEBOAS, a centaur, son of Ixion and Nephele.]

TELECLĪDES (Τηλεκλειδής), a distinguished Athenian comic poet of the Old Comedy, flourished about the same time as Crates and Cratinus, and a little earlier than Aristophanes. He was an earnest advocate of peace, and a great admirer of the ancient manners of the age of Themistocles. [The few fragments remaining of his comedies are contained in Meineke's Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. i., p. 130-133, edit. minor.]

TELECLUS (Τηλέκλος), king of Sparta, eighth of the Agids, and son of Archelaus. He was slain by the Messenians, in a temple of Diana (Artemis) Limnatis, on the borders. His death was the immediate occasion of the first Messenian war, B.C. 743.

TELEGŌNUS (Τηλέγονος), son of Ulysses and Circe. After Ulysses had returned to Ithaca, Circe sent out Telegonus in search of his father. A storm cast his ship on the coast of Ithaca, and, being pressed by hunger, he began to plunder the fields. Ulysses and Telemachus, being informed of the ravages caused by the stranger, went out to fight against him; but Telegonus ran Ulysses through with a spear which he had received from his mother. At the command of Minerva (Athena), Telegonus, accompanied by Telemachus and Penelope, went to Circe in Ææa, there buried the body of Ulysses, and married Penelope, by whom he became the father of Italus. In Italy Telegonus was believed to have been the founder of the towns of Tusculum and Præneste. He left a daughter Mamilia, from whom the family of the Mamilii traced their descent.

TELEMACHUS (Τηλέμαχος), son of Ulysses and Penelope. He was still an infant when his father went to Troy; and when the latter had been absent from home nearly twenty years, Telemachus went to Pylos and Sparta to gather information concerning him. He was hospitably received by Nestor, who sent his own son to conduct Telemachus to Sparta. Menelaus also received him kindly, and communicated to him the prophecy of Proteus concerning Ulysses. From Sparta Telemachus returned home; and on his arrival there he found his father, whom he assisted in slaying the suitors. According to some accounts, Telemachus became the father of Perseptolis either by Polycaste, the daughter of Nestor, or by Nausicaa, the daughter of Alcinous. Others relate that he was induced by Minerva (Athena) to marry Circe, and became by her the father of Latinus; or that he married Cassiphone, a daughter of Circe, but in a quarrel with his mother-in-law slew her, for which he was in his turn killed by Cassiphone. One account makes Telemachus the founder of Clusium in Etruria.

TELEMUS (Τηλέμος), son of Eurymus, and a celebrated soothsayer.

[TELEON (Τελέων), an Athenian, a son of Ion, husband of Zeuxippe, and father of the Argonaut Butes. From him the Teleontes (Τελεοντες) derived their name.]

TELEPHASSA (Τηλέφασσα), wife of Agenor, and mother of Europa, Cadmus, Phœnix, and Cilix. She, with her sons, went out in search of Europa, who had been carried off by Jupiter (Zeus); but she died on the expedition, and was buried by Cadmus.

TELEPHUS (Τηλέφος), son of Hercules and Auge, the daughter of King Aleus of Tegea. As soon as he was born he was exposed by his grandfather, but was reared by a hind (ελαφος), and educated by King Corythus in Arcadia

On reaching manhood, he consulted the Delphic oracle to learn his parentage, and was ordered to go to King Teuthras in Mysia. He there found his mother, and succeeded Teuthras on the throne of Mysia. He married Laodice or Astyoche, a daughter of Priam; and he attempted to prevent the Greeks from landing on the coast of Mysia. Bacchus (Dionysus), however, caused him to stumble over a vine, whereupon he was wounded by Achilles. Being informed by an oracle that the wound could only be cured by him who had inflicted it, Telephus repaired to the Grecian camp; and as the Greeks had likewise learned from an oracle that without the aid of Telephus they could not reach Troy, Achilles cured Telephus by means of the rust of the spear by which he had been wounded. Telephus, in return, pointed out to the Greeks the road which they had to take.

TELEPTE. Vid. THALA.

TELESIA (Telesinus: now Telese), a town in Samnium, on the road from Allifæ to Beneventum, taken by Hannibal in the second Punic war, and afterward retaken by the Romans. It was colonized by Augustus with a body of veterans. It was the birth-place of Pontius, who fought against Sulla, and who was hence surnamed Telesinus.

TELESILLA (Τηλέσιλλα), of Argos, a celebrated lyric poetess and heroine, flourished about B.C. 510. In the war of Argos against Sparta she not only encouraged her countrymen by her lyre and song, but she took up arms at the head of a band of her countrywomen, and greatly contributed to the victory which they gained over the Spartans. In memory of this exploit, her statue was erected in the temple of Venus (Aphrodite) at Argos, with the emblems of a poetess and a heroine; Mars (Ares) was worshipped in that city as a patron deity of women; and the prowess of her female associates was commemorated by the annual festival called Hybristica. Only two complete verses of her poetry are extant, [edited by Bergk, in his Poeta Lyrici Græci, p. 742-3.]

TELESINUS, PONTIUS. Vid. PONTIUS.

[TELESINUS, C. LUCIUS, consul A.D. 66 with Suetonius Paulinus. He was banished by Domitian for his love of philosophy.]

TELESTAS or TELESTES (Τελέστας, Τελέστης), of Selinus, a distinguished poet of the later Athenian dithyramb, flourished B.C. 393. A few lines of his poetry are preserved by Athenæus, [edited by Bergk in his Poeta Lyrici Græci, p. 864-6.]

TELETHRUS (Τηλέθριος), a mountain in the north of Eubœa, near Histiaea.

[TELETHUSA, wife of Ligdus and mother of Iphis. Vid. IPHIS, No. 4.]

[TELEUTIAS (Τελευτίας), a Spartan, was brother on the mother's side to Agesilaus II., by whose influence he was appointed to the command of the fleet, in B.C. 393, in the war of the Lacedæmonians against Corinth and the other states of the hostile league. After various successful enterprises in different quarters, he was sent as general against the Olynthians in B.C. 352; but, while making an assault on this city, he was slain in a sally of the inhabitants.]

TELLENÆ, a town in Latium between the later Via Ostiensis and the Via Appia, destroyed by Ancus Marcius.

[TELLIAS (Τελλίας). 1. Of Elis, a distinguished seer, was one of the commanders of the Phocians in a war against the Thessalians a few years before the invasion of Greece by Xerxes. After the defeat of the Thessalians, his statue was erected by the Phocians in the temple at Delphi.—2. One of the generals of the Syracusans when their city was besieged by the Athenians during the Peloponnesian war.]

TELLUS. Vid. ΓΕΛΑ.

TELMESSUS or TELMISSUS (Τελμησσός, Τελμισσός: Τελμησσεύς, Τελμισσεύς). 1. (Ruins at Méi, the port of Macri), a city of Lycia, near the borders of Caria, on a gulf called Telmissicus Sinus, and close to the promontory Telmissis.—2. A town of Caria, sixty stadia (six geographical miles) from Halicarnassus, celebrated for the skill of its inhabitants in divination. It is often identified with the former place.

TELO MARTIUS (now Toulon), a port-town of Gallia Narbonensis, on the Mediterranean, is rarely mentioned by the ancient writers, and did not become a place of importance till the downfall of the Roman empire.

TELÓS (Τήλος: Τήλιος: now Telos or Piskoli), a small island of the Carpathian Sea, one of the Sporades, lay off the coast of Caria, southwest of the mouth of the Sinus Doridis, between Rhodes and Nisyrus. It was also called Agathussa.

TELPHUSSA. Vid. THELPUSA.

TEMENIDÆ. Vid. TEMENUS.

TEMENITES (Τεμενίτης), a surname of Apollo, derived from his sacred temenus in the neighborhood of Syracuse.

TEMENUS (Τήμενος), son of Aristomachus, was one of the Heraclidæ who invaded Peloponnesus. After the conquest of the peninsula, he received Argos as his share. His descendants, the Temenidæ, being expelled from Argos, are said to have founded the kingdom of Macedonia, whence the kings of Macedonia called themselves Temenidæ.

TEMESA or TEMPSA (Temesæus or Tempsanus: now Torre del Lupi), a town in Bruttium, on the Sinus Terinæus, was one of the most ancient Ausonian towns in the south of Italy, and is said to have been afterward colonized by a body of Ætoliens under Thoas. At a still later time it was successively in the possession of the Locrians, of the Bruttians, and finally of the Romans, who colonized it in B.C. 196. Some of the ancients identified this town with Temese, mentioned by Homer as celebrated for its copper mines; but the Homeric town was probably in Cyprus.

TEMNUS. 1. (τὸ Τήμνον ὄρος: now Morad or Ak Dagh), a mountain of Mysia, extending eastward from Ida to the borders of Phrygia, and dividing Mysia into two parts. It contains the sources of the Mæcestus, Mysius, Cæicus, and Evenus.—2. (Now Menimen? or Guzal-Hisar?), a city of Æolis, in the northwest of Lydia (some say in Mysia), on the western bank of the Hermus, thirty miles south of Cyme. It was nearly destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, and in that of Titus (Pliny's time) it no longer existed.

TEMPE (Τέμπε, contraction of Τέμπεα), a beautiful and romantic valley in the north of Thessaly, between Mount Olympus and Ossa, through which the Peneus escapes into the sea. The lovely scenery of this glen is frequently described by the ancient poets and declaimers; and it was also celebrated as one of the favorite haunts of Apollo, who had transplanted his laurel from this spot to Delphi. The whole valley is rather less than five miles in length, and opens gradually to the east into a spacious plain. Tempe is also of great importance in history, as it is the only pass through which an army can invade Thessaly from the north. In some parts the rocks on each side of the Peneus approach so close to each other as only to leave room between them for the stream; and the road is obliged to be cut out of the rock in the narrowest point. Tempe is the only channel through which the waters of the Thessalian plain descend into the sea; and it was the common opinion in antiquity that these waters had once covered the country with a vast lake, till an outlet was formed for them by some great convulsion in nature, which rent the rocks of Tempe asunder. So celebrated was the scenery of Tempe that its name was given to any beautiful valley. Thus we find a Tempe in the land of the Sabines near Reate, through which the River Velinus flowed; and also a Tempe in Sicily, through which the River Helorus flowed, hence called by Ovid Tempe Heloria.

[TEMPSA. Vid. TEMESA.]

TEMÿRA, a town in Thrace, at the foot of a narrow mountain pass, between Mount Rhodope and the coast.

TENCÿRI or TENCHÿRI, a people of Germany, dwelling on the Rhine, between the Rur and the Sieg, south of the Usipetes, in conjunction with whom their name usually occurs. They crossed the Rhine together with the Usipetes, with the intention of settling in Gaul; but they were defeated by Cæsar with great slaughter, and those who escaped took refuge in the territories of their southern neighbors the Sygambri. The Tenceri afterward belonged to the league of the Cherusci, and at a still later period they are mentioned as a portion of the confederacy of the Franks.

[TENEÆ (Τενεα: Τενεάτης: now Chiliomodí), a small town in the interior of Corinthia, said to have been colonized by some Trojan captives brought from Tenedos by the Greeks. It was celebrated as the place where Œdipus was brought up by his supposed father Polybus. Its inhabitants could likewise boast that the greater part of the colonists who followed Archias to Syracuse were their fellow-citizens. Having submitted to the Roman power without resistance, it escaped the destruction that overwhelmed Corinth.]

TENÿDOS or TENÿDUS (Τένεδος: Τενέδιος: now Tenedos), a small island of the Ægean Sea, off the coast of Troas, of an importance very disproportionate to its size, on account of its position near the mouth of the Hellespont, from which it is about twelve miles distant. Its distance from the coast of the Troad was forty stadia (four geographical miles), and from Lesbos fifty-six stadia: its circuit was eighty stadia. It was called, in early times, by the names of Talydna, Leucophrys, Phœnice, and Lyrnessus. The mythical derivation of its usual name is from Tenes, son of Cycnus. It had an Æolian city of the same name, with two harbors. Its name appears in several proverbs, such as Τενέδιος πέλεκυς, Τ. ἄνθρωπος, Τ. αὐλήτης, Τ. κακόν. It appears in the legend of the Trojan war as the station to which the Greeks withdrew their fleet, in order to induce the Trojans to think that they had departed, and to receive the wooden horse. In the Persian war it was used by Xerxes as a naval station. It afterward became a tributary ally of Athens, and adhered to her during the whole of the Peloponnesian war, and down to the peace of Antalcidas, by which it was surrendered to the Persians. At the Macedonian conquest the Tenedians regained their liberty. In the war against Philip III., Attalus and the Romans used Tenedos as a naval station, and in the Mithradatic war Jucullus gained a naval victory over Mithradates off the island. About this time the Tenedians placed themselves under the protection of Alexandrea Troas. The island was celebrated for the beauty of its women.

TENES OR TENNES (Τέννης), son of Cycnus and Proclea, and brother of Hemitea. Cycnus was King of Colonæ in Troas. His second wife was Philonome, who fell in love with her stepson; but as he repulsed her advances, she accused him to his father, who threw both his son and daughter in a chest into the sea. But the chest was driven on the coast of the island of Leucophrys, of which the inhabitants elected him king, and which he called Tenedos, after his own name. Cycnus at length heard of the innocence of his son, killed Philonome, and went to his children in Tenedos. Here both Cycnus and Tenes were slain by Achilles. Tenes was afterward worshipped as a hero in Tenedos.

TĒNOS (Τήνος; Τήνιος; now Tino), a small island in the Ægean Sea, southeast of Andros and north of Delos. It is about fifteen miles in length. It was originally called Hydrussa (Ἵδροῦσσα) because it was well watered, and Ophiussa (Ὀφιοῦσσα) because it abounded in snakes. It possessed a town of the same name on the site of the modern S. Nicolo. It had also a celebrated temple of Neptune (Poseidon), which is mentioned in the time of the Emperor Tiberius. The wine of Tenos was celebrated in antiquity, and is still valued at the present day.

TENTYRA (τὰ Τένυρα; Τεντυρίτης, Tentyrites; ruins at Denderah), a city of Upper Egypt, on the western bank of the Nile, between Abydos and Coptos, with celebrated temples of Athor (the Egyptian Venus), Isis, and Typhon. Its people were distinguished for their hatred of the crocodile; and upon this and the contrary propensities of the people of Ombi, Juvenal founds his fifteenth satire. Vid. OMBI. There are still magnificent remains of the temples of Athor and of Isis: in the latter was found the celebrated Zodiac, which is now preserved at Paris.

TĒOS (ἡ Τέως; Τήϊος, Tēius; now Sighajik), one of the Ionian cities on the coast of Asia Minor, renowned as the birth-place of Anacreon and Hecateus. It stood on the southern side of the isthmus which connects the peninsula of Mount Mimas with the main land of Lydia, at the bottom of the bay between the promontories of Corycenn and Myonnesus. It was a flourishing sea-port, until, to free themselves from the Persian yoke, most of its inhabitants retired to Abdera. It was still, however, a place of importance in the time of the Roman emperors. It had two harbors, and a celebrated temple of Bacchus (Dionysus).

TERĒDON (Τερηδών; now probably Dorah), a city of Babylonia, on the western side of the Tigris, below its junction with the Euphrates, and not far from its mouth. It was a great emporium for the traffic with Arabia. It is no doubt the DIRIDOTIS (Διριδοτις) of Arrian.

TERENTĪA. 1. Wife of M. Cicero, the orator, to whom she bore two children, a son and daughter. She was a woman of sound sense and great resolution; and her firmness of character was of no small service to her weak and vacillating husband in some important periods of his life. On his banishment in B.C. 58, Terentia by her letters endeavored to keep up Cicero's fainting spirits, and she vigorously exerted herself on his behalf among his friends in Italy. During the civil war, however, Cicero was offended with her conduct, and divorced her in 46. Shortly afterward he married Publilia, a young girl of whose property he had the management. Terentia could not have been less than fifty at the time of her divorce, and therefore it is not probable that she married again. It is related, indeed, by Jerome, that she married Sallust the historian, and subsequently Messala Corvinus; but these marriages are not mentioned by any other writer, and may therefore be rejected. Terentia is said to have attained the age of one hundred and three.—2. Also called TERENTILLA, the wife of Mæcenas, and also one of the favorite mistresses of Augustus. The intrigue between Augustus and Terentia is said to have disturbed the good understanding which subsisted between the emperor and his minister, and finally to have occasioned the retirement of the latter.

TERENTIĀNUS MAURUS, a Roman poet, probably lived at the end of the first or the beginning of the second century, under Nerva and Trajan, and was a native of Africa, as his surname, Maurus, indicates. There is still extant a poem of Terentianus, entitled De Literis, Syllabis, Pedibus, Metris, which treats of prosody and the different kinds of metre with much elegance and skill. The work is printed by Santen and Van Lennep, Traj. ad Rhen., 1825, and by Lachmann, Berol., 1836.

TERENTIUS AFER, P., usually called TERENCE, the celebrated comic poet, was born at Carthage B.C. 195. By birth or purchase he became the slave of P. Terentius Lucanus, a Roman senator. A handsome person and promising talents recommended Terence to his master, who afforded him the best education of the age, and finally manumitted him. On his manumission, according to the usual practice, Terence assumed his patron's nomen, Terentius, having been previously called Publius or Pūblijor. The Andria was the first play offered by Terence for representation. The curule ædiles referred the piece to Cæcilius, then one of the most popular play-writers at Rome. Unknown and meanly elad, Terence began to read from a low stool his opening scene. A few verses showed the elder poet that no ordinary writer was before him, and the young aspirant, then in his twenty-seventh year, was invited to share the couch and supper of his judge. This reading of the Andria, however, must have preceded its performance nearly two years, for Cæcilius died in 168, and it was not acted till 166. Meanwhile, copies were in circulation, envy was awakened, and Lucius Lavinius, a veteran, and not very successful play-writer, began his unwearied attacks on the dramatic and personal character of the author. The Andria was successful, and, aided by the accomplishments and good address of Terence himself, was the means of introducing him to the most refined and intellectual circles of Rome. His chief patrons were Lælius and the younger Scipio, both of whom treated him as an equal, and are said even to have assisted him in the composition of his plays. After residing some years at Rome, Terence went to Greece, and while there he translated one hundred and eight of Menander's comedies. He never returned to Italy, and we have various accounts of his death. According to one story, after embarking at Brundisium, he was never heard of more; according to others, he died at Stymphalus in Arcadia, in Leucadia, or at Patræ in Achaia. One of his biographers said he was drowned, with all the fruits of his sojourn in Greece, on his home-passage. But the prevailing report was, that his translations of Menander were lost at sea, and that grief for their loss caused his death. He died in the thirty-sixth year of his age, in 159, or in the year following. He left a daughter, but nothing is known of his family. Six comedies are all that remain to us; and they are probably all that Terence produced. His later versions of Menander were, in all likelihood, from their number and the short time in which they were made, merely studies for future dramas of his own. His plays were brought forward at the following seasons. 1. Andria, "the Woman of Andros," so called from the birth-place of Glycerium, its heroine, was first represented at the Megalesian Games, on the fourth of April, 166. 2. Hecyra, "the Step-Mother," produced at the Megalesian Games in 165. 3. Heauton-timoroumenos, "the Self-Tormentor," performed at the Megalesian Games, 163. 4. Eunuchus, "the Eunuch," played at the Megalesian Games, 162. It was at the time the most popular of Terence's comedies. 5. Phormio, was performed in the same year with the preceding, at the Roman Games on the first of October. 6. Adelphi, "the Brothers," was acted for the first time at the funeral games of L. Æmilius Paullus, 160. The comedies of Terence have been translated into most of the languages of modern Europe, and, in conjunction with Plautus, were, on the revival of the drama, the models of the most refined play-writers. The ancient critics are unanimous in ascribing to Terence immaculate purity and elegance of language, and nearly so in denying him vis comica. But it should be recollected that four of Terence's six plays are more or less sentimental comedies, in which vis comica is not a primary element. Moreover, Terence is generally contrasted with Plautus, with whom he had very little in common. Granting to the elder poet the highest genius for exciting laughter, and a natural force which his rival wanted, there will remain to Terence greater consistency of plot and character, closer observation of generic and individual distinctions, deeper pathos, subtler wit, more skill and variety in metre and in rhythm, and a wider command of the middle region between sport and earnest. It may be objected that Terence's superiority in these points arises from his copying his Greek originals more servilely. But no servile copy is an animated copy, and we have corresponding fragments enough of Menander to prove that Terence retouched and sometimes improved his model. In summing up his merits we ought not to omit the praise which has been universally accorded him—that, although a foreigner and a freedman, he divides with Cicero and Cæsar the palm of pure Latinity. The best editions of Terence are by Bentley, Cantab., 1726, 4to, Amstel., 1727, 4to, Lips., 1791, 8vo; by Westerhovius, Hagæ Com., 1727, 2 vols. 4to; and by Stallbaum, Lips., 1830, 8vo.

TĒRES (Τῆρης). 1. King of the Odryæ and father of SITALCES, was the founder of the great Odrysian monarchy.—2. King of a portion of Thrace in the time of Philip of Macedon.

TĒREUS (Τῆρεὺς), son of Mars (Ares), king of the Thracians in Daulis, afterward Phocis. Pandion, king of Attica, who had two daughters, Philomela and Procne, called in the assistance of Tereus against some enemy, and gave him his daughter Procne in marriage. Tereus became by her the father of Itys, and then concealed her in the country, that he might thus marry her sister Philomela, whom he deceived by saying that Procne was dead. At the same time he deprived Philomela of her tongue. Ovid (Met., vi., 565) reverses the story by stating that Tereus told Procne that her sister Philomela was dead. Philomela, however, soon learned the truth, and made it known to her sister by a few words which she wove into a peplos. Procne thereupon killed her own son Itys, and served up the flesh of the child in a dish before Tereus. She then fled with her sister. Tereus pursued them with an axe, and when the sisters were overtaken, they prayed to the gods to change them into birds. Procne accordingly became a nightingale, Philomela a swallow, and Tereus a hoopoe. According to some, Procne became a swallow, Philomela a nightingale, and Tereus a hawk.

TĒRGESTE (Tergestinus: now Trieste), a town of Istria, on a bay in the northeast of the Adriatic Gulf, called after it Tergestinus Sinus. It was at first an insignificant place, with which the Romans became acquainted in their wars with the Iapydes; but under the Roman dominion it became a town of considerable commercial importance. It was made a Roman colony by Vespasian.

TĒRIA (Τῆρηίης ὄρος αἰπύ, Hom.), a mountain of Mysia, probably in the neighborhood of Cyzicus. Some identified it with a hill near Lamp-sacus, on which was a temple of Cybele.

TĒRIAS (now Guaralunga), a river in Sicily, near Leontini.

[TERIBAZUS or TIRIBAZUS (Τριβάζος, Τιριβάζος), a Persian, high in the favor of Artaxerxes II., and when he was present, as Xenophon says, no one else had the honor of helping the monarch mount his horse. At the time of the retreat of the Ten Thousand in B.C. 401, Teribazus was satrap of Western Armenia, and, when the Greeks had reached the River Teleboas on the frontier of his territory, he himself rode up to their camp and proposed a truce, on condition that both parties should abstain from molesting each other, the Greeks taking only what they needed while in his country. Teribazus, however, did not intend to keep his word, but waited to assail the Greeks in a mountain pass, which the latter, on learning his design, secured, and having, besides, attacked the camp of the satrap, put the barbarians to flight. Subsequently he aided the Lacedæmonians until superseded in B.C. 392, and again after his restoration in B.C. 388. Various charges having been brought against him, he was put on his trial and triumphantly acquitted. After this Artaxerxes promised him Amastris, and afterward Atossa, in marriage, and having each time broken his word, Teribazus excited an insurrection, but was betrayed, and slain by the king's guards.]

TERIDATES. Vid. TIRIDATES.

TERINA (Terinæus: now St. Eufemia), a town on the western coast of Bruttium, from which the Sinus Terinæus derived its name. It was a Greek city founded by Croton, and was originally a place of some importance; but it was destroyed by Hannibal in the second Punic war.

[TERINÆUS SINUS (now Gulf of St. Eufemia). Vid. TERINA.]

TERIÖLIS or TERIÖLA CASTRA, a fortress in Rætia, which has given its name to the country of the Tyrol. Its site is still occupied by the Castle of Tyrol, lying above Meran, to the north of the road.

TERMANTIA, TERMES, or TERMESUS (Termestinus or Termesius: now Ermita de nuestra Señora de Tiermes), a town of the Arevaci in Hispania Tarraconensis, originally situated on a steep hill, the inhabitants of which frequently resisted the Romans, who compelled them, in consequence, to abandon the town, and build a new one on the plain, B.C. 98.

TERMERA (τὰ Τέρμερα), a Dorian city in Caria, on the Promontory Termerium (Τερμέριον), the northwestern headland of the Sinus Ceramicus. Under the Romans it was a free city.

TERMESSUS (Τερμησσός), and other forms: ruins probably at Shenet), a city of Pisidia, high up on the Taurus, in the pass through which the River Catarrhaetes flowed. It was almost impregnable by nature and art, so that even Alexander did not attempt to take it.

TERMINUS, a Roman divinity presiding over boundaries and frontiers. His worship is said to have been instituted by Numa, who ordered that every one should mark the boundaries of his landed property by stones consecrated to Jupiter, and at these boundary-stones every year sacrifices should be offered at the festival of the Terminalia. The Terminus of the Roman state originally stood between the fifth and sixth mile-stone on the road toward Laurentum, near a place called Festi. Another public Ter- minus stood in the temple of Jupiter in the Capitol. It is said that when this temple was to be founded, all the gods gave way to Jupiter and Juno, with the exception of Terminus and Juventas, whose sanctuaries the auguries would not allow to be removed. This was taken as an omen that the Roman state would remain ever undiminished and young, and the chapels of the two divinities were enclosed within the walls of the new temple. It is, however, probable that the god Terminus is no other than Jupiter himself, in the capacity of protector of boundaries.

TERPANDER (Τέρπανδρος), the father of Greek music, and through it of lyric poetry. He was a native of Antissa in Lesbos, and flourished between B.C. 700 and 650. He removed from Lesbos to Sparta, and there introduced his new system of music, and established the first musical school or system that existed in Grece. He added three strings to the lyre, which before his time had only four strings, thus making it seven-stringed. His music produced a powerful effect upon the Spartans, and he was held in high honor by them during his life and after his death. He was the first who obtained a victory in the musical contests at the festival of the Carnæa (676). We have only three or four fragments of the remains of his poetry.

[TERPIUS, father of the celebrated minstrel Phemius, who is hence called by Homer Terpiades (Τερπιάδης).]

TERPSICHÖRE (Τερψιχόρα), one of the nine Muses, presided over the choral song and dancing. Vid. MUSÆ.

TERRA. Vid. GÆA.

TERRACINA, more usually written TARRACINA. Vid. TARRACINA.

[TERRASIDIUS, T., one of Cæsar's officers in Gaul, was sent to the Unelli to obtain corn in B.C. 57, but detained a prisoner by them.]

[TERTIA, a female actress, and one of the favorite mistresses of Verres in Sicily.]

TERTULLIANUS, Q. SEPTIMIUS FLORENS, usually called TERTULLIAN, the most ancient of the Latin fathers now extant. Notwithstanding the celebrity which he has always enjoyed, our knowledge of his personal history is extremely limited, and is derived almost exclusively from a succinct notice by St. Jerome. From this we learn that Tertullian was a native of Carthage, the son of a proconsular centurion (an officer who appears to have acted as a sort of aid-de-camp to provincial governors); that he flourished chiefly during the reigns of Septimius Severus and of Caracalla; that he became a presbyter, and remained orthodox until he had reached the term of middle life, when, in consequence of the envy and ill-treatment which he experienced on the part of the Roman clergy, he went over to the Montanists, and wrote several books in defence of those heretics; that he lived to a great age, and was the author of many works. His birth may be placed about A.D. 160, and his death about 240. The most interesting of his numerous works is his Apologia, or defence of Christianity. It was written at Carthage, probably during the reign of Severus. The writings of Tertullian show that he was a man of varied learning; but his style is rough, abrupt, and obscure, abounding in far-fetched metaphors and extravagant hyperboles. The best editions of the complete works of Tertullian are the edit. of Venice, 1744, fol., and that by Semler and Schutz, 6 vols. 8vo, Hal., 1770. There is a good edition of the Apologeticus by Havercamp, 8vo, Lugd. Bat., 1710, [and of the Apolog. and Ad Nationes by Oehler, Halle, 1849.]

TESTA, C. TREBĀTIUS, a Roman jurist, and a contemporary and friend of Cicero. He was recommended by Cicero to Julius Cæsar during his proconsulship of Gaul, and he followed Cæsar's party after the civil war broke out. Cicero dedicated to Trebatius his book of Topica, which he wrote to explain to him this book of Aristotle. Trebatius enjoyed considerable reputation under Augustus as a lawyer. Horace addressed to him the first satire of the second book. Trebatius was a pupil of Q. Cornelius Maximus, and master of Labeo. He wrote some books De Jure Civili and De Religionibus. He is often cited in the Digest, but there is no direct excerpt from his writings.

TĒTHYS (Τηθύς), daughter of Cælus (Uranus) and Terra (Gæa), and wife of Oceanus, by whom she became the mother of the Oceanides and of the numerous river-gods. She also educated Juno (Hera), who was brought to her by Rhea.

[TETRĀPOLIS, a union of four cities or states; of these the most important were, 1. The Attic Tetropolis (Τετράπολις τῆς Ἀττικῆς), a district of Attica lying northward from Athens, composed of CENOË, Marathon, Probalinthus, and Tricorythus, founded by Xuthus. 2. The Dorian.—Vid. DORIS. 3. The Syrian (τῆς Συρίας, or Σελευκίς), composed of Antiochia, Apamea, Laodicea, and Seleucia.]

TĒTRICA, a mountain on the frontiers of Picenum and the land of the Sabines, belonging to the great chain of the Apennines.

TETRICUS, C. PĒSUVIUS, one of the Thirty Tyrants, and the last of the pretenders who ruled Gaul during its separation from the empire under Gallienus and his successor. He reigned in Gaul from A. D. 267 to 274, and was defeated by Aurelian in 274 at the battle of Chalons, on which occasion he was believed to have betrayed his army to the emperor. It is certain that although Tetricus, along with his son, graced the triumph of the conqueror, he was immediately afterward treated with the greatest distinction by Aurelian.

TEUCER (Τεύκρος). 1. Son of the river-god Scamander by the nymph Idæa, was the first king of Troy, whence the Trojans are sometimes called Teuceri. Dardanus of Samothrace came to Teucer, received his daughter Batea or Arisbe in marriage, and became his successor in the kingdom. According to others, Dardanus was a native prince of Troy, and Scamander and Teucer immigrated into Troas from Crete, bringing with them the worship of Apollo Smintheus.—2. Son of Telamon and Hesione, was a step-brother of Ajax, and the best archer among the Greeks at Troy. On his return from the Trojan war, Telamon refused to receive him in Salamis, because he had not avenged the death of his brother Ajax. Teucer thereupon sailed away in search of a new home, which he found in the island of Cyprus, which was given to him by Belus, king of Sidon. He there founded the town of Salamis, and married Eune, the daughter of Cyprus, by whom he became the father of Asteria.

TEUCRI. Vid. MYSIA, TROAS.

TEUMESSUS (Τευμησσός), a mountain in Bœotia, near Hypatus, and close to Thebes, on the road from the latter place to Chalcis. It was from this mountain that Bacchus (Dionysus), enraged with the Thebans, sent the fox which committed such devastations in their territory.

TEUTA (Τεύτρα), wife of Agron, king of the Illyrians, assumed the sovereign power on the death of her husband, B. C. 231. In consequence of the injuries inflicted by the piratical expeditions of her subjects upon the Italian merchants, the Romans sent two ambassadors to demand satisfaction, but she not only refused to comply with their demands, but caused the younger of the two brothers to be assassinated on his way home. War was now declared against her by the Romans. The greater part of her territory was soon conquered, and she was obliged to sue for peace, which was granted to her (B. C. 228) on condition of her giving up the greater part of her dominions.

[TEUTAMIAS (Τευταμίας), a king of Larissa in Thessaly, and father of the Pelasgian Lethus.]

TEUTHRANIA. Vid. MYSIA.

TEUTHRAS (Τεύθρας). 1. An ancient king of Mysia, who married, or, according to other accounts, adopted as his daughter Auge, the daughter of Aleus. He also received with hospitality her son Telephus, when the latter came to Asia in search of his mother. He was succeeded in the kingdom of Mysia by Telephus. Vid. TELEPHUS. The fifty daughters of Teuthras, given as a reward to Hercules, are called by Ovid Teuthrantia turba.—[2. A Greek warrior of Magnesia, slain by Hector before Troy.—3. A companion of Æneas, slain in battle against the Rutuli in Italy.]

TEUTHRAS (Τεύθρας: now probably Demirji-Dagh), a mountain in the Mysian district of Teuthrania, a southwestern branch of Temnus. It contains a celebrated pass, called the Iron Gates (Demir Kapa), through which all caravans between Smyrna and Brusa (the ancient Prusias) must needs pass.

TEUTOBURGIENSIS SALTUS, a range of hills in Germany, covered with wood, extending north of the Lippe, from Osnabrück to Paderborn, and known in the present day by the name of the Teutoburger Wald or Lippische Wald. It is celebrated on account of the defeat and destruction of Varus and three Roman legions by the Germans under Arminius, A. D. 9.

[TEUTOMATUS, son of Olloviceon, king of the Nitiobriges, joined Vercingetorix with a body of cavalry: being suddenly attacked by Cæsar's soldiers while reposing in his tent, he with difficulty escaped half naked from the camp.]

TEUTONES or TEUTŌNI, a powerful people in Germany, who invaded Gaul and the Roman dominions along with the Cimbri at the latter end of the second century B. C. The history of their invasion is given under CIMBRI. The name Teutones is not a collective name of the whole people of Germany, as some writers have supposed, but only of one particular tribe, who probably dwelt on the coast of the Baltic, near the Cimbri.

THABOR, TABOR, or ATABYRUM (Ἀταβύριον, LXX. : Ἰταβύριον, Joseph. : now Jebel Tur), an isolated mountain at the eastern end of the plain of Esdraelon in Galilee, between seventeen hundred and eighteen hundred feet high. Its summit was occupied by a fortified town under the Maccabees and the Romans. This is quite enough to prove that it can not be, as a local tradition asserts, the lonely mountain on which our Saviour was transfigured, although the tradition has been bolstered up by a variation of the modern name of the mountain, which makes it Jebel Nur, i. e., the Mountain of Light.

THABRACA or TABRACA (Θάβρακα, Τάβραρα : now Tabarca), a city of Numidia, at the mouth of the River Tusca, and on the frontier toward Zeugitana.

THAÏS (Θαΐς), a celebrated Athenian courtesan, who accompanied Alexander the Great on his expedition into Asia. Her name is best known from the story of her having stimulated the conqueror, during a great festival at Persepolis, to set fire to the palace of the Persian kings; but this anecdote, immortalized as it has been by Dryden's famous ode, is in all probability a mere fable. After the death of Alexander, Thaïs attached herself to Ptolemy Lagi, by whom she became the mother of two sons, Leontiscus and Lagus, and of a daughter, Irene.

THALA (Θάλα), a great city of Numidia, mentioned by Sallust and other writers, and probably identical with TELEPTE (Τελεπτή) or THELEPTE, a city in the south of Numidia, seventy-one Roman miles northwest of Capsa. It was the southwestern frontier town toward the desert, and was connected by a road with Tacape on the Syrtis Minor. It is probably to be identified with Ferianah, and with the large ruins near it called Medinah el Kadima.

THALAMÆ (Θαλάμαι). 1. A fortified town in Elis, situated in the mountains above Pylos.—2. A town in Messenia, probably a little to the east of the River Panisus.

THALASSIUS, TALASSIUS, or TALASSIO, a Roman senator of the time of Romulus. At the time of the rape of the Sabine women, when a maiden of surpassing beauty was carried off for Thalassius, the persons conducting her, in order to protect her against any assaults from others, exclaimed "for Thalassius." Hence, it is said, arose the wedding shout with which a bride at Rome was conducted to the house of her bridegroom.

THALES (Θαλής), the Ionic philosopher, and one of the Seven Sages, was born at Miletus about B.C. 636, and died about 546, at the age of ninety, though the exact date neither of his birth nor of his death is known. He is said to have predicted the eclipse of the sun, which happened in the reign of the Lydian king Alyattes; to have diverted the course of the Halys in the time of Cræsus; and later, in order to unite the Ionians when threatened by the Persians, to have instituted a federal council in Teos. In the lists of the Seven Sages his name seems to have stood at the head; and he displayed his wisdom both by political sagacity and by prudence in acquiring wealth. He was also one of the founders in Greece of the study of philosophy and mathematics. In the latter science, however, we find attributed to him only proofs of propositions which belong to the first elements of geometry, and which could not possibly have enabled him to calculate the eclipses of the sun and the course of the heavenly bodies. He may, however, have obtained his knowledge of the higher branches of mathematics from Egypt, which country he is said to have visited. Thales maintained that water is the origin of things, meaning thereby that it is water out of which every thing arises and into which every thing resolves itself. Thales left no works behind him.

THALES or THALĒTAS (Θαλής, Θαλήτας), the celebrated musician and lyric poet, was a native of Gortyna in Crete. On the invitation of the Spartans he removed to Sparta, where, by the influence of his music, he appeased the wrath of Apollo, who had visited the city with a plague, and composed the factions of the citizens, who were at enmity with each other. He founded the second of the musical schools which flourished at Sparta, the first having been established by Terpander. The date of Thaletas is uncertain, but he may probably be placed shortly after Terpander. Vid. TERPANDER.

THALIA (Θάλεια, Θαλία). 1. One of the nine Muses, and, at least in later times, the Muse of Comedy. Vid. MUSÆ.—2. One of the Nereides.—3. One of the Charites or Graces.

THALLO. Vid. HORÆ.

THALNA or TALNA, M'. JUVENTIUS, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 170, prætor 167, and consul 163, when he subdued the Corsicans. The senate voted him a thanksgiving, and he was so overcome with joy at the intelligence, which he received as he was offering a sacrifice, that he dropped down dead on the spot.

[THALPIUS (Θάλπιος), son of Eurytus, one of the suitors of Helen, and therefore compelled to take part in the expedition against Troy; he led the Epei in ten vessels.]

THAMBES (Θάμβης, Θάμβης), a mountain in the east of Numidia, containing the source of the River Rubricatus.

THAMYRĒNI or THAMYRĒTÆ (Θαμυρηνοί, Θαμυρῆται), a people of Arabia Felix, on the coast of the Sinus Arabicus, in the neighborhood of Themond.

THAMYRIS or THAMYRAS (Θάμυρις). 1. An ancient Thracian bard, was a son of Philammon and the nymph Argiope. In his presumption he challenged the Muses to a trial of skill, and, being overcome in the contest, was deprived by them of his sight and of the power of singing. He was represented with a broken lyre in his hand.—[2. A Trojan warrior, companion of Æneas after the fall of Troy; slain by Turnus in Italy.]

THANĀTOS. Vid. MORS.

THAPSA, a city of Northern Africa, probably identical with RUSCADA.

THAPSACUS (Θάψακος : in the Old Testament, Thipsach : an Aramean word signifying a ford: Θαψακρός : ruins at the ford of El-Hamman, near Rakkah), a city of Syria, in the province of Chalybonitis, on the left bank of the Euphrates, two thousand stadia south of Zeugma, and fifteen parasangs from the mouth of the River Chaboras (the Araxes of Xenophon). At this place was the usual and, for a long time, the only ford of the Euphrates, by which a passage was made between Upper and Lower Asia.

THAPSUS (Θάψος: Θάψις). 1. A city on the eastern coast of Sicily, on a peninsula of the same name (now Isola degli Magnisi), founded by Dorian colonists from Megara, who soon abandoned it in order to found Megara Hybla. —2. (Ruins at Demas), a city on the eastern coast of Byzacena, in Africa Propria, where Cæsar finally defeated the Pompeian army, and finished the civil war, B.C. 46.

THASOS OR THASUS (Θάσος: Θάσιος: now Thaso or Tasso), an island in the north of the Ægean Sea, off the coast of Thrace, and opposite the mouth of the River Nestus. It was at a very early period taken possession of by the Phœnicians on account of its valuable gold mines. According to tradition, the Phœnicians were led by Thasus, son of Poseidon or Agenor, who came from the East in search of Europa, and from whom the island derived its name. Thasos was afterward colonized by the Parians, B.C. 708, and among the colonists was the poet Archilochus. Besides the gold mines in Thasos itself, the Thasians possessed still more valuable gold mines at Scape Hyle, on the opposite coast of Thrace. The mines in the island had been most extensively worked by the Phœnicians, but even in the time of Herodotus they were still productive. The clear surplus revenue of the Thasians before the Persian conquest amounted to two hundred, and sometimes even to three hundred talents (£46,000, £66,000), of which sum the mines in Scape Hyle produced eighty talents, and those in the island somewhat less. They possessed at this time a considerable territory on the coast of Thrace, and were one of the richest and most powerful tribes in the north of the Ægean. They were subdued by the Persians under Mardonius, and subsequently became part of the Athenian maritime empire. They revolted, however, from Athens in B.C. 465, and after sustaining a siege of three years, were subdued by Cimon in 463. They were obliged to surrender to the Athenians all their possessions in Thrace, to destroy their fortifications, to give up their ships, and to pay a large tribute for the future. They again revolted from Athens in 411, and called in the Spartans, but the island was again restored to the Athenians by Thrasybulus in 407. In addition to its gold mines, Thasos was celebrated for its marble and its wine. The soil, however, is otherwise barren, and merits, even at the present day, the description applied to it by the poet Archilochus, "an ass's back-bone, overspread with wild wood." The principal town in the island, also called Thasos, was situated on the northern coast upon three eminences. There are still a few remains of the ancient town.

[THAUMACI (now Dhomoko), a city of Phthiotis, in Thessaly, situated on a lofty and perpendicular rock, which rendered it a place of great strength. The ancients derived its name from the singularity of its position, and the astonishment it caused when first reached (Θαυμακός, from θαύμα, "wonder").]

THAUMAS (Θαύμας), son of Pontus and Terra (Ge), and by the Oceanid Electra, the father of Iris and the Harpies. Hence Iris is called ed Thaumantias, Thaumantis, and Thaumantia virgo.

THEÆTÉTUS (Θεαίτητος), an Athenian, the son of Euphronius of Sunium, is introduced as one of the speakers in Plato's Theætetus and Sophistes, in which dialogues he is spoken of as a noble and well-disposed youth, and ardent in the pursuit of knowledge, especially in the study of geometry.

THEAGÈNES (Θεαγένης). 1. Tyrant of Megara, obtained his power about B.C. 630, having espoused the part of the commonalty against the nobles. He was driven out before his death. He gave his daughter in marriage to Cylon. Vid. CYLON. —2. A Thasian, the son of Timosthenes, renowned for his extraordinary strength and swiftness. He gained numerous victories at the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games, and is said to have won thirteen hundred crowns. He flourished B.C. 480.

THÉANO (Θεανώ), daughter of Cisseus, wife of Antenor, and priestess of Minerva (Athena) at Ilium.

THEANO (Θεανώ), the most celebrated of the female philosophers of the Pythagorean school, appears to have been the wife of Pythagoras, and the mother by him of Telanges, Mnesarchus, Myia, and Arignote; but the accounts respecting her were various. Several letters are extant under her name; and, though they are not genuine, they are valuable remains of a period of considerable antiquity.

THEBÆ (Θήβαι), in the poets sometimes THEBÆ (Θήβη, Dor. Θήβα), afterward Diospōlis Magna (Διόσπολις μεγάλη, i. e., Great City of Jove), in Scripture, No or No AMMON, was the capital of Thebais or Upper Egypt, and, for a long time, of the whole country. It was reputed the oldest city of the world. It stood in about the centre of the Thebaid, on both banks of the Nile, above Coptos, and in the Nomos Coptites. It is said to have been founded by Æthiopians; but this is, of course, only a form of the tradition which represents the civilization of Upper Egypt as having come down the Nile. Others ascribed its foundation to Osiris, who named it after his mother, and others to Busiris. It appears to have been at the height of its splendor, as the capital of Egypt, and as a chief seat of the worship of Ammon, about B.C. 1600. The fame of its grandeur had reached the Greeks as early as the time of Homer, who describes it, with poetical exaggeration, as having a hundred gates, from each of which it could send out two hundred war-chariots fully armed. Homer's epithet of "Hundred-Gated" (ἐκατόμυλοι) is repeatedly applied to the city by later writers. Its real extent was calculated by the Greek writers at one hundred and forty stadia (fourteen geographical miles) in circuit; and in Strabo's time, when the long transference of the seat of power to Lower Egypt had caused it to decline greatly, it still had a circuit of eighty stadia. That these computations are not exaggerated, is proved by the existing ruins, which extend from side to side of the valley of the Nile, here about six miles wide; while the rocks which bound the valley are perforated with tombs. These ruins, which are, perhaps, the most magnificent in the world, inclose within their site the four modern villages of Carnac, Luxor, Me- dinet Abou, and Gournou; the two former on the eastern, and the two latter on the western side of the river. They consist of temples, colossi, sphinxes, and obelisks, and, on the western side, of tombs, many of which are cut in the rock and adorned with paintings, which are still as fresh as if just finished. These ruins are remarkable alike for their great antiquity and for the purity of their style. It is most probable that the great buildings were all erected before the Persian invasion, when Thebes was taken by Cambyses, and the wooden habitations burned; after which time it never regained the rank of a capital city; and thus its architectural monuments escaped that Greek influence which is so marked in the edifices of Lower Egypt. Among its chief buildings, the ancient writers mention the ΜΕΜΝΟΝΙΧ, with the two colossi in front of it, the temple of Ammon, in which one of the three chief colleges of priests was established, and the tombs of the kings. To describe the ruins and discuss their identification would far exceed the limits of this article.

THEBÆ, in Europe. 1. (Θῆβαι, in poetry Θῆβη, Doric Θῆβα: Θηβαίος, fem. Θηβαίς, Thēbanus, fem. Thēbāis: now Theba, Turkish Stiva), the chief city in Bœotia, was situated in a plain southeast of the Lake Helice and northeast of Plataeæ. Its acropolis, which was an oval eminence of no great height, was called ΚΑΔΜΕΑ (Καδμεία), because it was said to have been founded by Cadmus, the leader of a Phœnician colony. On each side of this acropolis is a small valley, running up from the Theban plain into the low ridge of hills by which it is separated from that of Plataeæ. Of these valleys, the one to the west is watered by the Dirce, and the one to the east by the Ismenus; both of which, however, are insignificant streamlets, though so celebrated in ancient story. The greater part of the city stood in these valleys, and was built some time after the acropolis. It is said that the fortifications of the city were constructed by Amphion and his brother Zethus; and that, when Amphion played his lyre, the stones moved of their own accord and formed the wall. The territory of Thebes was called ΤΗΒΑΪΣ (Θηβαίς), and extended eastward as far as the Eubæan Sea. No city is more celebrated in the mythical ages of Greece than Thebes. It was here that the use of letters was first introduced from Phœnicia into Western Europe. It was the reputed birth-place of the two great divinities, Dionysus and Hercules. It was also the native city of the great seer Tiresias, as well as of the great musician Amphion. It was the scene of the tragic fate of Oedipus, and of one of the most celebrated wars in the mythical annals of Greece. Polynices, who had been expelled from Thebes by his brother Eteocles, induced six other heroes to espouse his cause, and marched against the city; but they were all defeated and slain by the Thebans, with the exception of Adrastus, Polynices and Eteocles falling by each other's hands. This is usually called the war of the "Seven against Thebes." A few years afterward, "the Epigoni," or descendants of the seven heroes, marched against Thebes to revenge their fathers' death; they took the city and razed it to the ground. Thebes is not mentioned by Homer in the catalogue of the Greek cities which fought against Troy, as it was probably supposed not yet to have recovered from its devastation by the Epigoni. It appears, however, at the earliest historical period as a large and flourishing city; and it is represented as possessing seven gates, the number assigned to it in the ancient legends. Its government, after the abolition of monarchy, was an aristocracy, or, rather, an oligarchy, which continued to be the prevailing form of government for a long time, although occasionally exchanged for that of a democracy. Toward the end of the Peloponnesian war, however, the oligarchy finally disappears, and Thebes appears under a democratical form of government from this time till it became with the rest of Greece subject to the Romans. The Thebans were from an early period inveterate enemies of their neighbors, the Athenians. Their hatred of the latter people was probably one of the reasons which induced them to desert the cause of Grecian liberty in the great struggle against the Persian power. In the Peloponnesian war the Thebans naturally espoused the Spartan side, and contributed not a little to the downfall of Athens. But, in common with the other Greek states, they soon became disgusted with the Spartan supremacy, and joined the confederacy formed against Sparta in B.C. 394. The peace of Antalcidas in 387 put an end to hostilities in Greece; but the treacherous seizure of the Cadmea by the Lacedæmonian general Phœbidas in 382, and its recovery by the Theban exiles in 379, led to a war between Thebes and Sparta, in which the former not only recovered its independence, but forever destroyed the Lacedæmonian supremacy. This was the most glorious period in the Theban annals; and the decisive defeat of the Spartans at the battle of Leuctra in 371 made Thebes the first power in Greece. Her greatness, however, was mainly due to the pre-eminent abilities of her citizens, Epaminondas and Pelopidas; and with the death of the former at the battle of Mantinea in 362, she lost the supremacy which she had so recently gained. Soon afterward Philip of Macedon began to exercise a paramount influence over the greater part of Greece. The Thebans were induced, by the eloquence of Demosthenes, to forget their old animosities against the Athenians, and to join the latter in protecting the liberties of Greece; but their united forces were defeated by Philip, at the battle of Chæronea, in 338. Soon after the death of Philip and the accession of Alexander, the Thebans made a last attempt to recover their liberty, but were cruelly punished by the young king. The city was taken by Alexander in 336, and was entirely destroyed, with the exception of the temples, and the house of the poet Pindar; six thousand inhabitants were slain, and thirty thousand sold as slaves. In 316 the city was rebuilt by Cassander, with the assistance of the Athenians. In 290 it was taken by Demetrius Polioretetes, and again suffered greatly. Diœarehus, who flourished about this time, has left us an interesting account of the city. He describes it as about seventy stadia (nearly nine miles) in circumference, in form nearly circular, and in appearance somewhat gloomy. He says that it is plentifully provided with water, and contains better gardens than any other city in Greece; that it is most agreeable in summer, on account of its plentiful supply of cool and fresh water, and its large gardens; but that in winter it is very unpleasant, being destitute of fuel, exposed to floods and cold winds, and frequently visited by heavy falls of snow. He further represents the people as proud and insolent, and always ready to settle disputes by fighting rather than by the ordinary course of justice. It is supposed that the population of the city at this time may have been between fifty thousand and sixty thousand souls. After the Macedonian period Thebes rapidly declined in importance; and it received its last blow from Sulla, who gave half of its territory to the Delphians. Strabo describes it as only a village in his time; and Pausanias, who visited it in the second century of the Christian era, says that the Cadmea alone was then inhabited. The modern town is also confined to this spot, and the surrounding country is covered with a confused heap of ruins.—2. Surnamed ΡΗΘΗΟΤΙΣ (Θῆβαι αὐ φθιώτιδες), an important city of Thessaly in the district Phthiotis, at a short distance from the coast, and with a good harbor.—3. A town in Lucania, rarely mentioned.

THEBÆIS. Vid. ÆGYPTUS.

THEBE (Θῆβη Ὑποπλακίη), a city of Mysia, on the wooded slope of Mount Placus, destroyed by Achilles. It was said to have been the birth-place of Andromache and Chryseis. It existed in the historical period, but by the time of Strabo it had fallen into ruin, and by that of Pliny it had vanished. Its site was near the head of the Gulf of Adramyttium, where a beautiful tract of country was named, after it, Thebanus campus (τὸ Θῆβης πεδῖον).

[THECHES MOUNTS (Θήχης, a summit of the range called PARYADRES: now Κόρ Τάγῃ), a mountain on the borders of Pontus and Colchis, from which the Greek troops of Cyrus under Xenophon first got a view of the sea (Euxine).]

THECOA OR TEKOA (Θεκῶα, Joseph.: Θεκωέ, LXX.: ruins at Tekua), a city of Judæa, on the edge of the desert, six miles south of Bethlehem, and twelve miles south of Jerusalem, was the birth-place of the prophet Amos. (Vid. also 2 Chron., xi.) In the time of Jerome it was a mere village.

THELPUSSA OR TELPHUSSA (Θέλπουσα, Τέλφουσα: Τελφούσιος: ruins near Vanena), a town in Arcadia, on the River Ladon.

THEMAN, a city of the Edomites, in Arabia Petræa, whose people were celebrated for their wisdom.

THEMIS (Θέμις), daughter of Cælus (Uranus) and Terra (Ge), was married to Jupiter (Zeus), by whom she became the mother of the Horæ, Eunomia, Dice (Astræa), Irene, and of the Mæ-ræ. In the Homeric poems, Themis is the personification of the order of things established by law, custom, and equity, whence she is described as reigning in the assemblies of men, and as, convening, by the command of Jupiter (Zeus), the assembly of the gods. She dwells in Olympus, and is on friendly terms with Juno (Hera). She is also described as a prophetic divinity, and is said to have been in possession of the Delphic oracle as the successor of Terra (Ge), and previous to Apollo. Nymphs believed to be daughters of Jupiter (Zeus) and Themis lived in a cave on the River Eridanus, and the Hesperides also are called daughters of Jupiter (Zeus) and Themis. She is often represented on coins resembling the figure of Minerva (Athena) with a cornucopia and a pair of scales.

THEMISCYRA (Θεμισκυρα), a plain on the coast of Pontus, extending east of the River Iris, beyond the Thermodon, celebrated from very ancient times as the country of the Amazons. It was well watered, and rich in pasture. At the mouth of the Thermodon was a city of the same name, which had been destroyed by the time of Augustus. It is doubtful whether the present Thermæ occupies its site. Vid. THERMODON.

THEMISON (Θεμισών), a celebrated Greek physician, and the founder of the medical sect of the Methodici, was a native of Laodicea in Syria, and lived in the first century B.C. He wrote several medical works, but of these only the titles and a few fragments remain. The physician mentioned by Juvenal was probably a contemporary of the poet, and consequently a different person from the founder of the Methodici.

THEMISTIUS (Θεμιστίος), a distinguished philosopher and rhetorician, was a Paphlagonian, and flourished, first at Constantinople and afterward at Rome, in the reigns of Constantius, Julian, Jovian, Valens, Gratian, and Theodosius. He enjoyed the favor of all those emperors, and was promoted by them to the highest honors of the state. After holding various public offices, and being employed on many important embassies, he was made prefect of Constantinople by Theodosius, A.D. 384. So great was the confidence reposed in him by Theodosius, that, though Themistius was a heathen, the emperor intrusted his son Arcadius to the tutorship of the philosopher, 387. The life of Themistius probably did not extend beyond 390. Besides the emperors, he numbered among his friends the chief orators and philosophers of the age, Christian as well as heathen. Not only Libanius, but Gregory of Nazianzus also was his friend and correspondent, and the latter, in an epistle still extant, calls him the "king of arguments." The orations (πολιτικοὶ λόγοι) of Themistius, extant in the time of Photius, were thirty-six in number, of which thirty-three have come down to us in the original Greek, and one in a Latin version. The other two were supposed to be lost, until one of them was discovered by Cardinal Maio, in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, in 1816. The best edition of the Orations is by Dindorf, Lips., 1832, 8vo.

THEMISTOCLES (Θεμιστοκλής), the celebrated Athenian, was the son of Neocles and Abrotonon, a Thracian woman, and was born about B.C. 514. In his youth he had an impetuous character; he displayed great intellectual power combined with a lofty ambition and desire of political distinction. He began his career by setting himself in opposition to those who had most power, among whom Aristides was the chief. The fame which Miltiades acquired by his generalship at Marathon made a deep impression on Themistocles; and he said that the trophy of Miltiades would not let him sleep. His rival Aristides was ostracized in 483, to which event Themistocles contributed; and from this time he was the political leader in Athens. In 481 he was archon eponymus. It was about this time that he persuaded the Athenians to employ the produce of the silver mines of Laurium in building ships, instead of distributing it among the Athenian citizens. His great object was to draw the Athenians to the sea, as he was convinced that it was only by their fleet that Athens could repel the Persians and obtain the supremacy in Greece. Upon the invasion of Greece by Xerxes, Themistocles was appointed to the command of the Athenian fleet; and to his energy, prudence, foresight, and courage the Greeks mainly owed their salvation from the Persian dominion. Upon the approach of Xerxes, the Athenians, on the advice of Themistocles, deserted their city, and removed their women, children, and infirm persons to Salamis, Ægina, and Træzen; but, as soon as the Persians took possession of Athens, the Peloponnesians were anxious to retire to the Corinthian isthmus. Themistocles used all his influence in inducing the Greeks to remain and fight with the Persians at Salamis, and with the greatest difficulty persuaded the Spartan commander Eurybiades to stay at Salamis. But as soon as the fleet of Xerxes made its appearance, the Peloponnesians were again anxious to sail away; and when Themistocles saw that he should be unable to persuade them to remain, he sent a faithful slave to the Persian commanders, informing them that the Greeks intended to make their escape, and that the Persians had now the opportunity of accomplishing a noble enterprise, if they would only cut off the retreat of the Greeks. The Persians believed what they were told, and in the night their fleet occupied the whole of the channel between Salamis and the main land. The Greeks were thus compelled to fight; and the result was the great and glorious victory, in which the greater part of the fleet of Xerxes was destroyed. This victory, which was due to Themistocles, established his reputation among the Greeks. On his visiting Sparta, he was received with extraordinary honors by the Spartans, who gave Eurybiades the palm of bravery, and to Themistocles the palm of wisdom and skill, with a crown of olive, and the best chariot that Sparta possessed. The Athenians began to restore their ruined city after the barbarians had left the country, and Themistocles advised them to rebuild the walls, and to make them stronger than before. The Spartans sent an embassy to Athens to dissuade them from fortifying their city, for which we can assign no motive except a miserable jealousy. Themistocles, however, went on an embassy to Sparta, where he amused the Spartans with lies till the walls were far enough advanced to be in a state of defence. It was upon his advice, also, that the Athenians fortified the port of Piræus. The influence of Themistocles does not appear to have survived the expulsion of the Persians from Greece and the fortification of the ports. He was probably justly accused of enriching himself by unfair means, for he had no scruples about the way of accomplishing an end. A story is told that after the retreat of the fleet of Xerxes, when the Greek fleet was wintering at Pagasæ, Themistocles told the Athenians in the public assembly that he had a scheme to propose which was beneficial to the state, but could not be expounded to the many. Aristides was named to receive the secret, and to report upon it. His report was that nothing could be more profitable than the scheme of Themistocles, but nothing more unjust; and the Athenians abided by the report of Aristides. In 471 Themistocles was ostracized from Athens, and retired to Argos. After the discovery of the treasonable correspondence of Pausanias with the Persian king, the Lacedæmonians sent to Athens to accuse Themistocles of being privy to the design of Pausanias. Thereupon the Athenians sent off persons with the Lacedæmonians with instructions to arrest Themistocles (466). Themistocles, hearing of what was designed against him, first fled from Argos to Coreyra, and then to Epirus, where he took refuge in the house of Admetus, king of the Molossi, who happened to be from home. Admetus was no friend to Themistocles, but his wife told the fugitive that he would be protected if he would take their child in his arms and sit on the hearth. The king soon came in, and, respecting his suppliant attitude, raised him up, and refused to surrender him to the Lacedæmonian and Athenian agents. Themistocles finally reached the coast of Asia in safety. Xerxes was now dead (465), and Artaxerxes was on the throne. Themistocles went up to visit the king at his royal residence; and on his arrival he sent the king a letter, in which he promised to do the king a good service, and prayed that he might be allowed to wait a year, and then to explain personally what brought him there. In a year he made himself master of the Persian language and the Persian usages, and, being presented to the king, he obtained the greatest influence over him, and such as no Greek ever before enjoyed; partly owing to his high reputation and the hopes that he gave to the king of subjecting the Greeks to the Persians. The king gave him a handsome allowance, after the Persian fashion; Magnesia supplied him with bread nominally, but paid him annually fifty talents. Lampsacus supplied wine, and Myus the other provisions. Before he could accomplish any thing he died; some say that he could not perform his promise to the king. A monument was erected to his memory in the Agora of Magnesia, which place was within his government. It is said that his bones were secretly taken to Attica by his relations, and privately interred there. Themistocles died in 449, at the age of sixty-five. Themistocles undoubtedly possessed great talents as a statesman, great political sagacity, a ready wit, and excellent judgment: but he was not an honest man; and, like many other clever men with little morality, he ended his career unhappily and ingloriously, an exile and a traitor too. Twenty-one letters attributed to Themistocles are spurious.

THEMISTOGENES (Θεμιστογένης), of Syracuse, is said by Xenophon (Hell., iii., 1, § 2), to have written a work on the Anabasis of Cyrus; but most modern writers, following the statement of Plutarch, suppose that Xenophon really refers to his own work, to which he prefixed the name of Themistogenes.

THEOCLES (Θεοκλής), son of Hegylus, was a Lacedæmonian statuary, and one of the disciples of Dipænus and Scyllis. He therefore flourished about B.C. 550.

THEOCLYMENUS (Θεοκλύμενος), son of Polyphides of Hyperasia, and a descendant of Melampus, was a soothsayer, and, in consequence of a murder, was obliged to take to flight, and came to Telemachus when the latter quitted Sparta to return to Ithaca.

THEOCOSMOS (Θεόκοσμος), of Megara, a statuary, flourished about B.C. 435-430.

THEOCRITUS (Θεόκριτος). 1. Of Chios, an orator, sophist, and perhaps an historian, in the time of Alexander the Great. He was contemporary with Ephorus and Theopompus; and the latter was his fellow-citizen and political opponent, Theopompus belonging to the aristocratic and Macedonian, and Theocritus to the democratic and patriotic party. Theocritus is said to have also given deep offence to Alexander by the sarcastic wit, which appears to have been the chief cause of his celebrity, and which at last cost him his life. He was put to death by Antigonus, in revenge for a jest upon the king's single eye. None of his works are extant with the exception of two or three epigrams, among which is a very bitter one upon Aristotle.— 2. The celebrated bucolic poet, was a native of Syracuse, and the son of Praxagoras and Philinna. He visited Alexandria during the latter end of the reign of Ptolemy Soter, where he received the instruction of Philetas and Asclepiades, and began to distinguish himself as a poet. His first efforts obtained for him the patronage of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who was associated in the kingdom with his father, Ptolemy Soter, in B.C. 285, and in whose praise, therefore, the poet wrote the fourteenth, fifteenth, and seventeenth Idyls. At Alexandria he became acquainted with the poet Aratus, to whom he addressed his sixth Idyl. Theocritus afterward returned to Syracuse, and lived there under Hiero II. It appears from the sixteenth Idyl that Theocritus was dissatisfied, both with the want of liberality on the part of Hiero in rewarding him for his poems, and with the political state of his native country. It may therefore be supposed that he devoted the latter part of his life almost entirely to the contemplation of those scenes of nature and of country life, on his representations of which his fame chiefly rests. Theocritus was the creator of bucolic poetry as a branch of Greek, and, through imitators, such as Virgil, of Roman literature. The bucolic idyls of Theocritus are of a dramatic and mimetic character. They are pictures of the ordinary life of the common people of Sicily; whence their name, ιδὴν, εἰδύλλια. The pastoral poems and romances of later times are a totally different sort of composition from the bucolics of Theocritus, who knows nothing of the affected sentiment, the pure innocence, and the primeval simplicity, which have been ascribed to the imaginary shepherds of a fictitious Arcadia. He merely exhibits simple and faithful pictures of the common life of the Sicilian people, in a thoroughly objective, although truly poetical spirit. Dramatic simplicity and truth are impressed upon the pictures exhibited in his poems, into the coloring of which he has thrown much of the natural comedy which is always seen in the common life of a free people. The collection, which has come down to us under the name of Theocritus, consists of thirty poems, called by the general title of Idyls, a fragment of a few lines from a poem entitled Berenice, and twenty-two epigrams in the Greek Anthology. But these Idyls are not all bucolic, and were not all written by Theocritus. Those idyls, of which the genuineness is the most doubtful, are the twelfth, seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, twenty-ninth, and thirtieth. The dialect of Theocritus is a mixed or eclectic dialect, in which the new or softened Doric predominates. The best editions of Theocritus are by Kiessling, Lips., 1819, by Wüstemann, Gothæ, 1830, [by Wordsworth, Camb., 1844, and by Ameis in the Poetæ Bucolici et Didactici, Paris, 1846.]

THEODECTES (Θεοδέκτης), of Phaselis, in Pamphylia, was a highly distinguished rhetorician and tragic poet in the time of Philip of Macedon. He was the son of Aristander, and a pupil of Isocrates and Aristotle. The greater part of his life was spent at Athens, where he died at the age of forty-one. The people of his native city honored the memory of Theodectes with a statue in their agora, which Alexander, when he stopped at Phaselis on his march toward Persia, crowned with garlands, to show his respect for the memory of a man who had been associated with himself by means of Aristotle and philosophy. The passages of Aristotle, in which Theodectes is mentioned, show the strong regard and high esteem in which he was held by the philosopher. Theodectes devoted himself, during the first part of his life, entirely to rhetoric, and afterward he turned his attention to tragic poetry. He was a professional teacher of rhetoric and composer of orations for others, and was in part dependent on this profession for his subsistence. None of the works of Theodectes have come down to us. He wrote fifty tragedies, which were very popular among his contemporaries. His treatise on rhetoric is repeatedly referred to by the ancient writers.

THEODORETUS (Θεοδώρητος), an eminent ecclesiastic of the fifth century, was born at Antioch about A.D. 393, and was made bishop of Cyrus, or Cyrrhus, a small city near the Euphrates, in 420 or 423. He was accused of being a Nestorian, and was in consequence deposed at the second council of Ephesus in 449 but he was restored to his diocese at the council of Chalcedon, in 451, upon his anathematizing Nestorius and his doctrines. He appears to have died in 457 or 458. Theodoret was a man of learning and of sound judgment. The most important of his works are, 1. Commentaries on various books of the Old and New Testaments, in which he adopts the method, not of a continuous commentary, but of proposing and solving those difficulties which he thinks likely to occur to a thoughtful reader. 2. An Ecclesiastical History, in five books, intended as a continuation of the History of Eusebius. It begins with the history of Arianism, under Constantine the Great, and ends in 429. 3. An apologetic treatise, intended to exhibit the confirmations of the truth of Christianity contained in the Gentile philosophy. 4. Ten Orations on Providence. The complete editions of Theodoret are by Sirmond and Garnier, 5 vols. fol., Paris, 1642-1684, and by Schulze and Noesselt, Halæ Sax., 1769-1774, 5 vols. in ten parts, 8vo.

THEODŌRIAS. Vid. VACCA.

THEODORICUS or THEODERICUS. 1. I. King of the Visigoths from A.D. 418 to 451, was the successor of Wallia, but appears to have been the son of the great Alaric. He fell fighting on the side of Aëtius and the Romans at the great battle of Chalons, in which Attila was defeated, 451.—2. II. King of the Visigoths A.D. 452-466, second son of Theodoric I. He succeeded to the throne by the murder of his brother Thorismund. He ruled over the greater part of Gaul and Spain. He was assassinated in 466 by his brother Euric, who succeeded him on the throne. Theodoric II. was a patron of letters and learned men. The poet Sidonius Apollinarius resided for some time at his court.—3. Surnamed the GREAT, king of the Ostrogoths, succeeded his father Theodemir in 475. He was at first an ally of Zeno, the emperor of Constantinople, but was afterward involved in hostilities with the emperor. In order to get rid of Theodoric, Zeno gave him permission to invade Italy, and expel the usurper Odoacer from the country. Theodoric entered Italy in 489, and after defeating Odoacer in three great battles, laid siege to Ravenna, in which Odoacer took refuge. After a siege of three years, Odoacer capitulated, on condition that he and Theodoric should rule jointly over Italy; but Odoacer was soon afterward murdered by his more fortunate rival (493). Theodoric thus became master of Italy, which he ruled for thirty-three years, till his death in 526. His long reign was prosperous and beneficent, and under his sway Italy recovered from the ravages to which it had been exposed for so many years. Theodoric was also a patron of literature; and among his ministers were Cassiodorus and Boëthius, the two last writers who can claim a place in the literature of ancient Rome. But prosperous as had been the reign of Theodoric, his last days were darkened by disputes with the Catholics, and by the condemnation and execution of Boëthius and Symmachus, whom he accused of a conspiracy to overthrow the Gothic dominion in Italy. His death is said to have been hastened by remorse. It is related that one evening, when a large fish was served on the table, he fancied that he beheld the head of Symmachus, and was so terrified that he took to his bed, and died three days afterward. Theodoric was buried at Ravenna, and a monument was erected to his memory by his daughter Amalasuatha. His ashes were deposited in a porphyry vase, which is still to be seen at Ravenna.

THEODŌRIDAS (Θεοδωρίδας), of Syracuse, a lyric and epigrammatic poet, who lived about B.C. 235. He had a place in the Garland of Meleager. There are eighteen of his epigrams in the Greek Anthology.

THEODŌRUS (Θεόδωρος). 1. Of Byzantium, a rhetorician, and a contemporary of Plato, who speaks of him somewhat contemptuously. Cicero describes him as excelling rather in the theory than the practice of his art.—2. A philosopher of the Cyrenaic school, to one branch of which he gave the name of "Theodorians," Θεωδωρείοι. He is usually designated by ancient writers the Atheist. He was a disciple of the younger Aristippus, and was banished from Cyrene, but on what occasion is not stated. He then went to Athens, and only escaped being cited before the Areopagus by the influence of Demetrius Phalereus. He was afterward banished from Athens, probably with Demetrius (307), and went to Alexandria, where he was employed in the service of Ptolemy, son of Lagus, king of the Macedonian dynasty in Egypt; it is not unlikely that he shared the overthrow and exile of Demetrius. While in the service of Ptolemy, Theodorus was sent on an embassy to Lysimachus, whom he offended by the freedom of his remarks. One answer which he made to a threat of crucifixion which Lysimachus had used, has been celebrated by many ancient writers: "Employ such threats to those courtiers of yours; for it matters not to Theodorus whether he rots on the ground or in the air." He returned at length to Cyrene, where he appears to have ended his days.—3. An eminent rhetorician of the age of Augustus, was a native of Gadara, in the country east of the Jordan. He settled at Rhodes, where Tiberius, afterward emperor, during his retirement (B.C. 6-A.D. 2) to that island, was one of his hearers. He also taught at Rome; but whether his settlement at Rome preceded that at Rhodes is uncertain. Theodorus was the founder of a school of rhetoricians, called "Theodorei," as distinguished from "Apollodorei," or followers of Apollodorus of Pergamus, who had been the tutor of Augustus Cæsar at Apollonia. Theodorus wrote many works, all of which are lost.—4. A Greek monk, surnamed Prodromus, who lived in the first half of the twelfth century. He was held in great repute by his contemporaries as a scholar and philosopher, and wrote upon a great variety of subjects. Several of his works have come down to us, of which the following may be mentioned: 1. A metrical romance, in nine books, on the loves of Rhodanthe and Dosicles, written in iambic metre, and exhibiting very little ability. 2. A poem entitled Galecomyomachia, in iambic verse, on "the battle of the mice and cat," in imitation of the Homeric Batrachomyomachia. This piece is often appended to the editions of Æsop and Babrius.—5. The name of two ancient Samian artists. (1.) The son of Rhœcus, and brother of Telescles, flourished about B.C. 600, and was an architect, a statuary in bronze, and a sculptor in wood. He wrote a work on the Heræum at Samos, in the erection of which it may therefore be supposed that he was engaged as well as his father. Or, considering the time which such a building would occupy, the treatise may perhaps be ascribed to the younger Theodorus. He was also engaged with his father in the erection of the labyrinth of Lemnos; and he prepared the foundation of the temple of Diana (Artemis), at Ephesus. In conjunction with his brother Teicles, he made the wooden statue of Apollo Pythius for the Samians, according to the fixed rules of the hieratic style.—(2.) The son of Teicles, nephew of the elder Theodorus, and grandson of Rhæcus, flourished about 560, in the times of Cræsus and Polycrates, and obtained such renown as a statuary in bronze, that the invention of that art was ascribed to him, in conjunction with his grandfather. He also practiced the arts of engraving metals (τορευτική, calatura), and of gem-engraving; his works in those departments being celebrated gold and silver craters, and the ring of Polycrates.

THEODOSIOPOLIS (Θεοδοσιούπολις: probably Erzeroum), a city of Armenia Major, south of the Araxes, and forty-two stadia south of the mountain which contains the sources of the Euphrates: built by Theodōsius II. as a mountain fortress: enlarged and strengthened by Anastasius and Justinian. Its position made it a place of commercial importance. There were other cities of the name, but none of any great consequence.

THEODOSIUS. I. Surnamed the GREAT, Roman emperor of the East A.D. 378-395, was the son of the general Theodosius who restored Britain to the empire, and was beheaded at Carthage in the reign of Valens, 376. The future emperor was born in Spain about 346. He received a good education; and he learned the art of war under his own father, whom he accompanied in his British campaigns. During his father's lifetime he was raised to the rank of Duke (dux) of Mœsia, where he defeated the Sarmatians (374), and saved the province. On the death of his father, he retired, before court intrigues, to his native country. He acquired a considerable military reputation in the lifetime of his father; and after the death of Valens, who fell in battle against the Goths, he was proclaimed Emperor of the East by Gratian, who felt himself unable to sustain the burden of the empire. The Roman empire in the East was then in a critical position; for the Romans were disheartened by the bloody defeat which they had sustained, and the Goths were insolent in their victory. Theodosius, however, showed himself equal to the difficult position in which he was placed; he gained two signal victories over the Goths, and concluded a peace with the barbarians in 382. In the following year (383) Maximus assumed the imperial purple in Britain, and invaded Gaul with a powerful army. In the war which followed Gratian was slain; and Theodosius, who did not consider it prudent to enter into a contest with Maximus, acknowledged the latter emperor of the countries of Spain, Gaul, and Britain, but he secured to Valentinian, the brother of Gratian, Italy, Africa, and Western Illyricum. But when Maximus expelled Valentinian from Italy in 387, Theodosius espoused the cause of the latter, and marched into the West at the head of a powerful army. After defeating Maximus in Pannonia, Theodosius pursued him across the Alps to Aquileia. Here Maximus was surrendered by his own soldiers to Theodosius, and was put to death. Theodosius spent the winter at Milan, and in the following year (389) he entered

Rome in triumph, accompanied by Valentinian and his own son Honorius. Two events in the life of Theodosius, about this time, may be mentioned as evidence of his uncertain character and his savage temper. In 387, a riot took place at Antioch, in which the statues of the emperor, of his father, and of his wife were thrown down; but these idle demonstrations were quickly suppressed by an armed force. When Theodosius heard of these riots, he degraded Antioch from the rank of a city, stripped it of its possessions and privileges, and reduced it to the condition of a village dependent on Laodicea. But, in consequence of the intercession of Antioch and the senate of Constantinople, he pardoned the city, and all who had taken part in the riot. The other event is an eternal brand of infamy on the name of Theodosius. In 390, while the emperor was at Milan, a serious riot broke out at Thessalonica, in which the imperial officer and several of his troops were murdered. Theodosius resolved to take the most signal vengeance upon the whole city. An army of barbarians was sent to Thessalonica; the people were invited to the games of the Circus; and as soon as the place was full, the soldiers received the signal for a massacre. For three hours the spectators were indiscriminately exposed to the fury of the soldiers, and seven thousand of them, or, as some accounts say, more than twice that number, paid the penalty of the insurrection. St. Ambrose, the archbishop of Milan, represented to Theodosius his crime in a letter, and told him that penitence alone could efface his guilt. Accordingly, when the emperor proceeded to perform his devotions in the usual manner in the great church of Milan, the archbishop stopped him at the door, and demanded an acknowledgment of his guilt. The conscience-struck Theodosius humbled himself before the Church, which has recorded his penance as one of its greatest victories. He laid aside the insignia of imperial power, and in the posture of a suppliant, in the church of Milan, entreated pardon for his great sin before all the congregation. After eight months, the emperor was restored to communion with the church. Theodosius spent three years in Italy, during which he established Valentinian II. on the throne of the West. He returned to Constantinople toward the latter end of 391. Valentinian was slain in 392 by Arbogastes, who raised Eugenius to the empire of the West. This involved Theodosius in a new war; but it ended in the defeat and death both of Eugenius and Arbogastes in 394. Theodosius died at Milan, four months after the defeat of Eugenius, on the 17th of January, 395. His two sons, Arcadius and Honorius, had already been elevated to the rank of Augusti, and it was arranged that the empire should be divided between them, Arcadius having the East, and Honorius the West. Theodosius was a firm Catholic, and a fierce opponent and persecutor of the Arians and all heretics. It was in his reign, also, that the formal destruction of paganism took place; and we still possess a large number of the laws of Theodosius, prohibiting the exercise of the pagan religion, and forbidding the heathen worship under severe penalties, in some cases extending to death.—II. Roman emperor of the East, A.D.

408-450, was born in 401, and was only seven years of age at the death of his father Arcadius, whom he succeeded. Theodosius was a weak prince; and his sister Pulcheria, who became his guardian in 417, possessed the virtual government of the empire during the remainder of his long reign. The principal external events in the reign of Theodosius were the war with the Persians, which only lasted a short time (421-422), and was terminated by a peace for one hundred years, and the war with the Huns, who repeatedly defeated the armies of the emperor, and compelled him, at length, to conclude a disgraceful peace with them in 447 or 448. Theodosius died in 450, and was succeeded by his sister Pulcheria, who prudently took for her colleague in the empire the senator Marcian, and made him her husband. Theodosius had been married, in 421, to the accomplished Athenais, the daughter of the sophist Leontius, who received at her baptism the name of Eudocia. Their daughter Eudoxia was married to Valentinian III., the emperor of the West. In the reign of Theodosius and that of Valentinian III. was made the compilation called the Codex Theodosianus. It was published in 438. It consists of sixteen books, which are divided into titles, with appropriate rubricæ or headings; and the constitutions belonging to each title are arranged under it in chronological order. The first five books comprise the greater part of the constitution which relates to Jus Privatum; the sixth, seventh, and eighth books contain the law that relates to the constitution and administration; the ninth book treats of criminal law; the tenth and eleventh treat of the public revenue and some matters relating to procedure; the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth books treat of the constitution, and the administration of towns and other corporations; and the sixteenth contains the law relating to ecclesiastical matters. The best edition of this Code, with a commentary, is that of J. Gothofredus, which was edited after his death by A. Marville, Lyon, 1665, six vols. fol.; and afterward by Ritter, Leipzig, 1736-1745, fol. The best edition of the text alone is that by Hänel, in the Corpus Juris Antejustinianicum, Bonn, 1837.—III. Literary. 1. Of Bithynia, a mathematician, mentioned by Strabo and by Vitruvius, the latter of whom speaks of him as the inventor of a universal sun-dial.—2. Of Tripolis, a mathematician and astronomer of some distinction, who appears to have flourished later than the reign of Trajan. He wrote several works, of which the three following are extant, and have been published. 1. Σφαιρικά, a treatise on the properties of the sphere, and of the circles described on its surface. 2. Περὶ ἡμερῶν καὶ νυκτῶν. 3. Περὶ οἰκίσεων.

THEODOTA (Θεοδότη), an Athenian courtesan, and one of the most celebrated persons of that class in Greece, is introduced as a speaker in Xenophon's Memorabilia (iii, 11). She at last attached herself to Alcibiades, and, after his murder, she performed his funeral rites.

THEOGNIS (Θεογνίς). 1. Of Megara, an ancient elegiac and gnomic poet, is said to have flourished B. C. 548 or 544. He may have been born about 570, and would therefore have been eighty at the commencement of the Persian wars, 490, at which time we know, from his own writings, that he was alive. Theognis belonged to the oligarchical party in his native city, and in its fates he shared. He was a noble by birth, and all his sympathies were with the nobles. They are, in his poems, the ἀγαθοὶ and εὐθλοὶ, and the commons the κακοὶ and δειλοὶ, terms which, in fact, at that period, were regularly used in this political signification, and not in their later ethical meaning. He was banished with the leaders of the oligarchical party, having previously been deprived of all his property; and most of his poems were composed while he was an exile. Most of his political verses are addressed to a certain Cyrnus, the son of Polypas. The other fragments of his poetry are of a social, most of them of a festive character. They place us in the midst of a circle of friends, who formed a kind of convivial society: all the members of this society belonged to the class whom the poet calls "the good." The collection of gnomic poetry, which has come down to us under the name of Theognis, contains, however, many additions from later poets. The genuine fragments of Theognis contain much that is highly poetical in thought, and elegant as well as forcible in expression. The best editions are by Bekker, Lips., 1815, and second ed., 1827, 8vo; by Welcker, Francof., 1826, 8vo; and by Orellius, Turic., 1840, 4to.—2. A tragic poet, contemporary with Aristophanes, by whom he is satirized.

THEON (Θέων). 1. The name of two mathematicians who are often confounded together. The first is Theon the elder, of Smyrna, best known as an arithmetician, who lived in the time of Hadrian. The second is Theon the younger, of Alexandria, the father of ἩΥΡΑΤΙΑ, best known as an astronomer and geometer, who lived in the time of Theodosius the elder. Both were heathens, a fact which the date of the second makes it desirable to state; and each held the Platonism of his period. Of Theon of Smyrna, all that we have left is a portion of a work entitled Τῶν κατὰ μαθηματικὴν χρῆσιν μὲν εἰς τὴν τοῦ Πλάτωνος ἀνάγνωσιν. The portion which now exists is in two books, one on arithmetic and one on music: there was a third on astronomy, and a fourth, Περὶ τῆς κόσμου ἀρμονίας. The best edition is by Gelder, Leyden, 1827. Of Theon of Alexandria the following works have come down to us: 1. Scholia on Aratus. 2. Edition of Euclid. 3. Commentary on the Almagest of Ptolemy, addressed to his son Epiphanius. 4. Commentary on the Tables of Ptolemy.—2. ÆLIUS THEON, of Alexandria, a sophist and rhetorician of uncertain date, wrote several works, of which one, entitled Progymnasmata (Προγυμνάσματα), is still extant. It is a useful treatise on the proper system of preparation for the profession of an orator, according to the rules laid down by Hermogenes and Aphthonius. One of the best editions is by Finckh, Stuttgart, 1834.—3. Of Samos, a painter, who flourished from the time of Philip onward to that of the successors of Alexander. The peculiar merit of Theon was his prolific fancy.

THEODOTE (Θεοδότη), daughter of Proteus and Psamathe, also called Idothea. Vid. IDOTHEA.
THEOPHANES (Θεοφάνης). 1. CN. POMPEIUS

THEOPHĀNES, of Mytilene, in Lesbos, a learned Greek, and one of the most intimate friends of Pompey. Pompey appears to have made his acquaintance during the Mithradatic war, and soon became so much attached to him that he presented to him the Roman franchise in the presence of his army, after a speech in which he eulogized his merits. This occurred about B.C. 62; and in the course of the same year Theophanes obtained from Pompey the privileges of a free state for his native city, although it had espoused the cause of Mithradates. Theophanes came to Rome with Pompey; and on the breaking out of the civil war, he accompanied his patron to Greece. Pompey appointed him commander of the Fabri, and chiefly consulted him and Lucceius on all important matters in the war, much to the indignation of the Roman nobles. After the battle of Pharsalia, Theophanes fled with Pompey from Greece, and it was owing to his advice that Pompey went to Egypt. After the death of his patron, Theophanes took refuge in Italy, and was pardoned by Cæsar. After his death, the Lesbians paid divine honors to his memory. • Theophanes wrote the history of Pompey's campaigns, in which he represented the exploits of his patron in the most favorable light.—2. M. POMPEIUS THEOPHĀNES, son of the preceding, was sent to Asia by Augustus, in the capacity of procurator, and was, at the time that Strabo wrote, one of the friends of Tiberius. The latter emperor, however, put his descendants to death toward the end of his reign, A.D. 33, because their ancestor had been one of Pompey's friends, and had received after his death divine honors from the Lesbians.—3. A Byzantine historian, flourished most probably in the latter part of the sixth century of our era. He wrote, in ten books, the history of the Eastern empire during the Persian war under Justin II., from A.D. 567 to 581. The work itself is lost, but some extracts from it are preserved by Photius.—4. Also a Byzantine historian, lived during the second half of the eighth century and the early part of the ninth. In consequence of his supporting the cause of image worship, he was banished by Leo the Armenian to the island of Samothrace, where he died in 818. Theophanes wrote a Chronicle, which is still extant, beginning at the accession of Diocletian in 277, and coming down to 811. It consists, like the Chronica of Eusebius and of Synellus, of two parts, a history arranged according to years, and a chronological table, of which the former is very superior to the latter. It is published in the Collections of the Byzantine writers, Paris, 1655, fol., Venet., 1729, fol.

THEOPHĪLUS (Θεόφιλος). 1. An Athenian comic poet, most probably of the Middle Comedy.—2. An historian and geographer, quoted by Josephus, Plutarch, and Ptolemy.—3. Bishop of Antioch in the latter part of the second century of our era, and the author of one of the early apologies for Christianity which have come down to us. This work is in the form of a letter to a friend, named Autolyeus, who was still a heathen, but a man of extensive reading and great learning. It was composed A.D. 180, a year or two before the death of Theophilus. The best edition is that by Wolf, Hamb., 1724, 8vo.—4. Bishop of Alexandria in the latter part of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth centuries of our era, and distinguished for his persecutions of the Origenists and for his hostility to Chrysostom. He died A.D. 412. A few remains of his works have come down to us.—5. One of the lawyers of Constantinople who were employed by Justinian on his first Code, on the Digest, and on the composition of the Institutes. Vid. JUSTINIANUS. Theophilus is the author of the Greek translation or paraphrase of the Institutes of Justinian which has come down to us. It is entitled Ἰνστιτουῶν Θεοφίλου Ἀντικένσωρος, Instituta Theophili Antecessoris. It became the text for the Institutes in the East, where the Latin language was little known, and entirely displaced the Latin text. The best edition is by Reitz, Haag., 1751, 2 vols. 4to.—6. THEOPHILUS PROTOSPATHARIUS, the author of several Greek medical works, which are still extant. Protospatharius was originally a military title given to the colonel of the bodyguards of the Emperor of Constantinople (Spatharii), but afterward became also a high civil dignity. Theophilus probably lived in the seventh century after Christ. Of his works the two most important are, 1. Περὶ τῆς τοῦ Ἀνθρώπου Κατασκευῆς, De Corporis Humani Fabrica, an anatomical and physiological treatise in five books. The best edition is by Greenhill, Oxon., 1842, 8vo. 2. Περὶ Οὔρων, De Urinis, of which the best edition is by Guidot, Lugd. Bat., 1703 (and 1731), 8vo.

THEOPHRASTUS (Θεόφραστος), the Greek philosopher, was a native of Eresus in Lesbos, and studied philosophy at Athens, first under Plato, and afterward under Aristotle. He became the favorite pupil of Aristotle, who is said to have changed his original name of Tyrtamus to Theophrastus (or the Divine Speaker), to indicate the fluent and graceful address of his pupil; but this tale is scarcely credible. Aristotle named Theophrastus his successor in the presidency of the Lyceum, and in his will bequeathed to him his library and the originals of his own writings. Theophrastus was a worthy successor of his great master, and nobly sustained the character of the school. He is said to have had two thousand disciples, and among them such men as the comic poet Menander. He was highly esteemed by the kings Philipppus, Cassander, and Ptolemy, and was not the less the object of the regard of the Athenian people, as was decisively shown when he was impeached of impiety; for he was not only acquitted, but his accuser would have fallen a victim to his calumny, had not Theophrastus generously interfered to save him. Nevertheless, when the philosophers were banished from Athens in B.C. 305, according to the law of Sophocles, Theophrastus also left the city, until Philo, a disciple of Aristotle, in the very next year brought Sophocles to punishment, and procured the repeal of the law. From this time Theophrastus continued to teach at Athens without any further molestation till his death. He died in 287, having presided over the Lyceum about thirty-five years. His age is differently stated. According to some accounts, he lived eighty-five years; according to others, one hundred and seven years. He is said to have closed his life with the complaint respecting the short duration of human existence, that it ended just when the insight into its problems was beginning. The whole population of Athens took part in his funeral obsequies. He bequeathed his library to Neleus of Scepsis. Theophrastus exerted himself to carry out the philosophical system of Aristotle, to throw light upon the difficulties contained in his books, and to fill up the gaps in them. With this view he wrote a great number of works, the great object of which was the development of the Aristotelian philosophy. Unfortunately, most of these works have perished. The following are alone extant: 1. Characteres (ἠθικοί χαρακτήρες), in thirty chapters, containing descriptions of vicious characters. 2. A treatise on sensuous perception and its objects (περὶ αἰσθητικῆς [καὶ αἰσθητῶν]). 3. A fragment of a work on metaphysics (τῶν μετὰ τὰ φυσικά). 4. On the History of Plants (περὶ φυτῶν ἱστορίας), in ten books, one of the earliest works on botany which have come down to us. 5. On the Causes of Plants (περὶ φυτῶν αἰτιῶν), originally in eight books, of which six are still extant. 6. Of Stones (περὶ λίθων). The best editions of the complete works of Theophrastus are by Schneider, Lips., 1818-21, 5 vols., and by Wimmer, Vratislaviæ, 1842, of which, however, the first volume has only yet appeared. The best separate edition of the Characteres is by Ast, Lips., 1816.

THEOPHYLACTUS (Θεοφύλακτος). 1. Surnamed ΣΙΜΟΚΑΤΑ, a Byzantine historian, lived at Constantinople, where he held some public offices under Heraclius, about A.D. 610-629. His chief work is a history of the reign of the Emperor Maurice, in eight books, from the death of Tiberius II. and the accession of Maurice in 582, down to the murder of Maurice and his children by Phocas in 602. The best edition of this work is by Bekker, Bonn, 1834, 8vo. There is also extant another work of Theophylactus, entitled Questiones Physicæ, of which the best edition is by Boissonade, Paris, 1835, 8vo.—2. Archbishop of Bulgaria, flourished about A.D. 1070 and onward, is celebrated for his commentaries on the Scriptures, which are founded on the commentaries of Chrysostom, and are of considerable value.

THEOPOMPUS (Θεόπομπος). 1. King of Sparta, reigned about B.C. 770-720. He is said to have established the ephoralty, and to have been mainly instrumental in bringing the first Messenian war to a successful issue.—2. Of Chios, a celebrated Greek historian, was the son of Damasistratus and the brother of Caucalus, the rhetorician. He was born about B.C. 378. He accompanied his father into banishment, when the latter was exiled on account of his espousing the interests of the Lacedæmonians, but he was restored to his native country in the forty-fifth year of his age (333), in consequence of the letters of Alexander the Great, in which he exhorted the Chians to recall their exiles. In what year Theopompus quitted Chios with his father is uncertain; but we know that before he left his native country, he attended the school of rhetoric which Isocrates opened at Chios, and that he profited so much by the lessons of his great master as to be regarded by the ancients as the most distinguished of all his scholars. Ephorus the historian was a fellow-student with him, but was of a very different character; and Isocrates used to say of them, that Theopompus needed the bit and Ephorus the spur. In consequence of the advice of Isocrates, Theopompus did not devote his oratorical powers to the pleading of causes, but gave his chief attention to the study and composition of history. Like his master Isocrates, however, he composed many orations of the kind called Epidictic by the Greeks, that is, speeches on set subjects delivered for display, such as eulogiums upon states and individuals. Thus in 352 he contended at Halicarnassus with Naurates and his master Isocrates for the prize of oratory, given by Artemisia in honor of her husband, and gained the victory. On his return to Chios in 333, Theopompus, who was a man of great wealth as well as learning, naturally took an important position in the state; but his vehement temper, and his support of the aristocratical party, soon raised against him a host of enemies. Of these, one of the most formidable was the sophist Theocritus. As long as Alexander lived, his enemies dared not take any open proceedings against Theopompus; and even after the death of the Macedonian monarch he appears to have enjoyed for some years the protection of the royal house. Theopompus was supported by Alexander, and after his death by the royal house; but he was eventually expelled from Chios as a disturber of the public peace, and fled to Egypt to Ptolemy about 305, being at the time seventy-five years of age. We are informed that Ptolemy not only refused to receive Theopompus, but would even have put him to death as a dangerous busy-body, had not some of his friends interceded for his life. Of his further fate we have no particulars. None of the works of Theopompus have come down to us, but the following were his chief works: 1. Ἑλληνικαὶ ἱστορίαι ἢ Σύνταξις Ἑλληνικῶν, A History of Greece, in twelve books, which was a continuation of the history of Thucydides. It commenced in B.C. 411, at the point where the history of Thucydides breaks off, and embraced a period of seventeen years, down to the battle of Cnidus in 394. 2. Φιλιππικά, also called ἱστορίαι (κατ' ἐξοχήν), The History of Philip, father of Alexander the Great, in fifty-eight books, from the commencement of his reign, 360, to his death, 336. This work contained numerous digressions, which in fact formed the greater part of the whole work; so that Philip V., king of Macedonia, was able, by omitting them and retaining only what belonged to the proper subject, to reduce the work from fifty-eight books to sixteen. Fifty-three of the fifty-eight books of the original work were extant in the ninth century of the Christian era, and were read by Photius, who has preserved an abstract of the twelfth book. 3. Orationes, which were chiefly Panegyrics, and what the Greeks called Συμβουλευτικοὶ λόγοι. Of the latter kind, one of the most celebrated was addressed to Alexander on the state of Chios. Theopompus is praised by ancient writers for his diligence and accuracy, but is at the same time said to have taken more pleasure in blaming than in commending; and many of his judgments respecting events and characters were expressed with such acrimony and severity that several of the ancient writers speak of his malignity, and call him a reviler. The style of Theopompus was formed on the model of Isocrates, and possessed the characteristic merits and defects of his master. It was pure, clear, and elegant, but deficient in vigor, loaded with ornament, and in general too artificial. The best collections of the fragments of Theopompus are by Wichers, Lugd. Bat., 1829, and by C. and Theod. Müller, in the Fragmenta Historicorum Græcorum, Paris, 1841.—3. An Athenian comic poet, of the Old and also of the Middle Comedy, was the son of Theodectes or Theodoros, or Tisamenus. He wrote as late as B.C. 380. His extant fragments contain examples of the declining purity of the Attic dialect.

THEOXĒNIUS (Θεοξένιος), a surname of Apollo and Mercury (Hermes). Respecting the festival of the Theoxenia, vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.

Thera (Θήρα : Θηραῖος : now Santorin), an island in the Ægean Sea, and the chief of the Sporades, distant from Crete seven hundred stadia, and twenty-five Roman miles south of the island of Ios. It is described by Strabo as two hundred stadia in circumference, but by modern travellers as thirty-six miles, and in figure exactly like a horse-shoe. Thera is clearly of volcanic origin. It is covered at the present day with pumice-stone; and the rocks are burned and scorched. It is said to have been formed by a clod of earth thrown from the ship Argo, and to have received the name of Calliste when it first emerged from the sea. Therasia, a small island to the west, and called at the present day by the same name, was torn away from Thera by some volcanic convulsion. Thera is said to have been originally inhabited by Phœnicians, but was afterward colonized by Lacedæmonians and Minyans of Lemnos, under the guidance of the Spartan Theras, who gave his name to the island. In B.C. 631 Battus conducted a colony from Thera to Africa, where he founded the celebrated city of Cyrene. Thera remained faithful to the Spartans, and was one of the few islands which espoused the Spartan cause at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war.

Therambo (Θεράμβω, also Θράμβος), a town of Macedonia on the peninsula Pallene.

Theramēnes (Θηραμένης), an Athenian, son of Hagnon, was a leading member of the oligarchical government of the Four Hundred at Athens in B.C. 411. In this, however, he does not appear to have occupied as eminent a station as he had hoped to fill, while, at the same time, the declaration of Alcibiades and of the army at Samos against the oligarchy made it evident to him that its days were numbered. Accordingly he withdrew from the more violent aristocrats, and began to cabal against them; and he subsequently took not only a prominent part in the deposition of the Four Hundred, but came forward as the accuser of Antiphon and Archepolemus, who had been his intimate friends, but whose death he was now the mean and cowardly instrument in procuring. At the battle of Arginusæ in 406, Theramenes held a subordinate command in the Athenian fleet, and he was one of those who, after the victory, were commissioned by the generals to repair to the scene of action and save as many as possible of the disabled galleys and their crews. A storm, it is said, rendered the execution of the order impracticable; yet, instead of trusting to this as his ground of defence, Theramenes thought it safer to divert the popular anger from himself to others; and it appears to have been chiefly through his machinations that the six generals who had returned to Athens were condemned to death. After the capture of Athens by Lysander, Theramenes was chosen one of the Thirty Tyrants (404). He endeavored to check the tyrannical proceedings of his colleagues, foreseeing that their violence would be fatal to the permanence of their power. His opposition, however, had no effect in restraining them, but only induced the desire to rid themselves of so troublesome an associate, whose former conduct, moreover, had shown that no political party could depend on him, and who had earned, by his trimming, the nickname of Kóthorvos—a boot which might be worn on either foot. He was therefore accused by Critias before the council as a traitor, and when his nominal judges, favorably impressed by his able defence, exhibited an evident disposition to acquit him, Critias introduced into the chamber a number of men armed with daggers, and declared that, as all who were not included in the privileged Three Thousand might be put to death by the sole authority of the Thirty, he struck the name of Theramenes out of that list, and condemned him with the consent of all his colleagues. Theramenes then rushed to the altar, which stood in the council-chamber, but was dragged from it and carried off to execution. When he had drunk the hemlock, he dashed out the last drops from the cup, exclaiming, "This to the health of the lovely Critias!" Both Xenophon and Cicero express their admiration of the equanimity which he displayed in his last hour; but surely such a feeling is sadly out of place when directed to such a man.

Therapne (Θεράπνη, also Θεράπνη, Dor. Θεράπνη : Θεραπναῖος). 1. A town in Laconia, on the left bank of the Eurotas, and a little above Sparta. It received its name from Therapne, daughter of Lelex, and is celebrated in mythology as the birth-place of Castor and Pollux, and contained temples of these divinities as well as temples of Menelaus and Helen, both of whom were said to be buried here.—2. A town in Bœotia, on the road from Thebes to the Asopus.

Theras. Vid. Thera.

Therasia. Vid. Thera.

Thericles (Θηρικλής), a Corinthian potter, whose works obtained such celebrity that they became known throughout Greece by the name of Θηρίκλεια (sc. ποτήρια) or κύλικες Θηρίκλεια (or -αι), and these names were applied not only to cups of earthen-ware, but also to those of wood, glass, gold, and silver. Some scholars make Thericles a contemporary of Aristophanes; but others deny the existence of Thericles altogether, and contend that the name of these vases is a descriptive one, derived from the figures of animals (θήρια) with which they were adorned.

THERMA (Θέρμη: Θερμαῖος), a town in Macedonia, afterward called Thessalonica (vid. THESALONICA), situated at the northeastern extremity of a great gulf of the Ægean Sea, lying between Thessaly and the peninsula Chalcidice, and called ΤΗΡΜΑΪΟΥΣ or ΤΗΡΜΕΥΣ ΣΙΝΟΣ (Θερμαῖος κόλπος), from the town at its head. This gulf was also called Macedonicus Sinus: its modern name is Gulf of Saloniki.

ΤΗΡΜÆ (Θέρμαι), a town in Sicily, built by the inhabitants of Himera after the destruction of the latter city by the Carthaginians. For details, vid. HIMERA.

ΤΗΡΜΑΪΟΥΣ ΣΙΝΟΣ. Vid. THERMA.

ΤΗΡΜΩΔΩΝ (Θερμῶδων: now Thermeh), a river of Pontus, in the district of Themiscyra, the reputed country of the Amazons, rises in a mountain called Amazonius Mons (and still called Mason Dagh), near Phanaræa, and falls into the sea about thirty miles east of the mouth of the Iris, after a short course, but with so large a body of water, that its breadth, according to Xenophon, was three plethra (above three hundred feet), and it was navigable. At its mouth was the city of Themiscyra; and there is still, on the western side of the mouth of the Thermeh, a place of the same name, Thermeh.

ΤΗΡΜΟΠΥΛÆ, often called simply ΠΥΛÆ (Θερμοπύλαι, Πύλαι), that is, the Hot Gates, or the Gates, a celebrated pass leading from Thessaly into Locris. It lay between Mount Ceta and an inaccessible morass, forming the edge of the Maliac Gulf. At one end of the pass, close to Anthela, the mountain approached so close to the morass as to leave room for only a single carriage between; this narrow entrance formed the western gate of Thermopylæ. About a mile to the east the mountain again approached close to the sea, near the Locrian town of Alpeni, thus forming the eastern gate of Thermopylæ. The space between these two gates was wider and more open, and was distinguished by its abundant flow of hot springs, which were sacred to Hercules: hence the name of the place. Thermopylæ was the only pass by which an enemy could penetrate from northern into Southern Greece, whence its great importance in Grecian history. It is especially celebrated on account of the heroic defence of Leonidas and the three hundred Spartans against the mighty host of Xerxes; and they only fell through the Persians having discovered a path over the mountains, and thus being enabled to attack the Greeks in the rear. This mountain path commenced from the neighborhood of Trachis, ascended the gorge of the River Asoopus and the hill called Anopæa, then crossed the crest of Ceta, and descended in the rear of Thermopylæ, near the town of Alpeni.

ΤΗΡΜΟΥ or ΤΗΡΜΑ (Θέρμων or τὰ Θέρμα), a town of the Ætolians, near Stratus, with warm mineral springs, was regarded for some time as the capital of the country, since it was the place of meeting of the Ætolian confederacy.

ΤΗΡΜΟΥΣ, ΜΙΝΥΚΙΟΥΣ. 1. Q., served under Scipio as tribune militum in the war against Hannibal in Africa in B.C. 202; was tribune of the plebs 201; curule ædile 197; and prætor 196, when he carried on war with great success in Nearer Spain. He was consul in 193, and carried on war against the Ligurians in this and the two following years. On his return to Rome in 190, a triumph was refused him, through the influence of M. Cato, who delivered on the occasion his two orations entitled De decem Hominihus and De falsis Pugnibus. Thermus was killed in 188, while fighting under Cn. Manlius Vulso against the Thracians.—2. M., prætor in 81, accompanied L. Murena, Sulla's legate, into Asia. Thermus was engaged in the siege of Mytilene, and it was under him that Julius Cæsar served his first campaign and gained his first laurels.—3. Q., prætor 51 and 50 in Asia, where he received many letters from Cicero, who praises his administration of the province. On the breaking out of the civil war he espoused the side of Pompey.

ΤΗΡΩΝ (Θήρων), tyrant of Agrigentum in Sicily, was the son of Ænesidemus, and descended from one of the most illustrious families in his native city. He obtained the supreme power about B.C. 488, and retained it till his death in 472. He conquered Himera in 482, and united this powerful city to his own dominions. He was in close alliance with Gelon, ruler of Syracuse and Gela, to whom he had given his daughter Demarete in marriage; and he shared with Gelon in the great victory gained over the Carthaginians in 480. On the death of Gelon in 478, Theron espoused the cause of Polyzelus, who had been driven into exile by his brother Hieron. Theron raised an army for the purpose of reinstating him, but hostilities were prevented, and a peace concluded between the two sovereigns.

ΤΗΡΣΑΝΔΕΡ (Θέρσανδρος), son of Polynices and Argia, and one of the Epigoni, was married to Demonassa, by whom he became the father of Tisamenus. He went with Agamemnon to Troy, and was slain in that expedition by Telephus. His tomb was shown at Elæa in Mysia, where sacrifices were offered to him. Virgil (Æn., ii., 261) enumerates Thersander among the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse. Homer does not mention him.

ΤΗΡΣΙΤΗΣ (Θερσίτης), son of Agrius, the most deformed [and ugliest of the Greeks that came beneath the walls of Troy, and, at the same time, the most loquacious busy-body and fault-finder in the Greek army. He was especially fond of abusing Achilles and Ulysses; and, on one occasion, having assailed Agamemnon himself with his revellings, Ulysses inflicted summary punishment upon him with his sceptre in the assembly of the Greeks, and caused him to sit down quietly.] According to the later poets, he was killed by Achilles because he had ridiculed him for lamenting the death of Penthesilea, queen of the Amazons.

ΤΗΣΕΥΣ (Θησεύς), the great legendary hero of Attica, was the son of Ægeus, king of Athens, and of Æthra, the daughter of Pittheus, king of Træzen. He was brought up at Træzen; and when he reached maturity, he took, by his mother's directions, the sword and sandals, the tokens which had been left by Ægeus, and proceeded to Athens. Eager to emulate Hercules, he went by land, displaying his prowess by destroying the robbers and monsters that infested the country. Periphetes, Sinis, Phæa the Crom myonian sow, Sciron, Cercyon, and Procrustes fell before him. At Athens he was immediately recognized by Medea, who laid a plot for poisoning him at a banquet to which he was invited. By means of the sword which he carried, Theseus was recognized by Ægeus, acknowledged as his son, and declared his successor. The sons of Pallas, thus disappointed in their hopes of succeeding to the throne, attempted to secure the succession by violence, and declared war; but, being betrayed by the herald Leos, were destroyed. The capture of the Marathonian bull, which had long laid waste the surrounding country, was the next exploit of Theseus. After this Theseus went of his own accord as one of the seven youths, whom the Athenians were obliged to send every year, with seven maidens, to Crete, in order to be devoured by the Minotaur. When they arrived at Crete, Ariadne, the daughter of Minos, became enamored of Theseus, and provided him with a sword with which he slew the Minotaur, and a clew of thread by which he found his way out of the labyrinth. Having effected his object, Theseus sailed away, carrying off Ariadne. There were various accounts about Ariadne; but, according to the general account, Theseus abandoned her in the island of Naxos on his way home. Vid. ARIADNE. He was generally believed to have had by her two sons, Ctenopion and Staphylus. As the vessel in which Theseus sailed approached Attica, he neglected to hoist the white sail, which was to have been the signal of the success of the expedition; whereupon Ægeus, thinking that his son had perished, threw himself into the sea. Vid. ÆGEUS. Theseus thus became King of Athens. One of the most celebrated of the adventures of Theseus was his expedition against the Amazons. He is said to have assailed them before they had recovered from the attack of Hercules, and to have carried off their queen Antiope. The Amazons, in their turn, invaded Attica, and penetrated into Athens itself; and the final battle in which Theseus overcame them was fought in the very midst of the city. By Antiope Theseus was said to have had a son named Hippolytus or Demophon, and after her death to have married Phædra. (Vid. HIPPLYTUS, PHÆDRA.) Theseus figures in almost all the great heroic expeditions. He was one of the Argonauts (the anachronism of the attempt of Medea to poison him does not seem to have been noticed); he joined in the Calydonian hunt, and aided Adrastus in recovering the bodies of those slain before Thebes. He contracted a close friendship with Pirithous, and aided him and the Lapithæ against the Centaurs. With the assistance of Pirithous he carried off Helen from Sparta while she was quite a girl, and placed her at Aphidnæ, under the care of Æthra. In return, he assisted Pirithous in his attempt to carry off Proserpina (Persephone) from the lower world. Pirithous perished in the enterprise, and Theseus was kept in hard durance until he was delivered by Hercules. Meantime Castor and Pollux invaded Attica, and carried off Helen and Æthra, Academicus having informed the brothers where they were to be found. (Vid. ACADEMUS.) Menestheus also endeavored to incite the people against Theseus, who, on his return, found himself unable to re-establish his authority, and retired to Scyros, where he met with a treacherous death at the hands of Lycomedes. The departed hero was believed to have appeared to aid the Athenians at the battle of Marathon. In 469 the bones of Theseus were discovered by Cimon in Scyros, and brought to Athens, where they were deposited in a temple (the Theseum) erected in honor of the hero. A considerable part of this temple still remains, forming one of the most interesting monuments of Athens. A festival in honor of Theseus was celebrated on the eighth day of each month, especially on the eighth of Pyanepsion. There can be no doubt that Theseus is a purely legendary personage. Nevertheless, in later times the Athenians came to regard him as the author of a very important political revolution in Attica. Before his time Attica had been broken up into twelve petty independent states or townships, acknowledging no head, and connected only by a federal union. Theseus abolished the separate governments, and erected Athens into the capital of a single commonwealth. The festival of the Panathenæa was instituted to commemorate this important revolution. Theseus is said to have established a constitutional government, retaining in his own hands only certain definite powers and functions. He is further said to have distributed the Athenian citizens into the three classes of Eupatridæ, Geomori, and Demiurgi. It would be a vain task to attempt to decide whether there is any historical basis for the legends about Theseus, and still more so to endeavor to separate the historical from the legendary in what has been preserved. The Theseus of the Athenians was a hero who fought the Amazons, and slew the Minotaur, and carried off Helen. A personage who should be nothing more than a wise king, consolidating the Athenian commonwealth, however possible his existence might be, would have no historical reality. The connection of Theseus with Poseidon (Neptune), the national deity of the Ionic tribes, his coming from the Ionic town Træzen, forcing his way through the Isthmus into Attica, and establishing the Isthmia as an Ionic Panegyris, rather suggest that Theseus is, at least in part, the mythological representative of an Ionian immigration into Attica, which, adding, perhaps, to the strength and importance of Ionian settlers already in the country, might easily have led to that political aggregation of the disjointed elements of the state which is assigned to Theseus.

THESMIA OR THESMOPHÏROS (Θεσμία, Θεσμοφόρος), that is, "the law-giver," a surname of Demeter (Ceres) and Persephone (Proserpina), in honor of whom the Thesmophoria were celebrated at Athens in the month of Pyanepsion.

THESPIÆ OR THESPIA (Θεσπιαί, Θεσπιαί, Θεσπια, Θέσπια; Θεσπιαί: Θεσπιεύς, Θεσπιιάδης, Thespiensis: now Ereino or Rimokastro), an ancient town in Bœotia, on the southeastern slope of Mount Helicon, at no great distance from the Crissæan Gulf. Its inhabitants did not follow the example of the other Bœotian towns in submitting to Xerxes, and a number of them bravely fought under Leonidas at Thermopylæ, and perished with the Spartans. Their city was burned to the ground by the Persians, but was subsequently rebuilt. In the Peloponnesian war the Thebans made themselves masters of the town. At Thespiæ was preserved the celebrated marble statue of Eros by Praxiteles, who had given it to Phryne, by whom it was presented to her native town. Vid. PRAXITELES. From the vicinity of the town to Mount Helicon the Muses are called Thespiades, and Helicon itself is named the Thespiæ rupes.

THESPIA (Θέσπις), the celebrated father of Greek tragedy, was a contemporary of Pisistratus, and a native of Icarus, one of the demi in Attica, where the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus) had long prevailed. The alteration made by Thespiæ, and which gave to the old tragedy a new and dramatic character, was very simple but very important. He introduced an actor, for the sake of giving rest to the chorus, and independent of it, in which capacity he probably appeared himself, taking various parts in the same piece, under various disguises, which he was enabled to assume by means of the linen masks, the invention of which is ascribed to him. The first representation of Thespiæ was in B.C. 535. For further details, vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. TRAGÆDIA.

THESPIUS (Θέσπιος), son of Erechtheus, who, according to some, founded the town of Thespiæ in Bœotia. His descendants are called Thespiadae.

THESPROTÏ (Θεσπρωτοί), a people of Epirus, inhabiting the district called after them THESPROTIA (Θεσπρωτία) or THESPROTIS (Θεσπρωτις), which extended along the coast from the Ambracian Gulf northward as far as the River Thyamis, and inland as far as the territory of the Molossi. The southeastern part of the country on the coast, from the River Acheron to the Ambracian Gulf, was called Cassopœa, from the town Cassope, and is sometimes reckoned a distinct district. The Thesproti were the most ancient inhabitants of Epirus, and are said to have derived their name from Thesprotus, the son of Lycaon. They were Pelasgians, and their country was one of the chief seats of the Pelasgic nation. Here was the oracle of Dodona, the great centre of the Pelasgic worship. From Thesprotia issued the Thessalians, who took possession of the country afterward called Thessaly. In the historical period the Thesprotiæ were a people of small importance, having become subject to the kings of the Molossians.

THESSALIA (Θεσσαλία or Θετταλία: Θεσσαλόσ or Θετταλόσ), the largest division of Greece, was bounded on the north by the Cambanian Mountains, which separated it from Macedonia; on the west by Mount Pindus, which separated it from Epirus; on the east by the Ægean Sea; and on the south by the Maliac Gulf and Mount Ceta, which separated it from Locris, Phocis, and Ætolia. Thessaly Proper is a vast plain, lying between the Cambanian Mountains on the north and Mount Othrys on the south, Mount Pindus on the west, and Mounts Ossa and Pelion on the east. It is thus shut in on every side by mountain barriers, broken only at the northeastern corner by the valley and defile of Tempe, which separates Ossa from Olympus, and is the only road through which an im-vader can enter Thessaly from the west. This plain is drained by the River Penæus and its affluents, and is said to have been originally a vast lake, the waters of which were afterward carried off through the Vale of Tempe by some sudden convulsion, which rent the rocks of this valley asunder. The Lake of Nessonis, at the foot of Mount Ossa, and that of Babœis, at the foot of Mount Pelion, are supposed to have been remains of this vast lake. In addition to the plain already described, there were two other districts included under the general name of Thessaly: one called Magnesia, being a long, narrow strip of country, extending along the coast of the Ægean Sea from Tempe to the Pagasæan Gulf, and bounded on the west by Mounts Ossa and Olympus; and the other being a long narrow vale at the extreme south of the country, lying between Mounts Othrys and Ceta, and drained by the River Sperchæus. Thessaly is said to have been originally known by the names of Pyrrha, Æmonia, and Æolis. The two former appellations belong to mythology; the latter refers to the period when the country was inhabited by Æolians, who were afterward expelled from the country by the Thessalians about sixty years after the Trojan war. The Thessalians are said to have come from Thesprotia; but at what period their name became the name of the country can not be determined. It does not occur in Homer, who only mentions the several principalities of which it was composed, and does not give any general appellation to the country. Thessaly was divided in very early times into four districts or tetrarchies, a division which we still find subsisting in the Peloponnesian war. These districts were Hestiatotis, Pelasgiotis, Thessaliotis, and Phthiotis. They comprised, however, only the great Thessalian plain; and besides them, we find mention of four other districts, viz., Magnesia, Dolopia, Cetæa, and Malis. Thus there were eight districts altogether. Perrhæbia was, properly speaking, not a district, since Perrhæbi was the name of a Pelasgic people settled in Hestiatotis and Pelasgiotis. Vid. PERRHÆBI. 1. HESTIOTIS (Ἑστιαῖωτις or Ἑστιῶτις), inhabited by the Hestiatotæ (Ἑστιαῖωται or Ἑσιῶται), the northwestern part of Thessaly, bounded on the north by Macedonia, on the west by Epirus, on the east by Pelasgiotis, and on the south by Thessaliotis: the Penæus may be said in general to have formed its southern limit.—2. PELAGIOTIS (Πελασγιῶτις), inhabited by the Pelasgiotæ (Πελασγιῶται), the eastern part of the Thessalian plain, was bounded on the north by Macedonia, on the west by Hestiatotis, on the east by Magnesia, and on the south by the Sinus Pagasæus and Phthiotis. The name shows that it was originally inhabited by Pelasgians; and one of the chief towns in the district was Larissa, which was of Pelasgic origin.—3. THESSALIOTIS (Θεσσαλιῶτις), the southwestern part of the Thessalian plain, so called because it was first occupied by the Thessalians who came from Thesprotia. It was bounded on the north by Hestiatotis, on the west by Epirus, on the east by Pelasgiotis, and on the south by Dolopia and Phthiotis.—4. PHTHIOTIS (Φθιώτις), inhabited by the Phthiotæ (Φθιώται), the southeast of Thessaly, bounded on the north by Thessaliotis, on the west by Dolopia, on the south by the Sinus Maliacus, and on the east by the Pagasæan Gulf. Its inhabitants were Achæans, and are frequently called the Achæan Phthiotæ. It is in this district that Homer places Phthia and Hellas Proper, and the dominions of Achilles.—5. MAGNESIA. Vid. MAGNESIA.—6. ΔΟΛΟΠΙΑ (Δολοπία), inhabited by the Dōlōpēs (Δόλοπες), a small district bounded on the east by Phthiotis, on the north by Thessaliotis, on the west by Athamania, and on the south by Cetea. They were an ancient people, for they are not only mentioned by Homer as fighting before Troy, but they also sent deputies to the Amphictyonic assembly.—7. CΕΤΑΙΑ (Oiraia), inhabited by the Cetæi (Oiraioi) and Ænians (Aivivænes), a district in the upper valley of the Spercheus, lying between Mounts Othrys and Ceta, and bounded on the north by Dolopia, on the south by Phocis, and on the east by Malis.—8. ΜΑΛΙΣ. Vid. MALIS.—History of Thessaly. The Thessalians, as we have already seen, were a Thesprotian tribe. Under the guidance of leaders, who are said to have been descendants of Hercules, they invaded the western part of the country, afterward called Thessaliotis, and drove out or reduced to the condition of Penestæ or bondsmen the ancient Æolian inhabitants. The Thessalians afterward spread over the other parts of the country, compelling the Perrhæbi, Magnetes, Achæan Phthiotæ, etc., to submit to their authority and pay them tribute. The population of Thessaly, therefore, consisted, like that of Laconia, of three distinct classes: 1. The Penestæ, whose condition was nearly the same as that of the Helots. 2. The subject people, corresponding to the Pericæci of Laconia. 3. The Thessalian conquerors, who alone had any share in the public administration, and whose lands were cultivated by the Penestæ. For some time after the conquest, Thessaly was governed by kings of the race of Hercules; but the kingly power seems to have been abolished in early times, and the government in the separate cities became oligarchical, the power being chiefly in the hands of a few great families descended from the ancient kings. Of these, two of the most powerful were the Aleuadæ and the Scopadæ, the former of whom ruled at Larissa, and the latter at Cranon or Crannon. These nobles had vast estates cultivated by the Penestæ; they were celebrated for their hospitality and princely mode of life; and they attracted to their courts many of the poets and artists of Southern Greece. At an early period the Thessalians were united into a confederate body. Each of the four districts into which the country was divided probably regulated its affairs by some kind of provincial council; and, when occasion required, a chief magistrate was elected under the name of Tagus (Ταγός), whose commands were obeyed by all the four districts. His command was of a military rather than of a civil nature, and he seems to have been appointed only in case of war. We do not know the extent of his constitutional power, nor the time for which he held his office; probably neither was precisely fixed, and depended on the circumstances of the time and character of the individual. This confederacy, however, was not of much practical benefit to the Thessalian people, and appears to have been only used by the Thessalian nobles as a means of cementing and maintaining their power. The Thessalians never became of much importance in Grecian history. They submitted to the Persians on their invasion of Greece, and they exercised no important influence on Grecian affairs till after the end of the Peloponnesian war. About this time the power of the aristocratical families began to decline, and Lycophron, who had established himself as a tyrant at Pheræ, offered a formidable opposition to the great aristocratical families, and endeavored to extend his power over all Thessaly. His ambitious schemes were realized by Jason, the successor, and probably the son of Lycophron, who caused himself to be elected Tagus about B.C. 374. While he lived the whole of Thessaly was united as one political power, and he began to aim at making himself master of all Greece, when he was assassinated in 370. The office of Tagus became a tyranny under his successors, Polydorus, Polyphron, Alexander, Tisiphon, and Lycophron; but at length the old aristocratical families called in the assistance of Philip of Macedonia, who deprived Lycophron of his power in 353, and restored the ancient government in the different towns. The country, however, only changed masters; for a few years later (344) Philip made it completely subject to Macedonia, by placing at the head of the four divisions of the country governors devoted to his interests, and probably members of the ancient noble families, who had now become little better than his vassals. From this time Thessaly remained in a state of dependence upon the Macedonian kings, till the victory of T. Flamininus at Cynoscephalæ in 197 again gave them a semblance of independence under the protection of the Romans.

THESSALONICA (Θεσσαλονίκη), daughter of Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, by his wife or concubine Nicesipolis of Pheræ. She was taken prisoner by Cassander along with Olympias on the capture of Pydna in B.C. 317; and Cassander embraced the opportunity to connect himself with the ancient royal house of Macedonia by marrying her. By Cassander she became the mother of three sons, Philip, Antipater, and Alexander; and her husband paid her the honor of conferring her name upon the city of Thessalonica, which he founded on the site of the ancient Therma. (Vid. below.) After the death of Cassander, Thessalonica was put to death by her son Antipater, 295.

THESSALONICA (Θεσσαλονίκη, also Θεσσαλονίκη: now Saloniki), more anciently THERMA (Θέρμη: Θερμαῖος), an ancient city in Macedonia, situated at the northeastern extremity of the Sinus Thermaicus. Under the name of Therma it was not a place of much importance. It was taken and occupied by the Athenians a short time before the commencement of the Peloponnesian war (B.C. 432), but was soon afterward restored by them to Perdiccas. It was made an important city by Cassander, who collected in this place the inhabitants of several adjacent towns (about B.C. 315), and who gave it the name of Thessalonica, in honor of his wife, the daughter of Philip and sister of Alexander the Great. From this time it became a large and flourishing city. Its harbor was well situated for commercial intercourse with the Hellespont and the Ægean; and under the Romans it had the additional advantage of lying on the Via Egnatia, which led from the western shores of Greece to Byzantium and the East. It was visited by the Apostle Paul about A.D. 53; and about two years afterward he addressed from Corinth two epistles to his converts in the city. Thessalonica continued to be, under the empire, one of the most important cities of Macedonia; and at a later time it became the residence of the prefect, and the capital of the Illyrian provinces. It is celebrated at this period on account of the fearful massacre of its inhabitants by order of Theodosius, in consequence of a riot in which some of the Roman officers had been assassinated by the populace. Vid. THEODOSIUS.

[THESSALUS (Θεσσαλός). 1. Son of Hercules and Chalciopé (the daughter of Eurypylos, king of Cos), and father of Phidippus and Antiphus.—2. An eminent tragic actor in the time of Alexander the Great, whose special favor he enjoyed, and whom he served before his accession to the throne, and afterward accompanied on his expedition into Asia.]

THESSALUS (Θεσσαλός.) 1. A Greek physician, son of Hippocrates, passed some of his time at the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, who reigned B.C. 413–399. He was one of the founders of the sect of the Dogmatici, and is several times highly praised by Galen, who calls him the most eminent of the sons of Hippocrates. He was supposed by some of the ancient writers to be the author of several of the works that form part of the Hippocratic Collection, which he might have compiled from notes left by his father.—2. Also a Greek physician, was a native of Tralles in Lydia, and one of the founders of the medical sect of the Methodici. He lived at Rome in the reign of the Emperor Nero, A.D. 54–68, to whom he addressed one of his works; and here he died and was buried, and his tomb was to be seen in Pliny's time on the Via Appia. He considered himself superior to all his predecessors; he asserted that none of them had contributed anything to the advance of medical science, and boasted that he could himself teach the art of healing in six months. He is frequently mentioned by Galen, but always in terms of contempt and ridicule. None of his works are extant.

THESTIUS (Θέστιος), son of Mars (Ares) and Demonicé or Androdice, and, according to others, son of Agenor, and grandson of Pleuron, the king of Ætolia. He was the father of Iphielus, Euippus, Plexippus, Eurypylos, Leda, Althæa, and Hypermnestra. His wife is not the same in all traditions, some calling her Leneippe or Laophonte, a daughter of Pleuron, and others Deidamia. The patronymic THESTIDES is given to his grandson Meleager, as well as to his sons, and the female patronymic THESTIAS to his daughter Althæa, the mother of Meleager.

THESTOR (Θέστωρ). 1. Son of Idmon and Laothæ, and father of Calchas, Theoclymenus, Leucippe, and Theonoe. The patronymic THESTORIDES is frequently given to his son

Calchas.—[2. A Trojan warrior, son of Enops slain by Patroclus.]

THËTIS (Θέτις), one of the daughters of Ne-reus and Doris, was the wife of Peleus, by whom she became the mother of Achilles. As a marine divinity, she dwelt like her sisters, the Nereids, in the depth of the sea, with her father Ne-reus. She there received Bacchus (Dionysus) on his flight from Lycurgus, and the god, in his gratitude, presented her with a golden urn. When Hephæstus (Vulcan) was thrown down from heaven, he was likewise received by Thetis. She had been brought up by Hera (Juno), and when she reached the age of maturity, Zeus (Jupiter) and Hera (Juno) gave her, against her will, in marriage to Peleus Poseidon (Neptune) and Zeus (Jupiter) himself are said by some to have sued for her hand; but when Themis declared that the son of Thetis would be more illustrious than his father, both gods desisted from their suit. Others state that Thetis rejected the offers of Zeus (Jupiter), because she had been brought up by Hera (Juno); and the god, to revenge himself, decreed that she should marry a mortal. Chiron then informed Peleus how he might gain possession of her, even if she should metamorphose herself; for Thetis, like Proteus, had the power of assuming any form she pleased; and she had recourse to this means of escaping from Peleus, but the latter, instructed by Chiron, held the goddess fast till she again assumed her proper form, and promised to marry him. The wedding of Peleus was honored with the presence of all the gods, with the exception of Eris or Discord, who was not invited, and who avenged herself by throwing among the assembled gods the apple, which was the source of so much misery. Vid. PARIS. After Thetis had become the mother of Achilles, she bestowed upon him the tenderest care and love. Vid. ACHILLES.

THEÛPÔLIS (Θεούπολις), a later name given to the city of Antioch in Syria, on account of its eminence in the early history of Christianity.

THEÛPÔSÔRON (Θεού πρόσωρον, i. e., the face of a god: now Ras-esh-Shukch; Arab. Wejhel-Khiar, i. e., a face of stone), a lofty rugged promontory on the coast of Phœnicæ, between Tripolis and Byblus, formed by a spur of Lebanon, and running far out to sea. Some travellers have fancied that they can trace in its side view that resemblance to a human profile which its name implies.

THËVESTE (Θεούεστη: ruins at Tebessa), a considerable city of Northern Africa, on the frontier of Numidia and Byzacena, at the centre of several roads. It was of comparatively late origin, and a Roman colony. Among its recently discovered ruins are a fine triumphal arch and the old walls of the city, the circuit of which was large enough to have contained forty thousand inhabitants.

THÛA (Θεία), daughter of Cœlus (Uranus) and Terra (Ge), one of the female Titans, became by Hyperion the mother of Helios, Eos (Aurora), and Selene, that is, she was regarded as the deity from whom all light proceeded.

[THIBRON. Vid. THIBRON.]

THILSAPHATA (now probably Tell Afad, between Mosul and Sinjar), a town of Mesopotamia near the Tigris.

THILUTHA, a fort in the south of Mesopotamia, on an island in the Euphrates. Some identify it with Olabus, and that with the fort now called Zobia or Juba in about 34° north latitude.

[THIMBRON (Θιμβρον) or THIBRON (Θιβρον). 1. A Lacedæmonian, was sent as harmost in B.C. 400, with an army of five thousand men, to aid the Ionians against Tissaphernes. He arrived in Asia about the time of the return of the Greek mercenaries of Cyrus from Upper Asia, and at once engaged them to serve with him against Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus. With their aid he captured several cities.—2. A Lacedæmonian, an officer under Harpalus, Macedonian satrap of Babylon. After his death he got possession of his treasures, fleet, and army, and laid siege to Cyrene in Africa. He took their port Apollonia, and would have succeeded but for the desertion of his officer Mnasicles, under whose direction the Cyreneans recovered most of what they had previously lost. A force having been sent against him from Egypt under Ophellas, he was defeated, and soon after fell into the hands of some Libyans, by whom he was delivered up, taken to Apollonia, and crucified.]

THINÆ or THĪNA (Θίναί, Θίνα), a chief city of the SINAÆ, and a great emporium for the silk and wool trade of the extreme East. Some seek it on the eastern coast of China, others on the southeastern coast of Cochin-China.

THIDŌMAS (Θειδομάς), father of Hylas; and King of the Dryopes.

THIS (Θίς: Θιμίτης), a great city of Upper Egypt, capital of the Thinites Nomos, and the seat of some of the ancient dynasties. It was either the same place as ABYDUS (No. 2), or was so near it as to be entirely supplanted by Abydus.

THISBE (Θισβή), a beautiful Babylonian maiden, beloved by Pyramus. The lovers, living in adjoining houses, often secretly conversed with each other through a hole in the wall, as their parents would not sanction their marriage. Once they agreed upon a rendezvous at the tomb of Ninus. Thisbe arrived first, and while she was waiting for Pyramus, she perceived a lioness which had just torn to pieces an ox, and took to flight. While running she lost her garment, which the lioness soiled with blood. In the mean time Pyramus arrived, and, finding her garment covered with blood, he imagined that she had been murdered, and made away with himself under a mulberry-tree, the fruit of which henceforth was as red as blood. Thisbe, who afterward found the body of her lover, likewise killed herself.

THISBE, afterward THISEBÆ (Θισβή, Θισβαί: Θισβαίος, Θισβεύς; now Kakosia), a town of Boeotia, on the borders of Phocis, and between Mount Helicon and the Corinthian Gulf. It was famed for its number of wild pigeons, which are still found in abundance in the neighborhood of Kakosia.

THISBŌA (Θεισβῶα; Θεισοῦτής), a town in Arcadia, on Mount Lycæus, called after a nymph of the same name.

[THIUS (Θειοῦς, now Kutyfarina), a river in Northern Laconia, which joins the Alpheus on the borders of Arcadia.]

THMŪIS (Θμουίς: ruins at Tmaie, near Manzourah), a city of Lower Egypt, on a canal on the eastern side of the Mendesian mouth of the Nile. It was a chief seat of the worship of the god Mendes (the Egyptian Pan), under the symbol of a goat; and, according to Jerome, the word Thmuïs signifies goat. It was the chief city of the Nomos Thmuïtes, which was afterward united with the Mendesian Nomos.

THOANTĒA, a surname of the Taurian Artemis, derived from Thoas, king of Tauris.

THOAS (Θόας.) 1. Son of Andræmon and Gorge, was king of Calydon and Pleuron, in Ætolia, and sailed with forty ships against Troy.—2. Son of Bacchus (Dionysus) and Ariadne, was king of Lemnos, and married to Myrina, by whom he became the father of Hypsipyle and Sicinus. When the Lemnian women killed all the men in the island, Hypsipyle saved her father Thoas, and concealed him. Afterward, however, he was discovered by the other women and killed; or, according to other accounts, he escaped to Taurus, or to the island of CENOË near Eubœa, which was henceforth called Sicinus. The patronymic THOANTĪAS is given to Hypsipyle, as the daughter of Thoas.—3. Son of Borysthenes, and king of Tauris, into whose dominions Iphigenia was carried by Diana (Artemis) when she was to have been sacrificed.—4. Son of Jason and Hypsipyle, grandson of No. 2; according to Homer, while others called him Deiphilus or Nebroponus.—5. Son of Icarius and Peribœa, brother of Penelope.—6. A Trojan warrior, slain by Menelaus at the siege of Troy.—7. A Trojan warrior, accompanied Æneas to Italy, where he was slain by Halesus.]

THOMAS MAOISTER, a rhetorician and grammarian, who flourished about A.D. 1310. He was a native of Thessalonica, and lived at the court of the Emperor Andronicus Palæologus I., where he held the offices of marshal (Magister Officiorum) and keeper of the archives (Chartophylax); but he afterward retired to a monastery, where he assumed the name of Theodulus, and devoted himself to the study of the ancient Greek authors. His chief work, which has come down to us, is a Lexicon of Attic Words (κατὰ Ἀλλόφλητον ὀνομάτων Ἀττικῶν Ἐκλογαί), compiled from the works of the elder grammarians, such as Phrynichus, Ammonius, Herodian, and Mæris. The work has some value on account of its containing much from the elder grammarians, which would otherwise have been lost; but, when Thomas deserts his guides, he often falls into the most serious errors. The best edition is by Ritschl, Halis Sax., 1831, 1832, 8vo.

[THON (Θών), husband of Polydamna, renowned for his wealth, a king in Egypt, received Menelaus hospitably when he came thither with Helen after the Trojan war, and bestowed rich presents upon him, while Polydamna was equally liberal to Helen. Herodotus makes Paris and Helen to have arrived there from Sparta, and to have been detained by Thonis (Θώνις), the guard of the Canobic mouth of the Nile, until delivered to Proteus, who kept Helen until the visit of Menelaus in search of her after the fall of Troy.]

the Mœræ.—2. Son of Phænops, a Trojan warrior, slain along with his brother Xanthus by Diomedes.—3. A Trojan warrior, slain by Ulysses.—4. A Phœacian, who distinguished himself in the games celebrated by Alcinoüs in honor of Ulysses.]

THORICUS (Θορικός or Θορικός: Θορικός, Θορική, now Theriko), one of the twelve ancient towns in Attica, and subsequently a demus belonging to the tribe Acamantis, was situated on the southeastern coast, a little above Sunium, and was fortified by the Athenians toward the close of the Peloponnesian war. There are still extensive remains of the ancient town.

THORNAX (Θόρναξ: now Pavlaika), a mountain in Laconia, northeast of Sparta, on which stood a celebrated temple of Apollo.

THOSPITES LACUS (Θωσπίτις λίμνη: now Goljik I.), a lake in Armenia Major, through which the Tigris flows. The lake, and the surrounding district, also called Thospitis, were both named from a city Thospia (Θωσπία) at the northern end of the lake.

THRACIA (Θράκη, Ion. Θρήκη, Θρηκή, Θρηκίη: Θράξ, pl. Θράκες, Ion. Θρήξ and Θρηξίς, pl. Θρήκες, Θρηήκες: Thrax, pl. Thraces), was in earlier times the name of the vast space of country bounded on the north by the Danube, on the south by the Propontis and the Ægean, on the east by the Pontus Euxinus, and on the west by the River Strymon and the easternmost of the Illyrian tribes. It was divided into two parts by Mount Hæmus (now the Balkan), running from west to east, and separating the plain of the Lower Danube from the rivers which fall into the Ægean. Two extensive mountain ranges branch off from the southern side of Mount Hæmus, one running southeast toward Constantinople, and the other, called Rhodope, east of the preceding one, and also running in a southeasterly direction near the River Nestus. Between these two ranges there are many plains, which are drained by the Hebrus, the largest river in Thrace. At a later time the name Thrace was applied to a more limited extent of country. The district between the Strymon and the Nestus was added to Macedonia by Philip, and was usually called Macedonia Adjuncta. Vid. MACEDONIA. Under Augustus the part of the country north of the Hæmus was made a separate Roman province under the name of Mœsia (vid. MÆSIA); but the district between the Strymon and the Nestus had been previously restored to Thrace by the Romans. The Roman province of Thrace was accordingly bounded on the west by the River Nestus, which separated it from Macedonia, on the north by Mount Hæmus, which divided it from Mœsia, on the east by the Euxine, and on the south by the Propontis and Ægean. Thrace, in its widest extent, was peopled in the times of Herodotus and Thucydides by a vast number of different tribes; but their customs and character were marked by great uniformity. Herodotus says that, next to the Indians, the Thracians were the most numerous of all races, and if united under one head would have been irresistible. He describes them as a savage, cruel, and rapacious people, delighting in blood, but brave and warlike. According to his account, which is confirmed by other writers, the Thracian chiefs sold their children for exportation to the foreign merchant; they purchased their wives from their parents; they punctured or tattooed their bodies, and those of the women belonging to them, as a sign of noble birth; they despised agriculture, and considered it most honorable to live by war and robbery. Deep drinking prevailed among them extensively, and their quarrels over their wine-cups were notorious even in the time of Augustus. (Hor. Carm., i., 27.) They worshipped deities, whom the Greeks assimilated to Ares, Dionysus, and Artemis: the great sanctuary and oracle of their god Bacchus (Dionysus) was in one of the loftiest summits of Mount Rhodope. The tribes on the southern coast attained to some degree of civilization, owing to the numerous Greek colonies which were founded in their vicinity; but the tribes in the interior seem to have retained their savage habits, with little mitigation, down to the time of the Roman empire. In earlier times, however, some of the Thracian tribes must have been distinguished by a higher degree of civilization than prevailed among them at a later period. The earliest Greek poets, Orpheus, Linus, Musæus, and others, are all represented as coming from Thrace. Eumolpus, likewise, who founded the Eleusinian mysteries at Attica, is said to have been a Thracian, and to have fought against Erechtheus, king of Athens. We also find mention of the Thracians in other parts of Southern Greece: thus they are said to have once dwelt both in Phocis and Bœotia. They were also spread over a part of Asia: the Thynians and Bithynians, and perhaps also the Mysians, were members of the great Thracian race. Even Xenophon speaks of Thrace in Asia, which extended along the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus as far as Heraclea. The principal Greek colonies along the coast, beginning at the Strymon and going eastward, were AMPHIPOLIS, at the mouth of the Strymon; ABERA, a little to the west of the Nestus; DICÆA or Dicæopolis, a settlement of Maronea; MARONEA itself, colonized by the Chians; STRYME, a colony of the Thasians; MESEMBRIA, founded by the Samothracians; and ÆNOS, a Lesbian colony at the mouth of the Hebrus. The Thracian Chersonesus was probably colonized by the Greeks at an early period, but it did not contain any important Greek settlement till the migration of the first Miltiades to the country, during the reign of Pisistratus at Athens. Vid. CHERSONESUS. On the Propontis the two chief Greek settlements were those of PERINTHUS and SELVMBRIA; and on the Thracian Bosphorus was the important town of BYZANTIUM. There were only a few Greek settlements on the southwest coast of the Euxine; the most important were those of APOLLONIA, ODESSUS, CALLATIS, TOMI, renowned as the place of Ovid's banishment, and ISTRIA, near the southern mouth of the Danube. The Thracians are said to have been conquered by Scsostris, king of Egypt, and subsequently to have been subdued by the Teucirians and Mysians; but the first really historical fact respecting them is their subjugation by Megabazus, the general of Darius. After the Persians had been driven out of Europe by the Greeks, the Thracians recovered their independence; and at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, almost all the Thracian tribes were united under the dominion of Sitalces, king of the Odrysæ, whose kingdom extended from Abdera to the Euxine and the mouth of the Danube. In the third year of the Peloponnesian war (B.C. 429), Sitalces, who had entered into an alliance with the Athenians, invaded Macedonia with a vast army of one hundred and fifty thousand men, but was compelled, by the failure of provisions, to return home after remaining in Macedonia thirty days. Sitalces fell in battle against the Triballi in 424, and was succeeded by his nephew Seuthes, who, during a long reign, raised his kingdom to a height of power and prosperity which it had never previously attained, so that his regular revenues amounted to the annual sum of four hundred talents, in addition to contributions of gold and silver in the form of presents to a nearly equal amount. After the death of Seuthes, which appears to have happened a little before the close of the Peloponnesian war, we find his powerful kingdom split up into different parts; and when Xenophon, with the remains of the ten thousand Greeks, arrived on the opposite coast of Asia, another Seuthes applied to him for assistance to reinstate him in his dominions. Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, reduced the greater part of Thrace; and after the death of Alexander, the country fell to the share of Lysimachus. It subsequently formed a part of the Macedonian dominions, but it continued to be governed by its native princes, and was only nominally subject to the Macedonian monarchs. Even under the Romans Thrace was for a long time governed by its own chiefs, and we do not know at what period it was made into a Roman province.

THRASEA PÆTUS, P., a distinguished Roman senator and Stoic philosopher in the reign of Nero, was a native of Patavium, and was probably born soon after the death of Augustus. He appears at an early period of his life to have made the younger Cato his model, of whose life he wrote an account. He married Arria, the daughter of the heroic Arria, who showed her husband Cæcina how to die; and his wife was worthy of her mother and her husband. At a later period he gave his own daughter in marriage to Helvidius Priscus, who trod closely in the footsteps of his father-in-law. After incurring the hatred of Nero by the independence of his character and the freedom with which he expressed his opinions, he was condemned to death by the senate by command of the emperor, A.D. 66. By his execution and that of his friend Barea Soranus, Nero, says Tacitus, resolved to murder Virtue herself. The panegyric of Thræsea was written by Arulenus Rusticus, who was, in consequence, put to death by Domitian.

[THRASIUS (Θράσιος). 1. A Trojan warrior, slain by Achilles.—2. A soothsayer of Cyprus, who told Busiris that by sacrificing a stranger to the gods, he would cause a drought which then prevailed to cease; Busiris tried the experiment with the seer himself.]

THRASYBŪLUS (Θρασύβουλος). 1. Tyrant of Miletus, was a contemporary of Periander and Alyattes, the king of Lydia. He was intimately connected with Thrasylbulus. The story of the mode in which Thrasylbulus gave his advice to Periander as to the best means of securing his power, is given under PERIANDER.—2. A celebrated Athenian, son of Lycus. He was zealously attached to the Athenian democracy, and took an active part in overthrowing the oligarchical government of the Four Hundred in B.C. 411. This is the first occasion on which he is mentioned; but from this time he took a prominent part in the conduct of the war. On the establishment of the Thirty Tyrants at Athens he was banished, and was living in exile at Thebes when the rulers of Athens were perpetrating their excesses of tyranny. Being aided by the Thebans with arms and money, he collected a small band, and seized the fortress of Phyle. He next marched upon the Piræus, which fell into his hands; and from this place he carried on war for several months against the Ten, who had succeeded to the government, and eventually he obtained possession of Athens, and restored the democracy, 403. In 390 he commanded the Athenian fleet in the Ægean, and was slain by the inhabitants of Aspendus.—3. Brother of Gelon and Hieron, tyrants of Syracuse. He succeeded Hieron in the government B.C. 467, and was soon afterwards expelled by the Syracusans, whom he had provoked by his rapacity and cruelty. He withdrew to Locri, in Italy, and there ended his days.

THRASYDÆUS (Θρασύδαιος), tyrant of Agrigentum, was the son and successor of Theron, B.C. 472. Shortly after his accession he was defeated by Hieron of Syracuse, and the Agrigentines immediately took advantage of this disaster to expel him from their city. He made his escape to Greece, but was arrested at Megara, and publicly executed.

THRASYLLUS or THRASYLUS (Θράσυλλος, Θράσυλος). 1. An Athenian, who actively assisted Thrasylbulus in opposing the oligarchical revolution in B.C. 411. He was one of the commanders at the battle of Arginusæ, and was among the six generals who returned to Athens and were put to death, 406.—2. A celebrated astrologer at Rhodes, with whom Tiberius became acquainted during his residence in that island, and whom he ever after held in the highest honor. He died in A.D. 36, the year before Tiberius, and is said to have saved the lives of many persons whom Tiberius would otherwise have put to death, by falsely predicting for this very purpose that the emperor would live ten years longer. The son of this Thrasyllus succeeded to his father's skill, and he is said to have predicted the empire to Nero.

THRASYMĀCHUS (Θρασύμαχος), a native of Chalcedon, was a sophist, and one of the earliest cultivators of the art of rhetoric. He was a contemporary of Gorgias. He is introduced by Plato as one of the interlocutors in the Politia, and is referred to several times in the Phædrus.

THRASYMĒDES (Θρασύμήδης), son of the Pylian Nestor and Anaxibia, accompanied his father on the expedition against Troy, and returned with him to Pylos.

[THRASYMĒLUS (Θρασύμηλος), in the Iliad, charioteer of Sarpedon, slain by Patroclus.]

Diod.), a city of the Acrorēi in Elis, not far from the borders of Arcadia.]

[THRIA (Θρία), a village of Attica, from which the surrounding district was called THIRIASIUS CAMPUS (τὸ Θριάσιον πεδῖον), a part of the Eleusinian plain extending between the range of Ægaleus and Eleusis, along the borders of the bay, and to the north of it, and famed for its fertility.]

THRŌNIUM (Θρόνιον: Θρόνιος, Θρονιεύς: now Romani), the chief town of the Locri Epicnemidii, on the River Boagrius, at a short distance from the sea, with a harbor upon the coast.

[THRINAKIA (Θρινακία). Vid. SICILIA.]

[THRYUM (Θρύον, near the modern Agulinitza), a city in Triphylia in Elis, on the Alphcus, near the borders of the Pylians, corresponding to the later Epitalium.]

THUCYDIDES (Θουκυδίδης). 1. An Athenian statesman, of the demus Alopece, son of Melesias. After the death of Cimon in B.C. 449, Thucydides became the leader of the aristocratic party, which he concentrated and more thoroughly organized in opposition to Pericles. He was ostracized in 444, thus leaving the undisputed political ascendancy to Pericles. He left two sons, Melesias and Stephanus; and a son of the former of these, named Thucydides after his grandfather, was a pupil of Socrates.—2. The great Athenian historian, of the demus Halimus, was the son of Olorus or Orolus and Hegesipyle. He is said to have been connected with the family of Cimon; and we know that Miltiades, the conqueror of Marathon, married Hegesipyle, the daughter of a Thracian king called Olorus, by whom she became the mother of Cimon; and it has been conjectured with much probability that the mother of Thucydides was a grand-daughter of Miltiades and Hegesipyle. According to a statement of Pamphila (vid. PAMPHILA), Thucydides was forty years of age at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war or B.C. 431, and accordingly he was born in 471. There is a story in Lucian of Herodotus having read his History at the Olympic games to the assembled Greeks; and Suidas adds that Thucydides, then a boy, was present, and shed tears of emulation; a presage of his own future historical distinction. But this celebrated story ought probably to be rejected as a fable. Thucydides is said to have been instructed in oratory by Antiphon, and in philosophy by Anaxagoras; but whether these statements are to be received can not be determined. It is certain, however, that, being an Athenian of a good family, and living in a city which was the centre of Greek civilization, he must have had the best possible education: that he was a man of great ability and cultivated understanding his work clearly shows. He informs us that he possessed gold mines in that part of Thrace which is opposite to the island of Thasos, and that he was a person of the greatest influence among those in that part of Thrace. This property, according to some accounts, he had from his ancestors: according to other accounts, he married a rich woman of Scaptesyale, and received them as a portion with her. Thucydides left a son called Timotheus; and a daughter also is mentioned, who is said to have written the eighth book of the History of Thucydides. Thucydides (ii., 48) was one of those who suffered from the great plague of Athens, and one of the few who recovered. We have no trustworthy evidence of Thucydides having distinguished himself as an orator, though it is not unlikely that he did, for his oratorical talent is shown by the speeches that he has inserted in his history. He was, however, employed in a military capacity, and he was in command of an Athenian squadron of seven ships at Thasus, B.C. 424, when Euclēs, who commanded in Amphipolis, sent for his assistance against Brasidas, who was before that town with an army. Brasidas, fearing the arrival of a superior force, offered favorable terms to Amphipolis, which were readily accepted, for there were few Athenians in the place, and the rest did not wish to make resistance. Thucydides arrived at Eion, at the mouth of the Strymon, on the evening of the same day on which Amphipolis surrendered; and though he was too late to save Amphipolis, he prevented Eion from falling into the hand of the enemy. In consequence of this failure, Thucydides became an exile, probably to avoid a severer punishment; for Cleon, who was at this time in great favor with the Athenians, appears to have excited popular suspicion against him. There are various untrustworthy accounts as to his place of residence during his exile; but we may conclude that he could not safely reside in any place which was under Athenian dominion, and as he kept his eye on the events of the war, he must have lived in those parts which belonged to the Spartan alliance. His own words certainly imply that, during his exile, he spent much of his time either in the Peloponnesus or in places which were under Peloponnesian influence (v., 26); and his work was the result of his own experience and observations. His minute description of Syracuse and the neighborhood leads to the probable conclusion that he was personally acquainted with the localities; and if he visited Sicily, it is probable that he also saw some parts of Southern Italy. Thucydides says that he lived twenty years in exile (v., 26); and as his exile commenced in the beginning of 423, he may have returned to Athens in the beginning of 403, about the time when Thrasybulus liberated Athens. Thucydides is said to have been assassinated at Athens soon after his return; but other accounts place his death in Thrace. There is a general agreement, however, among the ancient authorities that he came to a violent end. His death can not be placed later than 401. The time when he composed his work has been a matter of dispute. He informs us himself that he was busy in collecting materials all through the war from the beginning to the end (i., 22), and, of course, he would register them as he got them. Plutarch says that he wrote the work in Thrace; but the work, in the shape in which we have it, was certainly not finished until after the close of the war, and he was probably engaged upon it at the time of his death. A question has been raised as to the authorship of the eighth and last book of Thucydides, which breaks off in the twenty-first year of the war (411). It differs from all the other books in containing no speeches, and it has also been supposed to be inferior to the rest as a piece of composition. Accordingly, several ancient critics supposed that the eighth book was not by Thucydides : some attribute it to his daughter, and some to Xenophon or Theopompus, because both of them continued the history. The words with which Xenophon's Hellenica commence (μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα) may chiefly have led to the supposition that he was the author, for his work is made to appear as a continuation of that of Thucydides ; but this argument is in itself of little weight ; and besides, both the style of the eighth book is different from that of Xenophon, and the manner of treating the subject, for the division of the year into summers and winters, which Thucydides has observed in his first seven books, is continued in the eighth, but is not observed by Xenophon. The rhetorical style of Theopompus, which was the characteristic of his writing, renders it also improbable that he was the author of the eighth book. It seems the simplest supposition to consider Thucydides himself as the author of this book, since he names himself as the author twice (viii., 6, 60) ; but it is probable that he had not the opportunity of revising it with the same care as the first seven books. It is stated by an ancient writer that Xenophon made the work of Thucydides known, which may be true, as he wrote the first two books of his Hellenica, or the part which now ends with the second book, for the purpose of completing the history. The work of Thucydides, from the commencement of the second book, is chronologically divided into winters and summers, and each summer and winter make a year (ii., 1). His summer comprises the time from the vernal to the autumnal equinox, and the winter comprises the period from the autumnal to the vernal equinox. The division into books and chapters was probably made by the Alexandrine critics. The history of the Peloponnesian war opens the second book of Thucydides, and the first is introductory to the history. He begins his first book by observing that the Peloponnesian war was the most important event in Grecian history, which he shows by a rapid review of the history of the Greeks from the earliest periods to the commencement of the war (i., 1-21). After his introductory chapters he proceeds to explain the alleged grounds and causes of the war : the real cause was, he says, the Spartan jealousy of the Athenian power. His narrative is interrupted (c. 89-118), after he has come to the time when the Lacedæmonians resolved on war, by a digression on the rise and progress of the power of Athens ; a period which had been either omitted by other writers, or treated imperfectly, and with little regard to chronology, as by Hellenicus in his Attic history (c. 97). He resumes his narrative (c. 119) with the negotiations that preceded the war ; but this leads to another digression of some length on the treason of Pausanias (c. 128-134), and the exile of Themistocles (c. 135-138). He concludes the book with the speech of Pericles, who advised the Athenians to refuse the demands of the Peloponnesians ; and his subject, as already observed, begins with the second book. A history which treats of so many events, which took place at remote spots, could only be written, in the time of Thucydides, by a man who took great pains to ascertain facts by personal inquiry. In modern times facts are made known by printing as soon as they occur ; and the printed records of the time, newspapers and the like, are often the only evidence of many facts which become history. When we know the careless way in which facts are now reported and recorded by very incompetent persons, often upon very indifferent and hearsay testimony, and compare with such records the pains that Thucydides took to ascertain the chief events of a war, with which he was contemporary, in which he took a share as a commander, the opportunities which his means allowed, his great abilities, and serious, earnest character, it is a fair conclusion that we have a more exact history of a long eventful period by Thucydides than we have of any period in modern history equally long and equally eventful. His whole work shows the most scrupulous care and diligence in ascertaining facts ; his strict attention to chronology, and the importance that he attaches to it, are additional proof of his historical accuracy. His narrative is brief and concise : it generally contains bare facts expressed in the fewest possible words ; and when we consider what pains it must have cost him to ascertain these facts, we admire the self-denial of a writer who is satisfied with giving facts in their naked brevity, without ornament, without any parade of his personal importance, and of the trouble that his matter cost him. A single chapter must sometimes have represented the labor of many days and weeks. Such a principle of historical composition is the evidence of a great and elevated mind. The history of Thucydides only makes an octavo volume of moderate size ; many a modern writer would have spun it out to a dozen volumes, and so have spoiled it. A work that is for all ages must contain much in little compass. He seldom makes reflections in the course of his narrative : occasionally he has a chapter of political and moral observations, animated by the keenest perception of the motives of action and the moral character of man. Many of his speeches are political essays, or materials for them ; they are not mere imaginations of his own for rhetorical effect ; they contain the general sense of what was actually delivered as nearly as he could ascertain, and in many instances he had good opportunities of knowing what was said, for he heard some speeches delivered (i., 22). His opportunities, his talents, his character, and his subject, all combined to produce a work that stands alone, and in its kind has neither equal nor rival. His pictures are sometimes striking and tragic, an effect produced by severe simplicity and minute particularity. Such is the description of the plague of Athens. Such, also, is the incomparable history of the Athenian expedition to Sicily, and its melancholy termination. A man who thinks profoundly will have a form of expression which is stamped with the character of his mind ; and the style of Thucydides is accordingly concise, vigorous, and energetic. We feel that all the words were intended to have a meaning, and have a meaning : none of them are idle. Yet he is sometimes harsh and obscure ; and probably he was so, even to his own countrymen.

Some of his sentences are very involved, and the connection and dependence of the parts are often difficult to seize. The best editions of Thucydides are by Bekker, Berlin, 1821, 3 vols. 8vo; by Poppo, Leipzig, 10 vols. 8vo, 1821-1838, of which two volumes are filled with prolegomena; by Haack, with selections from the Greek Scholia and short notes, Leipz., 1820, 2 vols. 8vo; by Gölter, 2 vols. 8vo, Leipz., 1826, [2d edit., 1836, 2 vols. 8vo]; by Arnold, 3 vols. 8vo, Oxford, 1830-1835, [2d edit., Oxford, 1840-1842; 3d edit., with copious indexes, still unfinished; by Krüger, with grammatical and brief explanatory notes, Berlin, 1846, 2 vols. 8vo; and by Poppo (school edit.), with brief notes, Erfurt and Gotha, 1843-1848, still incomplete.]

THULĒ (Θούλη), an island in the northern part of the German Ocean, regarded by the ancients as the most northerly point on the whole earth. It is first mentioned by Pytheas, the celebrated Greek navigator of Massilia, who undertook a voyage to Britain and Thule, of which he gave a description in his work on the Ocean. All subsequent writers who speak of Thule appear to have taken their accounts from that of Pytheas. According to Pytheas, Thule was six days' sail from Britain; and the day and night there were each six months long. He further stated that in Thule and those distant parts there was neither earth, sea, nor air, but a sort of mixture of all these, like to the mollusca, in which the earth, and the sea, and every thing else were suspended, and which could not be penetrated either by land or by sea. Many modern writers suppose the Thule of Pytheas to be the same as Iceland, while others regard it as a part of Norway. The Thule of Ptolemy, however, lay much farther to the south, and should probably be identified with the largest of the Shetland Islands.

THŪRII, more rarely THŪRIUM (Θούριοι, Θούριον: Θούριος, Θουριεύς, Thurius, Thurinus: now Terra nuova), a Greek city in Lucania, founded B.C. 443, near the site of the ancient Sybaris, which had been destroyed more than sixty years before. Vid. SYBARIS. It was built by the remains of the population of Sybaris, assisted by colonists from all parts of Greece, but especially from Athens. Among these colonists were the historian Herodotus and the orator Lysias, the latter of whom, however, was only a youth at the time, and subsequently returned to Athens. The new city, from which the remains of the Sybarites were soon expelled, rapidly attained great power and prosperity, and became one of the most important Greek towns in the south of Italy. Thus we are told that the Thurians were able to bring fourteen thousand foot soldiers and one thousand horse into the field against the Lucanians. In the Samnite wars Thuri received a Roman garrison; but it revolted to Hannibal in the second Punic war. The Carthaginian general, however, at a later time, not trusting the Thurians, plundered the town, and removed three thousand five hundred of its inhabitants to Croton. The Romans subsequently sent a Latin colony to Thuri, and changed its name into Copiae; but it continued to retain its original name, under which it is mentioned by Cæsar in the civil war as a municipium.

[THURIUS MONS (τὸ Θούριον ὄρος, according to Plutarch, also called τὸ Ὀρθόπαγον ὄρος), a mountain of Bœotia, south of Chæronea, on the right bank of the Cephissus, containing the sources of the River Morius.]

[THYAMIA (Θυαμία), a strong place in the south of Sicily, on the borders of Phlasiæ, and an object of contention between the two states.]

THYĀMIS (Θύαμις: now Kalama), a river in Epirus, forming the boundary between Thesprotia and the district of Cestryna, and flowing into the sea opposite Corcyra and near a promontory of the same name.

THYĀDES. Vid. THYIA.

THYĀNUS (Θύανος), a mountain in Acarnania, south of Argos Amphiloichium.

[THYĀTĪRA (Θυάτειρα τὰ: now Akhissar, with important ruins), a considerable city in the northern part of Lydia, near Mysia, on the River Lycus, a branch of the Hyllus; according to Strabo, a Macedonian colony; said to have been built by Seleucus Nicator, or, at least, greatly enlarged, as others mention an earlier place on the site called Pelopia and Euhippe. It was celebrated for its purple dye, but still more as an early seat of Christianity and one of the seven churches of the Apocalypse.]

THYESTES (Θυέστης), son of Pelops and Hippodamia, was the brother of Atreus and the father of Ægisthus. His story is given under ATREUS and ÆGISTHUS.

[THYESTĪDES (Θυεστιάδης), son or grandson of Thyestes, as Ægisthus is called in the Odyssey, &c.]

THYIA (Θυία), a daughter of Castalius or Cephisæus, became by Apollo the mother of Delphus. She is said to have been the first to sacrifice to Bacchus (Dionysus), and to celebrate orgies in his honor. From her the Attic women, who went yearly to Mount Parnassus to celebrate the Dionysiac orgies with the Delphian Thyiades, received themselves the name of THYIĀDES or THYĀDES. This word, however, comes from θύω, and properly signifies the raging or frantic women.

THYMBRA (Θύμβρα). 1. A city of the Troad, north of Ilium Vetus, on a hill by the side of the River THYMBRIUS, with a celebrated temple of Apollo, who derived from this place the epithet Thymbreus. The surrounding plain still bears the same name.—2. A wooded district in Phrygia, no doubt connected with THYMBRIUM.

THYMBRĪĀ (Θυμβρία), a place in Caria, on the Mæander, four stadia east of Myus, with a Chæronium, that is, a cave containing mephitic vapor.

THYMBRĪUM (Θύμβριον: Thymbriani), a small town of Phrygia, ten parasangs west of Tyriæum, with the so-called fountain of Midas (Xen., Anab., i., 2).

THYMBRĪUS (Θύμβριος: now Thimbrek), a river of the Troad, falling into the Scamander. At the present day it flows direct into the Hellespont; and, on this and other grounds, some doubt whether the Thimbrek is the ancient river.

THYMELE, a celebrated mime or actress in the reign of Domitian, with whom she was a great favorite. She frequently acted along with Latinus.

THYMÆTES (Θυμοίρη). 1. One of the elders of Troy. A soothsayer had predicted that on a certain day a boy should be born by whom Troy should be destroyed. On that day Paris was born to Priam, and Munippus to Thymætes. Priam ordered Munippus and his mother Cylla to be killed. Hence Virgil (Æn., ii., 31) represents Æneas saying that it was doubtful whether Thymætes advised the Trojans to draw the wooden horse into the city, in order to revenge himself.—[2. A Trojan warrior, accompanied Æneas to Italy, and was there slain in the war with Turnus.]

THÏNI (Θυνοί), a Thracian people, whose original abodes were near Salmydessus, but who afterward passed over into BITHYNIA.

THÏNÏA (Θυνία). 1. The land of the Thyni in Thrace.—2. Another name for BITHYNIA.—3. Vid. THYNIAS.

THÏNIAS or THÏNÏA (Θυνίας, Θυνία). 1. (Now Inada), a promontory on the coast of Thrace, northwest of Salmydessus, with a town of the same name.—2. (Now Kirpe), a small island of the Euxine, on the coast of Bithynia, near the Promontorium Calpe, also called Apollonia and Daphnusa.

THÏONE (Θυώνη), the name of Semele, under which Bacchus (Dionysus) fetched her from Hades, and introduced her among the immortals. Hence Bacchus (Dionysus) is also called THÏONEUS. Both names are formed from θύειν, "to be inspired."

THÏRÏA (Θυρέα, Ion. Θυρέη; Θυρεάτης), the chief town in Cynuria, the district on the borders of Laconia and Argolis, was situated upon a height on the bay of the sea called after it SINUS THÏREATES (Θυρεάτης κόλπος). It was for the possession of Thyrea that the celebrated battle was fought between the three hundred Spartans and three hundred Argives. The territory of Thyrea was called THÏRÏATIS (Θυρεάτης).

THÏSDRUS, TÏSDRUS, or TÏSDRUS (Θυσδρός; ruins at El-Jemm), a large fortified city of Byzacena, northwest of the promontory Brachodes (now Ras Kapoudiah). Under the Romans it was a free city. It was here that the Emperor Gordian assumed the purple.

THÏSSÏGÏTÏ (Θυσσαγέται), a people of Sarmatia Asiatica, on the eastern shores of the Palus Mæotis.

THÏSSUS (Θύσσορ or Θυσοός), a town of Macedonia, on the peninsula of Acte.

TIARANTUS, a river of Scythia and a tributary of the Danube.

[TIASA (Tiasa; now Magula), a small river of Laconia, flowing by Sparta into the Eurotas. Vid. SPARTA, p. 829, a.]

TIBARÏNI or TIBARÏ (Τιβαρηνοί, Τίβαροι, a quiet agricultural people on the northern coast of Pontus, east of the River Iris.

TIBÏRIAS. 1. (Τιβεριάς; Τιβεριεύς), a city of Galilee, on the southwestern shore of the Lake of Tiberias, built by Herod Antipas in honor of the Emperor Tiberius. After the destruction of Jerusalem it became the seat of the Jewish sanhedrim. Near it were the warm baths of Emmaus.—2. (Τιβεριάς, λίμνη ή Τιβεριών), or GENNÏSÏRET (Γεννησαρέτ, ύδωρ Γεννησάρ, ή Γεννησαρίτις), also the SEA OF GALILEE (ή θάλασσα τής Γαλιλαίας), in the Old Testament, CHINNÏ-

RETH (now Bahr Tubariyeh), the second of the three lakes in Palestine formed by the course of the Jordan. Vid. JORDANES. Its length is eleven or twelve geographical miles, and its breadth from five to six. It lies deep among fertile hills, has very clear and sweet water, and is full of excellent fish. Its surface is seven hundred and fifty feet below the level of the Mediterranean. In the time of our Saviour its shores were covered with populous villages, but they are now almost entirely deserted. Its eastern coast belonged to the districts of Decapolis and Gaulonitis.

TIBÏRÏNUS, one of the mythical kings of Alba, son of Capetus, and father of Agrippa, is said to have been drowned in crossing the River Alba, which was hence called Tiberis after him, and of which he became the guardian god.

TIBÏRIOPÏLIS (Τιβηριούπολις), a city of Great Phrygia, near Eumonia.

TIBÏRIS, also TIBRIS, TYBRIS, THYBRIS, AMNIS TIBÏRÏNUS, or simply TIBÏRÏNUS (now Tiber or Teverè), the chief river in Central Italy, on which stood the city of Rome. It is said to have been originally called Albula, and to have received the name of Tiberis in consequence of Tiberinus, king of Alba, having been drowned in it. It has been supposed that Albula was the Latin and Tiberis the Etruscan name of the river. The Tiber rises from two springs of limpid water in the Apennines, near Tifernum, and flows in a southwesterly direction, separating Etruria from Umbria, the land of the Sabines, and Latium. After flowing about one hundred and ten miles it receives the Nar (now Nera), and from its confluence with this river its regular navigation begins. Three miles above Rome, at the distance of nearly seventy miles from the Nar, it receives the Anio (now Teverone), and from this point becomes a river of considerable importance. Within the walls of Rome, the Tiber is about three hundred feet wide and from twelve to eighteen feet deep. After heavy rains, the river in ancient times, as at the present day, frequently overflowed its banks, and did considerable mischief to the lower parts of the city. (Hor., Carm., i., 2.) At Rome the maritime navigation of the river begins; and at eighteen miles from the city, and about four miles from the coast, it divides into two arms, forming an island, which was sacred to Venus, and called Insula Sacra (now Isola Sacra). The left branch of the river runs into the sea by Ostia, which was the ancient harbor of Rome; but in consequence of the accumulation of sand at the mouth of the left branch, the right branch was widened by Trajan, and was made the regular harbor of the city, under the name of Portus Romanus, Portus Augusti, or simply Portus. The whole length of the Tiber, with its windings, is about two hundred miles. The waters of the river are muddy and yellowish, whence it is frequently called by the Roman poets flavus Tiberis. The poets also give it the epithets of Tyrrhenus because it flowed past Etruria during the whole of its course, and of Lydius because the Etruscans are said to have been of Lydian origin.

TIBÏRÏUS. 1. Emperor of Rome A.D. 14-37. His full name was TIBÏRIUS CLAUDIUS NERO CÏSAR. He was the son of T. Claudius Nero and of Livia, and was born on the 16th of November, B. C. 42, before his mother married Augustus. Tiberius was tall and strongly made, and his health was very good. His face was handsome, and his eyes were large. He was carefully educated, and he became well acquainted with Greek and Latin literature. His master in rhetoric was Theodorus of Gadara. Though not without military courage, as his life shows, he had a great timidity of character, and was of a jealous and suspicious temper; and these qualities rendered him cruel after he had acquired power. In the latter years of his life, particularly, he indulged his lustful propensities in every way that a depraved imagination could suggest: lust and cruelty are not strangers. He affected a regard to decency and to externals. He was the prince of hypocrites; and the events of his reign are little more than the exhibition of his detestable character. In B. C. 11, Augustus compelled Tiberius, much against his will, to divorce his wife Vipsania Agrippina, and to marry Julia, the widow of Agrippa and the emperor's daughter, with whom Tiberius, however, did not long live in harmony. Tiberius was thus brought into still closer contact with the imperial family; but, as Cæsar and L. Cæsar, the grandsons of Augustus, were still living, the prospect of Tiberius succeeding to the imperial power seemed very remote. He was employed by Augustus on various military services. In 20 he was sent by Augustus to restore Tigranes to the throne of Armenia. It was during this campaign that Horace addressed one of his epistles to Julius Florus (i., 12), who was serving under Tiberius. In 15, Drusus and his brother Tiberius were engaged in warfare with the Ræti, and the exploits of the two brothers were sung by Horace (Carm., iv., 4, 14). In 13 Tiberius was consul with P. Quintilius Varus. In 11, while his brother Drusus was fighting against the Germans, Tiberius conducted the war against the Dalmatians and against the Pannonians. Drusus died in 9, owing to a fall from his horse. On the news of the accident, Tiberius was sent by Augustus to Drusus, whom he found just alive. Tiberius returned to the war in Germany, and crossed the Rhine. In 7 he was consul a second time. In 6 he obtained the tribunitia potestas for five years, but during this year he retired, with the emperor's permission, to Rhodes, where he spent the next seven years. Tacitus says that his chief reason for leaving Rome was to get away from his wife, who treated him with contempt, and whose licentious life was no secret to her husband; probably, too, he was unwilling to stay at Rome when the grandsons of Augustus were attaining years of maturity, for there was mutual jealousy between them and Tiberius. He returned to Rome A. D. 2. He was relieved from one trouble during his absence, for his wife Julia was banished to the island of Pandataria (B. C. 2), and he never saw her again. After the deaths of L. Cæsar (A. D. 2) and C. Cæsar (A. D. 4), Augustus adopted Tiberius, with the view of leaving to him the imperial power; and, at the same time, he required Tiberius to adopt Germanicus, the son of his brother Drusus, though Tiberius had a son Drusus by his wife Vipsania. From the year of his adoption to the death of Augustus, Tiberius was in command of the Roman armies, though he visited Rome several times. He was sent into Germany A. D. 4. He reduced all Illyricum to subjection A. D. 9; and in A. D. 12 he had the honor of a triumph at Rome for his German and Dalmatian victories. On the death of Augustus at Nola, on the 19th of August, A. D. 14, Tiberius, who was on his way to Illyricum, was immediately summoned home by his mother Livia. He took the imperial power without any opposition, affecting all the while a great reluctance. He began his reign by putting to death Postumus Agrippa, the surviving grandson of Augustus, and he alleged that it was done pursuant to the command of the late emperor. When he felt himself sure in his place, he began to exercise his craft. He took from the popular assembly the election of the magistrates, and transferred it to the senate. The news of the death of Augustus roused a mutiny among the legions in Pannonia, which was quelled by Drusus, the son of Tiberius. The armies on the Rhine under Germanicus showed a disposition to reject Tiberius, and, if Germanicus had been inclined to try the fortune of a campaign, he might have had the assistance of the German armies against his uncle. But Germanicus restored discipline to the army by his firmness, and maintained his fidelity to the new emperor. The first year of his reign was marked by the death of Julia, whom Augustus had removed from Pandataria to Rhegium. The death of Germanicus in the East, in A. D. 19, relieved Tiberius from all fear of a rival claimant to the throne; and it was believed by many that Germanicus had been poisoned by order of Tiberius. From this time Tiberius began to indulge with less restraint in his love of tyranny, and many distinguished senators were soon put to death on the charge of treason against the emperor (læsa majestas). Notwithstanding his suspicious nature, Tiberius gave his complete confidence to Sejanus, who for many years possessed the real government of the state. This ambitious man aimed at the imperial power. In 23, Drusus, the son of Tiberius, was poisoned by the contrivance of Sejanus. Three years afterward (26) Tiberius left Rome and withdrew into Campania. He never returned to the city. He left on the pretext of dedicating temples in Campania, but his real motives were his dislike to Rome, where he heard a great deal that was disagreeable to him, and his wish to indulge his sensual propensities in private. In order to secure still greater retirement, he took up his residence (27) in the island of Caprææ, at a short distance from the Campanian coast. The death of Livia (29), the emperor's mother, released Tiberius from one cause of anxiety. He had long been tired of her because she wished to exercise authority, and one object in leaving Rome was to be out of her way. Livia's death gave Sejanus and Tiberius free scope, for Tiberius never entirely released himself from a kind of subjection to his mother, and Sejanus did not venture to attempt the overthrow of Livia's influence. The destruction of Agrippina and her children was now the chief purpose of Sejanus: he finally got from the tyrant (31) the reward that was his just desert, an ig nominous death. Vid. SEJANUS. The death of Sejanus was followed by the execution of his friends; and for the remainder of the reign of Tiberius, Rome continued to be the scene of tragic occurrences. Tiberius died on the 16th of March, 37, at the villa of Lucullus, in Misenum. He was seventy-eight years of age, and had reigned twenty-two years. He was succeeded by Caius (Caligula), the son of Germanicus, but he had himself appointed no successor. Tiberius did not die a natural death. It was known that his end was rapidly approaching, and having had a fainting fit, he was supposed to be dead. Thereupon Caius came forth and was saluted as emperor; but he was alarmed by the intelligence that Tiberius had recovered and called for something to eat. Caius was so frightened that he did not know what to do; but Macro, the præfect of the prætorians, with more presence of mind, gave orders that a quantity of clothes should be thrown on Tiberius, and that he should be left alone. In the time of Tiberius lived Valerius Maximus, Velleius Paterculus, Phædrus, Fenestella, and Strabo; also the jurists Massurius Sabinus, M. Cocceius Nerva, and others. Tiberius wrote a brief commentary of his own life, the only book that the Emperor Domitian studied; Suetonius made use of it for his life of Tiberius. Tiberius also wrote Greek poems, and a lyric poem on the death of L. Cæsar.—2. A philosopher and sophist, of unknown time, the author of numerous works on grammar and rhetoric. One of his works, on the figures in the orations of Demosthenes (περὶ τῶν παρὰ Δημοσθένει σχημάτων), is still extant, and has been published.

TIBILIS (now Hammam Miskouten?), a town of Numidia, in Northern Africa, on the road from Cirta to Carthage, with warm springs, called Aquæ Tibilitanæ.

TIBISCUM, a town of Dacia and a Roman municipium on the River Tibiscus.

TIBISCUS or TIBISSUS, probably the same as the PARTHISCUS or PARTHISSUS (now Theiss), a river of Dacia, forming the western boundary of that country, rising in the Montes Carpathes, and falling into the Danube.

TIBULLUS, ALBIUS, the Roman poet, was of equestrian family. The date of his birth is uncertain; but he died young, soon after Virgil. His birth is therefore placed by conjecture B.C. 54, and his death B.C. 18. Of his youth and education, absolutely nothing is known. The estate belonging to the equestrian ancestors of Tibullus was at Pedum, between Tibur and Præneste. This property, like that of the other great poets of the day, Virgil and Horace, had been either entirely or partially confiscated during the civil wars; yet Tibullus retained or recovered part of it, and spent there the better portion of his short, but peaceful and happy life. His great patron was Messala, whom he accompanied in 31 into Aquitania, whither Messala had been sent by Augustus to suppress a formidable insurrection which had broken out in this province. Part of the glory of the Aquitanian campaign, which Tibullus celebrates in language of unwonted loftiness, redounds, according to the poet, to his own fame. He was present at the battle of Atax (Aude in Languedoc), which broke the Aquitanian rebellion. In the following year (30), Messala, having pacified Gaul, was sent into the East. Tibullus set out in his company, but was taken ill, and obliged to remain in Corcyra, from whence he returned to Rome. So ceased the active life of Tibullus; his life is now the chronicle of his poetry and of those tender passions which were the inspiration of his poetry. The first object of his attachment is celebrated under the poetic name of Delia. To Delia are addressed the first six elegies of the first book. The poet's attachment to Delia had begun before he left Rome for Aquitania. But Delia seems to have been faithless during his absence from Rome. On his return from Corcyra he found her ill, and attended her with affectionate solicitude (Eleg., i., 5), and hoped to induce her to retire with him into the country. But first a richer lover appears to have supplanted him with the inconstant Delia; and afterward there appears a husband in his way. The second book of Elegies is chiefly devoted to a new mistress named Nemesis. Besides these two mistresses Tibullus was enamored of a certain Glycera. He wrote elegies to soften that cruel beauty, whom there seems no reason to confound either with Delia, the object of his youthful attachment, or with Nemesis. Glycera, however, is not known to us from the poetry of Tibullus, but from the ode of Horace, which gently reproves him for dwelling so long in his plaintive elegies on the pitiless Glycera. The poetry of his contemporaries shows Tibullus as a gentle and singularly amiable man. To Horace especially he was an object of warm attachment. Besides the ode which alludes to his passion for Glycera (Hor., Carm., i., 33), the epistle of Horace to Tibullus gives the most full and pleasing view of his poetical retreat, and of his character: it is written by a kindred spirit. Horace does homage to that perfect purity of taste which distinguishes the poetry of Tibullus; he takes pride in the candid but favorable judgment of his own satires. The time of Tibullus he supposes to be shared between the finishing his exquisite small poems, which were to surpass even those of Cassius of Parma, up to that time the models of that kind of composition, and the enjoyment of the country. Tibullus possessed, according to his friend's notions, all the blessings of life—a competent fortune, favor with the great, fame, health; and he seemed to know how to enjoy all those blessings. The first two books alone of the Elegies, under the name of Tibullus, are of undoubted authenticity. The third is the work of another, a very inferior poet, whether Lygdamus be a real or fictitious name or not. This poet was much younger than Tibullus, for he was born in the year of the battle of Mutina, 43. The hexameter poem on Messala, which opens the fourth book, is so bad that, although a successful elegiac poet may have failed when he attempted epic verse, it can not well be ascribed to a writer of the exquisite taste of Tibullus. The smaller elegies of the fourth book have all the inimitable grace and simplicity of Tibullus. With the exception of the thirteenth (of which some lines are hardly surpassed by Tibullus himself), these poems relate to the love of a certain Sulpicia, a woman of noble birth, for Cerinthus, the real or fictitious name of a beautiful youth. Nor is there any improbability in supposing that Tibullus may have written elegies in the name or by the desire of Sulpicia. If Sulpicia was herself the poetess, she approached nearer to Tibullus than any other writer of elegies. The first book of Elegies alone seems to have been published during the author's life, probably soon after the triumph of Messala (27). The second book no doubt did not appear till after the death of Tibullus. With it, according to our conjecture, may have been published the elegies of his imitator, perhaps his friend and associate in the society of Messala, Lygdamus (if that be a real name), i. e., the third book; and likewise the fourth, made up of poems belonging, as it were, to this intimate society of Messala, the Panegyric by some nameless author, which, feeble as it is, seems to be of that age; the poems in the name of Sulpicia, with the concluding one, the thirteenth, a fragment of Tibullus himself. The best editions of Tibullus are by Lachmann, Berol., 1829, and by Dissen, Göttingen, 1835.

TIBUR (Tiburis, pl. Tiburtes, Tiburtinus: now Tivoli), one of the most ancient towns of Latium, sixteen miles northeast of Rome, situated on the slope of a hill (hence called by Horace supinum Tibur), on the left bank of the Anio, which here forms a magnificent water-fall. It is said to have been originally built by the Siculi, and to have afterward passed into the possession of the Aborigines and Pelasgi. According to tradition, it derived its name from Tiburtus, son of Catillus, who emigrated from Greece with Evander. It was afterward one of the chief towns of the Latin league, and became subject to Rome with the other Latin cities on the final subjugation of Latium in B.C. 338. Under the Romans Tibur continued to be a large and flourishing town, since the salubrity and beautiful scenery of the place led many of the most distinguished Roman nobles to build here magnificent villas. Of these the most splendid was the villa of the Emperor Hadrian, in the extensive remains of which many valuable specimens of ancient art have been discovered. Here also the celebrated Zenobia lived after adorning the triumph of her conqueror Aurelian. Horace likewise had a country house in the neighborhood of Tibur which he preferred to all his other residences. The deity chiefly worshipped at Tibur was Hercules; and in the neighborhood was the grove and temple of the Sibyl Albunea, whose oracles were consulted from the most ancient times. Vid. ALBUNEA. The surrounding country produced excellent olives, and also contained some celebrated stone quarries. There was a road from Rome leading to Tibur, called Via Tiburtina, which was continued from the town under the name of the Via Valeria, past Cornifinium to Adria.

TICHIS or ΤΕΚΥΜ. Vid. ΤΕΚΥΜ.

TICHISSA (Τειχοῖσσα), a fortress in the territory of Miletus.

TICINUM (Ticinensis: now Pavia), a town of the Lævi, or, according to others, of the Insures, in Gallia Cisalpina, on the left bank of the Ticinus. It was subsequently a Roman municipium; but it owed its greatness to the Lombard kings, who made it the capital of their dominions. The Lombards gave it the name of Papia, which it still retains under the slightly changed form of Pavia.

TICINUS (now Tessino), an important river in Gallia Cisalpina, rises in Mons Adula, and after flowing through Lacus Verbanus (now Lago Maggiore), falls into the Po near Ticinum. It was upon the bank of this river that Hannibal gained his first victory over the Romans by the defeat of P. Scipio, B.C. 218.

TIFĀTA, a mountain in Campania, east of Capua, near which the Samnites defeated the Campanians, and where at a later time Sulla gained a victory over the proconsul Norbanus. On this mountain there was a temple of Diana, and also one of Jupiter of some celebrity.

TIFERNUM. 1. TIBERINUM (Tifernates Tiberini, pl.: now Citta di Castello), a town of Umbria, near the sources of the River Tiber, whence its surname, and upon the confines of Etruria. Near this town the younger Pliny had a villa.—2. METAURENSE (Tifernates Metaureses: now S. Angelo in Vado), a town in Umbria, east of the preceding, on the River Metaurus, whence its surname.—3. A town in Samnium, on the River Tifernus.

TIFERNUS (now Biferno), a river of Samnium, rising in the Apennines, and flowing through the country of the Frentani into the Adriatic.

TIGELLINUS SOPHONISUS, the son of a native of Agrigentum, owed his rise from poverty and obscurity to his handsome person and his unscrupulous character. He was banished to Scyllaceum in Bruttii (A.D. 39-40) for an intrigue with Agrippina and Julia Livilla, sisters of Caligula. He was probably among the exiles restored by Agrippina, after she became empress, since early in Nero's reign he was again in favor at court, and on the death of Burrus (63) was appointed prætorian prefect jointly with Fenius Rufus. Tigellinus ministered to Nero's worst passions, and of all his favorites was the most obnoxious to the Roman people. He inflamed his jealousy or his avarice against the noblest members of the senate and the most pliant dependants of the court. In 65, Tigellinus entertained Nero in his Æmilian gardens with a sumptuous profiagey unsurpassed even in that age, and in the same year shared with him the odium of burning Rome, since the conflagration had broken out on the scene of the banquet. On Nero's fall he joined with Nymphidius Sabinus, who had succeeded Fenius Rufus as prætorian prefect, in transferring the allegiance of the soldiers to Galba. The people clamorously demanded his death. During the brief reign of Galba his life was spared, but on the accession of Otho he was compelled to put an end to his own life.

TIGELLIVS HERMOGĒNES. Vid. HERMOGENES.

TIGRĀNES (Τιγράνης), kings of Armenia. 1. Reigned B.C. 96-56 or 55. He united under his sway not only all Armenia, but several of the neighboring provinces, such as Atropatene and Gordyene, and thus raised himself to a degree of power far superior to that enjoyed by any of his predecessors. He assumed the pompous title of king of kings, and always appeared in public accompanied by some of his tributary princes as attendants. His power was also greatly strengthened by his alliance with Mithradates the Great, king of Pontus, whose daughter Cleopatra he had married at an early period of his reign. In consequence of the dissensions in the royal family of Syria, Tigranes was enabled in 83 to make himself master of the whole Syrian monarchy from the Euphrates to the sea. He was now at the summit of his power, and continued in the undisputed possession of these extensive dominions for nearly fourteen years. At the instigation of his son-in-law Mithradates, he invaded Cappadocia in 74, and is said to have carried off into captivity no less than three hundred thousand of the inhabitants, a large portion of whom he settled in his newly-founded capital of Tigranocerta. Vid. TIGRANOCERTA. In other respects he appears to have furnished little support to Mithradates in his war against the Romans; but when the Romans haughtily demanded from him the surrender of Mithradates, who had taken refuge in his dominions, he returned a peremptory refusal, accompanied with an express declaration of war. Lucullus invaded Armenia in 69, defeated the mighty host which Tigranes led against him, and followed up his victory by the capture of Tigranocerta. In the following year (68) the united forces of Tigranes and Mithradates were again defeated by Lucullus; but the mutinous disposition of the Roman troops prevented Lucullus from gaining any further advantages over the Armenian king, and enabled the latter not only to regain his dominions, but also to invade Cappadocia. The arrival of Pompey (66) soon changed the face of events. Mithradates, after his final defeat by Pompey, once more threw himself upon the support of his son-in-law; but Tigranes, who suspected him of abetting the designs of his son Tigranes, who had rebelled against his father, refused to receive him, while he himself hastened to make overtures of submission to Pompey. That general had already advanced into the heart of Armenia under the guidance of the young Tigranes, when the old king repaired in person to the Roman camp, and, presenting himself as a suppliant before Pompey, laid his tiara at his feet. By this act of humiliation he at once conciliated the favor of the conqueror, who treated him in a friendly manner, and left him in possession of Armenia Proper with the title of king, depriving him only of the provinces of Sophene and Gordyene, which he erected into a separate kingdom for his son Tigranes. The elder monarch was so overjoyed at obtaining these unexpectedly favorable terms, that he not only paid the sum of six thousand talents demanded by Pompey, but added a large sum as a donation to his army, and continued ever after the steadfast friend of the Roman general. He died in 56 or 55, and was succeeded by his son Artavasdes.—2. Son of Artavasdes, and grandson of the preceding. He was living an exile at Rome, when a party of his countrymen, discontented with the rule of his elder brother, Artaxias, sent to request that he should be placed on the throne. To this Augustus assented, and Tiberius was charged with the duty of accomplishing it, a task which he effected apparently without opposition (B.C. 20).

TIGRANOCERTA (τὰ Τίγρανόκερτα and ἡ Τίγρ., i. e., in Armenian, the City of Tigranes: ruins at Sert), the later capital of Armenia, built by Tigranes on a height by the River Nicephorius, in the valley between Mounts Masius and Niphates. It was strongly fortified, and peopled chiefly with Macedonians and Greeks, forcibly removed from Cappadocia and Cilicia; but, after the defeat of Tigranes by Lucullus under its walls, these people were permitted to return to their homes. The city was, at the same time, partially destroyed; but it still remained a considerable place.

TIGRIS, generally -ίδος and -ίς (ὁ Τίγρις, generally Τίγριδος and Τίγριος, also Τίγρης, generally Τίγρητος: now Tigris), a great river of Western Asia, rises from several sources on the southern side of that part of the Taurus chain called Niphates, in Armenia, and flows southeast, first through the narrow valley between Mount Masius and the prolongation of Mount Niphates, and then through the great plain which is bounded on the east by the last-named chain, till it falls into the head of the Persian Gulf, after receiving the Euphrates from the west. (Compare EUPHRATES.) Its other chief tributaries, all falling into its eastern side, were the NICEPHORIUS or CENTRITES, the LYCUS, the CAPRUS, the PHYSCUS, the GORGUS, SILLAS, or DELAS, the GYNDES, and the CHOASPES. It divided Assyria and Susiana on the east, from Mesopotamia and Bablyonia, and (at its mouth) Arabia, on the west. The name is sometimes applied to the PASTIGRIS.

TIGURINI, a tribe of the Helvetii, who joined the Cimbri in invading the country of the Allobroges in Gaul, where they defeated the consul L. Cassius Longinus, B.C. 107. They formed in the time of Cæsar the most important of the four cantons (pagi) into which the Helvetii were divided. It was perhaps from this people that the town of Tigurum (now Zürich) derived its name, though this name does not occur in any ancient writer.

TILPHŪSIUM (Τιλφούσιον, Τιφούσιον, Dor. Τιφώσιον: Τιφούσιος, Dor. Τιφώσιος), a town in Bœotia, situated upon a mountain of the same name, south of Lake Copais, and between Coronea and Haliartus. It derived its name from the fountain Tilphūsa, which was sacred to Apollo, and where Tiresias is said to have been buried.

TIMÆUS (Τίμαιος). 1. The historian, was the son of Andromachus, tyrant of Tauromenium, in Sicily. Timæus attained the age of ninety-six; and though we do not know the exact date either of his birth or death, we can not be far wrong in placing his birth in B.C. 352, and his death in 256. Timæus received instruction from Philiscus, the Milesian, a disciple of Isocrates; but we have no further particulars of his life, except that he was banished from Sicily by Agathocles, and passed his exile at Athens, where he had lived fifty years when he wrote the thirty-fourth book of his history. The great work of Timæus was a history of Sicily from the earliest times to 264, in which year Polybius commences the introduction to his work. This history was one of great extent. We have a quotation from the thirty-eighth book, and there were probably many books after this. The value and authority of Timæus as an historian have been most vehemently attacked by Polybius in many parts of his work. Most of the charges of Polybius appear to have been well founded ; but he has not only omitted to mention some of the peculiar excellences of Timæus, but has even regarded these excellences as deserving the severest censure. Thus it was one of the great merits of Timæus, for which he is loudly denounced by Polybius, that he attempted to give the myths in their simplest and most genuine form, as related by the most ancient writers. Timæus, also, collected the materials of his history with the greatest diligence and care, a fact which even Polybius is obliged to admit. He likewise paid very great attention to chronology, and was the first writer who introduced the practice of recording events by Olympiads, which was adopted by almost all subsequent writers of Greek history. The fragments of Timæus have been collected by Göller, in his De Situ et Origine Syracusarum, Lips., 1818, and by Car. and Theod. Müller, in the Fragmenta Historic. Græc., Paris, 1841. — 2. Of Loeri, in Italy, a Pythagorean philosopher, is said to have been a teacher of Plato. There is an extant work, bearing his name, written in the Doric dialect, and entitled περί ψυχῆς κόσμου καὶ φύσεως; but its genuineness is very doubtful, and it is in all probability nothing more than an abridgment of Plato's dialogue of Timæus. The best edition is by Gelder, Leyden, 1836. — 3. The Sophist, wrote a Lexicon to Plato, addressed to a certain Gentianus, which is still extant. The time at which he lived is quite uncertain. He is usually placed in the third century of the Christian era, which produced so many ardent admirers of the Platonic philosophy, such as Porphyry, Longinus, Plotinus, &c. The Lexicon is very brief, and bears the title Τιμαίου σοφιστοῦ ἐκ τῶν τοῦ Πλάτωνος λέξεων. It is evident that the work has received several interpolations, especially in explanations of words occurring in Herodotus. But it is one of great value, and the explanations of words are some of the very best which have come down to us from the ancient grammarians. It has been edited by Ruhken, Leyden, 1754, and again, Leyden, 1789; and by Koch, Leipzig, 1828 and 1833.

TIMAGĒNES (Τιμαγένης), a rhetorician and a historian, was a native of Alexandria, from which place he was carried as a prisoner to Rome, where he was first employed as a slave in menial offices, but being liberated by Faustus Sulla, the son of the dictator, he opened a school of rhetoric, in which he taught with great success. (Comp. Hor., Ep., i., 19, 15.) The Emperor Augustus induced him to write a history of his exploits; but having offended Augustus by sarcastic remarks upon his family, he was forbidden the palace; whereupon he burned his historical works, gave up his rhetorical school, and retired from Rome to the house of his friend Asinius Pollio at Tusculum. He afterward went to the East, and died at Dabanum in Mesopotamia.

TIMAGENIDAS (Τιμαγεníδας or -ίδης), a Theban, son of Herpys, advised Mardonius in his invasion of Greece to occupy the passes of Mount Cithæron, so as to cut off the re-enforcements and supplies that were coming through them to the Greeks. After the battle of Plataeæ, his surrender (with that of the other Theban traitors to the national cause) was demanded, and he was finally given up at his own instigation. But instead of a trial, which he had expected, he was sent with the other culprits to Corinth by Pausanias, and there put to death.]

TIMANTHES (Τιμάνθης), a celebrated Greek painter at Sicily, contemporary with Zeuxis and Parrhasius, about B.C. 400. The masterpiece of Timanthes was his celebrated picture of the sacrifice of Iphigenia, in which Agamemnon was painted with his face hidden in his mantle. The ancient critics tell us that the picture showed Iphigenia standing by the altar, surrounded, among the assistants, by Calchas, whose prophetic voice had demanded her sacrifice, and whose hand was about to complete it; Ulysses, who had brought her from her home, and Menelaus, her father's brother, all manifesting different degrees of grief, so that, when the artist had painted the sorrow of Calchas, and the deeper sorrow of Ulysses, and had added all his powers to express the woe of Menelaus, his resources were exhausted, and, unable to give a powerful expression to the agony of the father, he covered his head with a veil. But this is clearly not the reason why Timanthes hid the face of Agamemnon. The critics ascribe to impotence what was the forbearance of judgment. Timanthes felt like a father: he did not hide the face of Agamemnon because it was beyond the possibility, but because it was beyond the dignity of expression. If he made Agamemnon bear his calamity as a man, he made him also feel it as a man. It became the leader of Greece to sanction the ceremony with his presence, but it did not become the father to see his daughter beneath the dagger's point.

TIMASION (Τιμασίων), a Dardanian, served under Clearchus in Asia, and afterward joined the expedition of the younger Cyrus against Artaxerxes. After the arrest and murder of the generals by Tissaphernes, Timasion was chosen in the place of Clearchus, and he and Xenophon, as the youngest, had command of the rear. When the army had reached Cotyora, he endeavored to extort money as well as the means of conveyance from some of the neighboring cities by the report of Xenophon's intention to found a city in Pontus, but was foiled by Xenophon's refusing to lend himself to his designs. Timasion, in the subsequent movements, continued with Xenophon until they crossed over into Europe, and also entered with him into the service of Seuthes. After this he probably returned to Asia with the army, when it entered the Spartan service under Timbron.]

TIMĀVUS (now Timavo), a small river in the north of Italy, forming the boundary between Istria and Venetia, and falling into the Sinus Tergestinus in the Adriatic, between Tergeste and Aquileia. This river is frequently celebrated by the poets and other ancient writers, who speak of its numerous sources, its lake, and its subterraneous passage; but these accounts seem, to a great extent, fabulous.

TIMESIAS (Τιμησίας), or TIMESIUS (Τιμήσιος), of Clazomenæ, was the first founder of the colony of Abdera in Thrace. He was expelled by the Thracians, but was afterward worshipped as a hero at Abdera by the Teians, who founded a second colony at that place.]

proxenus of the Mossynœci, sent by the Greeks under Xenophon to treat with the Mossynœci about a passage through their territory: in an interview between the magistrates of the Mossynœci and the Greek generals, Timesitheus acted as interpreter.]

TIMOCLES (Τιμοκλῆς), a distinguished Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy, who lived at a period when the revival of political energy, in consequence of the encroachments of Philip, restored to the Middle Comedy much of the vigor and real aim of the Old. He is conspicuous for the freedom with which he discussed public men and measures, as well as for the number of his dramas and the purity of his style. He flourished from about the middle of the fourth century B.C. till after 324, so that at the beginning of his career he was in part contemporary with Antiphanes, and at the end of it with Menander. [The fragments of his Comedies are edited by Meineke in the Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. ii., 798-811, edit. minor.]

[ΤΙΜΟΚΡΑΤΗΣ (Τιμοκράτης). 1. A Lacedæmonian, one of the three counsellors sent to assist Cnemus after his first defeat by Phormion in the Corinthian Gulf in B.C. 429. In the second battle there, shortly after, Timocrates having had the vessel, on board which he himself was, sunk by an Athenian galley, slew himself, and his body was washed into the harbor of Naupactus.—2. An Athenian, was one of the commissioners for concluding the fifty years' truce between Athens and Sparta in B.C. 421, and also the separate treaty between these states in the same year.—3. An Athenian, in B.C. 406, was a member of the Council of Five Hundred, before which the generals who had conquered at Arginusæ gave in their account. (Perhaps the same as No. 2.)—4. A Rhodian, who was sent into Greece by the satrap Tithraustes in B.C. 395, taking with him fifty talents wherewith to bribe the leading men in the several states to excite a war against Sparta at home, and so to compel the return of Agesilaus from his victorious career in Asia. Plutarch calls him Hermocrates.—5. A Lacedæmonian, was one of the ambassadors who were sent to Athens in B.C. 369 to settle the terms of alliance between the Athenians and the Spartans.—6. A Syracusan, who commanded a squadron of twelve galleys sent by Dionysius the younger to the aid of Sparta in B.C. 366. The arrival of this force enabled the Spartans to reduce Sellasia, which had revolted from them.]

TIMOCREON (Τιμοκρέων), of Rhodes, a lyric poet, celebrated for the bitter and pugnacious spirit of his works, and especially for his attacks on Themistocles and Simonides. He was a native of Ialysus in Rhodes, whence he was banished on the then common charge of an inclination toward Persia (μηδισμός); and in this banishment he was left neglected by Themistocles, who had formerly been his friend, and his connection by the ties of hospitality. Timocreon was still flourishing after B.C. 471, since one of his poems, of which we have a fragment, was an attack upon Themistocles after the exile of the latter. It appears that Timocreon was a man of prodigious strength, which he sustained by great voracity.

TIMOLEON (Τιμολέων), son of Timodemus or

Timænetus and Demariste, belonged to one of the noblest families at Corinth. His early life was stained by a dreadful deed of blood. We are told that so ardent was his love of liberty, that when his brother Timophanes endeavored to make himself tyrant of their native city, Timoleon murdered him rather than allow him to destroy the liberty of the state. The murder was perpetrated just before an embassy arrived from several of the Greek cities of Sicily, begging the Corinthians to send assistance to the island, which was distracted by internal dissensions, and was expecting an invasion of the Carthaginians. It is said that the Corinthians were at the very moment of the arrival of the Sicilians deliberating respecting Timoleon's act, and had not come to any decision respecting it; and that they avoided the difficulty of a decision by appointing him to the command of the Sicilian expedition, with the singular provision, that if he conducted himself justly in the command, they would regard him as a tyrannicide, and honor him accordingly; but if otherwise, they would punish him as a fratricide. To whatever causes Timoleon owed his appointment, his extraordinary success more than justified the confidence which had been reposed in him. His history reads almost like a romance; and yet of the main facts of the narrative we can not entertain any reasonable doubt. Although the Corinthians had readily assented to the requests of the Sicilians in the appointment of a commander, they were not prepared to make many sacrifices in their favor, and accordingly it was only with ten triremes and seven hundred mercenaries that Timoleon sailed from Corinth to repel the Carthaginians, and restore order to the Sicilian cities. He reached Sicily in B.C. 344, and straightway marched against Syracuse, of two quarters of which he obtained possession. In the following spring (343), Dionysius, despairing of success, surrendered the citadel to Timoleon, on condition of his being allowed to depart in safety to Corinth. Vid. DIONYSIUS. Timoleon soon afterward obtained possession of the whole of Syracuse. He destroyed the citadel, which had been for so many years the seat and bulwark of the power of the tyrants, and restored the democratical form of government. He then proceeded to expel the tyrants from the other Greek cities of Sicily, but was interrupted in this undertaking by a formidable invasion of the Carthaginians, who landed at Lilybæum in 339, with an immense army, under the command of Hasdrubal and Hamilcar, consisting of seventy thousand foot and ten thousand horse. Such an overwhelming force struck the Greeks with consternation and dismay. So great was their alarm, that Timoleon could only induce twelve thousand men to march with him against the Carthaginians. But with this small force he gained a brilliant victory over the Carthaginians on the river Crimissus (339.) This victory justly ranks as one of the greatest gained by Greeks over barbarians. The booty which Timoleon acquired was prodigious; and some of the richest of the spoils he sent to Corinth and other cities in Greece, thus diffusing the glory of his victory throughout the mother country. Timoleon now resolved to carry into execution his project of expelling all the tyrants from Sicily. Of these, two of the most powerful, Hicetas of Leontini, and Mamerus of Catania, had recourse to the Carthaginians for assistance, who sent Gisco to Sicily with a fleet of seventy ships and a body of Greek mercenaries. Although Gisco gained a few successes at first, the war was, upon the whole, favorable to Timoleon, and the Carthaginians were therefore glad to conclude a treaty with the latter in 338, by which the River Halycus was fixed as the boundary of the Carthaginian and Greek dominions in Sicily. It was during the war with Gisco that Hicetas fell into the hands of Timoleon, and was massacred by his order. His wife and daughters were carried to Syracuse, where they were executed by the people, as a satisfaction to the manes of Dion, whose wife Arete and sister Aristomache had both been put to death by Hicetas. This is one of the greatest stains upon Timoleon's character, as he might easily have saved these unfortunate women if he had chosen. After the treaty between the Carthaginians and Timoleon, Mamerus, being unable to maintain himself in Catania, fled to Messana, where he took refuge with Hippon, tyrant of that city. Timoleon quickly followed, and besieged Messana so vigorously by sea and land, that Hippon, despairing of holding out, attempted to escape by sea, but was taken and put to death in the public theatre. Mamerus now surrendered, stipulating only for a public trial before the Syracusans, with the condition that Timoleon should not appear as his accuser. But as soon as he was brought into the assembly at Syracuse, the people refused to hear him, and unanimously condemned him to death. Thus almost all the tyrants were expelled from the Greek cities in Sicily, and a democratical form of government established in their place. Timoleon, however, was in reality the ruler of Sicily, for all the states consulted him on every matter of importance; and the wisdom of his rule is attested by the flourishing condition of the island for several years even after his death. He did not, however, assume any title or office, but resided as a private citizen among the Syracusans. Timoleon died in 337, having become blind a short time before his death. He was buried at the public expense in the market-place at Syracuse, where his monument was afterwards surrounded with porticoes and a gymnasium, which was called after him the Timoleon-teum. Annual games were also instituted in his honor.

ΤΙΜΟΜΑΧΟΣ (Τιμόμαχος), a distinguished painter of Byzantium, lived in the time of Julius Cæsar (according to Pliny), who purchased two of his pictures, the Ajax and Medea, for the immense sum of eighty Attic talents, and dedicated them in the temple of Venus Genetrix. It has been supposed, however, by some modern writers, that Timomachus lived at an earlier period.

ΤΙΜΩΝ (Τίμων). 1. The son of Timarchus of Phlius, a philosopher of the sect of the Sceptics, flourished in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, about B.C. 279, and onward. He first studied philosophy at Megara, under Stilpon, and then returned home and married. He next went to Elis with his wife, and heard Pyrrhon, whose tenets he adopted. Driven from Elis by straitened circumstances, he spent some time on the Hellespont and the Propontis, and taught at Chalcedon as a sophist with such success that he realized a fortune. He then removed to Athens, where he passed the remainder of his life, with the exception of a short residence at Thebes. He died at the age of almost ninety. Timon appears to have been endowed by nature with a powerful and active mind, and with that quick perception of the follies of men which betrays its possessor into a spirit of universal distrust both of men and truths, so as to make him a skeptic in philosophy and a satirist in every thing. He wrote numerous works both in prose and poetry. The most celebrated of his poems were the satiric compositions called Silli (σίλλου), a word of somewhat doubtful etymology, but which undoubtedly describes metrical compositions of a character at once ludicrous and sarcastic. The invention of this species of poetry is ascribed to Xenophanes of Colophon. Vid. XENOPHANES. The Silli of Timon were in three books, in the first of which he spoke in his own person, and the other two are in the form of a dialogue between the author and Xenophanes of Colophon, in which Timon proposed questions, to which Xenophanes replied at length. The subject was a sarcastic account of the tenets of all philosophers, living and dead; an unbounded field for skepticism and satire. They were in hexameter verse, and, from the way in which they are mentioned by the ancient writers, as well as from the few fragments of them which have come down to us, it is evident, that they were very admirable productions of their kind. The fragments of his poems are collected by Wölke, De Græcorum Sillis, Varsav., 1820; and by Paul, Dissertatio de Sillis, Berol., 1821.—2. The Misanthrope (ὁ μισάνθρωπος), lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war. He was an Athenian, of the demos of Colyttus, and his father's name was Echekratides. In consequence of the ingratitude he experienced, and the disappointments he suffered from his early friends and companions, he secluded himself entirely from the world, admitting no one to his society except Alcibiades, in whose reckless and variable disposition he probably found pleasure in tracing and studying an image of the world he had abandoned; and at last he is said to have died in consequence of refusing to suffer a surgeon to come to him to set a broken limb. One of Lucian's pieces bears his name.

[ΤΙΜΟΦΑΝΗΣ (Τιμοφάνης), the brother of Timoleon. Vid. TIMOLEON.]

ΤΙΜΟΘΕΪΣ (Τιμόθεος). 1. Son of Conon, the famous general, was himself a distinguished Athenian general. He was first appointed to a public command in B.C. 378, and from this time his name frequently occurs as one of the Athenian generals down to 356. In this year he was associated with Iphicrates, Menesthus, and Chares in the command of the Athenian fleet. In consequence of his conduct in this war, he was arraigned in 354, and condemned to the crushing fine of one hundred talents (more than £24,000). Being unable to pay the fine, he withdrew to Chalcis in Eubœa, where he died shortly after. The Athenians subsequently remitted nine tenths of the penalty, and allowed his son Conon to expend the remainder on the repair of the walls, which the famous Conon had restored.—2. Son of Clearchus, the tyrant of Heraclea on the Euxine, whom he succeeded in the sovereignty B.C. 353. There is extant a letter addressed to him by Isocrates.—3. A celebrated musician and poet of the later Athenian dithyramb, was a native of Miletus, and the son of Thersander. He was born B.C. 446, and died in 357, in the ninetieth year of his age. Of the details of his life we have very little information. He was at first unfortunate in his professional efforts. Even the Athenians, fond as they were of novelty, were offended at the bold innovations of Timotheus, and hissed off his performance. On this occasion it is said that Euripides encouraged Timotheus by the prediction that he would soon have the theatres at his feet. This prediction appears to have been accomplished in the vast popularity which Timotheus afterward enjoyed. The Ephesians rewarded him, for his dedicatory hymn to Diana (Artemis), with the sum of one thousand pieces of gold; and the last accomplishment by which the education of the Arcadian youth was finished, was learning the nomes of Timotheus and Philoxenus. Timotheus is said to have died in Macedonia. He delighted in the most artificial and intricate forms of musical expression, and he used instrumental music, without a vocal accompaniment, to a greater extent than any previous composer. Perhaps the most important of his innovations, as the means of introducing all the others, was his addition to the number of the strings of the cithara. Respecting the precise nature of that addition the ancient writers are not agreed; but it is most improbable, from the whole evidence, that the lyre of Timotheus had eleven strings. It is said that, when Timotheus visited Sparta, and entered the musical contest at Carneia, one of the ephors snatched away his lyre, and cut from it the strings, four in number, by which it exceeded the seven-stringed lyre of Terpander, and, as a memorial of this public vindication of the ancient simplicity of music, and for a warning to future innovators, the Lacedaemonians hung up the mutilated lyre of Timotheus in their Scias. With regard to the subjects of his compositions, and the manner in which he treated them, we have abundant evidence that he even went beyond the other musicians of the period in the liberties which he took with the ancient myths, in the attempt to make his music imitative as well as expressive, and in the confusion of the different departments of lyric poetry; in one word, in the application of that false principle, which also misled his friend Euripides, that pleasure is the end of poetry.—4. A distinguished flute-player of Thebes, flourished under Alexander the Great, on whom his music made so powerful an impression, that once, in the midst of a performance by Timotheus of an Orthian Nome to Athena, Alexander started from his seat and seized his arms.—5. A statuary and sculptor, whose country is not mentioned, but who belonged to the later Attic school of the time of Scopas and Praxiteles. He was one of the artists who executed the bas-reliefs which adorned the frieze of the Mausoleum, about B.C. 352.

[TINA (now Tyne), a river of Britannia, north of the Vedra, marking the eastern termination of the wall of Hadrian.]

TINGIS (ἡ Τίγγις: now Tangier), a city of Mauretania, on the southern coast of the Fretum Gaditanum (now Straits of Gibraltar), was a place of very great antiquity. It was made by Augustus a free city, and by Claudius a colony, and the capital of Mauretania Tingitana.

TINIÀ (now Timia), a small river in Umbria, rising near Spoletium, and falling into the Tiber after receiving the Clitumnus.

[TIPHYS (Τίφυς), son of Hagnius, or, according to others, of Phorbas, born at Tiphæ or Siphæ in Bœotia, or at Aphormium, in the territory of the Thespians, was the pilot of the Argo, but died before the Argonauts reached Colchis.]

TIRESIAS (Τειρησίας), a Theban, son of Eures and Chariclo, was one of the most renowned soothsayers in all antiquity. He was blind from his seventh year, but lived to a very old age. It was believed that his blindness was occasioned by his having revealed to men things which they ought not to have known, or by his having seen Athena while she was bathing, on which occasion the goddess deprived him of sight by sprinkling water upon his face. Chariclo prayed to Minerva (Athena) to restore his sight, but as the goddess was unable to do this, she conferred upon him the power of understanding the voices of birds, and gave him a staff, with the help of which he could walk as safely as if he had his eyesight. Another tradition accounts for his blindness in the following manner. Once, when on Mount Cithæron (others say Cyllene), he saw a male and a female serpent together; he struck at them with his staff, and as he happened to kill the female, he himself was metamorphosed into a woman. Seven years later he again saw two serpents, and now killing the male, he again became a man. It was for this reason that Jupiter (Zeus) and Juno (Hera), when disputing whether a man or a woman had more enjoyments, referred the matter to Tiresias, who declared that women enjoyed more pleasure than men. Juno (Hera), indignant at the answer, deprived him of sight, but Jupiter (Zeus) gave him the power of prophecy, and granted him a life which was to last for seven or nine generations. In the war of the Seven against Thebes, he declared that Thebes should be victorious if Menæceus would sacrifice himself; and during the war of the Epigoni, when the Thebans had been defeated, he advised them to commence negotiations of peace, and to avail themselves of the opportunity that would thus be afforded them to take to flight. He himself fled with them (or, according to others, he was carried to Delphi as a captive), but on his way he drank from the well of Tilphossa and died. His daughter Manto (or Daphne) was sent by the victorious Argives to Delphi as a present to Apollo. Even in the lower world Tiresias was believed to retain the powers of perception, while the souls of other mortals were mere shades, and there also he continued to use his golden staff. His tomb was shown in the neighborhood of the Tilphusian well near Thebes, and in Macedonia likewise. The place near Thebes where he had observed the birds was pointed out as a remark able spot even in later times. The blind seer Tiresias acts so prominent a part in the mythical history of Greece that there is scarcely any event with which he is not connected in some way or other; and this introduction of the seer in so many occurrences separated by long intervals of time, was facilitated by the belief in his long life.

[TIRIBAZUS (Τιριβαζός). Vid. TERIBAZUS.]

TIRIDĀTES or TERIDĀTES (Τηριδάτης). 1. The second king of Parthia. Vid. ARSACES II.—2. King of Armenia, and brother of Vologeses I. Arsaces, No. 23), king of Parthia. He was made King of Armenia by his brother, but was driven out of the kingdom by Corbulo, the Roman general, and finally received the Armenian crown from Nero at Rome in A. D. 63.

TIRO, M. TULLIUS, the freedman of Cicero, to whom he was an object of tender affection. He appears to have been a man of very amiable disposition and highly-cultivated intellect. He was not only the amanuensis of the orator, and his assistant in literary labor, but was himself an author of no mean reputation, and notices of several works from his pen have been preserved by ancient writers. It is supposed by many that Tiro was the chief agent in bringing together and arranging the works of his illustrious patron, and in preserving his correspondence from being dispersed and lost. After the death of Cicero, Tiro purchased a farm in the neighborhood of Puteoli, where he lived until he reached his hundredth year. It is usually believed that Tiro was the inventor of the art of short-hand writing among the Romans; and hence abbreviations of this description, which are common in MSS. from the sixth century downward, have very generally been designated by the learned as Notæ Tironianæ.

TIRYNS (Τίρυνς, -νθος; Τίρύνθιος), an ancient town in Argolis, southeast of Argos, and one of the most ancient in all Greece, is said to have been founded by Prætus, the brother of Acrisius, who built the massive walls of the city with the help of the Cyclopes. Prætus was succeeded by Perseus; and it was here that Hercules was brought up. Hence we find his mother Alcmena called Tiryinthia, and the hero himself Tirynthius. Homer represents Tiryns as subject to Argos; the town was at a later time destroyed by the Argives, and most of the inhabitants were removed to Argos. Tiryns was built upon a hill of small extent, rising abruptly from the dead level of the surrounding country. The remains of the city are some of the most interesting in all Greece, and are, with those of Mycenæ, the most ancient specimens of what is called Cyclopien architecture. They consist of masses of enormous stones, rudely piled in tiers above one another.

TISAMĒNUS (Τισαμενός.) 1. Son of Orestes and Hermione, was king of Argos, but was deprived of his kingdom when the Heraclidæ invaded Peloponnesus. He was slain in a battle against the Heraclidæ, and his tomb was afterward shown at Helice, from which place his remains were subsequently removed to Sparta by command of an oracle.—2. Son of Thersander and Demonassa, was king of Thebes, and the father of Auteson.—3. An Elean soothsayer, of the family of the Clytiadæ. He was assured by the Delphic oracle that he should be successful in five great conflicts. Supposing this to be a promise of distinction as an athlete, he devoted himself to gymnastic exercises; but the Spartans, understanding the oracle to refer, not to gymnastic, but to military victories, made great offers to Tisamenus to induce him to take with their kings the joint command of their armies. This he refused to do on any terms short of receiving the full franchise of their city, which the Spartans eventually granted. He was present with the Spartans at the battle of Plateæ, B. C. 379, which was the first of the five conflicts referred to by the oracle. The second was with the Argives and Tegeans at Tegea; the third, with the Arcadians at Dipæa; the fourth was the third Messenian War (465-455); and the last was the battle of Tanagra, with the Athenians and their allies, in 457.

TISIĀ (Tisiates, pl.), a town in Bruttium, in the Sila Silva, of uncertain site.

[TISIĀS, of Syracuse, one of the earliest writers on rhetoric, a pupil of Corax, who was said to have invented the rhetorical art. Vid. CORAX.]

TISICRĀTES, an eminent Greek statuary of the school of Lysippus, to whose works those of Tisicrates so nearly approached that many of them were scarcely to be distinguished from the works of the master.

TISIPHŌNE. Vid. EUMENIDES.

TISSA (Tissiensis, Tissinensis), a town in Sicily north of Mount Ætna.

TISSAPHERNES (Τισσαφέρνης), a famous Persian, who was appointed satrap of Lower Asia in B. C. 414. He espoused the cause of the Spartans in the Peloponnesian war, but he did not give them any effectual assistance, since his policy was not to allow either Spartans or Athenians to gain the supremacy, but to exhaust the strength of both parties by the continuance of the war. His plans, however, were thwarted by the arrival of Cyrus in Asia Minor in 407. This prince supplied the Lacedæmonians with cordial and effectual assistance. Tissaphernes and Cyrus were not on good terms; and after the death of Darius, they were engaged in continual disputes about the cities in the satrapy of the former, over which Cyrus claimed dominion. The ambitious views of Cyrus toward the throne at length became manifest to Tissaphernes, who lost no time in repairing to the king with information of the danger. At the battle of Cunaxa in 401, he was one of the four generals who commanded the army of Artaxerxes, and his troops were the only portion of the left wing that was not put to flight by the Greeks. When the ten thousand had begun their retreat, Tissaphernes professed his great anxiety to serve them, and promised to conduct them home in safety. In the course of the march he treacherously arrested Clearchus and four of the other generals, who were put to death. After this, Tissaphernes annoyed and harassed the Greeks in their march, without, however, seriously impeding it, till they reached the Carduchian Mountains, at which point he gave up the pursuit. Not long after, Tissaphernes, as a reward for his great services, was invested by the king, in addition to his own satrapy, with all the authority which Cyrus had enjoyed in Western Asia. On his arrival he claimed dominion over the Ionian cities, which applied to Sparta for aid. Their request was granted, and the Spartans carried on war against Tissaphernes with success for some years under the command successively of Thimbron, Dercyllidas, and Agesilaus (400–395). The continued want of success on the part of Tissaphernes led to grievous complaints against him; and the charges were transmitted to court, where they were backed by all the influence of Parysatis, eager for revenge on the enemy of Cyrus, her favorite son. The result was, that Tithraustes was commissioned by the king to put Tissaphernes to death and to succeed him in his government, which was accordingly done (395).

TITĀNES (Τιτᾶνες, sing. Τιτᾶν, Ion. Τιτῆνες; fem. Τιτανίδες, sing. Τιτανίς). 1. The sons and daughters of Cœlus (Uranus) and Terra (Gæ), originally dwelt in heaven, whence they are called Οὐρανίονες or Οὐρανίδαί. They were twelve in number, six sons and six daughters, namely, Oceanus, Cœus, Crius, Hyperion, Iapetus, Cronus, Thia, Rhea, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phœbe, and Tethys; but their names are different in other accounts. It is said that Uranus (Cœlus), the first ruler of the world, threw his sons, the Hecatoncheires (hundred-handed)—Briareus, Cottys, Gyes, and the Cyclopes Arges, Steropes, and Brontes—into Tartarus. Gæa (Terra), indignant at this, persuaded the Titans to rise against their father, and gave to Cronus (Saturn) an adamantine sickle. They did as their mother bade them, with the exception of Oceanus. Cronus (Saturn), with his sickle, unmanned his father, and threw the part into the sea: from the drops of his blood there arose the Erinyes Alecto, Tisiphone, and Megæra. The Titans then deposed Uranus (Cœlus), liberated their brothers who had been cast into Tartarus, and raised Cronus (Saturn) to the throne. But Cronus (Saturn) hurled the Cyclopes back into Tartarus, and married his sister Rhea. Having been foretold by Gæa (Terra) and Uranus (Cœlus) that he should be dethroned by one of his own children, he swallowed successively his children Hestia (Vesta), Demeter (Ceres), Hera (Juno), Hades (Pluto), and Poseidon (Neptune). Rhea, therefore, when she was pregnant with Zeus (Jupiter), went to Crete, and gave birth to the child in the Dictæan Cave, where he was brought up by the Curetes. When Zeus (Jupiter) had grown up, he availed himself of the assistance of Thetis, the daughter of Oceanus, who gave to Cronus (Saturn) a potion which caused him to bring up the stone and the children he had swallowed. United with his brothers and sisters, Zeus (Jupiter) now began the contest against Cronus (Saturn) and the ruling Titans. This contest (usually called the Titanomachia) was carried on in Thessaly, Cronus (Saturn) and the Titans occupying Mount Othrys, and the sons of Cronus (Saturn) Mount Olympus. It lasted ten years, till at length Gæa (Terra) promised victory to Zeus (Jupiter) if he would deliver the Cyclopes and Hecatoncheires from Tartarus. Zeus (Jupiter) accordingly slew Campe, who guarded the Cyclopes, and the latter furnished him with thunder and lightning. The Titans then were overcome, and hurled down into a cavity below Tartarus, and the Hecatoncheires were set to guard them. It must be observed that the fight of the Titans is sometimes confounded by ancient writers with the fight of the Gigantes.—2. The name Titans is also given to those divine or semi-divine beings who were descended from the Titans, such as Prometheus, Hecate, Latona, Pyrrha, and especially Helios (the Sun) and Selene (the Moon) as the children of Hyperion and Thia, and even the descendants of Helios, such as Circe.

TITĀRĒSIUS (Τιταρήσιος; now Elassonitiko or Xeraghi), a river of Thessaly, also called Eurypus, rising in Mount Titarus, flowing through the country of the Perrhæbi, and falling into the Peneus southeast of Phalanna. Its waters were impregnated with an oily substance, whence it was said to be a branch of the infernal Styx.

TITHŌNUS (Τιθωνός), son of Laomedon and Strymo, and brother of Priam. By the prayers of Eos (Aurora), who loved him, he obtained from the gods immortality, but not eternal youth, in consequence of which he completely shrunk together in his old age, whence an old decrepit man was proverbially called Tithonus. As he could not die, Eos (Aurora) changed him into a cicada.

TITHŌRĒA. Vid. NEON.

TITHRAUSTES (Τιθραύστης), a Persian, who succeeded Tissaphernes in his satrapy, and put him to death by order of Artaxerxes Mnemon, B.C. 395. Being unable to make peace with Agesilaus, he sent Timocrates, the Rhodian, into Greece with fifty talents, to distribute among the leading men in the several states, in order to induce them to excite a war against Sparta at home.

TITĪANUS, JŪLĪUS, a Roman writer, was the father of the rhetorician Titianus, who taught the younger Maximinus. The elder Titianus may therefore be placed in the reigns of Commodus, Pertinax, and Severus. He was called the apc of his age, because he had imitated every thing. All his works are lost.

TITINIŪS, a Roman dramatist, whose productions belonged to the department of the Comædia Togata, is commended by Varro on account of the skill with which he developed the characters of the personages whom he brought upon the stage. It appears that he was younger than Cæcilius, but older than Terence, and flourished about B.C. 170. The names of upward of fourteen plays, together with a considerable number of short fragments, have been preserved by the grammarians.

TITĪUS SEPTIMIŪS. Vid. SEPTIMIUS.

[TITORMUS (Τιτορμος), a herdsman of Ætolia, renowned for his great strength, which so far surpassed that of the celebrated Milo of Crotona, that the latter is said to have exclaimed, on witnessing a display of his physical powers, "Oh, Jupiter! hast thou begotten in this man another Hercules for us!"]

TITUS FLAVIŪS SABĪNUS VĒSPASĪANUS, Roman emperor A.D. 79–81, commonly called by his prænomen TITUS, was the son of the Emperor Vespasianus and his wife Flavia Domitilla. He was born on the 30th of December, A.D. 40. When a young man he served as tribunes militum in Britain and in Germany with great credit. After having been quæstor, he had the command of a legion, and served under his father in the Jewish wars. Vespasian returned to Italy after he had been proclaimed emperor on the first of July, A. D. 69; but Titus remained in Palestine to prosecute the siege of Jerusalem, during which he showed the talents of a general with the daring of a soldier. The siege of Jerusalem was concluded by the capture of the place on the 8th of September, 70. Titus returned to Italy in the following year (71), and triumphed at Rome with his father. He also received the title of Cæsar, and became the associate of Vespasian in the government. His conduct at this time gave no good promise, and the people looked upon him as likely to be another Nero. He was accused of being excessively addicted to the pleasures of the table, of indulging lustful passions in a scandalous way, and of putting suspected persons to death with very little ceremony. His attachment to Berenice, the sister of Agrippa II., also made him unpopular. Titus became acquainted with her when he was in Judæa, and after the capture of Jerusalem she followed him to Rome with her brother Agrippa, and both of them lodged in the emperor's residence. It was said that Titus had promised to marry Berenice, but as this intended union gave the Romans great dissatisfaction, he sent her away from Rome after he became emperor. Titus succeeded his father in 79, and his government proved an agreeable surprise to those who had anticipated a return of the times of Nero. His brother Domitian was accused of having entertained designs against Titus; but, instead of punishing him, Titus endeavored to win his affection, and urged him not to attempt to gain by criminal means that power which he would one day have in a legitimate way. During his whole reign Titus displayed a sincere desire for the happiness of the people, and he did all that he could to relieve them in times of distress. He assumed the office of pontifex maximus after the death of his father, and with the purpose, as he declared, of keeping his hands free from blood; a resolution which he kept. Two patri- cians, who were convicted by the senate of a conspiracy against him, were pardoned, and treated with kindness and confidence. He checked all prosecutions for the crime of læsæ majestatis, and he severely punished all informers. The first year of his reign is memorable for the great eruption of Vesuvius, which desolated a large part of the adjacent country, and buried with lava and ashes the towns of Herculaneum and Pompeii. Titus endeavored to repair the ravages of this great eruption: he sent two consulars with money to restore the ruined towns, and he applied to this purpose the property of those who had been destroyed, and had left no next of kin. At the beginning of the following year (80) there was a great fire at Rome, which lasted three days and three nights, and destroyed the Capitol, the library of Augustus, the theatre of Pompeius, and other public buildings, besides many houses. The emperor declared that he should consider all the loss as his own, and he set about repairing it with great activity; he took even the decorations of the imperial residences, and sold them to raise money. The eruption of Vesuvius was followed by a dreadful pestilence, which called for fresh exertions on the part of the benevolent emperor. In this year he completed the great amphitheatre called the Colosseum, which had been commenced by his father; and also the baths called the baths of Titus. The dedication of these two edifices was celebrated by spectacles which lasted one hundred days; by a naval battle in the old naumachia, and fights of gladiators: on one day alone five thousand wild animals are said to have been exhibited, a number which we may reasonably suspect to be exaggerated. He died on the thirteenth of September, 81, after a reign of two years, two months, and twenty days. He was in the forty-first year of his age. There were suspicions that he was poisoned by Domitian. There is a story that Domitian came before Titus was dead, and ordered him to be deserted by those about him: according to another story, he ordered him to be thrown into a vessel full of snow, under the pretext of cooling his fever. Titus was succeeded by his brother Domitian. His daughter Julia Sabina was married to Flavius Sabinus, his cousin, the son of Flavius Sabinus, the brother of Vespasian. Titus is said to have written Greek poems and tragedies; he was very familiar with Greek. He also wrote many letters in his father's name during Vespasian's life, and drew up edicts.

TITŪS (Τῑτῑός), son of Terra (Gæa), or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Elara, the daughter of Orchomenus, was a giant in Eubæa. Instigated by Juno (Hera), he attempted to offer violence to Latona (Leto) or Diana (Artemis), when she passed through Panopæus to Pytho, but he was killed by the arrows of Diana (Artemis) or Apollo; according to others, Jupiter (Zeus) destroyed him with a flash of lightning. He was then cast into Tartarus, and there he lay outstretched on the ground, covering nine acres, with two vultures or snakes devouring his liver. His destruction by the arrows of Diana (Artemis) and Apollo was represented on the throne of Apollo at Amyclæ.

Tius or TIUM (Τῑός, Τῑόν, also Τῑῑόν: now Tios or Tilios), a sea-port town of Bithynia, on the River Billaëus; a colony from Miletus, and the native place of Philetærus, the founder of the Pergamene kingdom.

ΤῑΕΡῑΛῑΜῑΣ (Τῑηῑπόλεμος), son of Hercules by Astyoche, daughter of Phylas, or by Astydamia, daughter of Amyntor. He was King of Argos, but after slaying his uncle Licymnius he was obliged to take to flight; and, in conformity with the command of an oracle, he settled in Rhodes, where he built the towns of Lindos, Ialysus, and Camirus. He joined the Greeks in the Trojan war with nine ships, but was slain by Sarpedon.

TIOS (Τῑός, gen. Τῑῑ: Τῑαεύς, Τῑῑώιτης: ruins near Dooteer), a considerable city in the interior of Lycia, about two and a half miles east of the River Xanthus, on the road leading over Mount Massieyus to Cibra.

ΤῑῑῑRUS. Vid. TOMARUS.

TIῑῑLUS (Τῑῑῑλος), god of Mount Tmolus in Lydia, is described as the husband of Pluto (or Omphale) and father of Tantalus, and is said to have decided the musical contest between Apollo and Pan.

TIῑῑLUS or TIῑῑῑLUS (Τῑῑῑλος: now Kisilja Musa Dagh), a celebrated mountain of Asia Minor, running east and west through the centre of Lydia, and dividing the plain of the Herms, on the north, from that of the Cayster, on the south. At its eastern end it joins Mount Messogis, thus entirely inclosing the valley of the Cayster. On the west, after throwing out the northwestern branch called Sipylus, it runs far out into the Ægean, forming, under the name of Mimas, the great Ionian peninsula, beyond which it is still further prolonged in the island of Chios. On its northern side are the sources of the Pactolus and the Cogamus; on its southern side those of the Cayster. It produced wine, saffron, zinc, and gold.

TOLENTINUM (Tolinas, -ātis: now Tolentino), a town of Picenum, on a height on the River Flusor (now Chiente).

TOLĒNUS or TELŌNIUS (now Turano), a river in the land of the Sabines, rising in the country of the Marsi and Æqui, and falling into the Velinus.

TOLĒTUM (now Toledo), the capital of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on the River Tagns, which nearly encompasses the town, and upon seven hills. According to tradition, it was founded by Jews, who fled thither when Jerusalem was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, and who called it Toledoth, or the "city of generations." It was taken by the Romans under the proconsul M. Fulvius, B.C. 192, when it is described as a small but fortified town. It was celebrated in ancient, as well as in modern times, for the manufactory of swords; but it owed its greatness to the Gothic kings, who made it the capital of their dominions. It still contains many Roman remains.

[TOLMIDES (Τολμίδης). 1. An Athenian general, who ravaged the coast of the Peloponnese in B.C. 455, burned the Spartan arsenal at Gythium, took Naupactus, and settled there the Messenians who left their country on its conquest by the Spartans. He afterward undertook an expedition to quell a disturbance in Chæronea and Orchomenus, but was defeated and slain.—2. An Elean, a herald of the Greek army of Cyrus, considered the best herald of his day.]

TOLŌRHŌN (Τολοφών: Τολοφώνιος), also called COLŌRHŌN (Κολοφών), a town of Locris, on the Corinthian Gulf.

TOLŌSA (now Toulouse), a town of Gallia Narbonensis, and the capital of the Tectosages, was situated on the Garumna, near the frontiers of Aquitania. It was subsequently made a Roman colony, and was surnamed Palladia. It was a large and wealthy town, and contained a celebrated temple, in which great riches were deposited. In this temple there is said to have been preserved a great part of the booty taken by Brennus from the temple at Delphi. The town and temple were plundered by the consul Q. Servilius Cæpio in B.C. 106; but the subsequent destruction of his army and his own unhappy fate were regarded as a divine punishment for his sacrilegious act. Hence arose the proverb Aurum Tolosanum habet. There are the ruins of a small amphitheatre and some other Roman remains at the modern town.

[TOLUMNIUS, an augur among the Rutulians, who distinguished himself by his bravery, was the means of preventing the completion of a friendly compact between Turnus and Æneas, and was slain in the subsequent conflict.]

TOLUMNIUS, LAR, king of the Veientes, to whom Fidenæ revolted in B.C. 438, and at whose instigation the inhabitants of Fidenæ slew the four Roman ambassadors who had been sent to Fidenæ to inquire into the reasons of their recent conduct. Statues of these ambassadors were placed on the Rostra at Rome, where they continued till a late time. In the war which followed, Tolumnius was slain in single combat by Cornelius Cossus, who dedicated his spoils in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the second of the three instances in which the spolia opima were won.

TŌMĀRUS or TMARUS (Τόμαρος, Τμάρος: now Tomaro), a mountain in Epirus, in the district Molossia, between the Lake Pambotis and the River Aracethus, near Dodona.

TOMEUS (Τομεύς: now Kondozoni), a mountain in Messenia, east of the promontory Coryphasium.

TOMĪ or TŌMIS (Τόμι, Τόμις: Τομεύς, Tomita: now Tomiswar or Jegni Pangola), a town of Thrace (subsequently Mæsia), situated on the western shore of the Euxine, and at a later time the capital of Scythia Minor. According to tradition, it was called Tomi (from τέμνω, "cut") because Medea here cut to pieces the body of her brother Ahsyrus. It is said to have been a colony of the Milesians. It is renowned as the place of Ovid's banishment.

TOMŪRIS (Τόμυρις), a queen of the Massagetæ who dwelt south of the Araxes (Jaxartes), by whom Cyrus was slain in battle B.C. 529.

[TONGILIUS. 1. A dissolute young Roman, mentioned contemptuously by Cicero among the favorites of Catiline.—2. A lawyer under Adrian, noted for his avarice, ridiculed by Juvenal.]

[TŌRŌNĒUS or TORŌNICUS SINUS (Τορωναῖος, Τορωνικὸς, Τορωνιακὸς κόλπος), ΤΟΡŌNĒICUS (Lit., now Gulf of Cassandhra or Hagios-Mamos). Vid. TORONE, No. 1.]

TŌRŌNE (Τορώνη: Τορωναῖος). 1. A town of Macedonia, in the district Chalcidice, and on the southwestern side of the peninsula Sithonia, from which the gulf between the peninsulas Sithonia and Pallene was called Sinus Toronicus.—[2. Vid. TORŪNE.]

TORQUATUS, the name of a patrician family of the Manlia gens. 1. T. MANLIUS IMPERIOSUS TORQUATUS, the son of L. Manlius Capitolinus Imperiosus, dictator B.C. 363, was a favorite hero of Roman story: Manlius is said to have been dull of mind in his youth, and was brought up by his father in the closest retirement in the country. When the tribune M. Pomponius accused the elder Manlius in B.C. 362, on account of the cruelties he had practiced in his dictatorship, he endeavored to excite an odium against him by representing him at the same time as a cruel and tyrannical father. As soon as the younger Manlius heard of this, he hurried to Rome, obtained admission to Pomponius early in the morning, and compelled the tribune, by threatening him with instant death if he did not take the oath, to swear that he would drop the accusation against his father. In 361 Manlius served under the dictator T. Quintius Pennus in the war against the Gauls, and in this campaign earned immortal glory by slaying in single combat a gigantic Gaul. From the dead body of the barbarian he took the chain (torques) which had adorned him, and placed it around his own neck; and from this circumstance he obtained the surname of Torquatus. He was dictator in 353, and again in 349. He was also three times consul, namely, in 347, 344, and in 340. In the last of these years Torquatus and his colleague P. Decius Mus gained the great victory over the Latins at the foot of Vesuvius, which established forever the supremacy of Rome over Latium. Vid. Decius. Shortly before the battle, when the two armies were encamped opposite to one another, the consuls published a proclamation that no Roman should engage in single combat with a Latin on pain of death. Notwithstanding this proclamation, the young Manlius, the son of the consul, provoked by the insults of a Tusculan noble of the name of Mettius Geminus, accepted his challenge, slew his adversary, and bore the bloody spoils in triumph to his father. Death was his reward. The consul would not overlook this breach of discipline, and the unhappy youth was executed by the lictor in presence of the assembled army. This severe sentence rendered Torquatus an object of detestation among the Roman youths as long as he lived; and the recollection of his severity was preserved in after ages by the expression Manliana imperia.—2. T. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, consul B.C. 235, when he conquered the Sardinians; censor 231, and consul a second time in 224. He possessed the hereditary sternness and severity of his family; and we find him opposing in the senate the ransom of those Romans who had been taken prisoners at the fatal battle of Cannæ. In 217 he was sent into Sardinia, where he carried on the war with success against the Carthaginians and the Sardinians. He was dictator in 210.—3. T. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, consul 165 with Cn. Octavius. He inherited the severity of his ancestors, of which an instance is related in the condemnation of his son, who had been adopted by D. Junius Silanus. Vid. SILANUS, No. 1.—4. L. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, consul B.C. 65 with L. Aurelius Cotta. Torquatus and Cotta obtained the consulship in consequence of the condemnation, on account of bribery, of P. Cornelius Sulla and P. Autronius Pætus, who had been already elected consuls. After his consulship Torquatus obtained the province of Macedonia. He took an active part in suppressing the Catilinarian conspiracy in 63; and he also supported Cicero when he was banished in 58.—5. L. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, son of No. 4, accused of bribery, in 66, the consuls elect, P. Cornelius Sulla and P. Autronius Pætus, and thus secured the consulship for his father. He was closely connected with Cicero during the prætorship (65) and consulship (63) of the latter. In 62 he brought a second accusation against P. Sulla, whom he now charged with having been a party to both of Catiline's conspiracies. Sulla was defended by Hortensius and by Cicero in a speech which is still extant. Torquatus, like his father, belonged to the aristocratical party, and accordingly opposed Cæsar on the breaking out of the civil war in 49. He was prætor in that year, and was stationed at Alba with six cohorts. He subsequently joined Pompey in Greece, and in the following year (48) he had the command of Oricum intrusted to him, but was obliged to surrender both himself and the town to Cæsar, who, however, dismissed Torquatus uninjured. After the battle of Pharsalia Torquatus went to Africa, and upon the defeat of his party in that country in 46 he attempted to escape to Spain along with Scipio and others, but was taken prisoner by P. Sittius at Hippo Regius, and slain together with his companions. Torquatus was well acquainted with Greek literature, and is praised by Cicero as a man well trained in every kind of learning. He belonged to the Epicurean school of philosophy, and is introduced by Cicero as the advocate of that school in his dialogic De Finibus, the first book of which is called Torquatus in Cicero's letters to Atticus.—6. A. MANLIUS TORQUATUS, prætor in 52, when he presided at the trial of Milo for bribery. On the breaking out of the civil war he espoused the side of Pompey, and after the defeat of the latter retired to Athens, where he was living in exile in 45. He was an intimate friend of Cicero, who addressed four letters to him while he was in exile.

[TORYNE (Τορύνη) or TORONE (Τορόνη, near Perga), a haven in Thesprotia, where the fleet of Augustus was moored for a short time previous to the battle of Actium.]

TOXANDRI, a people in Gallia Belgica, between the Menapii and Morini, on the right bank of the Scaldis.

TRABÆA, Q., a Roman comic dramatist, who occupies the eighth place in the canon of Volcæus Sedigitus. Vid. SEDIGITUS. The period when he flourished is uncertain, but he has been placed about B.C. 130. No portion of his works has been preserved with the exception of half a dozen lines quoted by Cicero, [edited in Bothe's Poete Scenici Latin., vol. vi., p. 29–30.]

TRACHÆLUS, GALERIUS, consul A.D. 68 with Silius Italicus, is frequently mentioned by his contemporary Quintilian as one of the most distinguished orators of his age.

TRACHIS or TRACHIN (Τραχίς, Ion. Τρηχίς, Τραχίν; Τραχίνιος). 1. Also called HERACLÆA TRACHINÆ, or HERACLÆA ΠΥTHIOTIDIS, or simply HERACLÆA (Ἡράκλεια ἢ ἐν Τραχίναϊς, or Ἡ ἢ ἐν Τραχίνι), a town of Thessaly, in the district Malis, celebrated as the residence of Hercules for a time.—2. A town of Phocis, on the frontiers of Bœotia, and on the slope of Mount Helicon, in the neighborhood of Lebadea.

TRACHONITIS or TRACHON (Τραχωνίτις, Τράχων), the northern district of Palestine beyond the Jordan, lay between Antilibanus and the mountains of Arabia, and was bounded on the north by the territory of Damascus, on the east by Auranitis, on the south by Ituræa, and on the west by Gaulanitis. It was for the most part a sandy desert, intersected by two ranges of rocky mountains, called Trachōnes (Τραχώνες), the caves in which gave refuge to numerous bands of robbers. For its political relations under the Asmonæan and Idumæan princes, vid. PALÆSTINA. Under the Romans it belonged sometimes to the province of Judæa and sometimes to that of Arabia. It forms part of the Hauran.

[TRADUCTA, JULIA (now Tarifa), a town in Hispania Batica, owed its origin to the Romans, who transported (whence the name Traducta) hither the inhabitants of Zelas, a town in Africa, near Tingis, adding some colonists of their own to the number.]

TRAGIA, TRAGIÆ, or TRAGIAS (Τραγία, Τραγία, Τραγίας), a small island (or more than one) in the Ægean Sea, near Samos, probably between it and Pharmacussa, where Pericles gained a naval victory over the Samians, B.C. 439.

TRAGURJUM (now Trau or Troglic), a town of Dalmatia, in Illyricum, celebrated for its marble, and situated on an island connected with the main land by means of a mole.

TRAJANOPŒLIS. 1. (Now Orichovo), a town in the interior of Thrace, on the Hebrus, founded by Trajan.—2. A town of Cilicia. vid. SELINUS.—3. A town in Mysia, on the borders of Phrygia.

TRAJANUS, M. ULPIUS, Roman emperor A.D. 98–117, was born at Italica, near Seville, the 18th of September, 52. He was trained to arms, and served with distinction in the East and in Germany. He was consul in 91, and at the close of 97 he was adopted by the Emperor Nerva, who gave him the rank of Cæsar and the names of Nerva and Germanicus, and, shortly after, the title of imperator and the tribunitia potestas. His style and title after his elevation to the imperial dignity were Imperator Cæsar Nerva Trajanus Augustus. He was the first emperor who was born out of Italy. Nerva died in January, 98, and was succeeded by Trajan, who was then at Cologne. His accession was hailed with joy, and he did not disappoint the expectations of the people. He was a man adapted to command. He was strong and healthy, of a majestic appearance, laborious, and inured to fatigue. Though not a man of letters, he had good sense, a knowledge of the world, and a sound judgment. His mode of living was very simple, and in his campaigns he shared all the sufferings and privations of the soldiers, by whom he was both loved and feared. He was a friend to justice, and he had a sincere desire for the happiness of the people. Trajan did not return to Rome for some months, being employed in settling the frontiers on the Rhine and the Danube. He entered Rome on foot, accompanied by his wife Pompeia Plotina. This lady is highly commended by Pliny the younger for her modest virtues, and her affection to Marciana, the sister of Trajan. In A.D. 101 Trajan left Rome for his campaign against the Daci. Decebalus, king of the Daci, had compelled Domitian to purchase peace by an annual payment of money; and Trajan determined on hostilities. This war employed Trajan between two and three years; but it ended with the defeat of Decebalus, who sued for peace at the feet of the Roman emperor. Trajan assumed the name of Dacicus, and entered Rome in triumph (103). In the following year (104) Trajan commenced his second Dacian war against Decebalus, who, it is said, had broken the treaty. Decebalus was completely defeated, and put an end to his life (106). In the course of this war Trajan built (105) a permanent bridge across the Danube at a place now called Szernecz. The piers were of stone and of an enormous size, but the arches were of wood. After the death of Decebalus Dacia was reduced to the form of a Roman province; strong forts were built in various places, and Roman colonies were planted. It is generally supposed that the column at Rome, called the Column of Trajan, was erected to commemorate his Dacian victories. On his return Trajan had a triumph, and he exhibited games to the people for one hundred and twenty-three days. Eleven thousand animals were slaughtered during these amusements; and an army of gladiators, ten thousand men, gratified the Romans by killing one another. About this time Arabia Petræa was subjected to the empire by A. Cornelius Palma, the governor of Syria; and an Indian embassy came to Rome. Trajan constructed a road across the Pomptine marshes, and built magnificent bridges across the streams. Buildings, probably mansions, were constructed by the side of this road. In 114 Trajan left Rome to make war on the Armenians and the Parthians. He spent the winter of 114 at Antioch, and in the following year he invaded the Parthian dominions. The most striking and brilliant success attended his arms. In the course of two campaigns (115–116) he conquered the greater part of the Parthian empire, and took the Parthian capital, Ctesiphon. In 116 he descended the Tigris and entered the Erythræan Sea (the Persian Gulf). While he was thus engaged the Parthians rose against the Romans, but were again subdued by the generals of Trajan. On his return to Ctesiphon, Trajan determined to give the Parthians a king, and placed the diadem on the head of Parthamaspatæ. In 117 Trajan fell ill, and, as his complaint grew worse, he set out for Italy. He lived to reach Selinus in Cilicia, afterward called Trajanopolis, where he died in August, 117, after a reign of nineteen years, six months, and fifteen days. His ashes were taken to Rome in a golden urn, carried in triumphal procession, and deposited under the column which bears his name. He left no children, and he was succeeded by Hadrian. Trajan constructed several great roads in the empire; he built libraries at Rome, one of which, called the Ulpia Bibliotheca, is often mentioned; and a theatre in the Campus Martius. His great work was the Forum Trajanum, in the centre of which was placed the column of Trajan. Under the reign of Trajan lived Sextus Julius Frontinus, C. Cornelius Tacitus, the younger Pliny, and various others of less note. Plutarch, Suetonius, and Epictetus survived Trajan. The jurists Juventius Celsus and Neratius Priscus were living under Trajan.

TRAJANUS PORTUS. vid. CENTUM CELLÆ.

TRAJESTUM (now Urecht), a town of the Bæ tavi, on the Rhine, called at a later time Trajectus Rheni, or Ad Rhenum.

TRALLES OF TRALLIS (αἱ Τραλλεῖς, ἡ Τράλλεις: Τραλλιανός, Trallianus: ruins at Ghiuzel-Hisar, near Aidin), a flourishing commercial city of Asia Minor, reckoned sometimes to Ionia and sometimes to Caria. It stood on a quadrangular height at the southern foot of Mount Messogis (with a citadel on a higher point), on the banks of the little river Eudon, a northern tributary of the Mæander, from which the city was distant eighty stadia (eight geographical miles). The surrounding country was extremely fertile and beautiful, and hence the city was at first called Anthea (Ἀνθεια). Under the Seleucidæ it bore the names of Seleucia and Antiochia. It was inhabited by a mixed population of Greeks and Carians. There was a less important city of the same name in Phrygia, if, indeed, it be not the same.

[TRAPISÆ (Τραπίσαι), a people of Thrace, mentioned along with the Melanditæ (vid. MELANDEPTÆ) and Thyni, by Seuthes, in the Anabasis of Xenophon, as forming part of the government of his father Masades.]

TRANQUILLUS, SÜETŌNIUS. vid. SÜETONIUS.

TRANSCELLENSIS MONS, a mountain of Mauretania Cæsariensis, between Cæsarea and the River Chinalaph.

TRAPEZOPŌLIS (Τραπεζούπολις) a town of Asia Minor, on the southern slope of Mount Cadmus, on the confines of Caria and Phrygia. Its site is uncertain.

TRAPEZŪS (Τραπεζοῦς: Τραπεζούντιος and -ούσιος). 1. (Near Mavria), a city of Arcadia, on the Alpheus, the name of which was mythically derived from the τράπεζα, or altar, on which Lycaon was said to have offered human sacrifices to Jove. At the time of the building of Megalopolis, the inhabitants of Trapezus, rather than be transferred to the new city, migrated to the shores of the Euxine, and their city fell to ruin.—2. (Now Taraboson, Trabezun, or Trebizond), a colony of Sinope, at almost the extreme east of the northern shore of Asia Minor. After Sinope lost her independence, Trapezus belonged first to Armenia Minor, and afterward to the kingdom of Pontus. Under the Romans it was made a free city, probably by Pompey, and, by Trajan, the capital of Pontus Cappadocius. Hadrian constructed a new harbor; and the city became a place of first-rate commercial importance. It was also strongly fortified. It was taken by the Goths in the reign of Valerian; but it had recovered, and was in a flourishing state at the time of Justinian, who repaired its fortifications. In the Middle Ages it was for some time the seat of a fragment of the Greek empire, called the empire of Trebizond. It is now the second commercial port of the Black Sea, ranking next after Odessa.

TRASIMĒNUS LACUS (now Lago di Perugia), sometimes, but not correctly, written THRASYMĒNUS, a lake in Etruria, between Clusium and Perusia, memorable for the victory gained by Hannibal over the Romans under Flaminius, B.C. 217.

TREBA (Trebanus: now Trevi), a town in Latium, near the sources of the Anio, north-east of Anagnia.

TREBĀTIUS TESTA. vid. TESTA.

[TREBELLIANUS, C. ANNIUS, a Cilician pirate, proclaimed himself Roman emperor (one of the so-called thirty tyrants) A.D. 264, but was defeated and slain in Isauria by one of the generals of Gallienus.]

TREBĒLIUS POLLIO, one of the six Scriptores Historiæ Augustæ, flourished under Constantine, and was anterior to Vopiscus. His name is prefixed to the biographies of, 1. The two Valeriani, father and son; 2. The Gallieni; 3. The Thirty Tyrants; 4. Claudius, the last-named piece being addressed to Constantine. We learn from Vopiscus that the lives written by Trebellius Pollio commenced with Philippus and extended down to Claudius. Of these, all as far as the Valeriani, regarding whom but a short fragment remains, have been lost. [For editions, vid. CAPITOLINUS, JULIUS.]

TREBĪA (now Trebbia), a small river in Gallia Cisalpina, falling into the Po near Placentia. It is memorable for the victory which Hannibal gained over the Romans, B.C. 218. This river is generally dry in summer, but is filled with a rapid stream in winter, which was the season when Hannibal defeated the Romans.

TREBŌNIUS, C., played rather a prominent part in the last days of the republic. He commenced public life as a supporter of the aristocratical party, and in his quaestorship (B.C. 60) he attempted to prevent the adoption of P. Clodius into a plebeian family. He changed sides soon afterward, and in his tribunate of the plebs (55) he was the instrument of the triumvirs in proposing that Pompey should have the two Spains, Crassus Syria, and Cæsar the Gauls and Illyricum for another period of five years. This proposal received the approbation of the comitia, and is known by the name of Lex Trebonia. For this service he was rewarded by being appointed one of Cæsar's legates in Gaul, where he remained till the breaking out of the civil war in 49. In the course of the same year he was intrusted by Cæsar with the command of the land forces engaged in the siege of Massilia. In 48 Trebonius was city-prætor, and in the discharge of his duties resisted the seditious attempts of his colleague M. Cælius Rufus to obtain by force the repeal of Cæsar's law respecting the payment of debts. Toward the end of 47, Trebonius, as pro-prætor, succeeded Q. Cassius Longinus in the government of Further Spain, but was expelled from the province by a mutiny of the soldiers who espoused the Pompeian party. Cæsar raised him to the consulship in October, 45, and promised him the province of Asia. In return for all these honors and favors, Trebonius was one of the prime movers in the conspiracy to assassinate Cæsar, and after the murder of his patron (44) he went as proconsul to the province of Asia. In the following year (43), Dolabella, who had received from Antonius the province of Syria, surprised the town of Smyrna, where Trebonius was then residing, and slew him in his bed.

TREBŪLA (Trebulanus). 1. (Now Tregghia), a town in Sannium, situated in the southeastern part of the mountains of Cajazzo.—2. Murusca; a town of the Sabines of uncertain site.—3. SUFENA, also a town of the Sabines, and of uncertain site.

TRERUS (now Sacco), a river in Latium, and a tributary of the Liris.

TRES TABERNÆ. 1. A station on the Via Appia in Latium, between Aricia and Forum Appii. It is mentioned in the account of St. Paul's journey to Rome.—2. (Now Borghetto), a station in Gallia Cisalpina, on the road from Placentia to Mediolanum.

TRĒTUM (Τρητόν: now Cape Bugiaroni, or Ras Sebâ Rous, i. e. Scenê Capes), a great promontory on the coast of Numidia, forming the western headland of the Sinus Olcachites (now Bay of Storah).

TREVĪRI or TREVĒRI, a powerful people in Gallia Belgica, who were faithful allies of the Romans, and whose cavalry was the best in all Gaul. The River Mosella flowed through their territory, which extended westward from the Rhine as far as the Remi. Their chief town was made a Roman colony by Augustus, and was called AUGUSTA TREVĪRŌRUM (now Trier or Treves). It stood on the right bank of the Mosella, and became under the later empire one of the most flourishing Roman cities north of the Alps. It was the capital of Belgica Prima; and after the division of the Roman world by Diocletian (A.D. 292) into four districts, it became the residence of the Cæsar who had the government of Britain, Gaul, and Spain. Here dwelt Constantius Chlorus and his son Constantine the Great, as well as several of the subsequent emperors. The modern city still contains many interesting Roman remains. They belong, however, to the latter period of the empire, and are consequently not in the best style of art. The most important of these remains is the Porta Nigra or Black Gate, a large and massive building in an excellent state of preservation. In addition to this, we have extensive remains of the Roman baths, of the amphitheatre, and of the palace of Constantine. The piers of the bridge over the Moselle are likewise Roman. At the village of Igel, about six miles from Treves, is a beautiful Roman structure, being a four-sided obelisk, more than seventy feet high, covered with carvings, inscriptions, and bas-reliefs. There has been much dispute respecting the object for which this building was erected; but it appears to have been set up by two brothers, named Secundini, partly as a funeral monument to their deceased relatives, partly to celebrate their sister's marriage, which is represented on one of the bas-reliefs by the figures of a man and woman joining hands.

TRIARIUS, VALĒRIUS. I. L., quæstor urbanus B.C. 81, and prætor in Sardinia 77, when he repulsed Lepidus, who had fled into that island after his unsuccessful attempt to repeal the laws of Sulla. Triarius served under Lucullus as one of his legates in the war against Mithradates, and at first gained considerable distinction by his zeal and activity. In 68 Triarius was dispatched to the assistance of Fabius, who had been intrusted with the defence of Pontus, while Lucullus invaded Armenia, and who was now attacked by Mithradates with overwhelming numbers. Triarius compelled Mithradates to assume the defensive, and early in the following year he commenced active operations against the Pontic king. Anxious to gain the victory over Mithradates before the arrival of Lucullus, Triarius allowed himself to be attacked at a disadvantage, and was defeated with great slaughter near Zela.—2. P., son of the preceding, accused M. Æmilius Scæurus, in 54, first of reptundæ and next of ambitus. Scæurus was defended on both occasions by Cicero.—3. C., a friend of Cicero, who introduces him as one of the speakers in his dialogue De Finibus, and praises his oratory in his Brutus. He fought on Pompey's side at the battle of Pharsalia. Triarius perished in the civil wars, probably in Africa, for Cicero speaks in 45 of his death, and adds, that Triarius had left him the guardian of his children.

TRIBALLI, a powerful people in Thrace, a branch of the Getæ dwelling along the Danube, who were defeated by Alexander the Great, B.C. 335, and obliged to sue for peace.

TRIBOCCI, a German people, settled in Gallia Belgica, between Mount Vogesus and the Rhine, in the neighborhood of Strasburg.

TRIBONIÂNUS, a jurist, commissioned by Justinianus, with sixteen others, to compile the Digest or Pandect. For details, vid. JUSTINIÂNUS.

TRICĀLA. Vid. TRIOCALA.

TRICARĀNON (Τρικάρανον: Τρικαρανεύς), a fortress in Phlissia, southeast of Phlius, on a mountain of the same name.

TRICASSES, TRICASSII, or TRICASSĪNI, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, east of the Senones, whose chief town was Augustobona, afterward Tricassæ (now Troyes).

TRICASTINI, a people in Gallia Narbonensis, between the Cavares and Vocontii, inhabiting a narrow slip of country between the Drome and the Isère. Their chief town was Augusta Tricastinorum, or simply Augusta (now Aouste).

TRICCA, subsequently TRICĀLA (Τρικκη, Τρίκαλα: now Trikkala), an ancient town of Thessaly, in the district Hestiatotis, situated on the Lethæus, north of the Pencus. Homer represents it as governed by the sons of Æsculapius; and it contained in later times a celebrated temple of this god.

TRICHŌNIS (Τριχωνίς: now Zygos or Vrakhori), a large lake in Ætolia, east of Stratos and north of Mount Aracynthus.

TRICHŌNIUM (Τριχώνιον: Τριχωνιεύς), a town in Ætolia, east of Lake Trichonis.

TRICIPITĪNIUS, LUCRĒTIUS. Vid. LUCRETII GENS.

TRICŌLŌNI (Τρικώλωνοι: Τρικόλωνεύς), a town of Arcadia, a little north of Megalopolis, of which a temple of Neptune (Poseidon) alone remained in the time of Pausanias.

TRICORĪI, a Ligurian people in Gallia Narbonensis, a branch of the Salyi, in the neighborhood of Massilia and Aquæ Sextiæ.

TRICORŪTHUS (Τρικóρυνθος: Τρικόρυνσιος), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Aiantis, between Marathon and Rhamnus.

TRICRANA (Τρίκρανα: now Trikkiri), an island off the coast of Argolis, near Hermione.

TRIDENTUM (now Trent, in Italian Trento), the capital of the TRIDENTINI, and the chief town of Rætia, situated on the River Athesis (now Adige), and on the pass of the Alps leading to Verona. Its greatness dates from the Middle Ages, and it is chiefly celebrated on account of the ecclesiastical council which assembled within its walls A.D. 1545.

TRIÈRES OR TRIÈRIS (Τριήρης: now Enfeh?), a small fortress on the coast of Phœnicia, between Tripolis and the Promontorium Theu-proson.

TRIFANUM, a town in Latium of uncertain site, between Minturnæ and Sinuessa.

[TRIMERUS (now Tremiti), an island on the coast of Apulia, one of the ΔΙΟΜΕΔΕÆ INSULÆ (q. v.), where Julia, the grand-daughter of Augustus, died in exile.]

[TRIMONTIUM. Vid. PHILIPPOPOLIS.]

• TRINACRĪA. Vid. SICILIA.

TRINEMĒS OR TRINEMĪA (Τρινεμείς, Τρινέμεια: Τρινεμείς), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Cecropis, on Mount Parnes.

[TRINIUM (flumen, now Trigno), a small river in the country of the Frentani, afforded a good harbor for ships (flumen portuosum, Plin..)]

TRINOBANTES, one of the most powerful people of Britain, inhabiting the modern Essex. They are mentioned in Cæsar's invasion of Britain, and they offered a formidable resistance to the invading force sent into the island by the Emperor Claudius.

[TRIO, L. FULCINIUS, a notorious informer under Tiberius, and one of the friends and favorites of that emperor: in A. D. 20 he accused Piso before the consuls, and for that service was still further honored by Tiberius. In A. D. 35 he was thrown into prison on suspicion, and there put an end to his own life.]

TRIOCĀLA OR TRICĀLA (Τριόκαλα, Τρικαλα: Τρικαλίνος, Tricalinus: near Calata Bellota), a mountain fortress in the interior of Sicily, near the Crimisus, was in the Servile war the headquarters of the slaves, and the residence of their leader Tryphon.

TRIOΠΑΣ (Τριόπας or Τρίοψ), son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Canace, a daughter of Æolus, or of Helios and Rhodos, and the father of Iphimedia and Erysichthon. Hence his son Erysichthon is called Triopæus, and his grand-daughter Mestra or Metra, the daughter of Erysichthon, Triopæis. Triopas expelled the Pelasgians from the Dotian plain, but was himself obliged to emigrate, and went to Caria, where he founded Cnidus on the Triopian promontory. His son Erysichthon was punished by Ceres (Demeter) with insatiable hunger because he had violated her sacred grove; but others relate the same of Triopas himself.

TRIOPIA OR TRIOPION, an early name of CNIDUS.

TRIOPIUM (Τριόπιον: now Cape Krio), the promontory which terminates the peninsula of Cnidus, forming the southwestern headland of Caria and of Asia Minor. Upon it was a temple of Apollo, surnamed Triopius, which was the centre of union for the states of DORIS. Hence it was also called the Sacred Promontory (ἄκρωτήριο ἱερόν).

TRIPHYLIA (Τριφυλία: Τριφύλιος), the southern portion of Elis, lying between the Alpheus and the Neda, is said to have derived its name from the three different tribes by which it was peopled. Its chief town was PYLOS.

[TRIPHYLUS (Τριφύλος), son of Arcas and Laodamia, the legendary hero eponymus of Triphylia.]

TRIPRODISCUS (Τριποδίσκος: Τριποδίσκος: ruins near Derweni), a town in the interior of Megaris, northwest of Megara.

TRĪPOLĪS (Τρίπολις: Τριπολίτης), is properly the name of a confederacy composed of three cities, or a district containing three cities, but it is also applied to single cities which had some such relation to others as to make the name appropriate. 1. In Arcadia, comprising the three cities of Callia, Dipœna, and Nonacris: its name is preserved in the modern town of Tripolitza.

—2. T. PELAGONIA, in Thessaly, comprising the three towns of Azoros, Doliche, and Pythium.

—3. In Rhodes, comprising the three Dorian cities Lindus, Ialysus, and Camirus. Vid. RHODUS.—4. (Now Kash Yeniji), a city on the Mæander, twelve miles west of Hierapolis, on the borders of Phrygia, Caria, and Lydia, to each of which it is assigned by different authorities.

—5. (Now Tireboli), a fortress on the coast of Pontus, on a river of the same name (now Tireboli Su), ninety stadia east of the Promontorium Zephyrium (now Cape Zefreh).—6. (Now Tripoli, Tarabulus), on the coast of Phœnicia, consisted of three distinct cities, one stadium (six hundred feet) apart, each having its own walls, but all united in a common constitution, having one place of assembly, and forming in reality one city. They were colonies of Tyre, Sidon, and Aradus respectively. Tripolis stood about thirty miles south of Aradus, and about the same distance north of Byblus, on a bold headland formed by a spur of Mount Lebanon. It had a fine harbor and a flourishing commerce. It is now a city of about fifteen thousand inhabitants, and the capital of one of the pachalics of Syria, that of Tripoli.—7. The district on the northern coast of Africa, between the two Syrtes, comprising the three cities of Sabrata (or Abrotonum), Cæa, and Leptis Magna, and also called Tripolitana Regio. Vid. SYRTICA. Its name is preserved in that of the regency of Tripoli, the western part of which answers to it, and in that of the city of Tripoli, probably the ancient Cæa.

TRIPOLITĀNA REGIO. Vid. SYRTICA, TRIPOLIS, No. 7.

TRIPTOLEMUS (Τριπτόλεμος), son of Celeus, king of Eleusis, and Metanira or Polymnia. Others describe him as son of King Eleusis by Cothonea, or of Oceanus and Gæa, or of Trochilus by an Eleusinian woman. Triptolemus was the favorite of Demeter (Ceres), and the inventor of the plough and agriculture, and of civilization, which is the result of it. He was the great hero in the Eleusinian mysteries. According to the common legend, he hospitably received Demeter at Eleusis when she was wandering in search of her daughter. The goddess, in return, wished to make his son Demophon immortal, and placed him in the fire in order to destroy his mortal parts; but Metanira screamed out at the sight, and the child was consumed by the flames. As a compensation for this bereavement, the goddess gave to Triptolemus a chariot with winged dragons and seeds of wheat. In this chariot Triptolemus rode over the earth, making man acquainted with the blessings of agriculture. On his return to Attica, Celeus endeavored to kill him, but by the command of Demeter he was obliged to give up his country to Triptolemus, who now established the worship of Demeter, and instituted the Thesmophoria. Triptolemus is represented in works of art as a youthful hero, sometimes with the petasus, on a chariot drawn by dragons, and holding in his hand a sceptre and corn ears.

TRITÆA (Τρίταια; Τριταίων). 1. A town of Phocis, northwest of Cleonæ, on the left bank of the Cephissus, and on the frontiers of Locris. —2. One of the twelve stadia cities of Achaia, one hundred and twenty stadia east of Pharæ, and near the frontiers of Arcadia. Augustus made it dependent upon Patræ.

[TRITANTÆCHMES (Τριτανταίχμης). 1. A Persian satrap of Babylon, son of Artabazus.—2. A son of Artabanus, and cousin of Xerxes, was one of the commanders of the Persian infantry when the barbarians invaded Greece in B.C. 480.]

TRITO of TRITOGENIA (Τριτώ or Τριτογένεια, and Τριτογενής), a surname of Minerva (Athena), which is explained in different ways. Some derive it from Lake Tritonis in Libya, near which she is said to have been born; others from the stream Triton, near Alalcomenæ in Bœotia, where she was worshipped, and where, according to some statements, she was also born; the grammarians, lastly, derive the name from τρίτω, which, in the dialect of the Athamanians, is said to signify "head," so that it would be the goddess born out of the head of her father.

TRITON (Τρίτων), son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Amphitrite (or Celæno), who dwelt with his father and mother in a golden palace in the bottom of the sea, or, according to Homer, at Ægæ. Later writers describe him as riding over the sea on horses or other sea-monsters. Sometimes we find mention of Tritons in the plural. Their appearance is differently described; though they are always conceived as having the human figure in the upper part of their bodies, and that of a fish in the lower part. The chief characteristic of Tritons in poetry as well as in works of art is a trumpet made out of a shell (concha), which the Tritons blow at the command of Neptune (Poseidon) to soothe the restless waves of the sea.

TRITON FL., TRITONIS, or TRITONIS PALUS (Τρίτων, Τριτωνίς, Τριτωνίτις), a river and lake on the Mediterranean coast of Libya, which are mentioned in several old Greek legends, especially in the mythology of Minerva (Athena), whom one account represented as born on the Lake Tritonis, and as the daughter of the nymph of the same name, and of Neptune (Poseidon): hence her surname of Τριτογένεια. When the Greeks first became acquainted geographically with the northern coast of Africa, they identified the gulf afterward called the Lesser SYRTIS with the Lake Tritonis. This seems to be the notion of Herodotus, in the story he relates of Jason (iv., 178, 179). A more exact knowledge of the coast showed them a great lake beyond the inmost recess of the Lesser Syrtis, to which the name Tritonis was then applied. This lake had an opening to the sea, as well as a river flowing into it, and accordingly the geographers represented the River Triton as rising in a mountain called Zuchabari, and forming the Lake Tritonis on its course to the Lesser Syrtis, into which it fell. The lake is undoubtedly the great salt lake, in the south of Tunis, called El-Sibkah; but, as this lake has no longer an opening to the sea, and the whole coast is much altered by the inroads of the sands of the Sahara, it seems impossible to identify the river: some suppose that it is represented by the Wady-el-Khabs. Some of the ancient writers gave altogether a different locality to the legend, and identify the Triton with the river usually called LATHON in Cyrenaica; and Apollonius Rhodius even transfers the name to the Nile.

TROAS (ἡ Τρωάς, sc. χώρα, the feminine of the adjective τρός; Τρωαδῆς: now Chan), the territory of Ilium or Troy, formed the northwestern part of Mysia. It was bounded on the west by the Ægean Sea, from Promontorium Lectum to Promontorium Sigeum, at the entrance of the Hellespont; on the northwest by the Hellespont, as far as the River Rhodius, below Abydus; on the northeast and east by the mountains which border the valley of the Rhodius, and extend from its sources southward to the main ridge of Mount Ida, and on the south by the northern coast of the Gulf of Adramytium along the southern foot of Ida; but on the northeast and east the boundary is sometimes extended so far as to include the whole coast of the Hellespont, and part of the Propontis, and the country as far as the River Granicus, thus embracing the district of Dardania, and somewhat more. Strabo extends the boundary still further east, to the River Æsepus, and also south to the Caicus; but this clearly results from his including in the territory of Troy that of her neighboring allies. The Troas is for the most part mountainous, being intersected by Mount IDA and its branches: the largest plain is that in which Troy stood. The chief rivers were the SARONIS on the south, the RHODIUS on the north, and the Scamander and Simois in the centre. These two rivers, so renowned in the legends of the Trojan war, flow from two different points in the chain of Mount Ida, and unite in the plain of Troy, through which the united stream flows northwest, and falls into the Hellespont east of the promontory of Sigeum. The Scamander, also called Xanthus, is usually identified with the Menderes-Chai, and the Simois with the Gumbrek; but this subject presents difficulties which can not be discussed within the limits of the present article. The precise locality of the city of Troy, or, according to its genuine Greek name, Ilium, is also the subject still of much dispute. First, there is the question whether the Ilium of Homer had any real existence; next, whether the ILIUM VERUS of the historical period, which was visited by Xerxes and by Alexander the Great, was on the same site as the city of Priam. The most probable opinion seems to be that which places the original city in the upper part of the plain, on a moderate elevation at the foot of Mount Ida, and its citadel (called Pergäma, Πέργαμα) on a loftier height, almost separated from the city by a ravine, and nearly surrounded by the Scamander. This city seems never to have been restored after its destruction by the Greeks. The Æolian colonists subsequently built a new city, on the site, as they doubtless believed, of the old one, but really much lower down the plain; and this city is the ΤΡΩΙΑ or ILIUM VETUS of most of the ancient writers. After the time of Alexander, this city declined, and a new one was built still further down the plain, below the confluence of the Simoïs and Scamander, and near the Hellespont, and this was called ILIUM NOVUM. Under the Romans, this city was honored with various immunities, as the only existing representative of the ancient Ilium. Its substantial importance, however, was entirely eclipsed by that of ALEXANDREA TROAS.—For the general political history of the Troad, see MYSIA. The Teucrians, by whom it was peopled at a period of unknown antiquity, were a Thracian people. Settling in the plain of the Scamander, they founded the city of Ilium, which became the head of an extensive confederacy, embracing not only the northwest of Asia Minor, but much of the opposite shores of Thrace, and with allies in Asia Minor even as far as Lycia, and evidently much in advance of the Greeks in civilization. The mythical account of the origin of the kingdom is briefly as follows. Teucer, the first king in the Troad, had a daughter, who married Dardanus, the chieftain of the country northeast of the Troad. Vid. DARDANIA. Dardanus had two sons, Ilus and Erichthonius; and the latter was the father of Tros, from whom the country and people derived the names of Troas and Troes. Tros was the father of Ilus, who founded the city, which was called after him ILIUM, and also, after his father, ΤΡΩΙΑ. The next king was LAOMEDON, and after him Priam. Vid. PRIAMUS. In his reign the city was taken and destroyed by the confederated Greeks, after a ten years' siege. Vid. HELENA, ALEXANDER, AGAMEMNON, ACHILLES, HECTOR, AJAX, ULYSSES, NEOPTOLEMUS, ÆNEAS, &c., and HOMERUS. To discuss the historical value of this legend is not the province of this work: it is enough to say that we have in it evidence of a great conflict, at a very early period, between the great Thracian empire in the northwest of Asia Minor, and the rising power of the Achæans in Greece, in which the latter were victorious; but their victory was fruitless, in consequence of their comparatively low civilization, and especially of their want of maritime power. The chronologers assigned different dates for the capture of Troy: the calculation most generally accepted placed it in B.C. 1184. This date should be carefully remembered, as it forms the starting point of various computations; but it should also be borne in mind that the date is of no historical authority. (There is not space to explain this matter here.) The subsequent history of the Troad presents an entire blank till we come to the period of the great Æolic migration, when it merges in that of ÆOLIS and MYSIA. In writers of the Roman period, the name Troas is often used by itself for the city of ALEXANDREA TROAS.

TROCMI or -II. Vid. GALATIA.

TROEZËN (Τροίην, more rarely Τροίηνην: Τροίηνησις: now Dhamala), the capital of ΤΡΟΖΕΝΙΑ (Τροίηνια), a district in the southeast of Argolis, on the Saronic Gulf, and opposite the island of Ægina. The town was situated at some little distance from the coast, on which it possessed a harbor called Ροσόν (Ρώγων), opposite the island of Calauria. Troezen was a very ancient city, and is said to have been originally called Poseidonia, on account of its worship of Poseidon (Neptune). It received the name of Troezen from Træzen, one of the sons of Pelops; and it is celebrated in mythology as the place where Pitheus, the maternal grandfather of Theseus, lived, and where Theseus himself was born. Troezen was for a long time dependent upon the kings of Argos; but in the historical period it appears as an independent state. It was a city of some importance, for we read that the Troezenians sent five ships of war to Salamis and one thousand heavy-armed men to Plataeæ. When the Persians entered Attica, the Troezenians distinguished themselves by the kindness with which they received the Athenians, who were obliged to abandon their city.

TROCÏLÏÆ, three small islands, named Pison, Argennon, and Sandalion, lying off the promontory of Trogilium. Vid. MYCALE.

[TROCILIMUM PROMONTORIUM (Τρωγίλιον ἀκρωτήριον). Vid. MYCALE.]

TROGÏTIS LACUS. Vid. PSEIDIA.

TROGLODÏTÆ (Τρωγλοδύται, i. e., dwellers in caves), the name applied by the Greek geographers to various uncivilized people, who had no abodes but caves, especially to the inhabitants of the western coast of the Red Sea, along the shores of Upper Egypt and Æthiopia. The whole of this coast was called Trogloδυτικὴ (Τρωγλοδυτική). There were also Troglodytæ in Mæsia, on the banks of the Danube.

TROGUS, POMPEIUS. Vid. JUSTINUS.

TROILIUM. Vid. TROSSULUM.

TROÏLUS (Τρωΐλος), son of Priam and Hecuba, or, according to others, son of Apollo. He fell by the hands of Achilles.

ΤΡΩΙΑ (Τροία, Ion. Τροίη, Ep. Τροία: Τρώς, Τρώος, Ep. and Ion. Τρώος, fem. Τρώας, &c.: Τρῶς, Τροῖς, Trojánus, fem. Τρῶας, pl. Τρῶαδες and Τρῶαδες), the name of the city of Troy or Ilium, also applied to the country. Vid. TROAS.

TROPHŌNIUS (Τροφώνιος), son of Erginus, king of Orchomenus, and brother of Agamedes. He and his brother built the temple at Delphi and the treasury of King Hyrieus in Bœotia. For details, vid. AGAMEDES. Trophonius, after his death, was worshipped as a hero, and had a celebrated oracle in a cave near Lebæda in Bœotia. (Vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. ΤΡΑΧΥΛΟΝ.)

ΤΡῶς (Τρώς), son of Erichthonius and Astyoche, and grandson of Dardanus. He was married to Callirrhœ, by whom he became the father of Ilus, Assaracus, and Ganymedes, and was King of Phrygia. The country and people of Troy derived their name from him. He [received from Jupiter (Zeus) as a compensation for his son Ganymedes a pair of divine horses.] Vid. GANYMEDES.

TROSSÛLUM (Trossulanus: now Trusso), a town in Etruria, nine miles from Volsinii, which is said to have been taken by some Roman equites without the aid of foot soldiers; whence the Roman equites obtained the name of Trossulii. Some writers identify this town with Troilium, which was taken by the Romans B.C. 293; but they appear to have been different places.

TROTÏLUM (Τρώπιλον: now Trontello), a town of Sicily, on the road from Syracuse to Leontini TRUENTUM, a town of Picenum, on the River Truentus or Truentinus (now Tronto).

TRUTULENSIS PORTUS, a harbor on the north-eastern coast of Britain, near the estuary Taus (now Tay), but of which the exact site is unknown.

ΤΡΥΦΗΘΩΡΟΣ (Τρυφήθωρος), a Greek grammarian and poet, was a native of Egypt; but nothing is known of his personal history. He is supposed to have lived in the fifth century of the Christian era. Of his grammatical labors we have no record; but one of his poems has come down to us, entitled Ἰλιον ἄλωσι, the Capture of Ilium, consisting of six hundred and ninety-one lines. From the small dimensions of it, it is necessarily little but a sketch. The best editions are by Northmore, Cambridge, 1791, London, 1804; by Schäfer, Leipzig, 1808; and by Wernicke, Leipzig, 1819.

ΤΡΥΦΩΝ (Τρύφων). 1. ΔΙΟΔΩΤΗΣ, a usurper of the throne of Syria during the reign of Demetrius II. Nicator. After the death of Alexander Balas in B.C. 146, Tryphon first set up Antiochus, the infant son of Balas, as a pretender against Demetrius; but in 142 he murdered Antiochus and reigned as king himself. Tryphon was defeated and put to death by Antiochus Sidetes, the brother of Demetrius, in 139, after a reign of three years.—2. SALVIUS, one of the leaders of the revolted slaves in Sicily, was supposed to have a knowledge of divination, for which reason he was elected king by the slaves in 103. He displayed considerable abilities, and in a short time collected an army of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse, with which he defeated the prætor P. Licinius Nerva. After this victory Salvius assumed all the pomp of royalty, and took the surname of Tryphon, probably because it had been borne by Diodotus, the usurper of the Syrian throne. He chose the strong fortress of Triocala as the seat of his new kingdom. Tryphon was defeated by L. Lucullus in 102, and was obliged to take refuge in Triocala. But Lucullus failed in taking the place, and returned to Rome without effecting any thing more. Lucullus was succeeded by C. Servilius; and on the death of Tryphon, about the same time, the kingdom devolved upon Athenion, who was not subdued till 101.

ΤΡΥΦΩΝΙΝΟΣ, CLAUDIUS, a Roman jurist, wrote under the reigns of Septimius Severus and Caracalla.

TUBANTES, a people of Germany, allies of the Cherusci, originally dwelt between the Rhine and the Yssel; in the time of Germanicus, on the southern bank of the Lippe, between Paderborn, Hamm, and the Armsberger Wald; and at a still later time in the neighborhood of the Thüringer Wald, between the Fulda and the Werra. Subsequently they are mentioned as a part of the great league of the Frangi.

TUBERO, AELIUS. 1. Q., son-in-law of L. Æmilius Paulus, served under the latter in his war against Perseus, king of Macedonia. This Tubero, like the rest of his family, was so poor that he had not an ounce of silver plate till his father-in-law gave him five pounds of plate from the spoils of the Macedonian monarch.—2. Q., son of the preceding, was a pupil of Panætius, and is called the Stoic. He had a reputation for talent and legal knowledge. He was prætor in 123, and consul suffectus in 118. He was an opponent of Tib. Gracchus, as well as of C. Gracchus, and delivered some speeches against the latter, 123. Tubero is one of the speakers in Cicero's dialogue de Republica. The passages in the Digest in which Tubero is cited do not refer to this Tubero, but to No. 4.—3. L., an intimate friend of Cicero. He was a relation and a school-fellow of the orator, had served with him in the Marsic war, and had afterward served under his brother Quintus as legate in Asia. On the breaking out of the civil war, Tubero, who had espoused the Pompeian party, received from the senate the province of Africa; but as Atius Varus and Q. Ligarius, who likewise belonged to the aristocratical party, would not surrender it to him, he passed over to Pompey in Greece. He was afterward pardoned by Cæsar, and returned with his son Quintus to Rome. Tubero cultivated literature and philosophy. He wrote a history, and the philosopher Ænesidemus dedicated to him his work on the sceptical philosophy of Pyrrhon.—4. Q., son of the preceding. In 46 he made a speech before C. Julius Cæsar against Q. Ligarius, who was defended by Cicero in a speech which is extant (Pro Q. Ligario). Tubero obtained considerable reputation as a jurist. He had a great knowledge both of Jus Publicum and Privatum, and he wrote several works on both these divisions of law. He married a daughter of Servius Sulpicius, and the daughter of Tubero was the mother of the jurist C. Cassius Longinus. Like his father, Q. Tubero wrote a history. Tubero the jurist, who is often cited in the Digest, is this Tubero; but there is no excerpt from his writings.

TUCCA, PLOTIUS, a friend of Horace and Virgil. The latter poet left Tucca one of his heirs, and bequeathed his unfinished writings to him and Varius, who afterward published the Æncid by order of Augustus.

TUDER (Tuders, -tis: now Todi), an ancient town of Umbria, situated on a hill near the Tiber, and on the road from Mevania to Romæ. It was subsequently made a Roman colony. There are still remains of the polygonal walls of the ancient town.

TUDITANUS, SEMPRONIUS. 1. M., consul B.C. 240, and censor 230.—2. P., tribune of the soldiers at the battle of Cannæ in 216, and one of the few Roman officers who survived that fatal day. In 214 he was curule ædile; in 213 prætor, with Ariminum as his province, and was continued in the command for the two following years (212, 211). He was censor in 209 with M. Cornelius Cethegus, although neither he nor his colleague had yet held the consulship. In 205 he was sent into Greece with the title of proconsul, for the purpose of opposing Philip, with whom, however, he concluded a treaty, which was ratified by the Romans. Tuditanus was consul in 204, and received Bruttium as his province. He was at first defeated by Hannibal, but shortly afterward he gained a decisive victory over the Carthaginian general.—3. C., plebeian ædile 198, and prætor 197, when he obtained Nearer Spain as his province. He was defeated by the Spaniards with great loss, and died shortly afterward of a wound which he had received in the battle.—4. M., tribune of the plebs 193; prætor 189, when he obtained Sicily as his province; and consul 185. In his consulship he carried on war in Liguria, and defeated the Apuani, while his colleague was equally successful against the Ingauni. He was carried off by the great pestilence which devastated Rome in 174.—5. C., prætor 132, and consul 129. In his consulship he carried on war against the Japydes in Illyricum, over whom he gained a victory chiefly through the military skill of his legate, D. Junius Brutus. Tuditanus was an orator and a historian, and in both obtained considerable distinction.

TULCIS, a river on the eastern coast of Spain, near Tarraco.

TULINGI, a people of Gaul of no great importance, who dwelt on the Rhine, between the Rauraci and the Helvetii.

TULLIA, the name of the two daughters of Servius Tullius, the sixth king of Rome. Vid. TULLIUS.

TULLIA, frequently called by the diminutive TULLIOLA, was the daughter of M. Cicero and Terentia, and was probably born B.C. 79 or 78. She was betrothed in 67 to C. Calpurnius Piso Frugi, whom she married in 63 during the consulship of her father. During Cicero's banishment Tullia lost her first husband. She was married again in 56 to Furius Crassipes, a young man of rank and large property; but she did not live with him long, though the time and the reason of her divorce are alike unknown. In 50 she was married to her third husband, P. Cornelius Dolabella, who was a thorough profligate. The marriage took place during Cicero's absence in Cilicia, and, as might have been anticipated, was not a happy one. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, the husband and the father of Tullia espoused opposite sides. While Dolabella fought for Cæsar, and Cicero took refuge in the camp of Pompey, Tullia remained in Italy. On the 19th of May, 49, she was delivered of a seven months' child, which died soon afterward. After the battle of Pharsalia, Dolabella returned to Rome; but he continued to lead a dissolute and profligate life, and at length (46) a divorce took place by mutual consent. At the beginning of 45 Tullia was delivered of a son. As soon as she was sufficiently recovered to bear the fatigues of a journey, she accompanied her father to Tusculum, but she died there in February. Her loss was a severe blow to Cicero. Among the many consolatory letters which he received on the occasion is the well-known one from the celebrated jurist Serv. Sulpicius (ad Fam., iv., 5). To dissipate his grief, Cicero drew up a treatise on Consolation.

TULLIA GENS, patrician and plebeian. The patrician Tullii were one of the Alban houses, which were transplanted to Rome in the reign of Tullus Hostilius. The patrician branch of the gens appears to have become extinct at an early period; for, after the early times of the republic, no one of the name occurs for some centuries, and the Tullii of a later age are not only plebeians, but, with the exception of their bearing the same name, can not be regarded as having any connection with the ancient gens. The first plebeian Tullius who rose to the honors of the state was M. Tullius Decula, consul B.C. 81, and the next was the celebrated orator M. Tullius Cicero. Vid. CICERO.

TULLIUS, SERVIUS, the sixth king of Rome. The account of the early life and death of Servius Tullius is full of strange marvels, and can not be regarded as possessing any title to a real historical narrative. His mother, Ocrisia, was one of the captives taken at Corniculum, and became a female slave of Tanaquil, the wife of Tarquinius Priscus. He was born in the king's palace, and, notwithstanding his servile origin, was brought up as the king's son, since Tanaquil, by her powers of divination, had foreseen the greatness of the child; and Tarquinius placed such confidence in him, that he gave him his daughter in marriage, and intrusted him with the exercise of the government. His rule was mild and beneficent; and so popular did he become, that the sons of Ancus Marcius, fearing lest they should be deprived of the throne which they claimed as their inheritance, procured the assassination of Tarquinius. Vid. TARQUINIUS. They did not, however, reap the fruit of their crime, for Tanaquil, pretending that the king's wound was not mortal, told the people that Tarquinius would recover in a few days, and that he had commanded Servius, meantime, to discharge the duties of the kingly office. Servius forthwith began to act as king, greatly to the satisfaction of the people; and when the death of Tarquinius could no longer be concealed, he was already in firm possession of the royal power. The reign of Servius is almost as barren of military exploits as that of Numa. The only war which Livy mentions is one against Veii, which was brought to a speedy conclusion. The great deeds of Servius were deeds of peace; and he was regarded by posterity as the author of all their civil rights and institutions, just as Numa was of their religious rites and ordinances. Three important events are assigned to Servius by universal tradition. First, he gave a new constitution to the Roman state. The two main objects of this constitution were to give the plebs political independence, and to assign to property that influence in the state which had previously belonged to birth exclusively. In order to carry his purpose into effect, Servius made a two-fold division of the Roman people, one territorial, and the other according to property. For details, vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. COMITIA. Secondly, he extended the pomerium, or hallowed boundary of the city, and completed the city by incorporating with it the Quirinal, Viminal, and Esquiline hills. Vid. ROMA. Thirdly, he established an important alliance with the Latins, by which Rome and the cities of Latium became the members of one great league. By his new constitution Servius incurred the hostility of the patricians, who conspired with L. Tarquinius to deprive him of his life and of his throne. His death was the subject of a legend, which ran as follows. Servius, soon after his succession, gave his two daughters in marriage to the two sons of Tarquinius Priscus. L. Tarquinius, the elder, was married to a quiet and gentle wife; Aruns, the younger, to an aspiring and ambitious woman. The character of the two brothers was the very opposite of the wives who had fallen to their lot; for Lucius was proud and haughty, but Aruns unambitious and quiet. The wife of Aruns, fearing that her husband would tamely resign the sovereignty to his elder brother, resolved to destroy both her father and her husband. She persuaded Lucius to murder his wife, and she murdered her own husband, and the survivors straightway married. Tullia now urged her husband to murder her father; and it was said that their design was hastened by the belief that Servius entertained the thought of laying down his kingly power and establishing the consular form of government. The patricians were equally alarmed at this scheme. Their mutual hatred and fears united them closely together; and when the conspiracy was ripe, Tarquinius entered the Forum arrayed in the kingly robes, seated himself in the royal chair in the senate-house, and ordered the senators to be summoned to him as their king. At the first news of the commotion, Servius hastened to the senate-house, and, standing at the door-way, ordered Tarquinius to come down from the throne. Tarquinius sprang forward, seized the old man, and flung him down the stone steps. Covered with blood, the king was hastening home, but, before he reached it, he was overtaken by the servants of Tarquinius and murdered. Tullia drove to the senate-house, and greeted her husband as king; but her transports of joy struck even him with horror. He bade her go home; and as she was returning, her charioteer pulled up and pointed out the corpse of her father lying in his blood across the road. She commanded him to drive on; the blood of her father spirted over the carriage and on her dress; and from that day forward the street bore the name of the Vicus Sceleratus, or Wicked Street. The body lay unburied, for Tarquinius said scoffingly, "Romulus too went without burial;" and this impious mockery is said to have given rise to his surname of Superbus. Servius had reigned forty-four years. His memory was long cherished by the plebeians.

TULLIUS TIRO. Vid. TIRO.

TULLUM (now Toul), the capital of the Leuci, a people in the southeast of Gallia Belgica, between the Matrona and Mosella.

TULLUS HOSTILIUS, third king of Rome, is said to have been the grandson of Hostus Hostilius, who fell in battle against the Sabines in the reign of Romulus. His legend ran as follows: Tullus Hostilius departed from the peaceful ways of Numa, and aspired to the martial renown of Romulus. He made Alba acknowledge Rome's supremacy in the war wherein the three Roman brothers, the Horatii, fought with the three Alban brothers, the Curiatii, at the Fossa Cluilia. Next he warred with Fidene and with Veii, and being straitly pressed by their joint hosts, he vowed temples to Pallor and Pavor—Paleness and Panic. And after the fight was won, he tore asunder with chariots Mettius Fufetius, the king or dictator of Alba, because he had desired to betray Rome; and he utterly destroyed Alba, sparing only the temples of the gods, and bringing the Alban people to Rome, where he gave them the Cælian Hill to dwell on. Then he turned himself to war with the Sabines; and being again straitened in fight in a wood called the Wicked Wood, he vowed a yearly festival to Saturn and Ops, and to double the number of the Salii, or priests of Mæmers. And when, by their help, he had vanquished the Sabines, he performed his vow, and his records were the feasts Saturnalia and Opalia. In his old age, Tullus grew weary of war; and when a pestilence struck him and his people, and a shower of burning stones fell from heaven on Mount Alba, and a voice as of the Alban gods came forth from the solitary temple of Jupiter on its summit, he remembered the peaceful and happy days of Numa, and sought to win the favor of the gods, as Numa had done, by prayer and divination. But the gods heeded neither his prayers nor his charms, and when he would inquire of Jupiter Elicius, Jupiter was wroth, and smote Tullus and his whole house with fire. Perhaps the only historical fact embodied in the legend of Tullus is the ruin of Alba.

[TULLUS, VOLCATIUS. 1. L., consul B.C. 66 with M. Æmilius Lepidus. After his consulship he lived in retirement, and during the civil wars took no part in public affairs. He had approved of Cicero's measures against the accomplices of Catiline, and spoke on the subject in the senate.—2. C., probably son of No. 1, fought under Cæsar in the Gallic war, and also distinguished himself at the siege of Dyrrachium in B.C. 48.—3. L., son of No. 1, was prætor urbanus in B.C. 46, and consul with Octavianus in B.C. 33.]

TUNES or TUNIS (Τύννης, Τοῦνις: Τυνηαῖος: now Tunis), a strongly-fortified city of Northern Africa, stood at the bottom of the Carthaginian Gulf, ten miles southwest of Carthage, at the mouth of the little river Catada. At the time of Augustus it had greatly declined, but it afterward recovered, and is now the capital of the regency of Tunis.

TUNGRI, a German people who crossed the Rhine, and settled in Gaul in the country formerly occupied by the Aduatici and the Eburones. Their chief town was called TUNGRI or ADUACA TONGRORUM (now Tongern), on the road from Castellum Morinorum to Colonia Agripina.

[TURBO. 1. A gladiator of small stature, but great courage, mentioned by Horace ("et idem Corpore majorem rides Turbonis in armis Spiritum et incessum," Sat., ii, 3, 310-11).—2. A distinguished commander, and governor for some time of Pannonia under Hadrian.]

TURDETANI, the most numerous people in Hispania Bætica, dwelt in the south of the province, on both banks of the Bætis, as far as Lusitania. They were regarded as the most civilized people in all Spain. Their country was called TURDETANIA.

TURDULI, a people in Hispania Bætica, situated to the east and south of the Turdetani, with whom they were closely connected. The names, in fact, appear identical.

TURIA or TURIVM (now Guadalquivar), a river on the eastern coast of Spain, flowing into the sea at Valentia, memorable for the battle fought on its banks between Pompey and Sertorius.

TURIASSO (Turiassonensis: now Tarrazona) a town of the Celtiberi in Hispania Tarraconen is, on the road from Cæsaraugusta to Numania. It possessed a fountain, the water of which was said to be very excellent for hardening iron.

[TURICUM (Turicensis, now Zürich), a town in the territory of the Helvetii, on the Limagus (now Limmat).]

TURNUS (Τύρνος). 1. Son of Daunus and Venilia, and king of the Rutuli at the time of the arrival of Æneas in Italy. He was a brother of Juturna, and related to Amata, the wife of King Latinus; and he fought against Æneas because Latinus had given to the Trojan hero his daughter Lavinia, who had been previously promised to Turnus. He appears in the Æneid as a brave warrior; but in the end he fell by the hand of Æneas.—2. A Roman satiric poet, was a native of Aurunca, and lived under Ves-pasian and Domitian. We possess thirty hexameters, forming a portion of, apparently, a long satiric poem, the subject being an enumeration of the crimes and abominations which characterized the reign of Nero. These lines are ascribed by some modern scholars to Turnus.

TURNUS HERDONIUS. Vid. HERDONIUS.

TÜRÖNES, TÜRÖNI or TÜRÖNII, a people in the interior of Gallia Lugdunensis, between the Au-lercii, Andes, and Pictones. Their chief town was CÆSARODÛNUM, subsequently TURÖNI (now Tours), on the Liger (now Loire).

TURPILIUS, SEXTUS, a Roman dramatist, whose productions belonged to the department of Comædia Paliata. The titles of thirteen or fourteen of his plays have been preserved, together with a few fragments. He died, when very old, at Sinuessa in B.C. 101. He stands seventh in the scale of Volcatus Sedigitus. Vid. SEDIGITUS. [His fragments are collected in Bothe's Poeta Scenici Latinorum, vol. vi., p. 77-94.]

TURPIO, L. AMBIVIVS, a very celebrated actor in the time of Terence, in most of whose plays he acted.

TURRIS HANNIBÄLIS (ruins at Bourj Salekiah), a castle on the coast of Byzacena, between Thapsus and Acholla, belonging to Hannibal, who embarked here when he fled to Antiochus the Great.

TURRIS STRATÖNIS. Vid. CÆSAREA, No. 3.

TUSCANIA (Tuscaniensis: now Toscanello), a town of Etruria, on the River Marta, rarely mentioned by ancient writers, but celebrated in modern times on account of the great number of Etruscan antiquities which have been discovered in its ancient tombs.

TUSCI, TUSCIA. Vid. ETRURIA.

TUSCULUM (Tusculanus: ruins near Frascati), an ancient town of Latium, situated about ten miles southeast of Rome, on a lofty summit of the mountains, which are called after the town TUSCULANI MONTES, and which are a continuation of Mons Albanus. Tusculum was one of the most strongly fortified places in all Italy, both by nature and by art. It is said to have been founded by Telegonus, the son of Ulysses; and it was always one of the most important of the Latin towns. Its importance in the time of the Roman kings is shown by Tarquinius Superbus giving his daughter in marriage to Octavius Mamilius, the chief of Tusculum. At a later time it became a Roman municipium, and was the birth-place of several distinguished Roman families. Cato the censor was a native of Tusculum. Its proximity to Rome, its salubrity, and the beauty of its situation made it a favorite residence of the Roman nobles during the summer. Cicero, among others, had a favorite-villa at this place, which he frequently mentions under the name of TUSCULANUM. The site of this villa is not exactly known; some placing it near Grotta Ferrata, on the road from Frascati to the Alban Lake, and others near La Rufinella. The ruins of ancient Tusculum are situated on the summit of the mountain, about two miles above Frascati.

TUTICANUS, a Roman poet and a friend of Ovid, who had translated into Latin verse a portion of the Odyssey.

TUTZIS (ruins at Garshee or Guersey Hassan), a city in the Dodecaschænus, that is, the part of Æthiopia immediately above Egypt, on the western bank of the Nile, north of Pselcis, and south of Talmis.

TÿANA (Τύανα: Τυανεύς: ruins at Kiz Hisar), a city of Asia Minor, stood in the south of Cappadocia, at the northern foot of Mount Taurus, on the high road to the Cilician Gates, three hundred stadia from Cybistra, and four hundred from Mazaca, in a position of great natural strength, which was improved by fortifications. Under Caracalla it was made a Roman colony. In B.C. 272 it was taken by Aurelian, in the war with Zenobia, to whose territory it then belonged. Valens made it the chief city of Cappadocia Secunda. In its neighborhood was a great temple of Jupiter, by the side of a lake in a swampy plain; and near the temple was a remarkable effervescing spring called Asmabæon. Tyana was the native place of Apollonius, the supposed worker of miracles. The southern district of Cappadocia, in which the city stood, was called TYANITIS.

[TYCHIUS (Τύχιος), of Hyle, a mythical artificer, mentioned by Homer as the maker of Ajax's shield of seven ox-hides, covered with a plate of brass.]

TYDEUS (Τυδεύς), son of CENEUS, king of Calydon, and Peribœa. He was obliged to leave Calydon in consequence of some murder which he had committed, but which is differently described by the different authors, some saying that he killed his father's brother, Melas, Lycopus, or Alcathous; others, that he slew Thoas or Aphareus, his mother's brother; others, that he slew his brother Olenias; and others, again, that he killed the sons of Melas, who had revolted against CENEUS. He fled to Adrastus at Argos, who purified him from the murder, and gave him his daughter Deïpyle in marriage, by whom he became the father of Diomedes, who is hence frequently called TYRIDES. He accompanied Adrastus in the expedition against Thebes, where he was wounded by Melanippus, who, however, was slain by him. When Tydeus lay on the ground wounded, Minerva (Athena) appeared to him with a remedy which she had received from Jupiter (Zeus), and which was to make him immortal. This, however, was prevented by a stratagem of Amphiarus who hated Tydeus, for he cut off the head of Melanippus and brought it to Tydeus, who divided it and ate the brain, or devoured some of the flesh. Minerva (Athena), seeing this, sludered, and left Tydeus to his fate, who consequently died, and was buried by Macon.

TYLOS or TYROS (Τύλος, Τύρος: now Bahrein), an island in the Persian Gulf, off the coast of Arabia, celebrated for its pearl fisheries.

TYMBRES or TEMBROGIUS (now Pursek), a river of Phrygia, rising in Mount Dindymene, and flowing past Cotyæum and Dorylæum into the Sangarius. It was the boundary between Phrygia Epictetus and Phrygia Salutaris.

TYMNES (Τύμνης), an epigrammatic poet, whose epigrams were included in the Garland of Meleager, but respecting whose exact date we have no further evidence. There are seven of his epigrams in the Greek Anthology.

ΤΥΜΡΗΛΙ (Τυμφαίοι), a people of Epirus, on the borders of Thessaly, so called from Mount ΤΥΜΡΗΣ (Τύμψη), sometimes, but less correctly, written ΣΤΥΜΡΗΣ (Στρέμψη). Their country was called ΤΥΜΡΗΛΕΑ (Τυμφαία).

ΤΥΜΡΗΡΕΣΤΟΣ (Τυμφορηστός: now Elladha), a mountain in Thessaly, in the country of the Dryopes, in which the River Sperchæus rises.

ΤΥΝΔΑΡΕΥΣ (Τυνδάρεος), not ΤΥΝΔΑΡΟΣ, which is not found in classical writers, was son of Perieres and Gorgophone, or, according to others, son of Cæbalus, by the nymph Batia or by Gorgophone. Tyndareus and his brother Icarium were expelled by their step-brother Hippocoon and his sons; whereupon Tyndareus fled to Thestius in Ætolia, and assisted him in his wars against his neighbors. In Ætolia Tyndareus married Leda, the daughter of Thestius, and was afterward restored to Sparta by Hercules. By Leda, Tyndareus became the father of Timandra, Clytæmnestra, and Philonoe. One night Leda was embraced both by Jupiter (Zeus) and Tyndareus, and the result was the birth of Pollux and Helena, the children of Jupiter (Zeus), and of Castor and Clytæmnestra, the children of Tyndareus. The patronymic ΤΥΝΔΑΡΙΔΕΥΣ is frequently given to Castor and Pollux, and the female patronymic ΤΥΝΔΑΡΙΣ to Helen and Clytæmnestra. When Castor and Pollux had been received among the immortals, Tyndareus invited Menelaus to come to Sparta, and surrendered his kingdom to him.

ΤΥΝΔΑΡΙΣ or ΤΥΝΔΑΡΙŪM (Τυνδαρίς, Τυνδαρίον: Tyndaritanus: now Tindare), a town on the northern coast of Sicily, with a good harbor, a little west of Messina, near the promontory of the same name founded by the elder Dionysius, B.C. 396, which became an important place. It was the head-quarters of Agrippa, the general of Octavianus, in the war against Sextus Pompey. The greater part of the town was subsequently destroyed by an inundation of the sea.

[ΤΥΡΑΕΥΣ (Τύραιον ὄρος), a craggy elevation in Elis, between Scillus and the Alpheus, in the direction of Olympia, from which the law decreed that women should be hurled, who had infringed the regulations excluding them from appearing at the Olympic games.]

ΤΥΡΗΘΩΝ or ΤΥΡΗΘΩΣ (Τυφάων, Τυφωεύς, contracted into Τυφάς), a monster of the primitive world, is described sometimes as a destructive hurricane, and sometimes as a fire-breathing giant. According to Homer, he was concealed in the earth in the country of the Arimi (Εἰν Ἀρίμοις, of which the Latin poets have made Inarime), which was lashed by Jupiter (Zeus) with flashes of lightning. In Hesiod, Typhaon and Typhoeus are two distinct beings. Typhaon is represented as a son of Typhoeus, and a fearful hurricane, who by Echidna became the father of the dog Orthus, Cerberus, the Lernæan hydra, Chimæra, and the Sphinx. Typhoeus, on the other hand, is called the youngest son of Tartarus and Terra (Gæa), or of Juno (Hera) alone, because she was indignant at Jupiter (Zeus) having given birth to Minerva (Athena). He is described as a monster with one hundred heads, fearful eyes, and terrible voices; he wanted to acquire the sovereignty of gods and men, but was subdued, after a fearful struggle, by Jupiter (Zeus), with a thunderbolt. He beget the winds, whence he is also called the father of the Harpies; but the beneficent winds Notus, Boreas, Argestes, and Zephyrus, were not his sons. Æschylus and Pindar describe him as living in a Cilician cave. He is further said to have at one time been engaged in a struggle with all the immortals, and to have been killed by Jupiter (Zeus) with a flash of lightning; he was buried in Tartarus under Mount Ætna, the work-shop of Hephæstus, which is hence called by the poets Typhoeis Ætna. The later poets frequently connect Typhoeus with Egypt. The gods, it is said, unable to hold out against him, fled to Egypt, where, from fear, they metamorphosed themselves into animals, with the exception of Jupiter (Zeus) and Minerva (Athena).

ΤΥΡΑΓΕΤÆ, ΤΥΡΙΓΕΤÆ, or ΤΥΡΑΝΓΕΤÆ, a people in European Sarmatia, probably a branch of the Getæ, dwelling east of the River Tyras.

ΤΥΡΑΝΝΙΩΝ (Τυραννίων). 1. A Greek grammarian, a native of Amisus in Pontus, was originally called Theophrastus, but received from his instructor the name of Tyrannion on account of his domineering behavior to his fellow-disciples. In B.C. 72 he was taken captive by Lucullus, who carried him to Rome. He was given by Lucullus to Murena, who manumitted him. At Rome Tyrannion occupied himself in teaching. He was also employed in arranging the library of Apelleion, which Sulla brought to Rome. This library contained the writings of Aristotle, upon which Tyrannion bestowed considerable care and attention. Cicero speaks in the highest terms of the learning and ability of Tyrannion. Tyrannion amassed considerable wealth, and died at a very advanced age of a paralytic stroke.—2. A native of Phœnicia, the son of Artemidorus, and a disciple of the preceding. His original name was Diocles. He was taken captive in the war between Antony and Octavianus, and was purchased by Dymas, a freedman of the latter. By him he was presented to Terentia, the wife of Cicero, who manumitted him. He taught at Rome, and wrote a great number of works, which are all lost.

ΤΥΡΑΣ (Τύρας, Τύρης: now Dniester), subsequently called DANASTRIS, a river in European Sarmatia, forming, in the lower part of its course, the boundary between Dacia and Sarmatia, and falling into the Pontus Euxinus north of the Danube. At its mouth there was a town of the same name, probably on the site of the modern Aekjermann.

[TYRES, brother of Teuthras, one of the companions of Æneas, fought in Italy against Turnus.]

TYRLEUM (Τυρλαῖον: now Ighun), a city of Lycaonia, described by Xenophon (in the Anabasis) as twenty parasangs west of Iconium. It lay due west of Laodicea.

TYRO (Τυρώ), daughter of Salmoneus and Alcidece. She was wife of Cretheus, and beloved by the river-god Enipeus in Thessaly, in whose form Neptune (Poseidon) appeared to her, and became by her the father of Pelias and Neleus. By Cretheus she was the mother of Æson, Pheres, and Amythaon.

TYRRHĒNUS (Τυρρηνός or Τυρσηνός), son of the Lydian king Atys and Callithea, and brother of Lydus, is said to have led a Pelasgian colony from Lydia into Italy, into the country of the Umbrians, and to have given to the colonists his name, Tyrrhenians. Others call Tyrrhēnus a son of Hercules by Omphale, or of Telephus and Hiera, and a brother of Tarchon. The name Tarchon seems to be only another form of Tyrrhēnus.

TYRRHEUS, a shepherd of King Latinus. As Aseanius was hunting, he killed a tame stag belonging to Tyrrheus, whereupon the country people took up arms, which was the first conflict in Italy between the natives and the Trojan settlers.

TYRTÆUS (Τυρταῖος or Τύρταϊος), son of Archembrotus, of Aphidnæ in Attica. According to the older tradition, the Spartans, during the second Messenian war, were commanded by an oracle to take a leader from among the Athenians, and thus to conquer their enemies, whereupon they chose Tyrtæus as their leader. Later writers embellish the story, and represent Tyrtæus as a lame schoolmaster, of low family and reputation, whom the Athenians, when applied to by the Lacedæmonians in accordance with the oracle, purposely sent as the most inefficient leader they could select, being unwilling to assist the Lacedæmonians in extending their dominion in the Peloponnesus, but little thinking that the poetry of Tyrtæus would achieve that victory which his physical constitution seemed to forbid his aspiring to. Many modern critics reject altogether the account of the Attic origin of Tyrtæus, and maintain that the extant fragments of his poetry actually furnish evidence of his being a Lacedæmonian. But it is impossible to arrive at any positive decision upon the subject. It is certain, however, that the poems of Tyrtæus exercised an important influence upon the Spartans, composing their dissensions at home, and animating their courage in the field. In order to appease their civil discords, he composed his celebrated elegy entitled "Legal Order" (Εὐνομία), which appears to have had a wondrous effect in stilling the excited passions of the Spartans. But still more celebrated were the poems by which he animated the courage of the Spartans in their conflict with the Messenians. These poems were of two kinds; namely, elegies, containing exhortations to constancy and courage, and descriptions of the glory of fighting bravely for one's native land; and more spirited compositions, in the anapestic measure, which were intended as marching songs, to be performed with the music of the flute. He lived to see the success of his efforts in the entire conquest of the Messenians, and their reduction to the condition of Helots. He therefore flourished down to B.C. 668, which was the last year of the second Messenian war. The best separate edition of the fragments of his poems is by Bach, with the remains of the elegiac poets Callinus and Asius, Lips., 1831.

TYRUS (Τύρος): Aram. Tura: in the Old Testament, Tsor: Τύριος, Tyrius: ruins at Sur), one of the greatest and most famous cities of the ancient world, stood on the coast of Phœnice, about twenty miles south of Sidon. It was a colony of the Sidonians, and is therefore called in Scripture "the daughter of Sidon." It gradually eclipsed the mother city, and came to be the chief place of all Phœnice for wealth, commerce, and colonizing activity. In the time of Solomon, we find its king, Hiram, who was also King of Sidon, in close alliance with the Hebrew monarch, whom he assisted in building the temple and his palace, and in commercial enterprises. Respecting its colonies and maritime enterprise, vid. PHŒNICE and CARTHAGO. The Assyrian king Salmanser laid siege to Tyre for five years, but without success. It was again besieged for thirteen years by Nebuchadnezzar, and there is a tradition that he took it, but the matter is not quite certain. At the period when the Greeks began to be well acquainted with the city, its old site had been abandoned, and a new city erected on a small island about half a mile from the shore, and a mile in length, and a little north of the remains of the former city, which was now called Old Tyre (Παλαιότυρος). With the additional advantage of its insular position, this new city soon rose to a prosperity scarcely less than that of its predecessor; though, under the Persian kings, it seems to have ranked again below Sidon. Vid. SIDON. In B.C. 322 the Tyrians refused to open their gates to Alexander, who laid siege to the city for seven months, and united the island on which it stood to the main land by a mole constructed chiefly of the ruins of Old Tyre. This mole has ever since formed a permanent connection between the island and the main land. After its capture and sack by Alexander, Tyre never regained its former consequence, and its commerce was for the most part transferred to Alexandria. It recovered, however, sufficiently to be mentioned as a strong fortress and flourishing port under the early Roman emperors. Septimius Severus made it a Roman colony. It was the see of a bishop, and Jerome calls it the most beautiful city of Phœnicia. It was a place of considerable importance in medieval history, especially as one of the last points held by the Christians on the coast of Syria. The wars of the Crusades completed its ruin, and its site is now occupied by a poor village; and even its ruins are for the most part covered by the sea. Even the site of Babylon does not present a more striking fulfilment of prophecy.

TZETZES (Τζέτζης). I. JOANNES, a Greek grammarian of Constantinople, flourished about A.D.

1150. His writings bear evident traces of the extent of his learning, and not less of the inordinate self-conceit with which they had filled him. He wrote a vast number of works, of which several are still extant. Of these the two following are the most important: 1. Iliaca, which consists properly of three poems, collected into one under the titles Tὰ πρὸ Ὁμήρου, τὰ Ὁμήρου, καὶ τὰ μεθ' Ὁμήρου. The whole amounts to one thousand six hundred and seventy-six lines, and is written in hexameter metre. It is a very dull composition. Edited by Bekker, Berlin, 1816. 2. Chiliades, consisting in its present form of twelve thousand six hundred and sixty-one lines. This name was given to it by the first editor, who divided it, without reference to the contents, into thirteen divisions of one thousand lines, the last being incomplete. Its subject-matter is of the most miscellaneous kind, but embraces chiefly mythological and historical narratives, arranged under separate titles, and without any further connection. The following are a few of them, as they occur: Cresus, Midas, Gyges, Codrus, Alcæon, &c. It is written in bad Greek; in that abominable make-believe of a metre called political verse. Edited by Kiessling, Lips., 1826.—2. ISAAC, brother of the preceding, the author of a valuable commentary on the Cassandra of Lycophron, printed in most of the editions of Lycophron; [best edit. by Müller, Lips. 1811, 3 vols.]

TZITZIS or TZUTZIS (ruins south of Debout), a city in the north of the Dodecaschænus, that is, the part of Æthiopia immediately above Egypt, a little south of Parembolæ, and considerably north of Taphis.

U.

URŪI, a German people, who originally dwelt on the right bank of the Rhine, but were transported across the river by Agrippa in B.C. 37, at their own request, because they wished to escape the hostilities of the Suevi. They took the name of Agrippenses, from their town COLONIA AGRIPPINA.

UCĀLĒGŌN (Οὐκαλέγων), one of the elders at Troy, whose house was burned at the destruction of the city.

UCUBIS, a town in Hispania Bætica, near Corduba.

UFENS (now Uffente), a river in Latium, flowing from Setia, and falling into the Amasenus.

UFFUGUM, a town in Bruttium, between Scyllacium and Rhegium.

UGERNUM (now Beaucaire), a town in Gallia Narbonensis, on the road from Nemausus to Aquæ Sextiæ, where Avitus was proclaimed emperor.

ULĪA (now Montemayor), a Roman municipium in Hispania Bætica, situated upon a hill, and upon the road from Gades to Corduba.

ULIARUS or OLARIONENSIS INSULA (now Oleron), an island off the western coast of Gaul, in the Aquitanian Gulf.

ULPIANUS. 1. DOMITIUS ULPIANUS, a celebrated jurist, derived his origin from Tyre in Phœnicia, but was probably not a native of Tyre himself. The time of his birth is unknown. The greater part of his juridical works were written during the sole reign of Caracalla, especially the two great works Ad Edictum and the Libri ad Sabinum. He was banished or deprived of his functions under Elagabalus, who became emperor 217; but on the accession of Alexander Severus, 222, he became the emperor's chief adviser. The emperor conferred on Ulpian the office of Scriniarum magister, and made him a consiliarius. He also held the office of Præfectus Annonæ, and he was likewise made Præfectus Prætorio. Ulpian perished in the reign of Alexander by the hands of the soldiers, who forced their way into the palace at night, and killed him in the presence of the emperor and his mother, 228. His promotion to the office of præfectus prætorio was probably an unpopular measure. A great part of the numerous writings of Ulpian were still extant in the time of Justinian, and a much greater quantity is excerpted from him by the compilers of the Digest than from any other jurist. The number of excerpts from Ulpian is said to be two thousand four hundred and sixty-two; and many of the excerpts are of great length, and altogether they form about one third of the whole body of the Digest. The excerpts from Paulus and Ulpian together make about one half of the Digest. Ulpian's style is perspicuous, and presents fewer difficulties than that of many of the Roman jurists who are excerpted in the Digest. The great legal knowledge, the good sense, and the industry of Ulpian place him among the first of the Roman jurists; and he has exercised a great influence on the jurisprudence of modern Europe through the copious extracts from his writings which have been preserved by the compilers of Justinian's Digest. We possess a fragment of a work under the title of Domitii Ulpiani Fragmenta; it consists of twenty-nine titles, and is a valuable source for the history of the Roman law. The best editions are by Hugo, Berlin, 1834, and by Böcking, Bonn, 1836.—2. Of Antioch, a sophist, lived in the time of Constantine the Great, and wrote several rhetorical works. The name of Ulpianus is prefixed to extant Commentaries in Greek on eighteen of the orations of Demosthenes, and it is usually stated that they were written by Ulpianus of Antioch. But the Commentaries have evidently received numerous additions and interpolations from some grammarian of a very late period. They are printed in several editions of the Attic orators.

ULTOR, "the avenger," a surname of Mars, to whom Augustus built a temple at Rome in the Forum, after taking vengeance upon the murderers of his great-uncle, Julius Cæsar.

ULŪBRÆ (Ulubranus, Ulubrensis), a small town in Latium, of uncertain site, but in the neighborhood of the Pontine Marshes.

ULYSSES, ULYXES, or ULIXES, called ODYSSEUS (Ὀδυσσεύς) by the Greeks, one of the principal Greek heroes in the Trojan war. According to the Homeric account, he was a son of Laërtes and Anticlea, the daughter of Autolycus, and was married to Penelope, the daughter of Icarus, by whom he became the father of Telemachus. But, according to a later tradition, he was a son of Sisyphus and Anticlea, who, being with child by Sisyphus, was married to Laërtes, and thus gave birth to him either after her arrival in Phœcia or on her way thither. Later traditions further state that, besides Telemachus, Ulysses became by Penelope the father of Arcesilaus or Ptoliporthus; and, by Circe, the father of Agrinus, Latinus, Telegonus, and Cassiphone; by Calypso, of Nausithous and Nausinous or Anson, Telegonus, and Teledamus; and, lastly, by Eviippe, of Leontophron, Doryclus or Euryalus. The name Odysseus is said to signify the angry. The story of Ulysses ran as follows: When a young man, Ulysses went to see his grandfather Autolycus near Mount Parnassus. There, while engaged in the chase, he was wounded by a boar in his knee, by the scar of which he was subsequently recognized by Euryclea. Even at that age he was distinguished for courage, for knowledge of navigation, for eloquence, and for skill as a negotiator; and on one occasion, when the Messenians had carried off some sheep from Ithaca, Læertes sent him to Messene to demand reparation. He there met with Iphitus, who was seeking the horses stolen from him, and who gave him the famous bow of Eurytus. This bow Ulysses used only in Ithaca, regarding it as too great a treasure to be employed in the field, and it was so strong that none of the suitors was able to handle it. According to some accounts, he went to Sparta as one of the suitors of Helen; and he is said to have advised Tyndareus to make the suitors swear that they would defend the chosen bridegroom against any one who should insult him on Helen's account. Tyndareus, to show him his gratitude, persuaded his brother to give Penelope in marriage to Ulysses; or, according to others, Ulysses gained her by conquering his competitors in the foot-race. Homer, however, mentions nothing of all this, and states that Agamemnon, who visited Ulysses in Ithaca, prevailed upon him only with great difficulty to join the Greeks in their expedition against Troy. Other traditions relate that he was visited by Menelaus and Agamemnon, and that Palamedes more especially induced him to join the Greeks. When Palamedes came to Ithaca, Ulysses pretended to be mad: he yoked an ass and ox to a plough, and began to sow salt. Palamedes, to try him, placed the infant Telemachus before the plough, whereupon the father could not continue to play his part. He stopped the plough, and was obliged to undertake the fulfillment of the promise he had made when he was one of the suitors of Helen. This occurrence is said to have been the cause of his hatred of Palamedes. Being now himself gained for the undertaking, he contrived to discover Achilles, who was concealed among the daughters of King Lycomedes. Vid. Achilles. Before, however, the Greeks sailed from home, Ulysses, in conjunction with Menelaus, went to Troy for the purpose of inducing the Trojans to restore Helen and her treasures. When the Greeks were assembled at Aulis, Ulysses joined them with twelve ships and men from Cephallenia, Ithaca, Neritus, Crocylia, Zacynthus, Samos, and the coast of Epirus. During the siege of Troy he distinguished himself as a valiant and undaunted warrior, but more particularly as a cunning spy, and a prudent and eloquent negotiator. After the death of Achilles, Ulysses contended for his armor with the Telamonian Ajax, and gained the prize. He is said by some to have devised the stratagem of the wooden horse, and he was one of the heroes concealed within it. He is also said to have taken part in carrying off the palladium. But the most celebrated part of his story consists of his adventures after the destruction of Troy, which form the subject of the Homeric poem called after him, the Odyssey. After the capture of Troy he set out on his voyage home, but was overtaken by a storm and thrown upon the coast of Ismarus, a town of the Cicones, in Thrace, north of the island of Lemnos. He plundered the town, but several of his men were cut off by the Cicones. From thence he was driven by a north wind toward Malea and to the Lotophagi on the coast of Libya. Some of his companions were so much delighted with the taste of the lotus that they wanted to remain in the country, but Ulysses compelled them to embark again, and continued his voyage. In one day he reached the goat-island, situated north of the country of the Lotophagi. He there left behind eleven ships, and with one he sailed to the neighboring island of the Cyclopes (the western coast of Sicily), where, with twelve companions, he entered the cave of the Cyclops Polyphemus, a son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Thosa. This giant devoured, one after another, six of the companions of Ulysses, and kept the unfortunate Ulysses and the six others as prisoners in his cave. In order to save himself, Ulysses contrived to make the monster drunk with wine, and then, with a burning pole, deprived him of his one eye. He now succeeded in making his escape with his friends, by concealing himself and them under the bodies of the sheep which the Cyclops let out of his cave. In this way Ulysses reached his ship. The Cyclops implored his father Neptune (Poseidon) to take vengeance upon Ulysses, and henceforth the god of the sea pursued the wandering king with implacable enmity. Ulysses next arrived at the island of Æolus; and the god gave him, on his departure, a bag of winds, which were to carry him home; but the companions of Ulysses opened the bag, and the winds escaped, whereupon the ships were driven back to the island of Æolus, who indignantly refused all further assistance. After a voyage of six days, Ulysses arrived at Telepylos, the city of Lamus, in which Antiphates ruled over the Læstrygones, a sort of cannibals. This place must probably be sought somewhere in the north of Sicily. Ulysses escaped from them with only one ship; and his fate now carried him to a western island, Æœa, inhabited by the sorceress Circe. Part of his people were sent to explore the island, but they were changed by Circe into swine. Eurylochus alone escaped, and brought the sad news to Ulysses, who, when he was hastening to the assistance of his friends, was instructed by Mercury (Hermes) by what means he could resist the magic powers of Circe. He succeeded in liberating his companions, who were again changed into men, and were most hospitably treated by the sorceress. When at length Ulysses begged for leave to depart, Circe desired him to descend into Hades and to consult the seer Tiresias. He now sailed west, right across the river Oceanus, and having landed on the other side, it the country of the Cimmerians, where Helios does not shine, he entered Hades, and consulted Tiresias about the manner in which he might reach his native land. Tiresias informed him of the danger and difficulties arising from the anger of Neptune (Poseidon), but gave him hope that all would yet turn out well, if Ulysses and his companions would leave the herds of Helios in Thrinacia uninjured. Ulysses now returned to Ææa, where Circe again treated the strangers kindly, told them of the dangers that yet awaited them, and of the means of escaping. The wind which she sent with them carried them to the island of the Sirens, somewhere near the western coast of Italy. The Sirens sat on the shore, and with their sweet voices attracted all that passed by, and then destroyed them. Ulysses, in order to escape the danger, filled the ears of his companions with wax, and fastened himself to the mast of his ship, until he was out of the reach of the Sirens' song. His ship next sailed between Scylla and Charybdis, two rocks between Thrinacia and Italy. As the ship passed between them, Scylla, the monster inhabiting the rock of the same name, carried off and devoured six of the companions of Ulysses. From thence he came to Thrinacia, the island of Helios, who there kept his sacred herds of oxen. Mindful of the advice of Tiresias and Circe, Ulysses wanted to sail past, but his companions compelled him to land. He made them swear not to touch any of the cattle; but as they were detained in the island by storms, and were hungry, they killed the finest of the oxen while Ulysses was asleep. After some days the storm abated, and they sailed away, but soon another storm came on, and their ship was destroyed by Jupiter (Zeus) with a flash of lightning. All were drowned with the exception of Ulysses, who saved himself by means of the mast and planks, and after ten days reached the island of Ogygia, inhabited by the nymph Calypso. She received him with kindness, and desired him to marry her, promising immortality and eternal youth if he would consent, and forget Ithaca. But he could not overcome his longing after his own home. Minerva (Athena), who had always protected Ulysses, induced Jupiter (Zeus) to promise that her favorite hero, notwithstanding the anger of Neptune (Poseidon), should one day return to his native island, and take vengeance on the suitors of Penelope. Mercury (Hermes) carried to Calypso the command of Jupiter (Zeus) to dismiss Ulysses. The nymph obeyed, and taught him how to build a raft, on which, after remaining eight years with her, he left the island. In eighteen days he came in sight of Scheria, the island of the Phæacians, when Neptune (Poseidon) sent a storm, which cast him off the raft. By the assistance of Leucothea and Minerva (Athena), he reached Scheria by dint of swimming. The exhausted hero slept on the shore until he was awoke by the voices of maidens. He found Nausicaa, the daughter of King Alcinous and Arete, who conducted the hero to her father's court. He was there honored with feasts and contests, and the minstrel Demodocus sang of the fall of Troy, which moved Ulysses to tears; and, being questioned about the cause of his emotion, he related his whole history. At length he was sent home in a ship. One night, as he had fallen asleep in his ship, it reached the coast of Ithaca; the Phæacians who had accompanied him carried him on shore, and left him. He had now been away from Ithaca for twenty years, and when he awoke he did not recognize his native land, for Athena, that he might not be recognized, had enveloped him in a cloud. As he was lamenting his fate, the goddess informed him where he was, and advised him how to take vengeance upon the enemies of his house. During his absence, his father Laertes, bowed down by grief and old age, had withdrawn into the country, his mother Anticlea had died of sorrow, his son Telemachus had grown up to manhood, and his wife Penelope had rejected all the offers that had been made to her by the importunate suitors from the neighboring islands. During the last few years more than a hundred nobles of Ithaca, Same, Dulichium, and Zacynthus had been suing for the hand of Penelope, and in their visits to her house had treated all that it contained as if it had been their own. That he might be able to take vengeance upon them, it was necessary that he should not be recognized. Minerva (Athena) accordingly metamorphosed him into an unsightly beggar, and he was kindly received by Eumæus, the swine-herd, a faithful servant of his house. While staying with Eumæus, his son Telemachus returned from Sparta and Pylos, whither he had gone to obtain information concerning his father. Ulysses made himself known to him, and with him deliberated upon the plan of revenge. In the disguise of a beggar he accompanied Telemachus and Eumæus to the town. The plan of revenge was now carried into effect. Penelope, with great difficulty, was made to promise her hand to him who should conquer the others in shooting with the bow of Ulysses. As none of the suitors was able to draw this bow, Ulysses himself took it up and then began to attack the suitors. He was supported by Athena and his son, and all fell by his hands. Ulysses now made himself known to Penelope, and went to see his aged father. In the mean time the report of the death of the suitors was spread abroad, and their relatives rose in arms against Ulysses; but Athena, who assumed the appearance of Mentor, brought about a reconciliation between the people and the king. It has already been remarked that in the Homeric poems Ulysses is represented as a prudent, cunning, inventive, and eloquent man, but, at the same time, as a brave, bold, and persevering warrior, whose courage no misfortune or calamity could subdue, but later poets describe him as a cowardly, deceitful, and intriguing personage. Respecting the last period of his life the Homeric poems give us no information, except the prophecy of Tiresias, who promised him a painless death in a happy old age; but later writers give us different accounts. According to one, Telegonus, the son of Ulysses by Circe, was sent out by his mother to seek his father. A storm cast him upon Ithaca, which he began to plunder in order to obtain provisions. Ulysses and Telemachus attacked him, but he slew Ulysses, and his body was afterward carried to Ææa. According to some, Circe recalled Ulysses to life again, on his arrival in Tyrrhenia, he was burned on Mount Perge. In works of art Ulysses is commonly represented as a sailor, wearing a semi-oval cap.

[UMBRENIUS, P., one of the accomplices of Catiline; he was a freedman, and had followed the business of a negotiator in Gaul, and was for that reason employed to gain over the ambassadors of the Allobroges to favor the designs of the conspirators.]

UMBRIA, called by the Greeks OMBRICA (ἡ Ὀμβρική), a district of Italy, bounded on the north by Gallia Cisalpina, from which it was separated by the River Rubicon; on the east by the Adriatic Sea; on the south by Picenum, from which it was separated by the River Æsis, and by the land of the Sabines, from which it was separated by the River Nar; and on the west by Etruria, from which it was separated by the Tiber. Under Augustus it formed the sixth Regio of Italy. The Apennines ran through the western part of the country, but it contained many fertile plains on the coast. Its inhabitants, the UMBRI (sing. UMBER), called by the Greeks OMBRICI (Ὀμβρικοί), were one of the most ancient races of Italy, and were connected with the Opicans, Sabines, and those other tribes whose languages were akin to the Greek. The Umbri were at a very early period the most powerful people in Central Italy, and extended across the peninsula from the Adriatic to the Tyrrhene seas. Thus they inhabited the country afterward called Etruria; and we expressly told that Crotona, Perusia, Clusium, and other Etruscan cities were built by the Umbrians. They were afterward deprived of their possessions west of the Tiber by the Etruscans, and confined to the country between this river and the Adriatic. Their territories were still further diminished by the Senones, a Gallic people, who took possession of the whole country on the coast, from Ariminum to the Æsis. The Umbri were subdued by the Romans B.C. 307; and after the conquest of the Senones by the Romans in 283, they again obtained possession of the country on the coast of the Adriatic. This district, however, continued to be called Ager Gallicus down to a late period. The chief towns of Umbria were ARIMINUM, FANUM FONTANÆ, MEVANIA, TUDER, NARNIA, and SPOLETIUM.

UPIS (Ὀὔπις). 1. A surname of Artemis (Diana) as the goddess assisting women in childbirth.—2. The name of a mythical being, who is said to have reared Artemis (Diana), and who is mentioned by Virgil as one of the nymphs in her train. The masculine Upis is mentioned by Cicero as the father of Artemis (Diana).

UR. Vid. EDESSA.

URANIA (Ὀὐρανία). 1. One of the Muses, a daughter of Zeus (Jupiter) by Mnemosyne. The ancient bard Linus is called her son by Apollo, and Hymenæus also is said to have been a son of Urania. She was regarded, as her name indicates, as the Muse of Astronomy, and was represented with a celestial globe, to which she points with a small staff.—2. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, who also occurs as a nymph in the train of Persephone (Proserpina).—3. A surname of Aphrodite (Venus), describing her as "the heavenly," or spiritual, to distinguish her from Aphrodite Pandemos. Plato represents her as a daughter of Uranus (Cælus), begotten without a mother. Wine was not used in the libations offered to her.

URĀNUS (Ὀὐρανός), CÆLUS, or HEAVEN, sometimes called a son, and sometimes the husband of Gæa (Earth). By Gæa Uranus became the father of Oceanus, Cæus, Crius, Hyperion, Iapetus, Thia, Rhia, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phœbe, Tethys, Cronos (Saturn); of the Cyclopes Brontes, Steropes, Arges; and of the Hecatoncheires Cottus, Briareus, and Gyes. According to Cicero, Uranus also was the father of Mercury by Dia, and of Venus by Hemera. Uranus hated his children, and immediately after their birth he confined them in Tartarus, in consequence of which he was unmanned and dethroned by Cronos (Saturn) at the instigation of Gæa (Terra). Out of the drops of his blood sprang the Gigantes, the Melian nymphs, and, according to some, Silenus, and from the foam gathering around his limbs in the sea sprang Aphrodite (Venus).

Status addressed to him a poem of consolation on the death of a favorite slave (Silo., ii., 6), and he also mentions him in the Preface to the second book of his Silva.

USCANA, a large town in Illyria, on a tributary of the Aous, and in the district Penestiana.

USIPĒTES or USIPĪ, a German people, who, being driven out of their abodes by the Suevi, crossed the Rhine and penetrated into Gaul; but they were defeated by Cæsar, and compelled to recross the river. They were now received by the Sigambri, and allowed to dwell on the northern bank of the Lippe; but we afterward find them south of the Lippe; and at a still later time they become lost under the general name of Alemanni.

[USPE, the capital of the Siraceni or Siraci, a people of Sarmatia Asiatica.]

USTĪA, a valley near the Sabine villa of Horace.

UTĪCA (ἡ Ἰτυκὴ or Οὐτίκη: Ἰτυκαῖος, Uticensis: ruins at Bou-Shater), the greatest city of ancient Africa, after Carthage, was a Phœnician colony, older (and, if the chronologers are to be trusted, much older) than Carthage. Like others of the very ancient Phœnician colonies in the territory of Carthage, Utica maintained a comparative independence, even during the height of the Punic power, and was rather the ally of Carthage than her subject. It stood on the shore of the northern part of the Carthaginian Gulf, a little west of the mouth of the Bagradas, and twenty-seven Roman miles northwest of Carthage; but its site is now inland, in consequence of the changes effected by the Bagradas in the coast-line. Vid. BAGRADAS. In the third Punic war, Utica took part with the Romans against Carthage, and was rewarded with the greatest part of the Carthaginian territory. It afterward became renowned to all future time as the scene of the last stand made by the Pompeian party against Cæsar, and of the glorious, though mistaken, self-sacrifice of the younger Cato. Vid. CATO.

UTUS (now Vid), a river in Mœsia and a tributary of the Danube, falling into the latter river at the town Utus. It is perhaps the same river as the Artanes of Herodotus.

UXĀMA (now Osuma), a town of the Arevaci in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Asturica to Cæsaraugusta, fifty-miles west of Numantia.

UXANTIS (now Ushant), an island off the north-western coast of Gaul.

UXELLODĒNUM, a town of the Cadurci in Gallia Aquitania, situated on a steep hill, rising out of the plain, at the foot of which a river flowed. It is probably the same as the modern Capellenac, on the Lot.

UXENTUM (Uxentinus: now Ugento), a town in Calabria, northwest of the Iapygian promontory.

UXĪI (Οὐξῖοι), a warlike people, of predatory habits, who had their strongholds in Mount Parachoathras, on the northern border of Persis, in the district called UXĪA (Οὐξία), but who also extended over a considerable tract of country in Media.

V.

VACCA, VAGA, or VABA (Ὀβάγα, Βάγα: now Beja), a city of Zeugitana in Northern Africa, on the borders of Numidia, on an eastern tributary of the River Tusca, a good day's journey south of Utica. It was a great emporium for the trade between Hippo, Utica, and Carthage, and the interior. It was destroyed by Metellus in the Jugurthine war, but was restored and colonized by the Romans. Its fortifications were renewed by Justinian, who named it Theodorias in honor of his wife.

VACCÆI, a people in the interior of Hispania Tarraconensis, occupying the modern Toro, Palencia, Burgos, and Valladolid, east of the Astures, south of the Cantabri, west of the Celtiberi, and north of the Vettones. Their chief towns were PALLANTIA and INTERCATIA.

[VACŪNA, a Sabine divinity, identical with Victoria. She had an ancient sanctuary near Horace's villa at Tibur, and another at Rome. The Romans, however, derived the name from vacuus, and said that she was a divinity to whom the country people offered sacrifices when the labors of the field were over, that is, when they were at leisure, vacui.]

VADA. 1. A fortress of the Batavi in Gallia Belgica, east of Batavodurum.—2. VADA SABBATIA (now Vado), a town of Liguria, on the coast, which was the harbor of Sabbata or Savo.—3. VADA VOLATERRANA (now Torre di Vado), a small town on the coast of Etruria, in the territory of Volaterræ.

VADICASSĪI, a people in Gallia Belgica, near the sources of the Sequana.

VADIMŌNIS LACUS (now Lago di Bassano), a small lake of Etruria of a circular form, with sulphureous waters, and renowned for its floating islands, a minute description of which is given by the younger Pliny. It is celebrated in history for the defeat of the Etruscans in two great battles, first by the dictator Papirius Cursor in B.C. 309, from the effects of which the Etruscans never recovered; and again in 283, when the allied forces of the Etruscans and Gauls were routed by the consul Cornelius Dolabella. The lake has so shrunk in dimensions in modern times as to be only a small stagnant pond, almost lost in the tall reeds and bulrushes which grow in it.

[VALA, C. NUMONIUS, a friend of Horace, who addressed to him the fifteenth of the first book of Epistles.]

VALENS, emperor of the East A.D. 364–378 was born about A.D. 328, and was made emperor by his brother Valentinian. Vid. VALENTINIANUS. The greater part of Valens's reign is occupied by his wars with the Goths. At first he gained great advantages over the barbarians; and concluded a peace with them in 370, on the condition that they should not cross the Danube. In 376 the Goths were driven out of their country by the Huns, and were allowed by Valens to cross the Danube, and settle in Thrace and the country on the borders of the Danube. Dissensions soon arose between the Romans and these dangerous neighbors, and in 377 the Goths took up arms. Valens collected a powerful army, and marched against the Goths; but he was defeated by them with immense slaughter, near Hadrianople, on the 9th of August, 378. Valens was never seen after the battle; some say he died on the field, and others relate that he was burned to death in a peasant's house, to which he was carried, and which the barbarians set fire to without knowing who was in it. The reign of Valens is important in the history of the empire on account of the admission of the Goths into the countries south of the Danube, the commencement of the decline of the Roman power. The furious contests between the rival creeds of the Catholics and the Arians also characterize this reign.

VALENS, ABURNUS, also called ABURNIUS, one of the jurists who are excerpted in the Digest, belonged to the school of the Sabinians. He flourished under Antoninus Pius.

VALENS, FABIVS, one of the principal generals of the Emperor Vitellius in A.D. 69, marched into Italy through Gaul, and, after forming a junction with the forces of Cæcina, defeated Otho in the decisive battle of Bedriacum, which secured for Vitellius the sovereignty of Italy. Vitellius raised Valens and Cæcina to the consulship, and he left the whole government in their hands. Valens remained faithful to Vitellius, when Antonius Primus, the general of Vespasian, marched into Italy; but as he had not sufficient forces to oppose Antonius after the capture of Cremona, he resolved to sail to Gaul and rouse the Gallic provinces to espouse the cause of Vitellius; but he was taken prisoner at the islands called Stœchades (now Hîères), off Massilia, and was shortly afterward put to death at Urbinum (now Urbino).

VALENTIA. I. (Now Valencia), the chief town of the Edetani, on the River Turia, three miles from the coast, and on the road from Carthago Nova to Castulo. It was founded by Junius Brutus, who settled here the soldiers of Viriathus; it was destroyed by Pompey, but it was soon afterward rebuilt and made a Roman colony. It continued to be an important place down to the latest times.—2. (Now Valence), a town in Gallia Narbonensis, on the Rhone, and a Roman colony. Some writers call it a town of the Cavares, and others a town of the Segelauni.—3. A town of Sardinia, of uncertain site, but which some writers place on the eastern coast, between Portus Sulpicii and Sorabile.—4. Or VALENTIUM, a town in Apulia, ten miles from Brundisium.—5. A province in the north of Britain, beyond the Roman wall, which existed only for a short time. Vid. BRITANNIA.

VALENTINIĀNUS. I., Roman emperor A.D.

364–375, was the son of Gratianus, and was born A.D. 321, at Cibalis in Pannonia. His first wife was Valeria Severa, by whom he became the father of the Emperor Gratianus. He held important military commands under Julian and Jovian; and on the death of the latter in February, 364, Valentinian was elected emperor by the troops at Nicæa. A few weeks after his elevation Valentinian elected his brother Valens emperor, and assigned to him the East, while he himself undertook the government of the West. Valentinian was a Catholic, though his brother Valens was an Arian; but he did not persecute either Arians or heathens. He possessed good abilities, prudence, and vigor of character. He had a capacity for military matters, and was a vigilant, impartial, and laborious administrator; but he sometimes punished with excessive severity. The greater part of Valentinian's reign was occupied by the wars against the Alemanni, and the other barbarians on the Roman frontiers. His operations were attended with success. He not only drove the Alemanni out of Gaul, but on more than one occasion crossed the Rhine and carried the war into the enemy's country. His usual residence was Treviri (Trèves). In 375 he went to Carnuntum, on the Danube, in order to repel the Quadi and Sarmatians, who had invaded Pannonia. After an indecisive campaign, he took up his winter quarters at Bregetio. In this place, while giving an audience to the deputies of the Quadi, and speaking with great heat, he fell down in a fit, and expired suddenly on the 17th of November.—II., Roman emperor A.D. 375–392, younger son of the preceding, was proclaimed Augustus by the army after his father's death, though he was then only three or four years of age. His elder brother Gratianus, who had been proclaimed Augustus during the lifetime of their father, assented to the choice of the army, and a division of the West was made between the two brothers. Valentinian had Italy, Illyricum, and Africa. Gratian had the Gauls, Spain, and Britain. In 383 Gratian was defeated and slain by Maximus, who left Valentinian a precarious authority out of fear of Theodosius, the emperor of the East; but in 387 Valentinian was expelled from Italy by Maximus, and fled for refuge to Theodosius. In 388 Theodosius defeated Maximus, and restored Valentinian to his authority as emperor of the West. Theodosius returned to Constantinople in 391, and in the following year (392) Valentinian was murdered by the general Arbogastes, who raised Eugenius to the throne. Valentinian perished on the 15th of May, being only a few months above twenty years of age. His funeral oration was pronounced by St. Ambrose.—III., Roman emperor A.D. 425–455, was born 419, and was the son of Constantius III. by Placidia, the sister of Honorius, and the daughter of Theodosius I. He was declared Augustus in 425 by Theodosius II., and was placed over the West; but as he was only six years of age, the government was intrusted to his mother Placidia. During his long reign the empire was repeatedly exposed to the invasions of the barbarians; and it was only the military abilities of Aëtius which saved the empire from ruin. In 429, the Vandals, under Genseric, crossed over into Africa, which they conquered, and of which they continued in possession till the reign of Justinian. The Goths likewise established themselves in Gaul; but Aëtius finally made peace with them (439), and with their assistance gained a great victory over Attila and the vast army of the Huns at Chalons in 451. The power and influence of Aëtius excited the jealousy and fears of Valentinian, who murdered his brave and faithful general in 454. In the following year the emperor himself was slain by Petronius Maximus, whose wife he had violated. He was a feeble and contemptible prince, and had all the vices that in a princely station disgrace a man's character.

VALĒRIA. 1. Sister of P. Valerius Publicola, advised the Roman matrons to ask Veturia, the mother of Coriolanus, to go to the camp of Coriolanus in order to deprecate his resentment.—2. The last wife of Sulla, was the daughter of M. Valerius Messala, and bore a daughter soon after Sulla's death.—3. GALĒRIA VALĒRIA, daughter of Diocletian and Prisca, was, upon the reconstruction of the empire in A.D. 292, united to Galerius, one of the new Cæsars. After the death of her husband in 311, Valeria rejected the proposals of his successor Maximinus, who, in consequence, stripped her of her possessions, and banished her along with her mother. After the death of Maximinus, Valeria and her mother were executed by order of Licinius, 315.—4. MESSALĪNA. Vid. MESSALINA.

VALĒRIA GENS, one of the most ancient patrician houses at Rome. The Valerii were of Sabine origin, and their ancestor Volesus or Volulus is said to have settled at Rome with Titus Tatius. One of the descendants of this Volesus, P. Valerius, afterward surnamed Publicola, plays a distinguished part in the story of the expulsion of the kings, and was elected consul in the first year of the republic, B.C. 509. From this time forward down to the latest period of the empire, for nearly one thousand years, the name occurs more or less frequently in the Fasti, and it was borne by the emperors Maximinus, Maximianus, Maxentius, Diocletian, Constantius, Constantine the Great, and others. The Valeria gens enjoyed extraordinary honors and privileges at Rome. Their house at the bottom of the Velia was the only one in Rome of which the doors were allowed to open back into the street. In the Circus a conspicuous place was set apart for them, where a small throne was erected, an honor of which there was no other example among the Romans. They were also allowed to bury their dead within the walls. The Valerii in early times were always foremost in advocating the rights of the plebeians, and the laws which they proposed at various times were the great charters of the liberties of the second order. Vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v. LEGES VALERILÆ. The Valeria gens was divided into various families under the republic, the most important of which bore the names of CORVUS, FLACCUS, LÆVINUS, MESSALA, PUBLICOLA, and TRIARIUS.

VALĒRIANUS. 1. Roman emperor A.D. 253–260, whose full name was P. LICINIUS VALE-

RIANUS. Valerian was proclaimed emperor by the troops whom he was leading against the usurper Æmilianus. Valerian proclaimed his son Gallienus Augustus, and first carried on war against the Goths, whom he defeated (257). But though the barbarians still threatened the Roman frontiers on the Danube and the Rhine, the conquests of the Persians, who had crossed the Euphrates and stormed Antioch, compelled him to hasten to the East. For a time his measures were both vigorous and successful. Antioch was recovered, and the Persian king Sapor was compelled to fall back behind the Euphrates; but the emperor, flushed by his good fortune, followed too rashly. He was surrounded, in the vicinity of Edessa, by the countless horsemen of his active foe; he was entrapped into a conference, taken prisoner (260), and passed the remainder of his life in captivity, subjected to every insult which Oriental cruelty could devise. After death his skin was stuffed and long preserved as a trophy in the chief temple of the nation.—2. Son of the preceding, but not by the same mother as Gallienus. He perished along with Gallienus at Milan in 268. Vid. GALLIENUS.

VALĒRIUS. Vid. VALERIA GENS.

VALĒRIUS VOLŪSUS MAXĪMUS, M', was a brother of P. Valerius Publicola, and was dictator in B.C. 494, when the dissensions between the burghers and commonalty of Rome de Nexis were at the highest. Valerius was popular with the plebs, and induced them to enlist for the Sabine and Æquian wars, by promising that when the enemy was repulsed, the condition of the debtors (nexi) should be alleviated. He defeated and triumphed over the Sabines; but, unable to fulfill his promise to the commons, resigned his dictatorship. The plebs, seeing that Valerius at least had kept faith with them, escorted him honorably home. As he was advanced in life at the time of his dictatorship, he probably died soon after. There were several descendants of this Valerius Maximus, but none of them are of sufficient importance to require special mention.

VALĒRIUS MAXĪMUS, is known to us as the compiler of a large collection of historical anecdotes, entitled De Factis Dictisque Memorabilibus Libri IX., arranged under different heads, the sayings and doings of Roman worthies being, moreover, kept distinct in each division from those of foreigners. He lived in the reign of the Emperor Tiberius, to whom he dedicated his work. Of his personal history we know nothing, except the solitary circumstance, recorded by himself, that he accompanied Sextus Pompeius into Asia (ii., 6, § 8), the Sextus Pompeius, apparently, who was consul A.D. 14, at the time when Augustus died. The subjects treated of in the work are of a character so miscellaneous, that it would be impossible, without transcribing the short notices placed at the head of each chapter, to convey a clear idea of the contents. In some books the topics selected for illustration are closely allied to each other, in others no bond of union can be traced. Thus the first book is entirely devoted to matters connected with sacred rites; the second book relates chiefly to certain remarkable civil institutions; the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth, to the more prominent social virtues; but in the seventh the chapters De Strategematis, De Repulsis, are abruptly followed by those De Necessitate, De Testamentis Rescissis, De Ratis Testamentis et Insperatis. In an historical point of view, the work is by no means without value, since it preserves a record of many curious events not to be found elsewhere; but from the errors actually detected upon points where we possess more precise information, it is manifest that we must not repose implicit confidence in the statements, unless where they are corroborated by collateral testimony. The work of Valerius Maximus became very popular in the later times of the empire and in the Middle Ages. It was frequently abridged, and we still possess an abridgment of it made by Julius Paris. The best editions of the original work are by Torrenius, Leid., 1726, and by Kappius, Lips., 1782.

VALERIUS FLACCUS. Vid. FLACCUS.

[VALGIUS. 1. The father-in-law of Rullus, who proposed the agrarian law in the consulship of Cicero, which was opposed by the latter. It appears from Cicero that Valgius had obtained much confiscated property in the time of Sulla.—2. A., the son of a senator, deserted the Pompeian party in the Spanish war, B.C. 45, and went over to Cæsar.—3. C. VALGIUS HIPPIANUS, the son of Q. Hippius, was adopted by a certain C. Valgius.]

VALGIUS RUFUS, C., a Roman poet, and a contemporary of Virgil and Horace, the latter of whom ranks him along with Varius, Mæcenas, and Virgil, among those friends of genius whose approbation far more than compensated for the annoyance caused by the attacks of his detractors.

VANDĀLI, VANDĀLĪ, or VINDĀLĪ, a confederacy of German nations, probably of the great Suevic race, to which the Burgundiones, Gothones, Gepidæ, and Rugii belonged. They dwelt originally on the northern coast of Germany, but were afterward settled north of the Marcomanni, in the Riesengebirge, which are hence called Vandalici Montes. They subsequently appear for a short time in Dacia and Pannonia; but at the beginning of the fifth century (A.D. 409) they traversed Germany and Gaul, and invaded Spain. In this country they subjugated the Alani, and founded a powerful kingdom, the name of which is still preserved in Andalusia (Vandalusia). In A.D. 429 they crossed over into Africa, under their king Genseric, and conquered all the Roman dominions in that country. Genseric subsequently invaded Italy, and took and plundered Rome in 455. The Vandals continued masters of Africa till 535, when their kingdom was destroyed by Belisarius, and annexed to the Byzantine empire.

a daring act of bravery, when the camp of Q. Cicero was besieged by the Nervii in B.C. 54.]

[VARGULA, a friend of C. Julius Cæsar Strabo, was noted as a wit.]

VARGUNTEIUS, a senator, and one of Catiline's conspirators, undertook, in conjunction with C. Cornelius, to murder Cicero in B.C. 63, but their plan was frustrated by information conveyed to Cicero through Fulvia. He was afterward brought to trial, but could find no one to defend him.

VARĪA (now Varea), a town of the Berones in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the Iberus, which was navigable from this town.

VARĪNI, a people of Germany, on the right bank of the Albis, north of the Langobardi.

VARIUS. 1. Q. VARIUS HYBRIDA, tribune of the plebs B.C. 90, was a native of Sucro in Spain, and received the surname of Hybrida because his mother was a Spanish woman. In his tribuneship he carried a lex de majestate, in order to punish all those who had assisted or advised the Socii to take up arms against the Roman people. Under this law many distinguished senators were condemned; but in the following year Varius himself was condemned under his own law, and was put to death.—2. L. VARIUS RUFUS, one of the most distinguished poets of the Augustan age, the companion and friend of Virgil and Horace. By the latter he is placed in the foremost rank among the epic bards, and Quintilian has pronounced that his tragedy of Thyestes might stand a comparison with any production of the Grecian stage. He enjoyed the friendship of Mæcenas, and it was to the recommendation of Varius, in conjunction with that of Virgil, that Horace was indebted for an introduction to the minister, about B.C. 39. Virgil appointed Plotius Tucca and Varius his literary executors, and they revised the Æneid. Hence Varius was alive subsequent to B.C. 19, in which year Virgil died. Only the titles of three works of Varius have been preserved: 1. De Morte. 2. Panegyricus in Cæsarem Octavianum. 3. The tragedy Thyestes. Only a very few fragments of these poems are extant.

VARRO, ATACINUS. (Vid. below, VARRO, No. 3.)

VARRO, CINGŌNIUS, a Roman senator under Nero, supported the claims of Nymphidius to the throne on the death of Nero, and was put to death in consequence by Galba, being at the time consul designatus.

VARRO, TERENTIUS. 1. C., consul B.C. 216 with L. Æmilius Paulus. Varro is said to have been the son of a butcher, to have carried on business himself as a factor in his early years, and to have risen to eminence by pleading the causes of the lower classes in opposition to the opinion of all good men. Notwithstanding the strong opposition of the aristocracy, he was raised to the consulship by the people, who thought that it only needed a man of energy at the head of an overwhelming force to bring the war against Hannibal to a close. His colleague was L. Æmilius Paulus, one of the leaders of the aristocratical party. The two consuls were defeated by Hannibal at the memorable battle of Cannæ. Vid. HANNIBAL. The battle was fought by Varro against the advice of Paulus. The Roman army was all but annihilated. Paulus and almost all the officers perished. Varro was one of the few who escaped and reached Venusia in safety, with about seventy horsemen. His conduct after the battle seems to have been deserving of high praise. He proceeded to Canusium, where the remnant of the Roman army had taken refuge, and there adopted every precaution which the exigencies of the case required. His conduct was appreciated by the senate and the people, and his defeat was forgotten in the services he had lately rendered. On his return to the city all classes went out to meet him, and the senate returned him thanks because he had not despaired of the commonwealth. He continued to be employed in Italy for several successive years in important military commands till nearly the close of the Punic war.—2. The celebrated writer, whose vast and varied erudition in almost every department of literature earned for him the title of the “most learned of the Romans.” He was born B.C. 116, and was trained under the superintendence of L. Ælius Stilo Præconinus, and he afterward received instruction from Antiochus, a philosopher of the Academy. Varro held a high naval command in the wars against the pirates and Mithradates, and afterward served as the legatus of Pompeius in Spain in the civil war, but was compelled to surrender his forces to Cæsar. He then passed over into Greece, and shared the fortunes of the Pompeian party till after the battle of Pharsalia, when he sued for and obtained the forgiveness of Cæsar, who employed him in superintending the collection and arrangement of the great library designed for public use. For some years after this period Varro remained in literary seclusion, passing his time chiefly at his country seats near Cumæ and Tusculum, occupied with study and composition. Upon the formation of the second triumvirate, his name appeared upon the list of the proscribed; but he succeeded in making his escape, and, after having remained for some time concealed, he obtained the protection of Octavianus. The remainder of his career was passed in tranquillity, and he continued to labor in his favorite studies, although his magnificent library had been destroyed, a loss to him irreparable. His death took place B.C. 28, when he was in his eighty-ninth year. Not only was Varro the most learned of Roman scholars, but he was likewise the most voluminous of Roman authors. We have his own authority for the assertion that he had composed no less than four hundred and ninety books; but of these only two works have come down to us, and one of them in a mutilated form. The following is a list of the principal works, both extant and lost: 1. De Re Rustica Libri III., still extant, was written when the author was eighty years old, and is the most important of all the treatises upon ancient agriculture now extant, being far superior to the more voluminous production of Columella, with which alone it can be compared. The best editions are in the Scriptores Rei Rusticæ veteres Latini by Gesner, 4to, 2 vols., Lips., 1735, and by Schneider, 8vo, 4 vols., Lips., 1794–1797. 2. De Lingua Latina, a grammatical treatise which extended to twenty-four books; but six only (v.–x.) have been preserved, and these are in a mutilated condition. The remains of this treatise are particularly valuable, in so far as they have been the means of preserving many terms and forms which would otherwise have been altogether lost, and much curious information is here treasured up connected with the ancient usages, both civil and religious, of the Romans. The best editions are by Spengel, 8vo, Berol., 1826, and by Müller, 8vo, Lips., 1833. 3. Sententia. One hundred and sixty-five Sententia, or pithy sayings, have been published by Devit under the name of Varro, Patav., 1843. It is manifest that these sayings were not strung together by Varro himself, but are scraps gleaned out of various works, probably at different times and by different hands. 4. Antiquitatum Libri, divided into two sections. Antiquitates Rerum humanarum, in twenty-five books, and Antiquitates Rerum divinarum, in sixteen books. This was Varro's great work; and upon this chiefly his reputation for profound learning was based; but, unfortunately, only a few fragments of it have come down to us. With the second section of the work we are, comparatively speaking, familiar, since Augustine drew very largely from this source in his “City of God.” 5. Saturæ, which were composed, not only in a variety of metres, but contained an admixture of prose also. Varro, in these pieces, copied to a certain extent the productions of Menippus the Gadarene (vid. MENIPPUS), and hence designated them as Saturæ Menippeæ s. Cynicæ. They appear to have been a series of disquisitions on a vast variety of subjects, frequently, if not uniformly, couched in the shape of dialogue, the object proposed being the inculcation of moral lessons and serious truths in a familiar, playful, and even jocular style. The best edition of the fragments of these Saturæ is by Eehler, M. Terentii Varronis Saturarum Menippearum Reliquiæ, Quedlingb., 1844. Of the remaining works of Varro we possess little except a mere catalogue of titles.—3. P., a Latin poet of considerable celebrity, surnamed ATACINUS, from the Atax, a river of Gallia Narbonensis, his native province, was born B.C. 82. Of his personal history nothing further is known. He is believed to have been the composer of the following works, of which a few inconsiderable fragments only have come down to us; but some of them ought perhaps to be ascribed to his illustrious contemporary M. Terentius Varro: 1. Argonautica, probably a free translation of the well-known poem by Apollonius Rhodius. Upon this piece the fame of Varro chiefly rested. It is referred to by Propertius, by Ovid, and by Statius. 2. Chorographia s. Cosmographia, appears to have been a metrical system of astronomy and geography. 3. Libri Navales, appears to have been a poem upon navigation.

VARUS, a cognomen in many Roman gentes, signified a person who had his legs bent inward, and was opposed to Valgus, which signified a person having his legs turned outward.

VARUS, ALFENUS. 1. A Roman jurist, was a pupil of Servius Sulpicius, and the only pupil of Servius from whom there are any excerpts in the Digest. The scholiast on Horace (Sat., i., 3, 130) tells us that the “Alfenus vafer” of Horace was the lawyer, and that he was a native of Cremona, where he carried on the trade of a barber or a botcher of shoes (for there are both readings, sutor and tonsor); that he came to Rome, where he became a pupil of Servius Sulpicius, attained the dignity of the consulship, and was honored with a public funeral.—2. A general of Vitellius, in the civil war in A.D. 69, and perhaps a descendant of the jurist.

VARUS, ATIUS. 1. P., a zealous partisan of Pompey in the civil war, was stationed in Picenum on the breaking out of the civil war in B.C. 49. He subsequently crossed over into Africa, and took possession of the province, which was then governed by Q. Ligarius. Vid. LIGARIUS. In consequence of his having been proprætor of Africa a few years previously, Varus was well acquainted with the country and the people, and was thus able to raise two legions without much difficulty. Meantime, L. Ælius Tubero, who had received from the senate the province of Africa, arrived to take the command; but Varus would not even allow him to land, and compelled him to sail away. In the course of the same year, Varus, assisted by King Juba, defeated Curio, Cæsar's legate, who had crossed over from Sicily to Africa. Vid. CURIO. Varus fought with the other Pompeians in Africa against Cæsar in 46; but after the battle of Thapsus he sailed away to Cn. Pompey in Spain. He fell at the battle of Munda, and his head was carried to Cæsar.—2. Q. ATIUS VARUS, commander of the cavalry under C. Fabius, one of Cæsar's legates in Gaul, and probably the same as the Q. Varus who commanded the cavalry under Domitius, one of Cæsar's generals in Greece in the war with Pompey. It is supposed by many modern writers that he is the same person as the Varus to whom Virgil dedicated his sixth eclogue, and whose praises the poet also celebrates in the ninth (ix., 27), from which poems we learn that Varus had obtained renown in war.

VARUS, QUINTILIUS. 1. SEX, quæstor B.C. 49, belonged to the Pompeian party. He fell into Cæsar's hands at the capture of Corfinium, but was dismissed by Cæsar. He afterward fought under Brutus and Cassius against the triumvirs; and after the loss of the battle of Philippi, he fell by the hands of his freedmen, who slew him at his own request.—2. P., son of the preceding, was consul B.C. 13, and was subsequently appointed to the government of Syria, where he acquired enormous wealth. Shortly after his return from Syria he was made governor of Germany (probably about A.D. 7). Drusus had conquered a great part of Central Germany as far as the Visurgis (now Weser); and Varus received orders from Augustus to introduce the Roman jurisdiction into the newly-conquered country. The Germans, however, were not prepared to submit thus tamely to the Roman yoke, and found a leader in Arminius, a noble chief of the Cherusci, who had previously served in the Roman army. Arminius organized a general revolt of all the German tribes between the Visurgis and the Weser, but kept his design a profound secret from Varus, with whom he continued to live on the most friendly terms. When he had fully matured his plans, he suddenly attacked Varus, at the head of a countless host of barbarians, as the Roman general was marching with his three legions through a pass of the Saltus Teutoburgiensis, a range of hills covered with wood, which extends north of the Lippe from Osnabrück to Paderborn, and is known in the present day by the name of the Teutoburgerwald or Lippische Wald. The battle lasted three days, and ended with the entire destruction of the Roman army. Varus put an end to his own life. His defeat was followed by the loss of all the Roman possessions between the Weser and the Rhine, and the latter river again became the boundary of the Roman dominions. When the news of this defeat reached Rome, the whole city was thrown into consternation; and Augustus, who was both weak and aged, gave way to the most violent grief, tearing his garments, and calling upon Varus to give him back his legions. Orders were issued, as if the very empire was in danger; and Tiberius was dispatched with a veteran army to the Rhine.

VĀRUS (now Var or Varo), a river in Gallia Narbonensis, forming the boundary between this province and Italy, rises in Mount Cema in the Alps, and falls into the Mediterranean Sea between Antipolis and Nicæa.

VASĀTES, a people in Gallia Aquitanica, on the Garumna, whose chief town was Cossium (now Bazas), on the road from Burdigala to Elusa.

VASCŌNES, a powerful people on the northern coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees, in the modern Navarre and Guipuzco. Their chief towns were POMPELON and CALAGURRIS. They were a brave people, and fought in battle bare-headed. Under the empire they were regarded as skillful diviners and prophets. Their name is still retained in that of the modern Basques.

VASĪO (now Vaison), a considerable town of the Vocontii in Gallia Narbonensis.

VATĪA ISAURĪCUS, P. SERVILIUS. 1. Consul in B.C. 79, was sent in the following year as proconsul to Cilicia, in order to clear the seas of the pirates, whose ravages now spread far and wide. He carried on the war with great ability and success, and from his conquest of the Isauri he obtained the surname of Isauricus. After giving Cilicia the organization of a Roman province, he entered Rome in triumph in 74. After his return Servilius took a leading part in public affairs. In 70 he was one of the judges at the trial of Verres; in 66 he supported the rogation of Manilius for conferring upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates; in 63 he was a candidate for the dignity of pontifex maximus, but was defeated by Julius Cæsar; in the same year he spoke in the senate in favor of inflicting the last penalty of the law upon the Catilinarian conspirators; in 57 he joined the other nobles in procuring Cicero's recall from banishment; in 56 he opposed the restoration of Ptolemy to his kingdom; and in 55 he was censor with M. Valerius Messala Niger. He took no part in the civil wars, probably on account of his advanced age, and died in 44.—2. Prætor 54, belonged originally to the aristocratic party, but espoused Cæsar's side on the breaking out of the civil war, and was consul with Cæsar in 48. In 46 he governed the provin jo of Asia as proconsul, during which time Cicero wrote to him several letters. After the death of Cæsar in 44, he supported Cicero and the rest of the aristocratic party, in opposition to Antony. But he soon changed sides again, became reconciled to Antony, and was made consul a second time in 41.

[VATICANUS MONS. Vid. ROMA, p. 747, b, 748, a.]

VATINIUS. I. P., a political adventurer in the last days of the republic, who is described by Cicero as one of the greatest scamps and villains that ever lived. His personal appearance was unprepossessing; his face and neck were covered with swellings, to which Cicero alludes, calling him the struma civilatis. Vatinius was quaestor B.C. 63, and tribune of the plebs 59, when he sold his services to Cæsar, who was then consul along with Bibulus. It was Vatinius who proposed the bill to the people by which Cæsar received the provinces of Cisalpine Gaul and Illyricum for five years. Vatinius continued to take an active part in political affairs. In 56 he appeared as a witness against Milo and Sestius, two of Cicero's friends, in consequence of which the orator made a vehement attack upon the character of Vatinius, in the speech which has come down to us. Vatinius was prætor in 55, and in the following year (54) he was accused by C. Licinius Calvus of having gained the prætorship by bribery. He was defended on this occasion by Cicero, in order to please Cæsar, whom Cicero had offended by his former attack upon Vatinius. Soon afterward Vatinius went to Gaul, where we find him serving in 51. He accompanied Cæsar in the civil war, and was made consul suffectus for a few days, at the end of December, 47. At the beginning of the following year he was sent into Illyricum, where he carried on the war with success. After Cæsar's death he was compelled to surrender Dyrrhachium and his army to Brutus, who had obtained possession of Macedonia, because his troops declared in favor of Brutus. — 2. Of Benventum, one of the vilest and most hateful creatures of Nero's court, equally deformed in body and in mind. He was originally a shoemaker's apprentice, next earned his living as one of the lowest kinds of scurræ or buffoons, and finally obtained great power and wealth by accusing the most distinguished men in the state. A certain kind of drinking-cups, having nasi or nozzles, bore the name of Vatinius, probably because he brought them into fashion. Juvenal alludes (v., 46) to a cup of this kind.

VATRËNUS. Vid. PADUS.

VECTIS or VECTA (now Isle of Wight), an island off the southern coast of Britain, with which the Romans became acquainted before their conquest of Britain, by means of the inhabitants of Massilia, who were accustomed to visit this island for the purpose of obtaining tin. It is related by Diodorus that at low water the space between Vectis and the coast of Britain was almost entirely dry, so that the Britons used to bring tin to the island in wagons. It was conquered by Vespasian in the reign of Claudius.

VEDIUS POLLIO. Vid. POLLIO.

VEGETIUS, FLAVIUS RENATUS, the author of a treatise Rei Militaris Institutæ, or Epitome Rei

Militaris, dedicated to the Emperor Valentinian II. The materials were derived, according to the declaration of the writer himself, from Cato the Censor, De Disciplina Militari, from Cornelius Celsus, from Frontinus, from Paternus, and from the imperial constitutions of Augustus, Trajan, and Adrian. The work is divided into five books. The first treats of the levying and training of recruits, including instructions for the fortification of a camp; the second, of the different classes into which soldiers are divided, and especially of the organization of the legion; the third, of the operations of an army in the field; the fourth, of the attack and defence of fortresses; the fifth, of marine warfare. The value of this work is much diminished by the fact that the usages of periods the most remote from each other are mixed together into one confused mass, and not unfrequently, we have reason to suspect, are blended with arrangements which never existed, except in the fancy of the author. The best edition is by Schwebelius, Norimberg, 1767, and by Oudendorp and Bessel, Argent., 1806.

[VEHILIUS, prætor B.C. 44, refused to receive a province from Antony, and said that he would obey the senate alone.]

[VEIANIUS, a celebrated gladiator in the time of Horace, who had retired to a small estate in the country, after dedicating his arms in the temple of Hercules at Fundi in Latium.]

VEIENTO, FABRICIUS, was banished in the reign of Nero, A.D. 62, in consequence of his having published several libels. He afterward returned to Rome, and became in the reign of Domitian one of the most infamous informers and flatterers of that tyrant. He also enjoyed the friendship of Nerva.

VEII (Veiens, -entis, Veientanus: now Isola Farnese), one of the most ancient and powerful cities of Etruria, situated on the River Cremera, about twelve miles from Rome. It possessed a strongly-fortified citadel, built on a hill rising precipitously from the deep glens which bound it, save at the single point where a narrow ridge unites it to the city. It was one of the twelve cities of the Etruscan Confederation, and apparently the largest of all. As far as we can judge from its present remains, it was about seven miles in circumference, which agrees with the statement of Dionysius, that it was equal in size to Athens. Its territory (Ager Veiens) was extensive, and appears originally to have extended on the south and east to the Tiber; on the southwest to the sea, embracing the salinæ or salt-works at the mouth of the river; and on the west to the territory of Cærc. The Ciminius forest appears to have been its north-western boundary; on the east it must have embraced all the district south of Soracte and eastward to the Tiber. The cities of Capena and Fidenæ were colonies of Veii. Veii was a powerful city at the time of the foundation of Rome, and the most formidable and dangerous of her neighbors. The Veientes were engaged in a most unceasing hostilities with Rome for more than three centuries and a half, and we have records of fourteen distinct wars between the two nations. Veii was at length taken by the dictator Camillus, after a siege which is said to have lasted ten years. The city fell into his hands, according to the common story, by means of a cuniculus or mine, which was carried by Camillus from the Roman camp under the city into the citadel of Veii. So well built and spacious was Veii, that the Romans were anxious, after the destruction of their own city by the Gauls in 390, to remove to Veii, and are said to have been only prevented from carrying their purpose into effect by the eloquence of Camillus. From this time Veii was abandoned; but after the lapse of ages it was colonized afresh by Augustus, and made a Roman municipium. The new colony, however, occupied scarcely a third of the ancient city, and had again sunk into decay in the reign of Hadrian. From this time Veii disappears entirely from history, and, on the revival of letters, even its site was long an object of dispute. It is now settled, however, beyond a doubt, that it stood in the neighborhood of the hamlet of Isola Farnese, where several remains of the ancient city have been discovered. Of these the most interesting is its cemetery; but there is now only one tomb remaining open, which was discovered in the winter of 1842-3, and contains many interesting remains of Etruscan art.

VEIOVIS, a Roman deity, whose name is explained by some to mean "little Jupiter," while others interpret it "the destructive Jupiter," and identify him with Pluto. Veiovis was probably an Etruscan divinity of a destructive nature, whose fearful lightnings produced deafness in those who were to be struck by them, even before they were actually hurled. His temple at Rome stood between the Capitol and the Tarpeian Rock; he was represented as a youthful god armed with arrows.

VELAUNI or VELLAVI, a people in Gallia Aquitania, in the modern Velay, who were originally subject to the Arverni, but subsequently appear as an independent people.

VELĒDA, a prophetic virgin, by birth belonged to the Bructeri, and was regarded as a divine being by most of the nations in Central Germany in the reign of Vespasian. She inhabited a lofty tower in the neighborhood of the River Luppia (now Lippe). She encouraged Civilis in his revolt against the Romans, but she was afterward taken prisoner and carried to Rome.

VELĪA or ELEĀ, also called HYĒLE (Ἐλέα, Ἐλέη), the different forms are owing to the word having originally the Æolic digamma, which the Romans changed into V: Velienses or Eleates, pl.: now Castell' a Mare della Brucca, a Greek town of Lucania, on the western coast, between Pæstum and Buxentum, was founded by the Phocæans, who had abandoned their native city to escape from the Persian sovereignty, about B.C. 543. It was situated about three miles east of the River Iales, and possessed a good harbor. It is celebrated as the birth-place of the philosophers Parmenides and Zeno, who founded a school of philosophy usually known under the name of the Eleatic. It possessed a celebrated temple of Demeter (Cercus). Cicero, who resided at Velia at one time, frequently mentions it in his correspondence; and it appears to have been reckoned a healthy place. (Hor., Ep., i., 15.) In the time of Strabo it had ceased to be a town of importance.

VELĪNUS (now Vellino), a river in the territory of the Sabines, rising in the central Apennines, and falling into the Nar. This river in the neighborhood of Reate overflowed its banks and formed several small lakes, the largest of which was called LACUS VELĪNUS (now Pie di Lugo, also Lago delle Marmore). In order to carry off these waters, a channel was cut through the rocks by Curius Dentatus, the conqueror of the Sabines, by means of which the waters of the Velinus were carried through a narrow gorge to a spot where they fall from a height of several hundred feet into the River Nar. This fall, which is one of the most celebrated in Europe, is known at the present day by the name of the Fall of Terni, or the Caduta delle Marmore.

VELĪTRÆ (Veliternus: now Velletri), an ancient town of the Volscians in Latium, but subsequently belonging to the Latin league. It was conquered by the Romans, and colonized at an early period, but it frequently revolted from Rome. It is chiefly celebrated as the birth-place of the Emperor Augustus.

VELĪUS LONGUS, a Latin grammarian, known to us from a treatise De Orthographia, still extant, printed in the "Grammaticæ Latinæ Auctores Antiqui" of Putschins, 4to, Hanov., 1605. Velius also wrote a commentary on Virgil, which is mentioned by Macrobius.

VELLAUNODŪNUM (now Beaune), a town of the Senones in Gallia Lugdunensis.

VELLEIUS PATERCŪLUS. Vid. PATERCULUS.

VELLOCASSES, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, northwest of the Parisii, extending along the Sequana as far as the ocean: their chief town was RATOMAGUS.

VENĀFRUM (Venafranus: now Venafri), a town in the north of Sannium, near the River Vulturnus, and on the confines of Latium, celebrated for the excellence of its olives.

VENĒDI or VENĒDÆ, a people in European Sarmatia, dwelling on the Baltic east of the Vistula. The SINUS VENĒDICUS (now Gulf of Rija), and the VENĒDICI MONTES, a range of mountains between Poland and East Prussia, were called after this people.

VĒNERIS PROMONTORIUM. Vid. PYRENE PROMONTORIUM.

VENERIS PORTUS or PYRENEI PORTUS, a seaport town of the Indigetes in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the Promontorium Veneris, and on the frontiers of Gaul.

VENĒTĪA. 1. A district in the north of Italy, was originally included under the general name of Gallia Cisalpina, but was made by Augustus the tenth Regio of Italy. It was bounded on the west by the River Athesis, which separated it from Gallia Cisalpina; on the north by the Carnic Alps; on the east by the River Timavus, which separated it from Istria; and on the south by the Adriatic Gulf. This country was, and is, very fertile, and its inhabitants enjoyed great prosperity. The chief productions of the country were excellent wool, a sweet but much-prized wine, and race-horses. Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, is said to have kept a stud of race-horses in this country. Its inhabitants, the VENĒTI, frequently called HENĒTI ('Evepoi) by the Greeks, were commonly said to be descendants of the Paphlagonian Heneti, whom Antenor led into the country after the Trojan war; but this tale, like so many others, has evidently arisen from the mere similarity of the name. Others supposed the Veneti to be a branch of the Celtic Veneti in Gaul; but this supposition is disproved by the express testimony of Polybius, that they spoke a language entirely different from the Celtic; and that they had no connection with the Celts, may be inferred from the fact that they were always on hostile terms with the Celtic tribes settled in Italy. Herodotus regards them as an Illyrian race; and all writers are agreed that they did not belong to the original population of Italy. In consequence of their hostility to the Celtic tribes in their neighborhood, they formed at an early period an alliance with Rome; and their country was defended by the Romans against their dangerous enemies. On the conquest of the Cisalpine Gauls, the Veneti likewise became included under the Roman dominions; and they were almost the only people in Italy who became the subjects of Rome without offering any resistance. The Veneti continued to enjoy great prosperity down to the time of the Marcomannic wars, in the reign of the Emperor Aurelius; but from this time their country was frequently devastated by the barbarians who invaded Italy; and at length, in the fifth century, many of its inhabitants, to escape the ravages of the Huns under Attila, took refuge in the islands off their coast, on which now stands the city of Venice. The chief towns of Venetia in ancient times were PATAVIUM, ALTINUM, and AQUILEIA. The two latter carried on an extensive commerce, and exported, among other things, large quantities of amber, which was brought from the Baltic through the interior of Europe to these cities.—2. A district in the northwest of Gallia Lugdunensis, inhabited by the Veneti, who were a brave people, and the best sailors in all Gaul. Off their coast was a group of islands called INSULÆ VENĒTICÆ.

VENĒTUS LACUS. Vid. BRIGANTINUS LACUS.

VENĒLIĀ, a nymph, daughter of Pilemnus, sister of Amata (the wife of King Latinus), and mother of Turnus and Juturna by Daunus.

VENNŌNES, a people of Rætia, and, according to Strabo, the most savage of the Rætian tribes, inhabiting the Alps near the sources of the Athesis (now Adige).

[VENNONIUS. 1. An early Roman annalist, placed by Cicero immediately after Fannius in his enumeration of Roman historians. C., a money-lender (negotiator) in Cilicia, a friend of Cicero, solicited, but unsuccessfully, a præfectura from the latter.]

VENTA. 1. BELGĀRUM (now Winchester), the chief town of the Belgæ in Britain. The modern city still contains several Roman remains.—2. ICENŌRUM. Vid. ICENI.—3. SILŪRUM (now Carwent), a town of the Silures in Britain, in Monmouthshire.

VENTI (ἄνεμοι), the winds. They appear personified, even in the Homeric poems, but, at the same time, they are conceived as ordinary phenomena of nature. The master and ruler of all the winds is Æolus, who resides in the island Æolia (vid. ÆOLUS); but the other gods also exercise a power over them. Homer mentions by name Boreas (north wind), Eurus (east wind), Notus (south wind), and Zephyrus (west wind). When the funeral pile of Patroclus could not be made to burn, Achilles promised to offer sacrifices to the winds; and Iris accordingly hastened to them, and found them feasting in the palace of Zephyrus in Thrace. Boreas and Zephyrus thereupon straightway crossed the Thracian Sea into Asia, to cause the fire to blaze. According to Hesiod, the beneficial winds, Notus, Boreas, Argestes, and Zephyrus, were the sons of Astræus and Eos; and the destructive ones, such as Typhon, are said to be the sons of Typhoeus. Later, especially philosophical, writers endeavored to define the winds more accurately, according to their places in the compass. Thus Aristotle, besides the four principal winds (Boreas or Aparctias, Eurus, Notus, and Zephyrus), mentions three, the Meses, Caicias, and Apeliotes, between Boreas and Eurus; between Eurus and Notus he places the Phœnicias; between Notus and Zephyrus he has only the Lips; and between Zephyrus and Boreas he places the Argestes (Olympias or Sciron) and the Thracias. It must further be observed that, according to Aristotle, the Eurus is not due east, but southeast. In the Muscum Pio-Clementinum there exists a marble monument upon which the winds are described with their Greek and Latin names, viz., Septentrio (Aparctias), Eurus (Euros or southeast), and between these two Aquilo (Boreas), Vulturus (Caicias), and Solanus (Apheliotes). Between Eurus and Notus (Notos) there is only one, the Euroauster (Euronotus); between Notus and Favonius (Zephyrus) are marked Austro-Africus (Libonotus) and Africus (Lips); and between Favonius and Septentrio we find Chorus (Iapyx) and Circius (Thracius). The winds were represented by poets and artists in different ways; the latter usually represented them as beings with wings at their heads and shoulders. The most remarkable monument representing the winds is the octagonal tower of Andronicus Cyrrhestes at Athens. Each of the eight sides of the monument represents one of the eight principal winds in a flying attitude. A movable Triton in the centre of the cupola pointed with his staff to the wind blowing at the time. All these eight figures have wings at their shoulders, all are clothed, and the peculiarities of the winds are indicated by their bodies and various attributes. Black lambs were offered as sacrifices to the destructive winds, and white ones to favorable or good winds. Boreas had a temple on the River Ilissus in Attica; and Zephyrus had an altar on the sacred road to Eleusis.

VENTIDIŪS BASSUS, P., a celebrated Roman general, was a native of Picenum, and was taken prisoner by Pompeius Strabo in the Social war (B.C. 89), and carried to Rome. When he grew up to man's estate, he got a poor living by undertaking to furnish mules and vehicles for those magistrates who went from Rome to administer a province. In this humble employment he became known to C. Julius Cæsar, whom he accompanied into Gaul. In the Civil war he executed Cæsar's orders with ability, and became a favorite of his great commander. He obtained the rank of tribune of the plebs, and was made a prætor for B.C. 43. After Cæsar's death Ventidius sided with M. Antony in the war of Mutina (43), and in the same year was made consul suffectus. In 39 Antony sent Ventidius into Asia to oppose Labienus and the Parthians. He conducted this war with distinguished ability and success. In the first campaign (39) he defeated the Parthians and Labienus, the latter of whom was slain in his flight after the battle; and in the second campaign (38) Ventidius gained a still more brilliant victory over the Parthians, who had again invaded Syria. Pacorus, the king's son, fell in this battle. Antony, however, far from being pleased with the success of Ventidius, showed great jealousy of him, and dismissed him from his employment. Yet his services were too great to be overlooked, and he had a triumph in November, 38. Nothing more is known of him. Ventidius was often cited as an instance of a man who rose from the lowest condition to the highest honors; a captive became a Roman consul and enjoyed a triumph; but this was in a period of revolution.

[VENULUS, a Latin chieftain (according to Servius, originally from Argos), sent by Turnus to Diomedes to persuade him to lend aid against Æneas and the Trojans: he was subsequently captured by Tarchon, and carried off the field after a fierce struggle.]

VĒVUS, the goddess of love among the Romans. Before she was identified with the Greek Aphrodite, she was one of the least important divinities in the religion of the Romans; but still her worship seems to have been established at Rome at an early time. There was a stone chapel with an image of Venus Murtea or Murcia in the Circus, near the spot where the altar of Consus was concealed. This surname was said to be the same as Myrtea (from myrtus, a myrtle), and to indicate the fondness of the goddess for the myrtle-tree. In ancient times there is said to have been a myrtle grove in front of her sanctuary below the Aventine. Another ancient surname of Venus was Cloacina, which is said to have been derived from her image having been found in the great sewer (cloaca); but this tale is nothing but an etymological inference from the name. It is supposed by modern writers that this surname signifies the "Purifier," from cloare or cluere, "to wash" or "purify." The statue of Venus under this surname was set up by T. Tatius in a temple near the forum. A third ancient surname of Venus is Calva, under which she had two temples in the neighborhood of the Capitol. Some believed that one of them had been built by Aneus Marcius, because his wife was in danger of losing her hair; others thought that it was a monument of a patriotic act of the Roman women, who, during the siege of the Gauls, cut off their hair and gave it to the men to make strings for their bows; and others, again, supposed it to refer to the fancies and caprices of lovers, calvere signifying "to tease." But it probably refers to the fact that on her wedding-day the bride, either actually or symbolically, cut off a lock of hair to sacrifice it to Venus. In these, the most ancient surnames of Venus, we must recognize her primitive character and attributes. In later times her worship became much more extended, and her identification with the Greek Aphrodite introduced various new attributes. At the beginning of the second Punic war, the worship of Venus Erycina was introduced from Sicily, and a temple was dedicated to her on the Capitol, to which subsequently another was added outside the Colline gate. In the year B.C. 114, a Vestal virgin was killed by lightning; and as the general moral corruption, especially among the Vestals, was believed to be the cause of this disaster, the Sibylline books, upon being consulted, commanded that a temple should be built to Venus Verticordia (the goddess who turns the hearts of men) on the Via Salaria. After the close of the Samnite war, Fabius Gurgus founded the worship of Venus Obsequens and Postvorta; Scipio Africanus the younger, that of Venus Genetrix, in which he was afterward followed by Cæsar, who added that of Venus Victrix. The worship of Venus was promoted by Cæsar, who traced his descent from Æneas, who was supposed to be the son of Mars and Venus. The month of April, as the beginning of spring, was thought to be peculiarly sacred to the goddess of love. Respecting the Greek goddess, vid. APHRODITE.

VĒNŪSĪA (Venusinus: now Venosa), an ancient town of Apulia, south of the River Aufidus, and near Mount Vultur, situated in a romantic country, and memorable as the birth-place of the poet Horace. It was originally a town of the Hirpini in Samnium; and after its original Sabellian inhabitants had been driven out by the Romans, it was colonized by the latter, B.C. 291, and formed an important military station. Here the remnants of the Roman army took refuge after the fatal battle of Cannæ, 216.

VĒKĀGRI or VARĀGRI, a people in Gallia Belgica, on the Pennine Alps, near the confluence of the Dranse and the Rhone.

[VERANIUS, Q., appointed by Tiberius Cæsar legatus or governor of Cappadocia, when that country was reduced to the form of a Roman province, A.D. 18. Veranius was one of the friends of Germanicus, and took an active part in the prosecution of Cn. Piso. He was consul in A.D. 49, and in A.D. 58, under Nero, he succeeded Didius Gallus as governor of Britain, but died there within a year.]

VĒRBĀNUS LACUS (now Lago Maggiore), a lake in Gallia Cisalpina, and the largest lake in all Italy, being about forty miles in length from north to south: its greatest breadth is eight miles. It is formed by the River Ticinus and other streams descending from the Alps; and the River Ticinus issues from its southern extremity. [In it are the Borromean islands, the admiration of travellers.]

VĒRCĒLLÆ (Vercellensis: now Vercelli), the chief town of the Libici in Gallia Cisalpina, and subsequently a Roman municipium, and a place of considerable importance.

VERCINGETORIX, the celebrated chieftain of the Arverni, who carried on war with great ability against Cæsar in B.C. 52. The history of this war occupies the seventh book of Cæsar's Commentaries on the Gallic war. Vercingetorix fell into Cæsar's hands on the capture of Alcia, was subsequently taken to Rome, where he adorned the triumph of his conqueror in 45, and was afterward put to death.

VERETUM (Veretinus: now Alessano), more anciently called BARIS, a town in Calabria, on the road from Leuca to Tarentum, and six hundred stadia southeast of the latter city.

VERGÆ, a town in the interior of Bruttium, of uncertain site.

VERGELLUS, a rivulet in Apulia crossing the plain of Cannæ, which is said to have been choked by the dead bodies of the Romans slain in the memorable battle against Hannibal.

VERGINIUS. Vid. VIRGINIUS.

VEROLANĪUM OF VERULANĪUM (now Old Verulam, near St. Alban's), the chief town of the Catuellani in Britain, probably the residence of the King Cassivellaunus, which was conquered by Cæsar. It was subsequently made a Roman municipium. It was destroyed by the Britons under Boadicea, in their insurrection against the Romans, but was rebuilt, and continued to be an important place.

VEROMANDUI, a people in Gallia Belgica, between the Nervi and Suessiones, in the modern Vermandois. Their chief town was Augusta Veromanduorum (now St. Quentin).

VERŌNA (Veronensis: now Verona), an important town in Gallia Cisalpina, on the River Athesis, was originally the capital of the Euganei, but subsequently belonged to the Cenomani. At a still later time it was made a Roman colony, with the surname Augusta; and under the empire it was one of the largest and most flourishing towns in the north of Italy. It was the birthplace of Catullus, and, according to some accounts, of the elder Pliny, though others make him a native of Comum. It is celebrated on account of the battle fought in its neighborhood in the Campi Raudii, by Marius against the Cimbri, and also by the victory of Theodoric the Great over Odoacer. Theodoric took up his residence in this town, whence it is called by the German writers of the Middle Ages Dieterichs Bern, to distinguish it from Bern in Switzerland. There are still many Roman remains at Verona, and, among others, an amphitheatre in a good state of preservation.

VERRES, C., was quæstor B.C. 82, to Cn. Papirius Carbo, and therefore, at that period, belonged to the Marian party. He, however, deserted Carbo and went over to Sulla, who sent him to Beneventum, where he was allowed a share of the confiscated estates. Verres next appears as the legate of Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, prætor of Cilicia in 80-79, and one of the most rapacious of the provincial governors. On the death of the regular quæstor C. Malleolus, Verres became the pro-quæstor of Dolabella. In Verres Dolabella found an active and unscrupulous agent, and, in return, connived at his excesses. But the pro-quæstor proved as faithless to Dolabella as he had been to Carbo, and turned evidence against him on his prosecution by M. Scæurus in 78. Verres was prætor urbanus in 74, and afterward pro-prætor in Sicily, where he remained nearly three years (73-71). The extortions and exactions of Verres in the island have become notorious through the celebrated orations of Cicero. No class of the inhabitants of Sicily was exempted from his avarice, his cruelty, or his insults. The wealthy had money or works of art to yield up; the middle classes might be made to pay heavier imposts; and the exports of the vineyards, the arable land, and the loom, he saddled with heavier burdens. By capricious changes or violent abrogation of their compacts, Verres reduced to beggary both the producers and the farmers of the revenue. His three years' rule desolated the island more effectually than the two recent Servile wars, and than the old struggle between Carthage and Rome for the possession of the island. So diligently did he employ his opportunities, that he boasted of having amassed enough for a life of opulence, even if he were compelled to disgorge two thirds of his plunder in stifling inquiry or purchasing an acquittal. As soon as he left Sicily, the inhabitants resolved to bring him to trial. They committed the prosecution to Cicero, who had been Lilybæan quæstor in Sicily in 75, and had promised his good offices to the Sicilians whenever they might demand them. Cicero heartily entered into the cause of the Sicilians, and spared no pains to secure a conviction of the great criminal. Verres was defended by Hortensius, and was supported by the whole power of the aristocracy. At first his partisans attempted to stop the prosecution by bribes, flatteries, and menaces; but, finding this to be impossible, they endeavoured to substitute a sham prosecutor in the place of Cicero. Hortensius therefore offered as prosecutor Q. Cæcilius Niger, who had been quæstor to the defendant, had quarrelled with him, and had consequently, it was alleged, the means of exposing officially his abuse of the public money. But the Sicilians rejected Cæcilius altogether, not merely as no match for Hortensius, but as foisted into the cause by the defendant or his advocate. By a technical process of the Roman law, called Divinatio, the judges, without hearing evidence, determined from the arguments of counsel alone who should be appointed prosecutor. They decided in Cicero's favor. The oration which Cicero delivered on this occasion was the Divinatio in Q. Cæcilium. The pretensions of Cæcilius were thus set aside. Yet hope did not forsake Verres and his friends. Evidence for the prosecution was to be collected in Sicily itself. Cicero was allowed one hundred and ten days for the purpose. Verres once again attempted to set up a sham prosecutor, who undertook to impeach him for his former extortions in Achaia, and to gather the evidence in one hundred and eight days. But the new prosecutor never went even so far as Brundisium in quest of evidence, and the design was abandoned. Instead of the one hundred and ten days allowed, Cicero, assisted by his cousin Lucius, completed his researches in fifty, and returned with a mass of evidence and a crowd of witnesses gathered from all parts of the island. Hortensius now grasped at his last chance of an acquittal, and it was not an unlikely one. Could the impeachment be put off to the next year, Verres was safe. Hortensius himself would then be consul, with Q. Metellus for his colleague, and M. Metellus would be prætor urbanus. For every firm and honest judge whom the upright M. Acilius Glabrio, then prætor urbanus, had named, a partial or venal substitute would be found. Glabrio himself would give place as quæstor or president of the court to M. Metellus, a partisan, if not a kinsman, of the defendant. It was already the month of July. The games to be exhibited by Cn. Pompey were fixed for the middle of August, and would occupy a fortnight; the Roman games would immediately succeed them, and thus forty days intervene between Cicero's charge and the reply of Hortensius, who again, by dexterous adjournments, would delay the proceedings until the games of Victory, and the commencement of the new year. Cicero therefore abandoned all thought of eloquence or display, and merely introducing his case in the first of the Verrine orations, rested all his hopes of success on the weight of testimony alone. Hortensius was quite unprepared with counter-evidence, and after the first day he abandoned the cause of Verres. Before the nine days occupied in hearing evidence were over, Verres quitted the city in despair, and was condemned in his absence. He retired to Marseilles, retaining so many of his treasures of art as to cause eventually his proscription by M. Antony in 43. Of the seven Verrine orations of Cicero, two only, the Divinatio and the Actio Prima, were spoken, while the remaining five were compiled from the depositions after the verdict. Cicero's own division of the impeachment is the following:

1. Preliminary { 1. In Q. Cæciliam or Divinatio.
2. Proœmium—Actio Prima—Statement of the Case.

These alone were spoken :

3. Orations founded on the Depositions. { 3. Verres's official life to B.C. 73.
4. Jurisdictio Siciliensis.
5. Oratio Frumentaria.
6. ——— De Signis.
7. ——— De Supplicis.

These were circulated as documents or manifestoes of the cause after the flight of Verres.

VERRUGO, a town of the Volsci in Latium, of uncertain site.

VERTICORDIA. Vid. VENUS.

VERTUMNUS or VORTUMNUS, is said to have been an Etruscan divinity, whose worship was introduced at Rome by an ancient Vulsinian colony occupying at first the Cælian Hill, and afterward the vicus Tuscus. The name is evidently connected with verto, and formed on the analogy of alumnus from alo, whence it must signify "the god who changes or metamorphoses himself." For this reason the Romans connected Vertumnus with all occurrences to which the verb verto applies, such as the change of seasons, purchase and sale, the return of rivers to their proper beds, &c. But, in reality, the god was connected only with the transformation of plants and their progress from blossom to fruit. Hence the story, that when Vertum-nus was in love with Pomona, he assumed all possible forms, until at last he gained his end by metamorphosing himself into a blooming youth. Gardeners accordingly offered to him the first produce of their gardens and garlands of budding flowers. The whole people celebrated a festival to Vertumnus on the 23d of August, under the name of the Vortumnalia, denoting the transition from the beautiful season of autumn to the less agreeable one. He had a temple in the vicus Tuscus, and a statue of him stood in the vicus Jugarius, near the altar of Ops. The story of the Etruscan origin seems to be sufficiently refuted by his genuine Roman name, and it is much more probable that the worship of Vertumnus was of Sabine origin. The importance of the worship of Vertumnus at Rome is evident from the fact that it was attended to by a special flamen (flamen Vortumnalis).

VERULÆ (Verulanus : now Veroli), a town of the Hernici in Latium, southeast of Aletrium, and north of Frusino, subsequently a Roman colony.

VERUS, L. AURELIUS, the colleague of M. Aurelius in the empire, A.D. 161–169. He was born in 130, and his original name was L. Ceionius Commodus. His father, L. Ceionius Commodus, was adopted by Hadrian in 136; and on the death of his father in 138, he was, in pursuance of the command of Hadrian, adopted, along with M. Aurelius, by M. Antoninus. On the death of Antoninus in 161, he succeeded to the empire along with M. Aurelius. The history of his reign is given under AURELIUS. Verus died suddenly at Altinum, in the country of the Veneti, toward the close of 169. He had been married to Lucilla, the daughter of his colleague.

VESËVUS. Vid. VESUVIUS.

VESONTIO (now Besançon), the chief town of the Sequani in Gallia Belgica, situated on the River Dubis (now Doubs), which flowed around the town, with the exception of a space of six hundred feet, on which stood a mountain, forming the citadel of the town, and connected with the latter by means of walls. Vesontio was an important place under the Romans, and still contains ruins of an aqueduct, a triumphal arch, and other Roman remains.

VESPASIANUS, T. FLAVIUS SABINUS, Roman emperor A.D. 70–79, was born in the Sabine country on the seventeenth of November, A.D. 9. His father was a man of mean condition, of Reate, in the country of the Sabini. His mother, Vespasia Polla, was the daughter of a præfectus castrorum, and the sister of a Roman senator. She was left a widow with two sons, Flavius Sabinus and Vespasian. Vespasian served as tribus militum in Thrace, and was quæstor in Crete and Cyrene. He was afterward ædile and prætor. About this time he took to wife Flavia Domitilla, the daughter of a Roman eques, by whom he had two sons, both of whom succeeded him. In the reign of Claudius he was sent into Germany as legatus legionis; and in 43 he held the same command in Britain, and reduced the Isle of Wight. He was consul in 51, and proconsul of Africa under Nero. He was at this time very poor, and was accused of getting money by dishonorable means. But he had a great military reputation, and he was liked by the soldiers. Nero afterward sent him to the East (66), to conduct the war against the Jews. His conduct of the Jewish war had raised his reputation, when the war broke out between Otho and Vitellius after the death of Galba. He was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria on the first of July, 69, and soon after all through the East. Vespasian came to Rome in the following year (70), leaving his son Titus to continue the war against the Jews. Titus took Jerusalem after a siege of five months; and a formidable insurrection of the Batavi, headed by Civilis, was put down about the same period. Vespasian, on his arrival at Rome, worked with great industry to restore order in the city and in the empire. He disbanded some of the mutinous soldiers of Vitellius, and maintained discipline among his own. He co-operated in a friendly manner with the senate in the public administration. The simplicity and frugality of his mode of life formed a striking contrast with the profusion and luxury of some of his predecessors, and his example is said to have done more to reform the morals of Rome than all the laws which had ever been enacted. He lived more like a private person than a man who possessed supreme power: he was affable and easy of access to all persons. The personal anecdotes of such a man are some of the most instructive records of his reign. He was never ashamed of the meanness of his origin, and ridiculed all attempts to make out for him a distinguished genealogy. When Vologeses, the Parthian king, addressed to him a letter commencing in these terms, "Arsaces, king of kings, to Flavius Vespasianus," the answer began, "Flavius Vespasianus to Arsaces, king of kings." If it be true, as it is recorded, that he was not annoyed at satire or ridicule, he exhibited an elevation of character almost unparalleled in one who filled so exalted a station. He knew the bad character of his son Domitian, and as long as he lived he kept him under proper restraint. The stories that are told of his avarice and of his modes of raising money, if true, detract from the dignity of his character; and it seems that he had a taste for little savings, and for coarse humor. Yet it is admitted that he was liberal in all his expenditure for purposes of public utility. In 71 Titus returned to Rome, and both father and son triumphed together on account of the conquest of the Jews. The reign of Vespasian was marked by few striking events. The most important was the conquest of North Wales and the island of Anglesey by Agricola, who was sent into Britain in 78. In the summer of 79, Vespasian, whose health was failing, went to spend some time at his paternal house in the mountains of the Sabini. By drinking to excess of cold water, he damaged his stomach, which was already disordered. But he still attended to business, just as if he had been in perfect health; and on feeling the approach of death, he said that an emperor should die standing; and, in fact, he did actually die in this posture, on the twenty-fourth of June, 79, being sixty-nine years of age.

identical with the Greek Ἥστια both in name and import. She was the goddess of the hearth, and therefore inseparably connected with the Penates; for Æneas was believed to have brought the eternal fire of Vesta from Troy along with the images of the Penates; and the prætors, consuls, and dictators, before entering upon their official functions, sacrificed, not only to the Penates, but also to Vesta at Lavinium. In the ancient Roman house, the hearth was the central part, and around it all the inmates daily assembled for their common meal (cæna); every meal thus taken was a fresh bond of union and affection among the members of a family, and at the same time an act of worship of Vesta, combined with a sacrifice to her; and the Penates. Every dwelling-house therefore was, in some sense, a temple of Vesta; but a public sanctuary united all the citizens of the state into one large family. This sanctuary stood in the Forum, between the Capitoline and Palatine hills, and not far from the temple of the Penates. The temple was round, with a vaulted roof, like the impluvium of private houses, so that there is no reason to regard that form as an imitation of the vault of heaven. The goddess was not represented in her temple by a statue, but the eternal fire burning on her hearth or altar was her living symbol, and was kept up and attended to by the Vestals, her virgin priestesses. As each house, and the city itself, so also the country had its own Vesta, and the latter was worshipped at Lavinium, the metropolis of the Latins, where she was worshipped and received the regular sacrifices at the hands of the highest magistrates. The goddess herself was regarded as chaste and pure, like her symbol, the fire; and the Vestals who kept up the sacred fire were likewise pure maidens. Respecting their duties and obligations, vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. VESTALES. On the first of March in every year, her sacred fire, and the laurel-tree which shaded her hearth, were renewed, and on the fifteenth of June her temple was cleaned and purified. The dirt was carried into an angiportus behind the temple, which was locked by a gate that no one might enter it. The day on which this took place was a dies nefastus, the first half of which was thought to be so inauspicious, that the priestess of Juno was not allowed to comb her hair or to cut her nails, while the second half was very favorable to contracting a marriage or entering upon other important undertakings. A few days before that solemnity, on the ninth of June, the Vestalia was celebrated in honor of the goddess, on which occasion none but women walked to the temple, and that with bare feet. On one of these occasions an altar had been dedicated to Jupiter Pistor. Respecting the Greek goddess, vid. HESTIA.

VESTINI, a Sabellian people in Central Italy, lying between the Apennines and the Adriatic Sea, and separated from Picenum by the River Matrinus, and from the Marrucini by the River Aternus. They are mentioned in connection with the Marsi, Marrucini, and Peligni; but they subsequently separated from these tribes, and joined the Samnites in their war against Rome. They were conquered by the Romans B.C. 328, and from this time appear as the allies of Rome. They joined the other allies in the Marsic war, and were conquered by Pompeius Strabo in 89. They made a particular kind of cheese, which was a great favorite with the Romans.

VESŪLUS. Vid. ALPES.

VESŪVIUS, also called VĒSĒVUS, VĒSĪUS, or VĒSVIUS, the celebrated volcanic mountain in Campania, rising out of the plain southeast of Neapolis. There are no records of any eruption of Vesuvius before the Christian era, but the ancient writers were aware of its volcanic nature from the igneous appearance of its rocks. The slopes of the mountain were extremely fertile, but the top was a rough and sterile plain, on which Spartacus and his gladiators were besieged by a Roman army. In A.D. 63 the volcano gave the first symptoms of agitation in an earthquake, which occasioned considerable damage to several towns in its vicinity; and on the 24th of August, A.D. 79, occurred the first great eruption of Vesuvius, which overwhelmed the cities of Stabie, Herculaneum, and Pompeii. It was in this eruption that the elder Pliny lost his life. Vid. PLINIUS. There have been numerous eruptions since that time, which have greatly altered the shape of the mountain. Its present height is three thousand two hundred feet.

VĒTĒRA OF CASTRA VETERA. Vid. CASTRA, No. 5.

VĒTRANŌ, commanded the legions in Illyria and Pannonia at the period (A.D. 350) when Constans was treacherously destroyed and his throne seized by Magnentius. Vetrano was proclaimed emperor by his troops; but at the end of ten months he resigned his pretensions in favor of Constantius, by whom he was treated with great kindness, and permitted to retire to Prusa, in Bithynia, where he passed the remaining six years of his life.

VĒTTIUS, L., a Roman eques, in the pay of Cicero in B.C. 63, to whom he gave some valuable information respecting the Catilinarian conspiracy. He again appears in 59 as an informer. In that year he accused Curio, Cicero, L. Lucullus, and many other distinguished men, of having formed a conspiracy to assassinate Pompey. This conspiracy was a sheer invention for the purpose of injuring Cicero, Curio, and others; but there is difficulty in determining who were the inventors of it. Cicero regarded it as the work of Cæsar, who used the tribuno Vatinius as his instrument. At a later period, when Cicero had returned from exile, and feared to provoke the triumvir, he threw the whole blame upon Vatinius. Vettius gave evidence first before the senate, and on the next day before the assembly of the people; but his statements were regarded with great suspicion, and on the following morning he was found strangled in prison, to which the senate had sent him. It was given out that he had committed suicide; but the marks of violence were visible on his body, and Cicero at a later time charged Vatinius with the murder.

VĒTTŌNES OF VĒCTŌNES, a people in the interior of Lusitania, east of the Lusitani and west of the Carpetani, extending from the Durus to the Tagus.

VĒTULŌNĪA, VĒTULŌNĪUM, or VĒTULŌNĪ, an ancient city of Etruria, and one of the twelve cities of the Etruscan confederation. From this city the Romans are said to have borrowed the insignia of their magistrates—the fasces, sella eurlis, and toga prætexta—as well as the use of the brazen trumpet in war. After the time of the Roman kings we find no further mention of Vetulonia, except in the catalogues of Pliny and Ptolemy, both of whom place it among the inland colonies of Etruria. Pliny also states that there were hot springs in its neighborhood not far from the sea, in which fish were found, notwithstanding the warmth of the water. The very site of the ancient city was supposed to have been entirely lost; but it has been discovered within the last few years near a small village called Magliano, between the River Osa and the Albegna, and about eight miles inland. It appears to have had a circuit of at least four and a half miles.

VĒTURĪA GENS, anciently called VĒTUSĪA, patrician and plebeian. The Veturii rarely occur in the later times of the republic, and after B.C. 206, when L. Veturius Philo was consul, their name disappears from the Fasti. The most distinguished families in the gens bore the names CALVINUS, CICURINUS, and PHILO.

VĒTURĪUS MAMURĪUS is said to have been the armorer who made the eleven ancilia exactly like the one that was sent from heaven in the reign of Numa. His praises formed one of the chief subjects of the songs of the Salii. Even the ancients themselves doubted in the reality of his existence: Varro interpreted his name as equivalent to velus memoria. Some modern writers regard Mamurius Veturius as an Etruscan artist, because he is said to have made a brazen image of the god Vertumnus.

VĒTUS, ANTISTIVS. 1. Proprætor in Further Spain about B.C. 68, under whom Cæsar served as quæstor.—2. C., son of the preceding, quæstor in 61, and tribune of the plebs in 57, when he supported Cicero in opposition to Clodius. In the Civil war he espoused Cæsar's party, and we find him in Syria in 45 fighting against Q. Cæcilius Bassus. In 34 Vetus carried on war against the Salassi, and in 30 was consul suffectus. He accompanied Augustus to Spain in 25, and on the illness of the emperor continued the war against the Cantabri and Astures, whom he reduced to submission.—3. C., son of No. 2, consul B.C. 6; and as he lived to see both his sons consuls, he must have been alive at least as late as A.D. 28. He was a friend of Velleius Paterculus.—4. L., grandson of No. 3, and consul with the Emperor Nero, A.D. 55. In 58 he commanded a Roman army in Germany, and formed the project of connecting the Mosella (now Moselle) and the Arar (now Saone) by a canal, and thus forming a communication between the Mediterranean and the Northern Ocean, as troops could be conveyed down the Rhone and the Saone into the Moselle through the canal, and down the Moselle into the Rhine, and so into the ocean. Vetus put an end to his life in 65, in order to anticipate his sentence of death, which Nero had resolved upon. Vetus was the father-in-law of Rubellius Plautus.

VIADUS (now Oder), a river of Germany, falling into the Baltic.

VIBO (Vibonensis: now Bivona), the Roman form of the Greek town HIΠPŌNIUM (Ἰππώνιον: Ἰππωνιάτης), situated on the southwestern coast of Bruttium, and on a gulf called after it SINUS VIBONENSIS or HIPPONIATES. It is said to have been founded by the Locri Epizephyrii; but it was destroyed by the elder Dionysius, who transplanted its inhabitants to Syracuse. It was afterward restored; and at a later time it fell into the hands of the Bruttii, together with the other Greek cities on this coast. It was taken from the Bruttii by the Romans, who colonized it B.C. 194, and called it VIBO VALENTIA. Cicero speaks of it as a municipium; and in the time of Augustus it was one of the most flourishing cities in the south of Italy.

VIBULANUS, the name of the most ancient family of the FABIA GENS. It was so powerful in the early times of the republic that three brothers of the family held the consulship for seven years in succession, B.C. 485-479. The last person of the gens who bore this surname was Q. Fabius Vibulanus, consul 412. This Vibulanus assumed the agnomen of Ambustus; and his descendants dropped the name of Vibulanus and took that of Ambustus in its place. In the same way Ambustus was after a time supplanted by that of Maximus.—1. Q. FABIVS VIBULANUS, consul 485, when he carried on war with success against the Volsci and Æqui, and consul a second time in 482. In 480 he fought under his brother Marcus (No. 3) against the Etruscans, and was killed in battle.—2. K., brother of the preceding, was quæstor parricidii in 485, and along with his colleague L. Valerius accused Sp. Cassius Viscellinus, who was, in consequence, condemned by the votes of the populus. He was consul in 484, when he took an active part in opposing the agrarian law, which the tribunes of the people attempted to bring forward. In 481 he was consul a second time, and in 479 a third time, when he espoused the cause of the plebeians, to whom he had become reconciled. As his propositions were rejected with scorn by the patricians, he and his house resolved to quit Rome altogether, where they were regarded as apostates by their own order. They determined to find a settlement on the banks of the Cremera, a small stream that falls into the Tiber a few miles above Rome. According to the legend, the consul Kæso went before the senate, and said that the Fabii were willing to carry on the war against the Veientes alone and at their own cost. Their offer was joyfully accepted, for the patricians were glad to see them expose themselves voluntarily to such dangers. On the day after Kæso had made the proposal to the senate, three hundred and six Fabii, all patricians of one gens, assembled on the Quirinal at the house of Kæso, and from thence marched with the consul at their head through the Carmental gate. They proceeded straight to the banks of the Cremera, where they erected a fortress. Here they took up their abode along with their families and clients, and for two years continued to devastate the territory of Veii. They were at length destroyed by the Veientes in 477. Ovid says that the Fabii perished on the Ides of February; but all other authorities state that they were destroyed on the day on which the Romans were subsequently conquered by the Gauls at the Allia, that is, on the 15th before the Kalends of Sextilis, June the 17th. The whole Fabia gens perished at the Cremera with the exception of one individual, the son of Marcus, from whom all the later Fabii were descended.—3. M., brother of the two preceding, was consul 483, and a second time 480. In the latter year he gained a great victory over the Etruscans, in which, however, his colleague the consul Cincinnatus and his brother Q. Fabius were killed.—4. Q., son of No. 3, is said to have been the only one of the Fabii who survived the destruction of his gens at the Cremera, but he could not have been left behind at Rome on account of his youth, as the legend relates, since he was consul ten years afterward. He was consul 467, a second time in 465, and a third time in 459. Fabius was a member of the second decemvirate (450), and went into exile on the deposition of the decemvirs.

VIBULLIUS RUFUS, L., a senator and a friend of Pompey, who made him præfectus fabrum in the Civil war. He was taken prisoner by Cæsar at Corfinium (49), and a second time in Spain later in the year. When Cæsar landed in Greece in 48, he dispatched Vibullius to Pompey with offers of peace. Vibullius made the greatest haste to reach Pompey, in order to give him the earliest intelligence of the arrival of his enemy in Greece.

VICENTIA or VICETIA, less correctly VINCENTIA (Vicentinus: now Vicenza), a town in Venetia, in the north of Italy, and a Roman municipium on the River Togisonus.

VICTOR, SEX. AURELIUS, a Latin writer, flourished in the middle of the fourth century under the Emperor Constantius and his successors. He was born of humble parents, but rose to distinction by his zeal in the cultivation of literature. Having attracted the attention of Julian when at Sirmium, he was appointed by that prince governor of one division of Pannonia. At a subsequent period, he was elevated by Theodosius to the high office of city præfect, and he is perhaps the same as the Sex. Aurelius Victor who was consul along with Valentinian in A.D. 373. The following works, which present in a very compressed form a continuous record of Roman affairs, from the fabulous ages down to the death of the Emperor Theodosius, have all been ascribed to this writer; but the evidence upon which the determination of authorship depends is very slender, and in all probability the third alone belongs to the Sex. Aurelius Victor whom we have noticed above: 1. Origo Gentis Romanæ, in twenty-three chapters, containing the annals of the Roman race, from Janus and Saturnus down to the era of Romulus. It is probably a production of some of the later grammarians, who were desirous of prefixing a suitable introduction to the series. 2. De Viris illustribus Urbis Romæ, in eighty-six chapters, commencing with the birth of Romulus and Remus, and concluding with the death of Cleopatra. 3. De Cæsariibus, in forty-two chapters, exhibiting short biographies of the emperors from Augustus to Constantius. 4. Epitome de Caesaribus, in forty-eight chapters, commencing with Augustus and concluding with Theodosius. These lives agree for the most part almost word for word with the preceding, but variations may here and there be detected. Moreover, the first series terminates with Constantius, but the second comes down as low as Areadius and Honorius. The best edition of these four pieces is by Arntzenius, Amst. et Traj. Bat., 1733, 4to.

VICTOR, PUBLIUS, the name prefixed to an enumeration of the principal buildings and monuments of ancient Rome, distributed according to the regions of Augustus, which has generally been respected as a work of great authority by Italian antiquaries. The best modern scholars, however, are agreed that this work, and a similar production ascribed to Sextus Rufus, can not be received in their present state as ancient at all, but must be regarded as mere pieces of patch-work, fabricated not earlier than the fifteenth century.

VICTORIA, the personification of victory among the Romans. It is said that Evander, by the command of Minerva, dedicated on Mount Palatine a temple of Victoria, the daughter of Pallas. On the site of this ancient temple a new one was built by L. Postumius during the war with the Samnites, and M. Porcius Cato added to it a chapel of Victoria Virgo. In later times there existed three or four sanctuaries of Victory at Rome. Respecting the Greek goddess of Victory, vid. Nice.

VICTORIA or VICTORINA, the mother of Victorinus, after whose death she was hailed as the mother of camps (Mater Castrorum); and coins were struck bearing her effigy. Feeling unequal to the weight of empire, she transferred her power first to Marius, and then to Tetricus, by whom some say that she was slain, while others affirm that she died a natural death.

VICTORINUS. 1. One of the Thirty Tyrants, was the third of the usurpers who in succession ruled Gaul during the reign of Gallienus. He was assassinated at Colonia Agrippina by one of his own officers in A.D. 268, after reigning somewhat more than a year.—2. Bishop of Pettaw, on the Drave, in Styria, hence distinguished by the epithet Petavionensis or Pictaviensis, flourished A.D. 270–290, and suffered martyrdom during the persecution of Diocletian, probably in 303. He wrote commentaries on the Scriptures, but all his works are lost.—3. C. MARIUS VICTORINUS, surnamed Afer from the country of his birth, taught rhetoric at Rome in the middle of the fourth century with so much reputation that his statue was erected in the Forum of Trajan. In his old age he professed Christianity; and when the edict of Julian, prohibiting Christians from giving instruction in polite literature, was promulgated, Victorinus chose to shut up his school rather than deny his religion. Besides his commentaries on the Scriptures, and other theological works, many of which are extant, Victorinus wrote, 1. Commentarius s. Expositio in Ciceronis libros de Inventione, the best edition of which is in the fifth volume of Orelli's edition of Cicero. 2. Ars Grammatica de Orthographia et Ratione Metrorum, a complete and voluminous treatise upon metres, in four books, printed in the Grammatica Latina Auctores Antiqui of Putsehius, Hannov., 1605, [and in the Scriptores Lat. Rei Metr. by Gaisford, Oxford, 1837.] The fame enjoyed by Victorinus as a public instructor does not gain any accession from his works. The exposition of the De Inventione is more difficult to comprehend than the text which it professes to explain.—4. MAXIMUS VICTORINUS. We possess three short tracts: 1. De Re Grammatica; 2. De Carmine Heroico; 3. De Ratione Metrorum; all apparently the work of the same author, and usually ascribed in MSS. to a Maximus Victorinus; but whether we ought to consider him the same with the rhetorician who flourished under Constantius, or as an independent personage, it is impossible to decide. They were printed in the collection of Putsehius, Hannov., 1605, and in that of Lindemann, Lips., 1831.

VIENNA (Viennensis: now Vienne), the chief town of the Allobroges in Gallia Lugdunensis, situated on the Rhone, south of Lugdunum. It was subsequently a Roman colony, and a wealthy and flourishing town. Under the later emperors it was the capital of the province, called after it Gallia Viennensis. The modern town contains several Roman remains, of which the most important is a temple, supposed to have been dedicated to Augustus, and now converted into a museum.

VINCENTIUS, surnamed LIRINENSIS, from the monastery in the island of Lerins, where he officiated as a presbyter. He was by birth a native of Gaul, and died in the reign of Theodosius and Valentinian, about A.D. 450. His fame rests upon a treatise against heretics, composed in 434. It commonly bears the title Commenitorium pro Catholica fidei antiquitate et universitate adversus profanas omnium Hæreticorum novitates. The standard edition is that of Baluzius, Svo, Paris, 1663, 1669, 1684.

VINDALUM, a town of the Cavares in Gallia Narbonensis, situated at the confluence of the Sulgas and the Rhone.

VINDELICIA, a Roman province south of the Danube, bounded on the north by the Danube which separated it from Germany, on the west, by the territory of the Helvetii in Gaul, on the south by Rætia, and on the east by the River Enus (now Inn), which separated it from Noricum, thus corresponding to the northeastern part of Switzerland, the southeast of Baden, the south of Würtemberg and Bavaria, and the northern part of the Tyrol. It was originally part of the province of Rætia, and was conquered by Tiberius in the reign of Augustus. At a later time Rætia was divided into two provinces, Rætia Prima and Rætia Secunda, the latter of which names was gradually supplanted by that of Vindlicia. It was drained by the tributaries of the Danube, of which the most important were the Licias or Licus (now Lech), with its tributary the Vindo, Vinda, or Virdo (now Wertach), the Isarus (now Isar), and Cenus (now Inn). The eastern part of the Lacus Brigantinus (now Lake of Constance) also belonged to Vindelicia. The greater part of Vindelicia was a plain, but the southern portion was occupied by the northern slopes of the Alpes Ræticeæ. It derived its name from its chief inhabitants, the VINDELICI, a warlike people dwelling in the south of the country. Their name is said to have been formed from the two rivers Vindó and Licus; but it is more likely connected with the Celtic word Vind, which is found in the names Vindobona, Vindomagus, Vindonissa, &c. The Vindelici were a Celtic people, and were closely connected with the Ræti, with whom they are frequently spoken of by the ancient writers, and along with whom they were subdued by Tiberius, as is mentioned above. The other tribes in Vindelicia were the Brigantii on the Lake of Constance, the Licatii or Licates on the Lech, and the Breuni in the north of Tyrol, on the Brenner. The chief town in the province was Augusta Vindelicorum (now Augsburg), at the confluence of Vindo and the Licus, which was made a Roman colony A.D. 14, and was the residence of the governor of the province. This town, together with the other towns of Vindelicia, fell into the hands of the Alemanni in the fourth century, and from this time the population of the country appears to have been entirely Germanized.

VINDEX, C. JULIUS, proprætor of Gallia Cæltica in the reign of Nero, was the first of the Roman governors who disowned the authority of Nero (A.D. 68). He did not, however, aspire to the empire himself, but offered it to Galba. Virginius Rufus, the governor of Upper Germany, marched with his army against Vindex. The two generals had a conference before Vesontio (now Besançon), in which they appear to have come to some agreement; but as Vindex was going to enter the town, he was attacked by the soldiers of Virginius, and put an end to his own life.

[VINDECIANUS, an eminent physician in the time of Valentinian, A.D. 364-375: there are extant a letter addressed by him to the emperor, and a poem on the medical art usually ascribed to him, though others assign it to Marcellus Empiricus. The poem is appended to several editions of Celsus, and is contained also in Burmann's Poeta Latini Minores.]

VINDICIUS, a slave, who is said to have given information to the consuls of the conspiracy which was formed for the restoration of the Tarquins, and who was rewarded in consequence with liberty and the Roman franchise. He is said to have been the first slave manumitted by the Vindicta, the name of which was derived by some persons from that of the slave; but it is unnecessary to point out the absurdity of this etymology.

VINDILIS (now Belle Isle), one of the islands of the Veneti, off the northwestern coast of Gaul.

VINDIUS or VINNIUS, a mountain in the northwest of Hispania Tarraconensis, forming the boundary between the Cantabri and Astures.

VINDOBONA (now Vienna, English; Wien, German), a town in Pannonia, on the Danube, was originally a Celtic place, and subsequently a Roman municipium. Under the Romans it became a town of importance; it was the chief station of the Roman fleet on the Danube, and the head quarters of a Roman legion. It was taken and plundered by Attila, but continued to be a flourishing town under the Lombards. It was here that the Emperor M. Aurelius died, A.D. 180.

VINDONISSA (now Windisch), a town in Gallia Belgica, on the triangular tongue of land between the Aar and Reuss, was an important Roman fortress in the country of the Helvetii. Several Roman remains have been discovered on the site of the ancient town; and the foundations of walls, the traces of an amphitheatre, and a subterranean aqueduct are still to be seen.

VINDICIANUS, M. CÆLIUS, tribune of the plebs B.C. 53, exerted himself to raise Pompey to the dictatorship, and was, in consequence, defeated when he became a candidate for the curule ædileship in B.C. 51. In the Civil war he espoused the cause of Cæsar, who left him in Pontus with two legions after the conquest of Pharnaces in B.C. 48.]

[VINICIUS or VINUCIUS. 1. L., tribune of the plebs B.C. 51, put his veto on a senatusconsultum, directed against Cæsar: perhaps the same Vinicius as the one who was consul suffectus in B.C. 33.—2. M., born at Cales, in Campania, was consul with C. Cassius Longinus in A.D. 30, in which year Paternulus dedicated his work to him. Vid. PATERCULUS. In A.D. 33 Tiberius gave Julia Livilla, daughter of Germanicus, in marriage to Vinicius; he was consul a second time in the reign of Claudius, A.D. 45; though in the following year he was put to death by Messalina, to whom he had become an object of suspicion, and whose advances he had repulsed.]

VINIUS, T., consul in A.D. 69 with the Emperor Galba, and one of the chief advisers of the latter during his brief reign. He recommended Galba to choose Otho as his successor, but he was, notwithstanding, killed by Otho's soldiers after the death of Galba.

VIPSANIA AGRIPPINA. 1. Daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa by his first wife Pomponia, the daughter of T. Pomponius Atticus, the friend of Cicero. Augustus gave her in marriage to his step-son Tiberius, by whom she was much beloved; but after she had borne him a son, Drusus, Tiberius was compelled to divorce her by the command of the emperor, in order to marry Julia, the daughter of the latter. Vipsania afterward married Asinius Gallus. She died in A.D. 20.—2. Daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa by his second wife Julia, better known by the name of Agrippina. Vid. AGRIPPINA.

VIPSANIUS AGRIPPA, M. Vid. AGRIPPA.

VIRBIUS, a Latin divinity worshipped along with Diana in the grove at Aricia, at the foot of the Alban Mount. He is said to have been the same as Hippolytus, who was restored to life by Æsculapius at the request of Diana. He was placed by this goddess under the care of the nymph Aricia, and received the name of Virbius. By this nymph he became the father of a son, who was also called Virbius, and whom his mother sent to the assistance of Turnus against Æneas.

[VIRGILIANUS, Q. FABIVS, the legatus of Ap-pius Claudius Pulcher in Cilicia in B.C. 51. He espoused the cause of Pompey on the breaking out of the Civil war in B.C. 49.]

VIRGILIUS OF VERGILIUS MARO, P., the Roman poet, was born on the 15th of October, B.C. 70, at Andes (now Pietola), a small village near Mantua, in Cisalpine Gaul. Virgil's father probably had a small estate which he cultivated: his mother's name was Maia. He was educated at Cremona and Mediolanum (now Milan), and he took the toga virilis at Cremona on the day on which he commenced his sixteenth year, in 55. It is said that he subsequently studied at Neapolis (now Naples), under Parthenius, a native of Bithynia, from whom he learned Greek. He was also instructed by Syron, an Epicurean, and probably at Rome. Virgil's writings prove that he received a learned education, and traces of Epicurean opinions are apparent in them. The health of Virgil was always feeble, and there is no evidence of his attempting to rise by those means by which a Roman gained distinction, oratory and the practice of arms. After completing his education, Virgil appears to have retired to his paternal farm, and here he may have written some of the small pieces which are attributed to him, the Culex, Ciris, Moretum, and others. After the battle of Philippi (42) Octavianus assigned to his soldiers lands in various parts of Italy; and the neighborhood of Cremona and Mantua was one of the districts in which the soldiers were planted, and from which the former possessors were dislodged. Virgil was thus deprived of his property. It is said that it was seized by a veteran named Claudius or Clodius, and that Asinius Pollio, who was then governor of Gallia Transpadana, advised Virgil to apply to Octavianus at Rome for the restitution of his land, and Octavianus granted his request. It is supposed that Virgil wrote the Eclogue which stands first in our editions to commemorate his gratitude to Octavianus. Virgil became acquainted with Mæcenas before Horace was, and Horace (Sat., i., 5, and 6, 55, &c.) was introduced to Mæcenas by Virgil. Whether this introduction was in 41 or a little later, is uncertain; but we may perhaps conclude, from the name of Mæcenas not being mentioned in the Eclogues of Virgil, that he himself was not on those intimate terms with Mæcenas which ripened into friendship until after they were written. Horace, in one of his Satires (Sat., i., 5), in which he describes the journey from Rome to Brundisium, mentions Virgil as one of the party, and in language which shows that they were then in the closest intimacy. The most finished work of Virgil, his Georgica, an agricultural poem, was undertaken at the suggestion of Mæcenas (Georg., iii., 41). The concluding lines of the Georgica were written at Naples (Georg., iv., 559), and the poem was completed after the battle of Actium, B.C. 31, while Octavianus was in the East. (Compare Georg., iv., 560, and ii., 171.) His Eclogues had all been completed, and probably before the Georgica were begun (Georg., iv., 565). The epic poem of Virgil, the Æneid, was probably long contemplated by the poet. While Augustus was in Spain (27), he wrote to Virgil to express his wish to have some monument of his poetical talent. Virgil appears to have commenced the Æneid about this time. In 23 died Marcellus, the son of Octavia, Cæsar's sister, by her first husband; and as Virgil lost no opportunity of gratifying his patron, he introduced into his sixth book of the Æneid (883) the well-known allusion to the virtues of this youth, who was cut off by a premature death. Octavia is said to have been present when the poet was reciting this allusion to her son, and to have fainted from her emotions. She rewarded the poet munificently for his excusable flattery. As Marcellus did not die till 23, these lines were of course written after his death, but that does not prove that the whole of the sixth book was written so late. A passage in the seventh book (606) appears to allude to Augustus receiving back the Parthian standards, which event belongs to 20. When Augustus was returning from Samos, where he had spent the winter of 20, he met Virgil at Athens. The poet, it is said, had intended to make a tour of Greece, but he accompanied the emperor to Megara and thence to Italy. His health, which had been long declining, was now completely broken, and he died soon after his arrival at Brundisium on the twenty-second of September, 19, not having quite completed his fifty-first year. His remains were transferred to Naples, which had been his favorite residence, and placed on the road from Naples to Puteoli (now Pozzuoli), where a monument is still shown, supposed to be the tomb of the poet. The inscription said to have been placed on the tomb,

"Mantua me genuit, Calabri rapuere, tenet nunc Parthenope. Cecini pascua, rura, duces,"

we can not suppose to have been written by the poet. Virgil named, as heredes in his testament, his half-brother Valerius Proculus, to whom he left one half of his property, and also Augustus, Mæcenas, L. Varius, and Plotius Tucca. It is said that in his last illness he wished to burn the Æneid, to which he had not given the finishing touches, but his friends would not allow him. Whatever he may have wished to be done with the Æneid, it was preserved and published by his friends Varius and Tucca. The poet had been enriched by the liberality of his patrons, and he left behind him a considerable property, and a house on the Esquiline Hill, near the gardens of Mæcenas. He used his wealth liberally, and his library, which was doubtless a good one, was easy of access. He used to send his parents money every year. His father, who became blind, did not die before his son had attained a mature age. Two brothers of Virgil also died before him. In his fortunes and his friends Virgil was a happy man. Munificent patronage gave him ample means of enjoyment and of leisure, and he had the friendship of all the most accomplished men of the day, among whom Horace entertained a strong affection for him. He was an amiable, good-tempered man, free from the mean passions of envy and jealmany : and in all but health he was prosperous. His fame, which was established in his life-time, was cherished after his death, as an inheritance in which every Roman had a share; and his works became school-books even before the death of Augustus, and continued such for centuries after. The learned poems of Virgil soon gave employment to commentators and critics. Aulus Gellius has numerous remarks on Virgil, and Macrobius, in his Saturnalia, has filled four books (iii.-vi.) with his critical remarks on Virgil's poems. One of the most valuable commentaries on Virgil, in which a great amount of curious and instructive matter has been preserved, is that of Servius. Vid. SERVIVS. Virgil is one of the most difficult of the Latin authors, not so much for the form of the expression, though that is sometimes ambiguous enough, but from the great variety of knowledge that is required to attain his meaning in all its fullness. Virgil was the great poet of the Middle Ages too. To him Dante paid the homage of his superior genius, and owned him for his master and his model. Among the vulgar he had the reputation of a conjurer, a necromancer, a worker of miracles: it is the fate of a great name to be embalmed in fable. The ten short poems called Bucolica were the earliest works of Virgil, and probably all written between 41 and 37. These Bucolica are not Bucolica in the same sense as the poems of Theocritus, which have the same title. They have all a Bucolic form and coloring, but some of them have nothing more. They are also called Eclogæ or Selections, but this name may not have originated with the poet. Their merit consists in their versification, which was smoother and more polished than the hexameters which the Romans had yet seen, and in many natural and simple touches. But as an attempt to transfer the Syracusan muse into Italy, they are certainly a failure, and we read the pastorals of Theocritus and of Virgil with a very different degree of pleasure. The fourth Eclogue, entitled Pollio, which may have been written in 40, after the peace of Brundisium, has nothing of the pastoral character about it. It is allegorical, mystical, half historical and prophetic, enigmatical—any thing, in fact, but Bucolic. The first Eclogue is Bucolic in form and in treatment, with an historical basis. The second Eclogue, the Alexis, is an amatory poem, with a Bucolic coloring, which, indeed, is the characteristic of all Virgil's Eclogues, whatever they may be in substance. The third, the fifth, the seventh, and the ninth are more clearly modelled on the form of the poems of his Sicilian prototype; and the eighth, the Pharmaceutria, is a direct imitation of the original Greek. The tenth, entitled Gallus, perhaps written the last of all, is a love poem, which, if written in elegiac verse, would be more appropriately called an elegy than a Bucolic. The Georgica, or "Agricultural Poem," in four books, is a didactic poem, which Virgil dedicated to his patron Mæcenas. He treats of the cultivation of the soil in the first book, of fruit-trees in the second, of horses and other cattle in the third, and of bees in the fourth. In this poem Virgil shows a great improvement both in his taste and in his versification. Neither in the Georgics nor elsewhere has Virgil the merit of striking originality; his chief merit consists in the skillful handling of borrowed materials. His subject, which was by no means promising, he treated in a manner both instructive and pleasing; for he has given many useful remarks on agriculture, and diversified the dryness of didactic poetry by numerous allusions and apt embellishments, and some occasional digressions without wandering too far from his main matter. In the first book he enumerates the subjects of his poem, among which is the treatment of bees; yet the management of bees seems but meagre material for one fourth of the whole poem, and the author accordingly had to complete the fourth book with matter somewhat extraneous—the long story of Aristæus. The Georgica is the most finished specimen of the Latin hexameter which we have; and the rude vigor of Lucretius and the antiquated rudeness of Ennius are here replaced by a versification which in its kind can not be surpassed. The Georgica are also the most original poem of Virgil, for he found little in the Works and Days of Hesiod that could furnish him with hints for the treatment of his subject, and we are not aware that there was any work which he could exactly follow as a whole. For numerous single lines he was indebted to his extensive reading of the Greek poets. The Æneid, or adventures of Æneas after the fall of Troy, is an epic poem on the model of the Homeric poems. It was founded upon an old Roman tradition that Æneas and his Trojans settled in Italy, and were the founders of the Roman name. In the first book we have the story of Æneas being driven by a storm on the coast of Africa, and being hospitably received by Dido, queen of Carthage, to whom he relates in the episode of the second and third books the fall of Troy and his wanderings. In the fourth book the poet has elaborated the story of the attachment of Dido and Æneas, the departure of Æneas in obedience to the will of the gods, and the suicide of the Carthaginian queen. The fifth book contains the visit to Sicily, and the sixth the landing of Æneas at Cumæ in Italy, and his descent to the infernal regions, where he sees his father Anchises, and has a prophetic vision of the glorious destinies of his race and of the future heroes of Rome. In the first six books the adventures of Ulysses in the Odyssey are the model, and these books contain more variety of incident and situation than those which follow. The critics have discovered an anachronism in the visit of Æneas to Carthage, which is supposed not to have been founded until two centuries after the fall of Troy, but this is a matter which we may leave without discussion, or admit without allowing it to be a poetical defect. The last six books, the history of the struggles of Æneas in Italy, are founded on the model of the battles of the Iliad. Latinus, the king of the Latini, offers the Trojan hero his daughter Lavinia in marriage, who had been betrothed to Turnus, the warlike king of the Rutuli. The contest is ended by the death of Turnus, who falls by the hand of Æneas. The fortunes of Æneas and his final settlement in Italy are the subject of the Æneid, but the glories of Rome and of the Julian house, to which Augustus belonged, are

Indirectly the poet's theme. In the first book the foundation of Alba Longa is promised by Jupiter to Venus (Æneid, i., 254), and the transfer of empire from Alba to Rome; from the line of Æneas will descend the "Trojan Cæsar," whose empire will only be limited by the ocean, and whose glory by the heavens. The future rivalry between Rome and Carthage, and the ultimate triumphs of Rome are predicted. The poems abound in allusions to the history of Rome; and the aim of the poet to confirm and embellish the popular tradition of the Trojan origin of the Roman state, and the descent of the Julii from Venus, is apparent all through the poem. It is objected to the Æneid that it has not the unity of construction either of the Iliad or of the Odyssey, and that it is deficient in that antique simplicity which characterizes these two poems. Æneas, the hero, is an insipid kind of personage, and a much superior interest is excited by the savage Mezentius, and also by Turnus, the unfortunate rival of Æneas. Virgil imitated other poets besides Homer, and he has occasionally borrowed from them, especially from Apollonius of Rhodes. If Virgil's subject was difficult to invest with interest, that is his apology; but it can not be denied that many parts of his poem are successfully elaborated, and that particular scenes and incidents are treated with true poetic spirit. The historical coloring which pervades it, and the great amount of antiquarian learning which he has scattered through it, makè the Æneid a study for the historian of Rome. Virgil's good sense and taste are always conspicuous, and make up for the defect of originality. As a whole, the Æneid leaves no strong impression, which arises from the fact that it is not really a national poem, like the Iliad or the Odyssey, the monument of an age of which we have no other literary monument; it is a learned poem, the production of an age in which it does not appear as an embodiment of the national feeling, but as a monument of the talent and industry of an individual. Virgil has the merit of being the best of the Roman epic poets, superior both to Ennius who preceded him, and on whom he levied contributions, and to Lucan, Silius Italicus, and Valerius Flaccus, who belong to a later age. The passion for rhetorical display, which characterizes all the literature of Rome, is much less offensive in Virgil than in those who followed him in the line of epic poetry. The larger editions of Virgil contain some short poems, which are attributed to him, and may have been among his earlier works. The Culex, or Gnat, is a kind of Bucolic poem, in four hundred and thirteen hexameters, often very obscure; the Ciris, or the mythus of Scylla, the daughter of Nisus, king of Megara, in five hundred and forty-one hexameters, has been attributed to Cornelius Gallus and others; the Moretum, in one hundred and twenty-three verses, the name of a compound mess, is a poem in hexameters, on the daily labor of a cultivator, but it contains only the description of the labors of the first part of the day, which consist in preparing the Moretum; the Copa, in elegiac verse, is an invitation by a female tavern-keeper or servant attached to a Caupona, to passengers to come in and enjoy themselves. There are also fourteen short pieces in various metres, classed under the general name of Catallecta. That addressed "Ad Venerem" shows that the writer, whoever he was, had a talent for elegiac poetry. Of the numerous editions of Virgil, the best are by Burmann, Amsterdam, 1746, 4 vols. 4to; by Heyne, 1767-1775, Lips., 4 vols. 8vo, of which the fourth edition contains important improvements by Wagner, Lips., 1830, 5 vols. 8vo; and by Forbiger, Lips., 1845-1846, 3 vols. 8vo (second edition).

[VIRGILIUS, C., prætor B.C. 62, had Q. Cicero as one of his colleagues. Next year, B.C. 61, he governed Sicily as proprætor, where P. Clodius served under him as quæstor. He was still in Sicily in B.C. 58, when Cicero was banished, and refused to allow the latter refuge in his province. In the Civil war Virgilius espoused the cause of Pompey, and had the command of Thapsus, together with a fleet, in B.C. 46. After the battle of Thapsus, Virgilius at first refused to surrender the town, but subsequently, seeing resistance hopeless, he surrendered the place to Caninius Rebilus.]

VIRGINIA, daughter of L. Virginius, a brave centurion, was a beautiful and innocent girl, betrothed to L. Icilius. Her beauty excited the lust of the decemvir Appius Claudius, who got one of his clients to seize the damsel and claim her as his slave. The case was brought before the decemvir for decision; her friends begged him to postpone his judgment till her father could be fetched from the camp, and offered to give security for the appearance of the maiden. Appius, fearing a riot, agreed to let the cause stand over till the next day; but on the following morning he pronounced sentence, assigning Virginia to his freedman. Her father, who had come from the camp, seeing that all hope was gone, prayed the decemvir to be allowed to speak one word to the nurse in his daughter's hearing, in order to ascertain whether she was really his daughter. The request was granted; Virginius drew them both aside, and snatching up a butcher's knife from one of the stalls, plunged it in his daughter's breast, exclaiming, "There is no way but this to keep thee free." In vain did Appius call out to stop him. The crowd made way for him; and, holding his bloody knife on high, he rushed to the gate of the city, and hastened to the Roman camp. The result is known. Both camp and city rose against the decemvirs, who were deprived of their power, and the old form of government was restored. L. Virginius was the first who was elected tribune, and he hastened to take revenge upon his cruel enemy. By his orders Appius was dragged to prison to await his trial, and he there put an end to his own life in order to avoid a more ignominious death.

VIRGINIA OR VERGINIA GENS, patrician and plebeian. The patrician Virginius frequently filled the highest honors of the state during the early years of the republic. They all bore the cognomen of Tricostus, but none of them are of sufficient importance to require a separate notice.

ernor of Upper Germany at the time of the revolt of Julius Vindex in Gaul (68). The soldiers of Vindex wished to raise him to the empire; but he refused the honor, and marched against Vindex, who perished before Vesontio. Vid. VINDEX. After the death of Nero, Virginius supported the claims of Galba, and accompanied him to Rome. After Otho's death, the soldiers again attempted to proclaim Virginius emperor, and, in consequence of his refusal of the honor, he narrowly escaped with his life. Virginius died in the reign of Nerva, in his third consulship, A.D. 97, at eighty-three years of age. He was honored with a public funeral, and his panegyric was pronounced by the historian Tacitus, who was then consul. The younger Pliny, of whom Virginius had been the tutor or guardian, also mentions him with praise.

VIRIATHUS, a celebrated Lusitanian, is described by the Romans as originally a shepherd or huntsman, and afterward a robber, or, as he would be called in Spain at the present day, a guerilla chief. His character is drawn very favorably by many of the ancient writers, who celebrate his justice and equity, which was particularly shown in the fair division of the spoils he obtained from the enemy. Viriathus was one of the Lusitanians who escaped the treacherous and savage massacre of the people by the proconsul Galba in B.C. 150. Vid. GALBA, No. 2. He was destined to be the avenger of his country's wrongs. He collected a formidable force, and for several successive years he defeated one Roman army after another. At length, in 140, the proconsul Fabius Servilianus concluded a peace with Viriathus in order to save his army, which had been inclosed by the Lusitanians in a mountain pass, much in the same way as their ancestors had been by the Samnites at the Caudine Forks. The treaty was ratified by the senate; but Servilius Cæpio, who had succeeded to the command of Further Spain in 140, renewed the war, and shortly afterward procured the assassination of Viriathus by bribing three of his friends.

VITELLIUS. 1. L., father of the emperor, was a consummate flatterer, and by his arts gained promotion. After being consul in A.D. 34, he had been appointed governor of Syria, and had made favorable terms of peace with Artabanus. But all this only excited Caligula's jealousy, and he sent for Vitellius to put him to death. The governor saved himself by his abject humiliation and the gross flattery which pleased and softened the savage tyrant. He paid the like attention to Claudius and Messalina, and was rewarded by being twice consul with Claudius, and censor.—2. L., son of the preceding, and brother of the emperor, was consul in 48. He was put to death by the party of Vespasian on his brother's fall.—3. A., Roman emperor from January 2d to December 22d, A.D. 69, was the son of No. 1. He was consul during the first six months of 48, and his brother Lucius during the six following months. He had some knowledge of letters and some eloquence. His vices made him a favorite of Tiberius, Caius Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, who loaded him with favors. People were much surprised when Galba chose such a man to command the legions in Lower Germany, for he had no military talent. His great talent was eating and drinking. The soldiers of Vitellius proclaimed him emperor at Colonia Agrippinensis (now Cologne) on the 2d of January, 69. His generals Fabius Valens and Cæcina marched into Italy, defeated Otho's troops at the decisive battle of Bedriacum, and thus secured for Vitellius the undisputed command of Italy. The soldiers of Otho, after the death of the latter, took the oath of fidelity to Vitellius. Vitellius reached Rome in July. He did not disturb any person in the enjoyment of what had been given by Nero, Galba, and Otho, nor did he confiscate any man's property. Though some of Otho's adherents were put to death, he let the next of kin take their property. But, though he showed moderation in this part of his conduct, he showed none in his expenses. He was a glutton and an epicure, and his chief amusement was the table, on which he spent enormous sums of money. Meantime Vespasian, who had at first taken the oath of allegiance to Vitellius, was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria on the 1st of July. Vespasian was speedily recognized by all the East; and the legions of Illyricum, under Antonius Primus, entered the north of Italy and declared for Vespasian. Vitellius dispatched Cæcina with a powerful force to oppose Primus; but Cæcina was not faithful to the emperor. Primus defeated the Vitellians in two battles, and afterward took and pillaged the city of Cremona. Primus then marched upon Rome, and forced his way into the city, after much fighting. Vitellius was seized in the palace, led through the streets with every circumstance of ignominy, and dragged to the Gemoniæ Scalæ, where he was killed with repeated blows. His head was carried about Rome, and his body was dragged into the Tiber; but it was afterward interred by his wife Galeria Fundana. A few days before the death of Vitellius, the Capitol had been burned in the assault made by his soldiers upon this building, where Flavius Sabinus, the brother of the Emperor Vespasian, had taken refuge.

[VITIA, the mother of Fufius Geminus, was put to death by Tiberius in A.D. 32 because she had lamented the execution of her son, who had been consul in A.D. 29.]

VITRUVIUS POLLIO, M., the author of the celebrated treatise on Architecture, of whom we know nothing except a few facts contained in scattered passages of his own work. He appears to have served as a military engineer under Julius Cæsar, in the African war, B.C. 46, and he was broken down with age when he composed his work, which is dedicated to the Emperor Augustus. (The name of the emperor is not mentioned in the dedication, but there can be no doubt that it was Augustus.) The object of his work appears to have had reference to himself as well as to his subject. He professes his intention to furnish the emperor with a standard by which to judge of the buildings he had already erected, as well as of those which he might afterward erect; which can have no meaning, unless he wished to protest against the style of architecture which prevailed in the buildings already erected. That this was really his intention appears from several other arguments, and especially from his frequent references to the unworthy means by which architects obtained wealth and favor, with which he contrasts his own moderation and contentment in his more obscure position. In a word, comparatively unsuccessful as an architect, for we have no building of his mentioned except the basilica at Fanum, he attempted to establish his reputation as a writer upon the theory of his art; and in this he has been tolerably successful. His work is a valuable compendium of those written by numerous Greek architects, whom he mentions chiefly in the preface to his seventh book, and by some Roman writers on architecture. Its chief defects are its brevity, of which Vitruvius himself boasts, and which he often carries so far as to be unintelligible, and the obscurity of the style, arising in part from the natural difficulty of technical language, but in part also from the author's want of skill in writing, and sometimes from his imperfect comprehension of his Greek authorities. His work is entitled De Architectura Libri X. In the First Book, after the dedication to the emperor, and a general description of the science of architecture, and an account of the proper education of an architect, he treats of the choice of a proper site for a city, the disposition of its plan, its fortifications, and the several buildings within it. The Second Book is on the materials used in building. The Third and Fourth Books are devoted to temples and the four orders of architecture employed in them, namely, the Ionic, Corinthian, Doric, and Tuscan. The Fifth Book relates to public buildings, the Sixth to private houses, and the Seventh to interior decorations. The Eighth is on the subject of water; the mode of finding it; its different kinds; and the various modes of conveying it for the supply of cities. The Ninth Book treats of various kinds of sundials and other instruments for measuring time; and the Tenth of the machines used in building, and of military engines. Each book has a preface, upon some matter more or less connected with the subject; and these prefaces are the source of most of our information about the author. The best editions of Vitruvius are those of Schneider, 3 vols., Lips., 1807, 1808, 8vo; of Stratico, 4 vols., Udino, 1825-30, with plates and a Lexicon Vitruvianum; and of Marini, 4 vols., Rom., 1836, fol.

VOCONTII, a powerful and important people in Gallia Narbonensis, inhabiting the southeastern part of Dauphiné, and a part of Provence, between the Drac and the Durancé, bounded on the north by the Allobroges, and on the south by the Salyes and Albiœci. Their country contained large and beautiful valleys between the mountains, in which good wine was grown. They were allowed by the Romans to live under their own laws, and, though in a Roman province, they were the allies and not the subjects of Rome.

VOCESUS or VOSÆSUS (now Vosges), a range of mountains in Gaul, in the territory of the Lingones, running parallel to the Rhine, and separating its basin from that of the Mosella. The rivers Sequana (now Seine), Arar (now Saône), and the Mosella (now Moselle), rise in these mountains.

VOLANDUM, a strong fortress in Armenia Major, some days' journey west of Artaxata, mentioned by Tacitus (Ann., xiii., 39).

VOLATERRÆ (Volaterranus; now Volterra), called by the Etruscans VELATHRI, one of the twelve cities of the Etruscan Confederation, was built on a lofty hill, about eighteen thousand English feet above the level of the sea rising from a deep valley, and precipitous on every side. The city was about four or five miles in circuit. It was the most northerly city of the Confederation, and possessed an extensive territory. Its dominions extended eastward as far as the territory of Arretium, which was fifty miles distant; westward as far as the Mediterranean, which was more than twenty miles off; and southward at least as far as Populonia, which was either a colony or an acquisition of Volaterræ. In consequence of possessing the two great ports of Luna and Populonia, Volaterræ, though so far inland, was reckoned as one of the powerful maritime cities of Etruria. Volaterræ is mentioned as one of the five cities which, acting independently of the rest of Etruria, determined to aid the Latins against Tarquinius Priscus; but its name is rarely mentioned in connection with the Romans, and we have no record of its conquest by the latter. Volaterræ, like most of the Etruscan cities, espoused the Marian party against Sulla; and such was the strength of its fortifications, that it was not till after a siege of two years that the city fell into Sulla's hands. Cicero speaks of Volaterræ as a municipium, and a military colony was founded in it under the triumvirate. It continued to be a place of importance even after the fall of the Western Empire; and it was for a time the residence of the Lombard kings, who fixed their court here on account of the natural strength of the site. The modern town covers but a small portion of the area occupied by the ancient city. It contains, however, several interesting Etruscan remains. Of these the most important, in addition to the ancient walls, are the family tomb of the Cæcinæ, and a double gateway, nearly thirty feet deep, united by parallel walls of very massive character.

VOLCÆ, a powerful Celtic people in Gallia Narbonensis, divided into the two tribes of the Volcæ Tectosages and the Volcæ Arecomici, extending from the Pyrenees and the frontiers of Aquitania along the coast as far as the Rhone. They lived under their own laws, without being subject to the Roman governor of the province, and they also possessed the Jus Latii. The Tectosages inhabited the western part of the country from the Pyrenees as far as Narbo, and the Arecomici the eastern part from Narbo to the Rhone. The chief town of the Tectosages was TOLOSA. A portion of the Tectosages left their native country under Brennus, and were one of the three great tribes into which the Galatians in Asia Minor were divided. Vid. GALATIA.

VULCI or VULCI. 1. (Volcienes, pl.: now Vulci), an inland city of Etruria, about eighteen miles northwest of Tarquinii, was about two miles in circuit, and was situated upon a hill of no great elevation. Of the history of this city we know nothing. It is only mentioned in the catalogues of the geographers and in the Fasti Capitolini, from which we learn that its citizens, in conjunction with the Volsinienses, were defeated by the consul Tib. Coruncanius, B.C. 280. But its extensive sepulchres, and the vast treasures of ancient art which they contain, prove that Vulci must at one time have been a powerful and flourishing city. These tombs were only discovered in 1828, and have yielded a greater number of works of art than have been discovered in any other parts of Etruria.—2. (Volcienes, Volcentani, pl.: now Vallo), a town in Lucania, thirty-six miles southeast of Pæstum, on the road to Buxentum.

[VOLSCENS, a Rutulian warrior in the army of Turnus; he encountered Nisus and Euryalus as they were returning from their expedition to the Rutulian camp, loaded with booty, slew Euryalus, and was himself slain by Nisus.]

VOLSCI, an ancient people in Latium, but originally distinct from the Latins, dwelt on both sides of the River Liris, and extended down to the Tyrrhene Sea. Their language was nearly allied to the Umbrian. They were from an early period engaged in almost unceasing hostilities with the Romans, and were no completely subdued by the latter till B.C. 338, from which time they disappear from history.

VOLSINIŪI or VULSINIŪI (Volsiniensis: now Bolsena), called VELSINA or VELSUNA by the Etruscans, one of the most ancient and most powerful of the twelve cities of the Etruscan Confederation, was situated on a lofty hill on the north-eastern extremity of the lake called after it LACUS VOLSINIENSIS and VULSINIENSIS (now Lago di Bolsena). Volsinii is first mentioned in B.C. 392, when its inhabitants invaded the Roman territory, but were easily defeated by the Romans, and were glad to purchase a twenty years' truce on humiliating terms. The Volsinienses also carried on war with the Romans in 311, 294, and 280, but were on each occasion defeated, and in the last of these years appear to have been finally subdued. On their final subjugation their city was razed to the ground by the Romans, and its inhabitants were compelled to settle on a less defensible site in the plain. The new city, on which stands the modern Bolsena, also became a place of importance. It was the birth-place of Sejanus, the favorite of Tiberius. Of the ancient city there are scarcely any remains. It occupied the summit of the highest hill, northeast of Bolsena, above the remains of a Roman amphitheatre. From the Lacus Volsiniensis the River Marta issues; and the lake contains two beautiful islands.

[VOLTURNA, an Etrurian goddess, at whose temple on Mons Ciminius (q. v.) the Etrurian Confederation used to hold their general assemblies.]

VOLTURCIŪS or VULTRICIŪS, T., of Crotona, one of Catiline's conspirators, was sent by Lentulus to accompany the ambassadors of the Allobroges to Catiline. Arrested along with the ambassadors on the Mulvian bridge, and brought before the senate by Cicero, Volturcius turned informer upon obtaining the promise of pardon.

title of Cæsar in A.D. 251, and of Augustus in 252. He was slain along with his father in 254. Vid. GALLUS.

VOLUSIUS MÆCIANUS, L., a jurist, in the consilium of Antoninus Pius, and was one of the teachers of M. Aurelius. Mæcianus wrote several works; and there are forty-four excerpts from his writings in the Digest. A treatise, De Asse et Ponderibus, is attributed to him, but there is some doubt about the authorship. It is edited by Böcking, Bonn, 1831.

VOPISCUS, a Roman prænomen, signified a twin child who was born safe, while the other twin died before birth. Like many other ancient Roman prænomens, it was afterward used as a cognomen.

VOPISCUS, FLĀVIŪS, a native of Syracuse, and one of the six Scriptores Historia Augusta, flourished about A.D. 300. His name is prefixed to the biographies of, 1. Aurelianus; 2. Tacitus; 3. Florianus; 4. Probus; 5. The four tyrants, Firmus, Saturninus, Proculus, and Bonosus; 6. Carus; 7. Numerianus; 8. VULCĀNUS, the Roman god of fire, whose name seems to be connected with fulgere, fulgur, and fulmen. His worship was of considerable political importance at Rome, for a temple is said to have been erected to him close by the eomitium as early as the time of Romulus and Tatius, in which the two kings used to meet and settle the affairs of the state, and near which the popular assembly was held. Tatius is reported to have established the worship of Vulcan along with that of Vesta, and Romulus to have dedicated to him a quadriga after his victory over the Fidenates, and to have set up a statue of himself near the temple. According to others, the temple was built by Romulus himself, who also planted near it the sacred lotus-tree which still existed in the days of Pliny. These circumstances, and what is related of the lotus-tree, show that the temple of Vulcan, like that of Vesta, was regarded as a central point of the whole state, and hence it was perhaps not without a meaning that the temple of Concord was subsequently built within the same district. The most ancient festival in honor of Vulcan seems to have been the Fornacalia or Furnalia, Vulcan being the god of furnaces; but his great festival was called Vulcanalia, and was celebrated on the 23d of August. The Roman poets transfer all the stories which are related of the Greek Hephæstus to their own Vulcan, the two divinities having in the course of time been completely identified. VULSO, MANLĪUS. 1. L., consul B.C. 256 with M. Atilius Regulus. He invaded Africa along with his colleague. For details, vid. REGULUS, No. 3. Vulso returned to Italy at the fall of the year with half of the army, and obtained the honor of a triumph. In 250 Vulso was consul a second time with T. Atilius Regulus Serranus, and with his colleague commenced the siege of Lilybæum.—2. CN., curule ædile 197, prætor with Sicily as his province 195, and consul 189. He was sent into Asia in order to conclude the peace which Scipio Asiaticus had made with Antiochus, and to arrange the affairs of Asia. He attacked and conquered the Gallogræci or Galatians in Asia Minor without waiting for any formal instructions from the senate. He set out on his return to Italy in 188, but in his march through Thrace he suffered much from the attacks of the Thracians, and lost a considerable part of the booty he had obtained in Asia. He reached Rome in 187. His triumph was a brilliant one, but his campaign in Asia had a pernicious influence upon the morals of his countrymen. He had allowed his army every kind of license, and his soldiers introduced into the city the luxuries of the East.

[VULTEIUS MENA, an auctioneer in Rome, a freedman of the family of the Vultei or Voltcii who was leading a happy life till Marcus Philippus took him under his protection and attempted to better his condition; from the ill effects produced by this change or elevation, Horace draws a lesson of instruction.]

[XANTHICLES (Ξανθικλῆς), an Aethæan, chosen general by the Greek mercenaries of Cyrus in the place of his countryman Socrates, when the latter had been treacherously seized by Tissa-

phernes, B.C. 401, along with Clearchus. When the army reached Cotyora, Xanthicles was one of those fined for a deficiency in the cargoes of the ships which had brought the soldiers from Trapezus, and of which he was one of the commissioners.]

XANTHIPPE (Ξανθίππη), wife of Socrates, said to be a woman of a peevish and quarrelsome disposition.

XANTHIPPIUS (Ξανθίππιος). 1. Son of Ariphron and father of Pericles. In B.C. 490, he impeached Miltiades on his return from his unsuccessful expedition against the island of Paros. He succeeded Themistocles as commander of the Athenian fleet in 479, and commanded the Athenians at the decisive battle of Mycale.

—2. The elder of the two legitimate sons of Pericles, Paralus being the younger. For details, vid. PARALUS. —3. The Lacedæmonian, who commanded the Carthaginians against Regulus. For details, vid. REGULUS, No. 3. Xanthippus appears to have left Carthage a short time after his victory over Regulus.

[XANTHUS (Ξάνθος), a son of Phænops, brother of Thoön, a warrior in the Trojan army, slain by Diomedes.]

XANTHUS (Ξάνθος). 1. A lyric poet, older than Stesichorus, who mentioned him in one at least of his poems, and who borrowed from him in some of them. Xanthus may be placed about B.C. 650. No fragments of his poetry survive.

—2. A celebrated Lydian historian, older than Herodotus, who flourished about B.C. 480. The genuineness of the Four Books of Lydian History which the ancients possessed under the name of Xanthus, and of which some considerable fragments have come down to us, was questioned by some of the ancient grammarians themselves. There has been considerable controversy respecting the genuineness of this work among modern scholars. It is certain that much of the matter in the extant fragments is spurious; and the probability appears to be that the work from which they are taken is the production of an Alexandrian grammarian, founded upon the genuine work of Xanthus. [The fragments of Xanthus are collected in Creuzer's Historiarum Græc. Antiquiss. Fragmenta, Heidelberg, 1806; and in Müller's Hist. Græc. Fragm., vol. i., p. 36–44, Paris, 1841.]

XANTHUS (Ξάνθος), rivers. 1. Vid. SCAMANDER. —2. (Now Echen Chai), the chief river of Lycia, rises in Mount Taurus, on the borders of Pisidia and Lycia, and flows south through Lycia, between Mount Cragus and Mount Masicyus, in a large plain called the Plain of Xanthus (τὸ Ξάνθιον πεδίον), falling at last into the Mediterranean Sea a little west of Patara. Though not a large river, it is navigable for a considerable part of its course.

XANTHUS (Ξάνθος; Ξάνθος, Xanthius: ruins at Gunik), the most famous city of Lycia, stood on the western bank of the river of the same name, sixty stadia from its mouth. Twice in the course of its history it sustained sieges, which terminated in the self-destruction of the inhabitants with their property, first against the Persians under Harpagus, and long afterward against the Romans under Brutus. The city was never restored after its destruction on the latter occasion. Xanthus was rich in temples and tombs, and other monuments of a most interesting character of art. Among its temples the most celebrated were those of Sarpedon and of the Lycian Apollo; besides which there was a renowned sanctuary of Latona (τὸ Λητώων), near the River Xanthus, ten stadia from its mouth, and sixty stadia from the city. The splendid ruins of Xanthus have recently been thoroughly explored by Sir C. Fellowes and his coadjutors, and several important remains of its works of art are now exhibited in the British Museum under the name of the Xanthian Marbles.

XENARCHUS (Ξενάρχος). 1. Son of Sophron, and, like his father, a celebrated writer of mimes. He flourished during the Rhegian war (B.C. 399–389), at the court of Dionysius. —2. An Athenian comic poet of the Middle Comedy, who lived as late as the time of Alexander the Great. [The fragments of his comedies are given by Meineke, in his Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. ii., p. 811–15, edit. minor.] —3. Of Seleucia in Cilicia, a Peripatetic philosopher and grammarian in the time of Strabo, who heard him. He taught first at Alexandria, afterward at Athens, and last at Rome, where he enjoyed the friendship of Augustus.

XENIÆDES (Ξενιάδης), a Corinthian, who became the purchaser of Diogenes the Cynic when he was taken by pirates and sold as a slave.

[XENIAS (Ξενίας). 1. A Parrhasian, one of the commanders of mercenaries in the service of Cyrus the younger, whom he accompanied, with a body of three hundred men, to court, when he was summoned thither by his father Darius in B.C. 405. After the return of Cyrus to Western Asia, Xenias commanded for him the garrisons in the several Ionian states, and with the greater portion of these troops, viz., four thousand heavy armed men, he joined the prince in his expedition against Artaxerxes. At Tarsus a large body of his troops and of those of Pasion left their standards for that of Clearchus; and Cyrus having allowed the latter to retain them, Xenias and Pasion abandoned the army at Myriandrus, and sailed away to Greece. —2. An Elean of great wealth, was a proxenus of Sparta, and connected by private ties of hospitality with King Agis II. In B.C. 400, during the war between Sparta and Elis, Xenias and his oligarchical partisans made an attempt to overpower their opponents and to subject their country to the Spartans, but they were defeated and driven into exile by Thrasidæus, the leader of the democracy.]

XENIPPA (now probably Uratippa), a city of Sogdiana, mentioned by Curtius.

XENOCLES (Ξενοκλῆς). 1. An Athenian tragic poet, son of Carcinus, who was also a tragic poet, and a contemporary of Aristophanes, who attacks him on several occasions. His poetry seems to have been indifferent, and to have resembled the worse parts of Euripides; but he obtained a victory over Euripides B.C. 415. There was another tragic poet of the name of Xenocles, a grandson of the preceding, of whom no particulars are recorded. —2. An Athenian architect, of the demos of Cholargos, was one of the architects who superintended the erection of the temple of Ceres (Demeter) at Eleusis, in the time of Pericles.

XENOCRATES (Ξενοκράτης). 1. The philosopher, was a native of Chalcidon. He was born B.C. 396, and died 314, at the age of eighty-two. He attached himself first to Æschines the Socratic, and afterward, while still a youth, to Plato, whom he accompanied to Syracuse. After the death of Plato he betook himself, with Aristotle, to Hermias, tyrant of Atarneus; and, after his return to Athens, he was repeatedly sent on embassies to Philip of Macedonia, and at a later time to Antipater during the Lamiæ war. He is said to have wanted quick apprehension and natural grace; but these defects were more than compensated by persevering industry, pure benevolence, freedom from all selfishness, and a moral earnestness which obtained for him the esteem and confidence of the Athenians of his own age. Yet he is said to have experienced the fickleness of popular favor, and, being too poor to pay the protection-money (μετοίκιον), to have been saved only by the courage of the orator Lycurgus. He became president of the Academy even before the death of Speusippus, who was bowen down by sickness, and he occupied that post for twenty-five years. The importance of Xenocrates is shown by the fact that Aristotle and Theophrastus wrote upon his doctrines, and that Panætius and Cicero entertained a high regard for him. Of his numerous works only the titles have come down to us.—2. A physician of Aphrodisias in Cilicia, lived about the middle of the first century after Christ. Besides some short fragments of his writings, there is extant a little essay by him, entitled Περὶ τῆς ἀπὸ τῶν Ἐνδύρων τροφῆς, "De Alimento ex Aquatilibus," which is an interesting record of the state of Natural History at the time in which he lived. Edited by Franz, 1774, Lips., and by Coray, 1794, Neap., and 1814, Paris.—3. A statuary of the school of Lysippus, was the pupil either of Tisicrates or of Euthycrates. He also wrote works upon the art. He flourished about B.C. 260.

XENOCRITUS (Ξενοκρίτος), of Locri Epizephyrri, in Lower Italy, a musician and lyric poet, was one of the leaders of the second school of Dorian music, which was founded by Thaletas, and was a composer of Pæans.

XENOPHONES (Ξενοφάνης), a celebrated philosopher, was a native of Colophon, and flourished between B.C. 540 and 500. He was a poet as well as a philosopher, and considerable fragments have come down to us of his elegies, and of a didactic poem "On Nature." According to the fragments of one of his elegies, he had left his native land at the age of twenty-five, and had already lived sixty-seven years in Hellas, when, at the age of ninety-two, he composed that elegy. He quitted Colophon as a fugitive or exile, and must have lived some time at Elea (Velia) in Italy, as he is mentioned as the founder of the Eleatic school of philosophy. He sung in one of his poems of the foundation of Velia. Xenophanes was usually regarded in antiquity as the originator of the Eleatic doctrine of the oneness of the universe. The Deity was in his view the animating power of the universe, which is expressed by Aristotle in the words, that, directing his glance on the whole universe, Xenophanes said, "God is the One." [His fragments are contained in Karsten's Xenophanis Col. Carminum Reliquiæ, Bruxelles, 1830.]

XENOPHON (Ξενοφών). 1. The Athenian, was the son of Gryllus, and a native of the demus Erchia. The time of his birth is not known, but it is approximated to by the fact that Xenophon fell from his horse in the flight after the battle of Delium, and was taken up by Socrates, the philosopher, on his shoulders, and carried a distance of several stadia. The battle of Delium was fought B.C. 424 between the Athenians and Bœotians, and Xenophon therefore could not well have been born after 444. The time of his death, also, is not mentioned by any ancient writer. Lucian says that he attained to above the age of ninety, and Xenophon himself mentions the assassination of Alexander of Pheræ, which happened in 357. Between 424 and 357 there is a period of sixty-seven years, and thus we have evidence of Xenophon being alive nearly seventy years after Socrates saved his life at Delium. Xenophon is said to have been a pupil of Socrates at an early age, which is consistent with the intimacy which might have arisen from Socrates saving his life. The most memorable event in Xenophon's life is his connection with the Greek army, which marched under Cyrus against Artaxerxes in 401. Xenophon himself mentions (Anab., iii., 1) the circumstances under which he joined this army. Proxenus, a friend of Xenophon, was already with Cyrus, and he invited Xenophon to come to Sardis, and promised to introduce him to the Persian prince. Xenophon consulted his master Socrates, who advised him to consult the oracle of Delphi, for it was rather a hazardous matter for him to enter the service of Cyrus, who was considered to be the friend of the Lacedæmonians and the enemy of Athens. Xenophon went to Delphi, but he did not ask the god whether he should go or not: he probably had made up his mind. He merely asked to what gods he should sacrifice in order that he might be successful in his intended enterprise. Socrates was not satisfied with his pupil's mode of consulting the oracle, but as he had got an answer he told him to go; and Xenophon went to Sardis, which Cyrus was just about to leave. He accompanied Cyrus into Upper Asia. In the battle of Cunaxa, Cyrus lost his life, his barbarian troops were dispersed, and the Greeks were left alone on the wide plains between the Tigris and the Euphrates. It was after the treacherous massacre of Clearchus and other of the Greek commanders by the Persian satrap Tissaphernes that Xenophon came forward. He had held no command in the army of Cyrus, nor had he, in fact, served as a soldier. He was now elected one of the generals, and took the principal part in conducting the Greeks in their memorable retreat along the Tigris over the high table-lands of Armenia to Trapezus (Trebizond), on the Black Sea. From Trapezus the troops were conducted to Chrysopolis, which is opposite to Byzantium. The Greeks were in great distress, and some of them, under Xenophon, entered the service of Seuthes, king of Thrace. As the Lacedæmonians under Thimbron were now at war with Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus, Xenophon and his troops were invited to join the army of Thimbron, and Xenophon led them to Pergamus to join Thimbron, 399. Xenophon, who was very poor, had made an expedition into the plain of the Caius with his troops before they joined Thimbron, to plunder the house and property of a Persian named Asidates. The Persian, with his women, children, and all his movables, was seized; and Xenophon, by this robbery, replenished his empty pockets (Anab., vii., 8, 23). He tells the story himself as if he were not ashamed of it. Socrates was put to death in 399, and it seems probable that Xenophon was banished either shortly before or shortly after that event. Xenophon was not banished at the time when he was leading the troops back to Thimbron (Anab., vii., 7, 57), but his expression rather seems to imply that his banishment must have followed soon after. It is not certain what he was doing after the troops joined Thimbron. As we know nothing of his movements, the conclusion ought to be that he stayed in Asia, and probably with Thimbron and his successor Dercylidas. Agesilaus, the Spartan king, was commanding the Lacedæmonian forces in Asia against the Persians in 396, and Xenophon was with him at least during part of the campaign. When Agesilaus was recalled (394), Xenophon accompanied him; and he was on the side of the Lacedæmonians in the battle which they fought at Coronea (394) against the Athenians. It seems that he went to Sparta with Agesilaus after the battle of Coronea, and soon after he settled at Scillus, in Elis, not far from Olympia, a spot of which he has given a description in the Anabasis (v., 3, 7, &c.). Here he was joined by his wife Philesia and his children. His children were educated in Sparta. Xenophon was now an exile, and a Lacedæmonian so far as he could become one. His time during his long residence at Scillus was employed in hunting, writing, and entertaining his friends; and perhaps the Anabasis and part of the Hellenica were composed here. The treatise on hunting and that on the horse were probably also written during this time, when amusement and exercise of that kind formed part of his occupation. Xenophon was at last expelled from his quiet retreat at Scillus by the Eleans after remaining there about twenty years. The sentence of banishment from Athens was repealed on the motion of Eubulus, but it is uncertain in what year. In the battle of Mantinea, which was fought 362, the Spartans and the Athenians were opposed to the Thebans, and Xenophon's two sons, Gryllus and Diodorus, fought on the side of the allies. Gryllus fell in the same battle in which Epaminondas lost his life. There is no evidence that Xenophon ever returned to Athens. He is said to have retired to Corinth after his expulsion from Scillus, and as we know nothing more, we assume that he died there. The Hipparchicus and the treatise on the revenues of Athens were written after the repeal of the decree of banishment. The events alluded to in the Epilogus to the Cyropædia (viii., 8, 4) show that the Epilogus at least was written after 362. The time of his death may have been a few years later. The following is a list of Xenophon's works: 1. The Anabasis (Ἀνάβασις), or the History of the Expedition of the Younger Cyrus, and of the retreat of the Greeks, who formed part of his army. It is divided into seven books. This work has immortalized Xenophon's name. It is a clear and pleasing narrative, written in a simple style, free from affectation; and it gives a great deal of curious information on the country which was traversed by the retreating Greeks, and on the manners of the people. It was the first work which made the Greeks acquainted with some portions of the Persian empire, and it showed the weakness of that extensive monarchy. The skirmishes of the retreating Greeks with their enemies, and the battles with some of the barbarian tribes, are not such events as elevate the work to the character of a military history, nor can it, as such, be compared with Cæsar's Commentaries. 2. The Hellenica (Ἑλληνικά) of Xenophon are divided into seven books, and comprehend the space of forty-eight years, from the time when the history of Thucydides ends (vid. Θουκυδίδης) to the battle of Mantinea, 362. The Hellenica is generally a dry narrative of events, and there is nothing in the treatment of them which gives a special interest to the work. Some events of importance are briefly treated, but a few striking incidents are presented with some particularity. 3. The Cyropædia (Κυροπαίδεια), in eight books, is a kind of political romance, the basis of which is the history of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian monarchy. It shows how citizens are to be made virtuous and brave; and Cyrus is the model of a wise and good ruler. As a history it has no authority at all. Xenophon adopted the current stories as to Cyrus and the chief events of his reign, without any intention of subjecting them to a critical examination; nor have we any reason to suppose that his picture of Persian morals and Persian discipline is any thing more than a fiction. Xenophon's object was to represent what a state might be, and he placed the scene of his fiction far enough off to give it the color of possibility. His own philosophical notions and the usages of Sparta were the real materials out of which he constructed his political system. The Cyropædia is evidence enough that Xenophon did not like the political constitution of his own country; and that a well-ordered monarchy or kingdom appeared to him preferable to a democracy like Athens. 4. The Agesilaus (Ἀγησίλαος) is a panegyric on Agesilaus II., king of Sparta, the friend of Xenophon. 5. The Hipparchicus (Ἱππάρχικός) is a treatise on the duties of a commander of cavalry, and it contains many military precepts. 6. The De Re Equestri, a treatise on the Horse (Ἱππική), was written after the Hipparchicus, to which treatise he refers at the end of the treatise on the Horse. The treatise is not limited to horsemanship, as regards the rider; it shows how a man is to avoid being cheated in buying a horse, how a horse is to be trained, and the like. 7. The Cynægeticus (Κυνήγετικός) is a treatise on hunting; and on the dog, and the breeding and training of dogs; on the various kinds of game, and the mode of taking them. It is a treatise written by a genuine sportsman, who loved the exercise and the excitement of the chase; and it may be read with delight by any sportsman who deserves the name. 8, 9. The Respublica Lacædæmoniorum and Respublica Atheniensium, the two treatises on the Spartan and Athenian states (Λακεδαιμονίων Πολιτεία, and Ἀθηναίων Πολιτεία), were not always recognized as genuine works of Xenophon, even by the ancients. They pass, however, under his name, and there is nothing in the internal evidence that appears to throw any doubt on the authorship. The writer clearly prefers Spartan to Athenian institutions. 10. The De Vectigalibus, a treatise on the Revenues of Athens (Πόροι ἢ περὶ Προσόδων) is designed to show how the public revenue of Athens may be improved. 11. The Memorabilia of Socrates, in four books (Ἀπομνημονεύματα Σωκράτους), was written by Xenophon to defend the memory of his master against the charge of irreligion and of corrupting the Athenian youth. Socrates is represented as holding a series of conversations, in which he develops and inculcates moral doctrines in his peculiar fashion. It is entirely a practical work, such as we might expect from the practical nature of Xenophon's mind, and it professes to exhibit Socrates as he taught. It is true that it may only exhibit one side of the Socratic argumentation, and that it does not deal in those subtleties and verbal disputes which occupy so large a space in some of Plato's dialogues. Xenophon was a hearer of Socrates, an admirer of his master, and anxious to defend his memory. The charges against Socrates for which he suffered were, that "Socrates was guilty of not believing in the gods which the state believed in, and of introducing other new dæmons (δαιμόνια): he was also guilty of corrupting the youth." Xenophon replies to these two charges specifically; and he then goes on to show what Socrates's mode of life was. The whole treatise is intended to be an answer to the charge for which Socrates was executed, and it is, therefore, in its nature, not intended to be a complete exhibition of Socrates. That it is a genuine picture of the man is indisputable, and it is the most valuable memorial that we have of the practical philosophy of Socrates. 12. The Apology of Socrates (Ἀπολογία Σωκράτους πρὸς τοὺς δικαστῆς) is a short speech, containing the reasons which induced Socrates to prefer death to life. It is not a first-rate performance, and is considered by some critics not to have been written by Xenophon. 13. The Symposium (Συμπόσιον), or Banquet of Philosophers, in which Xenophon delineates the character of Socrates. The speakers are supposed to meet at the house of Callias, a rich Athenian, at the celebration of the great Panathenæa. Socrates and others are the speakers. The piece is interesting as a picture of an Athenian drinking party, and of the amusement and conversation with which it was diversified. The nature of love and friendship is discussed. 14. The Hiero (Ἱέρων ἢ Τυραννικός) is a dialogue between King Hiero and Simonides, in which the king speaks of the dangers and difficulties incident to an exalted station, and the superior happiness of a private man. The poet, on the other hand, enumerates the advantages which the possession of power gives, and the means which it offers of obliging and doing services. 15. Œconomicus (Οἰκονομικός) is a dialogue between Socrates and Critobulus, in which Socrates gives instruction in the art called Œconomic, which relates to the administration of a household and of a man's property. This is one of the best treatises of Xenophon. All antiquity and all modern writers agree in allowing Xenophon great merit as a writer of a plain, simple, perspicuous, and unaffected style. His mind was not adapted for philosophical speculation: he looked to the practical in all things; and the basis of his philosophy was a strong belief in a divine mediation in the government of the world. The best edition of Xenophon's complete works is by Schneider, Lips., 1815, 6 vols. 8vo, [of which the first, second, and fourth volumes have been re-edited and much improved by Bornemann, containing the first, Cyropædia, Leipzig, 1838; the second, Anabasis, 1825; the fourth, Memorabilia, 1829; and the sixth, containing the Opuscula politica, equestria, venatica, by Sauppe, 1838: the best separate editions of the more important works are, of the Cyropædia, by Poppo, Leipzig, 1821, and by Jacobitz, Leipzig, 1843; of the Anabasis, by Poppo, Leipzig, 1827, and by Krüger, Halle, 1826; of the Memorabilia, by Kühner, Gotha, 1841; of the Historia Græca, from the text of Dindorf, with selected notes, at the University Press, Oxford, 1831: in addition may be mentioned, as useful in the study of Xenophon, Sturz's Lexicon Xenophonticum, 4 vols. 8vo, 1801-1804.]—2. The Ephesian author of a romance, still extant, entitled Ephesiaca, or the Loves of Anthia and Abrocomas (Ἐφεσιακά, τὰ κατὰ Ἀνθίαν καὶ Ἀβροκόμην). The style of the work is simple, and the story is conducted without confusion, notwithstanding the number of personages introduced. The adventures are of a very improbable kind. The age when Xenophon lived is uncertain. He is probably the oldest of the Greek romance writers. The best editions of his work are by Peerlkamp, Harlem, 1818, and by Passow, Lips., 1833.

XERXES (Ξέρξης). 1. King of Persia B.C. 485-465. The name is said by Herodotus (vi., 98) to signify the warrior, but it is probably the same word as the Zend kshatra and the Sanscrit kshatra, "a king." Xerxes was the son of Darius and Atossa. Darius was married twice. By his first wife, the daughter of Gobryas, he had three children before he was raised to the throne; and by his second wife, Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, he had four children after he had become king. Artabazanes, the eldest son of the former marriage, and Xerxes, the eldest son of the latter, each laid claim to the succession; but Darius decided in favor of Xerxes, no doubt through the influence of his mother Atossa, who completely ruled Darius. Xerxes succeeded his father at the beginning of 485. Darius had died in the midst of his preparations against Greece, which had been interrupted by the revolt of the Egyptians. The first care of Xerxes was to reduce the latter people to subjection. He accordingly invaded Egypt at the beginning of the second year of his reign (B.C. 484), compelled the people again to submit to the Persian yoke, and then returned to Persia, leaving his brother Achæmenes governor of Egypt. The next four years were devoted to preparations for the invasion of Greece. In the spring of 480 he set out from Sardis on his memorable expedition against Greece. He crossed the Hellespont by a bridge of boats, and continued his march through the Thracian Chersonese till he reached the plain of Doriscus, which is traversed by the River Hebrus. Here he resolved to number both his land and naval forces. Herodotus has left us a most minute and interesting catalogue of the nations comprising this mighty army, with their various military equipments and different modes of fighting. The land forces contained forty-six nations. (Herod., vii., 61, foll.) In his march through Thrace and Macedonia, Xerxes received a still further accession of strength; and when he reached Thermopylæ, the land and sea forces amounted to two million, six hundred and forty-one thousand, six hundred and ten fighting men. This does not include the attendants, the slaves, the crews of the provision-ships, &c., which, according to the supposition of Herodotus, were more in number than the fighting men; but, supposing them to have been equal, the total number of male persons who accompanied Xerxes to Thermopylæ reach the astounding sum of five million, two hundred and eighty-three thousand, two hundred and twenty! Such a vast number must be dismissed as incredible; but, considering that this army was the result of a maximum of effort throughout the empire, and that provisions had been collected for three years before along the line of march, we may well believe that the numbers of Xerxes were greater than were ever assembled in ancient times, or perhaps at any known epoch of history. After the review of Doriscus, Xerxes continued his march through Thrace. On reaching Acanthus, near the isthmus of Athos, Xerxes left his fleet, which received orders to sail through the canal that had been previously dug across the isthmus—and of which the remains are still visible (vid. Arros)—and await his arrival at Therme, afterward called Thessalonica. After joining his fleet at Therme, Xerxes marched through Macedonia and Thessaly without meeting with any opposition till he reached Thermopylæ. Here the Greeks resolved to make a stand. Leonidas, king of Sparta, conducted a land force to Thermopylæ; and his colleague Eurybiades sailed with the Greek fleet to the north of Eubœa, and took up his position on the northern coast, which faced Magnesia, and was called Artemisium from the temple of Artemis belonging to the town of Hestîæa. Xerxes arrived in safety with his land forces before Thermopylæ, but his fleet was overtaken by a violent storm and hurricane off the coast of Sepias in Magnesia, by which at least four hundred ships of war were destroyed, as well as an immense number of transports. Xerxes attempted to force his way through the Pass of Thermopylæ, but his troops were repulsed again and again by Leonidas; till a Malian, of the name of Ephialtes, showed the Persians a pass over the mountains of Ceta, and thus enabled them to fall on the rear of the Greeks. Leonidas and his Spartans disdained to fly, and were all slain. VID. LEONIDAS. On the same days on which Leonidas was fighting with the land forces of Xerxes, the Greek ships at Artemisium attacked the Persian fleet. In the first battle the Greeks had the advantage, and in the following night the Persian ships suffered still more from a violent storm. Two days afterward the contest was renewed, and both sides fought with the greatest courage. Although the Greeks at the close still maintained their position, and had destroyed a great number of the enemy's ships, yet their own loss was considerable, and half the Athenian ships were disabled. Under these circumstances, the Greek commanders abandoned Artemisium and retired to Salamis, opposite the southwest coast of Attica. It was now too late to send an army into Bœotia, and Attica thus lay exposed to the full vengeance of the invader. The Athenians removed their women, children, and infirm persons to Salamis, Ægina, and Trœzen. Meantime Xerxes marched through Phocis and Bœotia, and at length reached Athens. About the same time that Xerxes entered Athens, his fleet arrived in the bay of Phalerum. He now resolved upon an engagement with the Greek fleet. The history of this memorable battle, of the previous dissensions among the Greek commanders, and of the glorious victory of the Greeks at the last, is related elsewhere. VID. THEMISTOCLES. Xerxes witnessed the battle from a lofty seat, which was erected for him on the shores of the main land, on one of the declivities of Mount Ægaleos, and thus beheld with his own eyes the defeat and dispersion of his mighty armament. Xerxes now became alarmed for his own safety, and resolved to leave Greece immediately. He was confirmed in his resolution by Mardonius, who undertook to complete the conquest with three hundred thousand of his troops. Xerxes left Mardonius the number of troops which he requested, and with the remainder set out on his march homeward. He reached the Hellespont in forty-five days from the time of his departure from Attica. On arriving at the Hellespont, he found the bridge of boats destroyed by a storm, and he crossed over to Asia by ship. He entered Sardis toward the end of the year 480. In the following year, 479, the war was continued in Greece; but Mardonius was defeated at Platææ by the combined forces of the Greeks, and on the same day another victory was gained over the Persians at Mycale in Ionia. Next year, 478, the Persians lost their last possession in Europe by the capture of Sestos on the Hellespont. Thus the struggle was virtually brought to an end, though the war still continued for several years longer. We know little more of the personal history of Xerxes. He was murdered in 465, after a reign of twenty years, by Artabanus, who aspired to become king of Persia. Xerxes was succeeded by his son ARTAXERXES I.—II. The only legitimate son of Artaxerxes I., succeeded his father as King of Persia in 425, but was murdered after a short reign of only two months by his half-brother Sogdianus, who thus became king.

XIPHILINUS (Ξιφιλίνος), of Trapezus, was a monk at Constantinople, and made an abridgment of Dion Cassius from the thirty-sixth to the eightieth book, at the command of the Emperor Michael VII. Ducas, who reigned from A. D. 1071 to 1078. The work is executed with carelessness, and is only of value as preserving the main facts of the original, the greater part of which is lost. It is printed along with Dion Cassius.

XIPHONIA (Ξιφονία : now Capo di S. Croce), a promontory on the eastern coast of Sicily, above Syracuse, with a harbor (Ξιφώνειος λιμὴν).

XOIS or CHOIS (Χοίς, Χόης, Χοίς), an ancient city of Lower Egypt, north of Leontopolis, on an island of the Nile, in the Nomos Sebennyticus, the seat, at one time, of a dynasty of Egyptian kings. It appears to have entirely perished under the Roman empire, and its site is very doubtful. Some identify it with the Papremis of Herodotus.

XUTHUS (Ξούθος), son of Hellen by the nymph Orseis, and a brother of Dorus and Æolus. He was king of Peloponnesus, and the husband of Creusa, the daughter of Erechtheus, by whom he became the father of Achæus and Ion. Others state that after the death of his father Hellen, Xuthus was expelled from Thessaly by his brothers, and went to Athens, where he married the daughter of Erechtheus. After the death of Erechtheus, Xuthus, being chosen arbitrator, adjudged the kingdom to his eldest brother-in-law Cæcrops, in consequence of which he was expelled by the other sons of Erechtheus, and settled in Ægialius in Peloponnesus.

XYLINE, a town of Pisidia, between Corbasa and Termessus, mentioned by Livy (xxxviii., 15).

XYNIA or XYNLÆ (Ξυνία : Ξυνιεύς : now Taukli), a town of Thessaly, in the district of Pthiotis, east of the lake of the same name (ή Ξυνιάς λιμνη : now Nizero or Dereli).

XYPÉTĒ (Ξυπέτη : Ξυπεταίων, Ξυπετεών, Ξυπεταιωεύς, Ξυπετεεύς, Ξυπέτιος), said to have been anciently called Τροία, a demus of Attica belonging to the tribe Cæropis, near Piræus.

ZABĀTUS (Ζάβατος). Vid. LYCUS, No. 5. [ZABDICENE, a district in Mesopotamia, in which was a city named Zabda or Bezabda.]

ZABE (Ζάβη), a name applied, under the later emperors, to the southern part of Numidia, as far as the border of the Great Desert.

[ZABUS, a river of Assyria, called by the Macedonians Caprus. Vid. CAPRUS.]

ZACYNTHUS (Ζάκυνθος : Ζακύνθιος, Zacynthius : now Zante), an island in the Ionian Sea, off the coast of Elis, about forty miles in circumference. It contained a large and flourishing town of the same name upon the eastern coast, the citadel of which was called Psophis. There are two considerable chains of mountains in the island. The ancient writers mention Mount Elatus, which is probably the same as the modern Scopo in the southeast of the island, and which rises to the height of one thousand five hundred and nine feet. Zacynthus was celebrated in antiquity for its pitch wells, which were visited by Herodotus, and which still supply a large quantity of bitumen. About one hundred tons of bitumen are at the present day annually extracted from these wells. Zacynthus was inhabited by a Greek population at an early period. It is said to have derived its name from Zacynthus, a son of Dardanus, who colonized the island from Psophis in Arcadia ; and, according to an ancient tradition, the Zacynthians founded the town of Saguntum in Spain. Vid. SAGUNTUM. The island is frequently mentioned by Homer, who speaks of it as the "woody Zacynthus." It was afterward colonized by Achæans from Peloponnesus. It formed part of the maritime empire of Athens, and continued faithful to the Athenians during the Peloponnesian war. At a later time it was subject to the Macedonian monarchs, and on the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans passed into the hands of the latter. It is now one of the Ionian islands under the protection of Great Britain.

ZADRACARTA (Ζαδράκαρτα), one of the capital cities and royal residences in Hyrcania, lay at the northern foot of the chief pass through Mount Coronus. (Compare ΤΑΡΞΕ.)

ZAGREUS (Ζαγρεύς), a surname of the mystic Dionysus (Διώνυσος χθόνιος), whom Zeus (Jupiter), in the form of a dragon, is said to have begotten by Persephone (Proserpina), before she was carried off by Pluto. He was torn to pieces by the Titans ; and Athena (Minerva) carried his heart to Zeus (Jupiter).

ZAGROS or -US (ὁ Ζάγρος and τὸ Ζάγριον ὄρος, now Mountains of Kurdistan and Louristan), the general name for the range of mountains forming the southeastern continuation of the Taurus, and the eastern margin of the Tigris and Euphrates valley, from the southwestern side of the Lake Arsissa (now Van) in Armenia, to the northeastern side of the head of the Persian Gulf, and dividing Media from Assyria and Susiana. More specifically, the name Zagros was applied to the central part of the chain, the northern part being called the mountains of the Cordueni or Gordyæi, and the southern part Parachoathras.

ZAITHA or ZAÜTHA (Ζαυθά), a town of Mesopotamia, on the eastern bank of the Euphrates, twenty Roman miles south of Circesium, remarkable as the place at which a monument was erected to the murdered Emperor Gordian by his soldiers.

ZALEUCUS (Ζάλευκος), the celebrated lawgiver of the Epizephyrian Locrians, is said by some to have been originally a slave, but is described by others as a man of good family. He could not, however, have been a disciple of Pythagoras, as some writers state, since he lived upward of one hundred years before Pythagoras. The date of the legislation of Zaleucus is assigned to B. C. 660. His code is stated to have been the first collection of written laws that the Greeks possessed. The general character of his laws was severe ; but they were observed for a long period by the Locrians, who obtained, in consequence, a high reputation for legal order. Among other enactments, we are told that the penalty of adultery was the loss of the eyes. There is a celebrated story of the son of Zaleucus having become liable to this penalty, and the father himself suffering the loss of one eye that his son might not be utterly blinded. It is further related that among his laws was one forbidding any citizen, under penalty of death, to enter the senate house in arms. On one occa sion, however, on a sudden emergency in time of war, Zaleucus transgressed his own law, which was remarked to him by one present; whereupon he fell upon his own sword, declaring that he would himself vindicate the law. Other authors tell the same story of Charondas, or of Diocles.

ZALMOXIS or ZAMOLXIS (Ζάλμοξις, Ζάμολξις), said to have been so called from the bear's skin (Ζάλμοξ) in which he was clothed as soon as he was born. He was, according to the story current among the Greeks on the Hellespont, a Getan, who had been a slave to Pythagoras in Samos, but was manumitted, and acquired not only great wealth, but large stores of knowledge from Pythagoras, and from the Egyptians, whom he visited in the course of his travels. He returned among the Getæ, introducing the civilization and the religious ideas which he had gained, especially regarding the immortality of the soul. He was said to have lived in a subterranean cave for three years, and after that to have again made his appearance among the Getæ. Herodotus inclines to place the age of Zalmoxis a long time before Pythagoras, and expresses a doubt not only about the story itself, but as to whether Zalmoxis were a man, or an indigenous Getan deity. The latter appears to have been the real state of the case. The Getæ believed that the departed went to him.

ZAMA REGIA (Ζάμα: Zamensis: now Zovareen, southeast of Kaff), a strongly-fortified city in the interior of Numidia, on the borders of the Carthaginian territory. It was the ordinary residence of King Juba, who had here his treasury and his harem. It was the scene of one of the most important battles in the history of the world, that in which Hannibal was defeated by Scipio, and the second Punic war was ended, B.C. 202. Strabo tells us that it was destroyed by the Romans; but if, so, it must have been restored, for we find it mentioned under the empire as a colony and a bishop's see. Pliny and Vitruvius speak of a fountain in its neighborhood. There were unimportant places of the same name in Cappadocia and Mesopotamia.

ZANCLE. Vid. MESSANA.

ZAPAORTENE, a city in the southeast of Parthia, in the mountains of the Zapaorteni.

ZARADRUS (now Sutlej), a river of Northern India, now the southern boundary of the Punjab. It rises from two principal sources beyond the Himalaya, and falls into the Hyphasis (now Gharra).

ZARANGÆ or -I, or SARANGÆ (Ζαράγγοι, Σαράγγαι), a people in the north of Drangiana, on the confines of Aria. The close resemblance of their name to the generic name of all the people of Drangiana, that is, Drangæ, suggests a doubt whether they ought to be specifically distinguished from them.

ZARAX or ZAREX (Ζάραξ, Ζάρηξ). 1. The central part of the chain of mountains, extending along the eastern coast of Laconia from Mount Parnon, on the frontiers of Argolis, down to the promontory Malea.—2. (Now Jeraka), a town on the eastern coast of Laconia, at the foot of the mountain o. the same name.

ZARIASPE. Vid. BACTRA.

ZARIASPIS, an earlier, probably the native name for the river on which Bactra stood, and which is usually called Bactrus. Vid. BACTRA. The people on its banks were called Zariaspæ.

ZELA or ZIELA (τὰ Ζήλα: now Zilleh), a city in the south of Pontus, not far south of Amasia, and four days' journey east of Tavium. It stood on an artificial hill, and was strongly fortified. Near it was an ancient and famous temple of Anaitis and other Persian deities, in which great religious festivals were held. The surrounding district was called Zeletis or Zelitis. At Zela the Roman general Valerius Triarius was defeated by Mithradates; but the city is more celebrated for another great battle, that in which Julius Cæsar defeated Pharnaces, and of which he wrote this dispatch to Rome: VENI: VIDI: VICI.

[ZELARCHUS (Ζήλαρχος), an inspector of the market (ἀγορανόμος) among the Greek mercenaries of Cyrus, attacked by the soldiers for some real or imaginary misconduct in his official duty while they were at Trapezus; avoided the attack, and escaped from Trapezus by sea.]

ZELASŪM, a Thessalian town in the district Phthiotis, of uncertain site.

ZELIA (Ζέλια), an ancient city of Mysia, at the foot of Mount Ida, and on the River Æsepus, eighty stadia from its mouth, belonging to the territory of Cyzicus. At the time of Alexander's invasion the head-quarters of the Persian army were fixed here.

ZELUS (Ζήλος), the personification of zeal or strife, is described as a son of Pallas and Styx, and a brother of Nice.

ZENO, ZENON (Ζήνων). 1. The founder of the Stoic philosophy, was a native of Citium in Cyprus, and the son of Mnæas. He began at an early age to study philosophy through the writings of the Socratic philosophers, which his father was accustomed to bring back from Athens when he went thither on trading voyages. At the age of twenty-two, or, according to others, of thirty years, Zeno was shipwrecked in the neighborhood of Piræus; whereupon he was led to settle in Athens, and to devote himself entirely to the study of philosophy. According to some writers, he lost all his property in the shipwreck; according to others, he still retained a large fortune; but, whichever of these accounts is correct, his moderation and contentment became proverbial, and a recognition of his virtues shines through even the ridicule of the comic poets. The weakness of his health is said to have first determined him to live rigorously and simply; but his desire to make himself independent of all external circumstances seems to have been an additional motive, and to have led him to attach himself to the cynic Crates. In opposition to the advice of Crates, he studied under Stilpo of the Megaric school; and he subsequently received instruction from the two other contemporary Megarics, Diodorus Cronus and Philo, and from the Academics Xenocrates and Polemo. The period which Zeno thus devoted to study is said to have extended to twenty years. At its close, and after he had developed his peculiar philosophical system, he opened his school in the porch adorned with the paintings of Polygnotus (Stoa Pæcile), which, at an earlier time, had been a place in which poets met. From this place his disciples were called Stoics. Among the warm admirers of Zeno was Antigonus Gonatas, king of Macedonia. The Athenians likewise placed the greatest confidence in him, and displayed the greatest esteem for him; for, although the well-known story that they deposited the keys of the fortress with him, as the most trustworthy man, may be a later invention, there seems no reason for doubting the authenticity of the decree of the people by which a golden crown and a public burial in the Ceramicus were awarded to him. The Athenian citizenship, however, he is said to have declined, that he might not become unfaithful to his native land, where, in return, he was highly esteemed. We do not know the year either of Zeno's birth or death. He is said to have presided over his school for fifty-eight years, and to have died at the age of ninety-eight. He is said to have been still alive in the one hundred and thirtieth Olympiad (B.C. 260). Zeno wrote numerous works; but the writings of Chrysippus and the later Stoics seem to have obscured those of Zeno, and even the warm adherents of the school seem seldom to have gone back to the books of its founder. Hence it is difficult to ascertain how much of the later Stoic philosophy really belongs to Zeno.—2. The Eleatic philosopher, was a native of Elea (Velia) in Italy, son of Teleutagoras, and the favorite disciple of Parmenides. He was born about B.C. 488, and at the age of forty accompanied Parmenides to Athens. Vid. PARMENIDES. He appears to have resided some time at Athens, and is said to have unfolded his doctrines to men like Pericles and Callias for the price of one hundred minæ. Zeno is said to have taken part in the legislation of Parmenides, to the maintenance of which the citizens of Elea had pledged themselves every year by an oath. His love of freedom is shown by the courage with which he exposed his life in order to deliver his native country from a tyrant. Whether he perished in the attempt, or survived the fall of the tyrant, is a point on which the authorities vary. They also state the name of the tyrant differently. Zeno devoted all his energies to explain and develop the philosophical system of Parmenides. Vid. PARMENIDES.—3. An Epicurean philosopher, a native of Sidon, was a contemporary of Cicero, who heard him when at Athens. He was sometimes termed Coryphaeus Epicureorum. He seems to have been noted for the disrespectful terms in which he spoke of other philosophers. For instance, he called Socrates the Attic buffoon. He was a disciple of Apollodorus, and is described as a clear-headed thinker and perspicuous expounder of his views.

ZĒNŌBĪA, queen of Palmyra. After the death of her husband Odenathus, whom, according to some accounts, she assassinated (A.D. 266), she assumed the imperial diadem as regent for her sons, and discharged all the active duties of a sovereign. But not content with enjoying the independence conceded by Gallienus and tolerated by Claudius, she sought to include all Syria, Asia, and Egypt within the limits of her sway, and to make good the title which she claimed of Queen of the East. By this rash ambition she lost both her kingdom and her liberty. She was defeated by Aurelian, taken prisoner on the capture of Palmyra (273), and carried to Rome, where she adorned the triumph of her conqueror (274). Her life was spared by Aurelian, and she passed the remainder of her years with her sons in the vicinity of Tibur (now Tivoli). Longinus lived at her court, and was put to death on the capture of Palmyra. Vid. LONGINUS.

ZĒNŌBĪA (Zηνοβία: now Chelebi or Zelebi), a city of Chalybonitis, in Syria, on the west bank of the Euphrates, three days' journey both from Sura and from Circesium. It was founded by Zenobia.

ZĒNŌBĪŪS (Zηνοβίος), lived at Rome in the time of Hadrian, and was the author of a collection of proverbs in Greek, which have come down to us. In this collection the proverbs are arranged alphabetically, and divided into hundreds. The last division is incomplete, the total number collected being five hundred and fifty-two. It is printed in the collection of Schottus (Παροιμίας Ἑλληνικαί, Antwerp, 1612), [in the Paræmiographi Græci of Gaisford, Oxford, 1836, and of Leutsch and Schneidewin, Göttingen, 1839.]

ZĒNŌDŌRŪS, a Greek artist, who made for Nero the colossal statue of that emperor, which he set up in front of the Golden House, and which was afterward dedicated afresh by Vespasian as a statue of the Sun. It was one hundred and ten feet in height.

ZĒNŌDŌRĪŪM or -ĪA (Zηνοδότιον, Ζηνοδοτία), a fortress in the north of Mesopotamia, on the small tributary of the Euphrates called Bilecha, a little above Nicephorium, and below Ichnæ. It was a Macedonian settlement, and the only one of the Greek cities of Mesopotamia which did not revolt from the Parthians at the approach of Crassus.

ZĒNŌDŌRŪS (Zηνοδότος). 1. Of Ephesus, a celebrated grammarian, was the first superintendent of the great library at Alexandria, and flourished under Ptolemy Philadelphus about B.C. 208. Zenodotus was employed by Philadelphus, together with his two great contemporaries, Alexander the Ætolian, and Lycophron the Chalcidian, to collect and revise all the Greek poets. Alexander, we are told, undertook the task of collecting the tragedies, Lycophron the comedies, and Zenodotus the poems of Homer and of the other illustrious poets. Zenodotus, however, devoted his chief attention to the Iliad and Odyssey. Hence he is called the first Reviser (Διορθητής) of Homer, and his recession (Διόρθωσις) of the Iliad and Odyssey obtained the greatest celebrity. The corrections which Zenodotus applied to the text of Homer were of three kinds. 1. He expunged verses. 2. He marked them as spurious, but left them in his copy. 3. He introduced new readings, or transposed or altered verses. The great attention which Zenodotus paid to the language of Homer caused a new epoch in the grammatical study of the Greek language. The results of his investigations respecting the meaning and the use of words were contained in two works which he published under the title of a Glossary (Γλῶσσαι), and a Dictionary of barbarous or foreign phrases.—2. Of Alexandria, a grammarian, lived after Aristarchus, whose recession of the Homeric poems he attacked.

ZEPHYRA. Vid. HALICARNASSUS.

ZEPHYRĪUM (Ζεφύριον, sc. ἀκρωτήριον, i. e., the western promontory), the name of several promontories of the ancient world, not all of which, however, faced the west. The chief of them were the following: I. In Europe. 1. (Now Capo di Brussano), a promontory in Bruttium, forming the southeastern extremity of the country, from which the Locri, who settled in the neighborhood, are said to have obtained the name of Epizephyrii. Vid. p. 445, b.—2. A promontory on the western coast of Cyprus.—II. In Asia. 1. In Pontus (now Cape Zefreh), a headland west of TRIPOLIS, with a fort and harbor of the same name.—2. Vid. CARIA.—3. In Cilicia (now probably Cape Cavaliere), a far-projecting promontory, west of Promontorium Sarpedon. Some make it the headland east of Promontorium Sarpedon, and just south of the mouth of the Calycadnus, which Polybius, Appian, and Livy call by the same name as the river, Calycadnus.—III. In Africa (now Kasser Maarah), a headland on the northeastern coast of Cyrenaica, west of Darnis.

ZEPHYRUS (Ζέφυρος), the personification of the west wind, is described by Hesiod as a son of Astræus and Eos (Aurora): Zephyrus and Boreas are frequently mentioned together by Homer, and both dwell together in a palace in Thrace. By the Harpy Podge, Zephyrus became the father of the horses Xanthus and Balius, which belonged to Achilles; but he was married to Chloris, whom he had carried off by force, and by whom he had a son Carpus.

[ZERNA (Zernensis), a city of Dacia, a Roman colony, situated a short distance east of the Pons Trajani: it is sometimes called Colonia Zernensium.]

ZERYNTHUS (Ζήρυνθος: Ζηρύνθιος), a town of Thrace, in the territory of Ænos, with a temple of Apollo and a cave of Hecate, who are hence called Zerynthius and Zerynthia respectively. Some writers, however, place the Zerynthian cave of Hecate in Samothrace.

ZĒTĒS (Ζήτης) and CALĀIS (Κάλαις), sons of Boreas and Orithyia, frequently called the BOREADÆ, are mentioned among the Argonauts, and are described as winged beings. Their sister Cleopatra, who was married to Phineus, king of Salmydessus, had been thrown with her sons into prison by Phineus at the instigation of his second wife. Here she was found by Zetes and Calais, when they arrived at Salmydessus in the Argonautic expedition. They liberated their sister and his children, gave the kingdom to the latter, and sent the second wife of Phineus to her own country, Scythia. Others relate that the Boreadæ delivered Phineus from the Harpies; for it had been foretold that the Harpies might be killed by the sons of Boreas, but that the sons of Boreas must die if they should not be able to overtake the Harpies. Others, again, state that the Boreadæ perished in their pursuit of the Harpies, or that Hercules killed them with his arrows near the island of Tenos. Different stories were related to account for the anger of Hercules against the Boreadæ. Their tombs were said to be in Tenos, adorned with sepulchral stelæ, one of which moved whenever the wind blew from the north. Calais is also mentioned as the founder of the Campanian town of Cales.

ZĒTHUS (Ζήθος), son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Antiope, and brother of Amphion. For details, vid. AMPHION.

ZĒUGIS, ZEUGITĀNA REGIO (ἡ Ζευγιτανή: northern part of Tunis), the northern district of Africa Propria. Vid. AFRICA.

ZĒUGMA (Ζεύγμα, i. e., Junction: now probably Rumkaleh), a city of Syria, on the borders of Commagene and Cyrrhestice, built by Seleucus Nicator, on the western bank of the Euphrates, at a point where the river was crossed by a bridge of boats, which had been constructed by Alexander the Great: hence the name. Afterward, when the ford of Thapsacus became impassable for travellers, on account of the hordes of Arabs who infested the banks of the Lower Euphrates, the bridge at Zeugma gave the only passage over the river.

ZEUS (Ζεύς), called JŪPĪTER by the Romans, the greatest of the Olympian gods, was a son of Cronos (Saturn) and Rhea, a brother of Poseidon (Neptune), Hades (Pluto), Hestia (Vesta), Demeter (Ceres), Hera (Juno), and was also married to his sister Hera (Juno). When Zeus (Jupiter) and his brothers distributed among themselves the government of the world by lot, Poseidon (Neptune) obtained the sea, Hades (Pluto) the lower world, and Zeus (Jupiter) the heavens and the upper regions, but the earth became common to all. According to the Homeric account, Zeus (Jupiter) dwelt on Mount Olympus in Thessaly, which was believed to penetrate with its lofty summit into heaven itself. He is called the father of gods and men, the most high and powerful among the immortals, whom all others obey. He is the supreme ruler, who, with his counsel, manages every thing; the founder of kingly power, and of law and of order, whence Dice, Themis, and Nemesis are his assistants. For the same reason, he protects the assembly of the people (ἀγοραῖος), the meetings of the council (βουλαῖος), and as he presides over the whole state, so also over every house and family (ἑρκεῖος). He also watched over the sanctity of the oath (ὄρκιος) and the laws of hospitality (ξένιος), and protected suppliants (λκέσιος). He avenged those who were wronged, and punished those who had committed a crime, for he watched the doings and sufferings of all men (ἐπόψιος). He was further the original source of all prophetic power, from whom all prophetic signs and sounds proceeded (πανομφαῖος). Every thing good as well as bad comes from Zeus (Jupiter); according to his own choice, he assigns good or evil to mortals; and fate itself was subordinate to him. He is armed with thunder and lightning, and the shaking of his ægis produces storm and tempest: a number of epithets of Zeus (Jupiter) in the Homeric poems describe him as the thunderer, the gatherer of clouds, and the like. He was married to Hera (Juno), by whom he had two sons, Ares (Mars) and Hephaestus (Vulcan), and one daughter, Hebe. Hera (Juno) sometimes acts as an independent divinity; she is ambitious, and rebels against her lord, but she is nevertheless inferior to him, and is punished for her opposition; his amours with other goddesses or mortal women are no concealed from her, though they generally rouse her jealousy and revenge. During the Trojan war, Zeus (Jupiter), at the request of Thetis, favored the Trojans, until Agamemnon repaired the wrong he had done to Achilles. Zeus (Jupiter), no doubt, was originally a god of a portion of nature. Hence the oak, with its eatable fruit, and the fertile doves, were sacred to him at Dodona and in Areadia. Hence, also, rain, storms, and the seasons were regarded as his work; and hence, likewise, the Cretan stories of milk, honey, and the cornucopia. In the Homeric poems, however, this primitive character of a personification of certain powers of nature is already effaced to some extent, and the god appears as a political and national divinity, as the king and father of men, as the founder and protector of all institutions hallowed by law, custom, or religion. Hesiod also calls Zeus (Jupiter) the son of Cronos (Saturn) and Rhea, and the brother of Hestia (Vesta), Demeter (Ceres), Hera (Juno), Hades (Pluto), and Poseidon (Neptune). Cronos (Saturn) swallowed his children immediately after their birth; but when Rhea was pregnant with Zeus (Jupiter), she applied to Uranus (Cælus) and Ge (Terra) to save the life of the child. Uranus (Cælus) and Ge (Terra) therefore sent Rhea to Lyctos in Crete, requesting her to bring up her child there. Rhea accordingly concealed Zeus (Jupiter) in a cave of Mount Ægæon, and gave to Cronos (Saturn) a stone wrapped up in cloth, which he swallowed in the belief that it was his son. Other traditions state that Zeus (Jupiter) was born and brought up on Mount Dictæ or Ida (also the Trojan Ida), Ithome in Messenia, Thebes in Bœotia, Ægion in Achaia, or Olenos in Ætolia. According to the common account, however, Zeus (Jupiter) grew up in Crete. In the mean time, Cronos (Saturn), by a cunning device of Ge (Terra) or Metis, was made to bring up the children he had swallowed, and first of all the stone, which was afterward set up by Zeus (Jupiter) at Delphi. The young god now delivered the Cyclopes from the bonds with which they had been fettered by Cronos (Saturn), and they, in their gratitude, provided him with thunder and lightning. On the advice of Ge (Terra), Zeus (Jupiter) also liberated the hundred-armed Gigantes, Briareos, Cottus, and Gyes, that they might assist him in his fight against the Titans. The Titans were conquered and shut up in Tartarus, where they were henceforth guarded by the Hecatoncheires. Thereupon Tartarus and Ge (Terra) begot Typhœus, who began a fearful struggle with Zeus (Jupiter), but was conquered. Zeus (Jupiter) now obtained the dominion of the world, and chose Metis for his wife. When she was pregnant with Athena (Minerva), he took the child out of her body and concealed it in his head, on the advice of Uranus (Cælus) and Ge (Terra), who told him that thereby he would retain the supremacy of the world; for if Metis had given birth to a son, this son (so fate had ordained it) would have acquired the sovereignty. After this, Zeus (Jupiter) became the father of the Horæ and Mœræ by his second wife Themis; of the Charites by Eurynome; of Persephone (Proserpina) by Demeter (Ceres); of the Muses by Mnemosyne; of Apollo and Artemis (Diana) by Leto (Latona); and of Hebe, Ares (Mars), and Ilithyia by Hera (Juno). Athena was born out of the head of Zeus (Jupiter); while Hera (Juno), on the other hand, gave birth to Hephæstus (Vulcan) without the co-operation of Zeus (Jupiter). The family of the Cronidæ accordingly embraces the twelve great gods of Olympus, Zeus (Jupiter, the head of them all), Poseidon (Neptune), Apollo, Ares (Mars), Hermes (Mercury), Hephæstus (Vulcan), Hestia (Vesta), Demeter (Ceres), Hera (Juno), Athena (Minerva), Aphrodite (Venus), and Artemis (Diana). These twelve Olympian gods, who in some places were worshipped as a body, were recognized not only by the Greeks, but were adopted also by the Romans, who, in particular, identified their Jupiter with the Greek Zeus. In surveying the different local traditions about Zeus, it would seem that originally there were several, or at least three, divinities which in their respective countries were supreme, but which in the course of time became united in the minds of the people into one great national divinity. We may accordingly speak of an Arcadian, Dodonæan, Cretan, and a national Hellenic Zeus.

1. The Arcadian Zeus (Ζεύς Ἀρκάδιος) was born, according to the legends of the country, in Arcadia, either on Mount Parrhasium or on Mount Lycæus. He was brought up there by the nymphs Thisoa, Neda, and Hagno. Lycaon, a son of Pelagus, erected a temple to Zeus Lycaeus on Mount Lycæus, and instituted the festival of the Lycea in honor of him. Vid. ΛΥΣΣΕΥΣ, ΛΥΣΛΟΝ. No one was allowed to enter this sanctuary of Zeus Lycaeus on Mount Lycæus.

2. The Dodonæan Zeus (Ζεύς Δωδωναίος or Πελασγικός) possessed the most ancient oracle in Greece, at Dodona in Epirus, from which he derived his name. At Dodona Zeus was mainly a prophetic god, and the oak tree was sacred to him; but there, too, he was said to have been reared by the Dodonæan nymphs (Hyades). Respecting the Dodonæan oracle of Zeus, vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. ΟΡΑΚΛΕΥΜ.

3. The Cretan Zeus (Ζεύς Δικταίος or Κρηταγενής). We have already given Hesiod's account of this god. He was brought up in a cave of Mount Dictæ by the Curetes and the nymphs Adrastia and Ida, the daughters of Melisseus. They fed him with the milk of the goat Amalthea, and the bees of the mountain provided him with honey. Crete is called the island or nurse of the great Zeus, and his worship there appears to have been very ancient.

4. The national Hellenic Zeus, near whose temple at Olympia, in Elis, the great national panegyris was celebrated once in four years. There, too, Zeus was regarded as the father and king of gods and men, and as the supreme god of the Hellenic nation. His statue there was executed by Phidias, a few years before the outbreak of the Peloponnesian war, the majestic and sublime idea of this statue having been suggested to the artist by the words of Homer (Il., i., 527). Vid. ΦΙΔΙΑΣ. The Greek and Latin poets give to Zeus or Jupiter an immense number of epithets and surnames, which are derived partly from the places where he was worshipped, and partly from his powers and functions. The eagle, the oak, and the summits of mountains were sacred to him, and his sacrifices generally consisted of goats, bulls, and cows. His usual attributes are the sceptre, eagle, thunderbolt, and a figure of Victory in his hand, and sometimes also a cornucopia. The Olympian Zeus sometimes wears a wreath of olive, and the Dodonæan Zeus a wreath of oak leaves. In works of art Zeus is generally represented as the omnipotent father and king of gods and men, according to the idea which had been embodied in the statue of the Olympian Zeus by Phidias. Respecting the Roman god, vid. JUPITER.

ZEUXIDĀMOS (Ζευξίδαμος). 1. King of Sparta, and tenth of the Eurypontidae. He was grandson of Theopompus, and father of Anaxidamus, who succeeded him. — 2. Son of Leotychides, king of Sparta. He was also named Cyniscus. He died before his father, leaving a son, Archidamus II.

ZEUXIS (Ζεύξις), the celebrated Greek painter, who excelled all his contemporaries except Parrhasius, was a native of Heraclea (probably of the city of this name on the Euxine), and flourished B.C. 424–400. He came to Athens soon after the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, when he had already achieved a great reputation, although a young man. He passed some time in Macedonia, at the court of Archelaüs, for whom he decorated the royal palace at Pella with paintings, probably soon after 413. He must have spent some time in Magna Græcia, as we learn from the story respecting the picture of Helen, which he painted for the city of Croton; and it is also probable that he visited Sicily, as we are told that he gave away one of his pictures to the Agrigentines. His travels through Greece itself were no doubt extensive. We find him at Olympia, where he made an ostentatious display, before the eyes of all Greece, of the wealth which his art had brought him, by appearing in a robe embroidered with his own name in letters of gold. After acquiring a great fortune by the exercise of his art, he adopted the custom of giving away his pictures; because no adequate price could be set upon them. The time of his death is unknown. The master-piece of Zeuxis was his picture of Helen, in painting which he had as his models the five most beautiful virgins of Croton, whom he was allowed to select for this purpose from among all the virgins of the city. It was painted for the temple of Juno at Croton. This picture and its history were celebrated by many poets, who preserved the names of the five virgins upon whom the choice of Zeuxis fell. The accurate imitation of inanimate objects was a department of the art which Zeuxis and his younger rival Parrhasius appear to have carried almost to perfection. The well-known story of the trial of skill in that species of painting between these two artists, if not literally true, indicates the opinion which was held in ancient times of their powers of imitation. In this contest the picture of Zeuxis represented a bunch of grapes, so naturally painted that the birds flew at the picture to eat the fruit; upon which the artist, confident in this proof of his success, called upon his rival no longer to delay to draw aside the curtain and show his picture; but the picture of Parrhasius was the curtain itself, which Zeuxis had mistaken for real drapery.

On discovering his error, Zeuxis honorably yielded the palm to Parrhasius, saying that he himself had deceived birds, but Parrhasius an artist. Besides this accuracy of imitation, many of the works of Zeuxis displayed great dramatic power. This appears to have been especially the case with his Infant Hercules strangling the Serpent, where the chief force of the composition consisted in the terror of Alcmena and Amphitryon as they witnessed the struggle. Another picture, in which he showed the same dramatic power, applied to a very different subject, was his Female Hippocentaur, and which was lost in a shipwreck off Cape Malea, on its way to Rome, whether it had been sent by Sulla.

ΖΙΚΛΑ (Σέκελλα, Σέκελα), a town in the southwest of Palestine, belonging to the Philistines of Gath, whose king Achish gave it to David for a residence during his exile from the court of Saul. On David's accession to the kingdom, it was united to Judah.

[ZILIA, ZELIS (Ζήλις), ZELES (Ζέλεις), ZELAS or ZILIS (now Ar-Zila), an ancient Punic city in Mauretania Tingitana, at the mouth of a river of the same name, south of Tingis; after the time of Augustus, a Roman colony, with the appellation Julia Constantia: according to Strabo, its inhabitants were transferred to a town in Spain. Vid. TRADUCTA JULIA.]

ZIOBETIS ([not Zioberis as commonly written, vid. Zumpt ad Curt., vi., 10], now Jinjeran), a river of Parthia, [the same as the Stibetes (Στιβοίτης) of Diodorus, flows a short distance, then disappears under ground; after a subterranean course of three hundred stadia it reappears, and flows on in a broader current until it unites with the Ridagnus. Forbiger, following Mannert, considers the united stream the CHOATRES of Ammianus (now Adschi-Su).]

ZION. Vid. JERUSALEM.

ZOAR or TZOAR, ZOĀRA or ZOĀRAS (Ζόαρ, Ζόαρα: LXX., Ζηγώρ and Ζόγορα: now probably ruins in Ghor el Mezraa, on the Wady el Deraah), originally called BĒLA, a city on the southeast of the Dead Sea, belonging first to the Moabites, and afterward to the Arabs. In the time of Abraham it was the smallest of the "cities of the plain," and was saved, at the intercession of Lot, from the destruction which fell upon Sodom and Gomorrhah.

ZĒTĪUM or ZĒTĒUM (Ζοίτιον, Ζοίτειον: Ζοίτειός), a town of Arcadia, in the district Eutresia, north of Megalopolis.

ZŌILUS (Ζωίλος), a grammarian, was a native of Amphipolis, and flourished in the time of Philip of Macedon. He was celebrated for the asperity with which he assailed Homer. He found fault with him principally for introducing fabulous and incredible stories in his poems. From the list that we have of his writings, it also appears that he attacked Plato and Isocrates. His name became proverbial for a captious and malignant critic.

ZŌNĀRAS, JOANNES (Ἰωάννης ὁ Ζωνάρης), a celebrated Byzantine historian and theologian, lived in the twelfth century under the emperors Alexis I. Comnenus and Calo-Joannes. Besides his theological works, there are still extant, 1. Annales (χρονοκόν), in eighteen books, from the creation of the world to the death of Alexis in 1118. It is compiled from various Greek authors, whose very words Zonaras frequently retains. The earlier part is chiefly taken from Josephus; and in the portion which relates to Roman history, he has, for the most part, followed Dion Cassius. In consequence of the latter circumstance, the Annals of Zonaras are of great importance in studying the early history of Rome. Of the first twenty books of Dion Cassius we have nothing but the abstract of Zonaras; and even of the later books, of which Xiphilinus has made a more full epitome, Zonaras has preserved many statements of Dion which are entirely omitted by Xiphilinus. The best editions are by Du Fresne du Cange, Paris, 1686, fol.; and by Pinder, Bonn, 1841, 8vo. 2. A Lexicon, edited by Tittmann, Lips., 1808, 4to.

ZŌNĒ (Ζώνη: Ζωναίος), a town of Thrace, on a promontory of the same name in the Ægean, where Orpheus is said to have sung.

ZŌPŪRUS (Ζώπυρος). 1. A distinguished Persian, son of Megabyzus. After Darius Hystaspis had besieged Babylon for twenty months in vain, Zopyrus resolved to gain the place for his master by the most extraordinary self-sacrifice. Accordingly, one day he appeared before Darius with his body mutilated in the most horrible manner; both his ears and nose were cut off, and his person otherwise disfigured. After explaining to Darius his intentions, he fled to Babylon as a victim of the cruelty of the Persian king. The Babylonians gave him their confidence, and placed him at the head of their troops. He soon found means to betray the city to Darius, who severely punished the inhabitants for their revolt. Darius appointed Zopyrus satrap of Babylon for life, with the enjoyment of its entire revenues.—[2. The son of Megabyzus, and grandson of the preceding, revolted from the Persians, and fled to Athens.]—3. The Physiognomist, attributed many vices to Socrates in an assembly of his disciples, who laughed at him and at his art in consequence; but Socrates admitted that such were his natural propensities, but said that they had been overcome by philosophy.—[4. A Thraecian, a slave of Pericles, assigned by him, as the least useful, from old age, of all his slaves, to Alcibiades as his pædagogus.]—5. A surgeon at Alexandria, the tutor of Apollonius Citiensis and Posidonius, about the beginning of the first century B.C. He invented an antidote, used by Mithradates, king of Pontus.

ZOROASTER or ZOROASTRES (Ζωροάστρης), the ZARATHUSTRA of the Zendavesta, and the ZERDUSHT of the Persians, was the founder of the Magian religion. The most opposite opinions have been held both by ancient and modern writers respecting the time in which he lived; but it is quite impossible to come to any conclusion on the subject. As the founder of the Magian religion, he must be placed in remote antiquity, and it may even be questioned whether such a person ever existed. This religion was probably of Bactrian origin, and from thence spread eastward; and the tradition which represents Zoroaster a Mede sprang up at a later time, when the chief seat of his religion was in Media, and no longer in the further East. There were extant in the later Greek literature several works bearing the name of Zoroaster; but these writings were forgeries of a later age, and belong to the same class of writings as the works of Hermes Trismegistus, Orpheus, &c. There is still extant a collection of oracles ascribed to Zoroaster, which are of course spurious. They have been published by Morell Paris, 1595; by Obsopæus, Paris, 1507, and by others.

[ZORZINES or ZORSINES, king of the Siraci, a people of Sarnatia Asiatica, in whose territory was the city USPE, taken by the Romans in the reign of Claudius.]

[ZOSIMUS, a learned freedman of the younger Pliny, remarkable for his talents as a comedian and musician, as well as for his excellence as a reader.]

ZŌSĪMUS (Ζώσιμος), a Greek historian, who lived in the time of the younger Theodosius. He wrote a history of the Roman empire in six books, which is still extant. This work must have been written after A.D. 425, as an event is mentioned in it which took place in that year. The first book comprises a sketch of the history of the early emperors, down to the end of the reign of Diocletian (305). The second, third, and fourth books are devoted to the history of the fourth century, which is treated much less concisely. The fifth and sixth books embrace the period from 395 to 410, when Attalus was deposed. The work of Zosimus is mainly (though not altogether) an abridgment or compilation of the works of previous historians. His style is concise, clear, pure, and not unpleasing. His chief fault as an historical writer is his neglect of chronology. Zosimus was a pagan, and comments severely upon the faults and crimes of the Christian emperors. Hence his credibility has been assailed by several Christian writers. There are, no doubt, numerous errors of judgment to be found in the work, and sometimes (especially in the case of Constantine) an intemperate expression of opinion, which somewhat exaggerates, if it does not distort, the truth. But he does not seem fairly chargeable with deliberate invention or willful misrepresentation. The best editions are by Reichenow, Lips., 1784, [and by Imm. Bekker, Bonn, 1837.]

ZOSTĒR (now Cape of Vari), a promontory on the west of Attica, between Phalerum and Sounium. It was a sacred spot, and contained altars of Leto (Latona), Artemis (Diana), and Apollo.

ZYGANTES or GYGANTES (Ζύγαντες, Γύγαντες), a people of Libya, whom Herodotus places on the western side of the Lake Triton. Others mention a city Zygantia and a people Zyges on the coast of Marmarica

II. TABLES OF MEASURES, WEIGHTS, AND MONEY,

FROM THE DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQUITIES.

In the construction of these Tables, the same authorities have been used as those referred to in the articles in the body of the work. Particular acknowledgment is due of the assistance which has been derived from the Tables of Hussey and Wurm. The last two Tables (of Greek and Roman money) have been taken without alteration from Mr. Hussey's, because they were thought incapable of improvement, except one addition in the Table of Attic Money. All the calculations, however, have been made de novo, even where the results are the same as in Mr. Hussey's Tables.

The Tables are so arranged as to exhibit the corresponding Greek and Roman measures in direct comparison with each other. In some of the Tables the values are given, not only in our several measures, but also in decimals of a primary unit, for the purpose of facilitating calculations. In others, approximate values are given, that is, values which differ from the true ones by some small fraction, and which, from their simplicity, will perhaps be found far more useful for ordinary purposes than the precise quantities, while the error, in each case, can easily be corrected. Fuller information will be found under MENSURA, NUMMUS, PONDERA, and the specific names, in the DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQUITIES.

RULES

CONVERSION OF THE OLYMPIADS AND THE YEARS OF ROME (A.U.C.) INTO YEARS BEFORE AND AFTER THE BIRTH OF CHRIST.

THE Olympiads commenced in the year 3938 of the Julian period, or B.C. 776. Each Olympiad contains 4 years. The year of Rome commenced B.C. 753.

To ascertain the years before or after Christ of any Olympiad, take the number of Olympiads actually completed, multiply that number by 4, and if the product be less than 776, subtract that product from 776; the remainder will be the years before Christ. If the product be more than 776, subtract 776 from that product, and the remainder will be the years after Christ.

We thus obtain the year before or after Christ of the last complete Olympiad: we must now include the single years of the current Olympiad. To put down these correctly—if before Christ, subtract the last completed year (viz., the number 1, 2, or 3 immediately preceding); if after Christ, add the current year; the product will be the year before or after Christ, corresponding to the current year of the current Olympiad.

For Example: Let the 3d year of the 87th Olympiad be the year to be converted. The number of Olympiads actually completed is 86; multiply that number by 4, and the total will be 344. Subtract this number (being less than 776) from 776, and the remainder will be 432; subtract further the last completed year of the current Olympiad (viz., 2), and the year 430 before Christ will be the corresponding year.

Suppose it were the 2d year of the 248th Olympiad. Multiply 247, the number of Olympiads actually completed, by 4, and the total will be 988; as that number is larger than 776, deduct 776 from 988, and the remainder, 212, will be the year of the last complete Olympiad: add 2 for the current year of the current Olympiad, and 214 after Christ (A.D. 214) will be the corresponding year.

To find the year before or after Christ which corresponds to any given year of the Building of Rome, add 1 year (for the current year) to 753, and from the total, 754, subtract the given year of Rome; the remainder will be the corresponding year before Christ. If the given year of Rome exceed 753, subtract 753 from the given number, and the remainder will be the corresponding year after Christ.

For Example: Cæsar invaded Britain in the year of Rome 699. Deduct 699 from 754, and that event is seen to correspond with the year B.C. 55. The Romans finally left Britain in the year of Rome 1179. Subtract 753 from 1179, and the remainder, 426, will be the year of our Lord in which that event took place.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES OF GREEK HISTORY,

FROM THE FIRST OLYMPIAD, B.C. 776, TO THE FALL OF CORINTH, B.C. 146.

B.C.

- 776 Corœbus the Elean gains the victory in the foot-race at the Olympic games. The Olympic games were instituted by Iphitus the Elean about B.C. 884, but the Olympiads were not employed as a chronological era till the victory of Corœbus.
- 775 Arctinus of Miletus, the Cyclic poet, flourished.
- 774 Pandosia and Metapontum, in Italy, founded.
- 765 Cinæthon of Lacedæmon, the Cyclic poet, flourished.
- 761 Eumelus flourished.
- 753 Antimachus of Teos flourished.
- 750 Miletus at the height of its power. Many of its colonies founded about this time or a little later.
- 748 Phidon, tyrant of Argos, celebrates the 8th Olympic games. He introduced copper and silver coinage, and a new scale of weights and measures, throughout the Peloponnesus.

GALBA (æt. 73) is slain January 15th. Otho had formed a conspiracy against him.
OTHO (æt. 36) emperor from January 15th to his death, April 16th, was acknowledged as emperor by the senate on the death of Galba.
VITELLIUS (æt. 54) was proclaimed emperor at Cologne on January 2d, acknowledged as emperor by the senate on the death of Otho, and reigned till his death, December 22d.
VESPASIAN (æt. 60) was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria on July 1st, and was acknowledged as emperor by the senate on the death of Vitellius.
On the death of Galba followed the civil war between Otho and Vitellius. The generals of Vitellius march into Italy, and defeat the troops of Otho at the battle of Bedriacum. Thereupon Otho put an end to his own life at Brixellum, April 16th. Vitellius is in Gaul at the time of Otho's death; he visits the field of battle toward the end of May, and then proceeds to Rome. Meantime the generals of Vespasian invade Italy, take Cremona, and march upon Rome. They force their way into Rome, and kill Vitellius, December 22d. The Capitol burned. The war against the Jews suspended this year.

(1) NOTES TO TABLE I.

* Some make the doxunē = πρὸβαρῆ.
 † The accounts of these measures are various and somewhat confused. (See Wurm, p. 91; Hussey, p. 235.)
 ‡ A measure mentioned by some late writers, which, from its name, may be presumed to have been used for measuring timber.
 N.B. Approximate Values.—From the above table it will be seen that the Greek Foot, Cubit, and Orguia only exceeded the English Foot, Foot and a half, and Fathom by about 1-10th, 2-10ths, and 8-10ths of an inch respectively.

(2) NOTES TO TABLE II.

* It is not thought necessary to give the whole scale of the Uncial divisions of the foot. They can be easily calculated from the Uncia.
 † The accounts of this measure are various and somewhat confused. (See Wurm, p. 91; Hussey, p. 235.)
 N.B. Approximate Values.—The Roman Unctia, Pes, and Cubitus only fall short of our Inch, Foot, and Foot and a half by less than 1-10th, 4-10ths, and 6-10ths of an inch respectively.

(1) NOTES TO TABLE III.

* In order to show the relations more clearly, the foreign measures most familiar to the Greeks are included in this table.

† This is, of course, not the true number of English statute miles contained in a degree of a great circle of the earth, but the number computed from the data exhibited in the table, some of which are only approximate; namely, 1 degree = 75 Roman miles = 600 Greek stadia, and 1 Greek foot = 12·135 inches. The true value of a degree in English miles is 69½ = 69·9196, and the difference is only about 7·100ths of a mile.

(2) NOTE TO TABLE IV.

* See note to Table III.

N.B. The Roman mile only differs from the English by less than 1·10th.

* As the Sextarius differs from the English pint by only 1.25th part of the latter, it will be found useful, in ordinary rough calculations, to take it at exactly a pint, and so with the other measures in this table. The results thus obtained may be corrected by subtracting from each of them its 1.25th part.
N.B. The Ἐγκριάζον measures of capacity may be easily obtained from these, according to the ratio given under QUADRANTAL.

* In this and the other tables the English weights used are those of the avoirdupois scale as fixed by statute; namely, the grain = the Troy grain, the ounce = 437 $\frac{1}{2}$ grains, the pound = 16 ounces = 7000 grains.
† Or $\frac{1}{3}$ of an ounce.

3. Euboic or Attic Commercial Weights.*

* See Dict. of Antiq., p. 933, b., 934, a. It is here assumed that the Attic commercial mina was exactly 138 $\frac{2}{3}$ silver drachmæ, not 138, as stated in the decree. The difference is not quite half a grain in the drachma.

4. Attic Commercial Weights Increased.*

* Respecting the sense in which sums of ancient money are said to be equivalent to certain sums of our money, see NUMMUS in Dict. of Antiq.
 † The Drachma was very nearly equal to the French Franc.
 ‡ Or, approximately, £350, the difference being only 1-40th.

II. Æginetan and Euboic Silver.—The coins of these systems can be easily calculated from the Attic, according to the ratios given in Table XI, No. 1. As thus calculated, the Æginetan Talent was equal to £406 5s., and the Euboic was equal to £338 10s. 10d., and the Drachmæ were equal respectively to 1s. 4½d. for the Æginetan, and 1s. 1½d. + 4th of a farthing for the Euboic. Respecting the values of the coins actually found, see NUMMUS.

III. Grecian Gold.—The values of the Grecian gold money can not be conveniently reduced to the tabular form: they will be found in the articles STATER and DAREICUS.
